The power "to make such disposal of the estate as shall," in the judgment of the trustees, "benefit and increase the value of said estate,"—as also the duty of paying Mary Lucy "such installments of money as in the judgment of said trustees shall be proper and sufficient to meet her current expenses and provide an ample and comfortable support,"—necessarily imply the power to sell the lands and convert them into money or interest bearing securities; for this might well, in the judgment of the trustees, benefit and increase the estate, and be essential to make payment of the sums directed to be paid to Mary Lucy. The power implied to sell, is to sell the whole title,—and to this is essential the power to convey that title, requiring, as a condition precedent, a fee-simple estate in the trustees.

The property is devised to the trustees to sell and convey, if they deem it advisable, or to hold and control until it is to be transferred as directed; and in the contingency that has arisen, it was intended that it should be the duty of the trustees to make the equal division of the property between the corporations designated and convey it accordingly; for the grant to these corporations is in severalty, and not as tenants in common, and their title must necessarily rest on the conveyance of the trustees.

Whether the corporations can hold or not is not now material. The words of the devise show the intention of the testator that the trustees should take a fee, whether he was mistaken in the law as respects the objects of his intended bounty or not. The only difference would be, if the corporations cannot take, the trustees, instead of holding the legal title in trust for them, hold it in trust for the heirs at law. Hill, Trustees (4th Am. Ed.) 208, 209.

The legal title, then, being in the trustees, the heirs at law could not maintain ejectment. Perry, Trusts, §§ 17, 328, 520; Hill, Trustees (4th Am. Ed.) 422, 423, *274; Id. 482, *317; Id. 672, *428; Id. 784, *503; Bull. & T. Trusts & Trustees, p. 811.

Judgment reversed.

Court of Appeals of New York. Feb. 28, 1882.

Appeal from judgment of the general term of the supreme court, in the Second judicial department, entered upon an order made the second Monday of December, 1881, which affirmed a judgment in favor of plaintiff, entered upon a decision of the court on trial at special term. Reported below, 25 Hun, 574.

This action was brought to obtain a construction of the will of John Walsh, late of the city of New York, deceased. The clauses of the will as to which there was any controversy are as follows:

"Thirdly. I give, devise, and bequeath unto my said son James, during his natural life, all the rents, issues, and profits of my real estate, and in case he marries and has lawful issue, then and in the last-mentioned event and thereupon I give, devise, and bequeath to my said son James all and singular my real estate, whatsoever and wheresoever, to have and to hold, the same to my said son, his heirs and assigns forever.

"Fourthly. I desire my executors to keep the buildings on my real estate insured against loss or damage by fire, and in repair, and to pay all taxes, assessments, and other charges thereon, and also the interest on incumbrances by mortgage thereon; and, if necessary, they are authorized to receive sufficient of the rents to enable them so to do; and in case of damage or loss by fire they are to receive the avails of the insurance, and to repair or rebuild; but this clause of my will is only to have effect until my said son James shall have lawful issue; and I also authorize my said executors, until that event, to raise, by mortgage of my real estate, or any part thereof, whenever and as often as shall be necessary, a similar amount as is now on mortgage of my said estate, wherewith to discharge the present mortgage if necessary.

"Fifthly. In case of the death of my son James without ever having had any lawful issue, I desire my executors who shall then be surviving, or the last survivor, to sell all my real estate, and to distribute the proceeds thereof amongst my next of kin as personal estate, according to the laws of the state of New York for the distribution of intestate personal estate; and for that purpose I authorize my said surviving executors or the last survivor to execute good, valid, and sufficient conveyances in the law to transfer said estate, and vest the same in the purchaser and purchasers in fee simple.

"Lastly. I appoint my beloved wife, and my beloved son James, and my friend Tighe Davey to be the executors of this my last will and testament."

The testator died in 1836, leaving, surviving him, his son James, one nephew, the plaintiff herein, and four nieces. James died in 1880, unmarried, and having had no lawful issue. The two other executors died before him, as did also the four nieces of the testator. The defendants are the children of said nieces.

John W. Goff, for appellant McCormack. Luke F. Cozans and J. Woolsey Shephard, for appellants Walker et al. John R. Kuhn, for respondent.

FINCH, J. The testator gave to his son James the whole of his real estate for life, and absolutely and in fee, in case the son married and had issue; but if he died without having had lawful issue, the testator directed his executors who should then be surviving, or the last survivor of them, to sell his real estate and distribute the proceeds among the testator's "next of kin, as personal estate, according to the laws of the state of New York, for the distribution of intestate personal estate." The executors named were the testator's wife, his son James, and his friend Tighe Davey; all of whom are dead. James died without having had lawful issue. At testator's death his next of kin were his son James, four nieces, and a nephew, who is the present plaintiff. The four nieces died during the lifetime of James, but leaving children who are defendants here, and claim an interest in the proceeds of the real estate, or in the real estate itself. At the date of the death of James the plaintiff was the sole next of kin of the testator, and claiming the entire proceeds of the real estate, brought an action for a construction of the will and the appointment of a trustee to carry out its unexecuted provisions. The trial court determined that it had jurisdiction to appoint a trustee, and made such appointment, and that the plaintiff was entitled to the entire proceeds of the real estate after payment of the liens thereon. That judgment was affirmed, and the children of two of the nieces bring this appeal.

It is contended in their behalf that the devise to James, before marriage and the birth of issue, was but a life estate; that the remainder in fee vested at the death of testator in his heirs at law; that the four nieces and plaintiff took such remainder in fee as tenants in common, subject to be divested by the marriage of James and birth of lawful issue; that this contingency not having occurred the fee was not divested; and that it cannot be divested by a sale of the real estate and disposition of the proceeds as personalty because the power of sale given to the executors was a mere naked power, not coupled with any interest; died with the donees to whom it was given; and cannot be executed by a court of equity.

It might prove to be the better opinion that James took a base, or determinable fee, subject to be divested upon his death without having had lawful issue, so that during his life there was no fragment of the estate to descend upon his heirs at law, but the character of his interest need not be particularly discussed if the power of sale survived the death of the executors, and the real estate is to be distributed as personalty. That is the vital point in the case, and the appellant's view of it is sought to be sustained by a reference to the rule at common law, which, it is said, the Revised Statutes have not seriously changed, but have omitted any provision, express or implied, which gives the court authority to appoint a trustee to execute a naked power. The argument turns in the end upon the single inquiry whether the authority given to the executors to sell is a mere naked power, or a power in trust and its execution imperative. The statutory provisions must control and determine the result, and render unnecessary any discussion or examination of the cases previously decided, which were not always harmonious and in some instances not easily reconciled. They were very ably and patiently examined in Dominick v. Sayre, 3 Sandf. 555, resulting in a general conclusion that the statutory revision substantially followed and adopted the rules of the common law, departing from them only to remove doubts and secure greater accuracy and precision. But in any event the statutes must furnish the rule by which we are to be guided to a conclusion, for they begin with a comprehensive provision abolishing all powers as then existing by law, and making their creation, construction and execution to be governed by the succeeding enactments. 1 Rev. St. pt. 2, c. 1, tit. 2, art. 3, § 73. A power is there defined to be "an authority to do some act in relation to lands, or the creation of estates therein, or of charges thereon, which the owner granting or reserving such power might himself lawfully perform." Section 74. The authority here given to the executors of John Walsh to sell the lands and distribute the proceeds in the event of the death of James without having had issue was clearly a power within the statutory definition. It was also a general and not a special power, for the former exists where the authority permits the alienation in fee by means of a conveyance, will or charge of the lands embraced in the power to any alienee whatever (section 77), and the latter when the alienation must be to designated persons, or of a less estate or interest than a fee. Section 78. A distinction is then drawn between cases in which no person other than the grantee of the power has any interest in its execution, in which case the power, whether general or special, is denominated beneficial (section 79), and cases in which the grantee has no interest in its execution, but holds it for the benefit of others. A general power is in trust "when any person or class of persons, other than the grantee of such power, is designated as entitled to the proceeds, or any portion of the proceeds, or other benefits to result from the alienation of the lands according to the power." Within this definition the general power conferred upon the executors to sell the lands and distribute the proceeds to testator's next of kin was a power in trust, in the execution of which the grantees had no interest, for, although James was one of them, the power, by its terms, was to be exercised upon his death, and in an event which left him without any interest in its execution. These statutory definitions seem to us entirely accurate and clear and scarcely need, at least for present purposes, the "authoritative exposition" invoked. A power to be exercised by the grantee, not at all for his own benefit but wholly and entirely for the benefit of some other person or class of persons, is necessarily exercised by such grantee in a trust capacity. The element of trust inheres in its substance and is its essential and vital characteristic. The statutes then provide that every trust power shall be imperative, and impose a duty upon the grantee, the performance of which may be compelled in equity, unless in a case where its execution or non-execution is made expressly to depend upon the will of the grantee, and does not cease to be such even though he may have the right to select some and exclude others from among the objects of the trust. Sections 96, 97. So far, it is determined for us, that the authority granted to the executors of John Walsh is a general power in trust, and imperative. Being such, a further provision, reaching the emergency of the death of the grantees, becomes applicable. It is enacted (section 102) that the provisions of sections 66 to 71 of article 2, relating to express trusts, shall apply to powers in trust, and section 68 of that article confers upon the court, upon the death of the surviving trustee, his powers and duties, and permits them to be exercised by some person appointed for that purpose under the direction of the court. The statutes therefore answer the whole argument of the appellants. The power in trust conferred upon the executors did not die with them, but survived and vested in the courts of equity having full power to compel the execution of the trust. If in Catton v. Taylor, 42 Barb. 578, there is any thing to the contrary, which seems to be the fact, it was decided without reference to the statutes and does not alter or modify our conclusion. The power in this case was general, in trust and imperative. It was not of a character personal to the trustees as involving the exercise of their individual choice and discretion, and might as well be executed by persons other than themselves. Probably it would have survived before the Revised Statutes, but certainly remains and is enforceable since.

Assuming then the validity of the trust power and the jurisdiction of equity to provide for its exercise, the appellants still contend that the "next of kin," to whom the proceeds of the real estate were to be distributed, are the persons or their representatives who were such at the date of the death of the testator, and not those who were such at the date of the death of James. There is no question here of the suspension of the power of alienation, for the sale and distribution awaited only the termination of a single life; but nevertheless the argument of the appellants proceeds, and must necessarily proceed, upon the idea that the next of kin of the testator at his death took vested interests in a legacy, payable in the future, since otherwise the right of each would lapse and nothing would pass to their representatives. But there is no gift to the next of kin, and no language importing such gift, except in the direction to convert the real estate into money and then make distribution; and in such case the rule is settled that time is annexed to the substance of the gift and the vesting is postponed. Much more is that true where the gift is only to vest upon the happening of a future contingency, until the occurrence of which it is uncertain whether a gift will be made at all. Warner v. Durant, 76 N. Y. 136; Leake v. Robinson, 2 Mer. 387; Smith v. Edwards, 88 N. Y. 92. Here a future condition or contingency attached to the substance of the gift. It was conditioned upon the death of James without having had lawful issue, so that the vesting was plainly postponed and the gift was future. There is the further and important fact that at the death of James the land was to be converted into personalty and be distributed as such, and the very subject of the gift was not to come into existence until the prescribed contingency. Vincent v. Newhouse, 83 N. Y. 511; Hoghton v. Whitgreave, 1 Jac. & W. 145. The case therefore falls within the rule that where the gift is money, and the direction for the conversion absolute, the legacy given to a class of persons vests in those who answer the description and are capable of taking at the time of distribution. Teed v. Morton, 60 N. Y. 506. Adding to these considerations the incongruity of a construction which would include James himself among the next of kin in the testator's mind and intention, we are entirely clear that the courts below correctly decided that the next of kin entitled were those who answered that description at the date of the distribution. We discover therefore no error in the disposition of the case.

The judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

All concur.

Judgment affirmed.

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—26

JACKSON v. PHILLIPS et al.

(14 Allen, 539.)

Suffolk. Jan. Term, 1867.

Bill in equity by the executor of the will of Francis Jackson, of Boston, for instructions as to the validity and effect of the following bequests and devises:

"Article 4th. I give and bequeath to William Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Edmund Quincy, Maria W. Chapman, L. Maria Child, Edmund Jackson, William I. Bowditch, Samuel May, Jr., and Charles K. Whipple, their successors and assigns, ten thousand dollars; not for their own use, but in trust, nevertheless, for them to use and expend at their discretion, without any responsibility to any one, in such sums, at such times and such places, as they deem best, for the preparation and circulation of books, newspapers, the delivery of speeches, lectures, and such other means, as, in their judgment, will create a public sentiment that will put an end to negro slavery in this country; and I hereby constitute them a board of trustees for that purpose, with power to fill all vacancies that may occur from time to time by death or resignation of any member or of any officer of said board. And I hereby appoint Wendell Phillips president, Edmund Jackson treasurer, and Charles K. Whipple secretary, of said board of trustees. Other bequests, hereinafter made, will sooner or later revert to this board of trustees. My desire is that they may become a permanent organization; and I hope and trust that they will receive the services and sympathy, the donations and bequests, of the friends of the slave.

"Article 5th. I give and bequeath to the board of trustees named in the fourth article of this will, their successors and assigns, two thousand dollars, not for their own use, but in trust, nevertheless, to be expended by them at their discretion, without any responsibility to any one, for the benefit of fugitive slaves who may escape from the slaveholding states of this infamous Union from time to time.

"Disregarding the self-evident declaration of 1776, repeated in her own constitution of 1780, that 'all men are born free and equal,' Massachusetts has since, in the face of those solemn declarations, deliberately entered into a conspiracy with other states to aid them in enslaving millions of innocent persons. I have long labored to help my native state out of her deep iniquity and her barefaced hypocrisy in this matter. I now enter my last protest against her inconsistency, her injustice, and her cruelty, towards an unoffending people. God save the fugitive slaves that escape to her borders, whatever may become of the commonwealth of Massachusetts!

"Article 6th. I give and bequeath to Wendell Phillips of said Boston, Lucy Stone, formerly of Brookfield, Mass., now the wife of Henry Blackwell of New York, and Susan B. Anthony of Rochester, N. Y., their successors and assigns, five thousand dollars, not for their own use, but in trust, nevertheless, to be expended by them, without any responsibility to any one, at their discretion, in such sums, at such times, and in such places, as they may deem fit, to secure the passage of laws granting women, whether married or unmarried, the right to vote; to hold office; to hold, manage, and devise property; and all other civil rights enjoyed by men; and for the preparation and circulation of books, the delivery of lectures, and such other means as they may judge best; and I hereby constitute them a board of trustees for that intent and purpose, with power to add two other persons to said board if they deem it expedient. And I hereby appoint Wendell Phillips president and treasurer, and Susan B. Anthony secretary, of said board. I direct the treasurer of said board not to loan any part of said bequest, but to invest, and, if need be, sell and re-invest, the same in bank or railroad shares, at his discretion. I further authorize and request said board of trustees, the survivors and survivor of them, to fill any and all vacancies that may occur from time to time by death or resignation of any member or of any officer of said board. One other bequest, hereinafter made, will, sooner or later, revert to this board of trustees. My desire is that they may become a permanent organization, until the rights of women shall be established equal with those of men; and I hope and trust that said board will receive the services and sympathy, the donations and bequests, of the friends of human rights. And being desirous that said board should have the immediate benefit of said bequest, without waiting for my exit, I have already paid it in advance and in full to said Phillips, the treasurer of said board, whose receipt therefor is on my files.

"Article 8th. I now give to my three children equally the net income of the residue of my estate, during the term of their natural lives, in the following manner, namely: After the payment of my debts and the foregoing gifts and bequests, I give, bequeath and devise one undivided third part of the residue of my estate, real, personal and mixed, to my brother Edmund Jackson of said Boston, his successors and assigns, not for his or their own use, but in trust, nevertheless, with full power to manage, sell and convey, invest and re-invest, the same at his discretion, with a view to safety and profit;" and "the whole net income thereof shall be paid semi-annually to my daughter Eliza F. Eddy, during her natural life;" and at her decease, one-half of such income to be paid semi-annually "to the board of trustees constituted in the sixth article of this will, to be expended by them to promote the intent and purpose therein directed," and the other half to Lizzie F. Bacon, her daughter, during her natural life; and at the decease of both mother and daughter, "to pay and convey the whole of said trust fund to said board of trustees constituted in the sixth article of this will, to be expended by them in the manner, and for the intent and purpose, therein directed."

By article 9th, the testator gave another undivided third part of the said residue to his brother Edmund, his successors and assigns, in trust, with like powers of management and investment, "and the whole net income thereof shall be paid semi-annually to my son James Jackson, during the term of his natural life; at his decease, I direct said trustee, or whoever may then be duly qualified to execute this trust, to pay semi-annually one-half part of the net income thereof to the board of trustees constituted in the fourth article of this will, and the other half-part of said net income shall be paid semi-annually to his children equally, during their natural lives; at the decease of all his children, if they survive him, I direct said trustee, or whoever shall then be duly authorized to execute this trust, to pay and convey the whole of said trust fund to said board of trustees constituted in said fourth article in this will, to be expended by them for the intent and purpose directed in said fourth article; but, in case my said son James should leave no child living at the time of his decease, then, at his decease, I direct said trustee, or whoever shall then be duly authorized to execute this trust, to pay and convey the whole of said trust fund to said board of trustees constituted in the fourth article of this will, to be expended by them for the intent and purpose therein directed."

By article 10th, the testator made a similar bequest and devise of the remaining undivided third part of said residue to his brother George Jackson, his successors and assigns, and in trust to pay the whole net income thereof semi-annually to the testator's daughter Harriette M. Palmer, during her natural life, and at her decease, one half of such income "to the board of trustees constituted in the fourth article of this will, to be expended by them in the manner and for the intent and purpose therein directed;" and the other half, in equal proportions, to all her children that may survive her, during the term of their natural lives; and, at their decease, to pay and convey the whole of said trust fund to said board of trustees; "but, in case my said daughter Harriette M. Palmer should outlive all her children, then, at her decease, I direct said trustee, or whoever shall then be duly authorized to execute this trust, to pay and convey the whole of said trust fund to the board of trustees constituted in said fourth article in this will, to be expended by them as aforesaid."

S. E. Sewall, for one of the trustees. G. W. Phillips, for others of the trustees. S. Bartlett and J. G. King, for certain heirs at law.

GRAY, J. This case presents for decision many important and interesting questions, which have been the subject of repeated discussion at the bar and of much deliberation and reflection by the court. The able and elaborate arguments of counsel have necessarily involved the consideration of the fundamental principles of the law of charities, and of a great number of the precedents from which they are to be derived; and have disclosed such diversity of opinion upon the extent and application of those principles, and the just interpretation and effect of the adjudged cases, as to require the principles in question to be fully stated, and supported by a careful examination of authorities, in delivering judgment.

I. By the law of this commonwealth, as by the law of England, gifts to charitable uses are highly favored, and will be most liberally construed in order to accomplish the intent and purpose of the donor; and trusts which cannot be upheld in ordinary cases, for various reasons, will be established and carried into effect when created to support a gift to a charitable use. The most important distinction between charities and other trusts is in the time of duration allowed and the degree of definiteness required. The law does not allow property to be made inalienable, by means of a private trust, beyond the period prescribed by the rule against perpetuities, being a life or lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards; and if the persons to be benefited are uncertain and cannot be ascertained within that period, the gift will be adjudged void, and a resulting trust declared for the heirs at law or distributees. But a public or charitable trust may be perpetual in its duration, and may leave the mode of application and the selection of particular objects to the discretion of the trustees. Sanderson v. White, 18 Pick. 333; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 5, 6, and authorities cited; Saltonstall v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 446; Lewin, Trusts, c. 2.

Each of the bequests in the will of Francis Jackson, which the court is asked in this case to sustain as charitable, is to a permanent board of trustees, for a purpose stated in general terms only. The question of the validity of these trusts is not to be determined by the opinions of individual judges or of the whole court as to their wisdom or policy, but by the established principles of law; and does not depend merely upon their being permitted by law, but upon their being of that peculiar nature which the law deems entitled to extraordinary favor because it regards them as charitable.

It has been strenuously contended for the heirs at law that neither of the purposes declared by the testator is charitable within the intent and purview of St. 43 Eliz. c. 4, which all admit to be the principal test and evidence of what are in law charitable uses. It becomes necessary therefore to consider the spirit in which that statute has been construed and applied by the courts.

The preamble of the statute mentions three classes of charitable gifts, namely, First: For the relief and assistance of the poor and needy, specifying only "sick and maimed soldiers and mariners," "education and preferment of orphans," "marriages of poor maids," "supportation, aid and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen and persons decayed," "relief or redemption of prisoners and captives," and assistance of poor inhabitants in paying taxes, either for civil or military objects. Second: For the promoting of education, of which the only kinds specified in the statute (beyond the "education and preferment of orphans," which seems more appropriately to fall within the first class) are those "for maintenance of schools of learning, free schools, and scholars of universities." Third: For the repair and maintenance of public buildings and works, under which are enumerated "repair of ports, havens," and "seabanks," for promoting commerce and navigation and protecting the land against the encroachments of the sea; of "bridges," "causeways" and "highways," by which the people may pass from one part of the country to another; of "churches," in which religion may be publicly taught; and of "houses of correction."

It is well settled that any purpose is charitable in the legal sense of the word, which is within the principle and reason of this statute, although not expressly named in it; and many objects have been upheld as charities, which the statute neither mentions nor distinctly refers to. Thus a gift "to the poor" generally, or to the poor of a particular town, parish, age, sex, race, or condition, or to poor emigrants, though not falling within any of the descriptions of poor in the statute, is a good charitable gift. Saltonstall v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 455-461, and cases cited; Magill v. Brown, Brightly, N. P. 405, 406; Barclay v. Maskelyne, 4 Jur. (N. S.) 1294; Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo. 543. So gifts for the promotion of science, learning and useful knowledge, though by different means and in different ways from those enumerated under the second class; and gifts for bringing water into a town, for building a town-house, or otherwise improving a town or city, though not alluded to in the third class; have been held to be charitable. American Academy v. Harvard College, 12 Gray, 594; Drury v. Natick, 10 Allen, 177-182, and authorities cited. By modern decisions in England, gifts towards payment of the national debt, or "to the queen's chancellor of the exchequer for the time being, to be applied for the benefit and advantage of Great Britain," are legal charities. Tudor, Char. Trusts (2d Ed.) 14, 15, and cases cited. Sergeant Maynard, long before, gave an opinion that a bequest "to the public use of the country of New England" was a good disposition to a charitable use. 1 Hutch. Hist. Mass. (2d Ed.) 101, note. And it may be mentioned as evidence of the use of the word "charitable" by the founders of Massachusetts, that it was applied by the Massachusetts Company in 1628, before they crossed the ocean, to "the common stock" to be "raised from such as bear good affection to the plantation and the propagation thereof, and the same to be employed only in defrayment of public charges, as maintenance of ministers, transportation of poor families, building of churches and fortifications, and all other public and necessary occasions of the plantation." 1 Mass. Col. Rec. 68.

No kind of charitable trusts finds less support in the words of St. 43 Eliz. than the large class of pious and religious uses, to which the statute contains no more distinct reference than in the words "repair of churches." Such uses had indeed been previously recognized as charitable, and entitled to peculiar favor, by many acts of parliament, as well as in the courts of justice. St. 13 Edw. I. c. 41; 17 Edw. II. c. 2; 23 Hen. VIII. c. 10; 1 Edw. VI. c. 14; Anon., And. 43, pl. 108; Pitts v. James, Hob. 123; Cheney's Case, Co. Litt. 342; Gibbons v. Matyard, Poph. 6, Moore, 594; Coke's note to Porter's Case, 1 Coke, 26a; Bruerton's Case, 6 Coke, 1b, 2a; Barry v. Ley, Dwight, Char. Cas. 92. In the latest of those acts, the "erecting of grammar schools for the education of youth in virtue and godliness, the further augmenting of the universities, and better provision for the poor and needy," were classed with charities for the maintenance of preachers, and called "good and godly uses;" and grammar schools were considered in those times an effectual means of forwarding the progress of the Reformation. St. 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, §§ 1, 8, 9; Attorney General v. Downing, Wilm. 15; Boyle, Char. 7, 8. Sir Francis Moore, who drew St. 43 Eliz., indeed says that a gift to maintain a chaplain or minister to celebrate divine service could not be the subject of a commission under the statute; but "was of purpose omitted in the penning of the act," lest, in the changes of opinion in matters of religion, such gifts might be confiscated in a succeeding reign as superstitious. Yet he also says that such a gift might be enforced by "the chancellor by his chancery authority;" and cites a case in which it was so decreed. Duke, Char. Uses (Bridgman's Ed.) 125, 154. And from very soon after the passage of the statute, gifts for the support of a minister, the preaching of an annual sermon, or other uses connected with public worship and the advancement of religion, have been constantly upheld and carried out as charities in the English courts of chancery. Anon., Cary, 39; Nash, Char.; Dwight, Char. Cas. 114; Pember v. Inhabitants of Knighton, Herne, Char. Uses, 101, Toth. (2d Ed.) 34; Duke, Char. Uses, 354, 356, 381, 570, 614; Boyle, Char. 39-41; Tudor, Char. Trusts, 10, 11. So in this commonwealth, trusts for the support of public worship and religious instruction, or the spreading of religion at home or abroad, have always been deemed charitable uses. 4 Dane, Abr. 237; Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 536; Go- ing v. Emery, 16 Pick. 107; Sohler v. St. Paul's Church, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 250; Brown v. Kelsey, 2 Cush. 243; Earle v. Wood, 8 Cush. 445. It is not necessary in this connection to speculate whether the admission of pious uses into the rank of legal charities in modern times is to be attributed to the influence of the civil law; to their having been mentioned in the earlier English statutes; to a more liberal interpretation, after religion had become settled in England, of the words "repair of churches," or, possibly, of the clauses relating to gifts for the benefit of education, in St. 43 Eliz.; or to the support given by the court of chancery to public charitable trusts, independently of any statute. It is sufficient for our present purpose to observe that pious and religious uses are clearly not within the strict words of the statute, and can only be brought within its purview by the largest extension of its spirit.

The civil law, from which the English law of charities was manifestly derived, considered wills made for good and pious uses as privileged testaments, which were not, like other wills, void for uncertainty in the objects, and which must be carried into effect even if their conditions could not be exactly observed; and included among such uses (which it declared to be in their nature perpetual) bequests for the poor, orphans, widows, strangers, prisoners, the redemption of captives, the maintenance of clergymen, the benefit of churches, hospitals, schools and colleges, the repairing of city walls and bridges, the erection of public buildings, or other ornament or improvement of a city. Poth. Pand. lib. 30-32, Nos. 57-62; Code, lib. 1, tit. 2, cc. 15, 19; Id., tit. 3, cc. 24, 28, 42, 46, 49, 57; Godol. Leg. pt. 1, c. 5, § 4; 2 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 257; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1137-1141; McDonough v. Murdoch, 15 How. 405, 410, 414.

Charities are not confined at the present day to those which were permitted by law in England in the reign of Elizabeth. A gift for the advancement of religion or other charitable purpose in a manner permitted by existing laws is not the less valid by reason of having such an object as would not have been legal at the time of the passage of the statute of charitable uses. For example, charitable trusts for dissenters from the established church have been uniformly upheld in England since the toleration act of 1 Wm. & M. c. 18, removed the legal disabilities under which such sects previously labored. Attorney General v. Hickman, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 193, W. Kel. 34; Loyd v. Spillet, 3 P. Wms. 344, 2 Atk. 148; Attorney General v. Cock, 2 Ves. Sr. 273. And in this country since the Revolution no distinction has been made between charitable gifts for the benefit of different religious sects.

Gifts for purposes prohibited by or opposed to the existing laws cannot be upheld as charitable, even if for objects which would otherwise be deemed such. The bounty must, in the words of Sir Francis Moore, be "according to the laws, not against the law," and "not given to do some act against the law." Duke, Char. Uses, 126, 169. So Mr. Dane defines, as undoubted charities, "such as are calculated to relieve the poor, and to promote such education and employment as the laws of the land recognize as useful." 4 Dane, Abr. 237. Upon this principle, the English courts have refused to sustain gifts for printing and publishing a book inculcating the absolute and inalienable supremacy of the pope in ecclesiastical matters; or for the support of the Roman Catholic or the Jewish religion, before such gifts were countenanced by act of parliament. De Themmines v. De Bonneval, 5 Russ. 288; Tudor, Char. Trusts, 21-25, and cases cited. And a bequest "towards the political restoration of the Jews to Jerusalem and to their own land," has been held void, as tending to create a political revolution in a friendly country. Habershon v. Vardon, 4 De Gex & S. 467. In a free republic, it is the right of every citizen to strive in a peaceable manner by vote, speech or writing, to cause the laws, or even the constitution, under which he lives, to be reformed or altered by the legislature or the people. But it is the duty of the judicial department to expound and administer the laws as they exist. And trusts whose expressed purpose is to bring about changes in the laws or the political institutions of the country are not charitable in such a sense as to be entitled to peculiar favor, protection and perpetuation from the ministers of those laws which they are designed to modify or subvert.

A precise and complete definition of a legal charity is hardly to be found in the books. The one most commonly used in modern cases, originating in the judgment of Sir William Grant, confirmed by that of Lord Eldon, in Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 405, 10 Ves. 541—that those purposes are considered charitable which are enumerated in St. 43 Eliz. or which by analogies are deemed within its spirit and intendment—leaves something to be desired in point of certainty, and suggests no principle. Mr. Binney, in his great argument in the Girard Will Case, 41, defined a charitable or pious gift to be "whatever is given for the love of God, or for the love of your neighbor, in the catholic and universal sense—given from these motives, and to these ends—free from the stain or taint of every consideration that is personal, private or selfish." And this definition has been approved by the supreme court of Pennsylvania. Price v. Maxwell, 28 Pa. St. 35. A more concise and practical rule is that of Lord Camden, adopted by Chancellor Kent, by Lord Lyndhurst, and by the supreme court of the United States—"A gift to a general public use, which extends to the poor as well as the rich." Jones v. Williams, Amb. 652; Coggeshall v. Pelton, 7 Johns. Ch. 294; Mitford v. Reynolds, 1 Phil.

191, 192; Perin v. Carey, 24 How. 506. A charity, in the legal sense, may be more fully defined as a gift, to be applied consistently with existing laws, for the benefit of an indefinite number of persons, either by bringing their minds or hearts under the influence of education or religion, by relieving their bodies from disease, suffering or constraint, by assisting them to establish themselves in life, or by erecting or maintaining public buildings or works or otherwise lessening the burdens of government. It is immaterial whether the purpose is called charitable in the gift itself, if it is so described as to show that it is charitable in its nature.

If the words of a charitable bequest are ambiguous or contradictory, they are to be so construed as to support the charity, if possible. It is an established maxim of interpretation, that the court is bound to carry the will into effect, if it can see a general intention consistent with the rules of law, even if the particular mode or manner pointed out by the testator is illegal. Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 543; Inglis v. Sailor's Snug Harbor, 3 Pet. 117, 118. If the testator uses a word which has two meanings, one of which will effect and the other defeat his object, the first is to be adopted. Saltonstall v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 455. When a charitable intent appears on the face of the will, but the terms used are broad enough to allow of the fund being applied either in a lawful or an unlawful manner, the gift will be supported, and its application restrained within the bounds of the law. The most frequent illustrations of this in the English courts have arisen under St. 9 Geo. II. c. 36 (commonly called the "Statute of Mortmain"), prohibiting devises of land, or bequests of money to be laid out in land, to charitable uses. In the leading case, Lord Hardwicke held that a direction to executors to "settle and secure, by purchase of lands of inheritance, or otherwise, as they shall be advised, out of my personal estate," two annuities to be paid yearly forever for charitable objects, was valid, because it left the option to the executor to make the investment in personal property, which was not prohibited by the statute; and said, "This bequest is not void, and there is no authority to construe it to be void, if by law it can possibly be made good," or (according to another and perhaps more accurate report) "no authority to construe it to be void by law, if it can possibly be made good." Sorresby v. Hollins, 9 Mod. 221, 1 Coll. Jurid. 439. The doctrine of that case has ever since been recognized as sound law. Attorney General v. Whitchurch, 3 Ves. 144; Curtis v. Hutton, 14 Ves. 539; Dent v. Allcroft, 30 Beav. 340; Mayor, etc., of Faversham v. Ryder, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 353; Edwards v. Hall, 11 Hare. 12, 6 De Gex, M. & G. 89. In a like spirit the house of lords recently decided that a bequest to erect buildings for charitable purposes if other lands should be given was valid, and could not be held to be impliedly prohibited by St. 9 Geo. II. Philpott v. St. George's Hospital 6 H. L. Cas. 338. The rule stated in Attorney General v. Williams, 2 Cox, Ch. 388, and Tatham v. Drummond, 11 L. T. (N. S.) 325, upon which the heirs at law rely, that "the court will not alter its conception of the purposes of a testator, merely because those intentions happen to fall within the prohibition of the statute of mortmain," shows that no forced construction of the testator's language is to be adopted to avoid illegality, but does not affect the principle that a bequest which according to the fair meaning of the words may include a legal as well as an illegal application is to be held valid.

In the light of these general principles, we come to the consideration of the language of the different bequests in this will.

II. The first bequest which is drawn in question is that contained in the fourth article of the will, by which the sum of ten thousand dollars is given in trust to be used and expended at the discretion of the trustees, "in such sums, at such times and such places as they deem best, for the preparation and circulation of books, newspapers, the delivery of speeches, lectures and such other means as in their judgment will create a public sentiment that will put an end to the negro slavery in this country;" and the testator expresses a desire that they may become a permanent organization, and a hope "that they will receive the services and sympathy, the donations and bequests, of the friends of the slave."

Among the charitable objects specially designated in St. 43 Eliz. is the "relief or redemption of prisoners and captives." And this was not a peculiarity of the law of England or of that age. The civil law regarded the redemption of captives as the highest of all pious uses—in the words of Justinian, causa piissima—and not only declared that no heir, trustee or legatee should infringe or unjustly defeat the pious intentions of the testator by asserting that a legacy or trust for the redemption of captives was uncertain, and provided for the appointment of a trustee when none was named in the will, and for informing him of the bequest, but even authorized churches to alienate their sacred vessel and vestments for this one purpose, upon the ground that it was reasonable that the souls or lives of men should be preferred to any vessels or vestments whatsoever—"Quoniam non absurdum est animas hominum quibuscunque vasis vel vestimentis preferri." Code, lib. 1, tit. 2, c. 22; Id., tit. 3, cc. 28, 49; Id., lib. 8, tit. 54, c. 36; Nov. 7, c. 8; Id., p. 115, c. 3; Id., p. 120, c. 10; Id., p. 131, c. 11; Godol. Leg. pt. 1, c. 5, § 4.

The captives principally contemplated in St. 43 Eliz. were doubtless Englishmen taken and held as slaves in Turkey and Barbary. And the relief of our own citizens from such captivity was always deemed charitable in Massachusetts, an illustration of which is found in the records of the governor and council in 1693, by whom a petition of the relations of two inhabitants of the province, "some time since taken by a Salley man of war, and now under Turkish captivity and slavery," for permission "to ask and receive the charity and public contribution of well disposed persons for redeeming them out of their miserable suffering and slavery," was granted; "the money so collected to be employed for the end aforesaid, unless the said persons happen to die before, make their escape, or be in any other way redeemed; then the money so gathered to be improved for the redemption of some others of this province, that are or may be in like circumstances, as the governor and council shall direct." Council Rec. 1693, fol. 323. But there is no more reason for confining the words of the statute of Elizabeth to such captives, than for excluding from the class of religious charities gifts for preaching the gospel to the heathen, which have uniformly been sustained as charitable, here and in England. Boyle, Char. 41; Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 536. Indeed it appears by Sir Francis Moore's reading upon the statute, that even in his time the word "captives" might include captive enemies. Duke, Char. Uses, 158.

It was argued that the slave trade was fostered and rewarded by the English government in the reign of Elizabeth, and therefore gifts for the relief of negro slaves could not be deemed within the purview of the statute of charitable uses. The fact is undoubted; but the conclusion does not follow. The permission of slavery by law does not prevent emancipation from being charitable. A commission of manumission, granted by Queen Elizabeth, twenty-seven years before the statute, recites that in the beginning God created all men free by nature, and afterwards the law of nations placed some under the yoke of slavery, and that the queen believed it would be pious and acceptable to God and according to Christian charity—"pium fore credimus et Deo acceptabile Christianæque charitati consentaneum"—to wholly enfranchise the villeins of the crown on certain royal manors. 20 Howell, St. Tr. 1372. See, also, Bar. Ob. (5th Ed.) 305, 308. The spirit of the Roman law upon this point is manifested by an edict of Constantine, which speaks of those who with a religious sentiment in the bosom of the church grant their slaves that liberty which is their due—"Qui religiosâ mente in ecclesiæ gremio servis suis meritam concesserint libertatem." Code, lib. 1, tit. 13, c. 2. That the words of the statute of charitable uses may be extended to negro slaves of English masters is clearly shown by the decision of Lord Cottenham, when master of the rolls, applying for the benefit of negroes in the British colonies in the West Indies the accumulations of a bequest made in 1670 "to redeem poor slaves." Attorney General v. Gibson, 2 Beav.

317, note; Id., cited Craig & P. 226. In dealing with such a question, great regard is to be had to the favor which the law gives to liberty, so eloquently expressed by Chief Justice Fortescue: "Crudelis enim necessario judicabitur lex, quæ servitutem augmentat et minuit libertatem. Nam pro eâ natura semper implorat humana. Quia ab homine et pro vitio introducta est servitus. Sed libertas a Deo hominis est indita naturæ. Quare ipsa ab homine sublata semper redire gliscit, ut facit omne quod libertati naturali privatur. Quo ipse et crudelis judicandus est, qui libertati non favet. Hæc considerantia Angliæ jura in omni casu libertati dant favorem." Fortes. De Laud. c. 42.

But the question of the lawfulness of this gift, if falling within the class of charitable uses, depends not upon the laws and the public policy of England at the time of the passage of the statute, but upon our own at the time of the death of the testator. It was seriously argued that, before the recent amendment of the constitution of the United States, "a trust to create a sentiment to put an end to negro slavery, would, having regard to the constitution and laws under which we live, be against public policy and thus be void;" but the court is unable to see any foundation for this position in the constitution and laws, either of the United States or of this commonwealth.

The law of Massachusetts has always been peculiarly favorable to freedom, as may be shown by a brief outline of its history. The "rights, liberties and privileges," established by the general court of the colony in 1641, to be "impartially and inviolably enjoyed and observed throughout our jurisdiction forever," declared: "There shall never be any bond slavery, villenage or captivity amongst us, unless it be lawful captives taken in just wars, and such strangers as willingly sell themselves or are sold to us. And these shall have all the liberties and Christian usages which the law of God established in Israel concerning such persons doth morally require. This exempts none from servitude who shall be judged thereto by authority." The last proviso evidently referred to punishment for crime. Body of Liberties, art. 91. This article, leaving out the word "strangers" in the clause as to slaves acquired by sale, was included in each revision of the laws of the colony. Mass. Col. Laws (Ed. 1660) 5; Id. (Ed. 1672) 10; 4 Mass. Col. Rec. pt. 2, p. 467. It is worthy of observation, that the tenure upon which the Massachusetts Company held their charter, as declared in the charter itself, was as of the manor of East Greenwich in the county of Kent; that no one was ever born a villein in Kent (Y. B. 30 Edw. I, p. 168; Fitzh. Abr. "Villenage," 46; 3 Seld. Works, 1876); and that the Body of Liberties contained articles upon each of the principal points distinctive of the Kentish tenure of gavelkind—freedom from escheats on attainder and execution for felony, the power to devise, the age of alienation, and descent to all the sons together—adopting some and modifying others. Body of Liberties, arts. 10, 11, 53, 81; 2 Bl. Comm. 84.

In the laws of Europe, at the time of the foundation of the colony, descent was named first among the sources of slavery. The common law, following the civil law, repeated "Servi aut nascuntur aut fiunt," and differed only in tracing it through the father, instead of the mother; and each system recognized that a man might become a slave by capture in war, or by his own consent or confession in some form. Just. Inst. lib. 1, tit. 3; Bract. 4b; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 3; Eedes v. Holbadge, Act. Can. 393; Swinb. Wills, pt. 2, § 7; Co. Litt. 117b. And such was then the established law of nations. Gro. De Jure B. lib. 2, c. 5, §§ 27, 29; Id. lib. 3, c. 7. In parts of England, hereditary villenage would seem to have still existed in fact; and it was allowed by law until since the American Revolution. Pigg v. Caley, Noy, 27; Co. Litt. 116-140; 2 Inst. 28, 45; 2 Rolle, Abr. 732; Smith v. Brown, 2 Salk. 666, Holt, 495; Smith v. Gould, 2 Salk. 667, 2 Ld. Raym. 1275; Treblecock's Case, 1 Atk. 633; The King v. Ditton, 4 Doug. 302. Lord Bacon, in explaining the maxim, "Jura sanguinis nulla jure civili dirimi possunt," with a coolness which shows that in his day and country the illustration was neither unfamiliar nor shocking, says, "If a villein be attainted, yet the lord shall have the issue of his villein born before or after his attainder; for the lord hath them jure nature but as the increase of a flock." Bac. Max. reg. 11.

The Massachusetts Body of Liberties, as Governor Winthrop tells us, was composed by Nathaniel Ward, who had been "formerly a student and practiser in the course of the common law." 2 Winthrop's Hist. New England, 55. In view of the other laws of the time, the omission, in enumerating the legal sources of slavery, of birth, the first mentioned in those laws, is significant. No instance is known in which the lawfulness of hereditary slavery in Massachusetts under the charter of the colony or the province was affirmed by legislative or judicial authority; and it has been denied in a series of judgments of this court, beginning in the last century, in each of which it was essential to the determination of the rights of the parties. Littleton v. Tuttle, 4 Mass. 128, note; Lanesborough v. Westfield, 16 Mass. 74; Edgartown v. Tisbury, 10 Cush. 408. The case of Perkins v. Emerson, 2 Dane, Abr. 412, did not touch this question; but simply determined that a person received into a house as a slave of the owner was not received "as an inmate, boarder or tenant," so that notice of the place whence such person last came must be given to the selectmen under Prov. St. 10 Geo. II.; Anc. Chart. 508. No doubt many children of slaves were in fact held as slaves here, especially after the Province

Charter, during the period of which all acts of the general court were required to be transmitted to England for approval. Earlier ordinances which had not been so approved were hardly recognized by the English government as of any force. The policy of England restrained the colonists from abolishing the African slave trade, and the number of slaves (which had been very small under the comparatively independent government of the colony) was much increased. The practice of a whole people does not always conform to its laws. Thousands of negroes were held as slaves in England and commonly sold in public at the very time when Lord Mansfield and other judges decided such holding to be unlawful. Sommersett's Case, 20 Howell, St. Tr. 72, 79, Lofft, 17; Quincy, 97, note; The Slave Grace, 2 Hagg. Adm. 105, 106.

While negro slavery existed in Massachusetts, it was in a comparatively mild form. The marriages of slaves were protected by the legislature and the courts; according to the opinion of Hutchinson and of Dane, slaves might hold property; they were admitted as witnesses, even on capital trials of white persons, and on suits of other slaves for freedom; they might sue their masters for wounding or immoderately beating them; and indeed hardly differed from apprentices or other servants except in being bound for life. See authorities and records cited in Quincy, 30, 31, note; 2 Dane, Abr. 313. The annual tax acts show that before the Declaration of Independence they were usually taxed as property, always afterwards as persons. The general court in September 1776 forbade the sale of two negroes taken as prize of war on the high seas and brought into this state, and resolved that any negroes so taken and brought in should not be allowed to be sold, but should be treated like other prisoners. Res. Sept. 1776, c. 83.

It was in Massachusetts, by the first article of the declaration of rights prefixed to the constitution adopted in 1780, as immediately afterwards interpreted by this court, that the fundamental axioms of the Declaration of Independence—"that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"—first took at once the form and the force of express law; slavery was thus wholly abolished in Massachusetts; and it has never existed here since, except so far as the constitution and laws of the state were held to be prevented by the constitution and laws of the United States from operating upon fugitive slaves. Caldwell v. Jennison, Rec. 1781, fol. 79, 80; Jennison's Petition, Jour. H. R. June 18, 1782, fol. 89; Com. v. Jennison, Rec. 1783, fol. 85; Parsons, C. J., in Winchendon v. Hatfield, 4 Mass. 128; 4 Mass. Hist. Coll. 203, 204; Com. v. Aves, 18 Pick. 208, 210, 215, 217; 2 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 252; Betty v. Horton, 5 Leigh, 623.

The doctrine of our law, upon this subject, as stated by Chief Justice Shaw in delivering the judgment of the court in Com. v. Aves, just cited, is that slavery is a relation founded in force, contrary to natural right and the principles of justice, humanity and sound policy; and could exist only by the effect of positive law, as manifested either by direct legislation or settled usage. The same principle has been recognized by Chief Justice Marshall and Mr. Justice Story, speaking for the supreme court of the United States. The Antelope, 10 Wheat. 120, 121; Prigg v. Pennsylvania, 16 Pet. 611.

The constitution of the United States uniformly speaks of those held in slavery, not as property, but as persons; and never contained anything inconsistent with their peaceable and voluntary emancipation. As between master and slave, it would require the most explicit prohibition by law to restrain the right of manumission. M'Cutchen v. Marshall, 8 Pet. 238. We cannot take judicial notice of the local laws of other states of the Union except so far as they are in proof. Knapp v. Abell, 10 Allen, 488. But it appears by cases cited at the bar that bequests of manumission were formerly favored in Virginia; and that it was more recently decided in Mississippi that a trust created by will for paying the expenses of transporting the testator's slaves to Africa and maintaining them in freedom there was lawful. Charles v. Hunnicutt, 5 Call, 311; Wade v. American Colonization Soc., 7 Smedes & M. 663. A state of slavery, in which manumission was wholly prohibited, has never been known among civilized nations. Even when slavery prevailed throughout the world, the same common law of nations, jus gentium, which justified its existence, recognized the right of manumission as a necessary consequence. Just. Inst. lib. 1, tit. 5.

We fully concur with the learned counsel for the heirs at law that if this trust could not be executed according to the intention of the testator without tending to excite servile insurrections in other states of the Union, it would have been unlawful; and that a trust which looked solely to political agitation and to attempts to alter existing laws could not be recognized by this court as charitable. But such does not appear to us to be the necessary or the reasonable interpretation of this bequest. The manner stated of putting an end to slavery is not by legislation or political action, but by creating a public sentiment, which rather points to moral influence and voluntary manumission. The means specified are the usual means of public instruction, by books and newspapers, speeches and lectures. Other means are left to the discretion of the trustees, but there is nothing to indicate that they are not designed to be of a kindred nature. Giving to the bequest that favorable construction to which all charitable gifts are entitled, the just inference is that lawful means only are to be selected, and that they are to be used in a lawful manner.

It was further objected that "to create a public sentiment" was too vague and indefinite an object to be sustained as a charitable use. But "a public sentiment" on a moral question is but another name for public opinion, or a harmony of thought—idem sentire. The only case cited for the heirs at law in support of this objection was Browne v. Yeall, 7 Ves. 50, note, in which Lord Thurlow held void a perpetual trust for the purchase and distribution in Great Britain and its dominions of such books as might have a tendency to promote the interests of virtue and religion and the happiness of mankind. But the correctness of that decision was doubted by Sir William Grant and Lord Eldon in Morice v. Bishop of Durham, 9 Ves. 406, 10 Ves. 534, 539; and it is inconsistent with the more recent authorities, here and in England. The bequest now before us is quite as definite as one "for the increase and improvement of Christian knowledge and promoting religion," and the purchase from time to time of such bibles and other religious books, pamphlets and tracts as the trustees should think fit for that purpose, which was upheld by Lord Eldon in Attorney General v. Stepney, 10 Ves. 22; or "to the cause of Christ, for the benefit and promotion of true evangelical piety and religion," through the agency of trustees, to be by them "appropriated to the cause of religion as above stated, to be distributed in such divisions and to such societies and religious charitable purposes as they may think fit and proper," which was sustained by this court in Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. 107; or "for the promotion of such religious and charitable enterprises as shall be designated by a majority of the pastors composing the Middlesex Union Association," as in Brown v. Kelsey, 2 Cush. 243; or to be distributed, at the discretion of trustees, "in aid of objects and purposes of benevolence or charity, public or private," as in Saltonstall v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 446; or "for the cause of peace," to be expended by an unincorporated society, whose object, as defined in its constitution, was "to illustrate the inconsistency of war with Christianity, to show its baleful influence on all the great interests of mankind, and to devise means for insuring universal and permanent peace," as in Tappan v. Deblois, 45 Me. 122; or to found "an establishment for the increase and diffusion of knowledge among men;" or "for the benefit and advancement and propagation of education and learning in every part of the world, as far as circumstances will permit;" as in Whicker v. Hume, 7 H. L. Cas. 124, 155, and President of U. S. v. Drummond, there cited. See, also, McDonough v. Murdoch, 15 How. 405, 414.

The bequest itself manifests its immediate purpose to be to educate the whole people upon the sin of a man's holding his fellow-man in bondage; and its ultimate object, to put an end to negro slavery in the United States; in either aspect, a lawful charity.

It is universally admitted that trusts for the promotion of religion and education are charities. Gifts for the instruction of the public in the cure of the diseases of quadrupeds or birds useful to man, or for the prevention of cruelty to animals (either by publishing newspapers on the subject, or by providing establishments where killing them for the market might be attended with as little suffering as possible), have been held charitable in England. London University v. Yarrow, 23 Beav. 159, 1 De Gex & J. 72; Marsh v. Means, 3 Jur. (N. S.) 790; Tatham v. Drummond, 11 L. T. (N. S.) 325. To deliver men from a bondage which the law regards as contrary to natural right, humanity, justice and sound policy, is surely not less charitable than to lessen the sufferings of animals. The constitution of Massachusetts, which declares that all men are born free and equal, and have the natural, essential and unalienable rights of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties, of acquiring, possessing and protecting property, of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness; also declares that a frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of the constitution, and a constant adherence to those of piety and justice, are absolutely necessary to preserve the advantages of liberty and to maintain a free government; that "the encouragement of arts and sciences, and all good literature, tends to the honor of God, the advantage of the Christian religion, and the great benefit of this and the other United States of America;" and that "wisdom and knowledge, as well as virtue, diffused generally among the body of the people, being necessary for the preservation of their rights and liberties, and as these depend on spreading the opportunities and advantages of education in the various parts of the country, and among the different orders of the people, it shall be the duty of legislatures and magistrates, in all future periods of this commonwealth," besides cherishing the interests of literature and the sciences, "to countenance and inculcate the principles of humanity and general benevolence, public and private charity," "and all social affections and generous sentiments among the people." Declaration of Rights, arts. 1, 18; Const. Mass. c. 5. This bequest directly tends to carry out the principles thus declared in the fundamental law of the commonwealth. And certainly no kind of education could better accord with the religion of Him who came to preach deliverance to the captives, and taught that you should love your neighbor as yourself and do unto others as you would that they should do unto you.

The authorities already cited show that the peaceable redemption or manumission of slaves in any manner not prohibited by law is a charitable object. It falls indeed within the spirit, and almost within the letter, of many clauses in the statute of Elizabeth. It would be an anomaly in a system of law, which recognized as charitable uses the relief of the poor, the education and preferment of orphans, marriages of poor maids, the assistance of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen and persons decayed, the relief of prisoners and the redemption of captives, to exclude the deliverance of an indefinite number of human beings from a condition in which they were so poor as not even to own themselves, in which their children could not be educated, in which marriages had no sanction of law or security of duration, in which all their earnings belonged to another, and they were subject, against the law of nature, and without any crime of their own, to such an arbitrary dominion as the modern usages of nations will not countenance over captives taken from the most barbarous enemy.

III. The next question arises upon the bequest in trust for the benefit of fugitive slaves who might from time to time escape from the slaveholding states of the Union.

The validity of this bequest must be determined according to the law as it stood at the time when the testator died and from which his will took effect. It is no part of the duty of this court to maintain the constitutionality, the justice, or the policy of the fugitive slave acts, now happily repealed. But the constitution of the United States, at the time of the testator's death, declared that no person held to service or labor in one state should be discharged therefrom by escaping into another. It may safely be assumed that, under such a constitution, a bequest to assist fugitive slaves to escape from those to whom their service was thus recognized to be due could not have been upheld and enforced as a lawful charity. The epithets with which the testator accompanied this bequest show that he set his own ideas of moral duty above his allegiance to his state or his country; and warrant the conjecture that he would have been well pleased to have the fund applied in a manner inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the United States. But he has used no words to limit its use to illegal methods, and has left his trustees untrammelled as to the mode of its application.

Whether this bequest is or is not valid, is to be ascertained from a fair construction of its language, in the light of the maxims of interpretation stated in the earlier part of this opinion, by which the court is bound to carry into effect any charitable bequest in which can be seen a general intention consistent with the law, even if the particular mode pointed out is illegal; and there is no authority to construe it to be void if it can be applied in a lawful manner consistently with the intention of the testator as manifested in the words by which it is expressed. One illustration of these maxims may be added in this connection.

In Isaac v. Gompertz, Amb. (2d Ed.) 228, note, the will contained one bequest for the support and maintenance of a Jews' synagogue; and another bequest of an annuity "to the gabas of the said synagogue," who were found, upon inquiry by a master, to be treasurers of the synagogue, whose office it was to collect and receive the annual subscriptions for the support of poor Jews belonging to the synagogue, and to apply the same to the expenses of supporting the synagogue and to the maintenance of such poor Jews. This last bequest was upheld, and referred to a master to report a scheme, although the support of the synagogue was adjudged to be an unlawful use; and thus a bequest manifestly intended for the benefit of persons professing a religion not tolerated by law, and which might, according to its terms, be applied either in an unlawful or a lawful manner, was sustained as charitable, and its application confined to the lawful mode.

A bequest for the benefit of fugitive slaves is not necessarily unlawful. The words "relief or redemption of prisoners and captives" have always been held in England to include those in prison under condemnation for crime, as well as persons confined for debt; and to support gifts for distributing bread and meat among them annually, or for enabling poor imprisoned debtors to compound with their creditors. Duke, Char. Uses, 131, 156; Attorney General v. Ironmongers' Co., Coop. Prac. Cas. 285, 290; Attorney General v. Painterstainers' Co., 2 Cox, Ch. 51; Attorney General v. Drapers' Co., Tudor, Char. Trusts, 591, 592, 4 Beav. 67; 36th Report of Charity Commissioners to Parliament, pt. 6, pp. 856-868. It would be hardly consistent with charity or justice to favor the relief of those undergoing punishment for crimes of their own committing, or imprisonment for not paying debts of their own contracting; and yet prohibit a like relief to those who were in equal need, because they had withdrawn themselves from a service imposed upon them by local laws without their fault or consent.

It was indeed held in Thrupp v. Collett, 26 Beav. 125, that a bequest to be applied to purchasing and procuring the discharge of persons committed to prison for non-payment of fines under the game laws was not a lawful charity. But such persons were convicted offenders against the law of England, who would by such discharge be wholly released from punishment. A fugitive slave was not a criminal by the laws of this commonwealth or of the United States.

To supply sick or destitute fugitive slaves with food and clothing, medicine or shelter, or to extinguish by purchase the claims of those asserting a right to their service and labor, would in no wise have tended to impair the claim of the latter or the operation of the constitution and laws of the United States; and would clearly have been within the terms of this bequest. If, for example, the trustees named in the will had received this fund from the executor without question, and had seen fit to apply it for the benefit of fugitive slaves in such a manner, they could not have been held liable as for a breach of trust.

This bequest therefore, as well as the previous one, being capable of being applied according to its terms in a lawful manner at the time of the testator's death, must, upon the settled principles of construction, be held a valid charity.

It is hardly necessary to remark that the direction of the testator that his trustees shall not be accountable to any one is simply void. No testator can obtain for his bequests that support and permanence which the law gives to public charities only, and at the same time deprive the beneficiaries and the public of the safeguards which the law provides for their due and lawful administration.

As the trustees named in the will are not a corporation established by law, and these two bequests are unlimited in duration, and by their terms might cover an illegal as well as a legal appropriation, it is the duty of the court, before ordering the funds to be paid to the trustees, to refer the case to a master to settle a scheme for their application in a lawful manner. Isaac v. Gompertz, Amb. 228, note; Attorney General v. Stepney, 10 Ves. 22; Boyle, Char. 100, 217.

IV. It is quite clear that the bequest in trust to be expended "to secure the passage of laws granting women, whether married or unmarried, the right to vote, to hold office, to hold, manage and devise property, and all other civil rights enjoyed by men," cannot be sustained as a charity.

No precedent has been cited in its support. This bequest differs from the others in aiming directly and exclusively to change the laws; and its object cannot be accomplished without changing the constitution also. Whether such an alteration of the existing laws and frame of government would be wise and desirable is a question upon which we cannot, sitting in a judicial capacity, properly express any opinion. Our duty is limited to expounding the laws as they stand. And those laws do not recognize the purpose of overthrowing or changing them, in whole or in part, as a charitable use. This bequest therefore, not being for a charitable purpose, nor for the benefit of any particular persons, and being unrestricted in point of time, is inoperative and void.

For the same reason, the gift to the same object, of one third of the residue of the testator's estate after the death of his daughter Mrs. Eddy and her daughter Mrs. Bacon, is also invalid, and will go to his heirs at law as a resulting trust.

It is proper to add that the conclusion of the court upon this point, as well as upon the gift to create a public sentiment which would put an end to negro slavery in the United States, had the concurrence of the late Mr. Justice Dewey, whose judicial experience and large acquaintance with the law of charitable uses give great weight to his opinion, and whose lamented death, while this case has been under advisement, has deprived us of his assistance in determining the other questions in controversy.

V. The validity of the other residuary bequests and devises depends upon the law of perpetuities as applied to private trusts. The principles of this branch of the law have been so fully considered by the court in recent cases as to require no extended statement.

The general rule is that if any estate, legal or equitable, is given by deed or will to any person in the first instance, and then over to another person, or even to a public charity, upon the happening of a contingency which may by possibility not take place within a life or lives in being (treating a child in its mother's womb as in being) and twenty-one years afterwards, the gift over is void, as tending to create a perpetuity by making the estate inalienable; for the title of those taking the previous interests would not be perfect, and until the happening of the contingency it could not be ascertained who were entitled. Brattle Square Church v. Grant, 3 Gray, 142; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 5, 7. If therefore the gift over is limited upon a single event which may or may not happen within the prescribed period, it is void, and cannot be made good by the actual happening of the event within that period.

But if the testator distinctly makes his gift over to depend upon what is sometimes called an alternative contingency, or upon either of two contingencies, one of which may be too remote and the other cannot be, its validity depends upon the event; or, in other words, if he gives the estate over on one contingency which must happen, if at all, within the limit of the rule, and that contingency does happen, the validity of the distinct gift over in that event will not be affected by the consideration that upon a different contingency, which might or might not happen within the lawful limit, he makes a disposition of his estate, which would be void for remoteness. The authorities upon this point are conclusive. Longhead v. Phelps, 2 W. Bl. 704; Sugden and Preston, arguendo, in Beard v. Westcott, 5 Barn. & Ald. 809, 813, 814; Minter v. Wraith, 13 Sim. 52; Evers v. Challis, 7 H. L. Cas. 531; Armstrong v. Armstrong, 14 B. Mon. 333; 1 Jarm. Wills, 244; Lewis, Perp. c. 21; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 125, 126.

By the ninth and tenth articles of the will, the income of one third of the residue of the testator's estate, real and personal, is to be paid to his son James and to his daughter Mrs. Palmer, respectively, during life. Each of these articles contains a distinct direction that, in case such son or daughter shall die leaving no child surviving, the principal of his or her share shall be paid and conveyed to the board of trustees named in the fourth article, to be expended for the intent and purpose therein directed. As the first tenant for life in each bequest is living at the death of the testator, the event of such tenant's dying, leaving no child then living, must happen within the period of a life in being, if at all; and, if it does happen, the gift over to the charity will be valid. Neither James Jackson nor Mrs. Palmer therefore is entitled to a present equitable estate in fee. But as James, though now unmarried, may marry and have children who survive him, and as Mrs. Palmer's children may survive her, in either of which cases half of the income of the share would by the will go to such children during their lives and the bequest over to the charity be too remote, the validity and effect of that bequest over cannot be now determined. If the contingency upon which it is valid should hereafter occur, namely, the death of the testator's son or daughter, respectively, leaving no children surviving, the whole remainder of the share will then go to the charity established by the fourth article, and be paid, after the settlement of a scheme for its lawful application, to the trustees therein named.

VI. By the thirteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, adopted since the earlier arguments of this case, it is declared that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction." The effect of this amendment upon the charitable bequests of Francis Jackson is the remaining question to be determined; and this requires a consideration of the nature and proper limits of the doctrine of cy pres.

It is contended for the heirs at law, that the power of the English chancellor, when a charitable trust cannot be administered according to its terms, to execute it so as to carry out the donor's intention as nearly as possible—cy pres—is derived from the royal prerogative or St. 43 Eliz. and is not an exercise of judicial authority; that, whether this power is prerogative or judicial, it cannot, or, if it can, should not, be exercised by this court; and that the doctrine of cy pres, even as administered in the English chancery, would not sustain these charitable bequests since slavery has been abolished.

Much confusion of ideas has arisen from the use of the term "cy pres" in the books to describe two distinct powers exercised by the English chancellor in charity cases, the one under the sign manual of the crown, the other under the general jurisdiction in equity; as well as to designate the rule of construction which has sometimes been applied to executory devises or powers of appointment to individuals, in order to avoid the objection of remoteness. It was of this last, and not of any doctrine peculiar to charities, that Lord Kenyon said, "The doctrine of cy pres goes to the utmost verge of the law, and we must take care that it does not run wild;" and Lord Eldon, "It is not proper to go one step farther." Brudenell v. Elwes, 1 East, 451, 7 Ves. 390; 1 Jarm. Wills, 261-263; Sugd. Powers, c. 9, § 9; Coster v. Lorillard, 14 Wend. 309, 348.

The principal, if not the only, cases in which the disposition of a charity is held to be in the crown by sign manual, are of two classes; the first, of bequests to particular uses charitable in their nature, but illegal, as for a form of religion not tolerated by law; and the second, of gifts of property to charity generally, without any trust interposed, and in which either no appointment is provided for, or the power of appointment is delegated to persons who die without exercising it.

It is by the sign manual and in cases of the first class, that the arbitrary dispositions have been made, which were so justly condemned by Lord Thurlow in Moggridge v. Thackwell, 1 Ves. Jr. 469, and Sir William Grant in Cary v. Abbot, 7 Ves. 494, 495; and which, through want of due discrimination, have brought so much discredit upon the whole doctrine of cy pres. Such was the case of Attorney General v. Baxter, in which a bequest to Mr. Baxter to be distributed by him among sixty pious ejected ministers, (not, as the testator declared, for the sake of their nonconformity, but because he knew many of them to be pious and good men and in great want,) was held to be void, and given under the sign manual to Chelsea College; but the decree was afterwards reversed, upon the ground that this was really a legacy to sixty individuals to be named. 1 Vern. 248; 2 Vern. 105; 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 96; 7 Ves. 76. Such also was the case of Da Costa v. De Pas, in which a gift for establishing a jesuba or assembly for reading the Jewish law was applied to the support of a Christian chapel at a founding hospital. Amb. 228; 2 Swanst. 489, note; 1 Dickens, 258; 7 Ves. 76, 81.

This power of disposal by the sign manual of the crown in direct opposition to the declared intention of the testator, whether it is to be deemed to have belonged to the king as head of the church as well as of the state, "intrusted and empowered to see that nothing be done to the disherison of the crown or the propagation of a false religion" (Rex v. Portington, 1 Salk. 162, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 96); or to have been derived from the power exercised by the Roman emperor, who was sovereign legislator as well as supreme interpreter of the laws (Dig. 33, 2, 17; 50, 8, 4; Code, lib. 1, tit. 2, c. 19; Id., tit. 14, c. 12); is clearly a prerogative and not a judicial power, and could not be exercised by this court; and it is difficult to see how it could be held to exist at all in a republic, in which charitable bequests have never been forfeited to the use or submitted to the disposition of the government, because superstitious or illegal. 4 Dane, Abr. 239; Gass v. Wilhite, 2 Dana, 176; Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 226.

The second class of bequests which are disposed of by the king's sign manual is of gifts to charity generally, with no uses specified, no trust interposed, and either no provision made for an appointment, or the power of appointment delegated to particular persons who die without exercising it. Boyle, Char. 238, 239; Attorney General v. Syderfen, 1 Vern. 224, 1 Eq. Cas. Abr. 96; Attorney General v. Fletcher, 5 Law J. Ch. (N. S.) 75. This too is not a judicial power of expounding and carrying out the testator's intention, but a prerogative power of ordaining what the testator has failed to express. No instance is reported, or has been discovered in the thorough investigations of the subject, of an exercise of this power in England before the reign of Charles II. Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 69-81; Dwight's Argument in the Rose Will Case, 272. It has never, so far as we know, been introduced into the practice of any court in this country; and, if it exists anywhere here, it is in the legislature of the commonwealth as succeeding to the powers of the king as parens patriæ. 4 Kent, Comm. 508, note; Fontain v. Ravenel, 17 How. 369, 384; Moore v. Moore, 4 Dana, 365, 366; Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 93; Attorney General v. Jolly, 1 Rich. Eq. 108; Dickson v. Montgomery, 1 Swan, 348; Le page v. Macnamara, 5 Iowa, 146; Bartlet v. King, 12 Mass. 545; Sohier v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 3 Cush. 496, 497. It certainly cannot be exercised by the judiciary of a state whose constitution declares that "the judicial department shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them: to the end it may be a government of laws and not of men." Declaration of Rights, art. 30.

The jurisdiction of the court of chancery to superintend the administration and decree the performance of gifts to trustees for charitable uses of a kind stated in the gift stands upon different grounds; and is part of its equity jurisdiction over trusts, which is shown by abundant evidence to have existed before the passage of the statute of charitable uses. Sir Francis Moore records a case in which a man sold land to another upon confidence to perform a charitable use, which the grantor declared by his last will that the grantee should perform; "the bargain was never enrolled, and yet the lord chancellor decreed that the heir should sell the land to be disposed according to the limitation of the use; and this decree was made the 24th of Queen Elizabeth, before the statute of charitable uses, and this decree was made upon ordinary and judicial equity in chancery." Symon's Case, Duke, Char. Uses, 163. About the same time the court of chancery entertained a suit between two parties, each claiming to be trustee, to determine how bequests for the weekly relief of the poor of certain towns, for the yearly preferment of poor children to be apprentices, and for the curing of divers diseased people lying by the highway's side, should be "employed and bestowed according to the said will." Reade v. Silles (27 Eliz.) Act. Can. 559. A decree in 16 Eliz., confirming a report of the master of the rolls and others to whom a suit for enforcing a charitable trust founded by will had been referred, is cited in 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 588, note. For years before St. 43 Eliz., or the similar act of 39 Eliz., suits in equity by some in behalf of all of the inhabitants of a parish were maintained to establish and enforce bequests for schools, alms or other charitable purposes for the benefit of the parish, which would have been too indefinite to be enforced as private trusts. Parker v. Browne (12 Eliz.) 1 Cal. Pro. Ch. 81, 1 Mylne & K. 389, 390; Dwight, Char. Cas. 33, 34; in which the devise was in trust to a corporation incapable at law of taking. Parrot v. Lawlet (21 Eliz.) Cary, 47; Elmer v. Scot (24 Eliz.) Cho. Cas. Ch. 155; Matthew v. Marow (32-34 Eliz.); and Hensman v. Hackney (38 Eliz.) Dwight, Char. Cas. 65, 77; in which the decrees approved schemes settled by masters in chancery. Many other examples are collected in the able and learned arguments, as separately printed in full, of Mr. Binney in the Case of Girard's Will, and of Mr. Dwight in the Rose Will Case. And the existence of such a jurisdiction anterior to and independent of the statute is now generally admitted. Vidal v. Girard, 2 How. 194-196, and cases cited; Perin v. Carey, 24 How. 501; Magill v. Brown, Brightly, N. P. 346; 2 Kent, Comm. 286-288, and note; Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Pick. 152, 153; Preachers' Aid Soc. v. Rich, 45 Me. 559; Derby v. Derby, 4 R. I. 436; Urmey v. Wooden, 1 Ohio St. 160; Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo. 543; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 588; Tudor, Char. Trusts, 102, 103.

The theory that St. 43 Eliz. enlarged the discretion of the chancellor to depart from the expressed intention of the founder of a charity is refuted by the words of the statute itself. After reciting that many gifts and appointments for the charitable purposes therein named "have not been employed according to the charitable intent of the givers and founders thereof, by reason of frauds, breaches of trust, and negligence in those that should pay, deliver and employ the same;" it then, for redress and remedy thereof, authorizes the lord chancellor or lord keeper to make such decrees that the property "may be duly and faithfully employed to and for such of the charitable uses and intents before rehearsed respectively for which they were given, limited, assigned or appointed by the donors and founders thereof;" which decrees, "not being contrary or repugnant to the orders, statutes or decrees of the donors or founders," shall "stand firm and good, according to the tenor and purpose thereof, and shall be executed accordingly," until altered by the lord chancellor or lord keeper upon complaint by any party aggrieved; and upon such complaint the chancellor or keeper may "by such course as to their wisdoms shall seem meetest, the circumstances of the case considered, proceed to the examination, hearing and determining thereof; and upon hearing thereof shall and may annul, diminish, alter or enlarge" the decrees of the commissioners as "shall be thought to stand with equity and good conscience, according to the true intent and meaning of the donors and founders thereof." These last qualifications are specially marked by Lord Coke, who was attorney general at the passage of the statute and for some time before and after, and who adds, by way of note to the final clause, "This is the lapis ductitius, whereby the commissioners and chancellors must institute their course." 2 Inst. 712. See, also, Duke, Char. Uses, 11, 156, 169, 372, 619.

In cases of bequests to trustees for charitable uses, the nature of which is described in the will, the chancellor acts in his equity jurisdiction over trusts; and the prerogative of the king finds its appropriate exercise through his attorney general in bringing the case before the court of chancery for a judicial determination. This has been well explained by Lord Eldon. "It is the duty of a court of equity, a main part, originally almost the whole, of its jurisdiction, to administer trusts; to protect not the visible owner, who alone can proceed at law, but the individual equitably, though not legally, entitled. From this principle has arisen the practice of administering the trust of a public charity: persons possessed of funds appropriated to such purposes are within the general rule; but, no one being entitled to an immediate and peculiar interest to prefer a complaint, who is to compel the performance of these obligations, and to enforce their responsibility? It is the duty of the king, as parens patriæ, to protect property devoted to charitable uses; and that duty is executed by the officer who represents the crown for all forensic purposes. On this foundation rests the right of the attorney general in such cases to obtain by information the interposition of a court of equity." Attorney General v. Brown, 1 Swanst. 291, 1 Wils. 354. To the like effect are the opinions of Lord Redesdale in Attorney General v. Mayor, etc., of Dublin, 1 Bligh (N. S.) 347, 348, and Corporation of Ludlow v. Greenhouse, Id. 48, 62; of Lord Keeper Bridgman in Attorney General v. Newnman, 1 Ch. Cas. 158; of Sir Joseph Jekyll in Eyre v. Shaftsbury, 2 P. Wms. 119; and of Lord Hardwicke in Attorney General v. Middleton, 2 Ves. Sr. 328; which also state that the jurisdiction of the court of chancery over charities was exercised on such informations before St. 43 Eliz. See, also, Attorney General v. Carroll, Act. Can. 729; Dwight's Ar- gument in the Rose Will Case, 259-268. This duty of maintaining the rights of the public, and of a number of persons too indefinite to vindicate their own, has vested in the commonwealth, and is exercised here, as in England, through the attorney general. Going v. Emery, 16 Pick. 119; County Attorney v. May, 5 Cush. 338-340; Gen. St. c. 14, § 20. It is upon this ground that, in a suit instituted by the trustees of a charity to obtain the instructions of the court, the attorney general should be made a party defendant, as he has been by order of the court in this case. Harvard College v. Society for Promoting Theological Education, 3 Gray, 280; Tudor, Char. Trusts, 161, 162. The power of the king or commonwealth, thus exercised, is simply to present the question to a court of justice, not to control or direct its judicial action.

A charity, being a trust in the support and execution of which the whole public is concerned, and which is therefore allowed by the law to be perpetual, deserves and often requires the exercise of a larger discretion by the court of chancery than a mere private trust; for without a large discretionary power, in carrying out the general intent of the donor, to vary the details of administration, and even the mode of application, many charities would fail by change of circumstances and the happening of contingencies which no human foresight could provide against; and the probabilities of such failure would increase with the lapse of time and the remoteness of the heirs from the original donor who had in a clear and lawful manner manifested his will to divert his estate from his heirs for the benefit of public charities.

It is accordingly well settled by decisions of the highest authority, that when a gift is made to trustees for a charitable purpose, the general nature of which is pointed out, and which is lawful and valid at the time of the death of the testator, and no intention is expressed to limit it to a particular institution or mode of application, and afterwards, either by change of circumstances the scheme of the testator becomes impracticable, or by change of law becomes illegal, the fund, having once vested in the charity, does not go to the heirs at law as a resulting trust, but is to be applied by the court of chancery, in the exercise of its jurisdiction in equity, as near the testator's particular directions as possible, to carry out his general charitable intent. In all the cases of charities which have been administered in the English courts of chancery without the aid of the sign manual, the prerogative of the king acting through the chancellor has not been alluded to, except for the purpose of distinguishing it from the power exercised by the court in its inherent equitable jurisdiction with the assistance of its masters in chancery.

achusetts Colony, this power was most freely exercised by the court of chancery, either on information by the attorney general, or on proceedings by commission under the statute of charitable uses. Attorney General v. Warwick (1615, 1638) Dwight, Char. Cas. 140, 141, West, Ch. 60, 62; Bloomfield v. Stowemarket (1619) Duke, Char. Uses, 644. In the last case, lands had been given before the Reformation to be sold, and the proceeds applied, one half to the making of a highway from the town in which the lands were, one fourth to the repair of a church in that town, and the other fourth to the priest of the church to say prayers for the souls of the donor and others; and Lord Bacon decreed the establishment of the uses for making the highway and repairing the church, and directed the remaining fourth (which could not, by reason of the change in religion, be applied as directed by the donor) to be divided between the poor of the same town, and the poor of the town where the donor inhabited.

In the Case of Baliol College, this doctrine was enforced by successive decrees of the greatest English chancellors between the English Revolution and our own, which have been recently confirmed by the unanimous decision of the house of lords. Attorney General v. Guise, 2 Vern. 166; Attorney General v. Baliol College, 9 Mod. 407; Attorney General v. Glasgow College, 2 Colly. 665, 1 H. L. Cas. 800. The case is of such importance and reported at different stages in so many books and at such length, that it may be well to state it. John Snell, an Episcopalian, who made his last will and died in 1679, while the form of religion established by law in Scotland as well as in England was Episcopal, gave lands in trust to apply the income for the maintenance and education at the university of Oxford of Scotchmen to be designated by the vice-chancellor of that university and the heads of certain colleges therein, and who should, upon their admission, give security to enter into holy orders and to be sent into Scotland and there remain. After the Revolution of 1688, Presbyterianism was reestablished in Scotland by act of parliament; and in 1690 an information was filed by the attorney general, at the relation of the vice chancellor and heads of colleges named in the will, against the testator's heiress at law, suggesting a pretence by her that as Episcopacy and Prelacy had been abolished in Scotland, and the Presbyterian form of worship established instead, the testator's intentions could not be carried into effect, the devise became void, and the property reverted to her. But the lords commissioners of the great seal, by a decree passed in 1692, established the devise against her, ordered an account, and reserved all directions for the establishment of the charity. 2 Vern. 267, note; 2 Colly. 665-670, 1 H. L. Cas. 802-804, 820, 822. In 1693 the cause came on for further directions before

Lord Keeper Somers, who, acting upon the doctrine that it was within the province of a court of equity to administer the trust upon the principle of cy pres, ordered the estate to be conveyed to the six senior fellows of Baliol College, one of the colleges named in the will, to maintain a certain number of Scotch scholars at that college, and, in consideration of the privileges enjoyed by such scholars, to apply the surplus income to its library; and this decree was made subject to such alteration and disposition as the court should from time to time make, upon the application of any person concerned, for the better and more effectual execution of the trust, as near as could be to the testator's will and intentions. 2 Vern. 267, note; 2 Colly. 670, 671, 1 H. L. Cas. 804, 805, 824. In 1744 Lord Hardwicke, in the execution of the directions in the decree of Lord Somers, referred the cause to a master to approve of a scheme "for the better establishment and regulation of the charity, and carrying the same into effect for the future as near to the will and intention of the testator as the alteration of circumstances since the making of the will would admit;" and upon his report, and against the exceptions of the heads of colleges in Oxford, confirmed a scheme which did not impose any condition of the scholars taking holy orders—thus carrying out the general intention of the trust so far as to educate Scotch scholars at Oxford, although the testator's ultimate object that they should be educated in the Episcopal form of church government to take part in the established religion in Scotland could not, by reason of the change of law since his death, be effected. 9 Mod. 407; 1 H. L. Cas. 805, 806, 825–827. In 1759 Lord Keeper Henley (afterward Lord Northington) varied the scheme in other particulars, but declined to vary it in this; and further orders were afterwards made in chancery as the revenues increased. 2 Colly. 672–674, 1 H. L. Cas. 806, 807, 825, 826; 3 Ves. 650, note. Upon a new information filed at the relation of some Scotch Episcopalians, the house of lords in 1848, reversing an order of Vice Chancellor Knight Bruce, held that the charity must continue to be administered according to the earlier decrees. 1 H. L. Cas. 800.

In another case, Queen Elizabeth, by letters patent, established a hospital for forty lepers, and made the inmates a corporation. After leprosy had become almost extinct in England, and the members of the corporation reduced to three, an information was filed, alleging that the corporation was dissolved, and praying for a new application of the revenues agreeably to the letters patent and the donor's intention, or as near thereto as circumstances would permit and the court should direct. Lord Eldon held that neither the donor's heirs at law nor the crown took the land discharged of the charity; referred the case to a master to report a scheme; and confirmed the report of the master, approving a scheme for the application of the revenues to a general infirmary, reserving a preference to all lepers who might offer themselves. Attorney General v. Hicks, Highm. Mortm. 336–354, 3 Brown, Ch. 166, note.

Sir John Romilly, M. R., afterwards made a like decision, holding that a gift made in 1687 of land (for which in 1774 other land had been substituted by leave of parliament) in trust out of the income to keep it ready for a hospital and burial place for patients sick of the plague, was a present gift for charitable purposes, and valid, although the plague had not reappeared in England for more than one hundred and eighty years; and, after alluding to a class of cases, cited for the heirs at law in that case, as they have been in this, in which the charitable bequest could never have taken effect, added, "But who can say, when this deed was executed or the act passed, that this was not a charitable trust, capable of being performed;" "and if it were ever wholly devoted to charity, those cases do not apply." Attorney General v. Craven, 21 Beav. 392, 408.

The principle that a bequest to trustees for charitable purposes indicated in the will, which are lawful and capable of being carried out at the time of the testator's death, will not be allowed to fail and result to the heirs at law upon a change of circumstances, but will be applied by the court according to a scheme approved by a master to carry out the intent of the testator as nearly as possible, has been affirmed and acted on in many other English cases. Attorney General v. Pyle, 1 Atk. 435; Attorney General v. Green, 2 Brown, Ch. 492; Attorney General v. Bishop of London, 3 Brown, Ch. 171; Moggridge v. Thackwell, Id. 517, 1 Ves. Jr. 464; Attorney General v. Glyn, 12 Sim. 84; Attorney General v. Lawes, 8 Hare, 32; Attorney General v. Vint, 3 De Gex & S. 705. The dicta of Lord Alvanley, upon which the heirs at law much rely, do not, in the connection in which they were uttered, substantially differ from the general current of authority. Attorney General v. Boulton, 2 Ves. Jr. 387, 388; Attorney General v. Whitchurch, 3 Ves. 143, 144; Attorney General v. Minshull, 4 Ves. 14.

By the opinion of Lord Eldon, formed after great doubt and hesitation, the principle has been held to extend to the case of a bequest of property to a person named, in trust for such charitable purposes, not otherwise described, as he should appoint. Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 96, 13 Ves. 416; Paice v. Archbishop of Canterbury, 14 Ves. 364; Mills v. Farmer, 19 Ves. 483, 1 Mer. 55. Such a trust has been held valid in this commonwealth, so far as to vest a title in the trustee as against the next of kin. Wells v. Doane, 3 Gray, 201. Whether, in case of his death, it could properly be administered by a court of chancery, without the aid of the prerogative power, need not be considered in this

In most of the cases cited at the argument, in which the heirs at law were held to be entitled to the property, the charitable gift never took effect at all; either because it could not be carried out as directed, without violating the mortmain act of 9 Geo. II., as in Jones v. Williams, Amb. 651; Attorney General v. Whitechurch, 3 Ves. 141, and Smith v. Oliver, 11 Beav. 481; or because the testator had in terms limited it to a special object which could not be accomplished at the time of his death; as in the case of a bequest to build a church in Wheatley, which could not be done without the consent of the bishop, and he refused (Attorney General v. Bishop of Oxford, 1 Brown, Ch. 444, note; Id., cited 2 Cox, Ch. 365; 2 Ves. Jr. 388; and 4 Ves. 431, 432); or of a direction to contract with the governors of a hospital for the purchase of a presentation of a boy to that charity, if the residuary assets should prove sufficient for that purpose, and they proved to be insufficient (Cherry v. Mott, 1 Mylne & C. 123).

In Marsh v. Means, 3 Jur. (N. S.) 790, the testator gave a legacy, after the death of his wife, "for continuing the periodical published under the title of 'The Voice of Humanity,' according to the objects and principles which are set forth in the prospectus contained in the third number of that publication." "The Voice of Humanity" had been published quarterly by an association for the protection of animals, but no number had appeared for nearly a year before the date of the will. Upon the death of the widow twenty years later, Vice Chancellor Wood held that the gift was not to support the principles of the publication, but only the publication itself, and, the publication having ceased and the association perished, that the legacy lapsed. But he added, "It would, I think, have fallen within the description of charity, if this periodical had been subsisting at the date of the will, and afterwards ceased. That would be simply a case where, the particular intention having failed, the general intention must be carried out."

Two striking cases upon this subject have arisen in England under charities for the redemption of captives.

In the Case of Betton's Charity, Thomas Betton in 1723 bequeathed the residue of his estate to the Ironmongers' Company, in trust, "positively forbidding them to diminish the capital sum by giving away any part, or that the interest and profit arising be applied to any other use or uses than hereinafter mentioned and directed," namely, one half of the income yearly unto the redemption of British slaves in Turkey or Barbary, one fourth unto charity schools in the city and suburbs of London where the education is according to the church of England, and one fourth "unto necessitated decayed freemen of the company, their widows and children." The first half of the income of the fund greatly accumulated, few such slaves having been found for a century. Lord Brougham, reversing the decree of Sir John Leach, M. R., held that the court had jurisdiction to apply the surplus income of this moiety and its accumulations as near as might be to the intentions of the testator; having regard to the bequest touching British captives, and also to the other charitable bequests in the will; and that the case should be referred back to the master to approve a proper scheme for such application. Attorney General v. Ironmongers' Co., 2 Mylne & K. 576. Sir Christopher Pepys, M. R. (afterwards Lord Cottenham,) accordingly ordered it to be so referred. On the return of the master's report, Lord Langdale, M. R., approved a scheme to apply the whole fund to the second and third purposes declared in the will. 2 Beav. 313. Lord Chancellor Cottenham on appeal reversed this decree; and upon the ground that the testator had not limited the first charity, like the others, to persons in London, ordered the first moiety to be applied to supporting and assisting charity schools in England and Wales, and referred it back to the master to settle a scheme for that purpose. Craig & P. 208. And this decree was affirmed in the house of lords with the concurrence of Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, and Lords Brougham, Cottenham and Campbell. 10 Clark & F. 908. In that case, though there were differences of opinion as to the details of the scheme, the jurisdiction of the court of chancery to frame one in such a case was thus affirmed by the deliberate judgments of five law lords; and all agreed that, for the purpose of ascertaining what was cy pres to the particular object which had failed, the court might look at all the charitable bequests in the will; applying in this respect the principle upon which Lord Bacon had acted more than two centuries before in the case of Bloomfield v. Stowemarket, above cited.

But the case most like that now before us is that of Lady Mico's Charity, Lady Mico, by her will made in 1670, gave a thousand pounds "to redeem poor slaves in what manner the executors should think most convenient." This charity was established by decree in chancery in 1686. Upon an information filed in 1827, after the fund had accumulated a hundred fold, it was referred to a master to approve of a scheme for the application of the income according to the will of the testatrix, or, if he should find that it could not be executed according to her will, then as near the intent of the will as could be, regard being had to the existing circumstances and to the amount of the fund. The master, by his general report in 1835, stated that the relators had laid before him a scheme for applying the fund to the enfranchisement of slaves in the British Colonies who were too poor to purchase their own freedom; which application, in consequence of St. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 73, abolishing slavery (which took effect in 1834), had become impracticable; that he was of opinion that the testatrix by her will contemplated the redemption of poor slaves in the Barbary States, but that intention could not be carried into effect; and he approved a scheme to apply the capital and income in purchasing and building school-houses for the education of the emancipated apprentices and their issue, qualifying teachers, paying the salaries of masters and other expenses, and to apply the surplus rents to the support of any other schools, and generally in promoting education in the British Colonies. Sir Christopher Pepys, M. R., confirmed this scheme by a decree; and, after he had become lord chancellor, stated the reasons to have been that "in this there was no restriction as to the description of slaves, or the countries in which the slaves were to be looked for;" that upon the reference to the master "it appeared that there were not within any part of the British dominions any poor slaves to be redeemed, but that there were in the colonies many thousands of human beings from whom the odious appellation of slaves had been removed, but whose state was very far short of that of freemen, from whose bodies the chains of slavery had been struck, but whose minds and morals were still in that state of degradation which is inseparable from the unfortunate situation from which they had recently been in part rescued; it was proposed to the master to apply, and he approved of a scheme for the completion of that holy work, by assisting in the education of those poor beings. If, before the slavery abolition act, these funds could properly have been applied to procuring the redemption of slaves in the colonies, the proposed application for the benefit of the apprentices was doubtless cy pres to the intention of the donor." And his reason for not applying Betton's Charity in the same manner was that it was in terms limited to slaves in Turkey or Barbary. Attorney General v. Gibson, 2 Beav. 317, note; Attorney General v. Ironmongers' Co., Craig & P. 226, 227.

There is no adjudication of this question by the supreme court of the United States. The dicta of Chief Justice Marshall in Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs, 4 Wheat. 1, were based upon an imperfect survey of the authorities, were not required by the decision, and are hardly reconcilable with the more recent judgments of the same court; and that case, as well as Wheeler v. Smith, 9 How. 79, arose under the law of Virginia. Vidal v. Girard's Ex'rs, 2 How. 192; Perin v. Carey, 24 How. 501; Bartlett v. Nye, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 380; American Academy of Arts & Sciences v. President, etc., of Harvard College, 12 Gray, 593; 2 Kent, Comm. 287. In Fontain v. Ravenel, 17 How. 369, the testator authorized his executors or the survivor of them to dispose of the residue of his estate "for the use of such charitable institutions in Pennsylvania and South Carolina, as they or he may deem most beneficial to mankind," and they died without appointing; and it was held that the title did not vest in the executors as trustees, and that according to the English law the disposition would have been in the crown by sign manual. As Mr. Justice McLean, delivering the opinion of the court, said: "Nothing short of the prerogative power, it would seem, can reach this case. There is not only uncertainty in the beneficiaries of this charity, but behind that is a more formidable objection. There is no expressed will of the testator. He intended to speak through his executors or the survivor of them, but by the acts of Providence this has become impossible. It is then as though he had not spoken. Can any power now speak for him, except the parens patriæ?" The further remarks about the power of cy pres, if intended to cover a case in which the charitable purposes were described or indicated in the will, were upon a question not before the court. The separate opinion of Chief Justice Taney in Fontain v. Ravenel was but his own, based mainly upon that of Chief Justice Marshall in Baptist Ass'n v. Hart's Ex'rs. And it is impossible to avoid the inference that the impressions of both of those eminent magistrates were derived from the laws of Maryland and Virginia in which they had been educated, and by which St. 43 Eliz. has been expressly repealed, and charities are not recognized as entitled to any favor, either in duration or construction, beyond other trusts. Dashiell v. Attorney General, 5 Har. & J. 392; Gallego v. Attorney General, 3 Leigh, 450. In North Carolina, the supreme court once declared that it had all the powers exercised by the English chancellor, either in the equity jurisdiction or under the sign manual; and since, rebounding from that extreme opinion, seems to have adopted the view of Maryland and Virginia. Griffin v. Graham, 1 Hawks, 96; McAuley v. Wilson, 1 Dev. Eq. 276; Holland v. Peck, 2 Ired. Eq. 255. There is a dictum to a like effect in Carter v. Balfour, 19 Ala. 830. So in New York, the court of appeals, after some division and vacillation of opinion in the course of the frequent changes in the composition of the court, has recently adjudged that in that state the English law of charitable uses has been wholly abrogated by statute, and that charities are within the rule against perpetuities, and have no privileges about private trusts. Bascom v. Albertson, 34 N. Y. 584.

On the other hand, the court of appeals of Kentucky, in an able judgment delivered by Chief Justice Robertson, marked the distinction between the power exercised under the sign manual, and that inherent in the equity jurisdiction; and, after speaking of the former as not judicial, added: "The cy pres doctrine of England is not, or should not be, a judicial doctrine, except in one kind of case; and that is, where there is an available charity to an identified or ascertainable object, and a particular mode, inadequate, illegal or inappropriate, or which happens to fail, has been prescribed. In such case, a court of equity may substitute or sanction any other mode that may be lawful and suitable and will effectuate the declared intention of the donor, and not arbitrarily and in the dark, presuming on his weakness or wishes, declare an object for him. A court may act judicially as long as it effectuates the lawful intention of the donor." Moore v. Moore, 4 Dana, 366. See, also, Gass v. Wilhite, 2 Dana, 177; Curling v. Curling, 8 Dana, 38. The power of cy pres, which was declared by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Methodist Church v. Remington, 1 Watts, 226, and Witman v. Lex, 17 Serg. & R. 93, not to exist in that state, was the power exercised under the sign manual in case of a gift to superstitious uses, or of an expression of general intention to devote a sum to charitable purposes not designated. In a very recent case, the same court said: "The rule of equity on this subject seems to be clear, that when a definite charity is created, the failure of the particular mode in which it is to be effectuated does not destroy the charity; for equity will substitute another mode, so that the substantial intention shall not depend upon the formal intention." "And this is the doctrine of cy pres, so far as it has been expressly adopted by us"—"a reasonable doctrine, by which a well defined charity, or one where the means of definition are given, may be enforced in favor of the general intent, even where the mode or means provided for by the donor fail by reason of their inadequacy or unlawfulness." Philadelphia v. Girard, 45 Pa. St. 27, 28. Like principles have been maintained in South Carolina and Illinois. Attorney General v. Jolly, 1 Rich. Eq. 99, 2 Strob. Eq. 395; Gilman v. Hamilton, 16 Ill. 231. The existence of a judicial power to administer a charity cy pres where the expressed intention of the founder cannot be exactly carried out has been either countenanced or left an open question in all the New England states except Connecticut. Burr v. Smith, 7 Vt. 287, 288; Second Congregational Soc. v. First Congregational Soc., 14 N. H. 330; Brown v. Concord, 33 N. H. 296; Derby v. Derby, 4 R. I. 439; Tappan v. Deblois, 45 Me. 131; Howard v. American Peace Soc., 49 Me. 302, 303; Treat's Appeal, 30 Conn. 113. See, also, 2 Redf. Wills, 815, note; McCord v. Ochiltree, 8 Blackf. 15; Beall v. Fox, 4 Ga. 427; Chambers v. St. Louis, 29 Mo. 590, 592; Lepage v. Macnamara, 5 Iowa, 146; McIntyre v. Zanesville, 17 Ohio St. 352.

The narrow doctrines which have prevailed in some states upon this subject are inconsistent with the established law of this commonwealth. Our ancestors brought with them from England the elements of the law of charitable uses, and, although the form of proceeding by commission under St. 43 Eliz. has never prevailed in Massachusetts, that statute, in substance and principle, has always been considered as part of our common law. 4 Dane, Abr. 6, 239; Earle v. Wood, 8 Cush. 445. Under the Colony charter, charities were regulated and administered, according to the intent of the donors, under the direction of the general court, the court of assistants, and the county courts; and under the Province charter, although no court was vested with equity jurisdiction, charitable bequests were not the less valid. Anc. Chart. 52; Drury v. Natick, 10 Allen, 180, 181, and authorities cited; Winslow v. Trowbridge, stated in 11 Allen, 459, 460. The English mortmain act of 9 Geo. II. c. 36, did not extend to Massachusetts; and the similar provision in Prov. St. 28 Geo. II. c. 9, was repealed immediately after our Revolution by St. 1785, c. 51. Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 6. Charities are held not to be within the common rule limiting perpetuities and accumulations. Dexter v. Gardner, 7 Allen, 243; Odell v. Odell, 10 Allen, 1. Charitable bequests to an unincorporated society here, to a foreign corporation or society, or to a particular religious denomination in a certain county, have been carried into effect, even where no trustees have been named in the will. Burbank v. Whitney, 24 Pick. 146; Bartlett v. Nye, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 378; Washburn v. Sewall, 9 Metc. (Mass.) 280; Universalist Soc. v. Fitch, 8 Gray, 421. See, also, Wells v. Doane, 3 Gray, 201; Saltonstall v. Sanders, 11 Allen, 446.

The intention of the testator is the guide, or, in the phrase of Lord Coke, the lodestone, of the court; and therefore, whenever a charitable gift can be administered according to his express directions, this court, like the court of chancery in England, is not at liberty to modify it upon considerations of policy or convenience. Harvard College v. Society for Promoting Theological Education, 3 Gray, 280; Baker v. Smith, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 34; Trustees of Smith Charities v. Inhabitants of Northampton, 10 Allen, 498. But there are several cases, where the charitable trust could not be executed as directed in the will, in which the testator's scheme has been varied by this court in such a way and to such an extent as could not be done in the case of a private trust. Thus bequests to a particular bible society by name, whether a corporation established by law or a voluntary association, which had ceased to exist before the death of the testator, have been sustained, and applied to the distribution of bibles through a trustee appointed by the court for the purpose. Winslow v. Cummings, 3 Cush. 358; Bliss v. American Bible Soc., 2 Allen, 334. At a time when the general chancery jurisdiction of this court over trusts was limited to those arising under deeds and wills, the legislature by a special statute authorized it to hear and determine in equity any and all matters relating to a certain gift to a scientific corporation, to be invested in a certain manner, and paid in premiums for discoveries or improvements on heat or light published in America within two years before each award. Upon a bill being filed, and it appearing that it had become impracticable to carry out the intent of the donor in the mode prescribed, Chief Justice Shaw authorized a different investment of the fund; and, in accordance with a scheme reported by a master, authorized the corporation to apply the surplus income, after paying such premiums, to purchasing books, papers and philosophical apparatus, and making such publications or procuring such lectures, experiments or investigations as should facilitate and encourage the making of such discoveries and improvements; and said: "Whenever it appears that a general object of charity is intended, and the purpose is not unlawful and void, the right of the heir at law is divested." "It is now a settled rule in equity that a liberal construction is to be given to charitable donations, with a view to promote and accomplish the general charitable intent of the donor, and that such intent ought to be observed, and when this cannot be strictly and literally done, this court will cause it to be fulfilled as nearly in conformity with the intent of the donor as practicable. Where the property thus given is given to trustees capable of taking, but the property cannot be applied precisely in the mode directed, the court of chancery interferes, and regulates the disposition of such property under its general jurisdiction on the subject of trusts, and not as administering a branch of the prerogative of the king as parens patriæ." "What is the nearest method of carrying into effect the general intent of the donor must of course depend upon the subject matter, the expressed intent, and the other circumstances of each particular case, upon all of which the court is to exercise its discretion." American Academy v. Harvard College, 12 Gray, 582. The same principle was also recognized or assumed in 4 Dane, Abr. 242, 243, in Sanderson v. White, 18 Pick. 333, and other cases already cited. Baker v. Smith, 13 Metc. (Mass.) 41; Harvard College v. Society for Promoting Theological Education, 3 Gray, 282, 298; Trustees of Smith Charities v. Inhabitants of Northampton, 10 Allen, 501, 502.

By Gen. St. c. 113, § 2, this court may hear and determine in equity all suits and proceedings for enforcing and regulating the execution of trusts, whether the trusts relate to real or personal estate, "and shall have full equity jurisdiction, according to the usage and practice of courts of equity, in all other cases, where there is not a plain, adequate and complete remedy at law." The powers usually exercised by the court of chancery in the course of its jurisdiction in equity have thus been expressly conferred upon this court by the legislature. The authority of administering a charitable trust according to the expressed intention of the donor, and, when that cannot be exactly followed, then as nearly as possible, is a part of this jurisdiction, which the court is not at liberty to decline. The only question is, whether the facts of the case show a proper occasion for its exercise according to the settled practice in chancery.

In all the cases cited at the argument, in which a charitable bequest, which might have been lawfully carried out under the circumstances existing at the death of the testator, has been held, upon a change of circumstances, to result to the heirs at law or residuary legatees, the gift was distinctly limited to particular persons or establishments. Such was Russell v. Kellett, 3 Smale & G. 264, in which the gift was of five pounds outright to each poor person of a particular description in certain parishes, and Vice Chancellor Stuart held that the shares of those who died before receiving them went to the residuary legatees. Such, also, was Clark v. Taylor, 1 Drew. 642, in which it was held that a legacy to a certain orphan school by name, which ceased to exist after the death of the testator, failed and fell into the residue of the estate; and which can hardly be reconciled with the decisions in Incorporated Soc. v. Price, 1 Jones & L. 498, 7 Ir. Eq. 260; In re Clergy Society, 2 Kay & J. 615; Marsh v. Attorney General, 2 Johns. & H. 61; Winslow v. Cummings, 3 Cush. 358, and Bliss v. American Bible Soc., 2 Allen, 334. So in Easterbrooks v. Tillinghast, 5 Gray, 17, the trust was expressly limited, not only in object, but in duration, to the maintenance of the pastor of a certain church of a specified faith and practice in a particular town, "so long as they or their successors shall maintain the visibility of a church in said faith and order;" and could not have been held to have terminated, had it not been so limited. Attorney General v. Columbine, Boyle, Char. 204, 205; Potter v. Thurston, 7 R. I. 25; Dexter v. Gardner, 7 Allen, 243.

The charitable bequests of Francis Jackson cannot, in the opinion of the court, be regarded as so restricted in their objects, or so limited in point of time, as to have been terminated and destroyed by the abolition of slavery in the United States. They are to a board of trustees for whose continuance careful provision is made in the will, and which the testator expresses a wish may become a permanent organization and may receive the services and sympathy, the donations and bequests, of the friends of the slave. Their duration is not in terms limited, like that of the trust sought to be established in the sixth article of the will, by the accomplishment of the end specified. They take effect from the time of the testator's death, and might then have been lawfully applied in exact conformity with his expressed intentions. The retaining of the funds in the custody of the court while this case has been under advisement cannot affect the question. The gifts being lawful and charitable, and having once vested, the subsequent change of circumstances before the funds have been actually paid over is of no more weight than if they had been paid to the trustees and been administered by them for a century before slavery was extinguished.

Neither the immediate purpose of the testator—the moral education of the people; nor his ultimate object—to better the condition of the African race in this country; has been fully accomplished by the abolition of slavery.

Negro slavery was recognized by our law as an infraction of the rights inseparable from human nature; and tended to promote idleness, selfishness and tyranny in one part of the community, a destruction of the domestic relations and utter debasement in the other part. The sentiment which would put an end to it is the sentiment of justice, humanity and charity, based upon moral duty, inspired by the most familiar precepts of the Christian religion, and approved by the constitution of the commonwealth. The teaching and diffusion of such a sentiment are not of temporary benefit or necessity, but of perpetual obligation. Slavery may be abolished; but to strengthen and confirm the sentiment which opposed it will continue to be useful and desirable so long as selfishness, cruelty, the lust of dominion, and indifference to the rights of the weak, the poor and the ignorant, have a place in the hearts of men. Looking at the trust established by the fourth article of this will as one for the moral education of the people only, the case is within the principle of those, already cited, in which charities for the relief of leprosy and the plague were held not to end with the disappearance of those diseases; and is not essentially different from that of Attorney General v. Balliol College, in which a trust for the education at Oxford of Scotch youths, to be sent into Scotland to preach Episcopalianism in the established church there, was applied by Lords Somers and Hardwicke and their successors to educate such youths, although, by the change of faith and practice of the Church of Scotland, the donor's ultimate object could no longer be accomplished.

The intention of Francis Jackson to benefit the negro race appears not only in the leading clause of the fourth article, and in his expression of a hope that his trustees might receive the aid and the gifts of the friends of the slave, but in the trust for the benefit of fugitive slaves in the fifth article of the will, to which, according to the principle established by the house of lords in the Case of Betton's Charity, resort may be had to ascertain his intent and the fittest mode of carrying it out. The negroes, although emancipated, still stand in great need of assistance and education. Charities for the relief of the poor have been often held to be well applied to educate them and their children. Bishop of Hereford v. Adams, 7 Ves. 324; Wilkinson v. Malin, 2 Crompt. & J. 636, 2 Tyrw. 544; Anderson v. Wrights of Glasgow, 12 L. T. (N. S.) 807. The Case of Mico Charity is directly to the point that a gift for the redemption of poor slaves may be appropriated, after they have been emancipated by law, to educate them; and the reasons given by Lord Cottenham for that decision apply with no less force to those set free by the recent amendment of the constitution in the United States, than to those who were emancipated by act of parliament in the West Indies.

The mode in which the funds bequeathed by the fourth and fifth articles of the will may be best applied to carry out in a lawful manner the charitable intents and purposes of the testator as nearly as possible must be settled by a scheme to be framed by a master and confirmed by the court before the funds are paid over to the trustees. In doing this, the court does not take the charity out of the hands of the trustees, but only declares the law which must be their guide in its administration. Shelf. Mortm. 651-654; Boyle, Char. 214-218. The case is therefore to be referred to a master, with liberty to the attorney general and the trustees to submit schemes for his approval; and all further directions are reserved until the coming in of his report.

The case was then referred to John Codman, Esquire, a master in chancery for this county, who, after notice to the trustees and the attorney general, and hearing the parties, made his report, the results of which were approved by the attorney general; and upon exceptions to which the case was argued by W. Phillips for himself and other excepting trustees, and by J. A. Andrew in support of the master's report, before Gray, J., with the agreement that he should consult the whole court before entering a final decree. No account was asked by any party of sums already expended by the trustees.

As to the bequest in the fifth article, the master reported that the unexpended balance (amounting to $1049.90) was so small that it was reasonable that it should be confined to a limited territory; and that it should therefore be applied by the trustees, in accordance with their unanimous recommendation, to the use of necessitous persons of African descent in the city of Boston and its vicinity. This scheme was approved and confirmed by the court, with this addition: "Preference being given to such as have escaped from slavery."

As to the sum bequeathed in the fourth article of the will, the master reported that a portion had been expended by the trustees before any question arose as to its validity; and that but two schemes had been suggested to him for the appropriation of the residue, namely, first, (which was approved by four of the seven trustees who had accepted the trust,) in part to the support of the Anti-

Slavery Standard, and in part to the New England Branch of the American Freedmen's Union Commission; or, second, (which was approved by the remaining trustees,) that the whole should be applied to the last named object.

The master disapproved of the first of these schemes; and reported that the Anti-Slavery Standard was a weekly newspaper published in the city of New York with a circulation of not more than three thousand copies, which was established nearly thirty years ago for the purpose of acting upon public opinion in favor of the abolition of slavery; that in his opinion, since the abolition of slavery, and the passage of the reconstruction acts of congress, "the support of a paper of such limited circulation as hardly to be self-sustaining would do very little for the benefit of the colored people in their present status, and its direct influence would be almost imperceptible on the welfare of that class most nearly corresponding to those whom the testator had in view in making this bequest;" and that the argument, that it was evidently the intention of the testator to accomplish the object indicated in the fourth article of his will by means of which a newspaper like this might be considered an example, was answered by the fact that the object for which these means were to be used had been already accomplished without them. The master returned with his report a few numbers of the Anti-Slavery Standard, (taken without selection as they were given to him by the chairman of the trustees,) by which it appeared that it was in large part devoted to urging the passage of laws securing to the freedmen equal political rights with the whites, the keeping of the southern states under military government, the impeachment of the president, and other political measures.

The master reported that he was unable to devise any better plan than the second scheme suggested; that this mode of appropriation was in his opinion most in accordance with the intention of the testator as expressed in the fourth article of the will, because the intention nearest to that of emancipating the slaves was by educating the emancipated slaves to render them capable of self-government; and this could best be done by an organized society, expressly intended and exactly fitted for this function, and which, if the whole or any part of this fund was to be applied to the direct education and support of the freedmen, was admitted at the hearing before him to be the fittest channel for the appropriation. The master returned with his report printed documents by which it appeared that the object of the American Freedmen's Union Commission, as stated in its constitution, was "the relief, education and elevation of the freedmen of the United States, and to aid and coöperate with the people of the South, without distinction of race or color, in the improvement of their condition, upon the basis of industry, education, freedom and Christian morality;" and that the New England and other branches of the commission were now maintaining large numbers of teachers and schools for this purpose throughout the southern states.

The master accordingly reported that what remained of the fund bequeathed by the fourth article of the will should be "ordered to be paid over to the New England Branch of the Freedmen's Union Commission, to be employed and expended by them in promoting the education, support and interests generally of the freedmen (late slaves) in the states of this Union recently in rebellion." And this scheme was by the opinion of the whole court accepted and confirmed, modified only by directing the executor to pay the fund to the trustees, to be by them paid over at such times and in such sums as they in their discretion might think fit to the treasurer of the branch commission; and by substituting for the words "recently in rebellion" the words "in which slavery has been abolished, either by the proclamation of the late President Lincoln or the amendment of the constitution."

Court of Appeals of New York. Dec. 5, 1899.

Appeal from supreme court, appellate division, Fourth department.

Action by Benjamin G. Allen and others against Charles E. Stevens and others, as executors and trustees under the will of Nathan F. Graves, deceased, to obtain a construction of the will. From an order of the appellate division (54 N. Y. Supp. 8) reversing a judgment in favor of defendants (49 N. Y. Supp. 431), they appeal. Reversed.

This action was brought for the purpose of obtaining a construction of the will of Nathan F. Graves, deceased, and particularly the tenth clause thereof, devising and bequeathing the residuary real and personal estate in trust for the purpose of founding, erecting, and maintaining Graves Home for the Aged, to the effect that the said provisions of the tenth clause be adjudged void and invalid, and also that it be adjudged and determined that the said will is void and invalid so far as it devised and bequeathed more than one-half of the real and personal property of the testator to benevolent, charitable, literary, scientific, religious, and missionary societies, associations, or corporations, in trust or otherwise, and that the surplus of such one-half part be distributed and conveyed to the plaintiffs, who are next of kin of the testator. The special term decided that the will was in all respects valid, and rendered judgment accordingly. The appellate division, by a divided court, held that the tenth clause was invalid, and reversed the judgment. From the order and judgment entered thereon, appeals have been taken to this court.

The will read as follows:

"I Nathan F. Graves, of the city of Syracuse, in the state of New York, being of sound mind and memory, do make, ordain, publish, and declare this to be my last will and testament; that is to say:

"First. After all my lawful debts are paid and discharged, I give, devise, and bequeath unto Catharine H. Graves, my wife, all of the furniture, beds, and bedding of every kind, including paintings, pictures, vases, and statuary of every kind, with all kitchen utensils, in the dwelling house where we now live, the horses, harnesses, carriages, wagons, sleighs, sleds, cows, chickens, and everything appertaining thereto and connected therewith, including feed of every kind, to have and to hold the same to her heirs and assigns, forever. I also give and bequeath to the said Catharine H. Graves the rents, issues, and profits of all of my houses, tenements, and stores south of James street, in Syracuse, to be paid to her monthly, subject only to the necessary repairs and taxes for and during her natural life. I also give and bequeath to the said Catharine

H. Graves all dividends that may be declared by the New York State Banking Company on all the stock standing in my name, to be paid to her when declared and due, payable to her immediately, for and during her natural life.

"Second. I give and bequeath to the Oneida Cemetery Association, called 'Glenwood Cemetery,' situate in the town of Lenox, near the village of Oneida, in Madison county, in the state of New York, the sum of five hundred dollars, to be received and held in trust by the trustees thereof, or other representatives of said Cemetery Association, to be invested on first bond and mortgage or mortgages, the interest, or so much thereof or so much of the same as may be necessary, be expended in keeping the family burial lot in good order, grading, mowing, enriching, and all other things that may be needed. The lot is known as lot number one in section S in said cemetery, the title of which is in Nathan F. Graves and Catharine H. Graves, his wife. The said money may be deposited in any savings bank in Madison or Onondaga county when not invested in bond and mortgage. Any part of the interest or principal may be used to repair any injury to the monument or headstones caused by any casualty or by lapse of time.

"Third. I give and bequeath to the General Synod of the Reformed Church in America, also known as the General Synod of Church in America, the sum of ten thousand dollars, for the specific purpose of founding and maintaining an annual course of lectures on missions (the choice of the lecturer and the details of the lectureship to be under the direction of the professors in the seminary at New Brunswick, New Jersey, and the corresponding secretary of the board of foreign missions of the Reformed Church of America, or his successor), payable after the death of my wife, Catharine H. Graves; but the sum of five hundred dollars a year is to be paid by my executors, at such times as the same may be needed to sustain the lecture course, during the life of my wife.

"Fourth. I give and bequeath to the Syracuse University, situated in the city of Syracuse, in the state of New York, ten thousand dollars, for the specific purpose of founding and maintaining an annual course of lectures on missions (the choice of the lecturer and the details of the lectureship to be under the direction of the chancellor of the University), payable after the death of my wife, Catharine H. Graves; but the sum of five hundred dollars a year is to be paid by my executors, at such times as the same may be needed to sustain the lecture course, during the life of my wife.

"Fifth. I give and bequeath to Hope College, situated at Holland, in the state of Michigan, ten thousand dollars for the specific purpose of erecting a fireproof building, to be used as a library. The sums that I have advanced or may hereafter advance during my life will be deducted from the above amount. I also give and bequeath to said Hope College my miscellaneous library in the dwelling house in Syracuse where I now reside. The library will not be delivered to said Hope College during the life of Catharine H. Graves, my wife, unless she consents to the removal in writing.

"Sixth. I give and bequeath to the Syracuse Home Association, situate at the corner of Townsend and Hawley streets, in Syracuse, to the Onondaga County Orphan Asylum, in Syracuse, and the St. Joseph's Hospital, situate on Prospect avenue, corner Union street, in Syracuse, each one thousand dollars, payable after the death of Catharine H. Graves, my wife.

"Seventh. I give and bequeath unto the consistory of the Reformed Church, situated on James street, in Syracuse, in the state of New York, the sum of two thousand dollars in trust for the specific purpose hereinafter named, which sum may be invested in first mortgage or mortgages; the interest to be used in the payment of the rent of a pew in said church, and the balance of interest, if any, to be given to the board of foreign missions of said church. The pew designated by the consistory may be used by the pastor of the church and his family when needed for that purpose, and, when not so needed, to be used as the consistory shall from time to time determine.

"Eighth. I give and bequeath to my executors the sum of fifteen hundred dollars, but in trust to be used for the purpose of placing in the Reformed Church in Syracuse a memorial window for wife, Catharine H. Graves, and myself. The sum may be used for that purpose, or so much thereof as may be necessary. The memorial window may be omitted, and a memorial tablet be placed on the wall inside of the church. In either case the consent and approval of the consistory must first be obtained.

"Ninth. I give and bequeath to Francis H. Loomis, the son of my sister Achsah H. Loomis, one thousand dollars. I give and bequeath to Helen A. Graves, the daughter of my brother Benjamin S. Graves, one thousand dollars. I give and bequeath to Benjamin G. Allen, the son of my sister Mary A. Allen, one thousand dollars. I give and bequeath to Helen M. Hicks, Charles Sterling Graves, William Shaw Graves, Nathan Francis Graves and Mary Elizabeth Graves, the children of my brother Sterling P. Graves, each one thousand dollars. I give and bequeath to Abial S. Graves, my brother, one thousand dollars; to Mary E. Strong, Elizabeth and Benjamin S. Graves, his children, one thousand dollars each. I give and bequeath to Helen Breese Graves, daughter of Maurice A. Graves, one thousand dollars. I give and bequeath to Nathan B. Graves ten thousand dollars. I give and bequeath to Augustus C. Stevens, son of Charles E. Stevens, my law library and my mahogany book and paper case. I give and bequeath to Maurice A. Graves my three black-walnut book cases, now in my library room where I now reside; also, my library table. I give and bequeath to my brother the portrait of myself, painted by Eliatt; unto Sterling P. Graves. I give and bequeath unto Nathan Francis Graves my watch and chains.

"Tenth. I give, bequeath, and devise all the rest and residue of my property of every kind, personal and real, wherever situate, to my trustees hereinafter named, for the purpose of founding, erecting, and maintaining Graves Home for the Aged, to be located in the city of Syracuse, in the state of New York. It is intended as a home for those who by misfortune have become incapable of providing for themselves, and those who have slender means of support. The institution to be known as the Graves Home for the Aged. I hereby appoint Charles E. Stevens, Russelas A. Bonta, and Maurice A. Graves for the trustees to execute the above trust. I hereby authorize and empower my executors, or the survivor of them, to rent or sell any part or all of my real estate that I may own at the time of my death. They are authorized to employ a person or persons to have charge of the real estate, to collect rents and make repairs, and to pay such sums for compensation as they may deem reasonable and proper. After my executors have executed their trust, and paid all the legatees provided for in this will, they are authorized and directed to convey to the said trustees above named the balance and remainder of my property of every kind, to be applied for the purposes above provided; and the said trustees, or the survivor, are authorized to rent or sell all or any part of my real or personal property, and to employ such agents as they may deem proper to take charge of the same, and pay them such compensation as they deem best.

"Eleventh. My executors or my trustees are authorized to retain my stock and shares in the New York State Banking Company, and continue the business of banking for a term of years, at their discretion, but may sell the same or any part thereof at any time; but the same is not to be continued, nor any portion of my property held, longer than the lives of Catharine Graves Roby, daughter of Sidney B. Roby, of Rochester, and Helen Breese Graves, daughter of Maurice A. Graves, of Syracuse. Likewise, I make, constitute, and appoint Charles E. Stevens, Russelas A. Bonta, and Maurice A. Graves to be executors of this, my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills by me made.

"In witness whereof, I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my seal the fifteenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and ninety-three. Nathan F. Graves. [Seal.]"

attorney general. C. E. Stevens, for appellant First Reformed Church. Joseph W. Sutphen, for appellant General Synod. William G. Tracy, for respondents Allen and others. C. Carskadden, for respondent Breese.

PARKER, C. J. (after stating the facts). Under the law of this state, prior to the enactment of chapter 701 of the Laws of 1893, the tenth clause of the will in question would have been void upon two grounds: First, because of the indefiniteness of the beneficiaries (Bascom v. Albertson, 34 N. Y. 580; Tilden v. Green, 130 N. Y. 29, 28 N. E. 880, 14 L. R. A. 33); and, second, because, although intending to found a permanent charity, the testator did not direct the formation of a corporation within two lives in being to take over the trust property. Burrill v. Boardman, 43 N. Y. 254; Cruikshank v. Home for the Friendless, 113 N. Y. 337, 21 N. E. 64, 4 L. R. A. 140; People v. Simonson, 126 N. Y. 299, 27 N. E. 380. The question now presented is whether the act of 1893 has so far amended the law relating to the subject of charitable bequests as to make it possible for the charitable intentions of this testator to be executed. Before examining the statute, which was concededly intended to affect in some wise the law upon the general subject, it will not be out of place to have in mind the situation of such law. No one disputes that it was the intention of the legislature to change in substantial respects the law as it had been settled by the courts of this state. The controversy is as to the extent of the changes intended by the legislature, and upon the question of intent some light will be thrown by a very brief reference to the early state of the law in this state upon the subject of charitable uses, and the changes from time to time which finally resulted in its overthrow. This subject was exhaustively considered in an opinion written by Judge Denio in the case of Williams v. Williams, 8 N. Y. 525. In that case the opinion declared that according to the law of England as it existed at the time of the American Revolution, and as it still exists, devises and bequests in support of charity and religion, although defective for want of such grantee or donee as the rules of law require in other cases, would nevertheless be supported in the courts of chancery; that such parts of the common law had become incorporated into our system of jurisprudence prior to the adoption of the constitution, by force of the provisions, of which it became a part, of the common law of this state. In answer to the claim that the law of charitable uses was created by the statute 43 Eliz. c. 4, and hence was abrogated by the repeal in this state of the statute of Elizabeth (Laws 1788, c. 46, § 37), the court asserted that the doctrine of charitable uses was a creation of chancery, and had been regarded as an important part of its jurisdiction long prior to the enactment of the statute of Elizabeth, and such system having become ingrafted upon the common law, and the practice thereof having been undertaken and carried on by the court of chancery in this state, that it was not affected by the repeal of the statute of Elizabeth; that the provisions of the Revised Statutes did not affect property given in perpetuity for religious or charitable purposes; and hence that the bequest of $6,000 to Zophar V. Oakley and other individual trustees, with power to perpetuate their successors, as a perpetual fund for the education of children of the poor who should be educated in the academy in the village of Huntington, with directions to accumulate the fund up to a certain point, and apply the income to the education of children whose parents' names were not upon the tax list, was valid.

If that case had continued to be the law of this state, there would have been no opportunity for questioning the validity of the tenth clause of this testator's will. That decision, it would seem, should have settled the question in this state, but the struggle between the advocates of a liberal policy towards charities and the opponents of such a policy did not stop with that decision. In Levy v. Levy, 33 N. Y. 97, Judge Wright challenged the position taken by the court in the Williams Case, and discussed anew the question whether the English doctrine of trusts for charitable uses was the law of this state. The discussion was continued in Bascom v. Albertson and Burrill v. Boardman, supra; and in Holmes v. Mead, 52 N. Y. 332, it was finally decided that the system of charitable uses, as recognized in England prior to the Revolution, has no existence in this state, and that such uses are not exempt from the provisions of the statute abolishing all uses and trusts except such as are authorized thereby. Efforts in the interest of upholding important charitable bequests have from time to time been made to persuade the courts to reopen the subject to a limited extent, without other result than an approval of the case of Holmes v. Mead, as in Holland v. Alcock, 108 N. Y. 312, 16 N. E. 305, where the court felt called upon to point out that "charity, as a great interest of civilization and Christianity, has suffered no loss or diminution in the change which has been made. The law has been simplified, and that is all." So the fact seemed to be at the time of such writing, and so it may have been, except as to that class of charities which, for convenience, we may call original charities, as where a person desires to found an institution to carry on a charity that will bear his name and be a monument to his memory, or wishes to benefit a class of unfortunate persons in his own community, in whom he may be interested. Many a testator has attempted to provide by his last will and testament for such a charity, but, so far as the decisions show, nearly every such attempt has come to naught, because the courts, in applying the rules resulting from the final overthrow of the Williams Case, have been obliged to hold that the language employed by the testator was either indefinite as to beneficiaries, or in violation of the law against perpetuities. Holmes v. Mead, 52 N. Y. 332; Prichard v. Thompson, 95 N. Y. 76; Cottman v. Grace, 112 N. Y. 299, 19 N. E. 839, 3 L. R. A. 145; Read v. Williams, 125 N. Y. 560, 26 N. E. 730; Fosdick v. Town of Hempstead, 125 N. Y. 581, 26 N. E. 801, 11 L. R. A. 715; Tilden v. Green, 130 N. Y. 29, 28 N. E. 880, 14 L. R. A. 33; Booth v. Church, 126 N. Y. 215, 28 N. E. 238. Our attention has not been called to, nor have we discovered, any case in the books, since the decision of Holmes v. Mead, where an attempt to create an original charity has survived the test of an application by the courts of the rules of law to the language employed by the testator. Among the last, if not the very last, of the successful attempts in that direction, was in respect to the will of James H. Roosevelt, deceased, which was before the court in Burrill v. Boardman, 43 N. Y. 254. In that case the court declined to decide the question whether the peculiar system of charitable uses as it existed in England has ever had foothold in this state. The decision of this court, holding that will to be valid, made Roosevelt Hospital a possibility. As these statements seem to make their own comment, we pass to the position of the legislature in 1893, which had its attention sharply drawn to the subject by a comparatively recent decision of this court, the effect of which was to deprive the public of a great charity, in which Samuel J. Tilden sought to employ the bulk of his fortune, aggregating millions. Looking back over the 20 years that had elapsed since the decision of the court in Holmes v. Mead, the legislature could discover nothing but wrecks of original charities,—charities that were dear to the hearts of their would-be founders, and the execution of which would have been of inestimable value to the public. Further back of that period, however, it found that in Williams v. Williams, supra, the court had declared it to be the law of this state that charitable devises and bequests were not subject to the statute against perpetuities, nor subject to strangulation by the rule against indefinite beneficiaries; for the court, having equitable jurisdiction, claimed the right to administer the law of charitable uses. Our legislature not only saw that a great wrong had been and was being done to the public by the loss of many devises and bequests for the purpose of founding original charities, but it further saw that the remedy could alone be furnished by it. It perceived that its repeal of the statute of Elizabeth furnished the foundation for the decisions of the courts, and did away with the law of England upon that subject, as well as with the practice in this country in that regard which had been founded upon such law, so it set about making a change in the law; and the statute which it enacted, together with the title, reads as follows:

"An act to regulate gifts for charitable purposes.

"Section 1. No gift, grant, bequest or devise to religious, educational, charitable, or benevolent uses, which shall, in other respects be valid under the laws of this state, shall or be deemed invalid by reason of the indefiniteness or uncertainty of the persons designated as the beneficiaries thereunder in the instrument creating the same. If in the instrument creating such a gift, grant, bequest or devise there is a trustee named to execute the same, the legal title to the lands or property given, granted, devised or bequeathed for such purposes shall vest in such trustee. If no person be named as trustee then the title to such lands or property shall vest in the supreme court.

"Sec. 2. The supreme court shall have control over gifts, grants, bequests and devises in all cases provided for by section one of this act. The attorney-general shall represent the beneficiaries in all such cases and it shall be his duty to enforce such trusts by proper proceedings in the court." Laws 1893, c. 701.

Reading the statute in the light of the events to which reference has been made, it seems to me very clear that the legislature intended to restore the law of charitable trusts as declared in the Williams Case; that having discovered that legislative enactment had operated to take away the power of the courts of equity to administer trusts that were indefinite as to beneficiaries, and had declared a permanent charity void unless the devise in trust was to a corporation already formed, or to one to be created, it sought to restore that which had been taken away through another enactment. This is markedly indicated, not only by the absence of details in the statute, which is broadly entitled "An act to regulate gifts for charitable purposes," but also in the brevity of the statute, which confers all power over such trusts and trustees on the supreme court, and directs the attorney general to represent the beneficiaries in cases within the purview of the statute, as was the practice in England. Practical effect can be given to the provision that no devise or bequest shall be deemed invalid by reason of the indefiniteness or uncertainty of the persons designated as beneficiaries only by treating it as a part of a general scheme to restore to the courts of equity the power formerly exercised by chancery in the regulation of gifts for charitable purposes; for, in order to ascertain the class of persons who were entitled to the benefits of the trust, the rule formerly in force must necessarily be invoked, by which the court ascertained as nearly as possible the intention of the testator, by decree adjudged who were intended to be the beneficiaries of the trust, and directed its administration accordingly.

Fowler, in his work on Charitable Uses, in speaking of the act of 1893, says: "It must be very obvious that the act of 1893 has seriously affected those decisions of the courts of New York which require great certainty or a vested interest in the beneficiaries of a charitable trust. The act, in this respect only, is designed to restore the ancient law touching charitable uses for uncertain persons, and to this extent to relieve charitable trusts from the narrow boundaries prescribed by the Revised Statutes for private uses in lands." While that learned author expresses the opinion that the act does not relieve charitable or publicuses from the application of the rules relating to perpetuities, which, he says, "have no reference to public trusts," he asserts that, had that been done, the ancient law would have been almost revived by the legislature. That he is right in saying that the legislature "designed to restore the ancient law touching charitable uses for uncertain persons" seems unquestionable, and it appears to be reasonably clear, from a reading of the entire act, that the legislature designed to restore the law governing the administration of such trusts as well. And, if such was the design of the legislature, then effect must be given to it, though such a construction seems contrary to the letter of the statute. Smith v. People, 47 N. Y. 330. As this statute is remedial in its character, it should be liberally construed with a view to the beneficial end proposed. Hudler v. Golden, 36 N. Y. 446. The statute provides that, if there is a trustee named to execute the trust, the legal title to the property shall vest in such trustee, and, further, that, if no person be named as trustee, the title shall vest in the supreme court. That there might be no opportunity for questioning the authority of the supreme court in such matters, the second section provides that the supreme court shall have control over all gifts, grants, bequests, and devises in all cases provided by section 1 of this act. Under the provisions of the act a testator may name a corporation as trustee, or provide that a corporation to be founded shall act as trustee, or the trustee named may be an individual; but, if he name none of these, the statute provides, in effect, that the trust shall not fail, but the title to the property devised or bequeathed in trust shall vest in the supreme court, which shall have control over gifts, grants, bequests, and devises provided for by the act. If the contention be well founded that it was not the intention of the legislature to revive the ancient law as to the administration of such trusts by the supreme court, and to do away with the rule requiring the formation of a corporation for such purpose, then no permanent charity can be administered by the supreme court, notwithstanding the title to the trust property is by the command of the statute vested in the supreme court when no trustee is named by the testator. It is insisted that it cannot be, because the trust term is not measured by lives. Neither is a corporation, which may, as a trustee, execute a permanent trust for charity. But, it is answered, the law has created an exception to the general rule in favor of corporations. True, and the lawmaking power had the right to create other exceptions, or change the law altogether; and it has changed the law as to all cases within the scope of the act, "to regulate gifts for charitable purposes," so that now the supreme court must execute such a trust, if the title to the trust property vests in it under the statute, and shall have control over the administration, if a trustee be named by the testator. A construction of this statute allowing the supreme court to execute a permanent charity when the title to the real estate is vested in it, and at the same time declaring that, where such property is devised to a trustee named, the devise is void, would be absurd.

The learned counsel for the respondent points out that it is not all gifts and devises to religious, educational, charitable, or benevolent uses that shall not be deemed invalid by reason of indefiniteness as to beneficiaries, but only such as "shall in other respects be valid under the laws of this state," and, with signal ability, seeks to persuade us that, in order to give these words effect, it must be held that a trust is not within the protection of the statute if it contravenes the law against perpetuities, and, as a necessary sequence, that if the devise in trust be not to a corporation, or provision be not made for the formation of a corporation, within a period measured by two lives in being, to take over the trust estate, then the devise or bequest is invalid, and this statute is without effect in such case. It will be observed that, if this contention be well grounded, the authority attempted to be conferred upon the supreme court to take title and execute a trust of a permanent character when no trustee is named is practically of no effect, and the statute itself is limited in its application to a case of the type of Prichard v. Thompson, 95 N. Y. 76, which is the single case brought to our attention where the only objection to the validity of the trust was that the beneficiaries were indefinite. In the light of the destruction of so many original charities, as shown by the decisions, the thought cannot for a moment be indulged in that the legislature had in view this case only, and sought to furnish a remedy for just such cases in the future, and for none other.

We are thus led to inquire whether this clause in the statute may not have been intended to serve some other purpose than to require the continuance of the practice of the formation of corporations for the administration of permanent, charitable trusts,—a result apparently in conflict with the other provisions of the statute providing for the execution of trusts by trustees or by the supreme court. In the attempt to ascertain the intention of the legislature, it is a just rule, always to be observed, that the court shall assume that every provision of the statute was intended to serve some useful purpose; and, in obedience to that rule, we now inquire whether this clause of the statute does not have a useful place therein, and yet is not in conflict with the letter and spirit of the rest of the statute. It is so obvious that it has, that we need cite but one instance for the need of such a provision, and that is suggested by one of the contentions made in this case. A., having a substantial estate, and desiring to provide suitably for the support of his wife and two brothers during their lifetime, for which he deemed the income amply sufficient, devised his estate in trust to a trustee during the lifetime of his wife and brothers, directing that the income be apportioned between the cestuis que trustent during their lives, and that after the death of the last survivor of them the property be vested in the supreme court as a permanent trust, the income to be used towards the support and maintenance of the Syracuse Hospital. Such a trust would, of course, be in direct violation of the statute of perpetuities and void; for by it the testator would design to do what the statute aims to prevent from being done, namely, to tie up the estate for the benefit of his family for a period longer than two lives in being (i. e. three lives in being), before the trust for charitable purposes could go into operation. This clause therefore seems to constitute a very useful feature, indeed, of the statute; and, because this is so, all excuse is taken away for an argument that it was intended to serve as such an obstruction to a practical operation of the statute as would render it of no substantial value to the public, and it eliminates all opportunity for questioning that it was the intention of the legislature to restore the ancient law as to gifts for charitable purposes, because experience has shown that, as to original charities, far better results were obtained under it, from the public point of view, and with a more decent regard for the wishes of testators, who do not always love their distant relatives,—occasionally, perhaps, with justification.

We are thus conducted to an examination of the tenth clause of the will. It reads as follows: "Tenth. I give, bequeath, and devise all the rest and residue of my property, of every kind, personal and real, wherever situate, to my trustees hereinafter named, for the purpose of founding, erecting, and maintaining Graves Home for the Aged, to be located in the city of Syracuse, in the state of New York. It is intended for a home for those who by misfortune have become incapable of providing for themselves, and those who have slender means of support. The institution to be known as the Graves Home for the Aged. I hereby appoint Charles C. Stevens, Rasselas A. Bonta, and Maurice A. Graves for the trustees to execute the above trust. I hereby authorize and empower my executors, or the survivor of them, to rent or sell any part or all of my real estate that I may own at the time of my death. They are authorized to employ a person or persons to have charge of the real estate, to collect rents and to make repairs, and to pay such sum for compensation as they may deem reasonable and proper. After my executors have executed their trust, and paid all the legatees provided for in this will, they are authorized and directed to convey to the said trustees above named the balance and remainder of my property, of every kind, to be applied for the purposes above provided; and the said trustees, or the survivor, are authorized to rent or sell all or any part of my real or personal property, and to employ such agents as they may deem proper to take charge of the same, and pay them such compensation as they deem best."

While the place where "Graves Home for the Aged" is to be located is stated, and the general object of the charity is clearly given, namely, to provide a home for the aged who by misfortune have become incapable of providing for themselves, it is still indefinite as to the territory from which such aged people may be accepted at the home. But for the statute that we have been considering, this trust would fail because of the indefiniteness of the beneficiaries; but the practice that it revives makes it necessary for the supreme court, when properly moved by the attorney general, representing the beneficiaries, to ascertain, as nearly as may be, the intention of the testator as to the method of selecting those aged persons who are to be the beneficiaries of the home, and to make such intention efficacious by decree. It seems to have been the opinion of the appellate division that the power of alienation of the bank shares and the real estate south of James street was, under the terms of the will, suspended during three lives in being after the death of the testator, but to us it seems that this is not so. It is true that by the first clause of the will the trustees were directed to pay to testator's wife, during life, the dividends on the bank stocks, when declared, and the net income from the real estate, after making payments for necessary repairs and taxes, while by the eleventh provision of the will the testator authorized his executors and trustees to retain his shares in the New York State Banking Company for a term of years, at their discretion, "but may sell the same, or any part thereof, at any time; but the same is not to be continued, nor any portion of my property held, longer than the lives of Catharine Graves Roby, daughter of Sidney B. Roby, of Rochester, and Helen Breese Graves, daughter of Maurice A. Graves, of Syracuse." It will be observed, therefore, that the will operated to vest the title of the estate in the trustees, in trust for the purposes outlined by the testator, as of the date of the latter's death; and they were directed to pay to the widow certain rents and dividends for life, unless she survived two persons upon whose lives the trust estate was expressly limited.

The next question is whether this trust is to be executed by the trustees named in the will, or by the supreme court. It is the next question because we have already reached the conclusion that a corporation is not necessary for the execution of such a trust, since the adoption of the statute, but that the supreme court, in a proper case, must take upon itself such execution, over which it shall have control where a trustee is not named for the purpose. In this case trustees were named, and, as the eleventh clause of the will expressly prohibits the trustees from holding any portion of the testator's property longer than the lives of the two persons in being therein named, it must be held that the trustees are charged with the management and conduct of the trust until the expiration of a period measured by the two lives in being, at which time the title to the trust property will vest in the supreme court under the statute.

The plaintiffs claim that the tenth provision of the will is void as to one-half of the remainder of the testator's estate under section 1, c. 360, of the Laws of 1860, which reads as follows: "Section 1. No person having a husband, wife, child or parent, shall, by his or her last will and testament, devise or bequeath to any benevolent, charitable, literary, scientific, religious or missionary society, association or corporation, in trust or otherwise, more than one-half part of his or her estate, after the payment of his or her debts (and such devises or bequests shall be valid to the extent of one-half and no more)." The testator gives about $25,000 or less than one-seventh of his estate, to organizations that are within the description of the statute, and in addition to that the residuary devises and bequests are charitable, and therefore within the general description of the statute; but as such devises and bequests are not to a "society, association or corporation in trust or otherwise," but, instead, to trustees, they are not within its prohibition. The maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," is applicable; for it is a man's general right, in this state, to do as he wishes with his own. He may now, as in the past, disinherit his relatives for the benefit of strangers; and this statute was not designed to affect that right, except indirectly. It was recognized, perhaps, that, in the fear of death, men who have never exhibited a charitable impulse suddenly awaken to the fact that behind them are lost opportunities for usefulness that in some way ought to be made good; and in order to balance the account they look about for an opportunity to do good with their money, and find at once a man interested in promoting the fortunes of some religious or charitable institution, who, without hesitation, begins to play, and with a skill acquired by long experience, upon their fears and hopes. Given such a man and such a situation, it was readily conceived that, in his thought of self, the just demands of wife or child or parent might be temporarily lost sight of, and his all devoted to religious or charitable purposes, through some of the many societies, associations, and corporations which are to be found on every hand. Hence the design of the framers of the statute was to place a limitation upon the power of a person thus moved, to dispose of more than one-half of his property by will to such organizations, to the end that he should have an opportunity to measure the claims of his kindred upon him as to the remaining half, unembarrassed by the importunities of those whose business it is to get money for the societies, associations, or corporations they represent; and this it was thought would be substantially accomplished by an act prohibiting him from giving more than one-half of his property to the societies, associations, and corporations most likely to be considered. But, except as thus restrained by the statute, he may still disinherit his kindred by disposing of his property in such manner and for such purpose as he may desire; and so this testator, in devising his property to trustees in trust for the uses and purposes described in the will, was not within the prohibition of the statute. The result thus reached in this case in no way thwarts the general purpose of the legislature, for the only person who stood in such relation to the testator as to benefit by the statute in any case was the testator's wife, who was over 80 years of age at the time of his death, was amply provided for by the will, and has since died.

The amount of costs awarded seems to be out of all proportion to the work done, and so large that it is not at all surprising that several lawyers have appealed from nearly all allowances except their own; but the supreme court had the power in this suit, brought as it was on the equity side of the court, to award costs to each of the parties; and the question of amount, also, was in the discretion of that court, and not subject to review here, so long as the allowances did not exceed the limitations provided by statute, and this they did not do. The judgment of the appellate division should be reversed, and that of the special term affirmed, with costs to the appellant trustees and to the attorney general.

(12 N. E. 331, 17 N. E. 491, 121 Ill. 269.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. June 17, 1887.

Appeal from circuit court, La Salle county.

Geo. Hunt, Atty. Gen., and Mayo & Widmer, for appellants. Duncan, O'Connor & Gilbert, for appellees Vineria Fowler and others.

SHELDON, J. This was a bill in chancery filed by the heirs at law of Esther S. Chapman, deceased, against the attorney general of the state and the executors of the will of the decedent, to have a certain portion of the estate left by her declared to be intestate, and to belong to the complainants, as heirs at law of the decedent. The will, executed March 15, 1883, after making sundry bequests to various persons other than the complainants, concluded with this residuary clause: "All the residue of my estate I devise and bequeath unto the legatees hereinbefore named, in equal proportions, excepting said Oakwood seminary and said Sylvester M. Chapman." Subsequently, on April 5, 1885, the testatrix executed a codicil which contained this residuary clause: "All the rest and residue of my estate, including that which may lapse for any cause, I direct to be invested or loaned upon the best terms possible, so as to produce the largest income, and said income to be distributed among the worthy poor of the city of La Salle, in such manner as a court of chancery may direct." Executors of the will were appointed. The decedent left both real and personal estate.

The bill alleges that the city of La Salle is situated in the town of La Salle, and includes but a small portion of the territory of the town; and that there is not now, nor has there ever been, in said city, any organization or association, voluntary or otherwise, for the distribution of charity to the poor of the city; and that the municipal authorities have no duties imposed upon them to provide for the poor; and claims that the residuary clause of the codicil is incapable of execution by reason of the uncertainty of the beneficiaries intended by the testator, and void, and that, in consequence, all the rest and residue of the estate, both real and personal, after the payment of the general and specific legacies, was intestate estate. A demurrer to the bill was interposed by the attorney general and the executors, which was overruled by the court, whereupon the executors answered, denying the invalidity of the residuary clause of the codicil, or that it was incapable of execution, and setting up that, even if such were the case, the rest and residue of the estate must be distributed in accordance with the residuary clause of the will. Thereupon the bill was amended by making the residuary legatees specified in the will additional parties defendant. Subsequently a hearing was had upon pleadings and proofs, and a decree was entered finding that the residuary clause of the codicil was ineffectual to dispose of the property, but that it nevertheless revoked the residuary clause of the will, and declaring that the real estate of which the testatrix died seised belonged to the complainants as her heirs at law, and directing that the rest and residue of the personal estate should be distributed to the complainants as intestate estate. From this decree the attorney general, the executors, and a portion of the legatees specified in the residuary clause of the will have prosecuted this appeal.

There is in American courts much diversity of decision upon the subject of charitable trusts. In express private trusts there is not only a certain trustee who holds the legal estate, but there is a certain specified cestui que trust clearly identified, or made capable of identification, by the terms of the instrument erecting the trust. It is an essential feature of public or charitable trusts that the beneficiaries are uncertain,—a class of persons described in some general language, often fluctuating, changing in their individual numbers, and partaking of a quasi public character. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1018.

In some of the states the equitable system of distinctively charitable trusts is not recognized, and the courts apply only the rules applicable to express private trusts. In other states the "statute of charitable uses" of 43 Eliz. c. 14, has been adopted or repealed, and thereby decisions have been influenced. And in other cases local legislation, or supposed local policy, to more or less extent, enters into adjudications. In another, and, as believed, the larger, portion of the states, the system of charitable trusts as administered in the English court of chancery, in the exercise of its ordinary judicial power, prevails, with variation in regard to the element of certainty in the trustee and the object of the charity. A classification of the decisions in the several states will be found in 2 Perry, Trusts, § 748, in note, and 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1029, and note. The prerogative power of the crown, exercised through the lord chancellor as the representative of the king, as where there is a gift to charity generally, without appointment of a trustee, and the bounty is devoted to some particular charity, or where there is a gift to a particular charitable purpose which cannot be effectuated, and it is applied to some other charitable use, cy-pres the original purpose, is regarded not as a judicial, but a ministerial, prerogative function. This prerogative power courts in this country do not assume to exercise.

Were this subject of charitable trusts a new question with us, there would be opened up a wide and interesting field of discussion, in order for the establishment of the proper rule in this regard. But we are saved labor in this respect, from the ground having heretofore been gone over by this court, and the rule applicable to charitable trusts having been established to be that which is administered in the court of chancery in England, in the exercise of its ordinary jurisdiction as a court of equity. This was done in the case of Heuser v. Harris, 42 Ill. 425, and where it was recognized that the statute of 43 Eliz. c. 4, had been adopted in this state.

The entire contention in this case arises upon the construction, validity, and effect of this residuary clause of the codicil. It is insisted this clause is void for uncertainty as to the beneficiaries.

This is not a bequest to charity generally, or to the poor generally, but to the worthy poor of the city of La Salle. The class here is definite,—the worthy poor of the city of La Salle,—but the individuals of the class to whom the bounty is to be distributed are uncertain. There is always this uncertainty as to individuals, in the case of public charities, and it is this feature of uncertainty which distinguishes public charities from private charities; charitable trusts from private trusts; and to hold charitable gifts to be void because of such uncertainty is to reject this whole distinctive doctrine of charitable trusts. 2 Redf. Wills, 544, (66.)

In the case of a charitable bequest it is immaterial how vague, indefinite, and uncertain the objects of the testator's bounty may be, provided there is a discretionary power vested in some one over its application to those objects. Domestic & F. M. Soc.'s Appeal, 30 Pa. 425; Perry, Trusts, § 732. It is denied that there is any such discretionary power here given, and White v. Fisk, 22 Conn. 31, is cited in support of such denial. The bequest in that case was: "Any surplus income that may remain, to the extent of $1,000 per annum, I direct to be expended by my said trustees for the support of indigent, pious young men preparing for the ministry in New Haven." The decision was that the gift was void, as the objects of the benefaction were indefinite, and that no power was conferred on the trustees to make them definite by selection. This case, though meeting with seeming approval in Grimes' Ex'rs v. Harmon, 35 Ind. 198, has been disapproved by other high authorities. See Perry, Trusts, §§ 713, 720, 748, note 1; 2 Redf. Wills (2d Ed.) p. 541, note; Hesketh v. Murphy, 36 N. J. Eq. 304. The latter case especially speaks of White v. Fisk as a case not likely to be followed.

In Hesketh v. Murphy the testator's will empowered and directed the trustees to employ the annual income of the fund "for the relief of the most deserving poor of the city of Paterson aforesaid, forever, without regard to color or sex; but no person who is known to be intemperate, lazy, immoral, or undeserving, to receive any benefit from the said fund." It was objected that the gift could not be applied to its objects and was void, because the will did not confer upon any one the power of ascertainment of the individuals who should receive the benefit of the bequest. But the court held that the power given the trustees by the will to distribute the fund carried with it, by necessary implication, the power to select the beneficiaries from the designated class, and upheld the bequest. We entirely agree with the criticism there made by Chief Justice Beasley upon the case of White v. Fisk, that there was a mistaken assumption on the part of the court in that case that there was no power to select the objects of the charity lodged by the testator in the trustee; that when a power is conferred on the trustees to distribute the fund to members of a class, such members having certain qualifications which can be ascertained only by the exercise of judgment and discretion, as the act of distribution cannot be performed except after such ascertainment of the particular beneficiaries, the principal power to distribute the moneys carries with it the incidental and necessary power of selection; and this, upon the ordinary doctrine that, when one act is authorized to be done by a trustee or other agent, every authority requisite to the doing of such act is, by intendment of law, comprised in such grant of power. See Pickering v. Shotwell, 10 Pa. St. 23, that the power in the trustee to act at its discretion need not be expressly given, if it can be implied from the nature of the trust. In the later case of Erschine v. Whitehead, 84 Ind. 357, the decision in Grimes v. Harmon does not seem to be approved in its full extent.

In Heuser v. Harris, supra, the bequest of money was "to the poor of Madison county," the interest only to be used, with no appointment of a trustee. As the county court of Madison county was charged by law with the support of the paupers in the county, it was held in that particular case that the poor of the county were its paupers, and that the fund should be held by the county court to be applied for the latter's support. It is not to be the inference from that case that a charitable bequest to the poor necessarily means to paupers, and that the trust is only to be executed by somebody charged by law with the support of paupers. "A bequest in trust for the poor inhabitants of a particular place, parish, or town is a charitable trust for the poor not receiving parochial or municipal aid and relief as paupers, on the ground that the charity is for the poor, and not for the rich, and, if it was applied to the maintenance of those supported by the parish, town, or county, it would relieve wealthy tax-payers from their taxes, and not materially aid the poor." Perry, Trusts, § 698.

It is said in Redf. Wills (2d Ed.) 805, that some of the American cases have gone great lengths in carrying into effect the intention of the testator when there was great indefiniteness in the objects of the trust; "that the want of a trustee in such cases is never any obstacle in the way of a court of equity carrying into effect any trust, and more especially one of a charitable character." Mr. Pomeroy, in speaking of the distinguishing features between charitable and private trusts, says that, in case of the former, "not only may the beneficiaries be uncertain, but that even when the gift is made to no certain trustee, so that the trust, if private, would wholly fail, a court of equity will carry the trust into effect either by appointing a trustee, or by acting itself in place of a trustee. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 1025, 1026. And see Brown v. Kelsey, 2 Cush. 243; Washburn v. Sewall, 9 Metc. 280.

There can be no question of the general rule. But it is said it does not apply in a case where there is such indefiniteness as to beneficiaries as here. Numerous are the instances which might be cited where there was the want of a trustee, and the court executed the trust in cases of equal indefiniteness as here as to the objects of the trust,—as in McCord v. Ochiltree, 8 Blackf. 15, where the legacy was for the education of the pious indigent youths; in Bull v. Bull, 8 Conn. 47, where the executors were to dispose of the residue of the estate "among our brothers and sisters and their children as they shall judge shall be most in need of the same,—this to be done according to their best discretion,—and the executors died never having exercised the power, nor executed the trust; in Williams v. Pearson, 38 Ala. 299, where the beneficiaries named were "all the paupers and poor children of two designated 'beats,' whose parents were not able to support them;" in Howard v. American Peace Soc., 49 Me. 288, where the gift was to the suffering poor of the town of Auburn. Where a legacy is given to trustees to distribute in charity, and they all die in the life-time of the testator, yet the legacy will be enforced in equity. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1166. An extended collection of cases on the general subject may be found in note to Hesketh v. Murphy, 35 N. J. Eq. 23, and in 1 Jarm. Wills, 403, in note.

Mr. Perry sums up, as the result of the principles and authorities, that "a bequest for charity generally, * * * or to the poor generally, or to charity generally, with no trustees appointed, will not be carried into effect by the courts in this country." Perry, Trusts, § 729. That "if a testator makes a general and indefinite bequest to charity, or to the poor, or to religion, and appoints no trustee, but plainly refers such appointment to the court, there would seem to be no impropriety in the court appointing a trustee according to the plain intent of the donor, leaving such trustee to find his power in the will of the donor. But if a testator makes a vague and indefinite gift to charity, and names no trustee, and gives no power to the court to appoint one, there is no power in the American courts to administer such an inchoate and imperfect gift." Id. § 731. That "it is immaterial how uncertain the beneficiaries or objects are, if the court, by a true construction of the instrument, has power to appoint trustees to exercise the discretion or power of making the beneficiaries as certain as the nature of the trust requires them to be." Id. § 732. See, also, 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1169.

In the present case the testatrix appoints no trustee to distribute the fund, but expressly refers its distribution to a court of chancery. The power of distribution, in our opinion, carries with it the power to select the individuals to whom distribution shall be made. The trustee appointed by the court to make the distribution will have the incidental power to select the beneficiaries, so that the case stands the same as if the testatrix herself had appointed a trustee to distribute the fund. The trustee to be appointed by the court will, in effect, be a trustee of her appointment made through the court of chancery.

Courts incline strongly in favor of charitable gifts, and take special care to enforce them. As observed by Mr. Perry (section 687), charitable bequests are said to come within that department of human affairs where the maxim ut res magis valeat quam pereat has been, and should be, applied; and, further (section 690), that until the statute of distributions (22 Car. II. c. 13) was enacted, the ordinary was obliged to apply a portion of every intestate estate to charity, on the ground that there was a general principle of piety and charity in every man. This shows the favor in which charity is held in the law. There is to be the most liberal construction of the donor's intention in support of a charitable donation. Charities have always received a more liberal construction than the law will allow in gifts to individuals. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1165.

The charity here is not vague and indefinite, but quite specific,—to the worthy poor of the city of La Salle. Individuals of the class named will ever be readily found to whom the fund may be distributed. The trust is not difficult of execution according to the intention of the testatrix. Instead of herself naming a trustee to make the distribution of her bequest, the testatrix preferred that the distribution should be made by a court of chancery, whose peculiar province it is to effect the administration of trusts, and especially charitable trusts. There can be no doubt that the execution of the trust by such court would be to effectuate the donor's intention, the aim which is always sought to be accomplished.

Under the principles and the strong current of authorities which are properly applicable, we are fully satisfied that the bequest in question is a valid charitable gift, and that it should be carried into effect by a court of chancery, as the testatrix expressly willed that it should be. The residuary clause of the codicil being held valid, it follows that the complainants take nothing as heirs at law, and are not entitled to maintain their bill. The decree of the circuit court will be reversed, and the cause remanded to that court with directions to dismiss the bill. Decree reversed.

SCHOLFIELD, J. (dissenting). I do not concur in this opinion. I hold that courts of equity in this state exercise no prerogative powers, but, as contradistinguished therefrom, only judicial powers; that, not exercising prerogative powers, the court could not, by the act of the individual, be, and here is not, invested with a power not judicial, namely, that of selecting or designating the "worthy poor" to be the recipients of the testatrix's bounty; and that, since it has not been and could not be invested with such power, it cannot appoint and invest a trustee with such power. I concede the testatrix might have invested a trustee with such power, leaving and directing the court to appoint the trustee; but that is a very different case.

SKELLENGER'S EX'RS v. SKELLENGER'S EX'R.

(32 N. J. Eq. 659.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. May Term, 1880.

Alfred Mills, for complainants. George T. Wert and George W. Forsyth, for next of kin. Edward C. Lyon, for executor of Hannah Skellenger, deceased.

THE VICE CHANCELLOR. This is a bill for direction. The complainants, as the executors of Daniel Skellenger, deceased, ask direction as to what they shall do with certain moneys belonging to their testator, not disposed of by his will. His estate consisted entirely of personalty. By his will, he first gave all his estate to his wife, except his moneys and securities for the payment of money, and then gave all the residue of his estate to his executors, "to have and to hold upon and subject to the following trusts, to wit: upon trust to invest the same at interest, on good security, and the interest and income thereof, after payment of taxes and expenses attending investments, annually to pay to his (my) wife during her natural life," and, within six months after her death, to pay from and out of the residue so directed to be invested upon trust, several pecuniary legacies of fixed amounts. No other or further disposition of the residue is made. The testator's widow survived him. They never had a child. The widow is now dead. She left a will. The complainants, after paying all the legacies directed to be paid, have still in hand over $1,700. The will makes no disposition of the beneficial interest in this sum. The legal title to it was given to the complainants to enable them to perform certain trusts, but, the trusts having been fully performed without it, the question arises, what shall be done with it, or who is entitled to it?

There are three different claimants: first, the executors, who claim the whole to the exclusion of all others; second, the next of kin of the testator, who also claim the whole in exclusion of the executors, and likewise to the exclusion of the representative of the widow, and, third, the representative of the widow, who claims a moiety of the fund.

At common law, an executor, by virtue of his appointment, is entitled to the whole of the personal estate, and if, after the payment of debts and legacies, any surplus remains, it vests in him beneficially. 2 Wms. Ex'rs, 1475, marg. note. But this rule has never prevailed in the United States. On the contrary, it has uniformly been held in this country that, if any part of the personal estate happens to be undisposed of by the will, the executor takes it, as trustee for those who are entitled under the statute of distribution. 1 Perry, Trusts, § 155; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1208.

No doctrine of equity jurisprudence is more firmly established than that where personal estate is given by will to a trustee, upon certain trusts, and the purposes of the trust do not exhaust the whole estate, or the trusts fail, either in whole or in part, by lapse or otherwise, the trustee shall not take the surplus for his own benefit, unless such appears to have been the intention of the testator, but a trust results in favor of those who are entitled under the statute of distribution as the next of kin of the testator. Hill, Trustees, 113, marg. note; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 152; 2 Wms. Ex'rs, 1475, marg. note. Where the gift is made to the donee as trustee, or in trust, without any words indicating an intention to confer a beneficial interest upon him, the form of the gift will be considered conclusive against his right to take for his own benefit. Hill, Trustees, 114, marg. note; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 158. These authorities dispose of the claim of the complainants.

Technically, the testator did not die intestate as to any part of his estate. He gave the legal title of the whole to his executors. They would have taken it anyhow, in virtue of their office, if the will had contained no express gift to them. But he did die intestate as to the beneficial interest in this fund. No disposition was made of that. This interest is an equitable estate, and, as such, is entitled, in equity, to be considered, to all intents and purposes, as a legal estate. Such estates, in equity, are subject to the same incidents, properties and consequences that similar legal estates are at law, and are transmissible in the same manner. Cushing v. Blake, 30 N. J. Eq. 695. The income of this fund passed by the will, but no beneficial interest in the corpus itself. As to that the will is silent and inoperative, and it therefore stood, on the testator's death, in exactly the same condition that it would if he had left no will. As to that it must be declared, as a matter of law, that he had no will.

This being so, it would seem to follow, as a necessary sequence, that the widow was entitled to participate in its distribution. As a general rule, the right of the distributees vests immediately on the death of the intestate. But it is contended that our statute was intended to regulate distribution only in cases of total intestacy, and has no application to a case of partial intestacy. This argument, however, proves too much, for, if sound, it will exclude the next of kin quite as effectually as the widow. The right of distribution is not a common-law right, but depends upon statute. Originally the ordinary took the whole surplus for pious uses. To cure this wrong, parliament took away the right of the ordinary, and gave it, by statute, to the widow and next of kin. They hold under the same grant, and one cannot take unless the other does also. In the words of Chief Justice Shaw, uttered in a case identical in all material points with the one under consideration, "the same provision in the statute of distribution which gives property not disposed of by will, where there is a will, to the next of kin, gives a distributive share to the widow." Nickerson v. Bowly, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 430.

It is also insisted that the widow should not be permitted to take any part of this fund, because it is apparent, upon the face of the will, that the testator intended she should not. This intention, it is said, must be inferred from the fact that he gave her the use of the whole during her life, and he could not, therefore, have intended that she should take a part absolutely. In other words, having given her a part by express words, it must necessarily be inferred that he did not intend she should have any more. This argument, it will be observed, proceeds upon the assumption that the right of distribution is to be regulated by the intention of the testator. But this, I think, is a mistake. The intention of the testator is to govern only so far as he has declared it by his will. With regard to that part of his property which his will did not pass, it must be declared he had no will, and therefore the court cannot know his intention concerning it. The next of kin cannot take until intestacy is found, and then they take, not in pursuance of the testator's intention, but by force of law, regardless of what his intentions were. Upon this point, Chief Justice Shaw, in the case already cited, says: "If it were thought important to inquire into the intent of the deceased, when he has made a will, but left property undisposed of, either in terms or by implication, as every man is presumed to know the law, it may reasonably be inferred as his intention that the residue should be disposed of according to law."

The rule upon this subject is settled. It has recently been adjudged by this court that where a testator dies intestate as to part of his estate, in consequence of the lapsing of a legacy, his widow is entitled to a distributive share of it, though she had accepted the provision made for her in lieu of dower, by the will. Handy v. Marcy, 28 N. J. Eq. 59. The other pertinent authorities are Davers v. Dewes, 3 P. Wms. 40; Dicks v. Lambert, 4 Ves. 725; Oldham v. Carleton, 2 Cox, 399; Ex parte Kempton, 23 Pick. 163; Dale v. Johnson, 3 Allen, 364.

The decree will direct the complainants to pay one moiety of the fund to the representative of the widow, and the other to the next of kin of the testator.

BOND et al. v. MOORE et al.

(90 N. C. 239.)

Supreme Court of North Carolina. Feb. Term, 1884.

Civil action tried at fall term, 1883, of superior court, Chowan county; Avery, Judge.

John M. Jones, owning the lot of land in the town of Edenton described in the complaint, and the recovery of possession of which is the object of this action, on February 9, 1866, conveyed the same by deed executed by himself of the first part, Thomas W. Hudgins of the second, and Martha A. Jones, his wife, of the third part, to the said Thomas W. Hudgins in fee upon the following declared trusts:

1. That the said trustee shall at any time convey the said lot and improvements to such person as the said party of the third part shall direct in writing attested by one witness.

2. That he will convey said lot and improvements to such person as the said party of the third part shall give or devise the same to, by last will and testament, or by an appointment in the nature of one, which power to make a will or appointment in the nature of one is expressly conferred upon the said party of the third part, notwithstanding her coverture.

3. Upon the death of the party of the first part, he will convey the said lot and improvements to the said party of the third part.

4. Upon the death of the party of the third part without having made a last will and testament or appointment in the nature of one, he will convey the said lot and improvements to the party or parties entitled by the laws of North Carolina.

5. The party of the first part shall occupy or rent out the lot and improvements for his own use during the joint lives of himself and the party of the third part, unless the same shall be sooner sold by her order.

These declarations of the trusts upon which the trustee was to hold are preceded by recitals in the deed, which in substance state that the said Martha A. had theretofore united with her said husband in the sale and conveyance of certain lots owned by her previous to her marriage, the purchase money whereof he had received, under an arrangement by which he agreed to convey the lot herein described "to a trustee for the use of the party of the third part and upon the trusts hereinafter declared."

The said Martha died before her husband, without heirs, having made no disposition of the estate under the forms conferred in the deed, by deed, will or other writing.

John M. Jones, her survivor, died in 1879, leaving a will, wherein the plaintiff Bond is named executor and the other plaintiffs are the devisees.

The trustee died in 1872, intestate, and the defendants, other than the defendant Moore, who is in possession of the lot, are his heirs at law.

The defendant Moore claims the lot by virtue of a judgment against the university, an execution issued thereon, a sale and a sheriff's deed to him.

The relief demanded is a recovery of the possession and damages for detention against Moore, and a judgment against the other defendants requiring a conveyance of the legal title.

The defendants demur to the complaint, and the demurrer being overruled and judgment rendered for the plaintiffs they appeal.

Pruden & Bunch, for plaintiffs. W. A. Moore, for defendants.

SMITH, C. J. (after stating the case). The question to be decided arises from the construction of the deed, and is whether an equitable estate in remainder vests in the plaintiffs, entitling them to demand a conveyance of the legal estate from the heirs at law of the trustee and possession from the defendant Moore.

It is not important to consider the force and effect of the terms used in the declaration of the trust in favor of the wife, and the necessity of words of inheritance to enlarge an estate for life into a fee. This trust is, as are the others, executory, and not an executed trust,—created by a direction to the trustee to convey,—not itself a conveyance; and the same technical rules of construction do not prevail in interpreting both. When the trustee is required to act in execution of the trust, in order to effectuate the expressed purpose of the instrument, that purpose is ascertained by employing the ordinary rules of interpretation; and a direction to convey the lot, in the absence of restriction or qualifying words, when applied to instructions given to the trustee, is a direction to convey the full estate vested in him, and the trust consists in the right to have it performed. In the latter case the intent is ascertained by giving a fair and reasonable meaning to the language in which it is expressed, and in this sense the trust is enforced. This is the distinction taken in Levy v. Griffiths, 65 N. C. 236, and is warranted in Holmes v. Holmes, 86 N. C. 206.

But it is a settled rule in the interpretation of written instruments to look to other provisions for light to guide in arriving at the meaning of any doubtful clause. In applying the rule, we think it plainly appears that a life estate only was intended to be secured to the wife, associated with a power of disposition of the whole estate, by a written instrument in the form prescribed. The recitals in the deed show that it is drawn in pursuance of the agreement between Jones and his wife, and in precise fulfillment of its terms; for it declares the promise to have been to convey the lot to a trustee for her use "upon the trusts hereinafter declared."

Among the trusts enumerated, the third undertakes to provide for the contingency of the death of the wife without having exercised the power conferred, clearly contemplating a remainder and limiting her estate under a preceding clause for the term of her life. Nor is it material whether this final limitation of the trust estate is effectual or inoperative by reason of an insufficient description of the party to take under it. In either case the clause subserves the same purpose in showing the character and extent of the estate secured to the wife.

Her death, then, without her having exercised the dispositive power, her husband still being alive, and his estate also becoming extinct, which endured only during their joint lives, presents the very contingency upon whose happening the trustee is required to convey "to the party or parties entitled by the laws of North Carolina." Who is the party meant? The plaintiffs appropriate this designation to the grantor, the defendants to the heirs of the wife, and there being none, to the university substituted in their place under the law of escheat.

In our opinion, the words do not and were not intended to point out any particular persons to take the inheritance remaining, but to leave it to pass under the law as undisposed of property. They show such estate, depending on a contingency, to have been in the mind of the grantor as capable of subsisting beyond the life of the wife and of his own, and to place it under the control of the law.

This being the proper construction of the clause upon well established principles, the undisposed of remainder was freed from the intervening life estate in the wife, became united with the then expiring life estate of the husband, and he became the equitable owner of the entire inheritance.

"Another form in which a resulting trust may appear," says Mr. Justice Story, "is where there are certain trusts, created either by deed or will, which fail in whole or part, or which are of such an indefinite nature that courts of equity will not carry them into effect, or which are illegal in their nature or character, or which are fully executed and yet leave an unexhausted residuum. In all such cases there will arise a resulting trust to the party creating the trust, or to his heirs or legal representatives, as the case may require." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1106a; Lewin, Trusts, 175; Mosely v. Mosely, 87 N. C. 69; Robinson v. McDiarmid, Id. 455.

But the defendants contend that inasmuch as the husband was permitted to receive the purchase money of the wife's land, under his agreement to convey his lot in trust for her, this money constitutes the consideration of his deed and the trust arises to her. The rule which raises a trust in favor of one whose money was used in payment for land bought, has no application to the facts of the present case. The deed to which she consents in becoming a party contains all the trusts, and, in the very form he agreed to make and secure to her, the full fruits of his contract. He stipulates to make precisely such a conveyance, and with such declaration of trusts as are found in the present deed. This exhausts her equity in the premises. Her money is the consideration of, and given for, the interests and benefits secured to her in its provisions, and for no other portion of the trust estate. The land was her husband's, not her's; and whatever estate remains after all the trusts in her behalf have been executed, must be vested in him. This does not belong to the class of cases in which the purchase money of one party has been used and the title to the land conveyed to another.

"The doctrine," remarks the same author, "is strictly limited to cases in which the purchase has been made in the name of one person and the purchase money has been paid by another." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1201a. The authorities cited in the argument sustain this view of the law. Unless the constructive trust was raised in such case, a successful fraud would be perpetrated by the grantee. King v. Weeks, 70 N. C. 372; Cunningham v. Bell, 83 N. C. 328; Kisler v. Kisler, 27 Am. Dec. 308.

We therefore affirm the judgment overruling the demurrer, and remand the cause to be proceeded with in the court below.

No error.

Affirmed.

GOULD v. LYNDE et al.

Supreme Court of Massachusetts. Jan. Term, 1874.

W. P. Harding, for defendants. T. H.
Sweetser & W. B. Stevens, for plaintiff.

ENDICOTT, J. It is conceded by the plaintiff that there was no express trust upon which the conveyances were made, the alleged agreement between the parties being oral; but it is claimed, that a resulting trust to the plaintiff arises out of the transaction.

The rule that on a voluntary conveyance without consideration a trust results to the grantor was confined to common law conveyances, and does not apply to modern conveyances in common form, with recitals of consideration, to the use of the grantee and his heirs. Such deeds to a stranger, and a fortiori when the purpose of the grant is to convey to a wife, exclude any resulting trust to the grantor.

The distinction between such a conveyance and a conveyance to a third party where another furnishes the money to whom a trust results, he not being estopped by the recitals and covenants of the deed, is too well established by our authorities to require illustration. Walker v. Locke, 5 Cush. 90; Whitten v. Whitten, 3 Cush. 191; Bartlett v. Bartlett, 14 Gray, 277; Titcomb v. Morrill, 10 Allen, 15; Blodgett v. Hildreth, 103 Mass. 484; Cairns v. Colburn, 104 Mass. 274; Peirce v. Colcord, 113 Mass. 372; Perry, Trusts, §§ 161, 162, and cases cited.

The subsequent agreement, or attempt by the wife to convey, does not affect the question, as a trust must result, if at all, the instant the deed passes. Barnard v. Jewett, 97 Mass. 87.

The wife therefore held the estate, subject to no trust for the use and benefit of the plaintiff, and the respondents cannot be called upon to release and assign to him any title they may have therein, as her heirs at law.

The statute is peremptory that no conveyance of real estate by a married woman shall be valid without the assent of her husband in writing, or his joining with her in the conveyance. Gen. St. c. 108, § 3. As the plaintiff's wife made the deed to Wiley without such assent or joinder no title passed.

Demurrer sustained; bill dismissed.

BOTSFORD v. BURR.

Court of Chancery of New York. 1817.

The bill, filed March the 9th, 1815, stated, that the plaintiff, on the first of May, 1813, applied to the defendant for the loan of 900 dollars, to which the defendant agreed, provided he was permitted to purchase in a farm of the plaintiff, bought by him of S. Skidmore, subject to a mortgage given by Skidmore to J. Bogardus, and which was advertised for sale under that mortgage, as security for the payment of the loan. That the defendant accordingly purchased the farm. That the plaintiff had made an agreement to purchase of Peter Elmendorf, lot No. 3, lying opposite to the farm of the plaintiff, for 3,600 dollars; that the defendant consented to assume this contract, and become responsible to Elmendorf for the purchase money. That this lot was accordingly conveyed to the defendant, who executed a mortgage to Elmendorf, to secure the purchase money. That part of the purchase money, being 500 dollars, was to be paid down, to make up which sum, the plaintiff advanced to the defendant 90 dollars; that he also endorsed to the defendant a note of Edmund Bruyn, dated 10th of March, 1809, for 1,150 dollars, as security for the plaintiff's advances and responsibilities; and the amount of which note the defendant afterwards recovered. That the defendant has since sold the property for 7,000 dollars. The bill prayed for an account, and that the defendant might be decreed to pay over to him the balance, after deducting his advances, &c. and that he assign over to the plaintiff the securities taken, &c.

The defendant, in his answer, admitted that the plaintiff applied to him for a loan of about 900 dollars to pay off the mortgage on his farm, then advertised for sale. The defendant refused to lend the money, but offered to purchase the farm, and that if the plaintiff repaid the money and interest, and the costs and charges, in one month thereafter, the defendant would reconvey to him the farm, but on no other condition whatever. That on the 20th of May, 1813, he purchased the property (the Bogardus farm) at auction, being the highest bidder, for 930 dollars, which he paid to the mortgagee, and received his deed. He admitted the verbal agreement between the plaintiff and Elmendorf, but the plaintiff being embarrassed, Elmendorf applied to the defendant to purchase the lot No. 3, and he accordingly made the purchase, for 3,600 dollars, with a view to secure to himself certain advantages for pine timber and a mill dam, &c. essential to the Bogardus farm, and for no other object or benefit, and without any understanding, express or implied, with the plaintiff. The deed was dated 1st of May, 1813, but executed the 28th of June; that to make up 500 dollars to be paid to Elmendorf, the defendant borrowed of the plaintiff 90 dollars, which was not understood to be any part of the purchase money, or to give the plaintiff any interest in the purchase, which was made solely for the defendant's benefit, and without any trust, expressed or implied, whatever. For the residue of the purchase money, he executed a mortgage to Elmendorf, which had been paid off. That the plaintiff was insolvent, and had committed waste on the premises; that in the fall of 1813, the plaintiff being desirous to have some part of the property, the defendant told him, if he would pay 100 dollars monthly, he would convey to him some part of the Bogardus farm, in proportion to the money paid; but that if the plaintiff failed, the defendant would enter on the premises. That on the 30th of December, 1813, the plaintiff formally assigned to the defendant, the note of E. Bruyn, as an indemnity for the waste committed, and for boards of the defendant sold by the plaintiff, and agreed to pay 100 dollars a month, and if he failed to do so, there was to be an end of the business. The defendant recovered the amount of the note; but the plaintiff never paid a single sum according to the agreement. The assignment of the note expressed the consideration to be the amount of the note paid by the defendant to the plaintiff. That on the 31st of January, 1814, he contracted to sell the whole property, on both farms, for 7,000 dollars, but no conveyance had been executed; and he sold it in his own right, and for his own use, without any reference to the plaintiff, or any agreement with him.

The material parts of the evidence are stated in the judgment of the court.

R. Tillotson, for plaintiff. Mr. Sudam, for respondent.

THE CHANCELLOR. The bill proceeds on the assumed fact that the defendant purchased the Bogardus farm, and the Elmendorf lot, as trustee for the plaintiff, and took the deeds in his own name, by agreement between them, for his better security and indemnity, as he was obliged to advance, or become bound for nearly the whole of the consideration money. The defendant is, therefore, called on, as trustee, to account for the proceeds of the subsequent sale of the lands, after being credited for the advances which he has been obliged to make, together with a reasonable allowance for his services as the plaintiff's agent.

But as the defendant purchased, at public auction, what is called the Bogardus farm, and took the deed in his own name, and paid his own money; and as he purchased, at private sale, the Elmendorf lot, and paid part of the purchase money, principally with his own funds, and gave his bond and mortgage for the residue; and as both these purchases were made with the knowledge and assent of the plaintiff, it will be somewhat difficult to raise a trust in favour of the plaintiff, without violating the statute of frauds. The statute (session 10, c. 44, §§ 12, 13) declares, "That all declarations, or creations of trusts, or confidences of any lands, &c., shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party, who is, or shall be, by law, enabled to declare such trust, or else they shall be utterly void." The statute, however, excepts the case where "any conveyance shall be made of any lands, &c., by which a trust, or confidence, shall arise, or result, by implication or construction of law."

It is well settled that such a resulting trust may be established by parol proof. This point was fully considered in Boyd v. McLean, 1 Johns. Ch. 582. The only real doubt or controversy, in this case, is, whether the facts make out a resulting trust under the statute. If A. purchases an estate with his own money, and takes the deed in the name of B., a trust results to A., because he paid the money. The whole foundation of the trust is the payment of the money, and that must be clearly proved. Willis v. Willis, 2 Atk. 71. If, therefore, the party who sets up a resulting trust made no payment, he cannot be permitted to show, by parol proof, that the purchase was made for his benefit, or on his account. This would be to overturn the statute of frauds, and so it was ruled by Lord Keeper Henley, in the case of Bartlett v. Pickersgill, 4 East, 577, note; Hughes v. Moore, 7 Cranch, 176.

The plaintiff does not pretend, in this case, to have paid any part of the consideration, for the purchase by the defendant, at auction, of the Bogardus farm. The defendant purchased that farm for 930 dollars, and paid the money himself, without any advance from the plaintiff. There is then no pretext for setting up a resulting trust here, and all parol proof, for that purpose, is inadmissible. The conveyance by Bogardus, the mortgagee, and the payment of the purchase money by the defendant, completed the contract; and no parol proof of parol declarations, inconsistent with the deed, can be received. To admit it, would be repealing the statute of frauds, and would endanger the security of real property resting on title by deed. Nor would a subsequent advance of money to the purchaser, after the purchase is thus complete and ended, alter the case. It might be evidence of a new loan, or be the ground of some new agreement, but it would not attach, by relation, a trust to the original purchase; for the trust arises out of the circumstance that the moneys of the real, and not of the nominal purchaser, formed, at the time, the consideration of that purchase, and became converted into the land.

The only money that the plaintiff alleges he advanced was 90 dollars, at the time of the purchase of the Elmendorf lot, and this, he says, was part of the 500 dollars paid by the defendant on receiving the conveyance. It is not pretended, that any further payment was made by the plaintiff at the time of the purchase, though it is alleged, that, some time afterwards, he assigned over to the defendant the note of Edmund Bruyn, in furtherance of the same object.

A doubt has been suggested in the books, whether a resulting trust can be sustained, where only a part of the consideration was paid by the party claiming to be cestuy que trust. Lord Hardwicke held that it could not, according to the case of Crop v. Norton, 2 Atk. 74, 9 Mod. 233. He there said, that where the purchase money was paid by one, and the conveyance taken in the name of another, there was a resulting trust for the person who paid the money, but that this was where "the whole purchase money" was paid by one person, and that he never knew it to be so, where the consideration moved from several persons. He, accordingly, held, that as only part of the consideration, in that case, moved from N., there was no resulting trust in him. I doubt whether this case is to be understood to apply; and it cannot be received as correct, where only a single individual claims the benefit of the trust; for the cases recognize the trust where the money of A. formed only a part of the consideration of the land purchased in the name of B. The land, in such case, is to be charged pro tanto. This seems to be the language of the case of Ryal v. Ryal, 1 Atk. 59, Amb. 413, and of Bartlett v. Pickersgill, already referred to. So, also, in Lane v. Dighton, Amb. 409, only part of the consideration of the purchase arose from trust moneys, and yet the decree followed the money into the land. This is the most reasonable application of the rule; and, in the late case of Wray v. Steele, 2 Ves. & B. 388, the vice chancellor held, that there might be a resulting trust by a joint advance, by two or more, upon a purchase in the name of one, and that there was no reason for confining the advance to a single individual, to constitute a resulting trust. He did not believe that Lord Hardwicke, ever used the dictum imputed to him in Crop v. Norton, 2 Atk. 74, 9 Mod. 233.

We will now examine the proof of the payments charged to have been made by the plaintiff.

The defendant, in his answer, admits the loan of the 90 dollars, to make up the first payment of the 500 dollars to Elmendorf. He says, it was simply a loan, and not advanced as a payment by the plaintiff of any part of the consideration.

The plaintiff's witnesses, Hixson and Couch, say, that these 80 dollars, or 90 dollars, were advanced by the plaintiff, on account of the purchase under the mortgage sale; one of them says, he was present at the sale under the mortgage, and that the defendant then told him that the plaintiff had, on that day, advanced him the 80 dollars on account of the purchase. It will be recollected, that this sale, under the mortgage of the Bogardus farm, was on the 12th of May, and the purchase from Elmendorf, on the 28th of June, and that the plaintiff charges, and the defendant admits, that the advance of the 80 dollars, or 90 dollars, was at the latter purchase. None is pretended to have been made at the former purchase, and yet these witnesses fix, with so much precision, the advance at that time. This is a remarkable instance of the inaccuracy and fallacy of parol testimony, and shows the great danger there is of giving much latitude to these implied trusts, founded on naked declarations, in opposition to the solemnity and certainty of written documents.

Another witness (Wm. Doll) says, he heard the defendant acknowledge the receipt of from 80 to 100 dollars from the plaintiff, "on account of their contracts." This is too loose and general to be of much weight. Henry Upham is the only witness who directly supports the allegation in the bill. He says the defendant told him, in the autumn of 1803, that "he had received 80 dollars of the plaintiff, towards purchasing the Elmendorf lot." Here is an inaccuracy in this witness: for both parties admit, that the sum advanced in aid of that purchase, was 90 dollars; but the question still arises, was the money advanced as a loan to the defendant, or as a payment, pro tanto, by the plaintiff to the vendor. The testimony which I have stated as to this point (and it is all there is) is extremely imperfect. There was, no doubt, an advance by the plaintiff of 90 dollars, at the time of the purchase of the Elmendorf lot, but whether it was advanced to accommodate the defendant, or as payment of so much by the plaintiff to the vendor, through the agency of the defendant, is a point not clearly ascertained. All the proof seems to consist of confessions of the defendant; yet those confessions will, most of them, apply as well to the pretence on one side as on the other. He received 90 dollars of the plaintiff towards paying for the Elmendorf lot; but it is still uncertain whether it was considered as an advance by the plaintiff towards the purchase, on his own, or on the defendant's account. It is dangerous to trust to such inaccurate witnesses, as those who testify concerning this payment. The observation of Sir Wm. Grant, 10 Ves. 517, is very applicable to this case, and he was speaking on a similar point. "The witness swears to no fact or circumstance, capable of being investigated or contradicted, but merely to a naked declaration of the purchaser, admitting that the purchase was made with the trust money. That is, in all cases, most unsatisfactory evidence, on account of the facility with which it may be fabricated, and the impossibility of contradicting it. Besides, the slightest mistake or failure of recollection, may totally alter the effect of the declaration."

The situation of the parties, at the time, is sufficient to throw doubt on the suggestion, that the 90 dollars were advanced by the plaintiff, as part payment of a purchase actually made on his account. He was, at the time, absolutely insolvent, and could not pay a debt of 50 dollars, which he owed to another person. He had not been able, a few weeks before that purchase, to redeem a farm, with its mills, for 930 dollars, but suffered the same to be purchased by the defendant, without any payment on his part. The Elmendorf lot was then purchased for 3,600 dollars, and of which sum 500 dollars were to be paid immediately. The plaintiff was utterly unable to engage in this purchase. Is it then probable that, under all these circumstances, 90 dollars would be seriously considered, by either party, as paid by the plaintiff on his own account, or that the purchase was made for his benefit?

But the plaintiff, on the 30th of December, 1813, which was six months after the purchase of the Elmendorf lot, assigned to the defendant a note against Edmund Bruyn; and this is put forward as a payment of part of the purchase money, from which the resulting trust was to arise.

The bill charges, that the note was endorsed to the defendant, "as a security for the advances and responsibilities entered into by the defendant for the plaintiff;" and it says, afterwards, that it was "for the purpose of procuring a reconveyance or assignment of the said farm, so bid off at public auction by the defendant, and of the lot No. 3, purchased of Elmendorf."

It is not easy to reconcile these distinct reasons, stated in the bill, for the assignment of the note; but if we adopt either of them as the true reason, it does not appear that the note was assigned, truly and distinctly, as a part payment, by the plaintiff, of the purchase money belonging to the vendor, upon either of the sales. The note affords no ground for a resulting trust springing out of the purchase of either farm by the defendant, because such a trust arises only from the payment, originally, of the purchase money (or, at least, a part of it) by the party setting up the trust. The assignment of this note was an after thought and transaction: and, according to the latter reason mentioned in the bill, it was made for the purpose of procuring a reconveyance, a matter entirely distinct from the trust we are considering. The answer of the defendant puts the assignment of the note on other ground. It was made "as an indemnity for the waste committed on the property by the plaintiff, and for the boards belonging to the defendant (which had been sold by the plaintiff), and in order to induce the defendant to give to the plaintiff the only opportunity he required of making some payment, so as to induce the defendant voluntarily to convey to him some part of the tract purchased under the mortgage sale."

the allegations of either party. Hixson says, it was assigned "on account of moneys advanced by the defendant for the plaintiff, on the purchase of both the farms." It does not appear how the witness came to the knowledge of this fact; and considering his great inaccuracy on another point, as I have already shown, we cannot place much reliance upon the correctness of this assertion, unaccompanied with any reason or authority for making it. But assuming the fact as stated (and we may do it with the more safety, since Upham, another witness, testifies to the same fact, as coming to him from the repeated acknowledgments of the defendant) the assignment of the note, even for such a purpose, cannot raise a trust out of either of the conveyances to the defendant. The trust must have been coeval with the deeds, or it cannot exist at all. After a party has made a purchase with his own moneys or credit, a subsequent tender, or even reimbursement, may be evidence of some other contract, or the ground for some other relief, but it cannot, by any retrospective effect, produce the trust of which we are speaking. There never was an instance of such a trust so created, and there never ought to be, for it would destroy all the certainty and security of conveyances of real estate. The resulting trust, not within the statute of frauds, and which may be shown without writing, is when the purchase is made with the proper moneys of the cestuy que trust, and the deed not taken in his name. The trust results from the original transaction, at the time it takes place, and at no other time; and it is founded on the actual payment of money, and on no other ground. It cannot be mingled or confounded with any subsequent dealings whatever. They are to be governed by different principles, and the doctrine of a resulting trust would be mischievous and dangerous, if we once departed from the simplicity of this rule. It is a very questionable doctrine, in the view of policy, even under this limitation; and it has been admitted with great caution, as is manifest from the cases which were reviewed in Boyd v. McLean, 1 Johns. Ch. 582.

But there is an objection to the parol proof, in respect to the assignment of the note. It was assigned to the defendant by a very formal instrument under seal, and, as the instrument stated, "in consideration of the said sum of money now due on said note, and to him in hand paid by the defendant." The parties were concluded by this deed from setting up a different consideration, except upon the allegation of fraud, mistake, or surprise. 1 Johns. Ch. p. 429. On no other ground can a deed be contradicted by parol proof. We must take the consideration to be what it is stated to be in the assignment, except so far as the defendant has admitted, in his answer, a different consideration; and that admission in this case, even if we join with it the admission of the plaintiff, is of no use as to the charge of a resulting trust.

We are, then, brought to this conclusion, that the defendant was not, in any respect, a trustee to the plaintiff in the purchase of the Bogardus farm; and that he was not a trustee in the purchase of the Elmendorf lot, unless in a very small degree, or in the ratio that 90 dollars bear to 3,600. If the payment of part of the consideration raises a trust, it, certainly, cannot raise it beyond the proportion of the money paid. It can only be a charge, as one of the cases expresses it, pro tanto; and in this case the trust, even if admitted, is to so inconsiderable an amount, as not to be worth contending for. The difference between the 90 dollars with interest, considered as a loan, and a rateable proportion of the price for which the Elmendorf lot was sold by the defendant, is very immaterial. But if the plaintiff is entitled to pursue that sum into the land, the smallness of the demand will not be an obstacle. The proof of the payment of the 90 dollars by the plaintiff, as a part of the purchase money, is not, however, satisfactory; and if it was, there is evidence that the plaintiff afterwards discharged the trust. It is well settled that parol evidence is admissible to rebut a resulting trust. If the plaintiff, by his bill, sets up an equity founded on parol proof, it may be rebutted, put down, or discharged, by parol proof. Walker v. Walker, 2 Atk. 98; Lake v. Lake, Amb. 126; Roe v. Popham, Doug. 24. There may be a parol waiver even of a written agreement. Price v. Dyer, 17 Ves. 356. Now, in this case, it is in proof that after the sale of the Elmendorf lot by the defendant, the plaintiff disclaimed any right or title to it. He declared to Wm. Tremper, "that the defendant had sold the land to Hendrickson and others, and made something by it. That the whole was the defendant's, and he had nothing to do with it. That he had failed in every one of his contracts with the defendant; and that he had no interest in either of the said tracts of land. That the defendant did with it as he pleased, and that he had no claim on the defendant, unless the defendant chose to give him something."

I am, accordingly, of opinion, that the plaintiff has failed in charging the defendant as a trustee, in the purchase of either of the tracts of land mentioned in the bill. The defendant is, therefore, bound to account for the 90 dollars, with interest, and for the amount of the note assigned to him, with interest. This is what he offered to do by his answer. But he claims likewise the benefit of the consideration, for which he admits the note to have been assigned, and which was for waste committed on the lands between the time of the purchase by the defendant and the assignment of the note, and for boards of the defendant's which the plaintiff sold. It appears, also, by the testimony of two of the witnesses (Hixson and Upham), that after the purchase of the Elmendorf lot by the defendant, and before the sale by him, the plaintiff had made beneficial improvements upon it; and as it appears that the plaintiff was suffered to continue in possession, under some indistinct encouragement held out by the defendant, that he might eventually become interested in the lands, it is equitable, under all the circumstances of this case, that the plaintiff should have a reasonable allowance made him, for such beneficial and permanent improvements as he may have made on the lands, between the time of the purchase and sale of the defendant, as stated in the pleadings.

I shall, accordingly, direct a reference to a master, to take and state an account between the parties upon the following principles, viz. That he compute the amount of the loan of 90 dollars, and of the note assigned, with interest; that he ascertain, by proof, the damages, if any, arising from waste, committed by the plaintiff, or by his direction, on any part of the lands, between the time of the purchases and the sale thereof by the defendant; also the amount of boards belonging to the defendant upon the said lands, and sold, or otherwise converted by the plaintiff; and that he further ascertain the value of the beneficial and lasting improvements, if any, made by the plaintiff on either of the tracts of land, during the period aforesaid; also, what would be a reasonable allowance to the defendant for the use and occupation of the said lands by the plaintiff, during the same period. All further questions are reserved until the coming in of the report.

Decree accordingly.

DYER v. DYER.

2 Cox, Ch. 92.

Court of Chancery. Nov. 27, 1788.

In 1737 certain copyhold premises holden of the manor of Heytesbury, in the county of Wilts, were granted by the lord, according to the custom of that manor, to Simon Dyer (the plaintiff's father), and Mary, his wife, and the defendant William (his other son), to take in succession for their lives, and to the longest liver of them. The purchase money was paid by Simon Dyer, the father. He survived his wife, and lived until 1785, and then died, having made his will, and thereby devised all his interest in these copyhold premises (amongst others) to the plaintiff, his younger son. The present bill stated these circumstances, and insisted that the whole purchase money being paid by the father, although, by the form of the grant, the wife and the defendant had the legal interest in the premises for their lives in succession, yet in a court of equity they were but trustees for the father, and the bill therefore prayed that the plaintiff, as devisee of the father, might be quieted in the possession of the premises during the life of the defendant.

The defendant insisted that the insertion of his name in the grant operated as an advancement to him from his father to the extent of the legal interest thereby given to him. And this was the whole question in the cause. This case was very fully argued by Mr. Solicitor General and Ainge for plaintiff, and by Burton & Morris, for defendant. The following cases were cited, and very particularly commented on: Smith v. Baker, 1 Atk. 385; Taylor v. Taylor, Id. 386; Mumma v. Mumma, 2 Vern. 19; Howe v. Howe, 1 Vern. 415; Anon., 1 Freem. Ch. 123; Benger v. Drew, 1 P. Wms. 781; Dickinson v. Shaw, before the lords commissioners in 1770; Bedwell v. Froome, before Sir T. Sewell, on the 10th May, 1778; Row v. Bowden before Sir L. Kenyon, sitting for the lord chancellor; Crisp v. Pratt, Cro. Car. 549; Scroope v. Scroope, 1 Ch. Cas. 27; Elliot v. Elliot, 2 Ch. Cas. 231; Ebrand v. Dancer, Id. 26; Kingdon v. Bridges, 2 Vern. 67; Back v. Andrew, Id. 120; Rundle v. Rundle, Id. 264; Lamplugh v. Lamplugh, 1 P. Wms. 111; Stileman v. Ashdown, 2 Atk. 480; Pole v. Pole, 1 Ves. Sr. 76.

LORD CHIEF BARON, after directing the cause to stand over for a few days, delivered the judgment of the court.

The question between the parties in this cause is whether the defendant is to be considered as a trustee for his father in respect of his succession to the legal interest of the copyhold premises in question, and whether the plaintiff, as representative of the father, is now entitled to the benefit of that trust. I intimated my opinion of the question on the hearing of the cause, and I then indeed entertained very little doubt upon the rule of a court of equity, as applied to this subject; but as so many cases have been cited, some of which are not in print, we thought it convenient to take an opportunity of looking more fully into them, in order that the ground of our decision may be put in as clear a light as possible, especially in a case in which so great a difference of opinion seems to have prevailed at the bar. And I have met with a case in addition to those cited, which is that of Rumboll v. Rumboll, 2 Eden, 15, on the 20th April, 1761. The clear result of all the cases, without a single exception, is that the trust of a legal estate, whether freehold, copyhold, or leasehold; whether taken in the names of the purchasers and others jointly, or in the name of others without that of the purchaser; whether in one name or several; whether jointly or successive,—results to the man who advances the purchase money. This is a general proposition, supported by all the cases, and there is nothing to contradict it; and it goes on a strict analogy to the rule of the common law that, where a feoffment is made without consideration, the use results to the feoffer. It is the established doctrine of a court of equity that this resulting trust may be rebutted by circumstances in evidence. The cases go one step further, and prove the circumstance of one or more of the nominees, being a child or children of the purchaser, is to operate by rebutting the resulting trust; and it has been determined in so many cases that the nominee, being a child, shall have such operation as a circumstance of evidence, that we should be disturbing landmarks if we suffered either of these propositions to be called in question, namely, that such circumstance shall rebut the resulting trust, and that it shall do so as a circumstance of evidence. I think it would have been a more simple doctrine if the children had been considered as purchasers for a valuable consideration. Natural love and affection raised a use at common law. Surely, then, it will rebut a trust resulting to the father. This way of considering it would have shut out all the circumstances of evidence which have found their way into many of the cases, and would have prevented some very nice distinctions, and not very easy to be understood. Considering it as a circumstance of evidence, there must be, of course, evidence admitted on the other side. Thus it was resolved into a question of intent, which was getting into a very wide sea, without very certain guides. In the most simple case of all, which is that of a father purchasing in the name of his son, it is said that this shews the father intended an advancement, and therefore the resulting trust is rebutted; but then a circumstance is added to this, namely, that the son happened to be provided for. Then the question is, did the father intend to advance a son already provided for? Lord Nottingham could not get over this, and he ruled that in such a case the resulting trust was not rebutted; and in Pole v. Pole, 1 Ves. Sr. 76, Lord Hardwicke thought so too; and yet the rule in a court of equity as recognized in other cases is that the father is the only judge as to the question of a son's provision. That distinction, therefore, of the son being provided for or not, is not very solidly taken or uniformly adhered to. It is then said that a purchase in the name of a son is a prima facie advancement, and, indeed, it seems difficult to put it in any way. In some of the cases some circumstances have appeared which go pretty much against that presumption, as where the father has entered and kept possession, and taken the rents; or where he has surrendered or devised the estate; or where the son has given receipts in the name of the father. The answer given is that the father took the rents as guardian of his son. Now, would the court sustain a bill by the son against the father for these rents? I should think it pretty difficult to succeed in such a bill. As to the surrender and devise, it is answered that these are subsequent acts; whereas the intention of the father in taking the purchase in the son's name must be proved by concomitant acts; yet these are pretty strong acts of ownership, and assert the right, and coincide with the possession and enjoyment. As to the son's giving receipts in the name of the father, it is said that, the son being under age, he could not give receipts in any other manner; but I own this reasoning does not satisfy me. In the more complicated cases, where the life of the son is one of the lives to take in succession, other distinctions are taken. If the custom of the manor be that the first taker might surrender the whole lease, that shall make the other lessees trustees for him; but this custom operates on the legal estate, not on the equitable interest; and therefore this is not a very solid argument. When the lessees are to take successive, it is said that, as the father cannot take the whole in his own name, but must insert other names in the lease, then the children shall be trustees for the father; and to be sure, if the circumstance of a child being the nominee is not decisive the other way, there is a great deal of weight in this observation. There may be many prudential reasons for putting in the life of a child in preference to that of any other person; and if in that case it is to be collected from circumstances whether an advancement was meant, it will be difficult to find such as will support that idea. To be sure, taking the estate in the name of the child, which the father might have taken in his own, affords a strong argument of such an intent; but where the estate must necessarily be taken to him in succession, the inference is very different. These are the difficulties which occur from considering the purchase in the son's name as a circumstance of evidence only. Now, if it were once laid down that the son was to be taken as a purchaser for a valuable consideration, all these matter of presumption would be avoided.

It must be admitted that the case of Dickinson v. Shaw is a case very strong to support the present plaintiff's claim. That came on in chancery, on 22d May, 1770. "A copyhold was granted to three lives to take in succession, the father, son, and daughter. The father paid the fine. There was no custom stated. The question was whether the daughter and her husband were trustees during the life of the son, who survived the father. At the time of the purchase the son was nine and the daughter seven years old. It appeared that the father had leased the premises from three years to three years to the extent of nine years. On this case Lords Commissioners Smythe and Aston were of opinion that, as the father had paid the purchase money, the children were trustees for him." To the note I have of this case it is added that this determination was contrary to the general opinion of the bar, and also to a case of Taylor v. Alston, in this court. In Dickinson v. Shaw there was some little evidence to assist the idea of its being a trust, namely, that of the leases made by the father. If that made an ingredient in the determination, then that case is not quite in point to the present; but I rather think that the meaning of the court was that the burthen of proof laid on the child; and that the cases which went the other way were only those in which the estate was entirely purchased in the name of the children. If so, they certainly were not quite correct in that idea, for there had been cases in which the estates had been taken in the names of the father and son. I have been favoured with a note of Rumboll v. Rumboll, before Lord Keeper Henley on the 20th April, 1761, where a copyhold was taken for three lives in succession, the father and two sons. The father paid the fine, and the custom was that the first taker might dispose of the whole estate (and his lordship then stated that case fully). Now, this case does not amount to more than an opinion of Lord Keeper Henley, but he agreed with me in considering a child as a purchaser for good consideration of an estate bought by the father in his name, though a trust would result as against a stranger. It has been supposed that the case of Taylor v. Alston in this court denied the authority of Dickinson v. Shaw. That cause was heard before Lord Chief Baron Smythe, myself, and Mr. Baron Burland, and was the case of an uncle purchasing in the names of himself and a nephew and niece. It was decided in favour of the nephew and niece, not on any general idea of their taking as relations, but on the result of much parol evidence, which was admitted on both sides, and the equity on the side of the nominees was thought to preponderate. Lord Kenyon was in that cause, and his argument went solely on the weight of the parol evidence. Indeed, as far as the circumstance of the custom of the first taker's right to surrender, it was a strong case in favour of a trust. However, the court determined the other way on the parol evidence. That case, therefore, is not material. Another case has been mentioned, which is not in print, and which was thought to be materially applicable to this (Bedwell v. Froome, before Sir T. Sewell); but that was materially distinguishable from the present. As far as the general doctrine went, it went against the opinion of the lords commissioners. His honour there held that the copyholds were part of the testator's personal estate, for that was not a purchase in the name of the daughter. She was not to have the legal estate. It was only a contract to add the daughter's life in a new lease to be granted to the father himself. There could be no question about her being a trustee, for it was as a freehold in him for his daughter's life. But in the course of the argument his honour stated the common principles as applied to the present case, and ended by saying that, as between father and child, the natural presumption was that a provision was meant. The anonymous case in 1 Freem. Ch. 123, corresponds very much with the doctrine laid down by Sir T. Sewell, and it observes that an advancement to a child is considered as done for valuable consideration, not only against the father, but against creditors. Kingdon v. Bridges, 2 Vern. 67, is a strong case to this point,—that is, the valuable nature of the consideration arising on a provision made for a wife or for a child; for there the question arose as against creditors.

I do not find that there are in print more than three cases which respect copyholds where the grant is to take successive,—Rundle v. Rundle, 2 Vern. 264, which was a case perfectly clear; Benger v. Drew, 1 P. Wms. 781, where the purchase was made partly with the wife's money; and Smith v. Baker, 1 Atk. 385, where the general doctrine as applied to strangers was recognized; but the case turned on the question whether the interest was well devised. Therefore, as far as respects this particular case, Dickinson v. Shaw is the only case quite in point; and then the question is whether that case is to be abided by. With great reverence to the memory of those two judges who decided it, we think that case cannot be followed; that it has not stood the test of time, or the opinion of learned men; and Lord Kenyon has certainly intimated his opinion against it. On examination of its principles, they seem to rest on too narrow a foundation, namely, that the inference of a provision being intended did not arise, because the purchase could not have been taken wholly in the name of the purchaser. This, we think, is not sufficient to turn the presumption against the child. If it is meant to be a trust, the purchaser must shew that intention by a declaration of trust; and we do not think it right to doubt whether an estate in succession is to be considered as an advancement, when a moiety of an estate in possession certainly would be so. If we were to enter into all the reasons that might possibly influence the mind of the purchaser, many might perhaps occur in every case upon which it might be argued that an advancement was not intended. And I own it is not a very prudent conduct of a man just married to tie up his property for one child, and preclude himself from providing for the rest of his family. But this applies equally in case of a purchase in the name of the child only, yet that case is admitted to be an advancement; indeed, if anything, the latter case is rather the strongest, for there it must be confided to one child only. We think, therefore, that these reasons partake of too great a degree of refinement, and should not prevail against a rule of property which is so well established as to become a landmark, and which, whether right or wrong, should be carried throughout.

This bill must therefore be dismissed; but, after stating that the only case in point on the subject is against our present opinion, it certainly will be proper to dismiss it without costs.

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. 21, 1891.

Error to circuit court, McDonough county; CHARLES J. SCHOFIELD, Judge.

Bill by Hannah C. Cook and others, heirs of William L. Stinson, (alias Stevenson,) deceased, against Charles Patrick, Georgetta Patrick, and others, to establish title to certain real and personal property. Complainants bring error.

Smith & Helmer and Prentiss & Baily, for plaintiffs in error. Tunnichiff & Tunnichiff and C. F. Wheat, for defendants in error.

BAKER, J. In 1820, a young man, who was known in the community as William L. Stevenson, was living and keeping hotel at a place called Downingsville, in the state of Kentucky. He subsequently removed to Lexington, in that state, and was there engaged in the boot and shoe business for a number of years. He was married at Lexington, on May 4, 1834, to one Catherine B. Patrick, and four children were born of the marriage. A few years after the birth of these children he failed in business, and became insolvent; and then his wife and two of the children died. In 1856 he removed, taking his two remaining children with him, to Colchester, in the state of Illinois, where several brothers of his deceased wife were living, and were engaged in merchandising. He was at first a clerk in the store of John Patrick, then a clerk in the store of William Patrick, and then took charge of the store of the latter. Subsequently he was engaged in a partnership business with Charles Patrick, one of the defendants herein, who was son of another brother of his deceased wife. His other two daughters, Ellen and Mary, died without issue, in 1856 and 1857, respectively. In the years 1859, 1860, 1861, 1863, 1865, 1866, 1869, and 1874, said William L. Stevenson bargained for and purchased various tracts of land and town lots, and paid for the same with his own money, and at the time of the purchase of each of said several premises the deeds therefor were by his special direction made to Martha P. Patrick, (now Ringen,) Charles Patrick, and Georgetta Patrick, the defendants in error, respectively; some of said conveyances being made to one and some to another of said three persons. These conveyances were delivered to Stevenson, were not recorded until after his death, and were held and retained in his possession until after or shortly before his decease. Upon the delivery of each of said deeds to Stevenson he took possession of the premises in each deed described, and used and controlled the same, and received the rents, issues, and profits thereof, and repaired and built houses thereon, with his own money, or with money received from rents, and paid all taxes thereon out of his own moneys, but taking receipts for such taxes in the names of the several grantees mentioned in each of said respective deeds, severally. Said Stevenson also loaned various sums of his own money to different persons, and other persons became otherwise indebted to him in various amounts, and for such loans and other indebtedness he took promissory notes. Some of these notes were made payable to himself, and others, by his special direction, made payable to Georgetta Patrick; and many of these latter notes were secured by mortgages on real estate, and the mortgages, by his direction, made to said Georgetta. These notes and mortgages were delivered to said Stevenson, and retained in his possession, and he collected all the accrued interest thereon which was paid prior to his death. Said Stevenson died intestate at Colchester on April 6, 1881, being some 80 or 90 years of age, and leaving surviving him no widow or descendants. Charles Patrick was appointed administrator of his estate. The deeds to said Charles Patrick and to Martha C. Patrick (now Ringen) and Georgetta Patrick were placed upon record by them, and they thereupon severally claimed the absolute ownership of the tracts of land and town lots deeded to them respectively, and took possession of the same, and collected and appropriated the rents, and made sales and conveyances to other persons of various parcels thereof.

The present bill in chancery was exhibited in the McDonough circuit court by the plaintiffs in error, Hannah C. Cook and others, against Charles Patrick and his two sisters and the purchasers of real estate from them. It is claimed in the bill that the man commonly called William L. Stevenson, who died intestate at Colchester on the 6th day of April, 1881, was in truth and in fact one William L. Stinson, a son of one Robert Stinson, of Bodenheim, in the state of Maine, and that they (plaintiffs in error) are the heirs at law of the said William L. Stinson, deceased. It is also claimed in the bill that the deeds to the Patricks were not delivered to them in the life-time of the intestate, and that the latter, when he died, was the real owner of all the real estate described in said deeds; and that the notes and mortgages taken by the intestate remained in his possession and control during his life-time, and were his property at the time of his death. The prayer of the bill, succinctly stated, is that the real estate and personal property in question be decreed to be the property of the plaintiffs in error, that all conveyances made by the Patricks of said real estate be set aside; and that the Patricks account for all moneys collected from notes, bonds, accounts, and sales of said property. Answers were filed and issues formed, and upon the hearing of the cause the court found that the promissory notes which were made payable to W. L. Stevenson were not given by said Stevenson in his life-time to Georgetta Patrick so as to invest her with the title to them or the proceeds thereof; and that said Georgetta had, under claim of ownership, and since the death of said Stevenson, collected $547.47 on said notes; and that said $547.47, and the unpaid notes which had been made payable to said Stevenson, belonged and were due to the estate of said Stevenson. It was ordered and decreed that said Georgetta pay said $547.47 collected by her, and deliver the residue of the notes so payable to Stevenson, within 60 days to the administrator, and that the administrator account to the estate for said money and notes. The court further found that plaintiffs in error were not entitled to any other or further relief in the premises than that above mentioned, and as to all other and further matters the bill was dismissed.

Plaintiffs in error are dissatisfied with the limited measure of relief that was decreed to them upon their bill of complaint, and bring the record to this court. We deem it unnecessary to consider in detail the various assignments of error. There are several matters in controversy which may be disposed of quite briefly. We are inclined to think that the evidence sufficiently shows the identity of the man commonly called William L. Stevenson, who died at Colchester, in this state, in 1881, with the William L. Stinson of Bodenhams, in the state of Maine, who left that state early in the present century for the purpose of avoiding the vengeance of the brother of a girl whom he had wronged. We will also assume for the purposes of the decision that the allegations of the bill and the proofs introduced at the hearing make it manifest that plaintiffs in error are heirs at law of said William L. Stinson, deceased. It is claimed that by plaintiffs in error there was no such delivery of the deeds to the grantees named therein as would pass to them the titles to the lands. It would seem that, in order to divest the several grantors in said deeds of their titles, it is essential to the claim made by said plaintiffs in error that the deeds should be regarded as properly delivered. But, waiving this, and waiving any consideration of the testimony tending to show an actual delivery of the conveyance by Stevenson, alias Stinson, to Georgetta Patrick for said grantees, we think that a sufficient delivery of the deeds and acceptance of the same by the several grantees named therein appears from the evidence. Stevenson, in making the purchases and taking the deeds, assumed to be acting as agent of the nominal purchasers mentioned in the respective deeds, although he was in fact acting without their knowledge. At the times of the various purchases the grantors in the several deeds delivered the same to Stevenson, the supposed agent, absolutely and unconditionally, and for the express purpose of divesting themselves of their respective titles and vesting such titles in the grantees named in said several conveyances. Subsequently said grantees accepted and approved the acts of the self-constituted agent, and fully ratified and confirmed the same by accepting the deeds, and having the same recorded, and claiming title under them. If a deed is delivered to one who has no authority from the grantee to receive it, yet the grantee may ratify the act of acceptance, and the delivery will be good, even in cases where the deed is made without the grantee's knowledge. Morrison v. Kelly, 22 Ill. 610; Rawson v. Fox, 65 Ill. 200; Crocker v. Lowenthal, 83 Ill. 579; Bryan v. Wash, 2 Gilman, 557; Byars v. Spencer, 101 Ill. 429. The grantors in the several deeds parted with all dominion over them when they delivered them to Stevenson, alias Stinson, and, as the latter was not a grantor in any of the deeds, it was not essential that he should deliver them or any of them to the grantees, or that there should be a delivery of them to such grantees in his life-time. The absolute delivery of the deeds to Stevenson, and the acceptance of them by him, and the subsequent ratification by the grantees of such acts of acceptance, were amply sufficient to invest such grantees with title. We do not regard the cases cited by plaintiffs in error, where the deeds were not delivered by the grantors, and did not pass from their control and dominion in their life-times, and where it was held that there was no divestiture of the titles of such grantors, as here in point.

We think the material questions in the case whether or not there were resulting trusts in favor of Stevenson, alias Stinson, and, if so, in respect to the nature, character, and extent of such trusts. It is suggested by counsel that if Stinson bought the lands, and paid for them with his own money, then he was the equitable owner of such lands, although the deeds were made to third persons. It is a principle of the law that where one buys property and pays the purchase money with his own funds, and has the title placed in the name of another person, a resulting trust arises in favor of him who has so paid the purchase money, and he is regarded as the equitable owner of the property bought. But to this doctrine of implied trusts there are various exceptions, qualifications, and limitations. Such a trust is a mere creature of equity, founded upon presumptive intention, and designed to carry that intention into effect, not to defeat it. If it is not the intention that the estate shall vest in him who pays the purchase price, then no resulting trust in his favor attaches to the property; and there may be a resulting trust as to a part of the property, or a part of the interest therein, and not as to the residue, according to the intent existing in such particular case. In 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1202, it is said: "There are other exceptions to the doctrine of a resulting or implied trust, even where the principal has paid the purchase money; or, perhaps, more properly speaking, as the resulting or implied trust is, in such cases, a mere matter of presumption, it may be rebutted by other circumstances established in evidence, and even by parol proofs, which satisfactorily contradict it. And resulting and implied trusts in such cases may, in like manner, be rebutted, as well to part of the land as to part of the interest in the land purchased in the name of another. Thus, where A. took a mortgage in the name of B., declaring that he intended the mortgage to be for B.'s benefit, and that the principal, after his own death, should be B.'s, and A. received the interest therefor during his life-time, it was held that the mortgage belonged to B. after the death of A." In Lewin, Trusts, p. 169, § 15, it is said: "As the trust results to the real purchaser by presumption of law, which is merely an arbitrary implication in the absence of reasonable proof to the contrary, the nominal purchaser is at liberty to rebut the presumption by the production of parol evidence showing the intention of conferring the beneficial interest. And as he may repel the presumption in toto, so he may in part; as, by proving the purchasers' intention to permit the legal tenant to enjoy beneficially for life." See, also, 1 Perry, Trusts, § 139; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1040, and note 1; and Bisp. Eq. § 63, p. 94. Benbow v. Townsend, 1 Mylne & K. 506, was in many respects like the case at bar. It was there held that, where land was purchased with the money of A. in the name of B., the resulting trust to A. may be rebutted as to part of the land or part of the interest in the land; and also held that, where A. took a mortgage in the name of B., declaring that the principal sum should be for the benefit of B., and received the interest during his life, it was held that the property, after the death of A., will belong to B. by force of the parol declaration. The master of the rolls there said: "In the case of Lloyd v. Spillet, 2 Atk. 148, and also in the case of Lane v. Dighton, 1 Amb. 409, it is expressly decided that a resulting trust may be rebutted as to part of the land comprised in a deed, and prevail as to the remainder; and if it can be rebutted as to a part of the land, there can be no reason why it may not be rebutted as to a part of the interest in the land. But in this case, the trust being of personal estate, the case is not within the statute of frauds or the doctrine of resulting trusts under that statute, but the property will belong to the brother after the testator's death, by force of the testator's declaration that the two thousand pounds should, after his death, be the property of his brother Job." It appears from the report of the case that the brother, Job, knew nothing of the transaction of the taking of the mortgage, etc. It also appears therefrom that the same point was there made in argument that seems to be made in the case at bar,—that the equitable title raised by the parol evidence must be exactly commensurate with the legal title on the face of the instrument. From the conclusion reached it is manifest that it was considered that it was competent for A., who loaned the money, to reserve a portion of the equitable interest in the mortgage to himself, giving the remainder of it, as well as the legal title, to his brother. See, also, Maddison v. Andrew, 1 Ves. Sr. 58. In Rider v. Kidder, 10 Ves. 360, while the case was the reverse in respect to the interests retained and donated, the principle was the same; and Lord Chancellor Eldon said: "Upon the evidence, the utmost intended was to secure to her [meaning the nominal purchaser] an income; and, if that only was intended, it by no means destroys the existence of trust, for, if the intention was to give to her an estate for life, not dependent upon his will, still the capital would be his." Emmons v. Moore, 85 Ill. 304, is an authority in this state which fully recognizes the principle that, where a person buys land and pays the consideration money, and takes the deed in the name of another, parol evidence is admissible to show that the real purchaser is not intended to be the beneficiary of the resulting trusts, and to indicate who is the donee of the beneficial interest under such trust.

It only remains to apply the rules of equity above recited to the facts of the present case. William L. Stinson abandoned the home of his boyhood, and left behind him his relatives and the friends of his youth. He went to another and a distant state, changed his name, and formed other and different attachments. He married, and a family of children were born to him. Then, one by one, his wife and all four of his children died. It is manifest from the evidence that after the last of his own immediate family he was more intimate with the relatives of his deceased wife than with any one else, and that he was particularly attached to the nephews and the nieces of his deceased wife, who are the defendants herein. Shortly after the death of his last surviving child he commenced buying real estate, paying therefor with his own money, and taking conveyances of the property bought, some in the name of Charles Patrick, the nephew, and some in the name of Martha P. Patrick, now Ringen, one of the nieces. He persisted for more than 10 years in making such purchases and taking such deeds. He also, from time to time, loaned money belonging to himself, and took notes and mortgages therefor, and had the notes made payable to the other of said nieces, Georgetta Patrick, and had the mortgages executed to him as mortgagee. He retained possession of the deeds, notes, and mortgages. He also took and retained possession of the lands and lots purchased, and received the rents of the same, and repaired and built houses thereon, and paid the taxes levied on the same. He was always particular, however, to have the tax receipts made out in the names of the respective grantees to whom the particular lot or tract of land had been deeded. He also collected and used, as he saw fit, the interest moneys falling due on the notes and mortgages. He expressly directed the deeds to be made as they were made. He refused to accept conveyances made to himself as grantee, and insisted that the deeds should name one or another of the Patrick children as grantee. He frequently announced to different vendors, borrowers, and others that he was buying the property, or loaning the money, as the case might be, for the Patrick children, or the Patrick girls. He often spoke of the property as Mattie's, Charley's, or George's. He frequently spoke of having bought property, and of having caused the deeds to be made to said children; and said that when he got through with the property Charley and the girls should have it. He often said that he intended the property should go to the Patrick children; that Charley and the girls should have it; that no one else had any right to it, or should touch it; that he had it fixed,—had it all arranged; and that no one else could do anything with it. From these facts, and from numerous other circumstances that appear in the record, it is evident that when William L. Stinson, alias William L. Stevenson, made his various purchases of real estate, and took deeds in the name of one or another of the defendants in error, he, as well as the several vendors, fully intended to vest in said several defendants in error the legal titles to such real estate; and that when he loaned money and took notes and mortgages in the name of Georgetta Patrick he intended to vest in her the legal title to said money and mortgages; and that he also fully intended to reserve and retain to his own use a life-estate in the equitable interest in said realty, notes, and mortgages, and to give to defendants in error, respectively, and to vest in them, severally, the remainder and residue of the equitable interest, estate, and title in such real estate, notes, and mortgages, respectively. Such was the manifest intention of the intestate. There is no rule of law or of equity that will operate to prevent such intention from being carried into effect. The means that were adopted by the intestate for the purpose of accomplishing the disposition he desired to make of his own property were such as violate no rule of law, and such as the rules of equity recognize and enforce. The decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

HAGAN v. POWERS.

Supreme Court of Iowa. Oct. 29, 1897.

Appeal from district court, Union county; W. H. Tedford, Judge.

Plaintiff states as his cause of action that in December, 1873, he purchased from Joseph Shaw a certain quarter section of land in Adair county, with his own property and funds, and caused the same to be conveyed to his then wife, Mary E. Hagan, by reason of which she thereafter held the title as trustee for plaintiff; that she received said trust, and agreed to safely hold said land for plaintiff's benefit; that at the purchase the land was unimproved; that plaintiff improved it, and has ever since controlled it; that Mrs. Hagan died, intestate, without issue, October 10, 1894, leaving the defendant as her only surviving parent; that defendant claims an undivided one-half of said land by inheritance through said Mary E. Hagan, but that, in truth and in fact, said Mary E. Hagan did not own said land at the time of her death, but held it as trustee, as aforesaid. Plaintiff prays that he may be decreed to be the owner in fee simple in said premises, and that he be quieted in his title as against the claims of the defendant. The defendant answered, admitting that the title was in Mary E. Hagan, but denying that the plaintiff paid for the land with his own money or property, and denying that Mrs. Hagan held the same in trust for the plaintiff, or ever recognized such trust; admits the death of Mrs. Hagan, and that he is her only surviving parent. He avers that Mary E. Hagan had owned and controlled said land since December, 1873, and that her possession and claim of ownership were adverse to the claim of the plaintiff, and that the claim of the plaintiff is barred. He prays for decree awarding him the ownership of an undivided one-half interest in said land. The action was brought in Adair county, where the land is situated, but, by stipulation of parties, was transferred to and heard in the district court of Union county, by which a decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff as prayed, from which the defendant appealed. Affirmed.

D. W. Higbee, for appellant. Maxwell & Winter, for appellee.

GIVEN, J. 1. A consideration of the questions involved renders it necessary that we first determine the facts. There is no dispute that the plaintiff purchased the land in controversy in 1873, it being then unimproved; that he caused the title to be conveyed to his wife, who continued to hold the same until her death October 10, 1894, when she died, intestate, and without issue, leaving the defendant her only surviving parent. During these years the plaintiff and his wife resided upon an adjacent farm in Union county, and the plaintiff improved, controlled, and used the land in question as his own. Plaintiff, being somewhat addicted to the use of strong drink, and not always prudent in the management of his financial affairs, caused the deed for this land to be made to his wife, without her knowledge, intending that she should hold it in trust for him; and thereafter, when informed of the fact, Mrs. Hagan acquiesced in it, and repeatedly and uniformly throughout said years acknowledged that the land was the property of her husband. Appellant states his contention as follows: "The matters necessary to be proven in order to create the resulting trust claimed by appellee (neither fraud nor mistake being claimed) are: (1) Payment by appellee with his own money; (2) intention on the part of appellee at time of conveyance to create a trust; (3) conveyance to deceased; (4) knowledge on the part of deceased of appellee's intention to create a trust, and assent or failure to dissent after that knowledge." The claim of the plaintiff that he paid for said land with his own money is denied, and the defendant contends that after the contract of purchase from Shaw, and prior to the execution of the deed or payment of the purchase price, appellant promised appellee that, in consideration of a promise on the part of the appellee that he would place the title in the name of Mrs. Hagan, appellant would furnish him help in various ways, to the amount of the cost of the land, and that appellant did so furnish such help by contributing horses and other property at various times. Upon this issue of fact, we think, the appellant has failed to support his contention. It is true, he did furnish to the plaintiff and his wife horses and other property at various times, but it was mostly before this land was contracted for, and without reference thereto. It fairly appears that in every instance that money or property was received from appellant it is accounted for as having been a gift without condition, or as being settled for otherwise than on account of the purchase of this land. That appellee paid for the land, and caused the conveyance to be made to deceased, with the intention to thereby create a trust, and that, after knowledge of these facts, deceased assented thereto, we think, is abundantly proven.

2. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that much of the evidence from which these facts are found is incompetent, because it relates to communications between husband and wife, and communications and transactions with the deceased Mrs. Hagan. In Dysart v. Furrow, 90 Iowa, 59, 57 N. W. 644, it is said: "If the transaction or communication was personal, it must be known alike to both, and therefore either may deny. * * * Personal transactions and communications, as contemplated by the statute, are communications between the parties of which both must have had personal knowledge." This rule is approved in the later cases of Cole v. Marsh, 92 Iowa, 379, 60 N. W. 659, and Martin v. Shannon, 92 Iowa, 375, 60 N. W. 645. The purchase, payment, and conveyance of the land were exclusively transactions between the plaintiff and the vendor, Mr. Shaw. It was not until after the transaction was completed by the making of the conveyance that Mrs. Hagan learned that the conveyance was to her, and assented thereto, as shown by a number of witnesses other than appellee. The only evidence appearing in the record that comes within the objection is the statement of the plaintiff, as follows: "I then told her I had deeded to her, to take care of it for me, and she said, 'I can do it.'" This statement is clearly incompetent, and must therefore be disregarded.

3. We now inquire whether, under the facts as we find them, the law raises a resulting, or, as it is sometimes called, a presumptive, trust in favor of appellee. In Cotton v. Wood, 25 Iowa, 44, the familiar rule is thus announced: "Where, upon the purchase of property, the consideration is paid by one, and the legal title conveyed to another, a resulting trust is thereby raised, and the person named in the deed will hold the property as trustee of the party paying the consideration." In Perry on Trusts (section 124) it is said: "The general foundation of this kind of trusts is the natural equity that arises when parties do certain things. Thus, if one pays the purchase money of an estate, and takes the title deed in the name of another, in the absence of all evidence of intention the law presumes a trust from the natural equity that he who pays the money for property ought to enjoy the beneficial interest." The parties to this transaction being husband and wife, another rule requires consideration. In Cotton v. Wood it is further said: "But if the person to whom the conveyance is made be one for whom the party paying the consideration is under obligation, natural or moral, to provide, the transaction will be regarded prima facie as an advancement, and the burden will rest on the one who seeks to establish the trust for the benefit of the payee of the consideration to overcome the presumption in favor of the legal title by sufficient evidence." In the absence of the obligation to provide, it could not be questioned that the law would raise a trust in favor of appellee from the facts established. We think appellee has fully overcome the presumption of advancement, by his own evidence as to his intention, by evidence of repeated admissions of Mrs. Hagan that the land was his, and his continued occupation and improvement of it. This being a trust raised by operation of law, and not by reason of any declaration or creation of the parties, section 1935 of the Code of 1873 does not apply. The facts in this case are in many respects the same as those alleged in Cotton v. Wood, supra, and the rulings in that case support our conclusion in this. We think the decree of the district court is correct. Affirmed.

FERRIS v. VAN VECHTEN.

Court of Appeals of New York. 1878.

Charles A. Fowler, for appellants. J. Newton Fiero, for respondent.

ALLEN, J. This is, I think, a case of the first impression, but it is sought to be brought within the principle of equity by which, at the instance of a cestui que trust, trust funds which have been misappropriated by the trustee may be followed and reclaimed, so long as they can be traced and identified, and any property or choses in action into which they have been converted impressed with the same trusts as those upon which the original funds were held.

The claim of the plaintiff briefly stated is, that moneys realized from real estate sold under a power of sale for the payment of debts, and held by Van Vechten, the surviving executor, in trust for the plaintiff, a creditor, have been wrongfully and in violation of the trust applied to the payment of charges and incumbrances upon the lands of the testator described in the complaint, and which were devised to the executors in trust, to receive the rents, issues and profits thereof, and pay the same to the wife of a son of the testator, to be applied by her to the support of the family of such son, and upon her death to convey the same to the children of said son. The relief demanded by the plaintiff is in substance, although not so stated, that she be subrogated to the rights of the creditors and lienors, whose incumbrances have been pro tanto discharged as against the lands to the amount paid thereon from the trust funds. The funds can hardly be said to have been invested in the lands, or in the mortgages, or other charges paid by the executor. There was no purchase of either, but the incumbrances were partially satisfied. The lands were relieved from certain charges by the diversion to that purpose of funds held in trust for creditors, as alleged, and it is sought to revive the liens by subrogating the plaintiff to the rights of the original creditors. Whether a cestui que trust can be subrogated to the claims of creditors, to the payment of whose debts the trust fund has been misapplied, need not be determined. See Winder v. Diffenderffer, 2 Bland, 198.

Regarding the payments by Van Vechten as investments in the lands, in relief of which they were made, the primary question is whether in that view a case was made upon the evidence for the relief demanded. It must be conceded that trust moneys may be followed into lands to the purchase of which they have been applied, and the cestui que trust may elect whether to hold the unfaithful trustee personally responsible, or claim the lands, the fruits of the misappropriation of the funds, or cause the lands to be sold for his indemnity, and look to the trustee for any deficiency. Lane v. Dighton, 1 Amb. 409, per Lord Ellenborough; Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562; Thornton v. Stokill, 19 Jur. 751; Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. 333, per Story, J.; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258 et seq.; Shepherd v. McEvers, 4 Johns. Ch. 136, 8 Am. Dec. 561; Dodge v. Manning, 1 N. Y. 298.

To follow money into lands, and impress the latter with the trust, the money must be distinctly traced and clearly proved to have been invested in the lands. While money, as such, has no ear-mark by which, when once mingled in mass, it can be traced, it is, nevertheless, capable under some circumstances of being followed to, and identified with, the property into which it has been converted; but the conversion of the trust money specifically, as distinguished from other money of the trustee into the property sought to be subjected to the trust, must be clearly shown. It does not suffice to show the possession of the trust funds by the trustee, and the purchase by him of property—that is, payment for property generally by the trustee does not authorize the presumption that the purchase was made with trust funds. The product of, or substitute for, the original trust fund follows the nature of the fund as long as it can be ascertained to be such; and if a trustee purchase lands with trust money, a court of equity will charge them with a resulting trust for the person beneficially interested. But it must be clear that the lands have been paid for out of the trust money. This is illustrated by Perry v. Philips, 4 Ves. 108. There a trustee for the purchase of land died without personal assets, but having purchased lands, the estates purchased were held not liable to the trust, the circumstances affording no presumption that they were purchased in execution of the trust.

If the purchase of land with the trust moneys could not be presumed when such purchase would be in execution of the trust, a fortiori it should not be presumed when it would be a violation of the trust. The right of following the trust property, in the new form which has been given to it, or in the property substituted for it, ceases only when the means of ascertainment fail, “which of course is the case when the subject-matter is turned into money and mixed and confounded in a general mass of property of the same description.” 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1259, and note 4. When the purchase-money, paid by a trustee for lands purchased, corresponds very nearly with that of the trust fund to be invested, that with other circumstances, as the coincidence of the time of the receipt and disbursement, may suffice to show that the property was actually purchased with trust funds. Lowden v. Lowden, 2 Browne, Ch. 583; Price v. Blake-more, 6 Beav. 507. The money paid by the trustee for lands or other property, or for choses in action sought to be subjected to the original trust, must be identified as trust moneys; and this is clearly recognized in all the cases, and in very many of them this has been the difficult question of fact upon which they have hinged, and the principle to be deduced from them is, that when the trust fund has consisted of money, and been mingled with other moneys of the trustee in one mass, undivided and undistinguishable, and the trustee has made investments generally from moneys in his possession, the cestui que trust cannot claim a specific lien upon the property or funds constituting the investments. Hill, Trustees, m. p. 522. This is consistent with the cases cited and relied upon by the counsel for the plaintiff, and the doctrine is recognized and applied in each case, and as the facts were proved to exist in them respectively. In Moses v. Murgatroyd, 1 Johns. Ch. 119, 7 Am. Dec. 478, the property held in trust was readily and certainly traced. In Kip v. Bank, 10 Johns. 63, the money, the subject-matter of the trust, was kept separate and distinct, and deposited as such. The court say the only check to the operation of the rule now under consideration is when the property is converted into cash, and has been absorbed in the general mass of the estate so that it cannot be followed or distinguished. It is the difficulty of tracing the trust money, which has no ear-mark, that prevents the application of the rule. See, also, Hutchinson v. Reed, Hoff. 316, and cases by Asst. V. Ch., 2 Kent Comm. 623, 624; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 29, Fed. Cas. No. 14,164.

There can be no presumption as against the defendants whose property is sought to be affected by the trust, which attached to the moneys realized by Van Vechten from the sale of lands under the power. So far as appears they are innocent of all wrongdoing, and have not colluded or combined with the executors to violate the trust, and it is not found that they assented to or had any knowledge of any misappropriation of the fund, and if made trustees in virtue of their ownership of the lands they are made so, not by reason of any act of theirs, but as the legal result of the fact that trust moneys have been misapplied by a trustee of the fund to relieve of a burden their lands, held in trust for another purpose by the same trustee. The fact should be clearly, at least satisfactorily proved. This principal fact, upon which the right of the plaintiff to any relief in this action depends, is only alleged argumentatively in the complaint by the statement that it appeared in the account of the executors filed with the surrogate that large sales of real estate of the testator had been made by the executors, on account of which they had realized large sums of money, and that it also appeared that large amounts of money arising therefrom were issued and applied in keeping the homestead farm in repair, and large sums were paid out for interest and taxes on said farm. There was no proof that one dollar of the moneys received for lands, and which constituted the trust fund, was paid or applied to any of the purposes mentioned, nor is the fact of such misappropriation of the trust moneys found, nor was any fact proved or found from which such diversion and misappropriation of specific trust moneys can be legitimately inferred. The only proof given upon this branch of the case consisted of the proceedings before and the decree of the surrogate upon the settlement of the accounts of the executor. If these proceedings were competent evidence for any purpose, or to establish any fact as against the defendants, the present appellants, they were only competent in respect of the matters then in issue, and which were determined by the surrogate. The questions before that tribunal related solely to the accounts of the executors and their liability to the creditors, and those entitled under the will of the testator. The executors were charged with the amount of the inventory of the personal estate of the deceased, together with the amounts received upon the sale of real estate. The moneys realized from the sale of lands were the primary fund for the payment of debts, and creditors had the first claim to be paid from those moneys, and the first liability of the executors in respect of such moneys was to creditors. Such liability was discharged by proof of payment to creditors, whether made from the identical moneys received by the executors, or from other moneys of their own, or subject to their control. The moneys realized from lands sold in excess of the debts of the testator belonged to the present appellants, as devisees of the land subject to the power of sale, and the liability of the executors to them was discharged by like proof of payment to them or for their use, from any moneys of the executors, whether received for lands sold under the power or from other sources.

Upon proof of the plaintiff's debt she was of course entitled to a decree for its payment on the admission by the executors in their filed account of the moneys received by them properly applicable to its payment. Proof of payment to or for the use of the devisees of the lands was no discharge of the liability to the plaintiff, and the fact that payments to or for the devisees were set up in discharge of the plaintiff's claim was wholly unimportant. It was unimportant upon that accounting whether Van Vechten, the surviving executor, had the money in his own pocket, or had disposed of it to some third person. His liability to the plaintiff upon that accounting was the same, and the decree was necessarily the same in either event. In no aspect of the case was the surrogate called upon to trace and identify the money received by the accounting executor on the sale of lands. The charges against the executors consisted of the gross receipts, and the discharges of the gross amount of the several payments and disbursements as allowed by the surrogate, and the decree was for the payment of a gross amount, and was a general judgment against a surviving executor for a general balance due, not for a surrender or paying over of specific moneys or securities, and as between the plaintiff, a creditor, and the appellant's devisees it was adjudged that payment claimed to have been made by the executor to or for the latter did not discharge the obligation to the former, and such payments were merely disallowed as credits claimed by the executor. It was not found upon the trial of the present action by the court, as a fact, that the specific moneys received by the executors for lands sold, and which were trust moneys for the payment of debts, were in any way paid to or applied for the use of the devisees in payment of the incumbrances upon the homestead farm, although the general forms of expression, to a limited extent, seem to imply the fact. The learned judge did not intend to so find and does not seem to have regarded it as important. He merely speaks of the moneys which the executor used as, or in place of, the trust moneys and in discharge of his obligation, as trust moneys; but that does not make them the specific trust funds received. It is found in general terms that moneys to an amount stated were received from the sale of real estate under the power, and that the executors had paid various sums for principal and interest upon mortgages upon and repairs of the farm to the amount in the aggregate stated, but the times and amounts of the various receipts, or of the several payments, are not found, nor is it found that the payments were made from the moneys received, or that the moneys were misapplied to these payments. If reference is had to the accounts and schedules filed by the executors with the surrogate as the basis of the accounting, which is the only evidence of the dates and amounts of the several receipts and disbursements, there is nothing by which the moneys received for lands sold can be traced and identified as the moneys paid for the improvement of the homestead farm, or in discharge of incumbrances upon it. There is neither coincidence in the times or amount of the receipts and disbursements of moneys upon the account, and for the purposes mentioned, to connect the one with the other and lead to a presumption that the money received from the one source was the same money that was paid out. The inference would rather be that the moneys, when received, were mingled with other moneys of the executors and used as occasion required, either for purposes connected with the administration of the estate or the individual purposes of the executor. Whatever presumptions might be indulged in favor of the equities of the plaintiff as a creditor against the defaulting trustee or his representatives, were he or they the holders and claimants of the property sought to be realized, none can be indulged as against the present appellants who are innocent of any participation in the wrongful acts of the executor. If, upon the statement of the accounts by and before the surrogate, the evidence in this case and the findings of fact by the judge, the principle contended for by the plaintiff could be so far extended as to authorize a lien upon the lands in aid and relief of which payments were made by the executor for the benefit of the plaintiff as a cestui que trust, there would be no difficulty in giving every cestui que trust, as creditor having a debt of a fiduciary character, a preference in respect to the general assets and creditors at large of the trustee or debtor, a lien upon property which the trustee or debtor might have purchased during the existence of the trust or other fiduciary relations. This might be convenient and in furtherance of a general equity in favor of one class of creditors, but would be an unauthorized extension of the equitable doctrine invoked by the plaintiff, which demands for its application that the trust fund or money shall be traced and identified as existing in the new form into which it has been converted. In no other way can the equitable title of a cestui que trust to specific property be established.

This question, which is decisive of this appeal, is fairly raised by the exception to the admission, as evidence generally in the case, of the proceedings before the surrogate over the objection of the appellants that they were immaterial and incompetent, and also by the exceptions to the conclusions of law and the judgment of the court upon the trial. It is proper to say that in passing only upon this one question we do not intend to intimate an opinion upon any of the other questions made and ably argued by the learned counsel for the respective parties. The case bristles with interesting and difficult questions, but as the one considered is decisive of this appeal, and the other questions may not re-appear or be obviated by evidence upon another trial, we do not deem it necessary to consider them. Upon another trial it may be shown by competent evidence that the moneys received upon the sale of lands were kept separate from all other moneys, and specifically applied to the payment of the charges and incumbrances upon the homestead farm, and if so the difficulty which the plaintiff now encounters will be obviated. The equities are clearly with the plaintiff, but they cannot override the legal rules of evidence, or be enforced by an unauthorized enlargement and extension of the equitable doctrine which lies at the foundation of the action. There is in truth no competent proof as against the appellants other than Van Vechten, that the payments claimed to have been made by him in relief of the homestead were ever made. The proof consists of the accounts unverified filed with the surrogate by the executors; in which they credit themselves with these payments, and the decree of the surrogate disallowing them, and adjudging an amount stated to be due the estate from the said executors, and in their hands properly applicable to the payment of the plaintiff's claim, which was less than one-half in amount of the sum decreed to be in the hands of the executors. The surrogate merely held and decided that if the payments had been made as claimed, they could not be allowed to the executors upon that accounting. This is the extent of the decree.

It is possible, although we do not intend to intimate an opinion upon the subject for the reason that parties have not been heard, and the question is not before us, that the plaintiff may have relief in the present action without tracing and identifying the trust moneys as now being invested in the homestead farm, and by treating this complaint as a creditor's bill, filed upon the return of an execution against Van Vechten unsatisfied. Upon proof that Van Vechten had made the payments alleged, under circumstances which would give him as a trustee a lien upon the trust estate for the benefit of which they were made, it may be that the court would deem it a proper case to enforce the lien for the benefit of the plaintiff—that is, apply a debt due the judgment debtor to the satisfaction of the judgment. Such a claim in favor of a judgment debtor would not be beyond the reach of a creditor's bill.

As Van Vechten's account as trustee of the homestead farm has not been settled, there would arise none of the questions made upon the last trial as to the effect of the statute of limitations as affecting the claim of the plaintiff, upon the theory upon which the case was tried. But without considering this suggestion farther, the judgment must for reasons stated be reversed, and a new trial had. All concur.

Judgment reversed.

LITTLE et al. v. CHADWICK et al.
(23 N. E. 1005, 151 Mass. 109.)

Suffolk. Feb. 26, 1890.

In equity.

Bill by Samuel Little and Phineas B. Smith, trustees, against Joseph H. Chadwick, the Roxbury Institution for Savings, and others.

George E. Smith, for defendants. Horace G. Allen and Wm. R. Howland, for Roxbury Institution for Savings.

C. ALLEN, J. The executor and trustee under the will of Mrs. Williams, having assigned his property in trust for the benefit of his creditors, the annuitants under that will seek to establish a trust in that property, and to obtain a decree that $10,000 be set apart by the assignees, and appropriated to secure and raise the annuities. It was, however, found at the hearing that none of the property so conveyed was charged with any such trust, and this finding appears to be the only one that the evidence would warrant. There is nothing to show that there was ever any distinct trust fund in the hands of Williams, the executor and trustee, which was represented by any specific property. He was also the residuary legatee, and nearly one-half of the assets of the estate consisted of a debt due from himself. The rest was chiefly notes secured by mortgages. There was no real estate. The moneys received by Williams from the estate were mixed with his own. He paid the debts and other legacies, and rendered an account, called "final," in which he charged himself with "balance of this account retained to pay annuity of $600 per annum to Charles Bugbee, $10,000." It was his duty to set apart this sum, and to keep it separately invested, but he did not do so. The settlement of the account merely showed that he was held responsible for that sum; and, if he had set it apart, as he ought to have done, the trust would have attached to the property thus set apart. But, since this was never done, the trust was never impressed upon any specific property or money held by Williams. There was merely an indebtedness or liability on his part to account for that sum. This indebtedness or liability might itself be the subject of a trust, just as if it has been the indebtedness of another person. The trust, however, in such case, attaches merely to the indebtedness, and to whatever may be realized from it, and not to any particular property held by the debtor. The view most favorable to the annuitants that could be taken is that Williams had the sum of $10,000 in money in his hands, which was retained for the purpose of raising the annuities. The evidence shows that this was not the case. But assume that it was, the trust would then attach to it as long as the money could be identified or traced, but no longer. When trust money becomes so mixed up with the trustee's individual funds that it is impossible to trace and identify it as entering into some specific property, the trust ceases. The court will go as far as it can in thus tracing and following trust money; but when, as a matter of fact, it cannot be traced, the equitable right of the cestui que trust to follow it fails. Under such circumstances, if the trustee has become bankrupt, the court cannot say that the trust money is to be found somewhere in the general estate of the trustee that still remains. He may have lost it with property of his own. And in such case the cestui que trust can only come in and share with the general creditors. The Attorney General v. Brigham, 142 Mass. 248, 7 N. E. Rep. 851; Howard v. Fay, 138 Mass. 104; White v. Chapin, 134 Mass. 230; Bresnihan v. Sheehan, 125 Mass. 11; Harlow v. Dehon, 111 Mass. 195, 198, 199; Andrews v. Bank, 3 Allen, 313; Le Breton v. Peirce, 2 Allen, 8, 13; Johnson v. Ames, 11 Pick. 173, 181, 182; Trecothick v. Austin, 4 Mason, 16, 29; Ferris v. Van Vechten, 73 N. Y. 113; Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M. 417; Holland v. Holland, L. R. 4 Ch. 449; Isaacson v. Harwood, L. R. 3 Ch. 225; Perry, Trusts, §§ 345, 836-842; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1258, 1259; Lewin, Trusts, (8th Ed.) 241, 857, 892. There is nothing to the contrary in Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54, 66-71, and In re Hallett's Estate, 13 Ch. Div. 696, 708-721, which are chiefly relied on by the annuitants. In Wisconsin a majority of the court has declared that it is not necessary to trace the trust fund into any specific property in order to enforce the trust, and that, if it can be traced into the estate of the defaulting agent or trustee, this is sufficient. McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 409, 28 N. W. Rep. 173, 214. But this seems to us to be stated too broadly.

In the present case, there is no such thing as tracing the $10,000 into any particular pieces of property covered by the assignment by Williams for the benefit of his creditors. The most that can be said is that he had this money, and also other moneys of his own, and used all the moneys together, as his own, for several years, in buying, building, and selling, and that he finally failed. There is no means of ascertaining, as a matter of fact, that the trust money, if it ever was trust money, is now represented by any property in the hands of the assignees. Decree affirmed.

SLATER et al. v. ORIENTAL MILLS et al.
(27 A. 443, 18 R. I. 352.)

Supreme Court of Rhode Island. July 12, 1893.

Bill in equity by William A. Slater and another against the Oriental Mills and others to establish a charge in favor of the Forest-dale Manufacturing Company, of which complainants are stockholders, on the assigned estate of the Oriental Mills. Defendant filed a demurrer to the bill. Demurrer sustained.

Joseph C. Ely and James M. Ripley, for complainants. James Tillinghast and William G. Roelker, for respondents.

STINESS, J. The question raised by the demurrer to the bill is whether the Forest-dale Manufacturing Company, of which the complainants are stockholders, has a preferred claim upon the respondent assignee of the Oriental Mills, an insolvent corporation, for funds wrongfully taken from the former company and used to pay liabilities of the latter company, and otherwise, by persons who were officers in control of both companies. The rule is clear that one has an equitable right to follow and reclaim his property, which has been wrongfully appropriated by another, so long as he can find the property, or its substantial equivalent if its form has been changed, upon the ground that such property, in whatever form, is impressed with a trust in favor of the owner. If the trustee has mingled it with his own, he will be deemed to have used his own, rather than another's, and so to leave the remainder under the trust; and this is a sufficient identification for the owner. But in this case we are asked to go further, and to hold that, where one's property has been wrongfully applied and dissipated by another, a charge remains upon the estate of the latter for the amount thus wrongfully taken, upon the ground that his estate is thereby so much larger, and that the trust property is really and clearly there, in a substituted form, although it cannot be directly traced. This view is pressed with much skill and some authority, but we are unable to adopt it. While one who has been wronged may follow and take his own property, or its visible product, it is quite a different thing to say that he may take the property of somebody else. The general property of an insolvent debtor belongs to his creditors, as much as particular trust property belongs to a cestui que trust. Creditors have no right to share in that which is shown not to belong to the debtor, and, conversely, a claimant has no right to take from creditors that which he cannot show to be equitably his own. But right here comes the argument that it is equitably his own because the debtor has taken the claimant's money and mingled it with his estate, whereby it is swelled just so much. But, as applicable to all cases, the argument is not sound. Where the property or its substantial equivalent remains, we concede its force; but, where it is dissipated and gone, the appropriation of some other property in its stead simply takes from creditors that which clearly belongs to them. In the former case, as in Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 372, and In re Hallett's Estate, (Knatchbull v. Hallett), 13 Ch. Div. 696, the illustration may be used of a debtor mingling trust funds with his own in a chest or bag. Though the particular money cannot be identified, the amount is swelled just so much, and the amount added belongs to the cestui que trust. But in the latter case there is no swelling of the estate, for the money is spent and gone; or, as respondent's counsel pertinently suggests, "Knight Bruce's chest—Jessel's bag—is empty." Shall we therefore order a like amount to be taken out of some other chest or bag, or out of the debtor's general estate? Suppose the general estate consists only of mills and machinery acquired long before the complainants' money was appropriated. Upon what principle could that property be taken to reimburse them? But the complainants say: "Our money has been misappropriated by the debtor without our consent and without our fault. Why should we not be reimbursed out of his estate?" Undoubtedly, it is right that every one should have his own; but, when a claimant's property cannot be found, this same principle prevents the taking of property which equitably belongs to creditors of the trustee to make it up. The creditors have done no wrongful act, and should not be called upon, in any way, to atone for the misconduct of their debtor. It is an ordinary case of misfortune on the part of claimants, whose confidence in a trustee or agent has been abused.

In examining the question upon authority we think it is equally clear that there can be no equitable relief except in cases where the fund claimed is in some way apparent in the debtor's estate. Of the cases cited by the complainants, only four go to the extent of holding that a cestui que trust is entitled to a lien for reimbursement on the general estate of the trustee where the trust fund does not, in some form, so appear. These are Plow Co. v. Lamp, 80 Iowa, 722, 45 N. W. Rep. 1049; McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 28 N. W. Rep. 173, 214; Francis v. Evans, 69 Wis. 115, 33 N. W. Rep. 93; Bowers v. Evans, 71 Wis. 133, 36 N. W. Rep. 629. In the first of these cases the court lost sight of the distinction, which we desire to make clear, between funds remaining in the estate, which go to swell the assets, and funds which, having been dissipated or used in the payment of debts, do not remain in the estate, and so do not swell the estate. Upon the former fact, as we have stated above, we concede the right to relief. But the court in the Iowa case seems to ignore this very important distinction, and in so doing overthrows the foundation on which its decision is based, for it says: "The creditors, if permitted to enforce their claims as against the trust, would secure the payment of their claims out of trust moneys." Now, how can this be so if the trust moneys, or their substantial equivalent, are not there? The court assumes that the payment of debts is the same thing as an increase of assets, or perhaps that it works the same result to a creditor by increasing his dividends. But this is not so. How the satisfaction of a debt by incurring another of equal amount either decreases one's liabilities or increases his assets can only be comprehended by the philosophic mind of a Micawber. If a debtor is solvent, it is all right either way, because he will have enough to pay everything he owes; but, if he is insolvent, the injustice of the doctrine of the Iowa court is made almost painfully plain by the following illustration from the dissenting opinion of Taylor and Cassoday, JJ., in Francis v. Evans, supra: "Suppose that an insolvent debtor, D., has only $1,000 of property, but is indebted to the amount of $2,000, one-half of which is due to A., and the other half to B. In this condition of things D.'s property can only pay fifty per cent. of his debts. By such distribution A. and B. would each be equitably entitled to $500. Now, suppose D., while in that condition, collects $1,000 for F., but instead of remitting the money, as he should, he uses it in paying his debt in full to A. By so doing, D. has not increased his assets a penny, nor diminished his aggregate indebtedness a penny. The only difference is that he now owes $1,000 each to B. and F., whereas he previously owed $1,000 each to A. and B. Now if F. is to have preference over B., then his claim will absorb the entire amount of D.'s property, leaving nothing whatever for B. In other words, the $500 to which B. was equitably entitled from his insolvent debtor, upon a fair distribution of the estate, has, without any fault of his, been paid to another, merely in consequence of the wrongful act of the debtor." It is impossible to state the case more clearly. The illustration demonstrates that the mere fact that a trustee has used the money does not show that it has gone into his estate. If used to pay debts, he has simply turned it over to a creditor, thereby giving him a preference, while his own estate and indebtedness remains exactly as before. Suppose he had stolen the money, and turned it over to somebody from whom it could not be reclaimed. Can any one say the owner should have an equitable lien upon the thief's insolvent estate in preference to his creditors? They and the owner are equally innocent, and each must bear his own misfortune. There seems to be some confusion, also, upon the ground that, because there might be an equitable lien upon the trustee's property in his own hands, the same lien must follow it into the hands of the assignee, because he has no greater rights than the assignor. The assignee is primarily a trustee for creditors; yet it is indeed true that he has no greater right than the assignor to specific property. But suppose, after a creditor had attached property in possession of a debtor, a complainant should seek an equitable lien upon it for the reason that the debtor had misappropriated property which belonged to the complainant, and of which the attached property was in no way a part. We see no ground upon which he could succeed. When the creditor seeks to establish his lien for his debt he stands equal in equitable right with a claimant who can show no peculiar equitable claim to the property in question. The fact that the cestui que trust has not entered into the relation of debtor and creditor with the trustee does not affect the question. So long as he seeks to recover what he can show to be his own, he is in the position of an owner; but when he cannot do this, and seeks to recover payment out of the trustee's general estate, he is in the position of a creditor. Substantially the same criticisms are applicable to the Wisconsin cases, with the additional remarks that they are decisions of a court nearly evenly divided, and that, in our opinion, the better reason and weight of authority are with the dissentient judges.

In support of the views we have expressed, it is sufficient to select the following cases: Little v. Chadwick, 151 Mass. 109, 23 N. E. Rep. 1005; National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54; Cavin v. Gleason, 105 N. Y. 256, 11 N. E. Rep. 504; Englar v. Offutt, 70 Md. 78, 16 Atl. Rep. 497; Thompson's Appeal, 22 Pa. St. 16; Bank v. Armstrong, 39 Fed. Rep. 684. The question whether any of the property of the Forestdale Company has gone into the hands of the assignee in original or substituted form, whereby the assets are so much larger, is a question of fact. As to the sum of $149.39 on deposit in the Columbian National Bank of Boston, no question being made that it was a part of the funds of the Forestdale Company, it may, according to National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54, be claimed by the owner; but that question cannot be determined in this suit, as the money is not in the hands of the assignee, and the bank is not a party to the suit. As to the $3,103.33 invested in cotton, and made into manufactured goods, following the doctrine of the cases cited, the court will attribute ownership in such goods, if any such came to the assignee, to be in the cestui que trust to the amount or value disclosed. This being a question of fact, it must stand for hearing, and the demurrer to the bill, upon the points argued, must be overruled.

NONOTUCK SILK CO. v. FLANDERS.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. March 16, 1894.

Appeal from circuit court, Bayfield county; J. K. Parish, Judge.

The Nonotuck Silk Company filed a claim against the estate of A. C. Probert, an insolvent, and procured an order to show cause why said claim should not be declared preferred. On the hearing the claim was so declared, and the assignee appeals. Reversed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by CASSODAY, J.:

It appears from the record that for several years prior to June, 1893, the defendant's assignor, A. C. Probert, conducted a banking business at Washburn under the name of the Bank of Washburn; that May 24, 1893, the plaintiff, a corporation at Chicago, sent a draft for $99.67, on one Lemke, to the Bank of Washburn for collection; that June 2, 1893, the draft was presented to Lemke, and paid by his check on the Bank of Washburn on the same day; that June 3, 1893, the Bank of Washburn issued its draft on the Union National Bank, its Chicago correspondent, for the proper amount, and forwarded the same to the plaintiff; that the plaintiff did not receive the draft until June 9, 1893, and deposited the same immediately in the First National Bank of Chicago; that that bank presented the draft to the Union National Bank June 10, 1893, but payment thereof was refused; that the Union National Bank then had no money to the credit of the Bank of Washburn, but did have collaterals, left there expressly to protect overdrafts, more than enough to protect the draft in question, as well as all other drafts issued upon that bank by the Bank of Washburn; that June 7, 1893, the Bank of Washburn closed its doors. Probert having failed; that June 26, 1893, Probert perfected an assignment for the benefit of his creditors, and on that day the defendant, his assignee, took possession of all his property, including the Bank of Washburn and its effects; that Probert's assets at the time of such assignment amounted to $261,716.31, and his liabilities to $236,492.31; that such assets consisted of commercial paper, secured and unsecured, stocks, real estate, etc.; that no money whatever came into the hands of said assignee, except a few pennies and a $2.50 gold piece; that all money in the Bank of Washburn on and after June 1, 1893, was used in paying checks drawn against deposits, and in paying clerk hire or employes of the Bank of Washburn; that none of the moneys of Probert, and none of the proceeds of the collection made for the plaintiff, was used in acquiring other property or invested in other property of any kind, but that all money in the possession of Probert at and after receiving said check of Lemke for the plaintiff was used in paying the debts of Probert, so that no money, or the proceeds of the money, in the Bank of Washburn, or the plaintiff's collection, or the proceeds of said collection, ever came into the hands of said assignee in the shape of property of any kind whatsoever; that September 18, 1893, the plaintiff filed its claim against said estate; that October 17, 1893, the plaintiff procured an order to show cause why its said claim should not be declared preferred; that on the final hearing of that application, December 6, 1893, it was ordered by the court that said claim be, and the same was thereby, declared a preferred claim, and the money and effects upon which the same was founded were thereby declared to be trust funds, and the said assignee was thereby ordered to pay said claim of $99.42, in full, out of any moneys in his hands belonging to said estate, in preference of all claims against said estate not preferred, together with costs and disbursement of such hearing, taxed at $25. From that order the defendant brings this appeal.

Lamoreux, Gleason, Shea & Wright, for appellant. Warden & Alvord, for respondent.

CASSODAY, J. (after stating the facts). The amount involved is small, but the case is important by reason of others dependent upon it, and the nature of the question involved. It appears that A. C. Probert was the sole owner of the Bank of Washburn; that June 7, 1893, he failed, and his bank closed its doors; that June 26, 1893, he made a voluntary assignment of all his property to the defendant for the benefit of his creditors. There is some force in the suggestion that the receiving of Lemke's check in payment of the plaintiff's draft on him, held by Probert's bank for collection, and the sending to the plaintiff of a draft made by Probert's bank on the Chicago bank for the amount of such collection, four days prior to such failure, was nothing more than the substitution on the books of Probert's bank of a credit to the plaintiff, or to the Chicago bank, for the amount, in lieu of the former credit for the same amount to Lemke. But it appears that, at the time of giving the check, Lemke had funds in Probert's bank to the amount of the check, and hence the transaction would seem to be substantially the same as though Lemke had actually drawn the money on the check, and then immediately handed the same back in payment of the draft on him in favor of the plaintiff, and then held by Probert's bank for collection; and that Probert's bank then retained the money so paid in by Lemke, and in lieu thereof sent to the plaintiff its draft on the Chicago bank, as mentioned in the foregoing statement. As therein indicated, the money so represented by the check was, with other moneys, used up in paying the debts of Probert, so that no part of that money or the proceeds of that collection, either in the shape of money or of property of any kind, ever came into the hands of the defendant, as such assignee. Such being the facts, it is manifest that the plaintiff is not here reclaiming his own property intrusted to Probert's bank, nor the avails or the proceeds thereof, but is here claiming a preference over other creditors out of other assets and property of Probert received by the defendant by virtue of such assignment. Certainly, there is no statute in this state giving any such preference, nor any authorizing an insolvent debtor, by way of a voluntary assignment, to give such preference. Laws 1883, c. 349; Laws 1885, c. 48; sections 1693a, 1693c, Sanb. & B. Ann. St. It follows that, if the plaintiff is entitled to such preference at all, it must be by virtue of some established principle of equity or the common law.

The early English cases only went to the extent of holding, in effect, that the owner of property intrusted to an agent, factor, bailee, or other trustee could follow and retake his property from the possession of such trustee, or others in privity with him, and not a bona fide purchaser for value, whether such property remained in its original form, or in some different or substituted form, so long as it could be ascertained to be the same property, or the product or proceeds thereof, but that such right ceased when the means of ascertainment failed, as when the subject of the trust was money, or had been converted into money, and then mixed and confounded in a general mass of money of the same description, so as to be no longer divisible or distinguishable. This is apparent from the opinion of Lord Ellenborough, C. J., written nearly 80 years ago, reviewing the adjudications prior to that date. Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 575. But the more recent rule in England as to following trust moneys is broader, and goes to the extent of holding, in effect, that "if money held by a person in a fiduciary character, though not as trustee, has been paid by him to his account at his banker's, the person for whom he held the money can follow it, and has a charge on the balance in the banker's hands;" that "if a person who holds money as a trustee, or in a fiduciary character, pays it to his account at his banker's, and mixes it with his own money, and afterwards draws out sums by checks in the ordinary manner, * * * the drawer must be taken to have drawn out his own money, in preference to the trust money." In re Hallett's Estate (Knatchbull v. Hallett), 13 Ch. Div. 696, overruling some former English cases. In that case there was no dispute but what the money received by the trustee for the property wrongfully converted was deposited with his bankers to the credit of his account, and that the same "remained at his banker's, mixed with his own money, at the time of his death." But in the leading opinion, by Jessel, M. R., in that case, and by way of quoting Mr. Justice Fry approvingly, it is said: "The guiding principle is that a trustee cannot assert a title of his own to trust property. If he destroys a trust fund by dissipating it altogether, there remains nothing to be the subject of the trust. But, so long as the trust property can be traced and followed into other property into which it has been converted, that remains subject to the trust." Id. p. 719. That case is as favorable to the claim of the plaintiff as any in the English courts; and yet it nowhere sanctions the proposition that the owner of the property or money intrusted is entitled to a preference over other creditors of an insolvent estate out of property or assets to which no part of the trust fund, or the proceeds thereof, is traceable. All such cases turn upon the question of fact whether the trust property or fund, or the proceeds thereof, are traceable into any specific property or fund. Ex parte Harcastle (In Re Mawson), 44 Law T. 524. Thus, in Re Cavin v. Gleason, 105 N. Y. 256, 11 N. E. 504, it was held that, "to entitle the trust creditor to such a preference, it must, at least, be made to appear that the fund or property of the insolvent, remaining for distribution, includes proceeds of the trust estate." To the same effect, Atkinson v. Printing Co., 114 N. Y. 168, 21 N. E. 178; Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 376, 34 N. E. 205. In Little v. Chadwick, 151 Mass. 110, 23 N. E. 1005, the court said: "When trust money becomes so mixed up with the trustee's individual funds that it is impossible to trace and identify it as entering into some specific property, the trust ceases. The court will go as far as it can in thus tracing and following trust money; but when, as a matter of fact, it cannot be traced, the equitable right of the cestui que trust to follow it fails." To the same effect are Goodell v. Buck, 67 Me. 514; Steamboat Co. v. Locke, 73 Me. 370; Englar v. Offutt, 70 Md. 78, 16 Atl. 497; Thompson's Appeal, 22 Pa. St. 16; Columbian Bank's Estate, 147 Pa. St. 440, 23 Atl. 625, 626, 628; Appeal of Hopkins (Pa.) 9 Atl. 867; Bank v. Goetz, 138 Ill. 127, 27 N. E. 907; Neely v. Rood, 54 Mich. 134, 19 N. W. 920; Sherwood v. Bank, 94 Mich. 78, 53 N. W. 923; Elevator Co. v. Clark (N. D.) 53 N. W. 175; National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54, 68; Peters v. Bain, 133 U. S. 670, 693, 10 Sup. Ct. 354; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1258, 1259; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1058; 1 Lewin, Trusts (1st Am. Ed.) 241.

In speaking of following trust moneys into other property, it is stated in one of the New York cases cited that "the right has its basis in the right of property." It never was based upon the theory of preference by reason of an unlawful conversion. This is made clear by a recent and well-considered opinion by the supreme court of Rhode Island. Slater v. Oriental Mills (R. I.) 27 Atl. 443. It follows that the mere fact that Probert's bank used the plaintiff's money towards paying its indebtedness, before making the assignment, did not authorize a preference to the plaintiff, over Probert's other creditors, out of his other property and assets. This is made plain by an illustration having judicial sanction in the case last cited: "Suppose that an insolvent debtor, D., has only $1,000 of property, but is indebted to the amount of $2,000, one-half of which is due to A., and the other half to B. In this condition of things, D.'s property can only pay fifty per cent. of his debts. By such distribution, A. and B. would each be equitably entitled to $500. Now, suppose D., while in that condition, collects $1,000 for F., but instead of remitting the money, as he should, he uses it in paying his debt in full to A. By so doing, D. has not increased his assets a penny, nor diminished his aggregate indebtedness a penny. The only difference is that he now owes $1,000 each to B. and F., whereas he previously owed $1,000 each to A. and B. Now, if F. is to have preference over B., then his claim will absorb the entire amount of D.'s property, leaving nothing whatever for B. In other words, the $500 to which B. was equitably entitled from his insolvent debtor, upon a fair distribution of the estate, has, without any fault of his, been paid to another, merely in consequence of the wrongful act of the debtor." Id., and dissenting opinion in 69 Wis. 123. See, also, McClure v. Board (Colo. Sup.) 34 Pac. 763. We must hold that the plaintiff has no legal right to a preference over Probert's other creditors in the distribution of his estate in the hands of the defendant, as assignee, and into which no part of the plaintiff's money has been traced.

This is not a mere question of practice, nor the construction of a local statute long acquiesced in, but is a question of general equity jurisprudence; and it is very important to the people of the state that this court should, at least on such questions, adhere to the principles of the common law so well established as to become elementary. It is especially essential that the state and federal courts, on such questions, should be in harmony. In so far as McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 28 N. W. 173, 214; Francis v. Evans, 69 Wis. 115, 33 N. W. 93; and Bowers v. Evans, 71 Wis. 133, 36 N. W. 629,—are in conflict with the rules above indicated, they must be regarded as overruled. The order of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

ORTON, C. J. (dissenting). This case is ruled by McLeod v. Evans, 66 Wis. 401, 28 N. W. 173, 214; Francis v. Evans, 69 Wis. 115, 33 N. W. 93; and Bowers v. Evans, 71 Wis. 133, 36 N. W. 629. It was a case of a special deposit or trust or agency. It was the employment of the bank to collect a draft. It ought not to make any difference that the bank embezzled the proceeds. The plaintiff was clearly entitled to be a preferred creditor. If this was the first case of the kind, I might not dissent. I respectfully dissent on the ground that the decision in this case overrules three well-considered and reconsidered decisions of this court. In the long history of this court, there have been very few overruled cases. The interests of the public are best subserved by the stability of decisions. If former cases are to be overruled by every change of the personality of the bench, we may soon have no line of decisions on important questions, to which the business of the country has been long adapted and adjusted, and everything will become unsettled.

AMERICAN SUGAR-REFINING CO. v.
FANCHER.

Court of Appeals of New York. April 9, 1895.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, First department.

Action by the American Sugar-Refining Company against Charles H. Fancher, assignee. From a judgment of the general term (30 N. Y. Supp. 482), reversing a judgment for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

ANDREWS, C. J. This case presents a question of considerable practical importance. It relates to the equitable jurisdiction of the court, under special circumstances, to follow proceeds of personal property in the hands of a fraudulent vendee or his general assignee for the benefit of creditors at the suit of a defrauded vendor, who by false pretenses was induced to part with the property upon credit, the proceeds sought to be reached being the sums due from subvendees of the fraudulent purchaser arising on resales by him made before the discovery by the plaintiff of the fraud. The facts upon which the question arises are substantially conceded and are free from complication. Between the 20th day of September, 1892, and the 20th day of October following, the plaintiff sold and delivered to the mercantile firm of C. Burkhalter & Co., doing business in the city of New York, sugars of various qualities on credit for the price in the aggregate of $19,121.41, no part of which has been paid, the last sale having been made October 19, 1892. On the next day the firm, being insolvent and owing debts greatly in excess of its assets, made a general assignment to the defendant for the benefit of its creditors. Among the assigned assets were a portion of the sugars sold by the plaintiff to the firm, which he replevied from the assignee; but the firm, prior to the assignment, had sold to numerous persons, customers of the firm, in the ordinary course of trade, portions of the sugars on credit, and claims held by the firm against the subvendees arising out of such sales, exceeding in the aggregate the sum of $10,000, were among the assets which passed by the assignment. These claims were collected by the assignee after the assignment, and (excepting a small sum) after notice had been served by the plaintiff on the assignee that it rescinded the original sale for fraud, which notice was accompanied by a demand for the sugars then in the possession of the assignee, and for an accounting and the delivery to the plaintiff of the outstanding claims against the customers of Burkhalter & Co. in their hands for the sugars sold by the firm as above stated. The assignee declined to accede to the demand made. On the trial the parties by stipulation fixed the amount of the claims for sugars sold which had come to the hands of the assignee, and which had been collected by him. The fraud of Burkhalter & Co. was not controverted. It was shown that the sales were induced by a gross misrepresentation in writing made by one of the members of the firm to the plaintiff as to the solvency of the firm, made on or about September 20, 1892, within 30 days before the assignment, and when the firm was owing several hundred thousand dollars more than the value of its whole assets.

The case presented is singularly free from any uncertainty in respect to the facts upon which the equitable jurisdiction to follow the proceeds of the sugars is claimed. They are definite and ascertained, but it is insisted that the court is impotent to give relief by way of subjecting the choses in action or their proceeds, representing the sugars, to a lien in favor of the defrauded vendor, or to adjudge that they shall be applied in partial recompense and restitution for the property so wrongfully obtained, because, as is claimed, such relief is not in any such case within the scope of the powers of courts of equity as heretofore defined and exercised, and for the further reason that new rights have intervened by reason of the assignment. The fraud of Burkhalter & Co. was, as we have said, admitted. They are hopelessly insolvent, and were so at the time they took the plaintiff's goods. They disposed of a large part of the sugars before the plaintiff became cognizant of the fraud. The plaintiff was only apprised of it after the assignment was made. The remedy at law upon the contract against the fraudulent and insolvent purchaser is, under the circumstances, ineffectual. The pursuit of the property, except the small part of it which was unsold and passed to the assignee, is impracticable. If it could yet be found unconsumed and capable of identification, the multiplicity of suits which would be rendered necessary to reclaim it would make the remedy expensive, burdensome, and inadequate. The identification of the proceeds sought to be reached is complete and unquestioned. It is not claimed that the credits or the money into which they have been converted are not the very proceeds of sugars of which the plaintiff was defrauded.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity to follow the proceeds of property taken from the true owner by felony, or misapplied by an agent or trustee, and converted into property of another description, and to permit the true owner to take the property in its altered state as his own, or to hold it as security for the value of the property wrongfully taken or misapplied, or, in case the original property or its proceeds have been mingled with that of the wrongdoers in the purchase of other property, to have a charge declared in favor of the person injured to the extent necessary for his indemnity, so long as the rights of bona fide purchasers do not intervene, has been frequently exerted, and is a jurisdiction founded upon the plainest principles of reason and justice. The case of Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133, is an illustration of the application of this principle in a case of the larceny of negotiable bonds, sold by the thieves, in which the court subjected securities in which they invested the money, and which they had transferred with notice to third persons as security for services to be rendered, to a charge in favor of the owner of the stolen bonds. The cases upon this head are very numerous, where there has been a misapplication of trust funds by trustees, or persons standing in a fiduciary relation, and the money or property misapplied has been laid out in land or converted into other species of property. The court in such cases lays hold of the substituted property and follows the original fund, through all the changes it has undergone, until the power of identification is lost or the rights of bona fide purchasers stop the pursuit, and holds it in its grasp to indemnify the innocent victim of the fraud. And even in case of money, which is said to have no earmark, its identity will not be deemed lost, though it is mingled with other money of the wrongdoer, if it can be shown that it forms a part of the general mass. Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 372; In re Hallett's Estate, 13 Ch. Div. 696; Holmes v. Gilman, 138 N. Y. 369, 34 N. E. 205. In the cases of stolen property, or of misapplication by a trustee or agent of the funds of the principal or cestui que trust, the title of the real owner of the property has been in most cases lost, without his consent, and the court, by a species of equitable substitution, repairs, as far as practicable, the wrong, and prevents the wrongdoer from profiting by his fraud.

And, indeed, courts of law, borrowing the equitable principle, in cases of misappropriation by agents, vest in the principal at his election the legal title to a chattel or security in the hands of the agent, purchased exclusively by the application of the embezzled or misappropriated fund. Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562. It is at this point that the controversy in the present case commences, and the divergence arises which has led to this litigation. It is claimed, on behalf of the defendant, that courts of equity in commercial cases, where the claim of the plaintiff originates in a fraud in the sale of personal property, do not undertake to follow proceeds in the hands of the wrongdoer, but that the defrauded party, having consented to part with his title, is remitted exclusively to such legal remedies as are given for the redress of the wrong. The jurisdiction of courts of equity in cases of trust or agency, or cases of like character, it is insisted, is founded upon the ancient jurisdiction of these courts over trusts and fiduciary relations, and has not been and ought not to be extended beyond these cases. It is very true that trusts and trust relations are peculiarly cognizable in equity, and have been so cognizable from the earliest period of equitable jurisprudence. But it is to be said that these are but branches of the larger jurisdiction over frauds, which equity abhors, and of which it has cognizance admittedly in many cases not connected with technical trusts or agency. It cannot be denied that the protection of cestuis que trustent against frauds of the trustee is an object of peculiar solicitude in the courts of equity. They, in many cases, are incapable, by reason of age, inexperience, or other incapacity, from looking out for themselves, and the court stands in the attitude of guardian of their interests. But, as has been said, a court of equity does not restrict its remedial processes to the aid of the helpless or the ignorant. It embraces within its view the general claims included within what are called quasi trusts, and intervenes to prevent violations of equitable duty by whomsoever committed or whoever may suffer from the violation. It goes altogether outside of trust relations in many cases to prevent fraud, or to compel a restoration of property obtained by fraud. The exercise of the jurisdiction to set aside fraudulent transfers of real or personal property made in fraud of creditors is familiar. And the jurisdiction is most beneficially invoked in cases of private fraud to rescind transfers of real estate procured by fraudulent representations, and to restore to the defrauded vendor the title of which he has been defrauded. It often happens in cases of transfers of real estate procured by fraud that, before the action is brought or the plaintiff is apprised of the fraud, the fraudulent vendee has disposed of the land in whole or in part, or has created liens thereon in favor of the bona fide purchasers for value. In such cases the court will mold the relief to suit the circumstances, and will, at the election of the plaintiff, rescind the contract and compel a reconveyance of the part of the land still remaining in the hands of the vendor, and compel the wrongdoer to account for the proceeds of the land sold, or award compensation in damages. The court in many cases resorts to the fiction of a trust, and, by construction, adjudges that the proceeds in the hands of the wrongdoer are held by him as trustee of the plaintiff. This was the exact nature of the relief granted in the case of Trevelyan v. White, 1 Beav. 589, as appears by the recital of the decree in the opinion of the master of the rolls, where part of the estate had been sold by the fraudulent vendee. In Cheney v. Gleason, 117 Mass. 557, a bill was filed by the defrauded vendor of real estate to reach a mortgage taken by the vendee on the land on a resale by him, and the court sustained the bill and granted the relief. In Hammond v. Pennock, 61 N. Y. 145, the court rescinded, at the instance of the plaintiff, a contract for the exchange of real and personal property, owned by the plaintiff, for a farm of the defendant in Michigan, which had been consummated on the plaintiff's part by a conveyance and transfer, the contract and conveyance having been obtained by the defendant by fraudulent representations; and the defendant having, after the conveyance to him, contracted to sell part of the land conveyed to him by the plaintiff, the court adapted the relief to the circumstances, and rescinded the conveyance so far as practicable, and adjudged that the defendant account for the proceeds of the personal property included in the sale.

If the jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity in respect to undoing fraudulent conveyances of real estate, and following the proceeds in the hands of the fraudulent grantee, appertains in like manner and degree to sales of personalty, it would seem that the plaintiff in the present case was entitled to relief. The fact that, before the action was brought, Burkhalter & Co. had made a general assignment for the benefit of creditors to the defendant is no obstacle to the relief, if, except for the assignment, the court would have interposed, on the prayer of the plaintiff, its preventive and other remedies, to have enabled the plaintiff to reach the unpaid claims against the sub-vendees. An assignee for creditors is not a purchaser for value, and stands in no other or better position than his assignor as respects a remedy to reach the proceeds of the sales by Burkhalter & Co. Goodwin v. Wertheimer, 99 N. Y. 149, 1 N. E. 404; Barnard v. Campbell, 58 N. Y. 76; Ratcliffe v. Sangton, 18 Md. 383; Bussing v. Rice, 2 Cush. 48. It is claimed that the general creditors of the firm will be prejudiced if the plaintiff is allowed to prevail, and that he will thereby acquire a preference over the other creditors of the insolvent firm. But general creditors have no equity or right to have appropriated to the payment of their debts the property of the plaintiff, or property to which it is equitably entitled as between it and Burkhalter & Co.

They, so far as appears, advanced nothing, and gave no credit on the faith of the firm's possession of the sugars, assuming that that element would have had any bearing on the case. If the sugars had existed in specie in the hands of the assignee, it cannot be doubted that the plaintiff on rescinding the sale would have been entitled to retake them, and the general creditors are in no worse position, if the plaintiff is awarded the proceeds, than they would have been if the sugars had remained unsold. Much was said on the argument upon the difference between a trespasser taking and disposing of the property of another and the case of a sale of personal property to a vendee induced by fraud. It is the law of this state, as in England, that title passes on such a sale to the fraudulent vendee, notwithstanding that the crime of false pretenses is included in the statute definition of a felony, but which was not such at common law. Barnard v. Campbell, supra; Wise v. Grant, 140 N. Y.

593, 35 N. E. 1078; Benj. Sales (6th Ed.) § 433; Fassett v. Smith, 23 N. Y. 252; Benedict v. Williams, 48 Hun. 124. But a purchase procured by fraud is in no sense, as between the vendor and vendee, rightful. It was wrongful, and, while a transfer so induced vests a right of property in the vendee until the sale is rescinded, the means and act by which it was procured was a violation of an elemental principle of justice. But the rule is that a sale of personal property induced by fraud is not void, but is only voidable on the part of the party defrauded. "This does not mean that the contract is void until ratified; it means that the contract is valid until rescinded." When a contract of sale infected by fraud of the vendee is consummated, and the property delivered, the vendor on discovering the fraud may pursue one of several courses. He may affirm the contract, and an omission to disaffirm within a reasonable time after notice of the fraud will be deemed a ratification. He may elect to rescind it, and thereby his title to the property is reinstated as against the purchaser and all persons deriving title from him, not being bona fide purchasers for value, and a purchaser is not such who takes the property for an antecedent debt, or who purchased the property on credit, and has not paid the purchase money or been placed in a position where payment to a transferee of the claim cannot be resisted. Barnard v. Campbell, supra; Dows v. Kidder, 84 N. Y. 121; Matson v. Melchor, 42 Mich. 477, 4 N. W. 200; 1 Benj. Sales, p. 570, note.

Upon rescission the vendor may follow and retake the property wherever he can find it, except in the case mentioned, or he may sue for conversion. When these legal remedies are available and adequate, clearly there is no ground for going to a court of equity. The legal remedies in such case are and ought to be held exclusive. But in a case like the present, where there is no adequate legal remedy, either on the contract of sale or for the recovery of the property in specie, or by an action of tort, is the power of a court of equity so fettered that where it is shown that the property has been converted by the vendee, and the proceeds, in the form of notes or credits, are identified beyond question in his hands, or in possession of his voluntary assignee, it cannot impound such proceeds for the benefit of the defrauded vendor? The only reason urged in denial of this power which to our minds has any force is based on the assumption that it would be contrary to public policy to admit such an equitable principle into commercial transactions. But with the two limitations adverted to, and which ought strictly to be observed, (1) that it must appear that the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law, either in consequence of insolvency, the dispersion of the property, or other cause, and (2) that nothing will be adjudged as proceeds except what can be specifically identified as such, business interests will have adequate protection. Indeed, the disturbance would be much less than is now permitted in following the property from hand to hand until a bona fide purchaser is found.

The case of Small v. Attwood, Younge, 507, is a very instructive case, which involved a large amount, was argued by eminent counsel, and received great consideration. It supports, we think, the equitable jurisdiction invoked in the present case. It was an action by the purchaser to rescind a contract for the sale of mines and mining property induced by fraudulent representations, and to recover the purchase money paid to the amount of about £200,000. The court found the fraud and rescinded the contract, and made a decree for an accounting. On a supplemental bill being filed, showing that the purchase money paid had been invested by the seller in public securities in his name, which he afterwards caused to be put in the name of his mother, and that the purchaser had no other means adequate to repay the purchase money, the chancellor, on an application for an injunction restraining the transfer of the securities, held that the money paid could be followed into the stock purchased, and granted the injunction. The case of Cavin v. Gleason, 105 N. Y. 256, 11 N. E. 504, was an attempt to fasten upon the estate of an insolvent a preferential lien for money put into his hands by the plaintiff for the purchase of a mortgage for her, and which he applied, without authority, to the payment of his debts before the assignment, with the exception of a small sum ($30), which went into the hands of the assignee. The court held that the money, which the insolvent had used to pay debts prior to the assignment, was not a preferred debt, but sustained her right to be paid the small sum which the assignee received belonging to the trust. This case points the distinction. The character of the debt gave it no priority. The fund had been dissipated, and could not be traced among the assigned assets. There was no equitable ground of preference except for the small sum mentioned.

Upon the whole case, we are of the opinion that the judgment on the report of the referee was correct, and the order granting a new trial should therefore be reversed, and the judgment on the report of the referee affirmed, with costs. Judgment accordingly. All concur.

Court of Appeals of New York. April 19, 1887.

J. B. Gleason, for appellant. W. H. Johnson, for respondents.

ANDREWS, J. It may properly be conceded that the $3,000, received by White from the petitioners on the third day of January, 1883, for investment in the Gould mortgage, constituted in his hands a quasi trust fund, which White was bound to use for the specific purpose contemplated, and which he could not divert to any other use without committing a breach of trust. The securities which formed the greater part of the fund were immediately convertible into money, and authority in White to make such conversion was implied, but only as a means of realizing the money with which to make the mortgage loan. The securities, while in the hands of White, remained the property of the petitioners; and, when converted by him, their title attached to the proceeds of the converted property. White collected the securities actually or constructively. He collected the notes against third persons, and drew the money deposited in the Delaware National Bank. The two certificates of deposit issued by himself, amounting in the aggregate to $780, he accepted as money.

It is material to a proper understanding of the question presented, to state a few other facts which appear in the record. White was a private banker. On the fifth of January, 1883, two days after the transaction with the petitioners to which we have alluded, he was taken sick, and on or about the ninth of January a run commenced on the bank, and on the twelfth of January he made a general assignment to the defendant, Gleason, for the benefit of creditors, having at the time on hand in cash assets only the sum of $64.75. The Gould mortgage was never procured by White, and he made no investment for the petitioners of the $3,000 received on the third day of January. On the contrary, it was found by the judge at special term that White, after receiving and collecting the securities, and prior to the eleventh day of January, in violation of his trust, used the entire fund of $3,000 excepting the sum of $30, which came to the hands of the assignee, in paying his personal debts and liabilities. But on the eleventh of January, the day prior to the making of the assignment, for the purpose of securing the claim of the petitioners, he transferred to them a land contract, from which and other sources the petitioners have realized sufficient to reduce their claim to the sum of $877.27. It was admitted on the hearing of the petition, which took place in January, 1885, that the assignee had then on hand proceeds of the assigned estate sufficient to pay the said sum of $877.27, but it was conceded by the petitioners that the assigned estate was insufficient to pay in full the debts of the assignor.

The special term granted the prayer of the petitioner, and made an order directing the assignee to pay the claim of the petitioners out of the money in his hands, and this order was affirmed by the general term. The order in effect appropriates out of the assigned estate the sum of $877.27 to the payment of the claim of the petitioners, in preference to the claims of the general creditors.

The petitioners, to maintain the order in question, rely upon the rule in equity that, as between cestui que trust and trustee, and all parties claiming under the trustee otherwise than by purchase for valuable consideration, without notice, all property belonging to a trust, however much it may be changed or altered in its nature or character, and all the fruit of such property, whether in its original or altered state, continues to be subject to or affected by the trust. Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 387, Turner, L. J. This settled doctrine of equity has its basis in the right of property. The owner of personal property which, by the wrongful act of his agent or trustee, has been changed and converted into chattels of another description, may elect to treat the property into which the conversion has been made as his own. Upon such election the title to the substituted property is vested in him as fully as if he had originally authorized the wrongful act, which title he may assert in a legal action to the same extent as he could have asserted title in respect to the original property. The reason of the doctrine is stated by Lord Ellenborough in the leading case of Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562, in language often quoted: "For," he says, "the product or substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself, so long as it can be ascertained to be such, and the right only ceases when the means of ascertainment fail." The question in that case involved the legal title to certain stock and bullion which an agent of the defendant, intrusted by his principal with money to invest in exchequer bills, had wrongfully misapplied to the purchase of the stock and bullion, intending to abscond with it and go to America, and the court sustained the defendants' title.

Courts go very far to protect rights of property as against a wrong-doer. They follow it through whatever changes and transmutations it may undergo in his hands, and as against him, transferred to the changed and altered product the original title, however much the original property has been increased in value by his labor or expenditure, provided only that the product is still a chattel, and is composed of the original materials. Silbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379. But a court of law, as a general rule, deals only with the legal title; and when the legal identity of the property is destroyed, or the property cannot be traced specifically into another thing, it is powerless to give relief, except by action for damages against the wrong-doer. The language of Lord Ellenborough, already quoted, that the right to follow property only ceases when the means of ascertainment fail, is illustrated by what follows, "which," he adds, "is the case when the subject is turned into money and mixed and compounded in a general mass of the same description."

It is not important to inquire whether later decisions have not established, even in respect to strictly legal actions, a somewhat less stringent limitation upon the right of pursuit than that indicated in the language just quoted. But it is unnecessary to pursue this inquiry here. It is clear that in this case the trust fund has been dissipated and lost by the act of the trustee. It is neither specifically in the hands of the trustee or of his assignee, nor it is represented by other property into which it has been converted. The fund, according to the finding, (with the exception of the sum of $30,) was paid out on the debts of White before the assignment. Plainly, there is no room for any contention that the petitioners have legal title to any of the assigned property. The sole inquiry is whether a case is made for equitable intervention in favor of the petitioners in the administration of the insolvent estate. It is clear, we think, that, upon an accounting in bankruptcy or insolvency, a trust creditor is not entitled to a preference over general creditors of the insolvent, merely on the ground of the nature of his claim; that is, that he is a trust creditor as distinguished from a general creditor. We know of no authority for such a contention. The equitable doctrine that, as between creditors, equality is equity, admits, so far as we know, of no exception founded on the greater supposed sacredness of one debt, or that it arose out of a violation of duty, or that its loss involves greater apparent hardship in one case than another, unless it appears, in addition, that there is some specific recognized equity founded on some agreement, or the relation of the debt to the assigned property, which entitles the claimant, according to equitable principles, to preferential payment. If it appears that trust property specifically belonging to the trust is included in the assets, the court doubtless may order it to be restored to the trust. So, also, if it appears that trust property has been wrongfully converted by the trustee, and constitutes, although in a changed form, a part of the assets, it would seem to be equitable, and in accordance with equitable principles, that the things into which the trust property has been changed, should, if required, be set apart for the trust, or, if separation is impossible, that priority of lien should be adjudged in favor of the trust-estate for the value of the trust property or funds, or proceeds of the trust property, entering into and constituting a part of the assets. This rule simply asserts the right of the true owner to his own property.

But it is the general rule, as well in a court of equity as in a court of law, that, in order to follow trust funds, and subject them to the operation of the trust, they must be identified. A court of equity, in pursuing the inquiry and in administering relief, is less hampered by technical difficulties than a court of law; and it may be sufficient, to entitle a party to equitable preference in the distribution of a fund in insolvency, that it appears that the fund or property of the insolvent remaining for distribution includes the proceeds of the trust-estate, although it may be impossible to point out the precise thing in which the trust fund has been invested, or the precise time when the conversion took place. The authorities require at least this degree of distinctness in the proof before preference can be awarded. See Van Alen v. American Nat. Bank, 52 N. Y. 1; Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133; Ferris v. Van Vechten, 73 N. Y. 113; Pennell v. Deffell, supra; Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M. 417.

The facts in this case fall short of the proof required within any case which has come to our notice. The trust fund, with the single exception mentioned, was misappropriated by White to the payment of his private debts prior to the assignment. It cannot be traced into the property in the hands of the assignee, for the plain reason that it is shown to have gone to the creditors of White in satisfaction of their debts. The courts below seem to have proceeded upon a supposed equity springing from the circumstance that, by the application of the fund to the payment of White's creditors, the assigned estate was relieved pro tanto from debts which otherwise would have been charged upon it, and that thereby the remaining creditors, if entitled to distribution without regard to the petitioner's claim, will be benefited. We think this is quite too vague an equity for judicial cognizance, and we find no case justifying relief upon such a circumstance. In a very general sense, all creditors of an insolvent may be supposed to have contributed to the assets which constitute the residuum of his estate.

The case of People v. City Bank of Rochester, 96 N. Y. 32, seems to have been misunderstood. The question considered in this case was not raised there, and it was not claimed in that case that the proceeds of the checks of Sartwell, Hough & Co., the petitioners, had not gone into the general fund of the bank, or that they had not passed in some form to the receiver. The court did not decide that the petitioners would have been entitled to a preference in case the proceeds of the checks had been used by the bank, and were not represented in its assets in the hands of the receiver.

For the reasons stated, we are of opinion that the orders of the special and general terms should be modified by reducing the sum directed to be paid by the assignee to the sum of $30, with interest from April 19, 1883, but without costs to either party.

All concur.

Ordered accordingly.

Court of Appeals of New York. March 27, 1877.

Action to recover proceeds of stolen bonds. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendants appealed.

M. Goodrich, for appellants. M. M. Waters, for respondent.

ANDREWS, J. This is an equitable action brought to establish the right of the plaintiff to certain securities, the proceeds of stolen bonds, and to compel the defendants to account therefor.

In March, 1869, the plaintiff was the owner of $13,000 of government bonds, and of a railroad bond for $1,000, negotiable by delivery, which, on the 12th of March, 1869, were stolen from her, and soon afterward $11,500 of the bonds were sold by the thief and his confederates, and the proceeds divided between them. William Warner loaned a part of his share in separate loans and took the promissory notes of the borrower therefor. George Warner invested $2,000 of his share in the purchase of a bond and mortgage, which was assigned to his wife Cordelia without consideration.

In January, 1870, William Warner, George Warner, Cordelia Warner and one Lusk were arrested upon the charge of stealing the bonds, or as accessories to the larceny, and were severally indicted in the county of Cortland. The Warners employed the defendants, who are attorneys, to defend them in the criminal proceedings, and in any civil suits which might be instituted against them in respect to the bonds, and to secure them for their services and expenses, and for any liabilities they might incur in their behalf; William Warner transferred to the defendants Miner and Warren promissory notes taken on loans made by him out of the proceeds of the stolen bonds, amounting to $2,250 or thereabouts, and Cordelia Warner, for the same purpose, assigned to the defendant Porter the bond and mortgage above mentioned.

The learned judge at special term found that the defendants had notice at the time they received the transfer of the securities, that they were the avails and proceeds of the stolen bonds, and directed judgment against them for the value of the securities, it appearing on the trial that they had collected or disposed of them and received the proceeds.

The doctrine upon which the judgment in this case proceeded, viz.: that the owner of negotiable securities stolen and afterward sold by the thief may pursue the proceeds of the sale in the hands of the felonious taker or his assignee with notice, through whatever changes the proceeds may have gone, so long as the proceeds or the substitute therefor can be distinguished or identified, and have the proceeds or the property in which they were invested subjected, by the aid of a court of equity, to a lien and trust in his favor for the purposes of recompense and restitution, is founded upon the plainest principles of justice and morality, and is consistent with the rule in analogous cases acted upon in courts of law and equity. It is a general principle of the law of personal property that the title of the owner cannot be divested without his consent. The purchaser from a thief, however honest and bona fide the purchase may have been, cannot hold the stolen chattel against the true proprietor, but the latter may follow and reclaim it wherever or in whosoever hands it may be found. The right of pursuit and reclamation only ceases when its identity is lost and further pursuit is hopeless; but the law still protects the interest of the true owner by giving him an action as for the conversion of the chattel against any one who has interfered with his dominion over it, although such interference may have been innocent in intention and under a claim of right, and in reliance upon the title of the felonious taker. The extent to which the common law goes to protect the title of the true owner has a striking illustration in those cases in which it is held that where a willful trespasser converts a chattel into a different species, as for example, timber into shingles, wood into coal, or corn into whisky, the product in its improved and changed condition belongs to the owner of the original material. Silbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 380, and cases cited. The rule that a thief cannot convey a good title to stolen property has an exception in case of money or negotiable securities transferable by delivery, which have been put into circulation and have come to the hands of bona fide holders. The right of the owner to pursue and reclaim the money and securities there ends, and the holder is protected in his title. The plaintiff was in this position. The bonds, with the exception stated, had, as the evidence tends to show, been sold to bona fide purchasers, and she was precluded from following and reclaiming them.

The right of the plaintiff in equity to have the notes and mortgage while they remained in the possession of the felons or of their assignees with notice, subjected to a lien and trust in her favor, and to compel their transfer to her as the equitable owner, does not, we think, admit of serious doubt. The plaintiff, by the sale of the bonds to bona fide purchasers, lost her title to the securities. She could not further follow them. She could maintain an action as for a conversion of the property against the felons. But this remedy in this case would be fruitless, as they are wholly insolvent. Unless she can elect to regard the securities in which the bonds were invested as a substitute, pro tanto, for the bonds, she has no effectual remedy. The thieves certainly have no claim to the securities in which the proceeds of the bonds were invested as against the plaintiff. They, without her consent, have disposed of her property, and put it beyond her reach. If the avails remained in their hands, in money, the direct proceeds of the sale, can it be doubted that she could reach it? It is not necessary to decide that in the case supposed she would have the legal title to the money, but if that question was involved in the case I should have great hesitation in denying the proposition. That she could assert an equitable claim to the money I have no doubt. And this equitable right to follow the proceeds would continue and attach to any securities or property in which the proceeds were invested, so long as they could be traced and identified, and the rights of bona fide purchasers had not intervened.

In Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562, an agent, intrusted with a draft for money to buy exchequer bills for his principal, received the money and misapplied it by purchasing American stocks and bullion, intending to abscond and go to America, and absconded, but was arrested before he quitted England, and surrendered the securities and bullion to his principal, who sold them and received the proceeds. It was held that the principal was entitled to withhold the proceeds from the assignee in bankruptcy of the agent, who became bankrupt on the day he received and misapplied the money. Lord Ellenborough, in pronouncing the opinion in that case, said: "I makes no difference, in reason or law, into what other form different from the original the change may have been made, whether it be into that of promissory notes for the security of money produced on the sale of the goods of the principal, as in Scott v. Surman, Willes, 400, or into other merchandise, as in Whitecomb v. Jacob, Salk. 160, for the product or substitute for the original thing still follows the nature of the thing itself so long as it can be ascertained to be such, and the right only ceases when the means of ascertainment fails."

If, in the case now under consideration, the plaintiff had intrusted the Warners with the possession of the bonds, and they had sold them in violation of their duty, for the purpose of embezzling the proceeds, and invested them in the notes and mortgage in question, the plaintiff could, within the authority of Taylor v. Plumer, have claimed them while in their hands, or in the hands of their assignees with notice, and would be adjudged to have the legal title.

In courts of equity the doctrine is well settled and is uniformly applied that when a person, standing in a fiduciary relation, misapplies or converts a trust fund into another species of property, the beneficiary will be entitled to the property thus acquired. The jurisdiction exercised for the protection of a party defrauded by the misappropriation of property, in violation of a duty, owing by the party making the misappropriation, is exceedingly broad and comprehensive. The doctrine is illustrated and applied most frequently in cases of trusts, where trust moneys have been, by the fraud or violation of duty of the trustee, diverted from the purposes of the trust and converted into other property. In such case a court of equity will follow the trust fund into the property into which it has been converted, and appropriate it for the indemnity of the beneficiary. It is immaterial in what way the change has been made, whether money has been laid out in land, or land has been turned into money, or how the legal title to the converted property may be placed. Equity only stops the pursuit when the means of ascertainment fail, or the rights of bona fide purchasers for value without notice of the trust, have intervened. The relief will be moulded and adapted to the circumstances of the case, so as to protect the interests and rights of the true owner. Lane v. Dighton, Amb. 409; Mansell v. Mansell, 2 P. Wms. 679; Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves. 511; Lewis v. Madocks, 17 Ves. 56; Perry, Trusts, § 829; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258.

It is insisted by the counsel for the defendants that the doctrine which subjects property acquired by the fraudulent misuse of trust moneys by a trustee to the influence of the trust, and converts it into trust property and the wrong-doer into a trustee at the election of the beneficiary, has no application to a case where money or property acquired by felony has been converted into other property. There is, it is said, in such cases, no trust relation between the owner of the stolen property and the thief, and the law will not imply one for the purpose of subjecting the avails of the stolen property to the claim of the owner. It would seem to be an anomaly in the law if the owner who has been deprived of his property by a larceny should be less favorably situated in a court of equity, in respect to his remedy to recover it, or the property into which it had been converted, than one who by an abuse of trust has been injured by the wrongful act of a trustee to whom the possession of trust property has been confided. The law in such a case will raise a trust in invitum out of the transaction, for the very purpose of subjecting the substituted property to the purposes of indemnity and recompense. "One of the most common cases," remarks Judge Story, "in which a court of equity acts upon the ground of implied trusts in invitum, is when a party receives money which he cannot conscientiously withhold from another party." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1255. And he states it to be a general principle that "whenever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced, it will be held in its new form liable to the rights of the original owner, or the cestui que trust." Id. § 1258. See, also, Hill, Trustees, p. 222.

We are of opinion that the absence of the conventional relation of trustee and cestui que trust between the plaintiff and the Warners is no obstacle to giving the plaintiff the benefit of the notes and mortgage, or the proceeds in part of the stolen bonds. See Bank of America v. Pollock, 4 Edw. Ch. 215.

It is however strenuously insisted that the defendants had no notice when they received the securities that they were the avails or proceeds of the bonds. That if they had notice they would stand in the position of their assignors, and that the property in their hands would be affected by the same equities as if no transfer had been made, is not denied. Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566; Hill, Trustees, p. 259. The learned judge at special term found as has been stated, that the defendants had notice of the larceny of the bonds, and the use made of the money arising from their sale, at the time they received the notes and mortgage. The duty of this court upon the question of notice is limited to the examination of the case, with a view of ascertaining whether there was evidence to support the finding of fact. If such evidence exists, the finding of the trial judge is conclusive.

We have examined with much care the voluminous record before us, and are of opinion that the finding is sustained by the evidence. The testimony was conflicting. The circumstances under which the defendants took the transfer of the securities were certainly unusual, and the facts then known by the defendants were calculated to create a strong presumption that the notes and mortgage came from investments of the stolen property. It was for the trial court to weigh the testimony, and in the light of all the facts developed on the trial, to determine the question of notice. It would be a useless labor to collate the testimony on this subject, and we content ourselves with stating our conclusion, that the finding was warranted by the evidence.

The objection to the evidence, under a commission issued to William Jessup of Montrose, Pennsylvania, and which was executed by William H. Jessup as commissioner was, we think, properly overruled. In support of the objection, one of the defendants testified that he resided at Montrose in 1858, and that at that time two attorneys resided there, named respectively William and William H. Jessup, and an offer was made to prove that the judge who granted the order for the commission consulted a register of attorneys in which both names appeared, and selected the name of William Jessup, and inserted it in the order. The commission was executed two years and a half before the trial. It does not appear at what time it was returned to the clerk, but the presumption is that it was returned within a reasonable time after its execution. The objection that the commission was not executed by the person intended was not made until the evidence taken under it was offered on the trial. That the defendants were apprised of the facts upon which the objection was founded before the trial is quite evident.

Prima facie a commission directed to a person, omitting any mention of a middle name, and returned executed by a person of the same name, with the addition of a middle name, is executed by the person named in the order. Franklin v. Talmadge, 5 Johns. 84. The ruling of the judge, in respect to the objection made to the commission, was clearly in furtherance of justice. The defendant had ample opportunity to raise the objection to the commission before the trial by a motion to suppress, and it should not be permitted that a party may lie by, and spring an objection of this kind on the trial for the first time, when the other party may be unable to meet it by proof, and when there is no opportunity to issue a new commission, or send it back to be executed by the proper person. It is we think a wholesome rule that objections to the execution of a commission where the party has an opportunity to make them before the trial, should be raised by motion, and if not raised in that way when such opportunity exists, they should be deemed to have been waived. Whether such objection is to formal defects merely, or as in this case goes to the right of the person who executed the commission to act as commissioner, makes, we think, no difference in the application of the rule, if the fact of disqualification is known to the party who seeks to exclude the evidence a sufficient time before the trial, to enable him to make his motion. See Kimball v. Davis, 19 Wend. 438; Sturm v. Atlantic Mut. Ins. Co., 63 N. Y. 77; Drury v. Foster, 2 Wall. 33; Sheldon v. Wood, 2 Bosw. 267; Zellweger v. Caffé, 5 Duer, 100.

MITCHELL v. READ.

Court of Appeals of New York. May 21, 1874.

Appeal from judgment of the general term of the supreme court in the First judicial department, affirming a judgment in favor of defendant, entered upon decision of the court at special term. Reported below, 61 Barb. 310.

This action was brought to have certain leases, obtained by the defendant during the existence of a copartnership between him and plaintiff, for terms to commence at its termination, of premises leased and occupied by the firm, declared to have been taken for the partnership, and to have it adjudged that the defendant held them as trustee for the partnership. The facts found were substantially as follows:

The plaintiffs were copartners, conducting and carrying on the Hoffman House, in the city of New York. The copartnership, by its terms, expired May 1, 1871; it owned various leases of premises which were used for the partnership business. All of the leases expired at the same time with the copartnership. The firm had spent large sums of money in making valuable improvements and in fitting up the leasehold premises so that they could be beneficially used in connection, and also in fixtures and furnishing, and by their joint efforts had built up a profitable business, and largely enhanced the rental value of the premises. In 1869 the defendant, without any notice of his intent to apply therefor, and without the knowledge of plaintiff, procured renewal leases, in his own name, of the premises, for terms commencing at the termination of the partnership leases and of the partnership, which, upon discovery thereof having been made by plaintiff, defendant claimed were his property exclusively, and refused to recognize or acknowledge that the partnership or plaintiff had any right or interest therein. Other facts appear in the opinion.

The court found as conclusions of law that the defendant Read was the sole owner of the leases executed to him as aforesaid, and that the plaintiff had no right, title, nor interest in or to them, or either of them, and that the defendants have judgment accordingly, to which plaintiff duly excepted. Judgment was rendered accordingly.

The plaintiff commenced this action soon after he ascertained that the defendant had taken the new leases, to wit, in March, 1870, and the cause was brought to trial in February, 1871.

EARL, C. The relation of partners with each other is one of trust and confidence. Each is the general agent of the firm, and is bound to act in entire good faith to the other. The functions, rights and duties of partners in a great measure comprehend those both of trustees and agents, and the general rules of law applicable to such characters are applicable to them. Neither partner can, in the business and affairs of the firm, clandestinely stipulate for a private advantage to himself; he can neither sell to nor buy from the firm at a concealed profit to himself. Every advantage which he can obtain in the business of the firm must inure to the benefit of the firm. These principles are elementary, and are not contested. Story, Partn. §§ 174, 175; Colly. Partn. 181, 182. It has been frequently held that when one partner obtains the renewal of a partnership lease secretly, in his own name, he will be held a trustee for the firm as to the renewed lease. It is conceded that this is the rule where the partnership is for a limited term, and either partner takes a lease commencing within the term; but the contention is that the rule does not apply where the lease thus taken is for a term to commence after the expiration of the partnership by its own limitation, and whether this contention is well founded is one of the grave questions to be determined upon this appeal.

It is not necessary, in maintaining the right of the plaintiff in this case to hold that in all cases a lease thus taken shall inure to the benefit of the firm, but whether, upon the facts of this case, these leases ought to inure to the benefit of this firm I will briefly allude to some of the prominent features of this case. These parties had been partners for some years; they were equal in dignity, although their interests differed. The plaintiff was not a mere subordinate in the firm, but so far as appears, just as important and efficient in its affairs as the defendant. They procured the exclusive control of the leases of the property, to terminate May 1, 1871, and their partnership was to terminate on the same day. They expended many thousand dollars in fitting up the premises, a portion thereof after the new leases were obtained, and they expended a very large sum in furnishing them. By their joint skill and influence they built up a very large and profitable business, which largely enhanced the rental value of the premises. More than two years before the expiration of their leases and of their partnership, the defendant secretly procured, at an increased rent, in his own name, the new leases, which are of great value. Although the plaintiff was in daily intercourse with the defendant, he knew nothing of these leases for about a year after they had been obtained. There is no proof that the lessors would not have leased to the firm as readily as to the defendant alone. The permanent fixtures, by the terms of the leases at their expiration, belonged to the lessors. But the movable fixtures and furniture were worth vastly more to be kept and used in the hotel than to be removed elsewhere. Upon these facts I can entertain no doubt, both upon principle and authority, that these leases should be held to inure to the benefit of the firm. If the defendant can hold these leases, he could have held them if he had secretly obtained them immediately after the partnership commenced, and had concealed the fact from the plaintiff during the whole term. There would thus have been, during the whole term, in making permanent improvements and in furnishing the hotel, a conflict between his duty to the firm and to his self-interest. Large investments and extensive furnishing would add to the value of his lease, and defendant would be under constant temptation to make them. While he might not yield to the temptation, and while proof might show that he had not yielded, the law will not allow a trustee thus situated to be thus tempted, and therefore disables him from making a contract for his own benefit. Terwilliger v. Brown, 44 N. Y. 237, and cases cited. It matters not that the court at special term found upon the evidence that the improvements were judicious and prudent for the purposes of the old term. The plaintiff was entitled to the unbiased judgment of the defendant as to such improvements, uninfluenced by his private and separate interest. But, further, the parties owned together a large amount of hotel property in the form of furniture and supplies, considerably exceeding, as I infer, $100,000 in value. Assuming that the partnership was not to be continued after the 1st day of May, 1871, this property was to be sold, or in some way disposed of for the benefit of the firm, and each partner owed a duty to the firm to dispose of it to the best advantage. Neither could, without the violation of his duty to the firm, place the property in such a situation that it would be sacrificed, or that he could purchase it for his separate benefit, at a great profit. Much of this property, such as mirrors, carpets, etc., was fitted for use in this hotel, and it is quite manifest that all of it would sell better with a lease of the hotel, than it would be removed therefrom. It is clear that one or both of these parties could obtain advantageous leases of the hotel for a term of years, and hence, if the parties had determined to dissolve their partnership, it would have been a measure of ordinary prudence to have obtained the leases and transferred the property with the leases as the only mode of realizing its value. This was defeated by the act of the defendant, if he is allowed to hold these leases, and thus place himself in a position where the property must be largely sacrificed or purchased by himself at a great advantage. This the law will not tolerate. The language of Lord Eldon, in Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. 311, a case in many respects resembling this, is quite in point. He says: "If they [the defendants] can hold this lease and the partnership stock is not brought to sale, they are by no means on equal terms. The stock cannot be of equal value to the plaintiff, who was to carry it away and seek some place in which to put it, as to the defendants who were to continue it in the place where the trade was already established, and if the stock was sold the same construction would give them an advantage over the bidders. In effect they would have secured the good-will of the trade to themselves in exclusion of their partner." For these reasons, independently of the consideration that the leases themselves had a value to which the firm was entitled upon other grounds and upon authorities to be hereafter cited, the plaintiff, who commenced his suit about one year before the term of the partnership expired, was upon undisputed principles and authorities applicable to all trustees and persons holding a fiduciary relation to others, entitled to the relief he prayed for.

It has long been settled by adjudications, that generally when one partner obtains the renewal of a partnership lease secretly, in his own name, he will be held a trustee for the firm, in the renewed lease, and when the rule is otherwise applicable, it matters not that the new lease is upon different terms from the old one, or for a larger rent, or that the lessor would not have leased to the firm. The law recognizes the renewal of a lease as a reasonable expectancy of the tenants in possession, and in many cases protects this expectancy as a thing of value. I will briefly notice a few of the cases upon this subject. In Holridge v. Gillespie, 2 Johns. Ch. 30, Chancellor Kent says: "It is a general principle pervading the cases, that if a mortgagee, executor, trustee, tenant for life, etc., who has a limited interest, gets an advantage by being in possession, 'or behind the back' of the party interested in the subject, or by some contrivance or fraud, he shall not retain the same for his own benefit, but hold it in trust." That was a case where a lease was assigned as security, and the assignees surrendered it to the lessor and took a new lease for an extended term of years. In Phyfe v. Wardell, 5 Paige, 268, Chancellor Walworth lays down the general rule: "That if a person who has a particular or special interest in a lease obtains a renewal thereof from the circumstance of his being in possession as tenant, or from having such particular interest, the renewed lease is in equity considered as a mere continuance of the original lease, subject to the additional charges upon the renewal, for the purpose of protecting the equitable rights of all parties who had any interest, either legal or equitable, in the old lease." That case was followed in Gibbes v. Jenkins, 3 Sandf. Ch. 131, where it was held that one purchasing a leasehold which was subject to a mortgage and contained no covenant of renewal, could not escape the lien of the mortgage by suffering the lease to expire and afterward obtaining a new lease of the premises; that the new lease in such case, though not a renewal, was a continuance of the original lease for the purpose of protecting the rights of the parties interested in the original lease, both legal and equitable. In these two cases church leases were involved, and some stress was laid upon that fact, as the continuance of such leases was expected as a matter of course, without any covenant of renewal. But the fact that they were church leases could make no real difference in the principle upon which the decisions were based. The fact that a renewal or continuance of a lease is more or less certain can make no difference with the principle; that springs from the fact that the party obtained a new lease from the position he occupied, being in possession and having the good-will which accompanies that, or being connected with the old lease in some way, and thus enabled to take an inequitable advantage of other parties also interested, to whom he owed some duty.

In Struthers v. Pearce, 51 N. Y. 357, it was held that when during the existence of a continuing copartnership of undetermined duration, three or four copartners, without the knowledge of the other, obtained a new lease in their own names, of premises leased and used by the firm, the same became partnership property, and upon dissolution the other partner was entitled to his proportion of the value. In that case the defendants intended to dissolve the copartnership as early as August, and gave written notice on the 18th day of September, 1865, for the dissolution on the 31st day of December following. On the 11th day of September, the defendants secretly obtained a new lease, in their own names, of the same premises, for a term of five years, to commence May 1, 1866. I think that case is fairly decisive of this. It is true that a period for a dissolution of the partnership had not been fixed when the new lease was taken, but negotiations were pending for its dissolution, and a few days after the new lease was taken, a time for its dissolution was fixed by a written notice. But it can make no difference that the partnership might have been continued by the parties until after the new term commenced. So it might here, if the parties had so willed. There they had the right to dissolve it at any time. The principle which lies at the foundation of the decision of that and all similar cases must be the one above stated, that the defendants in possession took advantage of their position to procure the new lease, and thus deprived the plaintiff of a benefit to which he, with them, was equally entitled. In a note to Moody v. Matthews, 17 Ves. (Sumn. Ed.) 185, the learned editor says, as a deduction from adjudged cases, that "with a possible exception in favor of a bona fide purchaser, it seems to be an universal rule that no one who is in possession of a lease or a particular interest in a lease, which lease is affected with any sort of equity in behalf of third persons, can renew the same for his own use only; but such renewal must be construed as a graft upon the old stock." In Clements v. Hall, 2 De Gex & J. 173, where one partner in a mining partnership died in 1847, and the surviving partner thereafter worked the mine without a new lease thereof, claiming to do so for his own benefit, until 1850, when the lessor gave him notice to quit in March, 1851, when he entered into new negotiations with the lessor for a new lease, and obtained one of the greater part of the mine, on terms much more burdensome than those of the old tenancy, it was held that those who claimed under the will of the deceased partner were entitled to a share of the benefit of the new lease. In Clegg v. Fishwick, 1 Macn. & G. 294, one of several partners working a mine under a lease died, and the firm business was thereafter carried on for several years between the surviving partners and the plaintiff, widow of the deceased partner. Finally the old lease expired, and some of the partners took a new lease of the mine without the privity of the plaintiff. It was held that the estate of the deceased partner was interested in the new lease. The lord chancellor says: "The old lease was the foundation of the new lease, and the tenant's right of renewal arising out of the old lease giving the partners the benefit of this new lease; at least, the law assumes it to be so. Without saying at all what circumstances there may be to interfere with that ordinary right, we know that the rule of equity is that parties interested jointly with others in a lease cannot take to themselves the benefit of a renewal to the exclusion of the other parties interested with them." In Clegg v. Edmondson, 8 De Gex, M. & G. 787, the managing partners of a mining partnership at will gave notice of dissolution to the rest, and intimated their intention, after the dissolution, to apply for a new lease for their own exclusive benefit, and did so and obtained a lease, and it was held to inure to the benefit of the partnership. See, also, the leading cases of Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. 298, and Keech v. Sandford, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 741, and notes to the latter case in 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. 32, where the whole doctrine is discussed, and conclusion reached in harmony with the views above expressed. I therefore conclude that it makes no difference that these leases were obtained for a term to commence after the partnership, by its own limitation, was to terminate. I can find no authority holding that it does, and there is no principle sustaining the distinction claimed. The defendant was in possession as a member of the firm, and the firm held the good-will for a renewal, which ordinarily attaches to the possession. By his occupancy, and the payment of the rent, he was brought into intimate relations with the lessors; he became well acquainted with the value of the premises, and he took advantage of his position, during the partnership, secretly to obtain the new leases. He must hold them for the firm.

I am therefore of opinion that the judgment should be reversed, and new trial granted, costs to abide the event.

DWIGHT, C. The question at issue in this case is, whether a member of a commercial partnership, during its continuance, and without the consent or knowledge of his associate, can take a renewal of a lease of property used in the business, in his own name and for his own benefit, the partnership having a definite termination, and the renewal lease commencing at its expiration.

The general power of a partner to take a lease of such property for his own benefit must be considered as settled in this court by the decision in Struthers v. Pearce, 51 N. Y. 357. In that case the lease was taken during the existence of the partnership, which was of indefinite duration. No notice had been given of its termination when this lease was taken. The facts presented the case of a lease taken during the existence of the partnership, and to begin in enjoyment during that time. The court expressly distinguished it from the present case, which had then been decided in the supreme court. Page 362.

The only point now open for discussion is, whether the fact that when Read took the renewal of the lease the partnership had a precise limit, and was to terminate before the lease commenced, is material. Before considering that point, it may fairly be claimed that this case comes within the precise decision in Struthers v. Pearce, on a ground not mentioned in the argument. Read, though his lease was not to commence in possession until after the expiration of the original lease, acquired an immediate interest by way of an interesse termini. This precise point was decided in Smith v. Day, 2 Mees. & W. 684, 699; 2 Platt, Leas. 60. This, it is true, is not an estate, but a right. Still it is the subject of grant before entry. 1 Steph. Comm. 268; Burt. Real Prop. 18, pl. 61; 2 Crabb, Real Prop. 227. If the partnership had acquired this interesse termini, it might, as the facts of the case show, have been disposed of for a large sum of money. If the doctrine of Struthers v. Pearce establishes that the partner cannot acquire a lease in his own behalf, to commence while the partnership lasts, by parity of reasoning he cannot obtain an interesse termini under the same circumstances.

If however this view is not correct, the main question must be disposed of. Can a partner take a lease for himself, to commence in possession after the partnership has expired? In order to settle this point it is essential to give the subject a more full examination than was requisite in Struthers v. Pearce, and to consider more at large the principles on which this branch of the law rests. It grows out of the relation of trust and confidence between partners, and is a branch of the rule that a trustee cannot profit from the estate for which he acts. It largely has its roots in a principle of public policy, as shown in one of the early decisions. Keech v. Sandford, Sel. Cas. Ch. 61; Griffin v. Griffin, 1 Schoales & L. 352, per Lord Redesdale. The general rule is so well settled that it would be a waste of time to refer to authorities. The text-writers on the law of partnership, without exception, assert the applicability of this rule of law to partnership transactions. Lindl. Partn. 495; Story, Partn. §§ 174, 175; Parsons, Partn. §§ 224-226; Colly, Partn. §§ 281, 282.

The special rule that a trustee cannot take, for his own benefit, a renewal of a lease which he holds in trust, is enforced in a great number of cases. The principle on which it rests is nowhere more fully or clearly stated than in the argument of Sir Francis Hargrave in Lee v. Vernon, 5 Brown, Parl. Cas. (10th Eng. Ed.) 1803. Although the passage is somewhat long, it is quoted as shedding much light on a subject, the principle of which has in course of time, become somewhat obscure. He said: "It has long been an established practice to consider those who are in possession of lands under leases for lives or years as having an interest beyond the subsisting term, and this interest is usually termed the tenant right of renewal, which though according to language and ideas strictly legal, is not any certain or even contingent estate; but only a chance, there being no means of compelling a renewal, yet is so adverted to in all transactions relative to leasehold property, that it influences the price in sales, and is often an inducement to accept of it in mortgages and settlements. This observation is more especially applicable to leases from the crown, the church, colleges or other corporations, and indeed from private persons, where the tenure is of ancient date. * * * This 'tenant right' of renewal as it is termed, however imperfect or contingent in its nature, being still a thing of value, ought to be protected by the courts of justice, and when those who are entitled to its incidental advantages, whether by purchase or other derivation, are disappointed of them by fraud, imposition, misrepresentation, or unfair practice of any kind, it is fit and reasonable that this injury should have redress. Accordingly courts of equity have so far recognized the tenant right of renewal as frequently to interpose in its favor by decreeing that new or reversionary leases gained by means or supposition of the tenant right of renewal should be for the benefit of the same persons as were interested in the ancient lease, and those who procured such new leases and were legally possessed of them, should be trustees for that purpose. There is a great variety of authorities on this head, but the cases which have hitherto occurred have been principally of two kinds, some being cases of persons not having any beneficial interest in the old lease, as guardians and executors, and others being cases of persons having only partial and limited interests, as tenants for life, mortgagees and mortgagors, and in cases of both descriptions those who have procured a new lease in such situations have been uniformly declared trustees for the persons beneficially interested in the ancient lease, either wholly or in part, according to the particular circumstances, the court ever presuming that the new lease was obtained by means of a connection with and a reference to the interest in the ancient one, without in the least regarding whether the persons renewing intended to act as trustees, or for their own emolument."

From this exposition so luminous and judicial in its tone, which is fully sustained by the authorities, it is clear that the rule under consideration is not confined to crown, church or college leases, but embraces those of every kind. The same principle appertains to all. The cestui que trust has a right to the chance of renewal. Though this is termed a "tenant right" as between the lessee and the landlord, that is a mere phrase. It is a hope, an expectation, rather than a right. Such as it is the trustee shall not take it to himself, but if it results in any substantial benefit he shall hold it for his beneficiary. Phyfe v. Wardell, 5 Paige, 268; Bennett v. Van Syckel, 4 Duer, 162; Gibbes v. Jenkins, 3 Sandf. Ch. 130; Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252; Armour v. Alexander, 10 Paige, 572; Dickinson v. Codwise, 1 Sandf. Ch. 226. Some of these were instances of church or other corporation leases, and others were not. In no case has it been held that the rule is confined to these, as it certainly cannot be on principle.

The whole doctrine is extended to the case of partners in Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, 17 Ves. 298; Clegg v. Edmondson, 8 De Gex, M. & G. 787; Clements v. Hall, 2 De Gex & J. 173; Clegg v. Fishwick, 1 Macn. & G. 294; Struthers v. Pearce, supra.

The principle cannot depend on the fact whether the lease is made to begin during the continuance of the partnership or at its close. Once admit the general principle, and it must result in this. While the relation lasts, one partner cannot clandestinely and exclusively profit by the trust relation. There may perhaps be cases where the act is openly done by the trustee and acquiesced in by the beneficiary that would admit of different considerations. It is not now necessary to decide that in no case can a partner take a lease for his own benefit. What is now to be decided is, whether he can do so behind the back of his associate and without his consent. The bad consequences of making any such distinction as the defendant seeks to maintain in the present case is easily shown by a reference to the relation of a guardian and his ward. A guardian, we may suppose, holds a lease in his official character which is to expire at his ward's majority. While the relation of guardian and ward exists, he takes a lease to himself to commence at the termination of the existing lease. Could that be sustained? Has he not profited by the trust relation? When he takes a lease to himself, can a tenable distinction be taken between one commencing immediately and one beginning at a future day, even though that day be postponed until the trust relation expires? The sound rule is that he cannot make any profit to himself from a secret transaction initiated while the relation of trustee and cestui que trust exists, no matter when it springs into active operation. It must never be forgotten that on general principles of the law of contracts his right to the lease, as between him and his landlord, commences as soon as he has made his agreement for it. This is an immediate subject of sale, and if the trustee can hold it he will be allowed to profit by the trust relation which, as has been shown, he cannot do. The cestui que trust may accordingly say: "All the value of this lease you hold in trust for me. Grant that it is not yet an estate but only a right—make it over to me in the condition in which you hold it." While no case has been found presenting the precise facts in the case at bar, the principles which should govern it may be derived from the result in Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, supra, Clegg v. Edmondson, and Clegg v. Fishwick, supra.

In the first of these cases the partnership was for an indefinite period, and might be dissolved at the pleasure of either party, on notice. It was dissolved November 22, 1804, the day on which the lease expired. Two of the partners, without communication with the plaintiff, had applied for a renewal of the lease, and obtained it before giving notice of the dissolution of the partnership. The new lease was to run for eight years from the expiration of the old one. On October 19 they gave notice to dissolve the partnership. The court held that the new lease belonged to the partnership and was assets of the firm. Much stress was laid on the fact that the transaction was a clandestine one, and the court thought if notice had been given the case might have admitted of different consideration. The case is not in all respects parallel in its facts with the case at bar, for at the time the lease was taken the period for the termination of the partnership had not been fixed, and only became subsequently ascertained by notice.

In the case of Clegg v. Edmondson, which was also an instance of a partnership to be dissolved at the pleasure of the parties, the effect of a notice to dissolve, preceding the execution of the renewal lease, came before the court. In that case five managing partners had determined to dissolve their partnership, and had communicated their intent in June, 1846, and their determination to take a renewal to themselves. To this two other partners objected, claiming that the renewal should be for the benefit of all. Formal notice of dissolution was given in July, to take effect on September 30. On the succeeding 11th of December a new lease was executed for twenty-one years to the managing partners, to take effect from September 29, 1846. The defendants endeavored to distinguish this case from that of Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, on the ground of the openness and fairness of the transaction. The court however held that the mere communication of an intent on the part of the managing partners to apply for a lease for their own benefit was not sufficient to give them an exclusive right to it. This case, on the point of time, is stronger than the case at bar, for the new lease was taken after the partnership was dissolved, though some stress was laid upon a point which does not appear here, that the act was that of managing partners.

On principle, in many cases, it is of but little consequence whether the partnership is dissolved or not before the renewal, since, if the former partners become tenants in common, the result is the same. Clements v. Hall, 2 De Gex & J. 173; Van Horne v. Fonda, 5 Johns. Ch. 388; Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sumn. 475, Fed. Cas. No. 787. The case of Clegg v. Fishwick is still nearer to the one under consideration. In this instance, the renewal lease was obtained during the existence of the partnership, and the lease commenced at its expiration. This lease was declared to be held in trust for the firm.

Without further collation of authorities, the fair deductions from the principles on which they rest may be summed up as follows:

1. A trustee holding a lease, whether corporate or individual, holds the renewal as a trustee, and as he held the original lease.

2. This does not depend upon any right which the cestui que trust has to the renewal, but upon the theory that the new lease is, in technical terms, a "graft" upon the old one; and that the trustee "had a facility," by means of his relation to the estate, for obtaining the renewal, from which he shall not personally profit.

3. This doctrine extends to commercial partnerships, and one of several partners cannot, while a partnership continues, take a renewal lease clandestinely, or "behind the backs" of his associates, for his own benefit. It is not material that the landlord would not have granted the new lease to the other partners, or to the firm.

4. It is of no consequence whether the partnership is for a definite or an indefinite period. The disability to take the lease for individual profit grows out of the partnership relation. While that lasts, the renewal cannot be taken for individual purposes, even though the lease does not commence until after the expiration of the partnership.

5. It cannot necessarily be assumed that the renewal can be taken by an individual member of the firm, even after dissolution. The former partners may still be tenants in common; or there may be other reasons, of a fiduciary nature, why the transaction cannot be entered into.

The authorities cited on behalf of the defendant do not disprove these conclusions.

In Lee v. Vernon, supra, there was no trust. The question arose between a stranger to the lease and the claimant. The point made by the plaintiff was that the "tenant right" of renewal had become strictly a right, so that even a stranger could not take a renewal and hold it for his own benefit. It was an extraordinary claim, having no foundation in principle, and was rejected.

In Van Dyke v. Jackson, 1 E. D. Smith, 419, the party had made a special contract with his partner to abandon the place where the business was carried on. The case turned on the special contract to leave the business in the hands of the other party.

Musselman's Appeal, 62 Pa. St. 81, does not raise the question. It was not sought there to charge a partner with the value of a renewal lease which he had taken to himself during the existence of the partnership, but rather with that of the good-will as it existed after the partnership was dissolved. In fact the place where the business was carried on was sold for the benefit of the firm, and it was held, in substance, that the good-will had been realized in the enhanced value of the property sold.

It is said, in the present case, that Read was not authorized, by the articles of partnership, to contract for Mitchell after the expiration of the firm; and that therefore Mitchell cannot take advantage from the renewal lease. The answer is that he made the contract while the firm was in existence, and Mitchell may adopt and ratify it. The objection also proves too much, as it applies to all the cases in which the partner, acting clandestinely, has been declared a trustee.

In Phillips v. Reeder, 18 N. J. Eq. 95, one of the partners, R., prior to the partnership, owned the lease, exclusively, of certain stone quarries. He entered into a partnership with P. for three years, and so much longer as R. should continue lessee of the quarries. In the lease, there was a covenant of renewal at the option of R. He having declined to renew, it was held that the partnership expired; or, in other words, that R. was under no obligation to renew, and thus to continue the partnership. There could be no pretense in this case that the doctrine under the review applied, since the original lease did not itself belong to the firm. It was the private property of one of the partners, which he was under no obligation to preserve for the firm's benefit.

In Achenson v. Fair, 3 Dru. & War. 512, the point decided was, that the doctrine was not to be extended to additional lands purchased by trustee; in other words, the rule was fully recognized, but nothing was to be governed by it except that which could be fairly regarded as a graft on the former lease.

In Nesbitt v. Tredennick, 1 Ball & B. 29, 48, a mortgagee, not in possession, obtained a renewal, the original lease having been forfeited, both in law and equity, for nonpayment of rent. Here there was no violation of trust. The rule under discussion was fully recognized, but its application to the existing case denied. The court said: "In all the cases upon this subject, either the party, by being in possession, obtained the renewal, or it was done behind the back, or by some contrivance in fraud of those who were interested in the old lease; and there was either a remnant of the old lease, or a tenant right of renewal, on which a new lease could be engrafted." There could be no plainer recognition of the general principle maintained by the plaintiff.

In Munsell v. O'Brien, 1 Jones, Jr. 184, the facts were, that there was an under-tenant who took a new lease from the original landlord without advising his own immediate landlord. The court held that there was no fiduciary relation between these parties. The principle was fully admitted, but the facts did not raise a case for its application. Joy, C. B., said: "It is admitted that there is no authority which can be produced where such a lease as the present has been declared to be a trust; and that we are now called upon to go further than any decision has ever gone before, and to make an authority for future decisions. We are called upon to do this on what are called the principles of a court of equity; namely, that where a person is clothed with a fiduciary character, and in that character becomes possessed of an interest in land, held under a determinable lease, any acquisition by him of a new interest in those lands is a continuation of the old lease, and a 'graft' upon it. This however is the first time that I have heard it asserted that if an under-tenant obtains a lease of his lands from the head landlord without consulting his own immediate landlord that lease is a trust for his immediate landlord, because that person had a tenant right of renewal. But there is no fiduciary character imposed on an under-tenant, in reference to his landlord, by the creation of the relation of landlord and tenant, which would entitle the plaintiff to the relief he seeks, on the ground of his having a tenant right of renewal. A cestui que trust is entitled to the benefit of a new lease, obtained by a trustee by means of a tenant right of renewal, which the latter became entitled to as trustee, but there is no such person in the present case." This language plainly shows that the court was but following in the wake of Lee v. Vernon; and holding that the doctrine of tenant right of renewal, and that the new lease is a graft on the old stock, are not to be extended to strangers, but confined to persons acting in a fiduciary character.

The only other case that will be noticed is Anderson v. Lemon, 8 N. Y. 236, which holds, that one partner may in good faith purchase and hold, for his own use, the reversion of real estate occupied by the copartnership, under a lease for years, with the qualification that if he secretly makes such purchase in his own name while the other partner with his concurrence is negotiating with the owner to obtain the property for the use of the firm, the purchaser will be declared a trustee.

This decision carefully admits the general doctrine, but considers it not applicable to the case where one of the partners purchases in good faith the landlord's interest as distinguished from taking a new lease. It is simply a case of an exception to a general rule. It can scarcely be considered as a decision in favor of a partner's right to purchase, since he was, under the circumstances, a trustee. Should the question be distinctly presented, it will deserve consideration whether the view in Anderson v. Lemon, that one partner may even in good faith buy the reversion for himself, is correct. There is a great cogency in the remarks of Sir William Grant, that the partner may in this way intercept and cut off the chance of future renewals and consequently make use of his situation to prejudice the interests of his associates. Randall v. Russell, 3 Mer. 190, 197. There appears to be no direct decision allowing the partner thus to purchase, and the right to do so is treated as doubtful by approved text-writers. 1 Lead. Cas. Eq. (3d Am. Ed.) 43, 44, marg. paging.

The application of the principles discussed in this opinion to the case at bar is obvious.

The plaintiff and defendant were owners, as partners, of a lease of premises in the city of New York, on which a hotel business was carried on, yielding a large profit. These consisted of Nos. 1111, 1113, 1115 Broadway and Nos. 1 and 3 West Twenty-fourth street. The leases of the Twenty-fourth street property were made directly to them, November 17, 1866. The Broadway property, through a series of transactions not necessary to be detailed, became vested, according to the fair construction of the various agreements respecting it, in the partnership. The leases expired on the same day, May 1, 1871, when the partnership terminated. While the partnership continued, both parties thought it necessary to provide a place for a bar-room, and with this view the premises No. 3 West Twenty-Fourth street were connected with the rear of the premises fronting on Broadway, known as the "Hoffman House," and the first story fitted up and used for that purpose. A considerable expenditure was made with this view, and large profits were realized, as the course taken was judicious. While all of the leases owned by the firm were still in existence, viz. April 20, 1869, and on January 21, 1869, the owners of the hotel property made leases to the defendant, to commence from May 1, 1871, and to continue as to part of the property for five years, and as to another portion for ten years from that date, at specified rents. The leases were obtained by Read without notice to the plaintiff, and he now claims that they are his exclusive property. They are of great value, and the hotel at the commencement of the action, March, 1870, was still in operation. The furniture, fixtures, stock, etc., were valuable, and the business carried on was profitable.

The case has in it every element of the equity which has been already considered. The partnership is undisputed; the leases were in existence when the renewal was made. The act of renewal was clandestine, or occurred "behind the back" of the plaintiff. It took place while the partnership was in force. The right to renewal was immediate and vested in Read during the partnership's continuance. The property belonging to the firm, and which will be prejudiced by the prospect of disposing of it at a sacrifice at the close of the existing lease, is large and valuable.

Common justice and a due regard to rules of public policy demand that the renewal lease should be declared to belong to the firm, and that the defendant should be required to account to the plaintiff for his portion of its value. The clauses in the leases to Read that there shall be no assignment without the consent of the landlord do not stand in the way of the plaintiff's relief. This does not consist in an assignment in the ordinary sense of that term. On the contrary, the ground of relief is that the defendant acted inequitably when he entered into the contract; that he must therefore be considered as a trustee, while the assignment to the firm simply follows as an incident to the giving complete effect to the trust relation declared by the court to exist between the parties. Featherstonhaugh v. Fenwick, supra.

RYAN v. DOX.

Court of Appeals of New York. Jan., 1866.

Henry R. Selden, for appellants. Alexander S. Johnson, for respondent.

DAVIES, C. J. This action was tried by a referee who held as matter of law, that unless the agreement set out in the complaint in relation to the purchase by the defendant at the master's sale of the premises in question, or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration be in writing, the same was void, and created no interest in the plaintiffs in said premises, and could not be enforced against said defendant in law or equity. And he further reported, as matter of fact, that no proof was made or offered on said trial by or in behalf of the plaintiff of any such agreement in writing, or of any note or memorandum in writing of such an agreement, or of any deed, conveyance or instrument in writing subscribed by the defendant or his lawful agent, creating or declaring any trust or interest in said premises in favor of said plaintiffs, and that no proof was made or testimony or evidence offered on the part of the defendant. The judgment entered for the defendant upon the report of the referee was affirmed at the general term, and the plaintiffs now appeal to this court.

We are at liberty to assume from this finding, that the agreement set out in the complaint was proven on the trial before the referee. To ascertain what that agreement was, we must have reference to the complaint and the offer made by the plaintiffs on the trial. The plaintiffs averred in the complaint that the plaintiff Michael Ryan, being seized of certain lands in the town of Seneca, made and executed a mortgage thereon in the year 1839, to secure the sum of $800, part of the purchase-money thereof, and that in the month of October, 1841, said plaintiff Ryan conveyed to the said Nevins, the other plaintiff, an equal undivided half of the said premises; that plaintiffs being unable to pay the installments on said mortgage as they became due, the said mortgage was foreclosed, and said plaintiffs procured of one Lewis the sum of $300, which was paid on account of said judgment of foreclosure, and a portion thereof, to the extent of $300, was assigned to said Lewis as his security for such advance; that said Lewis becoming importunate for his money, and the plaintiffs being unable to raise the same for him, Lewis proceeded to advertise said premises for sale on the 12th day of October, 1843, for the purpose of raising said sum of about $300, while said premises were worth the sum of $4,000. The complaint further averred that while said premises were thus advertised for sale, and before the day of sale had arrived, the plaintiffs being men of limited means, and unable to raise the money which would be needed to stop the said sale, and to pay up the amount due on the said decree for the debt and the costs which had accrued, applied to the defendant Dox, reported to be a man of ready money, and who had always professed to be interested in their behalf, and asked him to assist them, and aid them to raise the money to pay the amount due on said decree and save the said premises from being sold away from them, and from being sacrificed for the small amount, compared with their value, which was claimed upon said decree. That said Dox did then profess and declare a willingness to help said plaintiffs for such purpose, and did then and there agree with the said plaintiffs that on the day of said sale, he, the said Dox, would attend the same and bid off and purchase the said premises at such sale, upon the express agreement and understanding, between the plaintiffs and said Dox, that such bidding and purchase, if made by the said Dox, should be for the benefit and advantage of these plaintiffs, and the plaintiffs upon such agreement and understanding agreed that they would not find any other one to go their friend at the said sale, and to bid in and purchase the said premises for them; and that it was expressly understood and agreed between the plaintiffs and said Dox, that if he became the purchaser of said premises at said sale he should take the deed of the same from the said master in his own name, but only by way of and as security to himself for what money he should have to advance and pay on such purchase, and with the agreement, promise and undertaking between said Dox and these plaintiffs, that whenever these plaintiffs should repay him the amount which he should pay to procure and effect such purchase and to get the deed therefor, with the interest thereon, and a reasonable compensation for his services therein, he, the said Dox, should convey the said premises to these plaintiffs and again vest the title thereto in them, and should in the mean time hold the said premises in his own name as security only for the said moneys, and always subject to the above agreement and defeasance. That in pursuance of said agreement, said Dox attended said sale and bid off the same for the sum of $100, he being the only bidder at said sale, and the same was struck off to him and he received the deed therefor. That at said sale it was talked about and understood by those present thereat, that said Dox was bidding for the benefit of these plaintiffs, and that said premises were struck off to him only as security to him for the repayment to him by these plaintiffs of the moneys he should advance and pay for the same and interest thereon, and his reasonable charges for his attention thereto. And the plaintiffs averred that such was the fact, and that in truth said Dox did bid off and purchase the said premises for these plaintiffs, and to save the same for them, and took the deed in his own name, only as such security as aforesaid, and that in consequence of such understanding other persons abstained from bidding on said premises, and the same was struck off to said Dox without any opposing bid, although the plaintiffs aver that the same were then worth $4,000 and upwards. And the plaintiffs also averred that if they had not relied upon said agreement, promise and undertaking of said Dox, they would not have allowed the said premises to have been struck off for the said sum of $100, but would have found other persons to have purchased the said premises, and saved the same from sacrifice, but that as said agreement was made more than a month before said sale, these plaintiffs relied upon it and made no other effort to procure the money, or the assistance of friends to save and buy said premises.

That at the time of said sale these plaintiffs were in the possession of said premises, and continued in possession thereof and made payments on account of the incumbrances thereon until some time in the year 1849, with the knowledge, privity and consent of said Dox. And that during all that time said Dox never exercised any acts of ownership over said premises, or interfered with the ownership, use, occupation or possession thereof by the plaintiffs, and that during all that time the assessments and taxes thereon were paid by the plaintiffs, with the knowledge, privity and assent of said Dox. That in the year 1849, the said plaintiffs were induced by said Dox to surrender the possession of said premises to him, and in the year 1851 he refused to come to a settlement with the plaintiffs, and denied that he held the said premises for their benefit, or that they had any interest therein. The referee excluded such evidence, and decided that he would not receive any parol evidence to establish, or tending to establish, the said agreement, and that upon the case made by the pleadings, assuming there was no agreement in writing as stated in the answer, there can be no recovery by the plaintiffs. To this decision and ruling, the plaintiffs' counsel duly excepted.

This exception presents the main question for consideration and decision upon this appeal, and the referee in his report states the ground or reason of his decision to be that unless the agreement mentioned, or some note or memorandum thereof expressing the consideration be in writing the same was void, and could not be enforced against the defendant. If the referee was right in this conclusion, then the plaintiffs were properly nonsuited, and the judgment for the defendant should be affirmed. If in error then it follows that there must be a reversal and a new trial. The Revised Statutes declare that no estate or interest in lands, nor any trust or power over or concerning lands, or in any manner relating thereto, shall be created, granted or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by a deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the party creating, granting or declaring the same. 1 Rev. St. p. 134, § 6. It is manifest that the referee had this provision before him, and that his decision was based upon the assumption of its applicability to the case in hand. In arriving at this conclusion he entirely ignored all consideration of fraud or of part performance, as elements of the transaction. Section 10 of the same title declares that "nothing in this title contained shall be construed to abridge the powers of a court of equity to compel the specific performance of agreements in cases of part performance of such agreements." 1 Rev. St. p. 135, § 10. It is well settled that courts of equity will enforce a specific performance of a contract within the statute when the parol agreement has been partly carried into execution. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 759. And the distinct ground upon which courts of equity interfere in cases of this sort is, that otherwise one party would be enabled to practice a fraud upon the other, and it could never be the intention of the statute to enable any party to commit such a fraud with impunity. Indeed fraud in all cases constitutes an answer to the most solemn acts and conveyances, and the objects of the statutes are promoted instead of being obstructed by such a jurisdiction for discovery and relief. And when one party has executed his part of the agreement in the confidence that the other party would do the same, it is obvious that if the latter should refuse it would be a fraud upon the former to suffer his refusal to work to his prejudice.

In Fonblanque's Equity it is said: "If the contract be carried into execution by one of the parties, as by delivering possession, and such execution be accepted by the other, he that accepts it must perform his part, for when there is a performance the evidence of the bargain does not lie merely upon the words but the facts performed, and it is unconscionable that the party that received the advantage should be admitted to say that such contract was never made." Fonbl. bk. 1, p. 181, c. 338. And the universal rule is correctly enunciated by Brown on Frauds, when he says: "The correct view appears to be that equity will at all times lend its aid to defeat a fraud, notwithstanding the statute of frauds." Brown, St. Frauds, § 438. In the present case we are to assume that the agreement was made as set out in the complaint, and performed on the part of the plaintiffs as therein stated. We then have a distinct and unequivocal agreement established, and performance by one party of all that was to be done in pursuance of it on his part. We find the other party, by reason of the acts and omissions of this party, obtaining the possession and title to a large amount of real estate for a trifling sum compared to its actual value, and refusing to fulfill the agreement on his part. He interposes the statute of frauds as a shield, thus using a statute designed to prevent frauds as an instrument whereby one can be perpetrated with impunity. This a court of equity cannot tolerate. Wetmore v. White, 2 Caines, Cas. 87, was an action brought in chancery to compel the specific performance of a contract by parol relating to lands. The chancellor dismissed the bill, but the court of errors unanimously reversed his decree. Thompson, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The appellant's claim resting altogether upon parol contract, it becomes necessary to examine whether any obstacle to relief is interposed by the statute for the prevention of fraud. I think there is not. It is an established rule in equity that a parol agreement in part performed is not within the provisions of the statute. Citing 1 Fonbl. Eq. 182, and cases there noted. To allow a statute having for its object the prevention of frauds to be interposed in bar of the performance of a parol agreement in part performed, would evidently encourage the mischief the legislature intended to prevent. * * * Possession delivered in pursuance of an agreement is such a decree of performance as to take a contract out of the statute." The same doctrine was reaffirmed in Parkhurst v. Van Cortlandt, 14 Johns. 15, 35, 36. In Lowry v. Tew, 3 Barb. Ch. 407, 413, the chancellor said the principle upon which courts of equity hold that a part performance of a parol agreement is sufficient to take a case out of the statute of frauds is, that a party who has permitted another to perform acts on the faith of an agreement shall not be allowed to insist that the agreement is invalid, because it was not in writing, and that he is entitled to treat those acts as if the agreement, in compliance with which they were performed, had not been made. In other words, upon the ground of fraud in refusing to execute the parol agreement after a part performance thereof by the other party, and when he cannot be placed in the same situation that he was before such part performance by him." See, also, Phillips v. Thompson, 1 Johns. Ch. 131; Murray v. Jayne, 8 Barb. 612.

In Hodges v. Tennessee Marine & Fire Ins. Co., 8 N. Y. 416, this court held that in equity parol evidence was admissible to show that a deed absolute on its face was in fact a mortgage, and so intended by the parties thereto. And in Despard v. Walbridge, 15 N. Y. 374, this court also held that an assignment of a lease, absolute on its face, was in fact made for the purpose of securing a debt, and that such debt had been fully paid; and that under the Code of Procedure, parol evidence is admissible to show that such assignment, though absolute in its terms, was intended as a mortgage.

The case of Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige, 147, is so like to that now under consideration that it may be profitable to refer to it at length. A mortgage upon a farm was foreclosed in chancery and advertised for sale by a master. Before the sale, Brown, the defendant, made an arrangement with the plaintiffs, the Lynches, whereby he agreed to purchase the farm in for their benefit, for which he was to receive a stipulated compensation. The mortgagee, in order to favor the Lynches, agreed with Brown that he might bid off the property for about half the amount of the mortgage. Brown, at the sale, prevented others bidding by representing that he intended to buy for the Lynches, and he purchased the farm at the master's sale for $1,500, about $1,000 below its value. Afterward Brown refused to convey the farm to the Lynches, or to account to them for the value, although they tendered to him the amount of his bid, with interest, and the sum agreed for his services. And it was held by the court of chancery that Brown was a trustee for the Lynches, and had no other interest in the farm than that of mortgagee to secure the repayment of the purchase-money, and of the payment of the sum agreed to be allowed him for his services. And that the court of chancery would relieve against a fraud by converting the person guilty of it into a trustee for those who have been injured thereby. Emott, vice chancellor, decreed for the plaintiffs, holding the defendant had committed a fraud upon the plaintiffs by agreeing to purchase for their benefit, when, in truth, he meant to purchase for himself, and that he had committed a fraud upon the plaintiffs, by his acts and representations, in preventing bidding at the sale. And he proceeds to show, by the citation of numerous authorities, that a court of equity can provide adequate relief by declaring the purchaser a trustee for the person defrauded. And he quotes with approbation the remarks of Lord Eldon, in Mestaer v. Gillespie, 11 Ves. 626, where he says:

"Upon the statute of frauds, though declaring that interest shall not be barred except by writing, cases in this court are perfectly familiar, deciding that a fraudulent use shall not be made of that statute; when this court has interfered against a party meaning to make it an instrument of fraud, and said he should not take advantage of his own fraud, even though the statute has declared that in case these circumstances do not exist, the instrument shall be absolutely void." The chancellor affirmed the decree, and observed, that the Lynches had an interest in the premises which they had a right to protect and preserve, and it would have been a gross fraud for any one to hold out to them, under such circumstances, that he was bidding off the property for their benefit, when he in fact intended to appropriate it to his own use. If the appellant did in fact bid it off for them, under the agreement, he held it in trust for them, and had no other interest in it than that of a mortgagee, to secure the repayment of the purchase-money and the $60 agreed to be paid him for his trouble. But if he had no such intention, and did not in fact bid off the property in trust for them, he was guilty of a fraud which the court will relieve against. The cases referred to by the circuit judge (vice-chancellor), fully establish the principle that this court has power to relieve against such fraud, and the means to be employed is to convert the person who has gained an advantage by means of his fraudulent act, into a trustee for those who have been injured thereby." This case was cited with approbation in Anderson v. Lemon, 8 N. Y. 239, and the principle of it adopted by this court in that case.

Its principle was also adopted and approved of in Sandford v. Norris, decided at special term of supreme court in May, 1859, and affirmed at general term in the First district in June, 1861. 4 Abb. Dec. 144. In that case, certain premises were owned by the plaintiff's husband, and he made an assignment thereof, and his assignees advertised the same for sale. The plaintiff was anxious to purchase them in at the sale, and made an arrangement with the defendant, Norris, by which he agreed to attend the sale and bid them off in his name for the plaintiff, and on payment of the sum bid convey the same to the plaintiff. In consequence of this arrangement, the plaintiff refrained from bidding at the sale, and the premises were struck off to the defendant for the sum of $20, subject to the prior incumbrances. The defendant subsequently sold the premises so purchased for the sum of $2,000, of which the plaintiff had received one-half, and the action was brought to recover the residue. It was held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the defense of the statute of frauds, interposed by the defendant, was no bar to the relief sought by the plaintiff; that the agreement was established beyond controversy, and the defendant was bound as well by sound morals as established principles of law to the performance of it. On the hearing of that case, the opinion of Mr. Justice Emott, in the case of Bergen v. Nelson (not reported), was read, distinctly affirming the doctrine of Brown v. Lynch, supra. The case of Osborn v. Mason, before the vice-chancellor of the first circuit (not reported), also affirming the doctrine of that case, was also cited.

Mason in that case agreed with Osborn to attend a sale of certain premises, Osborn being either owner or a subsequent incumbrancer, Mason also having a claim upon the premises as an incumbrancer. Mason agreed to bid in the premises at the sale, and then to let Osborn have them for the amount at which they stood him in, including his own incumbrance. Mason bid off the premises and then refused to fulfill his agreement which was by parol. The vice-chancellor held that the statute of frauds was no bar to the suit for a specific performance of the agreement which was decreed, and on appeal to the chancellor the same was affirmed. Voorhies v. St. John was argued and decided in this court in December, 1863. It was an action brought to recover moneys received by the defendant on a sale of a house and lot in the city of New York, and a leasehold estate in two buildings on other lots therein, and for an account of the rents and profits received therefrom. The property had formerly belonged to the husband of the plaintiff, and consisted of three parcels, and upon a sale thereof by his assignees, the plaintiff requested two of her friends to attend the sale and bid off two of said parcels for her benefit. They subsequently, at her request, transferred their bids to the defendant, St. John, and he took the conveyance therefor to himself, and paid the assignee for the same, declaring at the time that the plaintiff wished him to buy that property for her. At the sale of the other parcel, St. John attended the assignee's sale and bid off the same himself, and the assignments of the two bids and the titles to all the three pieces of property made out to him together in his own name. All these acts were done by St. John for Mrs. Voorhies, at her request and for her benefit. The referee reported in favor of the plaintiff, and the judgment thereon was affirmed at the general term of the First district, on the authority of Sandford v. Norris, supra. On appeal to this court, that judgment was affirmed in December, 1863, and distinctly on the ground that the statute of frauds was no bar to the performance of the agreement. We must hold this case as decisive of that now under consideration. The same doctrine has frequently been affirmed in other cases.

In Cox v. Cox, 5 Rich. Eq. 365, the owner of land, in danger of being summarily dispossessed by a sheriff's sale, agreed with his brother, the defendant, that the latter should bid off the land and pay the bid and make a reconveyance on repayment. This agreement was declared to the bystanders at the sale, and competition being thus prevented, the land was bought by the brother for one-tenth of its actual value. The whole transaction was alleged to be "a fraudulent contrivance on the part of the defendant to obtain his brother's land for one-tenth of its value." The court enjoined the defendant from proceeding at law under the title thus fraudulently obtained, saying: "This court has often repeated that the statute of frauds should never be perverted to an instrument of fraud. Thus, in a case of an agreement such as the statute plainly declares void, if not reduced to writing, yet if this was omitted by fraud, the defendant would not be permitted to avail himself of the statute. In Whitchurch v. Bevis, 2 Brown Ch. 565, Lord Thurlow says, if you interpose the medium of fraud, by which the agreement is prevented from being put in writing, I agree the statute is inapplicable. See Keith v. Purvis, 4 Desaus. Eq. 114."

In the case cited of Keith v. Purvis, a creditor induced his debtor's agent not to bid at a sale of his debtor's land by promising to give the debtor time to pay the debt, and then to reconvey the land. This agreement was disclosed at the sale, and prevented other bids, whereby the creditor bought the land at one-third of its value, but afterward refusing to reconvey, the debtor brought his bill for relief. To this it was objected that the agreement was void by the statute of frauds; but the court held, "that if the agreement was void, the creditor must surrender up his advantage under it and be liable to make good the loss sustained by the adverse party from his conduct." "Can it be tolerated," says the court at page 121, "that a creditor shall, at a sale of his debtor's property, lull him to sleep and keep off other purchasers by an agreement under which he buys in the land for a small sum much below the value, and then that he should declare that the agreement was void under the statute of frauds, and that the other party should have no benefit from the agreement, whilst he reaped all the fruits? Surely not. Courts of justice would be blind indeed if they could permit such a state of things."

In Peebles v. Reading, 8 Serg. & R. 492, the supreme court of Pennsylvania said: "If by the artifice of the purchaser declaring he was to buy for the owner, others were prevented from bidding, and the land was sold at a great undervalue, this would make him a trustee." And in Trapnall v. Brown, 19 Ark. 49, property of the value of $5,000 was, by agreement similar to the one in the present case, bought in for $176, other persons declining to bid on being informed of the object of the agreement. "Under these circumstances," the court said, "we think it would be a fraud in the purchaser to keep the property in violation of the agreement.

That the statute which was designed to prevent fraud would be used as a shield and in the commission of fraud, which the courts of equity will not tolerate. We think therefore that the court below did not err in treating the purchaser as a trustee." These observations, made in these cases, are as pertinent to that now under consideration, as they were in them. Many of these cases are identical in all important particulars with this, and there is no good reason why the same rules of law and morals enunciated in them should not govern and control the decision in this case. The fact that an agreement is void, under the statute of frauds, does not entitle either party to relief in equity, but other facts may; and when they do, it is no answer to the claim for relief, that the void agreement was one of the instrumentalities through which the fraud was effected. Ormond v. Anderson, 2 Ball & B. 369. Where one of the parties to a contract, void by the statute of frauds, avails himself of its invalidity but unconscientiously appropriates what he has acquired under it, equity will compel restitution; and it constitutes no objection to the claim, that the opposite party may happen to secure the same practical benefit, through the process of restitution, which would have resulted from the observance of the void agreement. Floyd v. Buckland, 2 Freem. Ch. 268; Oldham v. Litchford, Id. 284; Devenish v. Baines, Finch, Prec. 3; Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296; Reech v. Kennegal, 1 Ves. Sr. 125; Davis v. Walsh, 2 Har. & J. 329; Wilcox v. Morris, 1 Murph. 116; Stoddard v. Hart, 23 N. Y. 560.

It is very clear to my mind, both upon principle and authority, that the referee erred in excluding the evidence offered, and that the judgment must be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event.

EDWARDS v. CULBERTSON.

(16 S. E. 233, 111 N. C. 342.)

Supreme Court of North Carolina. Nov. 22, 1892.

Appeal from superior court, Chatham county; Whitaker, Judge.

Action by Samson Edwards against Jennie Culbertson for money paid and for a lien on land purchased therewith. Judgment for plaintiff for amount paid without a lien. Plaintiff appeals. Modified.

SHEPHERD, C. J. According to the finding of the jury the defendant fraudulently obtained of the plaintiff the sum of $275.25, for the purpose of purchasing the land described in the complaint, and that the fraud consisted in "falsely and fraudulently promising and pretending that, if the plaintiff would let her have the said sum of money for said purpose, she would marry him in a very short time, and that the land to be purchased with the said money should be in lieu of her right of dower which she would acquire" by the said marriage. Upon this verdict, his honor rendered a judgment in favor of the plaintiff for the recovery of the amount so fraudulently obtained, but refused to declare it a charge upon the land purchased by the defendant with the said money, the land still remaining in her hands. Were there nothing more than a mere promise to marry, it is plain that a violation of it would not entitle the plaintiff to any equitable relief, but we must infer from the verdict that the defendant did not intend to perform the promise at the time it was made, and that she intended it, as well as the additional agreement to hold the land in lieu of dower, simply as a trick or contrivance by which to cheat and defraud the plaintiff of his money. By submitting to the verdict and judgment, the defendant (even if she could successfully do so) is precluded from denying that she obtained the money under circumstances which the law denounces as fraudulent, and, this being so, it cannot be doubted that if the specific money had been retained by her and could have been identified, the plaintiff, in a proper action, could have recovered it. If this be true, why may not the money be traced into the land and declared to be a charge thereupon? This is a somewhat novel question in this state, but in view of well-settled equitable principles, as well as authorities in other jurisdictions, it is believed to be unattended with any very serious difficulty.

The only decision of this court to which we have been referred as bearing upon the question is that of Campbell v. Drake, 4 Ired. Eq. 94. The plaintiff filed a bill in equity against the heirs at law of one Farrow, praying that they be declared trustees of certain land purchased by their ancestor with money stolen by him of the plaintiff while in the employment of the latter as his clerk. The court said that it was "not at all like the cases of dealings with trust funds by trustees, executors, guardians, factors, and the like, in which the owner of the fund may elect to take either the money or that in which it was invested;" and it was accordingly held that the plaintiff was not entitled to the particular relief asked for. It was strongly intimated, however, by Ruffin, C. J., in delivering the opinion, that the plaintiff might "have the land declared liable as a security for the money laid out for it." It was not stated upon what principle this could be done, but we apprehend that it was based upon the general proposition that, whenever a person has obtained the property of another by fraud, he is a trustee ex maleficio for the person so defrauded, for the purpose of recompense or indemnity. "One of the most common cases," remarks Judge Story, "in which a court of equity acts upon the ground of implied trusts in invitum, is when a party receives money which he cannot conscientiously withhold from another party." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1255. And he states it to be a general principle that "whenever the property of a party has been wrongfully misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted into another species of property, if its identity can be traced, it will be held in its new form liable to the rights of the original owner, or cestui que trust." Id. § 1258; Hill, Trustees, 222; Whitley v. Foy, 6 Jones, Eq. 34; Taylor v. Plumer, 3 Maule & S. 562; Knatchbull v. Hallett, 13 Ch. Div. 696; People v. City Bank, 96 N. Y. 32; National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104 U. S. 54. Mr. Pomeroy says: "In general, whenever the legal title to property, real or personal, has been obtained through actual fraud, or through any other circumstances which render it unconscientious for the holder of the legal title to retain and enjoy the beneficial interest, equity imposes a constructive trust on the property thus acquired in favor of the one who is truly and equitably entitled to the same, although he may never, perhaps, have had any legal estate therein, and a court of equity has jurisdiction to reach the property either in the hands of the original wrongdoer or in the hands of any subsequent holder, until a purchaser in good faith and without notice acquires a higher right, and takes the property relieved from the trust. The forms and varieties of these trusts, which are termed 'ex maleficio' or 'ex delicto,' are practically without limit. The principle is applied whenever it is necessary for the obtaining of complete justice, although the law may also give the remedy of damages against the wrongdoer." Pom. Eq. Jur. 1053. A confidential relation is not necessary to establish such trust, and there is no good reason why the owner of property taken and converted by one who has no right to its possession should be less favorably situated in a court of equity, in respect to his remedy, (at least for the purpose of "recompense or indemnity,") than one who by an abuse of trust has been injured by the wrongful act of a trustee to whom the possession of trust property has been confided. "The beautiful character—pervading excellence, if one may say so—of equity jurisprudence," says Judge Story, "is that it varies its adjustments and proportions so as to meet the very form and pressure of each particular case in all its complex habitudes." The trusts of which we are speaking are not what is known as "technical trusts," and the ground of relief in such cases is, strictly speaking, fraud, and not trust. Equity declares the trust in order that it may lay its hand upon the thing and wrest it from the possession of the wrongdoer. This principle is distinctly recognized by our leading text writers, and it is said by Mr. Bispham (Bisp. Eq. 92) that "equity makes use of the machinery of a trust for the purpose of affording redress in cases of fraud." The principles above stated are illustrated by many decisions to be found in the reports of other states, and as our case may easily be assimilated to those in which money or other property has been stolen and converted, such cases must be recognized as pertinent authority in the present investigation. In Newton v. Porter, 69 N. Y. 133, it was held that the owner of negotiable securities, stolen and afterwards sold by the thief, may follow and claim the proceeds in the hands of the felonious taker or of his assignee with notice; and that this right continues and attaches to any securities or property in which the proceeds are invested, so long as they can be traced and identified. The law, it was said,

"will raise a trust in invitum out of the transaction, in order that the substituted property may be subjected to the purposes of indemnity and recompense." Andrews, J., said that "equity only stops the pursuit when the means of ascertainment fails, or the rights of bona fide purchasers for value, without notice of the trust, have intervened. The relief will be molded and adapted to the circumstances of the cases, so as to protect the rights of the true owner." Lane v. Dighton, Amb. 409; Mansell v. Mansell, 2 P. Wms. 679; Lench v. Lench, 10 Ves. 511; Perry, Trusts, § 829; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258. In Bank v. Barry, 125 Mass. 20, it was held that equity will charge land, paid for in part with the proceeds of stolen property, with a trust in favor of the owner of the property for the amount so used. In Humphreys v. Butler, 51 Ark. 351, 11 S. W. Rep. 479, the defendant, in paying for a house and lot purchased by him for $400, wrongfully used $149.52 belonging to the plaintiff, and of which he had obtained possession without her authority, knowledge, or consent. The court declared the defendant a trustee to the extent of the money of the plaintiff used by him, and charged the same upon the property, and in default of its payment by a certain time decreed that the same be sold to satisfy the said lien. These and other authorities that could be cited abundantly sustain the intimation of Chief Justice Ruffin, to which we have referred, and we are therefore of the opinion that the money fraudulently obtained of the plaintiff may be followed into the land described in the complaint, and that the judgment of his honor should be so modified as to declare it to be a charge upon the same. Court of Appeals of New York. 1884.

Appeal from surrogate court, Kings county.

The facts of the case are stated in the opinion of the court.

Geo. H. Starr and Samuel D. Morris, for appellants. William N. Dykman, for respondents.

FINCH, J. The testatrix gave to three persons, who were her lawyer, her doctor and her priest, absolutely, but as joint tenants, the bulk of her estate. Practically she disinherited her relatives in favor of strangers, who had no claim upon her bounty, except such as originated in their professional characters, and the confidence and friendship thus engendered. For this reason probate of the will was resisted. While the testatrix was shown to have been superstitious, whimsical, blindly devoted to her church and its ecclesiastics, habitually under the influence of stimulants, and seriously dependent upon the advice of those who became her residuary legatees, it is yet certain that there was no want of testamentary capacity. But although the attack failed upon that ground, the charge of undue influence was somewhat supported by the evidence relating to her character and surroundings, which made possible and tended to render probable the existence of an outside power capable of moulding her wishes to its own. The exigency demanded of the proponents some adequate and reasonable explanation of a diversion of the estate to strangers holding the power and influence derived from confidential relations, consistent with the free action and untrammelled exercise of the testamentary intention. The explanation came. A letter of instruction, addressed to the residuary legatees, contemporaneous with the will, and dictating the purpose as well as explaining the reason of the absolute legacy, was produced upon the hearing. These written instructions demonstrated that the residuary clause was not intended by the testatrix to pass to the legatees any beneficial interest. The absolute devise, on its face difficult of explanation except upon a theory of undue influence, thereby lost its suspicious character and put the legatees in more of a disinterested attitude. It appeared that the testatrix did not at all desire or intend to bestow her estate upon those to whom she gave it; that her real intention was to devote it to certain charitable purposes; that these, she was advised, could not effectively be accomplished by her will, except through an absolute devise to individuals, in whose honorable action she could confide; and, therefore, and for that reason, and to effect that ulterior purpose, she gave her estate in form to the professional friends, not meaning any beneficial legacy to them or for their use. With this development of the defense the attack took on a new phase. The heirs at law and next of kin began an action in equity to set aside and annul the residuary devise and bequest, or to establish a trust, which, failing as to the intended beneficiaries, should result to those who would otherwise have taken by descent or distribution. Both cases are now before us, and it is convenient to consider them together, since our conclusion in one may tend seriously to affect the result in the other.

The proof is uncontradicted that the testatrix made the residuary devise and bequest in its absolute and unconditional form in reliance upon a promise of the legatees to apply the fund faithfully and honorably to the charitable uses dictated in the letter of instructions. It does not disprove this statement to assert that no express promise to that effect was made, or that it was the pledge of Judge McCue alone. One of the legatees, Father McGuire, is dead, and the title is in the two survivors, and it is with them only that we need to deal. The trial judge did, indeed, find as a fact that Dr. Dudley did not know until after testatrix's death that the unattested letter of instructions existed, but he certainly did know before the will was made the character of the intended disposition; that he was selected as one of the executors; that the relatives by blood were to take but a trifle, and that the bulk of the estate was to be applied to charitable purposes by the executors; and with this knowledge he accepted the proposed trust. The trial judge further finds that Judge McCue "made no promise to obtain the bequest or devise and practiced no fraud." This finding is assailed, but unsuccessfully so far as it frees the legatees from a charge of actual fraud. In that respect we agree that there was no evil or selfish intention on their part. But the finding that Judge McCue "made no promise to obtain the bequest or devise" cannot be sustained. If anything is rendered certain by the evidence it is that the testatrix made the absolute devise and bequest upon the suggestion of a necessity therefor by Judge McCue, and upon the understanding that he and his associates would faithfully and honorably carry out her expressed intentions. If we say that McCue made no such promise, that he came under no such honorable obligation, then we must say that the testatrix was misled into a false belief, upon which, as true, she unmistakably acted. For it is not possible to doubt that if the legatees had said—we will not promise; we will do as we please; we will not be even honorably bound not to take this money for ourselves—the absolute bequest would never have been made. It matters little that McCue did not make in words a formal and express promise. Everything that he said and everything that he did was full of that interpretation. When the testatrix was told that the legal effect of the will was such that the legatees could divert the fund to their own use, which was a statement of their power, she was told also that she would only have their honor and conscience on which to rely, and answered that she could trust them; which was an assertion of their duty. Where in such case the legatee, even by silent acquiescence, encourages the testatrix to make a bequest to him to be by him applied for the benefit of others, it has all the force and effect of an express promise. Wallgrave v. Tebbs, 2 Kay & J. 321; Schultz's Appeal, 80 Pa. St. 405. If he does not mean to act in accord with the declared expectation which underlies and induces the devise, he is bound to say so, for his silent acquiescence is otherwise a fraud. Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204.

So far then as McCue is concerned he stands in the attitude of having procured and induced the testatrix to make a devise or bequest to himself and his associates, by asserting its necessity and promising faithfully to carry out the charitable purposes for which it was made, and whether his associates knew or promised, or did not, makes no difference where the devise is to them as joint tenants, and all must get their rights through the result accomplished by one. Rowbotham v. Dunnett, 8 Ch. Div. 430; Hooker v. Oxford, 33 Mich. 453; Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 206. If, therefore, in her letter of instructions, the testatrix had named some certain and definite beneficiary, capable of taking the provision intended, the law would fasten upon the legatee a trust for such beneficiary and enforce it, if needed, on the ground of fraud. Equity acts in such case not because of a trust declared by the testator, but because of the fraud of the legatee. For him not to carry out the promise by which alone he procured the devise and bequest, is to perpetrate a fraud upon the devisor which equity will not endure. The authorities on this point are numerous. Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296; Oldham v. Litchford, 2 Freem. 284; Reech v. Kennegal, 1 Ves. Sr. 124; Podmore v. Gunning, 5 Sim. 485; Muckleston v. Brown, 6 Ves. 52; Hoge v. Hoge, 1 Watts, 163; McKee v. Jones, 6 Pa. St. 425; Dowd v. Tucker, 41 Conn. 197; Hooker v. Oxford, 33 Mich. 454; Williams v. Vreeland, 32 N. J. Eq. 135. The circumstances in these cases were varied and sometimes peculiar, but all of them either recognize or enforce the general doctrine. It has been twice applied in our own state. Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige, 147; Williams v. Fitch, 18

N. Y. 546. In the last of these cases the making of a bequest to the plaintiff was prevented by an agreement of the father, who was next of kin, to hold in trust for the plaintiff; and the English cases were cited with approval and the trust enforced. All along the line of discussion it was steadily claimed that a plain and unambiguous devise in a will could not be modified or cut down by extrinsic matter lying in parol, or unattested papers, and that the statute of frauds and that of wills excluded the evidence; and all along the line it was steadily answered that the devise was untouched, that it was not at all modified, that the property passed under it, but the law dealt with the holder for his fraud, and out of the facts raised a trust, ex maleficio, instead of resting upon one as created by the testator. The character of the fraud which justifies the equitable interference is well described in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 40. It was said to consist "in the attempt to take advantage of that which has been done in performance or upon the faith of the agreement while repudiating its obligation under cover of the statute."

Yet that is not the position of the defendants here. By their answer they deny any promise, whatever, made by them; any trust accompanying the request; any agreement to hold for the benefit of others; and insist that the property is theirs "for their own use and disposal."

Yet this is evidently intended merely as an assertion of what they insist is their legal position, and is not meant as a repudiation of their promise or its honorable obligation, and no beneficiary claiming any such violation of duty, or even as threatened or intended, is before us.

But it may happen, as it does happen here, that all of the charitable uses enjoined are for the benefit of those incapable of taking, or of a character in direct violation of the law of the state. What then becomes the duty of a court of equity? A fraud remains, except that it takes on graver proportions, and becomes more certain and inevitable. The agreement which induced the absolute device, and the fraud of a beneficial holding secured by a contrary promise, still confront us. And what is worse, it does not need that the absolute legatees repudiate their promise, for if ever so honorably willing to perform it, they cannot do so without setting at defiance and secretly evading the law and general policy of the state. The alternative is plain, and offers no chance of escape. If the legatees repudiate their obligations, that is a fraud upon the dead woman, who acted upon the faith of their promise. If they are willing to perform they cannot perform, except by a fraud upon the law to which they and the testatrix are equally parties.

In such a case the fraud remains and exists, identical in its character as to the testatrix, but an injury to the heir at law and next of kin instead of an identified and capable beneficiary. And it becomes not only a fraud against them, but a fraud upon the law, since it is a declared and admitted effort to accomplish by a secret trust what could not on the face of the will be done at all. If, on the ground of fraud, equity, as it has often done, and will always do, fastens a trust ex maleficio upon the fraudulent legatee or devisee for the protection of a named and definite beneficiary, no reason can be given why it should not do the same thing when the fraud attempted assumes a more serious character, because aimed at an evasion of the law, and seeking the shelter of unauthorized purposes. In such event, if equity withholds its power, one of two things is accomplished; either the legatee holds the estate beneficially, which is a fraud upon the testatrix and the intended objects of her bounty, or the fund is devoted to unauthorized purposes, in fraud of the law, and of the heirs and next of kin. If a trust ex maleficio may be fastened upon the property in the hands of the fraudulent legatee in the one case, why not also in the other? If in the one the fraud grows out of a refusal to perform, which would be the voluntary act of the legatee repudiating his promise, and so an actual fraud; in the other it grows out of the impossibility of performance, except in defiance of the public law, which is legally a fraud. In neither event can the legatee honestly hold. In both, either fraud triumphs, or equity defeats it through the operation of a trust, and protects those justly entitled. And so are the cases. In Jones v. Badley, L. R. 3 Eq. Cas. 635, the suit was by the co-heiresses and next of kin to make the defendants trustees for them, on the ground that a devise made to them of a residue absolute on its face was, in fact, for charitable purposes in violation of the mortmain act, and made on the faith of an agreement by the legatees that they would make such application. One of them was the confidential medical adviser of the testatrix; the devise to the two was in joint tenancy; no purposed or intentional dishonesty was charged against them; instead of wholly repudiating their duty, they alleged in their answer a design to carry out the charitable purposes; and yet the court did not hesitate on the ground of fraud to fasten a trust upon the property in their hands for the benefit of the heir and next of kin. Wallgrave v. Tebbs, 2 Kay & J. 313. 321, and Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 207, were cited with approval. The latter case was a bill filed by the next of kin, alleging that the absolute devise of a residue was upon a secret trust either for charitable or illegal purposes. The court so held as to the proceeds of the freehold and leasehold estates, and because the dispositions "could not by law take effect," declared the devisees trustees for the heir and next of kin. In Muckleston v. Brown, 6 Ves. 63, 65, Lord Eldon intimated that where the devisees took under an agreement to hold upon such trusts as the testator should declare, but he omitted to declare any, there would be a trust to the heir which equity would decree; and added, as to a case of evasion of the statute, the pointed inquiry: "Is the court to feel for individuals, and not to feel for the whole of its own system, and compel a discovery of frauds that go to the root of its whole system?" In Schultz's Appeal, 80 Pa. St. 405, the plaintiff failed solely for want of proof of an agreement by the legatee inducing the devise; and the same difficulty existed in Rowbotham v. Dunnett, 8 Ch. Div. 430; and as to three of the four tenants in common in Tee v. Ferris, 2 Kay & J. 367; but all confirm the general doctrine asserted.

It is needed now that we consider the character of the charitable uses upon which these legatees agreed to hold the residuary estate. The testatrix began her letter of instructions by saying: "I am desirous of accomplishing certain purposes, some of which at least cannot be legally carried out by express provisions of my will; and, therefore, in order more certainly to effect my purposes I have constituted you such residuary devisees and legatees." The first purpose indicated is to "set apart" the income of $20,000 to the ecclesiastical education of poor young men for the Roman Catholic priesthood. She directed that this provision be made "a permanent one" and that the legatees make such arrangements that after their death the income should continue so to be appropriated. This purpose contemplated and required that the principal of the fund should be held inalienable and without an absolute power of disposition during the three lives of the legatees and for an indefinite period beyond. During this period the legal title to both the real and personal property would remain in the trustees and they pay over the income, and after the death of two the survivor was directed in some undefined manner to provide for the continuance of such income in the future. The plan violated the statute against perpetuities both as to real and personal estate, and the active trust was unlimited in its duration. Schettler v. Smith, 41 N. Y. 334; Adams v. Perry, 43 N. Y. 497; Garvey v. McDevitt, 72 N. Y. 561. What the respondent replies is that "the legatees may hand over the designated sum to an incorporated college" engaged in educating that class of young men. But the testatrix neither authorized nor contemplated any such thing. She chose her trustees for three lives, and no other was to be substituted till the death of the third, and then there might be another will, with an absolute bequest of the $20,000 to three other trustees, all honorable men, acting under a letter of instructions, and so the process goes on in evasion and defiance of the law. If, indeed, the testatrix intended a gift to a college corporation, that could have been done by her will. She could have made the devise or bequest without the risk of depending on some one's honor that the fund would not be diverted to private use, so that, in so far as this devise or bequest was represented to require an absolute devise or bequest to individuals, she was either misled or deceived, or else did not intend a gift to a college corporation. The legatees, therefore, cannot perform their promise as they made it and as the testatrix understood it without violating the law of the state against perpetuities.

The letter of instruction then proceeds: "I desire $3,000 set apart, the income whereof shall be applied to the purchase of shoes for poor children attending the parochial schools of St. Paul's R. C. Church, Brooklyn." This provision offends in the same way with the first as to the duration of the trust with also the difficulty that the beneficiaries are indeterminate. Levy v. Levy, 33 N. Y. 99. Again the respondent answers, both as to this clause and the one following which requires "$3,000 set apart for the St. Vincent de Paul Society connected with St. Paul's Church," that the church is incorporated, "and will receive $6,000 with a request from the residuary legatees to use one-half the income to purchase shoes for poor children attending the parochial school." The request would bind nobody. What the testatrix directed was not a gift to the church, but an application by her own chosen trustees of income to the two specified purposes. And if she intended the disposition now suggested, once more it is true that she could have given $6,000 to the church corporation with a request as to the supply of shoes quite as well as her legatees can do it, and there was no need of the absolute devise and bequest represented to exist.

Then follow these provisions, viz.: "The sum of $3,000 for the benefit of the Home of the Good Shepherd, and the sum of $5,000 for the Little Sisters of the Poor, both in Brooklyn." It is said that these two societies are incorporated, but they may not be entitled to the principal, if the trustees refuse it, for the latter are authorized to "limit the use of said bequests to the income thereof." And again the observation recurs that a bequest to these corporations could easily have been made in the will if that had been understood to be the real intention.

Finally the letter prescribes that any residue of the fund remaining should be applied "in aid" of the charities and purposes named in the will or in the letter, "or in any other charity which you or a majority of you may prefer." The respondent says that just such a provision as this in the body of a will has been upheld. Power v. Cassidy, 79 N. Y.

602. That is not true. On the contrary this court has very recently declined to carry the doctrine of that case beyond its own essential limits, and is not likely to agree that a devise may become the mere equivalent of a general power of attorney. Prichard v. Thompson, 95 N. Y. 76.

All through this letter the duty of the legatees is denominated a "trust," the gifts provided are sometimes called "bequests," and at its close, after charging the legatees to impose upon her beneficiaries "as far as you can" the "obligation" of "the offering of the holy sacrifice of the mass" in her own behalf and that of certain named relatives, she expresses her own sense of the force and character of her letter in the concluding sentence, "I desire to give to these instructions all the force and solemnity of a last will and testament."

This letter of instructions clearly and unmistakably shows the real nature of the transaction. The writer leaves almost nothing to the discretion of the trustees. She selects out her own objects of charity in the main, describes them in detail, fixes the amounts to be given and impresses upon her directions the "solemnity of a last will and testament." It is not at all the case of a devise to one absolutely to be expended at his discretion, but a definite and distinct trust having in view specific purposes and contemplating their precise performance.

If we construed this document to mean such dispositions as are now asserted, we should be driven to the inevitable inference that every one of them could have been easily, and safely, and perfectly made in the will itself, and that when told to the contrary by Judge McCue the testatrix was told what was utterly untrue, and what a jury might easily believe was known to be untrue, and so that the testatrix was led, by deception and fraud, to incur the danger and peril of an absolute devise and bequest—a conclusion which would destroy the will as the product of fraud. We do not believe that. Justice to two honorable men, of character and standing, forbids any such theory. Nothing about the case calls upon us for a conclusion so harsh and needless. On the contrary, we think Judge McCue told the truth to the testatrix, and that truth was that she could not tie up her estate in the hands of individuals perpetually, they distributing only the income, without violating the law of the state, and that she must either give up the purpose or depend for its accomplishment upon an absolute devise accompanied by a secret trust.

We have thus an important question squarely presented. If equity will not touch this devise by putting a trust for the heirs at law and next of kin upon the fund in the hands of these legatees, the road to an evasion of our statutes, and to the temptations of necessity or greed, will be left wide open. While in such cases it has been well said that the court should act with caution and only upon the clearest proof of the fraud (Collins v. Hope, 20 Ohio, 501), yet when, as here, the facts are proved beyond reasonable question, we ought not to hesitate. The testatrix did intend an absolute devise to these legatees on the face of the will; but she did not intend that they should have the resultant beneficial interest, and relied upon their promise to carry its fruits elsewhere. They do not refuse to perform. Although they deny the promise, it is quite possible that they mean to keep it. We are not authorized to say or suspect that they will not, but if they do, they must inevitably carry out a planned and purposed evasion of our statutes against perpetuities.

It is said, however, and that brings us to the decisive point in the case; that the English authorities turned upon the fact that because of the statutes of mortmain the lands devised upon an honorable promise by the absolute devisee to dispense them in charity, could not by any process or in any mode be carried to that destination without violating the law, while in this case the charity is not prohibited, but only certain modes of its operation. Let us test this suggestion.

The statutes of mortmain were numerous, and followed each other in a succession as rapid as the devices and evasions of the ecclesiastics which they were framed to overthrow, until by the Act 9 Geo. II. c. 36, it was ordained that no lands or tenements, or money to be laid out thereon, should be given for or charged with any charitable uses whatsoever, unless by deed intended, executed in the presence of two witnesses and made at least one year before the death of the party and registered in a prescribed manner. While under this statute a devise of land was forbidden to charitable uses, it could be so devoted by a deed inter vivos, and in each of the cases we have cited, the absolute devisee, acting as owner, could by indenture have transferred to charity the land he had taken as devisee. But that did not serve to ward off a trust ex maleficio in any single instance. The result was plainly apparent that the property of the testator, by the artifice of an absolute devise coupled with a secret agreement, had been carried to a charity in defiance of the public law and in fraud of the mortmain acts. These acts did not, therefore, absolutely and totally forbid gifts of land to charitable uses. They put their prohibition not on the gift, but on the manner of it. They forbade it by will or devise. It is a similar prohibition upon the manner of gifts or transfers which our law imposes. While it is true, as was said at special term in the very able opinion contained in the record, that our statute does not forbid charitable devises and bequests, it does forbid expressly and imperatively a certain manner of making them. Gifts or transfers made in that manner are prohibited and made void. The principal legatee in this case knew it, and it was distinctly planned between him and the testatrix that her understood and declared purpose, which could not be lawfully carried out by a devise on the face of the will, should be effected by an absolute devise coupled with his honorable obligation to hold and appropriate the property to forbidden uses. An evasion of the law was the very occasion and object of the absolute devise. Without that it could not have been suggested without a fraud upon the testatrix, for if there was no need of it, if no statute was to be avoided or flanked, the very suggestion of an absolute devise was fraudulent.

The question here is the character of the legatees' agreement and precisely that and nothing else must serve as a test. They agreed for three lives, under the pretense of ownership, to dole out the income of this fund to indeterminate persons of their selection; at the end of three lives in some manner to continue that process, making it permanent; and to dispense a possible surplus to any charities they might choose. That precise agreement, the one which they made, on the faith of which the testatrix acted, they must honorably and explicitly carry out or else they have defrauded her; and if they do carry it out as they agreed and as she understood it, they tie the property up for three lives and an uncertain period beyond, and so violate and defy the law.

We are not ready to concede that our statute against perpetuities is any the less sacred than the English acts of mortmain, or may be evaded with impunity. It may possibly be that the evils of such evasion are greater in the one case than in the other, but that will not justify us in shutting our eyes to the process, or holding that equity stands helpless in presence of the fraud. The learned presiding judge at the general term, while affirming this judgment formally that it might more swiftly come to our bar, sent with it a very wise and prudent caution. He said: "It seems clear to us that the law ought not to encourage arrangements for the disposition of property by testators, such as this case discloses." In Wallgrave v. Tebbs, supra, the vice-chancellor said that "the duty of a devisee under the circumstances stated was to throw up the property." Any devise or bequest of this character is dangerous and indefensible. It exposes testators to the suggestion of unnecessary difficulties as inducements to the artifice of an absolute devise concealing an illegal trust. It exposes the devisee to temptation and even when he acts honestly, to severe and unrelenting criticism. It subserves no good or useful purpose. If we sustain it we admit that any statute may be thus evaded, and that equity cannot redress the wrong.

We are not satisfied that the will was made through undue influence and therefore affirm the judgment of the general term which affirmed the decree of the surrogate, with costs.

But in the equity action we reverse the judgment of the general term and of the special term, with costs of both parties on the appeal to this court, payable out of the fund, and order a new trial.

All concur as to the first appeal. All concur as to the second, except RAPAPORT, J., not voting.

Judgments accordingly.

CURDY v. BERTON. (No. 11,949.)

(21 Pac. 858, 79 Cal. 420.)

Supreme Court of California. June 4, 1889.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; JOHN HUNT, Judge.

Action by Frank Curdy against G. A. Berton, executor of Francis Berton, deceased, to declare a trust, and for an accounting. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

McFARLAND, J. Madeline Curdy died February 9, 1877, in Alameda county, Cal. She left a will duly executed, in which, after bequests to several persons, including the plaintiff herein, there occurs the following: "I give in trust to Francis Berton, now Swiss consul in San Francisco, all the moneys I possess in France, and principally my share of the Italian rentes deposited in the banking-house of Messrs. Hentsch, Lutscher & Co., of Paris, to be distributed according to the private instructions I give him." Berton was present when the will was made, and wrote it for the testatrix at her request; and at the time of the making of the will she verbally instructed him to distribute said property or its proceeds to certain relations and others in France, other than the plaintiff herein, and gave him an order for said property. The facts in proof show that he at least impliedly agreed to accept the trust. After her death, and before the commencement of this action, said Berton faithfully distributed said property in accordance with the said instructions of said testatrix. This action is brought by plaintiff, a brother of the deceased, and one of her heirs-at-law, to have it decreed that Berton held the legal title to said property in trust for the heirs of said deceased, for an accounting, and for the payment to him of his proportionate share of said property, with interest, profits, etc. Francis Berton died during the pendency of the action, and his executor, George A. Berton, was substituted as defendant. The court gave judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a new trial.

Upon the main point in the case the position of appellant is, in brief, that, as the statute law of this state requires a will to be in writing, therefore, "where a testator devises property in trust to be applied to such uses as the testator has verbally specified to the devisee, the trust attempted to be created by parol fails, and the devisee takes the property in trust for the heirs of the testator." The contention of respondent is, in brief, that, independent of the statute of wills, where a testator bequeaths property in trust to a legatee without specifying in the will the purposes of the trust, and at the same time communicates those purposes to the legatee orally, or by unattested writings, and the legatee, either expressly or by silent acquiescence, promises to perform the trust, and the trust itself is not unlawful, there a court of equity will raise a constructive trust in favor of the beneficiaries intended by the testator, and will charge the legatee as a constructive trustee for them, upon the ground that the legatee will not be countenanced in perpetrating a fraud by encouraging the testator to make a bequest which would not otherwise have been made, and then refusing to execute his promise. We think that respondent's view of the law, as above stated, is correct. There are some cases which support the proposition of appellant, notably, the case of Olliffe v. Wells, 130 Mass. 221; but the weight of authority and the better reason are the other way.

Obviously, the clear intention of the testatrix, as expressed in the written will, was that the property in question should not go to plaintiff. He, however, says, in effect: "True, the property was not to come to me. It was given to Berton upon the understanding, between him and the testatrix, that it was to go to the benefit of certain other persons; but, as they cannot establish their rights as beneficiaries, according to the statute of wills, Berton must be held to be my trustee, against the intention of the testatrix. I stand upon what I claim to be the dry law." Evidently, in a doubtful case, no just impulse would move a court to lean towards a proposition involving such consequences; and, as the question is an open one in this state, we are at liberty to follow those authorities, and that line of reasoning which appear to us to be most in consonance with the true principles of equity and justice.

We find in the Case of O'Hara, 95 N. Y. 403, a very full statement of the considerations which, in our opinion ought to govern the decision of the case at bar. In that case the testatrix, by her will, practically disinherited her relations in favor of strangers, giving the bulk of her estate to three legatees, who were her lawyer, her doctor, and her priest. The will was attacked by the heirs, on the ground of want of testamentary capacity and undue influence. As there was considerable evidence to support these charges, the legatees finally, to establish some reasonable explanation of a diversion of the estate to strangers having influence from confidential relations, showed that they were not to have any beneficial interest in the estate, but were to devote it entirely to certain charitable uses, according to instructions given them by the testatrix at the time the will was made. It appeared, however, that these charitable uses were in direct violation of the statute law of the state. The heirs at law then began an action in equity to establish a trust, which, failing as to the intended beneficiaries on account of illegality, should result to them. The legatees then, although intending to carry out the wishes of the testatrix, stood upon their rights under the terms of the will, which upon its face gave them the property absolutely; denied that they had accepted any trust, or that any could be proven by extrinsic matter lying outside the will; and insisted that the property was theirs absolutely. The question thus presented was, in substance, the one presented here. The only difference is that in the O'Hara Case the instructions were in writing, while in the case at bar they were oral. But neither in the argument of counsel, nor in the opinion of the court, was there any distinction made between written and oral instructions or promises. The principles announced applied equally to both. There was no claim that the letter of instructions came within the rule that an extraneous paper may be incorporated into a validly executed will by a direct reference to it in the will itself. There was no reference whatever in the will to the letter. The court in the O'Hara Case, after stating that "the proof is uncontradicted that the testatrix made the residuary devise and bequest in its absolute and unconditional form in reliance upon a promise of the legatees to apply the fund faithfully and honorably to the charitable uses dictated in the letter of instructions," proceeds to discuss the question whether or not one of the legatees, McCue, expressly promised to accept the trust. After reviewing the evidence (which was somewhat contradictory) on that point, the court says; "Where, in such case, the legatee, even by silent acquiescence, encourages the testatrix to make a bequest to him, to be applied by him to the benefit of others, it has all the force and effect of an express promise. Wallgrave v. Tebbs, 2 Kay & J. 321; Schultz' Appeal, 80 Pa. St. 405. If he does not mean to act in accord with the declared expectation which underlies and induces the devise, he is bound to say so, for his silent acquiescence is otherwise a fraud. Russell v. Jackson, 10 Hare, 204." The court then proceeds to state the principles which should determine the main question under discussion, as follows: "If, therefore, in her letter of instruction the testatrix had named some certain and definite beneficiary, capable of taking the provision intended, the law would fasten upon the legatee a trust for such beneficiary, and enforce it, if needed, on the ground of fraud. Equity acts, in such case, not because of a trust declared by the testator, but because of the fraud of the legatee. For him not to carry out the promise by which alone he procured the devise and bequest is to perpetrate a fraud upon the deviser, which equity will not endure. The authorities on this point are numerous." (Here follows a long list of cases.) "The circumstances in these cases were varied and sometimes peculiar, but all of them either recognize or enforce the general doctrine. It has been twice applied in our own state. Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige, 147; Williams v. Fitch, 18 N. Y. 546. In the last of these cases the making of a bequest to the plaintiff was prevented by an agreement of the father, who was next of kin, to hold in trust for the plaintiff; and the English cases were cited with approval, and the trust enforced. All along the line of discussion it was steadily claimed that a plain and unambiguous devise in a will could not be modified or cut down by extrinsic matter lying in parol, or unattested papers, and that the statute of frauds and that of wills excluded the evidence; and all along the line it was steadily answered that the devise was untouched; that it was not at all modified; that the property passed under it, but the law dealt with the holder for his fraud, and out of the facts raised a trust ex maleficio, instead of resting upon one as created by the testator. The character of the fraud which justifies the equitable interference is well described in Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 40. It was said to consist 'in the attempt to take advantage of that which has been done in performance or upon the faith of the agreement, while repudiating its obligation under cover of the statute.' The other parts of the opinion discuss the question whether, as the charitable uses could not be enforced, because forbidden by the statute, the legatees could be held as trustees for the heirs, but that question does not arise in the case at bar.

We have thus referred at length to the O'Hara Case because it contains a lucid statement of the principles which apply to the case at bar, and for the additional reason that in the opinion of the court and the briefs of counsel nearly all the authorities bearing upon the question are cited. We also refer especially to the case of Williams v. Vreeland, 32 N. J. Eq. 135, which declares the doctrine above stated; and in the notes to which are collated extracts from about 40 different cases, all of which are confirmatory of said doctrine. See, also, Hooker v. Axford, 33 Mich. 453; In re Fleetwood, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 594; In re Boyes, L. R. 26 Ch. Div. 531; and Riordan v. Banon, 10 Ir. Eq. 469. The cases cited will show that it is immaterial whether the instructions given by a testator are oral or in writing. Indeed, in the opinion of the court in the O'Hara Case, (above quoted,) where the phrase "lying in parol, or unattested papers" is employed, the word "parol" is evidently used in its usual meaning, as synonymous with "verbal" or "oral," and not in its broader meaning of "not under seal." The California cases of De Laurencel v. De Boom, 48 Cal. 581; Estate of Shillaber, 74 Cal. 144, 15 Pac. Rep. 453; and Estate of Brooks, 54 Cal. 475,—while in harmony with the principles above stated,—are not directly to the point involved in the case at bar. Our conclusion is that the court below correctly decided that Francis Berton, deceased, properly distributed the property in France, in accordance with the instructions given him by the testatrix when the will was made, and which instructions he, at that time, agreed to carry out. Of course, the case must be distinguished from one where a testator, intending to give certain property directly to a certain person, for that person's sole benefit, fails to designate in the will either the property or the person. In such a case no question of trust could arise. These views make it unnecessary to determine the other two points made by respondent: (1) That the order for the property in France, given by the testatrix to Berton at the time the will was made, constituted a transfer of the property in presenti; and (2) that the action was barred by the statute of limitations. The judgment and order are affirmed.

In re WEALL.
ANDREWS v. WEALL.

Supreme Court of Judicature. July 12, 13, 20,

Benjamin Weall, who died in 1868, bequeathed his residuary personal estate, including leaseholds, to John Weall the elder, William Weall the elder, and William Lightfoot, upon trust thereout to raise certain sums, and as to the ultimate residue upon trust to pay the income thereof to Margaret Andrews (therein called Margaret Weall) during her life and after her death upon the trusts therein mentioned. And the testator devised the residue of his real estate to the same trustees upon trust (subject to certain payments) to pay the residue of the rents and profits to Margaret Andrews during her life, and after her decease upon the trusts therein mentioned. William Weall the elder died in 1874, and John Weall the elder died in 1879; and the defendants William Weall and John Weall were appointed trustees in their places. The defendants William Weall and John Weall and William Lightfoot for several years prior to 1884 employed Sydney F. Weall as solicitor to the estate and to collect the rents, allowing him a commission of 5 per cent. on the rents. They also paid, or allowed him to retain out of the rents, certain sums of money for costs, part of which, as Margaret Andrews alleged, and as the court held on the evidence were unnecessary, and part ought to have been charged to corpus and not to income. William Lightfoot died in 1886.

Margaret Andrews brought this action against the defendants William Weall and John Weall and against the executors of W. Lightfoot claiming that the defendants William Weall and John Weall and the estate of William Lightfoot were jointly and severally liable to make good to her the losses she had incurred as aforesaid; and claiming all necessary accounts as to the estate of the testator and the costs of the action.

The principal defense was that the plaintiff was aware of and assented to what was done, and that some of the costs were incurred by her desire.

This was the trial of the action.

Warmington, Q. C., and MacSwinney, for plaintiff. Barber, Q. C., and Bardswell, for defendants.

Soames, Edwards & Jones, for plaintiff. E. W. Reeves, for defendant Sedguirck & Co.

KEKWICH, J. The only point argued on the further consideration of the case and now requiring decision is by whom the costs of the action are to be borne. The short result of the proceedings is that none of the costs which are mentioned in the statement of claim and which gave rise to the litigation are payable out of income as distinguished from corpus, and that, almost precisely to the extent contended for by the plaintiff, they are not chargeable against the trust estate at all. Therefore, speaking generally, the plaintiff has succeeded, and the defendants, the present trustees and representatives of a deceased trustee, have failed in the action, and the questions occur, why is not the plaintiff entitled to her costs, and why should the defendants not be held liable to pay them?

On behalf of the defendants it was argued by Mr. Barber with his accustomed force that they had been proved to be in the wrong only as regards matters of account, and that trustees do not pay costs occasioned by errors in accounts, and, indeed, are allowed them out of the trust estate unless misconduct has been proved; and he relied on the cases of Turner v. Hancock, 20 Ch. Div. 303, and Stott v. Milne, 25 Ch. Div. 710. Those cases, of course, are binding on me and must be followed; but I venture to add that in my judgment they express in apt language what has ever been the rule of the court. They express what is termed the contract between trustee and cestui que trust, and also that tenderness which the court is anxious to exhibit towards trustees honestly exercising discretion in discharge of their duties, often difficult and still more often thankless.

This, however, does not dispose of the case before me. There is another and somewhat different question which must all the more be considered because, as pointed out by Mr. Warmington in reply, this is not really an action for administration of a trust, but it was commenced and brought to trial for the purpose of challenging the claim of the trustees to charge particular items of expenditure against the trust estate.

Consider for a moment the position of that special agent called a trustee as regards the employment of subagents. He certainly has the right to appoint them, if and so far as the work of the trust reasonably requires; for instance, he may appoint a broker to make or realize investments, or a solicitor to do legal business, and the power of employment involves that of remuneration at the cost of the trust estate. The limit of the power of employment is, as pointed out in the well-known case of Speight v. Gaunt, 22 Ch. Div. 727, 9 App. Cas. 1, reasonableness, and whether there happens to be a standard to which appeal can be made by taxation or otherwise or not, reasonableness must also, I think, be the limit of the power of remuneration. A trustee is bound to exercise discretion in the choice of his agents, but so long as he selects persons properly qualified he cannot be made responsible for their intelligence or their honesty. He does not in any sense guaranty the performance of their duties. It does not, however, follow that he can intrust his agents with any duties which they are willing to undertake, or pay them or agree to pay them any remuneration which they see fit to demand. The trustee must consider these matters for himself, and the court would be disposed to support any conclusion at which he arrives, however erroneous, provided it really is his conclusion,—that is, the outcome of such consideration as might reasonably be expected to be given to a like matter by a man of ordinary prudence guided by such rules and arguments as generally guide such a man in his own affairs. If trustees fail to exercise their discretion, or purporting to exercise it do so in such a manner that the court is bound to infer that they have not done so honestly, their costs of any proceedings challenging their accounts are taken out of the rules laid down in Turner v. Hancock, 20 Ch. Div. 303, and Stott v. Milne, 25 Ch. Div. 710; and the court is at liberty, and under certain circumstances may be bound, for the protection of cestuis que trustent, to disallow the trustees' costs, or even make them pay those of others.

One other general remark before applying these principles to the particular case. Trustees deserve and receive the upmost consideration at the hands of the court. They gratuitously undertake duties for the benefit of others, and as regards costs and otherwise they are entitled to generous treatment. But cestuis que trustent also have their rights,—their claim to consideration. The trust property is theirs, managed for their benefit, and on the trial of a question between them and their trustees, by whom costs are to be borne, they may fairly require something more to be proved than absence of dishonesty. They must not complain of mistakes or errors in judgment, but reasonable prudence is not too much for them to require, and by reasonable prudence I mean that which is defined in the judgment in the case of Speight v. Gaunt, 22 Ch. Div. 727, 9 App. Cas. 1, already mentioned.

I have intended throughout the above remarks to follow the principles of that case and of subsequent cases commenting on it. A decision of the house of lords requires no sanction, but the language used by other judges in adopting and expounding that particular decision has assisted to make it a most instructive and useful statement of the extent and limit of trustees' authority and consequent liability. Now, to apply these principles to the case in hand. Of the three trustees of Benjamin Weall's will in office during the period of the transactions to which this litigation relates John Weall was undoubtedly the foremost. He was the acting trustee, and by him William Weall, who, as far as I can see, did nothing, was content to be guided. William Lightfoot, the third trustee (now dead), also did little, but he had views of his own, which, according to the correspondence, he asserted with some vigor. They were peculiar views and open to criticism, but he has not had an opportunity of explaining himself, and I therefore refrain from further comment. Suffice it to say that, as regards the particular matter which gave rise to this action, he certainly did not differ from his colleague John Weall, in the sense of urging the adoption of a course more agreeable to the plaintiff's requirements. These trustees had employed as their solicitor for trust purposes Mr. Sydney F. Weall, and, besides giving him ordinary legal business, they had allowed him to receive the rents of the trust estate and to retain a commission of 5 per cent. for his trouble. This does not commend itself to me, but the plaintiff's claim to be reimbursed this commission was abandoned at the trial, and although it was stipulated that the proper influence, whatever that might be, on the subject of costs should not thereby be lost, yet, not having had an opportunity of fully discussing the matter, I prefer to lay it aside. Observe, however, that this receipt of rents has really been the moving cause of the litigation, for it is clear that, if Sydney F. Weall had not had the means of paying himself the charges objected to, he would never have been paid at all, and this action would not have been necessary. Mr. Sydney F. Weall, without instructions or any sufficient reason, prepared an abstract of the title to the testator's residuary estate, and charged for it nearly £100. To this charge the plaintiff objected. Having read through the correspondence, the position taken by her is plain, as is also the manner in which she was treated by the trustees. She from first to last objected to the charge on principle, and asserted that it must be wholly disallowed. They, on the other hand, never went further than a suggestion that the bill should be taxed, and though perhaps taxation might have solved the difficulty, it would have been one under special order and not such as was suggested or was likely to be assented to by the solicitor. It is due to the defendant John Weall to say that he knew and admitted that the charge was altogether wrong, and my conclusion from the correspondence, without further explanation, is that with but little encouragement he would have taken a bolder course than, unfortunately for himself and his colleagues, he in fact did. I again call attention to the fact that Sydney F. Weall's receipt of rents had enabled him to pay himself, and this placed the trustees in a position of great difficulty.

Failing to obtain redress, the plaintiff commenced this action, and, passing over the statement of claim (in which the facts are stated plainly and with due moderation), I must say a word on the defense. The trustees had claimed to charge the particular costs already mentioned against the plaintiff's income to the exoneration of the corpus of the trust estate. For this there was no justification, but they pleaded the plaintiff's wish to that effect, and that she had acquiesced in their dealings with the income. At the trial they were forced to admit this view to be erroneous, and to account to the plaintiff for income accordingly. They further pleaded that the particular costs had been incurred in compliance with the plaintiff's express desire, of which they were unable to tender any evidence. And, the plaintiff alleging that none of the costs were chargeable against income, but that some were chargeable against corpus, and the rest not chargeable against the trust estate at all, the trustees justified all the costs, including those admitted by John Weall to have been improperly incurred, as properly chargeable against corpus. This question has been investigated in a most complete and satisfactory manner, with the result already noticed. It has been determined that out of £175. 4s. 8d., the total amount of costs, £84. 7s. 8d., or less than 50 per cent., is properly chargeable against corpus, and that, as regards the sum of £90. 17s., there is no charge whatever, or, in other words, that sum has been improperly paid to or allowed to be retained by the solicitor. I am not sure how far the conclusion from this ought to be affected by any offer made on behalf of the plaintiff, but it is worthy of notice that an offer was made which would have given almost exactly this result without the pain and expense of litigation. Why it was declined I do not understand. It would, I think, be an unwarranted departure from the principles which I have endeavored to expound not to make the trustees pay the costs which have been occasioned by their disregard of those principles and their unjustifiable defense. To accede to the argument of counsel for the trustees that I ought not in any event to do more than deprive them of their costs would be to cast on the trust estate an undue burden by reason of litigation which is the direct consequence of the trustees' default. It is right to add that, having gone carefully through the pleadings and the other papers to see whether I could relieve them of any part of the costs as being in respect of matters capable of being brought under the general rules in favor of trustees, I regret to say that I can find no reason for distinction. The trustees seem to me to have been wholly wrong from first to last.

The form of order may require consideration, but, as regards the only point argued, my judgment is that the defendants, the trustees, and the representatives of the deceased trustee must pay the costs of the action, including the costs of the remaindermen who were added as defendants in order to try the liability of the corpus on which the trustees insisted.

HUN v. CARY.

Court of Appeals of New York. 1880.

E. Ellery Anderson, for appellants. Francis C. Barlow, for respondent.

EARL, J. This action was brought by the receiver of the Central Savings Bank of the city of New York against the defendants, who were trustees of the bank, to recover damages which, it is alleged, they caused the bank by their misconduct as such trustees.

The first question to be considered is the measure of fidelity, care and diligence which such trustees owe to such a bank and its depositors. The relation existing between the corporation and its trustees is mainly that of principal and agent, and the relation between the trustees and the depositors is similar to that of trustee and cestui que trust. The trustees are bound to observe the limits placed upon their powers in the charter, and if they transcend such limits and cause damage, they incur liability. If they act fraudulently or do a willful wrong, it is not doubted that they may be held for all the damage they cause to the bank or its depositors. But if they act in good faith within the limits of powers conferred, using proper prudence and diligence, they are not responsible for mere mistakes or errors of judgment. That the trustees of such corporations are bound to use some diligence in the discharge of their duties cannot be disputed. All the authorities hold so. What degree of care and diligence are they bound to exercise? Not the highest degree, not such as a very vigilant or extremely careful person would exercise. If such were required, it would be difficult to find trustees who would incur the responsibility of such trust positions. It would not be proper to answer the question by saying the lowest degree. Few persons would be willing to deposit money in savings banks, or to take stock in corporations, with the understanding that the trustees or directors were bound only to exercise slight care, such as inattentive persons would give to their own business, in the management of the large and important interests committed to their hands. When one deposits money in a savings bank, or takes stock in a corporation, thus divesting himself of the immediate control of his property, he expects and has the right to expect that the trustees or directors who are chosen to take his place in the management and control of his property, will exercise ordinary care and prudence in the trusts committed to them—the same degree of care and prudence that men prompted by self-interest generally exercise in their own affairs. When one voluntarily takes the position of trustee or director of a corporation, good faith, exact justice, and public policy unite in requiring of him such a degree of care and prudence, and it is a gross breach of duty—crassa negligentia—not to bestow them.

It is impossible to give the measure of culpable negligence for all cases, as the degree of care required depends upon the subjects to which it is to be applied. First Nat. Bank v. Ocean Nat. Bank, 60 N. Y. 278. What would be slight neglect in the care of a quantity of iron might be gross neglect in the care of a jewel. What would be slight neglect in the care exercised in the affairs of a turnpike corporation or even of a manufacturing corporation, might be gross neglect in the care exercised in the management of a savings bank intrusted with the savings of a multitude of poor people, depending for its life upon credit and liable to be wrecked by the breath of suspicion. There is a classification of negligence to be found in the books, not always of practical value and yet sometimes serviceable, into slight negligence, gross negligence, and that degree of negligence intermediate the two, attributed to the absence of ordinary care; and the claim on behalf of these trustees is that they can only be held responsible in this action in consequence of gross negligence, according to this classification. If gross negligence be taken according to its ordinary meaning—as something nearly approaching fraud or bad faith—I cannot yield to this claim; and if there are any authorities upholding the claim, I emphatically dissent from them.

It seems to me that it would be a monstrous proposition to hold that trustees, intrusted with the management of the property, interests and business of other people who divest themselves of the management and confide in them, are bound to give only slight care to the duties of their trust, and are liable only in case of gross inattention and negligence; and I have found no authority fully upholding such a proposition. It is true that authorities are found which hold that trustees are liable only for crassa negligentia, which literally means gross negligence; but that phrase has been defined to mean the absence of ordinary care and diligence adequate to the particular case. In Scott v. De Peyster, 1 Edw. 513, 543—a case much cited—the learned vice-chancellor said: "I think the question in all such cases should and must necessarily be, whether they (directors) have omitted that care which men of common prudence take of their own concerns. To require more, would be adopting too rigid a rule and rendering them liable for slight neglect; while to require less, would be relaxing too much the obligation which binds them to vigilance and attention in regard to the interests of those confided to their care, and expose them to liability for gross neglect only—which is very little short of fraud itself." In Spering's Appeal, 71 Pa. St. 11, Judge Sharswood said: "They [directors] can only be regarded as mandataries—persons who have gratuitously undertaken to perform certain duties, and who are therefore bound to apply ordinary skill and diligence, but no more." In Hodges v. New England Screw Co., 1 R.

I. 312, Jenckes, J., said: "The sole question is, whether the directors have or have not bestowed proper diligence. They are liable only for ordinary care; such care as prudent men take in their own affairs." And in the same case, Ames, J., said: "They should not therefore be liable for innocent mistakes, unintentional negligence, honest errors of judgment, but only for willful fraud or neglect, and want of ordinary knowledge and care." The same case came again under consideration in 3 R. I. 9, and Green, C. J., said: "We think a board of directors, acting in good faith and with reasonable care and diligence, who nevertheless fall into a mistake, either as to law or fact, are not liable for the consequences of such mistake." In the case of Liquidators of Western Bank v. Douglas, 11 Sess. Cas. (Scot.) 112, it is said: "Whatever the duties (of directors) are, they must be discharged with fidelity and conscience, and with ordinary and reasonable care. It is not necessary that I should attempt to define where excusable remissness ends and gross negligence begins. That must depend to a large extent on the circumstances. It is enough to say that gross negligence in the performance of such a duty, the want of reasonable and ordinary fidelity and care, will impose liability for loss thereby occasioned." In Charitable Corp. v. Sutton, 2 Atk. 405, Lord Chancellor Hardwicke said, that a person who accepted the office of director of a corporation "is obliged to execute it with fidelity and reasonable diligence," although he acts without compensation. In Litchfield v. White, 3 Sandf. 545, Sandford, J., said: "In general a trustee is bound to manage and employ the trust property for the benefit of the cestui que trust with the care and diligence of a provident owner. Consequently he is liable for every loss sustained by reason of his negligence, want of caution or mistake, as well as positive misconduct."

In Spering's Appeal, Judge Sharswood said that directors "are not liable for mistakes of judgment, even though they may be so gross as to appear to us absurd and ridiculous, provided they were honest, and provided they are fairly within the scope of the powers and discretion confided to the managing body." As I understand this language, I cannot assent to it as properly defining to any extent the nature of a director's responsibility. Like a mandatary, to whom he has been likened, he is bound not only to exercise proper care and diligence, but ordinary skill and judgment. As he is bound to exercise ordinary skill and judgment, he cannot set up that he did not possess them. When damage is caused by his want of judgment, he cannot excuse himself by alleging his gross ignorance. One who voluntarily takes the position of director, and invites confidence in that relation, undertakes, like a mandatary, with those whom he represents or for whom he acts, that he possesses at least ordinary knowledge and skill, and that he will bring them to bear in the discharge of his duties. Story, Bailm. § 182. Such is the rule applicable to public officers, to professional men and to mechanics, and such is the rule which must be applicable to every person who undertakes to act for another in a situation or employment requiring skill and knowledge; and it matters not that the service is to be rendered gratuitously. These defendants voluntarily took the position of trustees of the bank. They invited depositors to confide to them their savings, and to intrust the safe-keeping and management of them to their skill and prudence. They undertook not only that they would discharge their duties with proper care, but that they would exercise the ordinary skill and judgment requisite for the discharge of their delicate trust.

Enough has now been said to show what measure of diligence, skill, and prudence the law exacts from managers and directors of corporations; and we are now prepared to examine the facts of this case, for the purpose of seeing if these trustees fell short of this measure in the matters alleged in the complaint.

This bank was incorporated by the act chapter 467 of the Laws of 1867, and it commenced business in the spring of that year, in a hired building on the east side of Third avenue, in the city of New York. It remained there for several years, and then removed to the west side of the avenue, between Forty-Fifth and Forty-Sixth streets, where it occupied hired rooms until near the time of its failure in the fall of 1875. During the whole time the deposits averaged only about $70,000. In 1867, the income of the bank was $942.12, and the expenses, including amounts paid for safe, fixtures, charter, current expenses and interest to depositors, were $5,571.34. In 1868, the income was $5,471.43, and the expenses including interest to depositors, $5,719.43. In 1869, the income was $3,918.27, and the expenses and interest paid, $5,346.05. In 1870 the income was $5,784.09, and expenses and interest, $7,040.22. In 1871 the income was $13,551.14; which included a bonus of $4,000, or $6,000 obtained upon the purchase of a mortgage of $40,000, which mortgage was again sold in 1874 at a discount of $2,000, and the expenses, including interest paid, were $9,124.05. In 1872 the income was $5,100.51, and the expenses, including interest paid, were $7,212.49. Down to the 1st day of January, 1873, therefore, the total expenses, including interest paid, were $5,046 more than the income. To this sum should be added $2,000, deducted on the sale of the large mortgage in 1874, which was purchased at the large discount in 1871, as above mentioned, and yet entered in the assets at its face. From this apparent deficiency should be deducted the value of the safe and furniture of the bank, from which the receiver subsequently realized $500. At the same date the amount due to over one thousand depositors was about $70,000, and the assets of the bank consisted of about $13,000 in cash and the balance mostly of mortgages upon real estate.

While the bank was in this condition, with a lease of the rooms then occupied by it expiring May 1, 1874, the project of purchasing a lot and erecting a banking-house thereon began to be talked of among the trustees. The only reason put on record in the minutes of the meetings held by the trustees for procuring a new banking-house was to better the financial condition of the bank. In February, 1873, at a meeting of the trustees a committee was appointed "on site for new building;" and in March the committee entered into contract for the purchase of a plot of land, consisting of four lots, on the corner of Forty-Eighth street and Third avenue, for the sum of $74,500; of which $1,000 was to be paid down, $9,000 on the 1st day of May then next, and $64,000 to be secured by a mortgage, payable on or before May 1, 1875, with interest from May 1, 1873, at seven per cent.; and there was an agreement that payment of the principal sum secured by the mortgage might be extended to May 1, 1877, provided a building should, without unavoidable delay, be erected upon the corner lot, worth not less than $25,000. This contract was reported by the committee to the trustees, at a meeting held April 7. On the 1st day of May, 1873, the real estate was conveyed and the cash payment was made, and four separate mortgages were executed to secure the balance, one upon each lot. The mortgage upon the lot upon which the bank building was afterward erected was for $30,500. At the same time the bank became obligated to build upon that lot a building covering its whole front, twenty-five feet, and sixty feet deep, and not less than five stories high, and have the same inclosed by the 1st day of November then next. Upon that lot the bank proceeded, in the spring of 1875, to erect a building covering the whole front, and seventy-six feet deep, and five stories high, at an expense of about $27,000. And the building was nearly completed when the receiver of the bank was appointed in November of that year. The three lots not needed for the building were disposed of, as we may assume, without any loss, leaving the corner lot used for the building to cost the bank $29,250; and we may assume that that was then the fair value of the lot. This case may then be treated as if the trustees had purchased the corner lot at $29,250, and bound themselves to erect thereon a building costing $27,000. When the receiver was appointed that lot and building, and other assets which produced less than $1,000, constituted the whole property of the bank; and subsequently the lot and building were swept away by a mortgage foreclosure, and this action was brought to recover the damages caused to the bank by the alleged improper investment of its funds, as above stated, in the lot upon which the building was erected.

At the time of the purchase of the lot the bank was substantially insolvent. If it had gone into liquidation, its assets would have fallen several thousand dollars short of discharging its liabilities, and this state of things was known to the trustees. It had been in existence about six years, doing a losing business. The amount of its deposits, which its managers had not been able to increase, shows that the enterprise was an abortion from the beginning, either because it lacked public confidence, or was not needed in the place where it was located. It had changed its location once without any benefit. It had on hand but about $13,000 in cash, of which $10,000 were taken to make the first payments. The balance of its assets was mostly in mortgages not readily convertible. One was a mortgage for $40,000, which had been purchased at a large discount, and we may infer that it was not very salable, as the trustees resolved to sell it as early as May, 1873, and in August, 1873, authorized it to be sold at a discount of not more than $2,500, and yet it was not sold until 1874. In this condition of things the trustees made the purchase complained of, under an obligation to place on the lot an expensive banking-house. Whether under the circumstances the purchase was such as the trustees, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, skill and care, could make; or whether the act of purchase was reckless, rash, extravagant, showing a want of ordinary prudence, skill and care, were questions for the jury. It is not disputed that, under the charter of this bank, as amended in 1868 (chapter 294), it had the power to purchase a lot for a banking-house "requisite for the transaction of its business." That was a power, like every other possessed by the bank, to be exercised with prudence and care. Situated as this moribund institution was, was it a prudent and reasonable thing to do, to invest nearly half of all the trust funds in this expensive lot, with an obligation to take most of the balance to erect thereon an extravagant building? The trustees were urged on by no real necessity. They had hired rooms where they could have remained; or if those rooms were not adequate for their small business, we may assume that others could have been hired. They put forward the claim upon the trial that the rooms they then occupied were not safe. That may have been a good reason for making them more secure, or for getting other rooms, but not for the extravagance in which they indulged. It is inferable however that the principal motive which influenced the trustees to make the change of location was to improve the financial condition of the bank by increasing its deposits. Their project was to buy this corner lot and erect thereon an imposing edifice, to inspire confidence, attract attention, and thus draw deposits. It was intended as a sort of advertisement of the bank, a very expensive one indeed. Savings banks are not organized as business enterprises. They have no stockholders, and are not to engage in speculations or money-making in a business sense. They are simply to take the deposits, usually small, which are offered, aggregate them, and keep and invest them safely, paying such interest to the depositors as is thus made, after deducting expenses, and paying the principal upon demand. It is not legitimate for the trustees of such a bank to seek deposits at the expense of present depositors. It is their business to take deposits when offered. It was not proper for these trustees—or at least the jury may have found that it was not—to take the money then on deposit and invest in a banking-house, merely for the purpose of drawing other deposits. In making this investment the interests of the depositors whose money was taken, can scarcely be said to have been consulted.

It matters not that the trustees purchased this lot for no more than a fair value, and that the loss was occasioned by the subsequent general decline in the value of real estate. They had no right to expose their bank to the hazard of such a decline. If the purchase was an improper one when made, it matters not that the loss came from the unavoidable fall in the value of the real estate purchased. The jury may have found that it was grossly careless for the trustees to lock up the funds in their charge in such an investment, where they could not be reached in any emergency which was likely to arise in the affairs of the crippled bank.

We conclude therefore that the evidence justified a finding by the jury that this was not a case of mere error or mistake of judgment on the part of the trustees, but that it was a case of improvidence, of reckless, unreasonable extravagance, in which the trustees failed in that measure of reasonable prudence, care and skill which the law requires.

This case was moved for trial at a circuit court, and before the jury was impaneled the defendants claimed that the case was improperly in the circuit, and that it should be tried at special term; and the court ordered that the trial proceed, and at the close of the evidence the defendants moved that the complaint be dismissed, on the ground that the action was not a proper one to be tried before a jury, and should be tried before the equity branch of the court. The motion was denied, and these rulings are now alleged for error. The receiver in this case represents the bank, and may maintain any action the bank could have maintained. The trustees may be treated as agents of the bank. In re German Min. Co., 27 Eng. Law & Eq. 158; Belknap v. Davis, 19 Me. 455; Bedford R. Co. v. Bowser, 48 Pa. St. 29; Butts v. Wood, 38 Barb. 181; Austen v. Daniels, 4 Denio, 299; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. McPherson, 35 Mo. 13. And for any misfeasance or non-feasance, causing damage to the bank, they were responsible to it, upon the same principle that any agent is for like cause responsible to his principal. It has never been doubted that a principal may sue his agent in an action at law for any damages caused by culpable misfeasance or non-feasance in the business of the agency. The only relief claimed in this complaint was a money judgment, and we think it was properly tried as an action at law. No equitable rights were to be adjusted, and there was no occasion to appeal to an equitable forum.

Treating this therefore as an action at law, it follows also that the objection taken that other trustees should have been joined as defendants cannot prevail. In actions ex delicto the plaintiff may sue one, some or all of the wrong-doers. Liquidators of Western Bank v. Douglas, 22 Sess. Cas. (Scot.) 475; Barb. Parties, 203.

The defendants Hoffman and Gearty filed petitions for their discharge in bankruptcy after the commencement of this action, and were discharged before judgment, and they alleged such discharge as a defense to the action. The trial judge and the general term held that the discharge furnished no defense, and we are of the same opinion. This claim was purely for unliquidated damages occasioned by a tort. Such a claim was not provable in bankruptcy, and therefore was not discharged. Rev. St. U. S. (2d Ed.) §§ 5115, 5119, 5067-5071; Zinn v. Ritterman, 2 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 261; Kellogg v. Schuyler, 2 Denio, 73; Crouch v. Gridley, 6 Hill, 250; In re Wiggers, 2 Biss. 71, Fed. Cas. No. 17,623; In re Clough, 2 Ben. 508, Fed. Cas. No. 2,905; In re Sidle, 2 N. B. R. 77, Fed. Cas. No. 12,844.

I conclude therefore that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed.

The appeal by the plaintiff from the order of the general term, granting a new trial as to defendant Smith, must, for reasons stated on the argument, be dismissed, with costs.

All concur.

Judgment affirmed, and appeal from order dismissed.

KING v. TALBOT.

Court of Appeals of New York. 1869.

This was an action for an accounting against the defendants, as the surviving executors of the will of the father of the plaintiffs. By the will the executors were directed to invest $15,000 for each of the plaintiffs, and the executors made these investments in certain railroad bonds and stock, and in some bank stock. The value of these securities having depreciated, the investment was repudiated by the plaintiffs, and this action brought. The further facts appear in the opinion of the court.

Stephen P. Nash, for appellants. George M. Titus, for respondents.

WOODRUFF, J. It is conceded that in England the rule is, and has long been settled, that a trustee, holding funds to invest for the benefit of his cestui que trust, is bound to make such investment in the public debt, for the safety whereof the faith of their government is pledged; or in loans, for which real estate is pledged as security. And that although the terms of the trust commit the investment, in general terms, to the discretion of the trustee, that discretion is controlled by the above rule, and is to be exercised within the very narrow limits, which it prescribes.

As a purely arbitrary rule, resting upon any special policy of that country, or on any peculiarity in its condition, it has no application to this country. It is not of the common law. It had no applicability to the condition of this country, while a colony of Great Britain, and cannot be said to have been incorporated in our law.

So far, and so far only, as it can be said to rest upon fundamental principles of equity, commending themselves to the conscience, and suited to the condition of our affairs, so far it is true, that it has appropriate application and force, as a guide to the administration of a trust here, as well as in England.

I do not therefore deem it material to inquire through the multitude of English cases, and the abundant texts of the law-writers, into the origin of the rule in England, or the date of its early promulgation. Nor in this particular case do I deem it necessary to determine whether it should, by precise analogy, be deemed to prohibit here investments in any other public debt than that of the state of New York.

Neither, in my judgment, are we at liberty, in the decision of this case, to propound any new rule of conduct, by which to judge of the liability of trustees, now subjected to examination. Under trusts heretofore created, the managers thereof performed their duty with the aid of rules for the exercise of their discretion, which were the utterance of equity and good conscience, intelligible to their understanding, and available for their information; otherwise, trusts heretofore existing have been traps and pitfalls to catch the faithful, prudent and diligent trustee, without the power to avoid them.

But it is not true that there is no underlying principle or rule of conduct in the administration of a trust, which calls for obedience. Whether it has been declared by the courts or not, whether it has been enacted in statutes or not, whether it is in familiar recognition in the affairs of life, there appertains to the relation of trustee and cestui que trust, a duty to be faithful, to be diligent, to be prudent in an administration intrusted to the former, in confidence in his fidelity, diligence and prudence.

To this general statement of the duty of trustees, there is no want of promulgation or sanction, nor want of sources of information for their guidance. In the whole history of trusts, in decisions of courts for a century in England, in all the utterances of the courts of this and the other states of this country, and not less in the conscious good sense of all intelligent minds, its recognition is uniform.

The real inquiry therefore is, in my judgment, in the case before us, and in all like cases: Has the administration of the trust, created by the will of Charles W. King, for the benefit of the plaintiff, been governed by fidelity, diligence and prudence? If it has, the defendants are not liable for losses which nevertheless have happened.

This however aids but little in the examination of the defendants' conduct, unless the terms of definition are made more precise. What are fidelity, diligence and discretion? and what is the measure thereof, which trustees are bound to possess and exercise?

It is hardly necessary to say that fidelity imports sincere and single intention to administer the trust for the best interest of the parties beneficially interested, and according to the duty which the trust imposes. And this is but a paraphrase of "good faith."

The meaning and measure of the required prudence and diligence has been repeatedly discussed, and with a difference of opinion. In extreme rigor, it has sometimes been said that they must be such and as great as that possessed and exercised by the court of chancery itself. And again, it has been said that they are to be such as the trustee exercises in the conduct of his own affairs, of like nature, and between these is the declaration that they are to be the highest prudence and vigilance, or they will not exonerate.

My own judgment, after an examination of the subject, and bearing in mind the nature of the office, its importance and the considerations which alone induce men of suitable experience, capacity and responsibility to accept its usually thankless burden, is that the just and true rule is that the trustee is bound to employ such diligence and such prudence in the care and management as in general prudent men of discretion and intelligence in such matters employ in their own like affairs.

This necessarily excludes all speculation, all investments for an uncertain and doubtful rise in the market, and of course every thing that does not take into view the nature and object of the trust, and the consequences of a mistake in the selection of the investment to be made.

It therefore does not follow that because prudent men may, and often do, conduct their own affairs with the hope of growing rich, and therein take the hazard of adventures which they deem hopeful, trustees may do the same; the preservation of the fund and the procurement of a just income therefrom are primary objects of the creation of the trust itself, and are to be primarily regarded.

If it be said that trustees are selected by the testator or donor of the trust, from his own knowledge of their capacity, and without any expectation that they will do more than, in good faith, exercise the discretion and judgment they possess, the answer is: First, the rule properly assumes the capacity of trustees to exercise the prudence and diligence of prudent men in general; and second, it imposes the duty to observe and know or learn what such prudence dictates in the matter in hand.

And once more the terms of the trust, and its particular object and purpose, are in no case to be lost sight of in its administration.

Lewin, in his treatise on the law of Trusts, etc., (page 332), states, as the result of the several cases, and as the true rule, that "a trustee is bound to exert precisely the same care and solicitude in behalf of his cestui que trust as he would do for himself; but greater measure than this a court of equity will not exact." In general this is true; but if it imports that if he do what men of ordinary prudence would not do, in their own affairs, of a like nature, he will be excused, on showing that he dealt with his own property with like want of discretion, it cannot be sustained as a safe or just rule toward cestuis que trust; nor is it required by reasonable indulgence to the trustee; it would be laying the duty to be prudent out of view entirely, and I cannot think the writer intended it should be so understood.

The Massachusetts cases (Harvard College v. Amory, 9 Pick. 446; Lovell v. Minot, 20 Pick. 116) cited by the counsel for the defendants, are in better conformity with the rule as I have stated it.

To apply these general views to the case before us, and with the deductions which necessarily flow from their recognition: The testator gave to each of his children $15,000, the interest on the same, so far as required, to be applied to their maintenance and education, and the principal, with any accumulations thereon, to be paid to them severally on their majority; appointed the defendant, Talbot, and his partner, Mr. Olyphant, executors, "intrusting to their discretion the settlement of my affairs and the investment of my estate for the benefit of my heirs."

If I am correct in my views of the duty of trustees, this last clause neither added to, nor in any wise affected the duty or responsibility of these executors; without it they were clothed with discretion; with it their discretion was to be exercised with all the care and prudence belonging to their trust relation to the beneficiaries. Such is the distinct doctrine of the cases very largely cited by the counsel for the parties, and is, I think, the necessary conclusion from the just rule of duty I have stated.

What then was the office of the trustees, as indicated by the terms and nature of the trust? If its literal reading be followed, it directed that "$15,000" in money be placed at "interest." The nature of the trust, according to the manifest intent of the testator, required that in order to the maintenance and support of infant children, whose need, in that regard, would be constant and unremitting, that interest should flow in with regularity and without exposure to the uncertainties or fluctuations of adventures of any kind. And then the fund should continue, with any excess of such interest accumulated for their benefit, so as to be delivered at the expiration of their minority.

Palpably then the first and obvious duty was to place that $15,000 in a state of security; second, to see to it that it was productive of interest; and third, so to keep the fund that it should always be subject to future recall for the benefit of the cestui que trust.

I do not attach controlling importance to the word "interest" used by the testator, but I do regard it as some guide to the trustees, as an expression of the testator, that he did not contemplate any adventure with the fund, with a view to profits as such.

But apart from the inference from the use of that word, I think it should be said, that whenever money is held upon a trust of this description, it is not according to its nature, nor within any just idea of prudence to place the principal of the fund in a condition in which it is necessarily exposed to the hazard of loss or gain, according to the success or failure of the enterprise in which it is embarked, and in which by the very terms of the investment, the principal is not to be returned at all.

It is not denied that the employment of the fund, as capital in trade, would be a clear departure from the duty of trustees. If it cannot be so employed under the management of a copartnership, I see no reason for saying that the incorporation of the partners tends, in any degree, to justify it.

The moment the fund is invested in bank, or insurance, or railroad stock, it has left the control of the trustees; its safety and the hazard, or risk of loss, is no longer dependent upon their skill, care or discretion in its custody or management, and the terms of the investment do not contemplate that it ever will be returned to the trustees.

If it be said that at any time the trustees may sell the stock (which is but another name for their interest in the property and business of the corporation), and so repossess themselves of the original capital, I reply that is necessarily contingent and uncertain; and so the fund has been voluntarily placed in a condition of uncertainty, dependent upon two contingencies: First, the practicability of making the business profitable; and, second, the judgment, skill and fidelity of those who have the management of it for that purpose.

If it be said that men of the highest prudence do in fact invest their funds in such stocks, becoming subscribers and contributors thereto in the very formation thereof, and before the business is developed, and in the exercise of their judgment on the probability of its safety and productiveness, the answer is, so do just such men, looking to the hope of profitable returns, invest money in trade and adventures of various kinds. In their private affairs they do, and they lawfully may put their principal funds at hazard; in the affairs of a trust they may not. The very nature of their relation to it forbids it.

If it be said that this reasoning assumes that it is certainly practicable so to keep the fund that it shall be productive, and yet safe against any contingency of loss; whereas in fact if loaned upon bond and mortgage, or upon securities of any description, losses from insolvency and depreciation may and often do happen, notwithstanding due and proper care and caution is observed in their selection. Not at all. It assumes and insists that the trustees shall not place the fund where its safety and due return to their hands will depend upon the success of the business in which it is adventured, or the skill and honesty of other parties intrusted with its conduct; and it is in the selection of the securities for its safety and actual return that there is scope for discretion and prudence, which if exercised in good faith, constitute due performance of the duty of the trustees.

My conclusion is therefore that the defendants were not at liberty to invest the fund bequeathed to the plaintiff in stock of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company; of the New York and Harlem Railroad Company; of the New York and New Haven Railroad Company; of the Bank of Commerce; or of the Saratoga and Washington Railroad Company; and that the plaintiff was not bound to accept these stocks as and for his legacy, or the investment thereof.

In regard to the bonds of the Hudson River Railroad Company and of the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, it appears by schedule B, given in evidence, that the former were mortgage bonds; but what was the extent or sufficiency of the security afforded by such mortgage, or what property was embraced in it does not appear, nor does it appear whether there was any security whatever for the payment of the canal company's bond.

It is not necessary for the decision of this case; and I am not prepared to say that an investment in the bonds of a railroad or other corporation, the payment whereof is secured by a mortgage upon real estate, is not suitable and proper under any circumstances.

If the real estate is ample to insure the payment of the bonds, I do not at present perceive that it is necessarily to be regarded as inferior to the bond of an individual secured by mortgage; it would of course be open to all the inquiries which prudence would suggest if the bond and mortgage were that of an individual. The nature, the location and the sufficiency of the security and the terms of the mortgage, and its availability for the protection and ultimate realization of the fund, must of course enter into the consideration.

But it is not necessary to pursue that subject. The plaintiff in his complaint rejects the entire investment. The court below held that it was equitable that the plaintiff should be held to receive the whole or none of the stocks and bonds, and to that ruling neither the plaintiff nor the defendant have excepted; and therefore the question whether the judgment below was correct in that respect is not before us.

It is proper however to say that I do not clearly apprehend the propriety of that ruling, unless it be on the ground that the plaintiff in his complaint did so elect.

The rule is perfectly well settled that a cestui que trust is at liberty to elect to approve an unauthorized investment and enjoy its profits, or to reject it at his option; and I perceive no reason for saying that where the trustee has divided the fund into parts and made separate investments, the cestui que trust is not at liberty, on equitable as well as legal grounds, to approve and adopt such as he thinks it for his interest to approve. The money invested is his money; and in respect to each and every dollar, it seems to me he has an unqualified right to follow it, and claim the fruits of its investment, and that the trustee cannot deny it. The fact that the trustee has made other investments of other parts of the fund, which the cestui que trust is not bound to approve, and disaffirms, cannot, I think, affect the power. For example, suppose in the present case the cestui que trust, on delivery to him of all the securities and bonds in which his legacy had appeared invested, had declared: Although these investments are improperly made, not in accordance with the intent of the testator, nor in the due performance of your duty, I waive all objection on that account, except as to the stock of the Saratoga and Washington Railroad Company. That I reject and return to you. Is it doubtful that his position must be sustained?

The result is, that the main features of the judgment herein must be affirmed.

LAMAR v. MICOU.

Supreme Court of the United States. Dec. 1, 1884.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York.

E. N. Dickerson, for appellant. S. P. Nash and Geo. C. Holt, for appellee.

GRAY, J. This is an appeal by the executor of a guardian from a decree against him upon a bill in equity filed by the administratrix of his ward. The original bill, filed on July 1, 1875, by Ann C. Sims, a citizen of Alabama, as administratrix of Martha M. Sims, in the supreme court of the state of New York, alleged that on December 11, 1855, the defendant's testator, Gazaway B. Lamar, was duly appointed, by the surrogate of the county of Richmond, in that state, guardian of the person and estate of Martha M. Sims, an infant of six years of age, then a resident of that county, and gave bond as such, and took into his possession and control all her property, being more than $5,000; that on October 5, 1874, he died in New York, and on November 10, 1874, his will was there admitted to probate, and the defendant, a citizen of New York, was appointed his executor; and that he and his executor had neglected to render any account of his guardianship to the surrogate of Richmond county, or to any court having cognizance thereof, or to the ward or her administratrix; and prayed for an account, and for judgment for the amount found to be due.

The defendant removed the case into the circuit court of the United States for the Southern district of New York, and there filed an answer, averring that in 1855, when Lamar was appointed guardian of Martha M. Sims, he was a citizen of Georgia, and she was a citizen of Alabama, having a temporary residence in the city of New York; that in the spring of 1861 the states of Georgia and Alabama declared themselves to have seceded from the United States, and to constitute members of the so-called Confederate states of America, whereupon a state of war arose between the United States and the Confederate states, which continued to be flagrant for more than four years after; that Lamar and Martha M. Sims were in the spring of 1861 citizens and residents of the states of Georgia and Alabama, respectively, and citizens of the Confederate states, and were engaged in aiding and abetting the state of Georgia and the so-called Confederate states in their rebellion against the United States, and she continued to aid and abet until the time of her death, and he continued to aid and abet till January, 1865; that the United States, by various public acts, declared all his and her property, of any kind, to be liable to seizure and confiscation by the United States, and they both were, by the various acts of congress of the United States, outlawed and debarred of any access to any court of the United States, whereby it was impossible for Lamar to appear in the surrogate's court of Richmond county to settle and close his accounts there, and to be discharged from his liability as guardian, in consequence whereof the relation of guardian and ward, so far as it depended upon the orders of that court, ceased and determined; that, for the purpose of saving the ward's property from seizure and confiscation by the United States, Lamar, at the request of the ward and of her natural guardians, all citizens of the state of Alabama, withdrew the funds belonging to her from the city of New York, and invested them for her benefit and account in such securities as by the laws of the states of Alabama and Georgia and of the Confederate states he might lawfully do; that in 1864, upon the death of Martha M. Sims, all her property vested in her sister, Ann C. Sims, as her next of kin, and any accounting of Lamar for that property was to be made to her; that on March 15, 1867, at the written request of Ann C. Sims and of her natural guardians, Benjamin H. Micou was appointed her legal guardian by the probate court of Montgomery county, in the state of Alabama, which was at that time her residence, and Lamar thereupon accounted for and paid over all property with which he was chargeable as guardian of Martha M. Sims, to Micou as her guardian, and received from him a full release therefor; and that Ann C. Sims, when she became of age, ratified and confirmed the same. To that answer the plaintiff filed a general replication.

The case was set down for hearing in the circuit court upon the bill, answer and replication, and a statement of facts agreed by the parties, in substance as follows: On November 23, 1850, William W. Sims, a citizen of Georgia, died at Savannah, in that state, leaving a widow, who was appointed his administratrix, and two infant daughters, Martha M. Sims, born at Savannah on September 8, 1849, and Ann C. Sims, born in Florida on June 1, 1851. In 1853 the widow married the Rev. Richard M. Abercrombie, of Clifton, in the county of Richmond and state of New York. On December 11, 1855, on the petition of Mrs. Abercrombie, Gazaway B. Lamar, an uncle of Mr. Sims, and then residing at Brooklyn, in the state of New York, was appointed by the surrogate of Richmond county guardian of the person and estate of each child "until she shall arrive at the age of fourteen years, and until another guardian shall be appointed;" and gave bond to her, with sureties, "to faithfully in all things discharge the duty of a guardian to the said minor according to law, and render a true and just account of all moneys and other property received by him, and of the application thereof, and of his guardianship in all respects, to any court having cognizance thereof;" and he immediately received from Mrs. Abercrombie in money $5,166.89 belonging to each ward, and invested part of it, in January and April, 1856, in stock of the Bank of the Republic, at New York, and part of it, in March and July, 1857, in stock of the Bank of Commerce, at Savannah, each of which was then paying, and continued to pay until April, 1861, good dividends annually, the one of 10 and the other of 8 per cent.

In 1856, several months after Lamar's appointment as guardian, Mr. and Mrs. Abercrombie removed from Clifton, in the state of New York, to Hartford, in the state of Connecticut, and there resided till her death, in the spring of 1859. The children lived with Mr. and Mrs. Abercrombie, Lamar as guardian paying Mr. Abercrombie for their board, at Clifton and at Hartford, from the marriage until her death; and were then removed to Augusta, in the state of Georgia, and there lived with their paternal grandmother and her unmarried daughter and only living child, their aunt; Lamar as guardian continuing to pay their board. After 1856 neither of the children ever resided in the state of New York. On January 18, 1860, their aunt was married to Benjamin H. Micou, of Montgomery, in the state of Alabama, and the children and their grandmother thereafter lived with Mr. and Mrs. Micou at Montgomery, and the children were educated and supported at Mr. Micou's expense. From 1855 to 1859 Lamar resided partly in Georgia and partly in New York. In the spring of 1861 he had a temporary residence in the city of New York, and upon the breaking out of the war of the rebellion, and after removing all his own property, left New York, and passed through the lines to Savannah, and there resided, sympathizing with the rebellion, and doing what he could to accomplish its success, until January, 1865, and continued to have his residence in Savannah until 1872 or 1873, when he went to New York again, and afterwards lived there. Mr. and Mrs. Micou also sympathized with the rebellion and desired its success, and each of them, as well as Lamar, failed during the rebellion to bear true allegiance to the United States.

At the time of Lamar's appointment as guardian, 10 shares in the stock of the Mechanics' Bank of Augusta, in the state of Georgia, which had belonged to William W. Sims in his life-time, stood on the books of the bank in the name of Mrs. Abercrombie as his administratrix, of which one-third belonged to her as his widow, and one-third to each of the infants. In January, 1856, the bank refused a request of Lamar to transfer one-third of that stock to him as guardian of each infant, but afterwards paid to him as guardian, from time to time, two-thirds of the dividends during the life of Mrs. Abercrombie, and all the dividends after her death until 1865. During the period last named, he also received as guardian the dividends on some other bank stock in Savannah, which Mrs. Abercrombie owned, and to which, on her death, her husband became entitled. Certain facts, relied on as showing that he, immediately after his wife's death, made a surrender of her interest in the bank shares to Lamar, as guardian of her children, are not material to the understanding of the decision of this court, but are recapitulated in the opinion of the circuit court. 7 Fed. 180-185. In the winter of 1861-62, Lamar, fearing that the stock in the Bank of the Republic at New York, held by him as guardian, would be confiscated by the United States, had it sold by a friend in New York; the proceeds of the sale, which were about 20 per cent. less than the par value of the stock, invested at New York in guaranteed bonds of the cities of New Orleans, Memphis, and Mobile, and of the East Tennessee & Georgia Railroad Company; and those bonds deposited in a bank in Canada. Lamar from time to time invested the property of his wards, that was within the so-called Confederate states, in whatever seemed to him to be the most secure and safe—some in Confederate state bonds, some in the bonds of the individual states which composed the confederacy, and some in bonds of cities, and of railroad corporations, and stock of banks within those states. On the money of his wards, accruing from dividends on bank stock, and remaining in his hands, he charged himself with interest until the summer of 1862, when, with the advice and aid of Mr. Micou, he invested $7,000 of such money in bonds of the Confederate states and of the state of Alabama; and in 1863, with the like advice and aid, sold the Alabama bonds for more than he had paid for them, and invested the proceeds also in Confederate states bonds; charged his wards with the money paid, and credited them with the bonds; and placed the bonds in the hands of their grandmother, who gave him a receipt for them and held them till the end of the rebellion, when they, as well as the stock in the banks at Savannah, became worthless.

Martha M. Sims died on November 2, 1864, at the age of 15 years, unmarried and intestate, leaving her sister Ann C. Sims her next of kin. On January 12, 1867, Lamar, in answer to letters of inquiry from Mr. and Mrs. Micou, wrote to Mrs. Micou that he had saved from the wreck of the property of his niece, Ann C. Sims, surviving her sister, three bonds of the city of Memphis, indorsed by the state of Tennessee, one bond of the city of Mobile, and one bond of the East Tennessee & Georgia Railroad Company, each for $1,000, and with some coupons past due and uncollected; and suggested that by reason of his age and failing health, and of the embarrassed state of his own affairs, Mr. Micou should be appointed in Alabama guardian in his stead. Upon the receipt of this letter, Mrs. Micou wrote to Lamar, thanking him for the explicit statement of the niece's affairs, and for the care and trouble he had had with her property; and Ann C. Sims, then nearly 16 years old, signed a request, attested by her grandmother and by Mrs. Micou, that her guardianship might be transferred to Mr. Micou, and that he might be appointed her guardian. And on March 15, 1867, he was appointed guardian of her property by the probate court of the county of Montgomery and state of Alabama, according to the laws of that state, and gave bond as such. On May 14, 1867, Lamar sent to Micou complete and correct statements of his guardianship account with each of his wards, as well as all the securities remaining in his hands as guardian of either, and a check payable to Micou as guardian of Ann C. Sims for a balance in money due her; and Micou, as such guardian, signed and sent to Lamar a schedule of and receipt for the property, describing it specifically, by which it appeared that the bonds of the cities of New Orleans and Memphis, and of the East Tennessee & Georgia Railroad Company, were issued, and the Memphis bonds, as well as the railroad bonds, were indorsed by the state of Tennessee, some years before the breaking out of the rebellion. Micou thenceforth continued to act in all respects as the only guardian of Ann C. Sims until she became of age on June 1, 1872.

No objection or complaint was ever made by either of the wards or their relatives against Lamar's transactions or investments as guardian until July 28, 1874, when Micou wrote to Lamar informing him that Ann C. Sims desired a settlement of his accounts, and that he had been advised that no credits could be allowed for the investments in Confederate states bonds, and that Lamar was responsible for the security of the investments in other bonds and bank stock. Lamar was then sick in New York, and died there on October 5, 1874, without having answered the letter. Before the case was heard in the circuit court, Ann C. Sims died, on May 7, 1878, and on June 20, 1878, Mrs. Micou was appointed, in New York, administratrix de bonis non of Martha M. Sims, and as such filed a bill of revivor in this suit. On October 3, 1878, the defendant filed a cross-bill, repeating the allegations of his answer to the original bill, and further averring that Ann C. Sims left a will which had been admitted to probate in Montgomery county, in the state of Alabama, and afterwards in the county and state of New York, by which she gave all her property to Mrs. Micou, who was her next of kin, and that Mrs. Micou was entitled to receive for her own benefit whatever might be recovered in the principal suit, and was estopped to deny the lawfulness or propriety of Lamar's acts, because whatever was done by him as guardian of Martha M. Sims in her life-time, or as guardian of the interests of Ann C. Sims as her next of kin, was authorized and approved by Mrs. Micou and her mother and husband as the natural guardians of both children. Mrs. Micou, as plaintiff in the bill of revivor, answered the cross-bill, alleging that Ann succeeded to Martha's property as her administratrix, and not as her next of kin, admitting Ann's will and the probate thereof, denying that Mrs. Micou was a natural guardian of the children, and denying that she approved or ratified Lamar's acts as guardian. A general replication was filed to that answer.

Upon a hearing on the pleadings and the agreed statement of facts, the circuit court dismissed the cross-bill, held all Lamar's investments to have been breaches of trust, and entered a decree referring the case to a master to state an account. The case was afterwards heard on exceptions to the master's report, and a final decree entered for the plaintiff for $18,705.19, including the value before 1861 of those bank stocks in Georgia of which Lamar had never had possession. The opinion delivered upon the first hearing is reported in 17 Blatchf. 378, and in 1 Fed. 14, and the opinion upon the second hearing in 7 Fed. 180. The defendant appealed to this court.

The authority of the surrogate's court of the county of Richmond and state of New York to appoint Lamar guardian of the persons and property of infants at the time within that county, and the authority of the supreme court of the state of New York, in which this suit was originally brought, being a court of general equity jurisdiction, to take cognizance thereof, are not disputed; and, upon the facts agreed, it is quite clear that none of the defenses set up in the answer afford any ground for dismissing the bill. The war of the rebellion, and the residence of both ward and guardian within the territory controlled by the insurgents, did not discharge the guardian from his responsibility to account, after the war, for property of the wards which had at any time come into his hands, or which he might, by the exercise of due care, have obtained possession of. A state of war does not put an end to pre-existing obligations, or transfer the property of wards to their guardians, or release the latter from the duty to keep it safely, but suspends until the return of peace the right of any one residing in the enemy's country to sue in our courts. Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 447; Montgomery v. U. S., 15 Wall. 395, 400; Insurance Co. v. Davis, 95 U. S.

425, 430; Kershaw v. Kelsey, 100 Mass. 561, 563, 564, 570; 3 Phillim. Int. Law (2d Ed.) § 589. The appointment of Micou in 1867 by a court of Alabama to be guardian of the surviving ward, then residing in that state, did not terminate Lamar's liability for property of his wards which he previously had or ought to have taken possession of. The receipt given by Micou was only for the securities and money actually handed over to him by Lamar; and if Micou had any authority to discharge Lamar from liability for past mismanagement of either ward's property, he never assumed to do so. The suggestion in the answer, that the surviving ward, upon coming of age, ratified and approved the acts of Lamar as guardian, finds no support in the facts of the case. The further grounds of defense, set up in the cross-bill, that Micou participated in Lamar's investments, and that Mrs. Micou approved them, are equally unavailing. The acts of Micou, before his own appointment as guardian, could not bind the ward. And admissions in private letters from Mrs. Micou to Lamar could not affect the rights of the ward, or Mrs. Micou's authority, upon being afterwards appointed administratrix of the ward, to maintain this bill as such against Lamar's representative, even if the amount recovered will inure to her own benefit as the ward's next of kin. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 179. The extent of Lamar's liability presents more difficult questions of law, now for the first time brought before this court. The general rule is everywhere recognized, that a guardian or trustee, when investing property in his hands, is bound to act honestly and faithfully, and to exercise a sound discretion, such as men of ordinary prudence and intelligence use in their own affairs. In some jurisdictions no attempt has been made to establish a more definite rule; in others, the discretion has been confined, by the legislature or the courts, within strict limits.

The court of chancery, before the Declaration of Independence, appears to have allowed some latitude to trustees in making investments. The best evidence of this is to be found in the judgments of Lord Hardwicke. He held, indeed, in accordance with the clear weight of authority before and since, that money lent on a mere personal obligation, like a promissory note, without security, was at the risk of the trustee. Ryder v. Bickerton, 3 Swanst. 80, note, 1 Eden, 149, note; Barney v. Saunders, 16 How. 535, 545; Perry, Trusts, § 453. But, in so holding, he said: "For it should have been on some such security as binds land, or something to be answerable for it." 3 Swanst. 81, note. Although in one case he held that a trustee, directed by the terms of his trust to invest the trust money in government funds or other good securities, was responsible for a loss caused by his investing it in South Sea stock, and observed that neither South Sea stock nor bank stock was considered a good security, because it depended upon the management of the governor and directors, and the capital might be wholly lost (Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 440, 444); yet, in another case, he declined to charge a trustee for a loss on South Sea stock, which had fallen in value since the trustee received it, and said that "to compel trustees to make up a deficiency, not owing to their willful default, is the harshest demand that can be made in a court of equity." Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Atk. 513, 514, West, Ch. 31, 34. In a later case he said: "Suppose a trustee, having in his hands a considerable sum of money, places it out in the funds, which afterwards sink in their value, or on a security at the time apparently good, which afterwards turns out not to be so, for the benefit of the cestui que trust; was there ever an instance of the trustee's being made to answer the actual sum so placed out? I answer, 'No.' If there is no mala fides, nothing willful in the conduct of the trustee, the court will always favor him; for, as a trust is an office necessary in the concerns between man and man, and which, if faithfully discharged, is attended with no small degree of trouble and anxiety, it is an act of great kindness in any one to accept it. To add hazard or risk to that trouble, and subject a trustee to losses which he could not foresee, and, consequently, not prevent, would be a manifest hardship, and would be deterring every one from accepting so necessary an office." That this opinion was not based upon the fact that in England trustees usually receive no compensation is clearly shown by the chancellor's adding that the same doctrine held good in the case of a receiver, an officer of the court, and paid for his trouble; and the point decided was that a receiver, who paid the amount of rents of estates in his charge to a Bristol tradesman of good credit, taking his bills therefor on London, was not responsible for the loss of the money by his becoming bankrupt. Knight v. Plymouth, 1 Dick. 120, 126, 127, 3 Atk. 480. And the decision was afterwards cited by Lord Hardwicke himself as showing that when trustees act by other hands, according to the usage of business, they are not answerable for losses. Ex parte Belchier, 1 Amb. 218, 219, 1 Kenyon, 38, 47.

In later times, as the amount and variety of English government securities increased, the court of chancery limited trust investments to the public funds, disapproved investments either in bank stock or in mortgages of real estate, and prescribed so strict a rule that parliament interposed; and by the statutes of 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, and by general orders in chancery, pursuant to those statutes, trustees have been authorized to invest in stock of the bank of England or of Ireland, or upon mortgage of freehold or copyhold estates, as well as in the public funds. Lewin, Trusts (7th Ed.)

282, 283, 287. In a very recent case the court of appeal and the house of lords, following the decisions of Lord Hardwicke in Knight v. Plymouth and Ex parte Belchier, above cited, held that a trustee investing trust funds, who employed a broker to procure securities authorized by the trust, and paid the purchase money to the broker, if such was the usual and regular course of business of persons acting with reasonable care and prudence on their own account, was not liable for the loss of the money by fraud of the broker. Sir George Jessel, M. R., Lord Justice Bowen, and Lord Blackburn affirmed the general rule that a trustee is only bound to conduct the business of his trust in the same manner that an ordinarily prudent man of business would conduct his own; Lord Blackburn adding the qualification that "a trustee must not choose investments other than those which the terms of his trust permit." Speight v. Gaunt, 22 Ch. Div. 727, 739, 762, 9 App. Cas. 1, 19.

In this country there has been a diversity in the laws and usages of the several states upon the subject of trust investments.

In New York, under Chancellor Kent, the rule seems to have been quite undefined. See Smith v. Smith, 4 Johns. Ch. 281, 285; Thompson v. Brown, Id. 619, 628, 629, where the chancellor quoted the passage above cited from Lord Hardwicke's opinion in Knight v. Plymouth. And in Brown v. Campbell, Hopk. Ch. 233, where an executor in good faith made an investment, considered at the time to be advantageous, of the amount of two promissory notes, due to his testator from one manufacturing corporation, in the stock of another manufacturing corporation, which afterwards became insolvent, Chancellor Sanford held that there was no reason to charge him with the loss. But by the later decisions in that state investments in bank or railroad stock have been held to be at the risk of the trustee, and it has been intimated that the only investments that a trustee can safely make without an express order of court are in government or real estate securities. King v. Talbot, 40 N. Y. 76, affirming 50 Barb. 453; Ackerman v. Emott, 4 Barb. 626; Mills v. Hoffman, 26 Hun, 594; 2 Kent, Comm. 416, note b. So the decisions in New Jersey and Pennsylvania tend to disallow investments in the stock of banks or other business corporations, or otherwise than in the public funds or in mortgages of real estate. Gray v. Fox, 1 N. J. Eq. 259, 268; Halsted v. Meeker's Ex'rs, 18 N. J. Eq. 136; Lathrop v. Smalley's Ex'rs, 23 N. J. Eq. 192; Worrell's Appeal, 9 Pa. 508, and 23 Pa. 44; Hemphill's Appeal, 18 Pa. 303; Ihmsen's Appeal, 43 Pa. 431. And the New York and Pennsylvania courts have shown a strong disinclination to permit investments in real estate or securities out of their jurisdiction. Ormiston v. Olcott, 84 N. Y. 339; Rush's Estate, 12 Pa. 375, 378.

In New England, and in the southern states, the rule has been less strict. In Massachusetts, by a usage of more than half a century, approved by a uniform course of judicial decision, it has come to be regarded as too firmly settled to be changed, except by the legislature, that all that can be required of a trustee to invest is that he shall conduct himself faithfully and exercise a sound discretion, such as men of prudence and intelligence exercise in the permanent disposition of their own funds, having regard, not only to the probable income, but also to the probable safety, of the capital; and that a guardian or trustee is not precluded from investing in the stock of banking, insurance, manufacturing, or railroad corporations within or without the state. Harvard College v. Amory, 9 Pick. 446, 461; Lovell v. Minot, 20 Pick. 116, 119; Kinmonth v. Brigham, 5 Allen, 270, 277; Clark v. Garfield, 8 Allen, 427; Brown v. French, 125 Mass. 410; Bowker v. Pierce, 130 Mass. 262. In New Hampshire and in Vermont, investments, honestly and prudently made, in securities of any kind that produce income, appear to be allowed. Knowlton v. Bradley, 17 N. H. 458; Kimball v. Reding, 11 Post. 352, 374; French v. Currier, 47 N. H. 88, 99; Barney v. Parsons, 54 Vt. 623.

In Maryland, good bank stock, as well as government securities and mortgages on real estate, has always been considered a proper investment. Hammond v. Hammond, 2 Bland, 306, 413; Gray v. Lynch, 8 Gill, 403; Murray v. Feinour, 2 Md. Ch. 418. So, in Mississippi, investment in bank stock is allowed. Smyth v. Burns, 25 Miss. 422.

In South Carolina, before the war, no more definite rule appears to have been laid down than that guardians and trustees must manage the funds in their hands as prudent men manage their own affairs. Boggs v. Adger, 4 Rich. Eq. 408, 411; Spear v. Spear, 9 Rich. Eq. 184, 201; Snelling v. McCreary, 14 Rich. Eq. 291, 300.

In Georgia the English rule was never adopted; a statute of 1845, which authorized executors, administrators, guardians, and trustees, holding any trust funds, to invest them in securities of the state, was not considered compulsory; and before January 1, 1863 (when that statute was amended by adding a provision that any other investment of trust funds must be made under a judicial order, or else be at the risk of the trustee,) those who lent the fund at interest, on what was at the time considered by prudent men to be good security, were not held liable for a loss without their fault. Cobb, Dig. 333; Code 1861, § 2308; Brown v. Wright, 39 Ga. 96; Moses v. Moses, 50 Ga. 9, 33.

In Alabama the supreme court in Bryant v. Craig, 12 Ala. 354, 359, having intimated that a guardian could not safely invest upon either real or personal security without an order of court, the legislature, from 1852, authorized guardians and trustees to invest on bond and mortgage, or on good personal security, with no other limit than fidelity and prudence might require. Code 1852, § 2024; Code 1867, § 2426; Foscue v. Lyon, 55 Ala. 440, 452.

The rules of investment varying so much in the different states, it becomes necessary to consider by what law the management and investment of the ward's property should be governed. As a general rule (with some exceptions not material to the consideration of this case) the law of the domicile governs the status of a person, and the disposition and management of his movable property. The domicile of an infant is universally held to be the fittest place for the appointment of a guardian of his person and estate; although, for the protection of either, a guardian may be appointed in any state where the person or any property of an infant may be found. On the continent of Europe, the guardian appointed in the state of the domicile of the ward is generally recognized as entitled to the control and dominion of the ward and his movable property everywhere, and guardians specially appointed in other states are responsible to the principal guardian. By the law of England and of this country, a guardian appointed by the courts of one state has no authority over the ward's person or property in another state, except so far as allowed by the comity of that state, as expressed through its legislature or its courts; but the tendency of modern statutes and decisions is to defer to the law of the domicile, and to support the authority of the guardian appointed there. Hoyt v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613, 631, and authorities cited; Morrell v. Dickey, 1 Johns. Ch. 153; Woodworth v. Spring, 4 Allen, 321; Milliken v. Pratt, 125 Mass. 374, 377, 378; Leonard v. Putnam, 51 N. H. 247; Com. v. Rhoads, 37 Pa. 60; Sims v. Renwick, 25 Ga. 58; Dacey, Dom. 172-176; Westl. Int. Law (2d. Ed.) 48-50; Whart. Conf. Laws (2d Ed.) §§ 259-268. An infant cannot change his own domicile. As infants have the domicile of their father, he may change their domicile by changing his own; and after his death the mother, while she remains a widow, may likewise, by changing her domicile, change the domicile of the infants; the domicile of the children, in either case, following the independent domicile of their parent. Kennedy v. Ryall, 67 N. Y. 379; Pottinger v. Wightman, 3 Mer. 67; Dedham v. Natick, 16 Mass. 135; Dacey, Dom. 97-99. But when the widow, by marrying again, acquires the domicile of a second husband, she does not, by taking her children by the first husband to live with her there, make the domicile which she derives from the second husband their domicile; and they retain the domicile which they had, before her second marriage, acquired from her or from their father. Cumner v. Milton, 3 Salk. 259, Holt, 578; Free-town v. Taunton, 16 Mass. 52; School Direc- tors v. James, 2 Watts & S. 568; Johnson v. Copeland, 35 Ala. 521; Brown v. Lynch, 2 Bradf. 214; Mears v. Sinclair, 1 W. Va. 185; Pot. Introduction Generale aux Coutumes, No. 19; 1 Burge, Col. Law, 39; 4 Phillim. Int. Law (2d Ed.) § 97.

The preference due to the law of the ward's domicile, and the importance of a uniform administration of his whole estate, require that, as a general rule, the management and investment of his property should be governed by the law of the state of his domicile, especially when he actually resides there, rather than by the law of any state in which a guardian may have been appointed or may have received some property of the ward. If the duties of the guardian were to be exclusively regulated by the law of the state of his appointment, it would follow that in any case in which the temporary residence of the ward was changed from state to state, from considerations of health, education, pleasure, or convenience, and guardians were appointed in each state, the guardians appointed in the different states, even if the same persons, might be held to diverse rules of accounting for different parts of the ward's property. The form of accounting, so far as concerns the remedy only, must, indeed, be according to the law of the court in which relief is sought; but the general rule by which the guardian is to be held responsible for the investment of the ward's property is the law of the place of the domicile of the ward. Bar, Int. Law, § 106 (Gillespie's translation) p. 438; Whart. Conf. Laws, § 259. It may be suggested that this would enable the guardian, by changing the domicile of his ward, to choose for himself the law by which he should account. Not so. The father, and after his death the widowed mother, being the natural guardian, and the person from whom the ward derives his domicile, may change that domicile. But the ward does not derive a domicile from any other than a natural guardian. A testamentary guardian nominated by the father may have the same control of the ward's domicile that the father had. Wood v. Wood, 5 Paige, 596, 605. And any guardian, appointed in the state of the domicile of the ward, has been generally held to have the power of changing the ward's domicile from one county to another within the same state and under the same law. Cutts v. Haskins, 9 Mass. 543; Holyoke v. Haskins, 5 Pick. 20; Kirkland v. Whately, 4 Allen, 462; Anderson v. Anderson, 42 Vt. 350; Ex parte Bartlett, 4 Bradf. 221; Reg. v. Whitby, L. R. 5 Q. B. 325, 331. But it is very doubtful, to say the least, whether even a guardian appointed in the state of the domicile of the ward (not being the natural guardian or a testamentary guardian) can remove the ward's domicile beyond the limits of the state in which the guardian is appointed, and to which his legal authority is confined. Douglas v. Douglas, L. R. 12 Eq. 617, 625; Daniel v. Hill, 52 Ala. 430; Story, Conf. Laws, § 506, note; Dicey, Dom. 100, 132. And it is quite clear that a guardian appointed in a state in which the ward is temporarily residing, cannot change the ward's permanent domicile from one state to another. The case of such a guardian differs from that of an executor of, or a trustee under, a will. In the one case, the title in the property is in the executor or the trustee; in the other, the title in the property is in the ward, and the guardian has only the custody and management of it, with power to change its investment. The executor or trustee is appointed at the domicile of the testator; the guardian is most fitly appointed at the domicile of the ward, and may be appointed in any state in which the person or any property of the ward is found. The general rule which governs the administration of the property in the one case may be the law of the domicile of the testator; in the other case, it is the law of the domicile of the ward.

As the law of the domicile of the ward has no extraterritorial effect, except by the comity of the state where the property is situated, or where the guardian is appointed, it cannot, of course, prevail against a statute of the state in which the question is presented for adjudication, expressly applicable to the estate of a ward domiciled elsewhere. Hoyt v. Sprague, 103 U. S. 613. Cases may also arise with facts so peculiar or so complicated as to modify the degree of influence that the court in which the guardian is called to account may allow to the law of the domicile of the ward, consistently with doing justice to the parties before it. And a guardian, who had in good faith conformed to the law of the state in which he was appointed, might, perhaps, be excused for not having complied with stricter rules prevailing at the domicile of the ward. But in a case in which the domicile of the ward has always been in a state whose law leaves much to the discretion of the guardian in the matter of investments, and he has faithfully and prudently exercised that discretion with a view to the pecuniary interests of the ward, it would be inconsistent with the principles of equity to charge him with the amount of the moneys invested, merely because he has not complied with the more rigid rules adopted by the courts of the state in which he was appointed. The domicile of William W. Sims, during his life and at the time of his death in 1850, was in Georgia. This domicile continued to be the domicile of his widow and of their infant children until they acquired new ones. In 1853 the widow, by marrying the Rev. Mr. Abercrombie, acquired his domicile. But she did not, by taking the infants to the home, at first in New York and afterwards in Connecticut, of her new husband, who was of no kin to the children, was under no legal obligation to support them, and was, in fact, paid for their board out of their property, make his domicile, or the domicile derived by her from him, the domicile of the children of the first husband. Immediately upon her death in Connecticut, in 1859, these children, both under 10 years of age, were taken back to Georgia to the house of their father's mother and unmarried sister, their own nearest surviving relatives; and they continued to live with their grandmother and aunt in Georgia until the marriage of the aunt in January, 1860, to Mr. Micou, a citizen of Alabama, after which the grandmother and the children resided with Mr. and Mrs. Micou at their domicile in that state.

Upon these facts, the domicile of the children was always in Georgia from their birth until January, 1860, and thenceforth was either in Georgia or in Alabama. As the rules of investment prevailing before 1863 in Georgia and in Alabama did not substantially differ, the question in which of those two states their domicile was is immaterial to the decision of this case; and it is therefore unnecessary to consider whether their grandmother was their natural guardian, and as such had the power to change their domicile from one state to another. See Hargrave's note 66 to Co. Litt. 88b; Reeve, Dom. Rel. 315; 2 Kent, Comm. 219; Code Ga. 1861, §§ 1754, 2452; Darden v. Wyatt, 15 Ga. 414. Whether the domicile of Lamar in December, 1855, when he was appointed in New York guardian of the infants, was in New York or in Georgia, does not distinctly appear, and is not material; because, for the reasons already stated, wherever his domicile was, his duties as guardian in the management and investment of the property of his wards were to be regulated by the law of their domicile.

It remains to apply the test of that law to Lamar's acts or omissions with regard to the various kinds of securities in which the property of the wards was invested.

1. The sum which Lamar received in New York in money from Mrs. Abercrombie he invested in 1856 and 1857 in stock of the Bank of the Republic at New York, and of the Bank of Commerce at Savannah, both of which were then, and continued till the breaking out of the war, in sound condition, paying good dividends. There is nothing to raise a suspicion that Lamar, in making these investments, did not use the highest degree of prudence; and they were such as by the law of Georgia or of Alabama he might properly make. Nor is there any evidence that he was guilty of neglect in not withdrawing the investment in the stock of the Bank of Commerce at Savannah before it became worthless. He should not, therefore, be charged with the loss of that stock. The investment in the stock of the Bank of the Republic of New York being a proper investment by the law of the domicile of the wards, and there being no evidence that the sale of that stock by Lamar's order in New York, in 1862, was not judicious, or was for less than its fair market price, he was not responsible for the decrease in its value between the times of its purchase and of its sale. He had the authority, as guardian, without any order of court, to sell personal property of his ward in his own possession, and to reinvest the proceeds. Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 150; Ellis v. Essex Merrimack Bridge, 2 Pick. 243. That his motive in selling it was to avoid its being confiscated by the United States, does not appear to us to have any bearing on the rights of these parties. And no statute under which it could have been confiscated has been brought to our notice. The act of July 17, 1862, c. 195, § 6, cited by the appellant, is limited to property of persons engaged in or abetting armed rebellion, which could hardly be predicated of two girls under 13 years of age. 12 St. 591. Whatever liability, criminal or civil, Lamar may have incurred or avoided as towards the United States, there was nothing in his selling this stock, and turning it into money, of which his wards had any right to complain.

As to the sum received from the sale of the stock in the Bank of the Republic, we find nothing in the facts agreed by the parties, upon which the case was heard, to support the argument that Lamar, under color of protecting his wards' interests, allowed the funds to be lent to cities and other corporations which were aiding in the rebellion. On the contrary, it is agreed that that sum was applied to the purchase in New York of guaranteed bonds of the cities of New Orleans, Memphis, and Mobile, and of the East Tennessee & Georgia Railroad Company; and the description of those bonds, in the receipt afterwards given by Micou to Lamar, shows that the bonds of that railroad company, and of the cities of New Orleans and Memphis, at least, were issued some years before the breaking out of the rebellion, and that the bonds of the city of Memphis and of the railroad company were, at the time of their issue, indorsed by the state of Tennessee. The company had its charter from that state, and its road was partly in Tennessee and partly in Georgia. Tenn. St. 1848, c. 169. Under the discretion allowed to a guardian or trustee by the law of Georgia and of Alabama, he was not precluded from investing the funds in his hands in bonds of a railroad corporation, indorsed by the state by which it was chartered, or in bonds of a city. As Lamar, in making these investments, appears to have used due care and prudence, having regard to the best pecuniary interests of his wards, the sum so invested should be credited to him in this case, unless, as suggested at the argument, the requisite allowance has already been made in the final decree of the circuit court in the suit brought by the representative of the other ward, an appeal from which was dismissed by this court for want of jurisdiction in 104 U. S. 465.

2. Other moneys of the wards in Lamar's hands, arising either from dividends which he had received on their behalf, or from interest with which he charged himself upon sums not invested, were used in the purchase of bonds of the Confederate states, and of the state of Alabama. The investment in bonds of the Confederate states was clearly unlawful, and no legislative act or judicial decree or decision of any state could justify it. The so-called Confederate government was in no sense a lawful government, but was a mere government of force, having its origin and foundation in rebellion against the United States. The notes and bonds issued in its name and for its support had no legal value as money or property, except by agreement or acceptance of parties capable of contracting with each other, and can never be regarded by a court sitting under the authority of the United States as securities in which trust funds might be lawfully invested. Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. 1; Head v. Starke, Chase, 312, Fed. Cas. No. 6,293; Horn v. Lockhart, 17 Wall. 570; Confederate Note Case, 19 Wall. 548; Sprott v. U. S., 20 Wall. 459; Fretz v. Stover, 22 Wall. 198; Alexander v. Bryan, 110 U. S. 414, 4 Sup. Ct. 107. An infant has no capacity, by contract with his guardian, or by assent to his unlawful acts, to affect his own rights. The case is governed in this particular by the decision in Horn v. Lockhart, in which it was held that an executor was not discharged from his liability to legatees by having invested funds, pursuant to a statute of the state, and with the approval of the probate court by which he had been appointed, in bonds of the Confederate states, which became worthless in his hands. Neither the date nor the purpose of the issue of the bonds of the state of Alabama is shown, and it is unnecessary to consider the lawfulness of the investment in those bonds, because Lamar appears to have sold them for as much as he had paid for them, and to have invested the proceeds in additional Confederate states bonds, and for the amount thereby lost to the estate he was accountable.

3. The stock in the Mechanics' Bank of Georgia, which had belonged to William W. Sims in his life-time, and stood on the books of the bank in the name of his administratrix, and of which one-third belonged to her, as his widow, and one-third to each of the infants, never came into Lamar's possession; and upon a request made by him, the very next month after his appointment, the bank refused to transfer to him any part of it. He did receive and account for the dividends; and he could not, under the law of Georgia concerning foreign guardians, have obtained possession of property of his wards within that state without the consent of the ordinary. Code 1861, §§ 1834-1839. The attempt to charge him for the value of the principal of the stock must fail for two reasons: First. This very stock had not only belonged to the father of the wards in his lifetime, but it was such stock as a guardian or trustee might properly invest in by the law of Georgia. Second. No reason is shown why this stock, being in Georgia, the domicile of the wards, should have been transferred to a guardian who had been appointed in New York during their temporary residence there. The same reasons are conclusive against charging him with the value of the bank stock in Georgia, which was owned by Mrs. Abercrombie in her own right, and to which Mr. Abercrombie became entitled upon her death. It is therefore unnecessary to consider whether there is sufficient evidence of an immediate surrender by him of her interest to her children.

The result is that both the decrees of the circuit court in this case must be reversed, and the case remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

SIMMONS v. OLIVER et al.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Nov. 5, 1889.

Appeal from circuit court, Fond du Lac county; N. S. GILSON, Judge.

Accounting and petition to be discharged by M. W. Simmons, trustee of the estate of William Oliver, deceased. Elizabeth Oliver and others, beneficiaries, objected to the account, and opposed the petition. From a judgment holding the trustee liable for certain losses, he appeals.

Knowles & Phelps, for appellant. N. C. Giffin, for respondents.

COLE, C. J. M. W. Simmons, as trustee, received the funds mentioned in his account from the former trustee, Smith, to invest and to keep invested for the benefit of the beneficiaries named. The income was to be paid to the widow during her life, and $1,000 was to be paid the children in equal portions when the youngest should arrive at age. No directions were given in the order appointing Simmons as to how the trust funds should be invested. It appears that in 1883 the trustee loaned to the McDonald Manufacturing Company a portion of the fund, taking its indorsed note, which note was taken up in February, 1884, by a new note for the amount of the loan unpaid, such note running one year, which was indorsed by the president and secretary of the company. The company at this time was in good financial standing, and the indorsers were reputed to be perfectly responsible, and men of ample means. In a few months, however, the company failed, and turned over its property to a trustee, and the president, who was supposed to have the most property of either of the indorsers, became unable to pay his debts. The claims against the manufacturing company were finally compromised at 50 cents on the dollar, in cash and notes, and 50 cents in mining stock at $5 a share. Simmons at first declined to take the mining stock, not considering it of any value, but after a few months, thinking it might turn out to be worth something, decided to take it and pay an assessment of $50 upon it, for which it was advertised for sale. The testimony clearly shows that the compromise made by the creditors of the manufacturing company was the best that could be realized at the time; and that the mining stock, which proved to be worthless, was considered of some value. The trustee, in his account filed, wishes to be credited and allowed for the mining stock at its face value and interest thereon since June 22, 1888, and the amount paid upon it as an assessment, together with another small item of $11. The beneficiaries object to the allowance of these items, and the court below decided that the estate of the trustee must make good the loss resulting to the trust-estate by reason of the loan to the manufacturing company.

We think the circuit court was clearly right in holding the trustee liable for the loss of the trust funds under the circumstances. He made a loan to a manufacturing company upon its note and the personal security of two indorsers. It is true, when the note for the amount of the loan unpaid was given in February, 1884, in addition to the security of the indorsers, the company had assigned to the trustee as collateral for the payment of the note a bond, which was supposed to be a lien upon real estate, but which was afterwards held by this court to be invalid, and not a lien upon its property. So it eventually turned out that the loan was made to a private business corporation upon personal security alone. While there is no evidence that the trustee did not act in good faith in making the loan, doubtless deeming it entirely safe, and amply secured, yet he cannot be protected against the loss. We are disposed, on this subject, to follow the English rule which has been adopted in some of our sister states, and hold that the trustee cannot invest trust funds in personal securities, and that it is not an exercise of sound discretion to so invest them. Says PARKER, V. C., in Ackerman v. Emott, 4 Barb. 626-636: "It is a well-settled rule of the English court of chancery that the trustee can only protect himself against risk by investing the trust fund in real estate, or governmental securities. He must either take security on real estate, or invest in a fund approved by the court; and no other fund is there approved by the courts except the public funds." The learned counsel on behalf of the trustee candidly admits that it is the rule of the earlier decisions, and the one which is laid down in some of our elementary works on this subject, which say that the trustee is personally liable in case of any loss from investments in personal securities, no matter how safe they may, at the time, seem to be. The concession is according to the fact, as an examination of the authorities will show. But he insists that this well-established rule shall be changed to meet the conditions and needs of present business and methods of investment. Investments, he says, in personal securities, are deemed quite as safe and reliable, by good business men, as loans upon real estate, which is subject to great changes in value from one cause or another. This remark may be true when applied to new towns or cities where there is more or less speculation in real estate; but as a general rule the commercial world regards loans made upon adequate real estate security as more safe and desirable than upon personal security. Of course it is not practicable for a trustee always to find government securities in which to invest, but he can usually find opportunities to make loans upon safe and adequate real estate securities, and, in view of the hazards of other investments, of which this case furnishes a good illustration, we are disposed to hold that the trustee should not be protected against loss in investing trust funds unless he loans on real estate security, or invests in some other security approved by the court to which he is accountable for the manner he executes his trust. If this rule shall be found inconvenient, or on the whole not best adapted to the new condition of things, or to the necessities of present business arrangements, the legislature can change it by authorizing the investment of trust funds in shares or stocks, or on the credit of business corporations, or on the personal security of individuals. We prefer to adhere to the well-established rule in relation to the investment of trust funds, and if a change is to be made let the legislature make it. We do not enter upon a discussion of the doctrine which makes an investment on private or personal security at the risk of the trustee, because the law is elementary. The prevailing rule in the United States and in England is to prefer either public securities or real estate securities to personal security, and this, we think, is a wise and salutary rule to follow. Hill, Trustees, 368 et seq., and cases referred to in the notes; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 453 et seq.; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1074; Clark v. Garfield, 8 Allen, 427.

It follows from these views that the judgment of the circuit court must be affirmed.

HARVARD COLLEGE et al. v. AMORY.

(9 Pick. 446.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Jan. 10, 1831.

S. Hubbard, for appellants. Sullivan & Shaw, for appellee.

PUTNAM, J. The confidence which the testator reposed in his executors, whom he also constituted his trustees, was unbounded. He directed that they, as trustees, should not be required to give any other security than their own bond, without sureties, and that each of them should be accountable "simply for his own acts, doings and defaults as such trustee."

The general question is, whether the trustees have abused the trust.

The testator made provision for the support of his wife mainly from the proceeds of the trust fund. He speaks of the profits, income, dividends, which were to come from it through their hands. They were to loan the 50,000 dollars upon ample and sufficient security, or invest the same in safe and productive stock, either in the public funds, bank shares or other stock, according to their best judgment and discretion.

It is very clear that the testator did not intend to limit the income to the simple interest of the fund; for if he had so intended, he would not have spoken of dividends and profits, but would have given an annuity of three thousand dollars a year.

It has been argued that the testator gave the sum of fifty thousand dollars as the trust fund, and that the trustees could only have demanded that sum of the executors. But we think that no important inference can be drawn from that fact. It would not follow from thence, that there should have been a sale of the personal property or stocks of the testator and a reinvestment. The trustees and the executors were the same persons, and instead of going through the useless formality of a sale and investment, it was clearly competent for them to select from the ample funds of the estate, those stocks which should form the capital of the trust fund. And in making that selection, it is very clear to us, that they should have preferred that stock which would probably give her the most profit, and at the same time preserve the value of the capital sum. It would not for example have been the exercise of a sound discretion, to have appropriated the trust fund in the stock of an incorporated company which gave great dividends for the time being, but which would, according to the terms of its charter, expire as soon as the death of the wife could be calculated to happen. In such a case nothing would be left of the capital for those in remainder. On the other hand, if the investment of the trust fund were in stock which made large dividends, and which had acquired its value by the prudent management of its proprietors, and might be reasonably calculated upon as a safe and permanent capital, such an investment would seem to be according to the manifest intent of the testator.

It is somewhat remarkable that the testator did not himself appropriate the stock of which the trust fund should consist, but that he should have left the selection to his trustees. But as it would have been necessary to empower them to change, sell out and reinvest, perhaps it was wise in the testator to leave the whole matter, the selection as well as the management, to them. Be that as it may, he has given them that authority.

But it has happened that the value of the capital stock in which the trust fund was invested, has fallen, and those in remainder call upon the trustees to make up the deficiency.

It was said by Lord Hardwicke in Jackson v. Jackson, 1 Atk. 514, that "to compel trustees to make up a deficiency not owing to their wilful default, is the harshest demand that can be made in a court of equity." The statute of Geo. I, for the indemnity of guardians and trustees, provides that if there be a diminution of the principal, without the default of the trustees, they shall not be liable. If that were otherwise, who would undertake such hazardous responsibility?

It is argued for the appellants, that the trustees have not loaned the money on good security. The answer is found in the authority which the testator gave to them. They were to loan, or to invest the fund in stocks. They preferred the latter.

But it is argued, that they did not invest in the public funds, bank shares or other stock, within the true intent and meaning of the authority, but in trading companies, and so exposed the capital to great loss. And we are referred to Trafford v. Boehm, 3 Atk. 444, to prove the position, that such an investment will not have the support of a court of chancery. The chancellor seems to suppose that funds or other good securities, must be such as have the engagement of the government to pay off their capital. Bank stock, as well as South-Sea stock, which were in the management of directors, &c. were not considered by that court as good security. But no such rule has ever been recognized here. In point of fact, there has been as great fluctuation in the value of the stock which was secured by the promise and faith of the government, as of the stock of banks. And besides, the testator himself considers that bank shares might be a safe object of investment—"safe and productive stock." And yet bank shares may be subject to losses which may sweep away their whole value. Lord Hardwicke considers that South-Sea annuities and bank annuities stand upon different footing, because the directors have nothing to do with the principal, and are only to pay the interest, until the government pay off the capital, and therefore that they only are properly good securities.

This reasoning has very little or no application here; for, in the first place, the stocks depending upon the promise of the government, or, as they are called, the public funds, are exceedingly limited in amount, compared with the amount of trust funds to be invested; and, in the second place, it may well be doubted, if more confidence should be reposed in the engagements of the public, than in the promises and conduct of private corporations which are managed by substantial and prudent directors. There is one consideration much in favour of investing in the stock of private corporations. They are amenable to the law. The holder may pursue his legal remedy and compel them or their officers to do justice. But the government can only be supplicated.

It has been argued, that manufacturing and insurance stocks are not safe, because the principal is at hazard. But this objection applies to bank shares, as well as to shares in incorporated manufacturing and insurance companies. To a certain extent, each may be considered as concerned or interested in trade. The bank deals in bills of exchange and notes, and the value of its capital depends upon the solvency of its debtors. It may, for example, very properly discount upon the responsibility of merchants of good credit at the time, but who, before the maturity of their notes, become bankrupts from unavoidable and unforeseen mercantile hazards. In this way a bank becomes indirectly interested in navigation, trade and merchandise, to an extent very little, if any, short of the trade in which manufacturing companies engage. The capital in both cases may be lost by the conduct of those who direct their affairs, notwithstanding the exercise of reasonable prudence and discretion.

In regard to insurance companies or incorporations, the capital seems, at first view, to be exposed to greater risk, but it is believed that there has not been much if any more fluctuation of the capital in those investments, than in incorporated companies for banking or manufacturing purposes. If the insurance be so general as to embrace a fair proportion of all the property at risk, it will generally yield a reasonable profit, and preserve the capital entire.

It will not do to reject those stocks as unsafe, which are in the management of directors, whose well or ill directed measures may involve a total loss. Do what you will, the capital is at hazard. If the public funds are resorted to, what becomes of the capital when the credit of the government shall be so much impaired as it was at the close of the last war?

Investments on mortgage of real estate are not always safe. Its value fluctuates more, perhaps, than the capital of insurance stock.

Again, the title to real estate, after the most careful investigation, may be involved, and ultimately fail, and so the capital, which was originally supposed to be as firm as the earth itself, will be dissolved.

All that can be required of a trustee to invest, is, that he shall conduct himself faithfully and exercise a sound discretion. He is to observe how men of prudence, discretion and intelligence manage their own affairs, not in regard to speculation, but in regard to the permanent disposition of their funds, considering the probable income, as well as the probable safety of the capital to be invested.

But in the case at bar, the testator referred the management of this trust especially to the judgment and discretion of the trustees whom he appointed; one of whom is the brother, and the other was the cousin of his wife, for whose support this provision was made. These trustees are not to be made chargeable but for gross neglect and wilful mismanagement.

The testator expressly authorized the trustees to invest in "other stock" than bank shares or the public funds; so they might as well select other stock as that which the testator named.

There can be no doubt but that shares in manufacturing and insuring incorporations are and were commonly called and known by the name of stock. The investment would therefore be clearly within the letter of the authority.

It has been argued, "that the trustees should have invested in safe and productive stock, at their own and a sound discretion, without being governed by the known opinions of the testator;" "that he was at liberty to speculate, but the trustees were not." If these positions should be granted, the desired inference would not follow. If the testator, for example, had been in the habit of dealing largely in lotteries and games of hazard, it would undoubtedly not have justified the trustees in making such investments, notwithstanding the testator had been the favourite of fortune. But if the testator had invested his funds to remain permanently in any stock, that circumstance might well be taken into consideration by the trustees when called to exercise their own best skill and discretion. They might reasonably and properly inquire and consider what their testator would do in the circumstances in which they were placed. Would he recommend an investment that should give simple interest on a loan, or in stock that would probably give much more, and yet have the principal sum reasonably safe?

The circumstance of the trustees' reposing confidence where the testator had, is one which is always to be considered as tending properly to their discharge. Thompson v. Brown, 4 Johns. Ch. 628. The case of Rowth v. Howell, 3 Ves. 565, has a strong bearing upon this part of the case. There the testator, having great confidence in his banker, recommended it to his executors not to be in a hurry to withdraw the funds from him. But after the death of the testator, the banker misapplied them, and probably stung by remorse on account of his fraud, he committed suicide. It was urged against the executors, that they might have withdrawn the securities from the banker; and they had time enough to do so; but it was considered that the loss arose from the confidence originally reposed in the banker by the testator, and the executors were not subjected to the loss.

In the case at bar, the testator was a man of extraordinary forecast and discretion, in regard to the management of his property. His vast accumulation could not be ascribed to accidental causes, but to calculation and reflection. The fact that he had within three or four years invested nearly half his property in manufacturing stock, was entitled to great consideration and respect, and would, without any change of circumstances, have a strong tendency to justify the selection of the manufacturing stock as part of the trust fund.

We cannot think with the counsel for the appellants, that the dividend of fourteen per cent arising from the recovery of the claim against the Spanish government, can be considered as part of the capital. It was received in the nature of salvage; which is always divided as profits, and not treated as part of the capital stock.

And we do not think that the negotiations between the Boston Manufacturing Company and the Merrimack Manufacturing Company, in relation to making a large quantity of machinery, and the sale of patents and of patterns for castings, by the Boston Manufacturing Company to the Merrimack Manufacturing Company, should be considered as part of the capital stock. We have seen no evidence that they were ever treated as such by the proprietors. We think the sums arising from those causes were properly considered as the fruits of their industry, and placed to the account of profit and loss of the Boston Manufacturing Company.

It is proved or admitted, that the stock which the trustees selected to constitute the trust fund of 50,000 dollars, was of that value when it was taken by them.

We are of opinion that they had a right to select the stock which they did for that purpose, and that they acted in the premises according to their best skill and discretion. And we have not seen any evidence which would satisfy us, that under all the circumstances of the case, they did not act with a sound discretion in making the selection and investment.

But if we were less clear than we are upon that point, we are of opinion that this whole matter has been settled in the court of probate, where the appellants had notice to attend, and where all objections were raised and considered. The judge thereupon made a decree, from which there has not been any appeal.

ecutors and the trustees are the same persons. On February 9, 1824, the executors, after due notice to all persons interested, presented their account with the estate, and appropriated the stock which should constitute the fund of 50,000 dollars selected by them as trustees for Mrs. McLean. The Massachusetts General Hospital was heard in fact, and (as has been said and not denied) the objections were made by the same able and learned counsel who now appears in their behalf. And upon the hearing, the judge of probate allowed the account. There was no appeal from that settlement. By the legal operation of that settlement, the trustees became chargeable with that selected trust fund, and it is not now competent for the appellants to contend that those stocks were not legally appropriated by the executors and received by the trustees, as the fund of 50,000 dollars given by the testator. If the college had any objections, they should have made them. Probably every objection to the account which could have been made by the college was in fact made by the hospital.

It has been argued that the account which was settled and acquiesced in, was rendered by the executors and not by the trustees, and ought not to bar this process, which is against the surviving trustee. But it was a settlement of the very root and substance of this controversy. The executors announced their selection and appropriation of the stock for the fund. The trustees (being the same persons) became instantly chargeable with the management of it. It is the original misappropriation and selection, which is the subject of complaint. Suppose the trustees had not been the executors, and that the college and the hospital had requested the executors to deliver to the other persons as trustees the particular stock to constitute the trust fund; could those institutions object against the trustees, that those stocks did not constitute a proper fund? It would seem clear that the trustees might justify. They would say to the two institutions, "You acquiesced in the appropriation by the executors, and we also thought it advisable, safe and expedient." We think that that matter having been settled by a court of competent jurisdiction, without appeal, the decree is final and conclusive.

The college and the hospital were especially put upon their guard; for the executors, in their letter of December 27, 1823, informed their committee, that they should be duly notified when these accounts should be presented for allowance at the probate office, that they might object to any arrangements which the executors might have made for the capital of the 50,000 dollars. As no appeal was made from the decree of the probate court, all parties in interest must be presumed to have acquiesced in the arrangements which were then made for the capital of the trust fund of 50,000 dollars. If there had been an appeal, it would probably have been heard and de-terminated before there was any depreciation upon the whole investment. Indeed it appears from the evidence, that the stock of the Merimack Manufacturing Company advanced twenty per cent from the time when the stock was selected in February, 1824, to December 1, 1825.

The claim now made upon the trustees, to make up the subsequent depreciation, would seem to be justified only on the ground of gross abuse of their trust, even if it were not barred by the decree in the probate court from which no appeal was made. But upon examining all the documents and evidence, it seems to us that there is no reason whereon to ground that imputation.

Trustees are justly and uniformly considered favourably, and it is of great importance to bereaved families and orphans, that they should not be held to make good, losses in the depreciation of stocks or the failure of the capital itself, which they held in trust, provided they conduct themselves honestly and discreetly and carefully, according to the existing circumstances, in the discharge of their trusts. If this were held otherwise, no prudent man would run the hazard of losses which might happen without any neglect or breach of good faith.

The judgment of this court is, that the decree of the probate court, from which the appellants appealed, be, and it is hereby affirmed; and that the record be remitted to that court for further proceedings according to law to be there had; and that the appellee recover his costs.

BENTLEY v. CRAVEN.

Court of Chancery. Nov. 15, 16, 1853.

The plaintiff Bentley carried on business in partnership with the defendants Craven, Prest and Younge, as sugar refiners, at Southampton. Craven was the managing partner, and generally resided in London, where he did the agency business of the firm, made all the purchases of sugar and kept the London books, visiting Southampton once a week for the purpose of superintending the affairs there. He was, however, at liberty to carry on, and did carry on, an independent business as a sugar dealer, in which he had great skill and knowledge, and was able to buy to great advantage. Accordingly, in 1851, he bought a quantity of sugar, and afterwards sold it to the firm at a profit, but at the fair market price of the day. Bentley having complained of this, on the ground that they were sugar refiners and not speculators in sugar, Craven took offense and canceled the transaction, but he, nevertheless, continued to speculate in sugars, and, without acquainting his partners with the fact, sold various quantities of his own sugars at various times to the firm, at the market prices of the day, but at a considerable profit in each case, the sums so gained by him amounting in the whole to about £853 17s. 3d.

R. Palmer and W. D. Lewis, for plaintiff. Mr. Amphlett, for Prest. Mr. Cole, for Younge. Mr. Roupell and Mr. Selwyn, for Craven.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. This appears to me to be founded on the first principles of equity, and that it would be a violation of them to allow this gentleman to retain the profit which he has made upon these sugars.

Two principles with relation to the doctrine of principal and agent have been recognized from the earliest times. One is, that an agent employed to purchase cannot legally buy his own goods for his principal; neither can an agent employed to sell, himself purchase the goods of his principal. If he should do so, and thereby make a profit, his principal may either repudiate the transaction altogether or, adopting it, may claim for himself the benefit made by his agent. The same principle is applicable to a great many other relations, as to that of trustee and cestui que trust and others. The court has repeatedly applied this rule where the transaction was perfectly bona fide; it is founded on this principle, that an agent will not be allowed to place himself in a situation which, under ordinary circumstances, would tempt a man to do that which is not the best for his principal, and it is the plain duty of every agent to do the best he can for his principal. I have no doubt that many persons act in ignorance of this rule of equity; for otherwise these cases would not come so frequently into court. I have never seen a case which illustrated the principle more clearly than this.

The case is this: Four partners establish a partnership for refining sugar; one of them is a wholesale grocer, and, from his business, is peculiarly cognizant with the variations in the sugar market, and has great skill in buying sugar at a right and proper time for the business. Accordingly, the business of selecting and purchasing the sugar for the sugar refinery is intrusted to him. He being the person to buy, it is his duty and business to employ his skill in buying for the sugar refinery at the time he thinks most beneficial. Having, according to his skill and knowledge, bought sugar at a time when he thought it likely to rise, and it having risen, and the firm being in want of some, he sells his own sugars to the firm, without letting the partners know that it was his sugar that was sold, for that is expressly and clearly stated in his own affidavit.

In fact, he himself says, not only that he did not tell his copartners, but that he avoided it. The only way in which a sale of that sort could be made valid and effectual would be by communication of the fact. The agent should say to his principal "I have certain sugars of my own which I do not choose to sell to you, unless you give a particular price for them; you have the option to do it or not, as you think fit." If he had said that, the relation of principal and agent between them would, so far as this transaction was concerned, have been determined. If, after receiving this statement, his partners had consented to his terms, the transaction might have stood good; but, in the absence of such a statement, the purchase by an agent of his own goods for his principal cannot be sustained in this court, even though the sale may have been made at the fair market price, and at such a price as that at which he might have sold to any other person; and if, by such a transaction, he makes a profit, the principal is entitled to take that profit to himself. This accordingly puts an end to the questions as to whether the partners are bound to adopt or to repudiate the transaction; or if they adopt it, as to the price at which the sugar should be charged and the like. This gentleman has made a profit of £853 in the course of one year, by sales to himself as agent of the firm, and in my opinion the firm is entitled to that benefit and profit. He is agent for the firm for buying sugars; he has sold his own sugars to the firm and made that profit, and the firm are entitled to it accordingly.

MUNSON et al. v. SYRACUSE, G. & C. RY.

Court of Appeals of New York. Oct. 5, 1886.

Appeal by plaintiffs from a judgment upon a decision of the general term of the Fifth department of the supreme court, affirming a judgment entered upon the report of a referee in favor of defendant. The action was to enforce specific performance of a contract to deliver certain bonds of the Syracuse, Geneva & Corning Railway Company. The issues were referred to J. L. Angle, of Rochester, who reported in favor of plaintiff, August 20, 1880, and judgment was entered directing specific performance of the contract, from which judgment defendants appealed to the general term, Fourth department, on which appeal said judgment was reversed, on the ground that the contract sought to be enforced was against public policy. The case was again tried before A. J. Northrup, as referee, who reported in favor of defendants, upon which report judgment was entered dismissing the complaint, from which judgment plaintiffs appealed to the general term, when the last-named judgment was affirmed. Plaintiff thereupon appealed to the court of appeals.

Samuel Hand and B. W. Huntington, for appellants, Edgar Munson and others. Geo. F. Comstock, for respondents, Syracuse, G. & C. Ry. Co. and another.

ANDREWS, J. We think it would be difficult to affirm the judgment of the court below dismissing the complaint, if, in order to do so, it was necessary to uphold the proposition that the original contract of August 13, 1875, between the plaintiffs and Magee, was invalid either because Munson, one of the plaintiffs, was, at the time of entering into the contract, a director of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, or for the reason that the contract violated the rule which prohibits combinations to prevent competition at a judicial or other public sale. The situation was briefly this:

The Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company was organized in 1871 to construct and operate a railroad from Corning, in the county of Steuben, to Sodus Bay, in the county of Wayne, a distance of about 86 miles, passing through the counties of Schuyler, Yates, and Ontario, by way of Savona, Penn Yann, and Geneva. Of this road the plaintiff Munson was president and a director. In 1872 the corporation created a mortgage on its projected road, its franchises and property, for $1,500,000, to secure a contemplated issue of bonds to that amount, to be used in the construction of the road. It proceeded to secure rights of way over a portion of its line, graded about 30 miles of its track, between Savona and Geneva, and expended in the aggregate, in securing titles and in the prosecution of the work, the sum of $250,000. It issued bonds under the mortgage to the amount of $257,000, from the proceeds of which the expenditures were made. At the date of the contract between the plaintiffs and Magee, August 13, 1875, the plaintiffs held and controlled, of the bonds, $241,000 in amount; the remaining $16,000 being in the hands of a former treasurer of the company, whose title thereto seems to have been disputed, but who subsequently received a dividend thereon from the proceeds of the mortgage sale. The title of the plaintiffs to the $241,000 of bonds was not questioned, and there is no suggestion that they were not bona fide holders for value, or that the bonds did not represent a valid debt against the company for their full amount.

In January, 1874, the company became insolvent. It defaulted in the payment of the interest on its bonds at that date, and in the spring of 1875 all operations on the road were suspended, and the further prosecution of the enterprise was practically abandoned. In short, when the contract of August 13, 1875, was made, the company was hopelessly bankrupt, the work had stopped, the interest on its bonds had been unpaid for 18 months, and practically its whole property consisted of disconnected rights of way over a portion of its route, and a road-bed partially graded between Savona and Geneva; and whatever property it had of any value was acquired through the means furnished by the holders of the bonds.

Under these circumstances the parties entered into the contract of August 13, 1875. It recites that the plaintiffs own and represent $241,000 of the bonds of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, and that Magee, the other party to the contract, represents the persons and interests proposing to organize another railroad company for the construction of a railroad from the vicinity of Corning to Geneva. The parties of the first part (the plaintiffs) agree to proceed at once to secure the foreclosure of the mortgage, and purchase, on the foreclosure sale, the property, rights of way, franchises, and interests covered thereby, and convey the same to Magee, or to the railroad company proposed to be organized. Magee, the other party to the contract, agrees to deliver, or cause to be delivered, to Munson and his associates, in payment for the said property, rights of way, and franchises—First, mortgage bonds of the proposed railway company to the amount of 50 per cent. of the principal and interest of the bonds of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company held by them. The contract contains other stipulations not now necessary to mention.

In the view we take of another question in the case, we deem it unnecessary to determine whether the contract of August 13, 1875, was valid as between the original parties thereto; that is, whether the plaintiff Munson, in entering into the contract, violated any duty owing by him to the corporation of which he was a director, or whether the contract as a whole was, on the part of Munson and his associates, anything more than a legitimate arrangement to protect their interests as bondholders, and to make the mortgage security available for the payment of a part of the mortgage debt. The contract was not by or with the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company; and, assuming that the question as to the validity of the original contract can be raised in this action, we are not prepared, without further consideration, to condemn the transaction on either of the grounds suggested. Duncomb v. Railroad Co., 84 N. Y. 190; Marie v. Garrison, 83 N. Y. 14; Harpending v. Munson, 91 N. Y. 650. But this action is not brought to enforce the contract of August 13, 1875, against the defendant Magee. It is an action to compel the specific performance, by the defendant corporation, of the undertaking of Magee in that contract to deliver the bonds of the new company as therein provided, founded upon the assumption by the new company of that obligation, by resolution of its board of directors passed August 13, 1875, and also upon the subsequent contract of September 14, 1875, made between the company and the plaintiffs, which in its primary provision substituted the company to the place of Magee as the party of the second part in the contract of August 13, 1875.

The action in its entire scope is framed to enforce the obligation of the defendant corporation under its contract of assumption. It was tried upon this theory. The exceptions point to this as the ground of the action, and Magee is joined as defendant, and in the demand of relief, as the custodian of bonds of the company which the plaintiffs claimed he should be adjudged to deliver to them by the judgment in the action. Throughout the trial the action was treated as an action against the defendant corporation upon its contract, and in no respect as an action against Magee to enforce a liability against him under the contract of August 13, 1875. The plaintiffs, therefore, are compelled to meet the question whether, upon principles of equity, they are entitled to the aid of the court to enforce an executory contract between themselves on the one side, and the defendant corporation on the other, for the sale of the property of the former, in a case where one of the plaintiffs, at the time the contract was made, was a director of the purchasing corporation, and took part in making the contract upon which the action is brought.

For a proper understanding of the situation a few additional facts need to be stated. On the twenty-sixth of August, 1875, Magee and his associates organized a railroad company to construct a railroad from Corning to Geneva, as contemplated by the contract of August 13, 1875. The plaintiff Munson was one of the promoters, and became a director and stockholder, and was the first president of the corporation. On the thirty-first of August, 1875, Magee executed a written assignment to the new corporation, the Syracuse, Geneva & Corning Railway Company, of his rights under the contract with the plaintiffs of August 13, 1875; and the board of directors, at a meeting on the same day, in which the plaintiff Munson participated, passed a resolution assuming the contract on the part of Magee, and agreeing to perform it, except in one particular not now material to be mentioned. On the fourteenth of September, 1875, the contract before referred to of that date was entered into between the plaintiffs and the new corporation, and was executed individually by each of the plaintiffs, and on the part of the corporation by the plaintiff Munson as president. The proceedings of the board of directors indicate that when the resolution of August 13, 1875, was passed, and for two or three months thereafter, the company contemplated building its road to Geneva on the same line substantially as that of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, but in December, 1875, it located an entirely new line, not coincident in any part with the line originally contemplated, upon which new line its road was subsequently built. It is found, and the evidence supports the finding, that the best interests of the company were promoted by adopting its present route. The plaintiffs procured a foreclosure of the mortgage, and purchased the property, as they had agreed, and subsequently, in 1877, tendered a deed thereof to the defendant corporation, and demanded the delivery of the bonds, which was refused.

In determining the legal question presented, it is proper to say that there is no evidence of any actual fraud or collusion on the part of any of the parties to the original contract of August 13, 1875, or that the contract of assumption was induced by any improper appliances or motives whatever. It is plain that Magee and his associates, when they entered into the original contract, contemplated building the proposed road on the line of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, and that the contract was made with a view of acquiring for the new road the rights of way and other property of that corporation. It is equally plain that the contract of assumption was entered into by the new corporation with the same expectation, and for the same purpose.

If the contract was otherwise unobjectionable, it could not, we think, be assailed on the ground that it was a contract outside of the power of the defendant corporation. The statute authorizes a railroad corporation to acquire land for its track and other necessary purposes, by voluntary purchase or by condemnation (Laws 1850, c. 140, §§ 14, 15); and an agreement, made on the purchase of rights of way, to pay therefor in bonds of the purchasing corporation, secured by a mortgage on its property, is clearly, we think, within the implied, if not within the express, powers of a railroad corporation. Section 28, subd. 10. The contract made between the defendant corporation and the plaintiffs was in substance a contract to purchase rights of way; and although the defendant's line was not formally located on the line proposed to be purchased, and was in fact subsequently located on a different line, this change of purpose does not, we think, affect the question of corporate power.

But we are of opinion that the contract of September 14, 1875, is repugnant to the great rule of law which invalidates all contracts made by a trustee or fiduciary, in which he is personally interested, at the election of the party he represents. There is no controversy as to the facts bringing the case as to Munson within the operation of the rule. He and his associates were dealing with a corporation in which Munson was a director, in a matter where the interests of the contracting parties were or might be in conflict. The contract bound the corporation to purchase, and Munson, as one of the directors, participated in the action of the corporation in assuming the obligation, and in binding itself to pay the price primarily agreed upon between the plaintiffs and Magee. He stood in the attitude of selling as owner, and purchasing as trustee. The law permits no one to act in such inconsistent relations. It does not stop to inquire whether the contract or transaction was fair or unfair. It stops the inquiry when the relation is disclosed, and sets aside the transaction, or refuses to enforce it, at the instance of the party whom the fiduciary undertook to represent, without undertaking to deal with the question of abstract justice in the particular case. It prevents frauds by making them, as far as may be, impossible, knowing that real motives often elude the most searching inquiry; and it leaves neither to judge nor jury the right to determine, upon a consideration of its advantages or disadvantages, whether a contract made under such circumstances shall stand or fall.

It can make no difference in the application of the rule in this case that Munson's associates were not themselves disabled from contracting with the corporation, or that Munson was only one of ten directors who voted in favor of the contract. The contract on its face notified Munson's associates of his relation to the corporation, and that the contract was subject to be defeated on that ground; and, on the other hand, a corporation, in order to defeat a contract entered into by directors, in which one or more of them had a private interest, is not bound to show that the influence of the director or directors having the private interest determined the action of the board. The law cannot accurately measure the influence of a trustee with his associates, nor will it enter into the inquiry, in an action by the trustee in his private capacity to enforce the contract, in the making of which he participated. The value of the rule of equity to which we have adverted, lies, to a great extent, in its stubbornness and inflexibility. Its rigidity gives it one of its chief uses as a preventive or discouraging influence, because it weakens the temptation to dishonesty or unfair dealing on the part of the trustees, vitiating, without attempt at discrimination, all transactions in which they assume the dual characters of principal and representative.

The rule has been declared and enforced in a great variety of cases; but in none, perhaps, with more vigor and completeness, both upon principle and authority, than in the leading case of Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252. But the case of Railway Co. v. Blakie, 1 Macq. 461, decided by the house of lords, is in many of its features similar to the present one. In that case it appeared that the plaintiffs were a manufacturing firm, and that one of them was also a manager of the Aberdeen Railway Company, the defendant, and the chairman of the board. At a meeting of the managers, they by resolution authorized their engineer to contract for iron chairs needed by the company. The agent contracted with the plaintiffs' firm. It did not appear that the member of the firm, who was also a manager and the chairman of the company, intermeddled with the dealing on either side, further than that it may be assumed he was at the meeting which authorized the engineer to procure a supply of chairs. The plaintiffs brought their suit to enforce specifically the performance of the contract, or, in the alternative, to recover damages for its non-performance. After a decision in their favor in the lower court, the company appealed to the house of lords, where the ruling was unanimously reversed, on the ground that the contract was condemned by the rules of equity as having been made between the company of which one of the plaintiffs was a manager, and a private firm of which he was a member. The opinions of Lord Chancellor Cranworth, and of Lord Brougham, vindicate, upon impregnable grounds, the general rule, and its application to the particular case.

We have designedly omitted, up to this time, special reference to a circumstance which it is claimed takes the case out of the operation of the general equitable rule; that is, that the contract with the defendant corporation was not, on the part of the plaintiffs, a fresh dealing in respect to the sale of their interest in the property of the Sodus Bay & Corning Railroad Company, but was simply a substitution, in the place of Magee, of the corporation organized by him and his associates for the purpose of carrying out the original arrangement. But the promoters of the corporation are not the corporation. The legal body is distinct from the individuals who compose it. The statute confers no authority upon the promoters of a corporation to enter into preliminary contracts binding the corporation when it shall come into existence. Such contracts may bind the individuals who make them. If adopted by the corporation, and they are within the corporate powers, and are not otherwise subject to objection, they may become the contract of the corporation, and enforceable as such.

In respect to contracts of promoters, Judge Redfield says: "The promoters are in no sense identical with the corporation, nor do they represent it in any relation of agency; and their contracts could, of course, only bind the company so far as they should be subsequently adopted by it as their successors." 1 Redf. Rys. 9.

But the corporation is at liberty to refuse to sanction them; and, if its sanction is obtained by the act or co-operation of directors who have a private interest, we perceive no reason why, under the general rule, the corporation may not resist an action for specific performance; at least, in a case where it has not accepted the consideration and taken the benefit.

It is claimed that the general policy of the law in this state sanctions the contract in question, and we are referred to chapter 710, Laws 1873, which authorizes the purchaser, or the grantee of the purchaser, of the real estate, tracks, and fixtures of a railroad corporation sold under a mortgage or decree, to associate with him other persons, and form a new corporation to maintain and operate the road. But the transaction in question was not in any proper sense an arrangement for the reorganization of an existing railroad. It was contemplated that the new corporation should operate or maintain the road of the old corporation. The line of the new corporation, by its articles, extended only from Corning to Geneva; whereas the route of the old corporation was from Corning to Sodus Bay. When the contract was made, the enterprise of building the Sodus Bay & Corning road had been commenced, but the road had not been built. Its route had only in part been located, and the great burden and expense of the undertaking was yet to be incurred. The case is not in terms within the act of 1873; nor, as we think, within its spirit and intent.

These views lead to an affirmance of the judgment. All concur, except RAPALLO and FINCH, JJ., not voting.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 6, 1896.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Allegheny county; Thomas Ewing, Judge.

Bill by Martha K. Rich against Black & Baird, Daniel H. Barr, and others, to have said Barr declared trustee for plaintiff as to certain land, and to obtain an accounting by defendants. From a decree for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. S. & E. G. Ferguson, for appellants. M. A. Woodward, for appellee.

STERRETT, C. J. The rule of public policy which avoids, at the instance of the cestui que trust, purchases made by agents for sale, is practically absolute in its character. Courts of equity view such transactions with jealous eye; and it is only under special circumstances, amounting to a dissolution of the trust relation, when the parties have dealt at arm's length, that their validity is recognized. Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 254. And the reasons are obvious. On the one hand, the relation which such agents bear is confidential, and disarms the vigilance of their principals. It affords peculiar facilities for obtaining exclusive information in respect of the property intrusted to them for sale. Their employment implies that they have superior advantages for making sales, and that they will use every effort and means to obtain the highest price for the benefit of their principals. On the other hand, their individual interest is to purchase at the lowest price, and places them in a position which is inconsistent with the faithful and proper discharge of the duties of the trust. The opportunity will naturally lead to temptation, to abuse, and, as was aptly said by Mr. Chancellor Kent in Davoue v. Fanning, supra, be poisonous in its consequences. The cestui que trust is not bound to prove, nor is the court bound to judge, that the trustee has made a bargain advantageous to himself. The fact may be so, and yet the party not have it in his power distinctly and clearly to show it. "There may be fraud," as Lord Hardwicke observed, "and the party not able to prove it." Thus an agent, by virtue of his trust relation, may discover valuable minerals in the land, and, locking the knowledge in his breast, take advantage of it in making a contract with his cestui que trust. If he deny it, how can the court find the fact? "The probability is that a trustee who has once conceived such a purpose will never disclose it, and the cestui que trust will be effectually defrauded." Ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. 627. So he may take advantage of his superior knowledge of the market and skill in manipulation to obtain results beneficial to himself. "It is to guard against this uncertainty and hazard of abuse, and to remove the trustee from temptation, that the rule does and will permit the cestui que trust to come, at his own option, and without showing actual injury, and insist upon having the experiment of another sale" (Davoue v. Fanning, supra); or, as was held in our own case of Swisshelm's Appeal, 56 Pa. St. 475, treat the purchase as inoperative in respect of the land unsold by the trustee, and compel an account of the proceeds of sale made by him to innocent purchasers for value. "This is a remedy that goes deep, and touches the very root of the matter." Davoue v. Fanning, supra; Leisenring v. Black, 5 Watts, 303; Parshall's Appeal, 65 Pa. St. 224; Rice v. Davis, 136 Pa. St. 439, 20 Atl. 513; Murphy v. O'Shea, 2 Jones & Le T. 422. The cestui que trust must, it is true, move within a reasonable time; but what shall amount to a reasonable time will depend on circumstances, and lies in the discretion of the court. In the absence of special circumstances which may lengthen or shorten the time, the analogy of the law is followed. Marshall's Estate, 138 Pa. St. 285, 22 Atl. 90. These appellants misapprehend the rationale of this rule. They insist that because, as they claim, the sale was satisfactory to Mrs. Rich, the rule has no application. Conceding that in the first instance it was satisfactory, that fact would not take away her option to rescind; for these appellants then and for a long time afterwards ostensibly maintained towards her the character of agents for sale, and willfully concealed the fact of their own interest. They maintain their characters of inconsistency even now by claiming not only title as purchasers, but commissions as agents for sale. Roll, whom they first reported as the purchaser, confessedly knew nothing of it. The alleged interest of Gillespie and Neeb is more than doubtful, and, if it ever existed, was soon parted with. To all practical intents and purposes, these agents were the real purchasers, without the knowledge of their cestui que trust. Rosenberger's Appeal, 26 Pa. St. 67. However Mrs. Rich may have felt in the first instance in regard to the sale, it is not likely that it would have been satisfactory had she been fully informed of the facts. When she gave her agents a minimum price, it was manifestly intended as a guide to them in negotiating sale, and implied a just expectation on her part and an engagement on theirs that they would make an honest endeavor to obtain a higher price. If Roll, Gillespie, and Neeb were really intending purchasers, the obvious course was that these agents for sale should take competitive bids. They did not occupy the position of middlemen with equal duty to both. Their primary duty was to Mrs. Rich. But, so far as appears, no bona fide effort was made by them to perform this duty. Instead, Mrs. Rich was asked to take less, and, when this was refused, they hastened to avail themselves of the minimum price in their own interest, and had already made large profits before Mrs. Rich's discovery of the facts. If they could realize profits for themselves, they could and should have done so for their cestui que trust. That was their employment, and that their undertaking; and equity will treat that as done which ought to have been done. To sustain the purchase made in these circumstances would work "actual injury" to Mrs. Rich, tend to encourage breaches of trust, and violate a wise rule of public policy. Having taken action in time, the plaintiff was entitled to the relief which the decree of the court below is intended to secure. Decree affirmed, and appeal dismissed, with costs to be paid by appellants; and it is ordered that the record be remitted to the court below for further proceedings.

BENT v. PRIEST.

(86 Mo. 475.)

Supreme Court of Missouri. Oct. Term, 1885.

A. J. P. Garesche and J. M. Holmes, for appellant. T. L. Gant and J. M. Glover, for respondent.

BLACK, J. In 1873, the superintendent of insurance began proceedings to wind up the St. Louis Mutual Insurance Company, which was not then in a satisfactory condition. Most of the directors regarded a reinsurance as the best way out of the difficulty. Efforts were made to that end, including negotiations with the Mound City Life Insurance Company. Charles H. Peck, who was a large stockholder in the St. Louis Mutual, but not a director or officer, made proposals to some of the officers of the Mound City to bring about such an arrangement, the result of which was a contract between Peck and the president of that company, dated the 27th of November, 1873, by which, after reciting the desire of that company to effect the reinsurance, and the deemed necessity of Peck's services to accomplish that object, the company agreed to pay him $155,000 within sixty days, for which sum Peck was to "devote his services for the procurement of such reinsurance and effecting a contract between said companies."

Peck thereupon approached the defendant, a director of the St. Louis Mutual, who at first did not take much interest in the matter. Peck, then, in substance, stated that he was largely interested in having the reinsurance effected; that it was worth ten or fifteen thousand dollars to the stockholders of the St. Louis Mutual, and that he meant business.

Priest and Wyman were partners in the real estate business, and upon Peck's suggestion that his business was legitimately within the partnership business, Priest referred Peck to Wyman, who was at a desk in the same room or office. The result of the negotiation between Peck and Wyman was that the former placed bonds of the Leavenworth, Atchison & Northwestern Railroad Company of the par value of fifteen thousand dollars in the hands of Mullikin to be handed to Wyman, if the reinsurance was effected, otherwise they were to be returned to Peck. This agreement was in writing, but was subsequently destroyed. The evidence, including a letter from Peck, shows that he agreed within thirty days to substitute money, or bonds of the Vulcan Iron Company, or St. Louis Gaslight Company, for these railroad bonds, the latter, it is said, then being worth but sixty cents on the dollar.

As the Mound City Insurance Company then stood, the superintendent of insurance did not regard it strong enough to make the reinsurance, and it was required to add a half million dollars to its capital stock. In December, 1873, a contract of reinsurance was made by the St. Louis Mutual with the Mound City, the latter also stipulating that for a transfer of all of the assets of the St. Louis Mutual it would assume all the liabilities of that company, increase its own stock a half a million dollars, and out of this increased stock exchange its own stock for that of the St. Louis Mutual. Of the twenty directors of the St. Louis Mutual, seventeen, including the defendant, voted for the measure. The Mound City increased its stock as agreed, the reinsurance was approved by the superintendent of insurance and by the court in which the proceedings against the St. Louis Mutual were pending, and those proceedings were dismissed. By the 17th of January, 1874, the whole contract was substantially completed. Peck received his agreed compensation from the Mound City Insurance Company in secured notes which that company acquired by the assignment from the St. Louis Mutual. Peck would not, at least did not, substitute money or bonds of the iron company, or gas company, as he had agreed, for the railroad bonds in the hands of Mullikin, and Wyman, unable to do better, took those bonds. In August, 1874, Priest and Wyman dissolved their partnership, at which time Wyman handed over to Priest the one-half of the railroad bonds.

The conclusion from all the evidence is irresistible that defendant agreed to and did advocate and vote for the assignment and reinsurance, in consideration of the arrangement between Peck and Wyman. At all events the bonds were given to secure defendant's active influence in favor of the measure, though without this he might not have been hostile to the transaction.

In 1877 the superintendent of insurance commenced new proceedings against the St. Louis Mutual Life Insurance Company, and plaintiff was appointed receiver. By this suit he seeks to charge the defendant as a trustee of all the railroad bonds. The circuit court so held and decreed as to the one-half received by the defendant, and on his refusal to produce the same, entered a money judgment for the estimated value. From this judgment the defendant appealed. Plaintiff took a writ of error. In like manner both parties come to this court from the court of appeals, where the judgment of the circuit court was affirmed.

1. An agent or trustee cannot unite in himself the opposite character of buyer and seller, and if he does the profits may be charged with a trust for the benefit of the principal, unless the latter confirm the transaction with full knowledge of all the facts. So, too, if the agent make gains from the use of the trust funds or property he must account therefor. We need not cite authorities from this and other courts to support these plain propositions. Again, if the agent accept any benefits in conducting the business of his principal he will hold them in trust for the principal. Story, Agency (8th Ed.) § 211; Perry, Trusts, § 206; Jacobus v. Munn, 37 N. J. Eq. 48.

The directors of a corporation occupy a fiduciary position. They are trustees and agents of the corporation and stockholders. In general they are governed by the same rules as are applied to trustees and agents. Parker v. Nickerson, 112 Mass. 195; Railway Co. v. Poor, 59 Me. 277; Railway Co. v. Hudson, 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 365. In Perry on Trusts, at section 207, it is said: "And so all advantages, all purchases, all sales, and all sums of money received by directors in dealing with the property of the corporation are made and received by them as trustees of the corporation, and they must account for all such moneys or advantages, received by them by reason of their position as trustees." Defendant does not seriously controvert these general principles of equity jurisprudence, but he insists they have no rightful application to this case, because the bonds were never made a part of the assets of the St. Louis Mutual, did not constitute a part of the consideration, avowed or concealed, paid by the Mound City, and were not made by him in the legitimate business of the corporation. He relies with full confidence upon Tyrrell v. Bank, 10 H. L. Cas. 26. The substantial facts of that case were these: The bank had been recently organized, and Tyrrell was its solicitor. Mrs. Campbell owned certain property, upon a part of which was situated a building known as the Hall of Commerce. Read had a contract with her for the purchase of the whole property at £49,200. Tyrrell and Read formed a combination to sell the property to the bank at an advanced price, and Tyrrell, for his influence, was to have a one-half interest in the contract, which Read had with Mrs. Campbell. Tyrrell kept the agreement secret from the bank, at the same time urged the bank to purchase, professing to act for it as solicitor. Eventually the bank purchased the Hall of Commerce part of the property at £65,000. Out of this Mrs. Campbell was paid, some litigated claims were settled, and the balance was paid to Read, who divided the profits with Tyrrell, each making some £6,000, and had left also the unsold portion of the property, alleged to be of the value of £8,000. The suit was brought by the bank against Tyrrell and Read. The master of the rolls dismissed the bill as to Read, and decreed Tyrrell a trustee for the bank of all interest acquired in the property, accounts were directed to be taken, and Tyrrell was ordered to convey to the bank his share in the property not sold to the bank. On appeal, prosecuted by Tyrrell, the decree was modified in form. The Lords considered that Tyrrell could not be decreed a trustee of the unsold portion of the property, and should not have been directed to convey that to the bank, because, as was said, the limit of the agency of Tyrrell, the extent of his obligation, and the relation of solicitor and client, were to be ascertained by the extent of the property sold by Tyrrell to the bank. The lord chancellor very clearly states that Tyrrell could only be a trustee as to that portion of the property sold to the bank, and as to that he should make no gain. He proceeds to say the object which the master of the rolls has in view is to be accomplished in another way: "Tyrrell must receive from his clients, in his character of vendor to his clients, only that sum of money which, as between him and Read, Tyrrell must be taken to have paid for the property conveyed to his clients, but that sum of money must be ascertained in the following way: by deducting from it the value of the unsold property included in the contract between Read and Tyrrell, but not included in the contract of sale to the clients."

The bank among other things contended that, assuming Tyrrell's agency as to the bank was confined to the Hall of Commerce part of the property, still the circumstances showed that he received the share in the rest as a bribe, and for that reason the bank was entitled to a conveyance of it. As to this contention, Lord Chelmsford said: "No authority has been adduced in support of such a proposition, and I do not think it can be maintained. In order to simplify the question, let it be supposed that Tyrrell had acquired no interest in the property, but that Read had offered him £5,000 to induce the respondent to purchase, and that they had been persuaded by Tyrrell to buy at an excessive price. Of course, they might have rescinded the contract, but could they in any manner have obtained the £5,000 on the ground that it belonged to them? If, by reason of the agreement between Read and Tyrrell, the respondent had been prevailed upon to give too large a sum for the property, they might have maintained an action on the case against both the parties to the imposition upon them, and have recovered damages; or they might have sued their agent, Tyrrell, for damages arising from the breach of duty, and they would probably have received an amount equal to the sum which he had improperly received as a fair measure of the injury which they had sustained. But the £5,000 itself, as a specific demand, they could in no manner have recovered. The unsold part of the property in the same manner cannot be directly reached by any proceeding of the respondent." These remarks of Lord Chelmsford, if detached from the facts of that case and the decree actually made, appear to give some support to the defendant's position here.

The solicitor could be regarded as the agent of the bank only so far as the bank became the purchaser; beyond that he had a right to deal for himself; yet the decree as modified did not allow him to make any gain out of the transaction taken as a whole. He was allowed to keep the unsold portion, but its value was deducted from the amount which he was allowed to receive from the clients in the statement of the account. Practically, there was little, if any, difference between the decree as made by the master of the rolls and as modified, in its effect upon the parties, and this seems to have been conceded in terms by Lord Cranworth. The facts there in judgment and the decree even as modified do not furnish a precedent in defendant's favor.

Where a trustee retired from his office in consideration that his successor paid him a sum of money, it was held that the money so paid should be treated as a part of the trust estate, and be accounted for as such by the retiring trustee, on the ground that he could make no profit directly or indirectly from the trust property, or from his office of trustee. Sugden v. Crossland, 3 Smale & G. 192. In Gaskell v. Chambers, 26 Beav. 360, it appears the Eagle Insurance Company desired to buy out the business of the London Mutual Insurance Company, and agreed to and did pay a specific consideration therefor, and, by a secret agreement with the directors, agreed to and did pay to them the further sum of four thousand pounds as a compensation for the loss of their officers. These directors were held to be trustees for the corporation, and it was also ruled that they received that sum by reason of their position as trustees, and must account therefor.

These cases are all quite clear to the effect that the trustee will not be allowed to make gain to himself, beyond his allowed compensation, by reason of his office and influence as such trustee. By accepting the office the director undertakes to give his judgment and influence to the interests of the corporation in all matters in which he represents or professes to represent it. That judgment and influence, if right, belongs to the corporation, and so does that which it produces, and the bonds received by the director are its property, as between it and the defendant. The circumstance that they came from Peck, and not directly from the Mound City Insurance Company, is wholly immaterial. They came from the agent of that company, and the extravagant amount paid Peck impresses one with the notion that more than fair commissions was included in the $155,000. However that may be, what the director makes in his office as such belongs to the corporation. It will not do to clog these principles of law applied to principal and agent, trustee and cestui que trust, with exceptions and modifications. They must not be whittled away. Whatever may be the practice in such cases, the agreement by which the bonds were acquired was an illegal contract, as well as a plain breach of duty. No court, it is true, would aid the defendant or the receiver, or the corporation of which he is the receiver, in recovering the bonds from Peck, for that would be to execute the illegal contract. Neither would a court assist Peck in recovering them back after the transaction was completed. So, too, an agent may resist an accounting on the ground that the subject of the agency was illegal, or against public policy. Story, Agency, § 235. But when the subject of the agency is entirely legal, and that was the case here, and profits are made by a violation of duty, it would be obviously unjust to allow the agent to reap the fruits of his own misconduct. Id. § 207. An agent is accountable to his principal for moneys that come into his hands as such, even if such amount be composed of usurious interest, and not collectible by the principal himself. Chinn v. Chinn, 22 La. Ann. 599. One party cannot hold back proceeds from another, of whom he was representative, on the ground that there was illegality in the way of getting the money. Whart. Cont. § 354. The defendant acquired the bonds while acting and professing to act in his capacity of director, and must be held to have received them in that capacity. The plaintiff's case is made out by the proof of these facts, and we are not concerned in the execution of the illegal agreement.

2. As to the writ of error prosecuted by the receiver we do not see that he has any right to the bonds which never came to the defendant. Wyman, who acquired them, is no party to this suit, and held no fiduciary relation to the plaintiff's corporation. The receiver has elected to take the course here pursued and must be content with such property as it will reach.

3. This suit was begun February 19, 1879, five years and ten to fifteen days after Wyman received the bonds for himself and defendant. The agreement by which the bonds were acquired and the receipt of the same are facts which were kept secret from all persons save those directly connected therewith, until 1878, when rumors were afloat pointing to these facts. They were then brought to the attention of the court, and soon thereafter this suit was begun. Defendant pleaded the five-year statute of limitations, and plaintiff replied that the fraud was not discovered until within five years next before the commencement of the suit. Section 3230, Rev. St., specifies five different classes of civil actions (other than those for the recovery of real estate) which can only be commenced within five years after the cause of action shall have accrued. The fifth is: "An action for relief on the ground of fraud, the cause of action in such case to be deemed not to have accrued until the discovery by the aggrieved party, at any time within ten years, of the facts constituting the fraud."

Our statute of limitations applies to equitable, as well as legal, causes of action, and we agree with counsel for the defendant that this clause under consideration should be considered in the light of the former equity rules, the place of which, in many respects, at least, it was designed to take. Beyond doubt the statute does not now and never did run against an express continuing trust in favor of the trustee, certainly not until he openly repudiates the trust. Johnson v. Smith, 27 Mo. 591; Smith v. Ricords, 52 Mo. 581, 56 Mo. 553. Conceded it must be that by the equity rules, the statute was not applied by way of analogy, in cases of actual fraud, until the discovery of the fraud. But is it true, as is contended here, that by those rules the statute was applied without regard to the time of discovery in case of constructive frauds and trusts? It was said by Scott, J., in Keeton's Heirs v. Keeton's Adm'r, 20 Mo. 541: "In cases of resulting, implied and constructive trusts, where a party is to be constituted a trustee by a decree of a court of equity founded on fraud, it is well settled as a rule of equity, that the statute of limitations, and presumptions from lapse of time, will operate. With regard to the statute of limitations, it will run from the time that the facts are brought home to the knowledge of the party." See, also, Perry, Trusts, §§ 228, 230; 1 Daniell, Ch. Pl. 669; Hunter v. Hunter, 50 Mo. 445; Ang. Lim. § 470. In the case last cited the defendants were the uncles and agents of the plaintiffs for the management and sale of the lands; they purchased the lands, with the value of which plaintiffs were not familiar, at an under value; they then sold the same at an advanced price. It was a suit to establish a constructive trust for the profits arising from the re-sale. It was there said: "If a party is in possession of, or has notice of, the main facts constituting the fraud, the statute will commence running from that time." The difference of opinion expressed in that case and the subsequent one of Rogers v. Brown, 61 Mo. 187, is not pertinent to any inquiry here, for this case in no way concerns real estate.

Many authorities do hold that, in cases of constructive trusts and frauds, the statute will begin to run without regard to the time of the discovery. This appears to be due to the fact that often in such cases the facts are open and the law frequently draws its conclusion without regard to the motives, because of the confidential relation of the parties. Much, we think, depends upon the fact whether the fraud is a secret or open one. If the substantial facts constituting the fraud, in cases like the one under consideration, were open, it is believed, under the equity rules, the statute of limitations would have been applied at once, but if these facts were in their nature secret and were unknown, it is believed the statute would not begin to run until they were discovered, there being no want of diligence on the part of the complainant. Here the fraud consists in professing to act for and in the interest of the corporation, as was defendant's duty, when, in reality, he was acting for himself and for his private gain. The agreement under which this was done was in its very nature a secret one, one which the corporation would not naturally suspect, and one which would not be revealed by any act openly done. Of course, here, simple knowledge of the existence of the agreement and acquisition of the bonds thereunder, brought home to the plaintiff, or the corporation of which he is receiver, would start the statute and from that time it would continue to run notwithstanding the subsequent appointment of the receiver. This knowledge was not acquired until much more than fifteen days after the receipt of the bonds, by Wyman. The circumstances by which the transaction was discovered show there were no laches on the part of the plaintiff or his corporation. We conclude the clause of the statute before noted applies to this case, and under it the cause of action is not barred.

4. A contract founded on a champertous consideration is illegal, against public policy and void. Duke v. Harper, 66 Mo. 55. In that case the contract there in question was held not to be champertous because the attorneys did not bind themselves to pay any portion of the expenses of the litigation. Where the right of the plaintiff, which he seeks to enforce, is derived under a title founded on his champerty, the suit must fail. Courts are not organized for the purpose of enforcing such contracts. Many of the authorities cited by defendant go to this extent and no farther. Some of them do appear to hold that where there is a champertous contract, by which the suit is prosecuted, and that fact comes to the knowledge of the court, it should dismiss the suit. Barker v. Barker, 14 Wis. 143; Webb v. Armstrong, 5 Humph. 379. Others appear to give a qualified approval to the doctrine. On the other hand a number of cases hold that the fact that the suit is being prosecuted under a champertous contract is no defense, and that the illegality of such a contract can only be set up when it is sought to enforce the contract. Hilton v. Woods, L. R. 4 Eq. 432; Whitney v. Kirtland, 27 N. J. Eq. 333; Allison v. Railway Co., 42 Iowa, 274; Courtright v. Burnes, 3 McCrary, 60, 13 Fed. 317. Unless the plaintiff's title, by which he seeks to enforce a right, is infected by a champertous contract, we see no reason why the suit may not proceed, though such a contract exists as between the plaintiff and his attorney. It is time enough to turn a party out of court when he asks the aid of a court to enforce such a contract. This is, in substance, the rule as to most illegal contracts, and there is no good reason at this day for making an exception in this class of contracts.

Certain policy holders brought to light the facts upon which this suit is founded, and were permitted by the court to prosecute the same in the name of the receiver upon indemnifying him, and, as a consequence, the funds in his hands, against the payment of costs. These policy holders were but protecting their own rights. They could not well sue in their own names. In such cases it is not an uncommon thing for cautious courts to require that the officer be made safe against costs of long and tedious suits. Thus far there is no element of champerty in the defense. It would seem the defendant offered to prove that the attorney by whom the suit was instituted and who represented these policy holders gave the bond, and, further, that he had an agreement with the receiver by which he was to have a certain portion of the avails of the suit for his services. In view of this offer let it be conceded, for the purpose of this case, without deciding the question that the agreement between the attorney and the receiver was champertous, still, applying the principle before announced, that constituted no defense to this action. The receiver's accounts will come before the court for its approval and it will be time enough then to examine into the questions of the validity of the agreement. The plaintiff is in no wise affected by the illegal agreement, even if any there was. We do not think public policy requires the courts to turn aside and investigate such side issues.

The judgment in this case, from which both parties come to this court, is affirmed.

COOK v. GILMORE et al.

Supreme Court of Illinois. May 14, 1890.

Appeal from appellate court, first district.

SHOPE, C. J. The question presented by this record is whether a trustee, who accepts and performs the trust, without any contract or stipulation of the parties, or any provision in the order of court appointing him, for compensation for his services, is entitled to compensation for care bestowed, and for time expended in executing the trust. The rule laid down in the text-book is "that a trustee is not entitled to compensation for personal trouble and loss of time." Perry, Trusts, §§ 904-906; Hill, Trustees, 889; 2 Lewin, Trusts, 627. And such seems to be the rule established by the English court of equity, although in the later cases exceptions to that general rule have been more frequent, in cases where the court can find from the attending circumstances that both parties expected that compensation would be made. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1268, and cases cited; authorities supra. The rule applied, not only to trustees so cited, but also to all who held a fiduciary relation, as executors and administrators, mortgagees in possession, receivers and guardians, and to officers, directors, and trustees of corporations. The rule is based upon the well-recognized principle, upon which courts of equity invariably act, that the trustee should execute the trust for the benefit of the cestui que trust alone, and that he shall desire no profit by reason of the trust. And the rule was adopted and enforced for the reason that, while in a particular case the allowance of compensation might be justly allowed, and the estate not be charged with more than it might otherwise have to bear, yet the adoption of the contrary rule would have the tendency to tempt the trustee to disregard the interest of the beneficiaries, and lead, in general, to the consequence of loading the estate for the benefit of the trustee, by pretenses of care, trouble, and loss of time; thus placing the trustee in a position, which equity forbids, where his personal interests would conflict with the performance of his duty. And it is held that in this there was no hardship upon the trustee, for he might choose whether he will accept the trust or not. So a trustee might refuse to accept appointment by a court unless provision was made for proper compensation; and, if he undertook the trust with the understanding that upon subsequent application compensation would be allowed, the court may at the proper time ascertain and allow the same. Brocksopp v. Barnes, 5 Madd. 90; Morison v. Morison, 4 Mylne & C. 215; English note to Robinson v. Pett, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq.

417. By this well-settled rule the services of a trustee, in the absence of a provision for compensation in advance, are to be performed as a gratuity, without regard to the advantage that may result from his superior care, skill, and diligence in the management of the trust-estate. We are aware that in many of the states of the Union, and in the federal courts, a different rule prevails; but the law, as established by the courts of equity in England, in respect of compensation of conventional trustees, has been so long and firmly established in the jurisprudence of this state that it ought not to be changed by judicial determination. As said by the appellate court, the rule has been applied in all its strictness in this state whenever the question has arisen. See Constant v. Matteson, 22 Ill. 546; Hough v. Harvey, 71 Ill. 72; Huggins v. Rider, 77 Ill. 360. In some of the states, the right of mere conventional trustees to compensation has been fixed by statute; while perhaps in all, as in this state, laws have been passed allowing compensation of trustees required by law to be appointed, such as executors and administrators, guardians, conservators, and assignees of insolvent estates. And it is now universally held in this country that a receiver, being the arm of the court to execute its orders in respect of the property of which the court has taken control, may be allowed compensation out of the funds in his hands. In some, and perhaps a majority, of the states, where remuneration has been provided by statute to those to whom the law intrusts the care and management of the estates of lunatics, infants, deceased persons, insolvents, and the like, the courts by an equitable construction have extended the right to voluntary or conventional trustees, when the agreement, deed, will, or order of appointment is silent. See American note to Robinson v. Pett, supra. And this view is pressed upon us in this case with great force. But it must be answered, regardless of what our views might be if the question was an open one in this state, that the same statutes now in force, or others in every respect identical in effect, were in force when each of the decisions of this court referred to upon this question was rendered, and manifestly were not regarded by the court as controlling. Notwithstanding these statutes, this court adopted and has since adhered to the common-law rule. Appellant's trusteeship falls clearly within the rule, and, while he would be entitled to have allowed him all money actually expended in good faith for the preservation of the trust fund, if any, he can recover nothing for his personal or professional services in respect of his trusteeship. His claim for compensation as trustee, as well as for attorney's fees for professional services rendered during the continuance of the trust, were properly disallowed by the court. Hill, Trustees, 890; Perry, Trusts, § 904, and cases supra. The judgment of the appellate court must be affirmed.

In re SCHELL.

Court of Appeals of New York. Sept. 23, 1873.

Appeal from order on settlement of accounts of Edward Schell, trustee, etc., of the estate of Jacob Appley, which disallowed an item of $2,500 charged for his services as such trustee.

Jacob Appley died seized of a large real and personal estate. By his last will and testament he devised and bequeathed all his property, with certain exceptions, to his executors and the survivor of them, upon certain trusts therein named. The will, after reciting the trusts, contained this clause: "And also that my said executors retain and pay unto themselves out of said rents and incomes all costs, charges and expenses that they shall have to pay or be put unto in the fulfillment of this my will, and a reasonable compensation for their services."

By an order of the supreme court, Schell was appointed trustee in place of those named in the will. In his accounts he made a charge in gross of $2,500 for his services. The referee reported in favor of its allowance.

Amasa J. Parker, for appellant. Samuel Hand, for respondent.

RAPALLO, J. The order appealed from shows upon its face that it was made upon the ground that the compensation of the trustee for his services should be limited to commissions, at the rate allowed by statute to executors and administrators, for receiving and paying out moneys.

This is the settled rule in cases where the creator of the trust has made no provision for compensation to the trustee. Under such circumstances the courts have by analogy allowed the same commissions which are by statute allowable to executors and administrators, and have restricted the allowances to those rates.

But where the instrument creating the trust provides that the trustee shall have a compensation for his services in executing the trust, such provision will be enforced. If the instrument declares the rate of compensation, it must be followed. If it establishes no rate, the value of the services should be ascertained by judicial investigation. Meacham v. Sternes, 9 Paige, 398.

The provision of the will in question is that the trustees (of whom the applicant is the successor) shall retain and pay unto themselves, out of the rents and income of the testator's estate, all costs, charges and expenses that they shall have to pay or be put unto in the fulfillment of his will, and a reasonable compensation for their services.

It would seem a sufficiently simple proposition that the question, what is a reasonable sum to be allowed to the trustee over and above his proper disbursements for his services, is a question of fact determinable upon the same principles which would regulate such an inquiry were the controversy one arising upon an employment inter vivos.

But it is claimed on the part of the respondent that the statute which regulates the commissions of executors, administrators and guardians determines that the rate thereby allowed is a reasonable compensation, and that the subject of the amount of compensation is closed to further inquiry. The learned court at special term seems to have adopted this view, and its decision has been affirmed at general term. We cannot concur in the soundness of these conclusions. In the first place, the provisions of the statute do not in terms apply to trustees. The original trustees in this case were the same persons who were named in the will as executors, but their offices as trustees were additional to and distinct from their legal duties as executors. The applicant succeeds to the office of trustee and not of executor. The decisions which apply to trustees the same rules as to compensation which the statute applies to executors, etc., rest upon the principle of analogy and not upon the command of the statute. They are confined to cases where no provision is made by the creator of the trust for the compensation of the trustees. In such cases, there being no express declaration of the creator of the trust that his appointees should be compensated, yet it being unreasonable under ordinary circumstances to require them to perform their responsible duties gratuitously, it is a fair presumption that the testator assumed that they would be entitled to the commissions established by law for similar services when rendered by executors, etc. Where however he expressly provides that they shall have a reasonable compensation for their services, he must be supposed to have intended that the compensation should be reasonable with reference to the special circumstances of his estate and the services which he has required them to perform.

The object of the statute is to furnish a general and arbitrary rule for cases not otherwise provided for; but it should not govern where the testator has, by reason of peculiar circumstances existing in reference to his estate, required extraordinary services on the part of those to whose care he has confided it, and has specially provided that their compensation shall be reasonable, which is equivalent to declaring that it shall be proportioned to the value of the services they may render. By such a direction the testator necessarily confides to the tribunals under whose jurisdiction the administration of his estate may come, the adjustment of the compensation of his trustees, and this is a duty which those tribunals must perform conscientiously upon the evidence before them. It was therefore the duty of the court below in the case to determine whether the sum claimed by the trustee was or was not reasonable under the circumstances, and to allow or reduce it according to their judgment, without being controlled by the statute. The case shows that the duties of the trustee were onerous, and involved more than the mere receipt and disbursement of money. He was intrusted with the management of forty houses and lots, the buildings being old and requiring frequent repairs, and the trustee swears that he has given them his personal care and attention, besides attending to the receipt and application of the funds.

Whether the sum of $2,500 allowed by the referee is a reasonable amount is a question for the court below. The report of the referee is not conclusive, but merely for the information of the court. The court, at special term, should exercise its discretion whether to confirm or modify it, and if the amount is in its judgment excessive, it should be reduced, but the amount should be determined with reference to the facts of the case and not by the statute.

The orders of the special and general terms should be reversed, and the proceedings remitted to the court below to rehear at special term the motion to confirm the report of the referee.

The costs of the appellant should be allowed to him out of the fund.

All concur, except GROVER, J., not voting.
Ordered accordingly.

VAN ALLEN v. AMERICAN NAT. BANK.
(52 N. Y. 1.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Jan. 21, 1873.

Action to recover $1,625.13, deposited by plaintiff with defendant in the name of Van Allen & Rice.

Van Allen & Rice were merchants in the city of New York. Before Feb., 1867, the plaintiff, a resident of Danville, Penn., had indorsed a note for Van Allen & Rice, due March 8, 1867.

On Feb. 4, 1867, plaintiff sent to Van Allen & Rice bonds, with a letter to the effect that they could be used "to protect the note on which I (plaintiff) am indorser. If you can get along without using them you can let me know, and I will give instructions as to future disposal of them."

On Feb. 15, 1867, plaintiff wrote another letter, giving instructions to "collect the coupon of the 7-30 bond, and retain all until you can determine as to your ability to meet the note maturing March 8. If you are able to meet it advise me so soon as you can determine, and I will then give further advice in regard to the bonds. * * * If you want to sell them and let the proceeds lay to your credit in bank, so that it will be available 8th March, do so. It would make your bank account look better, and perhaps do you good in that way."

The bonds were sold Feb. 20, 1867, for $1,628.12. A check was received therefor which was used by Van Allen & Rice. On the same day they deposited with defendant $1,711.66 "to cover the sale of the bonds." It was deposited for plaintiff. On the following day Van Allen & Rice wrote plaintiff, notifying him of the sale and deposit.

Van Allen & Rice made no subsequent deposit in the defendant's bank, and never drew any check against this deposit, or any check upon the bank, except a check in plaintiff's favor for the amount due him, March 6.

Van Allen & Rice had made an accommodation note for McCombie & Child, which became due March 4, at defendant's bank, for $15,000. On the day it became due McCombie & Child sent their certified check to Van Allen & Rice, and that check was deposited with defendant to pay the note. On March 6 plaintiff served upon defendant a notice of his right to the money, and presented the check for payment. Payment was refused. Judgment for plaintiff.

Charles H. Woodbury, for appellant. Aaron J. Vanderpoel, for respondent.

CHURCH, C. J. The learned counsel for the appellant is undoubtedly right in the position that if, as between the plaintiff and Van Allen & Rice, there was no trust impressed upon the deposit in the bank defendant, to an amount equal to the proceeds of the bonds sold by Van Allen & Rice for the plaintiff, this action cannot be maintained. It is settled that the holder of a check cannot maintain an action against the drawee, after a refusal to pay, for want of privity, and that a check against a general bank account does not operate as an assignment. Ætna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, 46 N. Y. 82, 7 Am. Rep. 314; Bank v. Millard, 10 Wall. 152, and cases there cited. This action is based upon another principle equally well settled, viz., that so long as money or property belonging to the principal or the proceeds thereof may be traced and distinguished in the hands of the agent or his representatives or assignees, the principal is entitled to recover it unless it has been transferred for value without notice. 2 Grat. 544; Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 372; 6 Jones, Eq. 34; 2 Hem. & M. 417; 2 Kent, Comm. 796, 801. It appears to me clear that Van Allen & Rice were the agents of the plaintiff to sell the bonds, and were bound to keep the proceeds of the same for him. He owned the bonds, directed their sale, and also directed that the proceeds should be kept for him in a particular manner, and he was notified by Van Allen & Rice that they had been sold and the avails placed and would be kept as directed. These undisputed facts establish the relation of trustee and cestui que trust between the plaintiff and Van Allen & Rice as to the proceeds of these bonds.

It is claimed however that this principle is not applicable because the identical money for which the bonds were sold was not deposited. This objection would be fatal if there had in fact been no substitution of other money for the proceeds of the bonds. It seems to have been assumed on the trial that the check given upon the sale of the bonds was used by Van Allen & Rice for their own benefit, and if the evidence had stopped there the trust fund would have been gone and dissipated, and of course beyond the reach of being traced. But the uncontradicted evidence is that on the same day Van Allen & Rice substituted other money for that obtained for the bonds, and placed it in the bank defendant to their credit, to be retained for the plaintiff as arranged between them, and notified the plaintiff thereof. The letter of the 21st of February to the plaintiff in connection with the evidence of G. R. Van Allen is conclusive that the money referred to in the letter was that deposited in the bank defendant. The point made is this: A. having $100, the proceeds of a sale of property of B., intends to place it in a repository and keep it for B., and instead of putting the identical bank bills in the designated place substitutes others of the same amount and keeps them for B. as such proceeds, can there be a doubt that the $100 thus substituted would occupy the same position as the particular bills obtained for the property, and that they would be impressed with the same trust? Suppose Van Allen & Rice had got the check cashed by a third person and deposited the money, it would of course be regarded as the proceeds of the check, and belong to the plaintiff as effectually as the check itself. Does it make any difference whether the money was obtained from a third person upon the check or from the safe of Van Alen & Rice? In either case the money is the proceeds of the check and stands in lieu of it. It is said that the secret intention of Van Alen & Rice cannot effect such a result. Between them and the defendant as to the substitution it was not secret. They in substance notified the plaintiff that they had placed on deposit the proceeds of his bonds and would keep it for him. They did deposit the amount which they treated as the proceeds, and declared it to be such. Can they deny it? Can any one for them? If I send a note to an attorney to collect, and deposit the money in a bank in his own name and keep it for me, is my title to the money impaired because he fails to deposit the identical bills? My agent collects $100 rent for me and puts the bills in one pocket and takes the same amount from another pocket and deposits it and notifies me. Are my rights gone by the change of money? I think not. Stripped of unsubstantial forms, the case presented is that of a person delivering stock or bonds to an agent for sale with directions to deposit the proceeds in a bank to the credit of the agent, but to keep it in that way for him, and the agent follows the directions. Can there be a doubt as to the ownership of the money as between the agent and the principal? Clearly not. Suppose the principal had directed the agent to loan the money on a note or mortgage, would not the security belong to the principal? The bank defendant upon receiving the deposit became the debtor ostensibly to the depositor, but equitably to the real owner. The obligation incurred by the bank was to pay the money on demand in the usual course of business, and had a right to require a check from the depositor. When this formality was complied with and the bank was notified that the money actually belonged to the plaintiff, it did not lie in its mouth to set up a want of privity. Privity has nothing to do with the question. The bank had the plaintiff's money and gave its obligation in form to another person, but the obligation was in fact owned by the plaintiff and he can enforce it. There is no mystery or sanctity respecting the obligations of a bank in such a case, different from those of a private person, and if this money had been loaned to the latter under an agreement to repay it upon the presentation of the agent's check, he would not have been heard to say when the plaintiff presented the check, "I made no contract with you, and although I have no claim to the money you cannot maintain an action because there is no privity between us and the check does not operate as an assignment." The answer would be that the plaintiff owned the obligation, and had the same right to recover it as he would if the person had possession of his horse, and refused to deliver it on demand. The only effect of the direction to deposit in a particular manner was to relieve the agent upon complying with the direction from liability for loss without his fault. In the absence of such a direction the principal, while he might pursue and claim the money, would not have been obliged to do so, and could have also held the agent personally.

It is objected also that the money was so mingled with the agent's own money as not to be traceable in the hands of the defendant. When Van Alen & Rice deposited this money for the plaintiff they included with it a few dollars of their own. But this does not affect the plaintiff's right to it. When a trustee deposits trust moneys in his own name in a bank with his individual money, the character of the trust money is not lost but it remains the property of the cestui que trust. If such money can be traced into the bank, and it remains there, the owner can reclaim it. When deposited, the bank incurred an obligation to repay it, which is not lessened or impaired because it incurred, at the same time, an obligation to pay other money belonging to the agent individually. If A. sells B.'s horse for $100, and puts it in a box with $100 of his own, the $100 of B. may be claimed by him although the particular bills constituting it could not be identified. So if the same $200 were deposited in a bank to the credit of A., the title of B. to $100 would not be affected by the association, and the bank would owe that money to B. in equity, although it owed A. also for his individual money. These views are not only consonant with integrity and justice, but are fully sustained by authority.

The case of Pennell v. Deffell, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 372, is a leading and very instructive case upon this whole subject. It was a contest between the successor of one Green, an official assignee in bankruptcy, and the personal representatives of Green for moneys standing to his individual credit in the Bank of England and another bank. These moneys had been deposited from time to time by Green, and consisted of funds received by him in his official capacity as trustee and his own individual funds. The account was kept in his individual name, without any discrimination between the trust and private funds, and the question was, whether the various persons interested in the trust funds could claim the respective amounts due them, or whether the defendants were entitled to receive and administer upon the money as a part of the estate of Green. The master of the rolls held that the cestuis que trustent could not hold the money because it had no "earmark," and could not be traced and distinguished within the principle before adverted to. This decision was reversed upon appeal to the Court of Appeal in Chancery. The Lord Justice Knight Bruce, after a clear statement illustrating the doctrine upon which the principle rests, proceeds to say: "When a trustee pays trust money into a bank to his credit, the account being a simple account with himself, not marked or distinguished in any other manner, the debt thus constituted from the bank to him is one which, as long as it remains due, belongs specifically to the trust as much and as effectually as the money so paid would have done had it specifically been placed by the trustee in a particular repository and so remained; that is to say, if the specific debt shall be claimed on behalf of the cestuis que trustent it must be deemed specifically theirs. * * * This state of things would not, I apprehend, be varied by the circumstance of the bank holding also for the trustee, or owing also to him money in every sense his own." The Lord Justice Turner also delivered an elaborate opinion sustaining the same doctrine, in the course of which he says: "Suppose a trustee pays into a bank moneys belonging to his trust to an account not marked or distinguished as a trust account, and pays in no other moneys, could it for one moment be denied that the moneys standing to the account of the debt due from the bankers, arising from the moneys so paid in, would belong to the trust and not to the private estate of the trustee? Then suppose the trustee subsequently pays in moneys of his own, not belonging to the trust, to the same account. Would the character of the moneys which he had before paid in, of the debt which had before accrued, be altered? Again, suppose the trustee, instead of subsequently paying moneys into the bank, draws out a part of the trust moneys which he has before paid in, would the remainder of those moneys and of the debt contracted in respect of them lose their trust character? Then can the circumstance of the account consisting of a continued series of moneys paid in and drawn out alter the principle? It may indeed increase the difficulty of ascertaining what belongs to the trust, but I can see no possible ground on which it can affect the principle."

In the case of Overseers of the Poor v. Bank of Virginia, 2 Grat. 544, 44 Am. Dec. 399, an attorney deposited a check for the amount of a judgment in favor of his clients to his own credit, having a small amount of other money to his credit, and died. On the day of his death a note fell due belonging to the bank which it claimed to set off, but the court held that the clients were entitled to the money. Stanard, J., says: "The credits to Langhorne with the bank are several, and the sources of each distinctly identified. * * * They are as distinct and distinguishable as they would be were they in separate parcels in the hands of Langhorne, with labels on each designating the sources from whence they were derived." The same principle was decided in 6 Jones, Eq. 34. So also in Frith v. Cartland, 2 Hem. & M. 417, where a person received from the plaintiff certain acceptances to take up paper owing to the plaintiff, and got them cashed and ran away. After mingling the money with his own, and making various changes and transformations, he was arrested, and the plaintiff was decided to be entitled to the money in preference to creditors; Vice-Chancellor Wood saying that "the court attributes the ownership of the trust property to the cestui que trust so long as it can be traced."

The same principle was decided in Veil v. Mitchell, 4 Washb. 105, in respect to the avails

In Merrill v. Bank of Norfolk, 19 Pick. 32, involving the same principle, Morton, J., said: "The defendants having the plaintiff's money in their hands, for which a demand was made before the action was commenced, are liable for the amount with interest from the time when it was demanded." These rules and adjudications, which are decisive of this case, accord with the equities. The bank defendant has no lien upon this money, and does not claim to have, and no claim is set up in the answer. Nor does it appear that any one else has. If Van Alen & Rice had given a lien for value upon this money, or had obtained a loan upon the apparent ownership of it in any way, the rights of the party holding the claim may have been superior to those of the plaintiff. No such claim is set up or shown. The note falling due the 20th of February was not set up in the answer, and if it had been, would not have operated as a defense. This deposit was demanded the 6th of February and could have been assigned by Van Alen & Rice, and the holder, if for value, could have enforced it. The note due the 20th was not an off-set, and could not be as against any but Van Alen & Rice. The question is therefore entirely between the plaintiff and Van Alen & Rice; the former claims the money and the latter admits the claim, and the facts sustain the justice of it. The defendant occupies the position of objecting to the title of the plaintiff without having or claiming any title itself. If Van Alen & Rice had refused to give a check, the plaintiff might have been obliged to resort to an equitable action; but if a title is established by the plaintiff, and he presented the evidence upon which the defendant agreed to pay the money, I see no reason why an action at law may not be maintained, but it is unnecessary to pass upon this point as it was not made. Neither was the point made that a part of the deposit could not be recovered.

It was suggested on the argument that notice to the bank by the depositor was necessary to protect the rights of the plaintiff, but this is not so. The title of the plaintiff does not depend upon whether the bank knew he had a title or not. That rested upon other facts. A notice to the bank might have prevented any transfer or the creation of a lien by the depositor, or prevented the bank from taking or acquiring such lien in good faith, but could not otherwise be necessary or important.

The appellant also claims that the plaintiff's money was in fact drawn out by the check for $15,000 on the 4th of February.

The authorities before cited adopt the rule that moneys first deposited apply upon checks first drawn, and the accounts in the case of Pennell v. Deffell were adjusted upon that principle.

Without undertaking to determine when this rule should, and when it should not, be adopted, it is sufficient to say that the $15,000 credit and debit was a special transaction. The check of a third person was put in to pay an accommodation note of Van Alen & Rice and used for that purpose, so that the general rule would not apply to that item. With that exception no money was drawn after the deposit of $1,711, which included the proceeds of the bonds. The decision in Ætna Nat. Bank v. Fourth Nat. Bank, supra, has no bearing on this case. There was no question of title in the plaintiff in that case, and this court held that the obligation of the bank defendant to the depositor was discharged by the payment of another note against the depositor before the plaintiff's note became due, and that the plaintiff had no right of action.

The judgment must be affirmed. All concur except ALLEN and GROVER, JJ., dissenting. Judgment affirmed.

WATERMAN et al. v. ALDEN et al.

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. 19, 1893.

Bill by Robert W., Charles, Albert H., and James D. Waterman, Sarah J. and Kate D. Moulton, Ellen L. Thomas, Caroline W. Syme, and J. Frank Wells, legatees under the will of James S. Waterman, deceased, for themselves, and all others similarly situated who may join therein, against Philander M. Alden, George S. Robinson, Sarah E., Mary J. Clayton, Charlotte and Caroline M. Waterman, Lizzie Chase, and Jennie Kinney, to obtain an accounting from said Alden and Robinson, to have them removed as trustees under said will, and for other relief. A decree was rendered, from which the complainants appealed to the appellate court. That court affirmed the decree, and complainants again appeal. Reversed.

WILKIN, J. On the 28th day of November, 1870, James S. Waterman executed his last will and testament, by which he gave his wife one third of all his estate, and a specific legacy of $5,000 in trust for the use of one Nellie Farnhdon. The rest of his estate was disposed of by the following residuary clause: "I give, devise, and bequeath all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, both real and personal, to the said Philander M. Alden and George S. Robinson, * * * the executors of this, my last will and testament, hereinafter nominated and appointed, in trust for the use and benefit of my brothers and sisters, to wit, [naming them] to have and hold, manage and control, the same for such purpose, for and during the term of twenty one years from and after the date of my decease, and during the continuance of said trust estate, as aforesaid, to receive, collect, and pay over to my said brothers and sisters above named the net income and profits thereof, in equal portions to each, annually, the child or children of a deceased brother or sister to take the same portion the father or mother would have taken if living; and, at the expiration of said twenty one years after my decease, I give, devise, and bequeath to my said brothers and sisters, their heirs and assigns, forever, the said rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, both real and personal, to be equally divided between them, share and share alike, the child or children of any deceased brother or sister to take the same share the father or mother would have taken if living, and, in case of the death of any of my said brothers or sisters leaving no issue, the share of such brother or sister would have taken if living to be equally divided among my surviving brothers and sisters."

The testator died July 19, 1883, and on the 24th of the same month said will was duly admitted to probate in the county court of De Kalb county, whereupon said Alden and Robinson were qualified, and took upon themselves the duties of executors and trustees, as in and by the will provided. The estate was very large, being inventoried at about $531,000, consisting of farm lands and other real estate to the value of $127,512.70, and the balance in cash, notes and accounts, stocks, etc. The widow declined to take under the will, and, her husband having left no child or children, or descendants of such, one half of the entire estate, real and personal, was partitioned and set off to her, as provided by the statute in such case. The administration was still pending and undetermined in said county court at the filing of this bill. Said Alden and Robinson had reduced a part of the trust property to possession, and made a partial distribution of the proceeds thereof to the beneficiaries, when on the 9th of June, 1887, Robert W. and Charles Waterman, surviving brothers of the testator, and certain children of deceased brothers and sisters, claiming under said residuary clause, began this action in the circuit court of said De Kalb county against Alden and Robinson, to compel them to render an account of their trusteeship, to charge them with certain losses to the trust estate by reason of their negligent and wrongful conduct in and about the management of the same, and to have them removed as such trustees, and others appointed in their stead. After protracted litigation a final decree was rendered in the cause by the circuit court of Lee county, to which it had been removed. The complainants carried the record to the appellate court of the second district by appeal. There both parties assigned errors, and an extended statement of the case, with a very carefully prepared opinion by Cartwright, J., was filed (42 Ill. App. 294), affirming the decree of the circuit court in all respects. This appeal is from that judgment of affirmance. The record is unusually voluminous, and the argument of counsel on behalf of appellants has taken an almost unlimited range. It would be impossible to even casually notice all the points made, without extending this opinion to an unreasonable length. For a full statement of the facts of the case we refer to the opinion of the appellate court. We also concur in the conclusions reached by that court, as set forth in said opinion, except as hereinafter indicated.

The points more particularly pressed upon our attention are—First, the circuit court erred in refusing to remove appellees as trustees; second, the circuit court erred in refusing to hold said trustees personally liable for the loss of the "Marsh indebtedness;" third, the circuit court erred in its division of the costs and expenses of the litigation. The parts of the final decree relating to these assignments of error are as follows: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the motion of complainants, filed herein on the 17th of July, 1890, for the removal of Alden and Robinson as trustees, be overruled." "And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that this court has no jurisdiction to investigate the charge against said Alden and Robinson or either, on account of any alleged loss growing out of the failure of the Sycamore Marsh Harvester Man'f'g Co., the Marsh Binder Man'f'g Co., C. W. Marsh, and W. W. Marsh, or either, or two or more, of them, or the alleged neglect of the said Alden and Robinson to collect or secure the payment of obligations owing by them, or some of them, to the estate of James S. Waterman, dec'd." "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the expenses of this litigation be paid up to October 15, 1889, as found by said master's report, to wit: $3,869.71, and the attorneys' fees and attorneys' expenses in this cause paid or incurred since October 15, 1889, as enumerated, and shown by the testimony of D. J. Carnes and William Lathrup, heard in open court, up to July 19, 1890, to wit: $1,348.27 to be allowed said trustees in their accounts when they shall have actually paid the same, and shall be charged to the principal fund, less one-fourth part of the gross attorneys' fees therein included, which one-fourth part is found by the court to be $988.62, and which one-fourth part said trustees are ordered to bear personally, leaving $4,229.36 to be charged to the principal fund. This decree shall not be construed as allowing or disallowing any other expense of this litigation paid or incurred by said trustees since October 15, 1889. And it is further ordered and decreed that the costs of this proceeding be taxed as follows,—that is to say, that two thirds thereof be paid by the trustees, as such, out of the principal fund in their hands, and one third of said costs out of the distributable income going to the complainants, and that in taxing the costs the clerk allow $500 paid by stipulation on file herein to Mason B. Loomis, and $360 paid by said trustees to Sherwood Dixon, as special masters; also payment by them of $15.40 for witness fees, and $312.80 for depositions; which sums, so far as paid by them, except that paid Master Dixon, are shown by his report to have been paid, and are embraced in the items of $3,869.71 costs of this litigation. The clerk will also tax, as part of the complainant's costs herein, the sum of $392.86, paid by complainant for taking depositions; also $47.40 for certified copies of record, $2.50 for service of subpoenas, $8 witness fees paid by complainants' solicitor. The clerk will also tax the usual taxable costs incurred by either party." We will consider the foregoing questions in the order named, referring to the facts appearing in the record especially applicable thereto.

There is no difficulty in finding the legal measure of care and diligence required at the hands of trustees in the management of a trust estate. Cases may be found holding that, inasmuch as no compensation can be allowed them when not expressly provided for, they can only be held liable for losses which result from their gross negligence or willful misconduct; but the rule undoubtedly is that they must discharge the duties of their trust to the best of their skill and ability, "with such care and diligence as men fit to be intrusted with such matters may fairly be expected to put forth in their own business of equal importance." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1268b; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1070. The evidence in this case clearly shows, and in fact it is admitted, that appellees were, prior to the filing of this bill, guilty of some negligence in and about the management of the trust property. First, they wholly failed to keep proper accounts of the trust funds, and of their dealings with the same, as will more fully appear hereafter. In the second place, Robinson gave little or no attention to the business, being much of the time absent from the state. It will not do to say, as is attempted, that his personal attention was not necessary to the proper management of the business, in view of the fact that numerous letters were written him by Alden, complaining of his continued absence, and demanding his presence and attention to the estate. Finally, general negligence was shown in failing to promptly collect or secure claims due the estate, especially owing by the Marsh Manufacturing Companies. It does not follow necessarily that, because of these acts of negligence, a court of chancery should remove them. Courts of equity have a very broad jurisdiction over trust estates and trustees, and will remove the latter for a failure, through neglect or from willfulness, to perform their duties, or will compel them to carry out the trust which they have been appointed to and have accepted, as shall appear, under all the circumstances of a given case, for the best interest of the estate and all parties interested in the same. In 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1289, it is said: "It is not, indeed, every mistake or neglect of duty or inaccuracy of conduct of trustees which will induce courts of equity to adopt such a course, [remove the trustees,] but the act or omission must be such as to endanger the trust property, or to show a want of honesty, or a want of proper capacity to execute the duties, or want of reasonable fidelity." The dereliction of duty on the part of these trustees seems to have resulted from mere negligence rather than willfulness, and we are of the opinion that the chancellor was justified, on the whole record, in refusing to remove them.

Whether or not the trustees should be held personally liable for losses sustained by the complainants on the Marsh indebtedness is attended with much more difficulty. It is alleged in the bill that among the assets which came into their hands were three judgment notes payable to said James W. Waterman,—one for $5,000, dated April 27, 1883, due in 90 days, signed by the Sycamore Marsh Harvester Company and C. W. and W. W. Marsh; one for the sum of $3,000, dated June 13, 1883, due in 90 days, by the same parties; and one for $5,350.40, dated January 1, 1878, by C. W. and W. W. Marsh alone. It is there alleged that after said notes came into their hands, and were due and payable to them, they knew the makers were embarrassed financially, and likely to fail, but took no steps to collect or secure the same until June 30, 1884; that said Alden, being cashier, one of the directors, and a large stockholder in the Sycamore National Bank, on October, 1883, the said Alden knowing the financial embarrassment of the said makers of said notes, said bank loaned them about $25,000; that thereafter said Alden pressed said parties for security for said bank indebtedness, which was given, but that he made no effort whatever to obtain security for said indebtedness due the estate, although security therefor could have been obtained; that on said June 30, 1884, Alden caused the notes due the estate to be put in judgments in the circuit court of Lee county, although the circuit court of De Kalb county was at the time in session, the makers of said notes having property in the last-named county subject to lien and levy of judgments on said notes; that he employed the same attorney who represented said bank, and he at the same time took judgment in its favor for said $25,000 indebtedness; that, through the wrongful and negligent conduct of said trustee, said property in De Kalb county was allowed to be levied upon and taken on executions in favor of said bank and others, to the exclusion of those in favor of the estate; that, through the negligence of the trustees, property attempted to be levied upon in said county on executions in favor of the estate was wrongly described, and thereby priority of lien in favor of said estate lost; that by reason of such neglect and mismanagement on the part of appellees the greater part of the said indebtedness was wholly lost to said estate. The first special master to whom the case was referred found against the complainants on these allegations as to negligence and omissions of duty on the part of the trustees, and reported that they should not be held liable for the loss; but the chancellor before whom the case was pending took a different view of the evidence, and on exceptions to the master's report found "that said trustees, Alden and Robinson, should have known that said Marsh Harvester Manufacturing Company and the Marshes were insolvent, and in failing condition, from the time of the death of the said James S. Waterman until their actual failure, about July, 1884, and that said trustees did not exercise due and proper diligence to collect or have secured said undisputed indebtedness to said estate; and it appearing, had said trustees diligently pressed said undisputed indebtedness to said estate for payment or security, that security might have been obtained therefor, so it is ordered that trustees, Alden and Robinson, be charged with the payment of said undisputed indebtedness to said estate." This order only includes the two notes signed by the manufacturing companies and the Marshes, the other note being disputed, as hereafter shown. On a re-reference of the case the master was directed to report the amount of loss on said two notes, which he did, finding the amount to be $1,365.51; but the circuit court of Lee county, as appears from the foregoing extract from its decree, refused to allow the claim for want of jurisdiction. That a loss to the complainants has been sustained by reason of the failure of appellees to collect the whole amount of those notes is not denied. That they might have been collected by the use of ordinary business management and diligence, or secured, is clearly established by the evidence. We think it is equally clear that the trustees knew that said parties were heavily indebted, and liable to fail, long before any effort was made by them to secure or collect said indebtedness. The only finding of the court below on the facts is to that effect. While Special Master Loomis by his report excuses the conduct of the trustees, he does not do so on the ground that they were not negligent, but rather upon the theory that, from the relations existing between the testator and the Marshes, it is fair to presume that he, if living, would have used no more care and diligence in enforcing those claims than did appellees. It need scarcely be suggested that no such test can properly be applied to the conduct of trustees. There may be abundant reason for believing that Mr. Waterman, though a careful business man, would much rather have lost the indebtedness than to have pressed the collection of it, but that furnishes no excuse for these trustees to neglect or fail to use all reasonable diligence in the matter. Mr. Waterman might do with his own as he pleased, but the duties of these appellees are fixed by law, and if they have violated those duties they are personally liable.

The question, then, as to whether or not the circuit court erred in refusing to hold appellees liable to make good said loss, must be decided upon the admission that, upon the facts proved and found by that court in a proper tribunal, they can be so held; the only question now being, did said court properly hold that it had no jurisdiction to adjudicate upon the matter? That courts of chancery have jurisdiction generally, on the application of beneficiaries of a trust fund, to charge trustees with losses occurring through their negligence or mismanagement, is too clear to call for the citation of authorities. The decree of the circuit court seems to have proceeded upon the theory that, inasmuch as the trustees were also executors of the will of James S. Waterman, a court of chancery could not compel them to make good the loss sustained by complainants without interfering with the jurisdiction of the county court before which the administration of the estate was pending. This, we think, is a misapprehension. The negligence in failing to secure or collect these claims, it is said, was the negligence of the executors, over whom, in the administration of the estate, the county court has exclusive jurisdiction. The relief sought by this bill is against the trustees, and not the executors; and, if the relief prayed cannot be granted by a court of chancery, it must be because complainants have failed to prove such dereliction of duty on the part of appellees, in their capacity as trustees, as should make them liable, and not because their bill seeks to remove any part of the administration of the estate from the county court. It does not follow, because Alden and Robinson were guilty of negligence in not collecting said indebtedness as executors, they are not also guilty of neglect of duty in that regard as trustees. Suppose other persons had been executors, and they had been guilty of the conduct charged in this bill, causing the loss here complained of, and these trustees, with full knowledge of that misconduct, had not only consented, but themselves contributed, thereto, would there have been any doubt as to the power of a court of chancery to charge the trustees, regardless of the liability of the executors in their settlement of the estate in the county court? The executors and trustees being the same persons, it is impossible that there should be an act of fraud or breach of duty by the executors which is not consented to and acquiesced in by the trustees. The question is not in which capacity appellees are liable, and hence cases cited by counsel on either side, discussing the question as to whether funds were held in the one capacity or another, have no application. On the allegations of the bill, and the finding of the facts by the circuit court, the debts in question have been absolutely lost to the estate, and to that extent the complainants have been injured; and the only question which can now or hereafter arise between these parties is, have these trustees, by their negligent conduct, become liable for that loss? Nothing which may be hereafter done in the settlement of the estate in the county court can affect this question, and we are unable to see why these complainants should be sent to that court for the settlement of their rights. We are therefore of the opinion that the circuit court erred in refusing to take jurisdiction of the question of the liability of appellees for said loss, and that it should have decreed that they make good the same to the trust fund in their hands.

alone, the first master reported that the makers claimed to have a defense against it, and, when the case was again referred, the master was directed to ascertain whether or not a valid defense did exist to said note, and report the same. He reported that a defense was insisted upon, and that on the testimony of said C. W. and W. W. Marsh it was established, the only question being as to the competency of those parties as witnesses to prove the defense; and on that question he found that in their favor. We think his conclusion as to their competency was correct. Moreover, it does not appear that appellees could have secured or collected that note, however prompt and diligent they might have been. The Marshes denied that they owed it, and do not say they would have paid or secured it if applied to for that purpose; whereas they admit that the other two notes were undisputed, and could have been secured if security had been asked for. Appellees should not, therefore, be held liable on said personal note.

Both parties object to the apportionment of the costs and expenses of the suit made by the circuit court. We think the order in that regard is quite as favorable to appellees as the facts of the case would justify. They are responsible for the most expensive portion of this litigation, in failing to keep proper accounts of their trusteeship. In the first special master's report is the significant finding that they "made out and exhibited an entirely new book of accounts as executors, also one as trustees, since the filing of the bill;" and that fact the master well says "amounts to an admission that prior books were not what they ought to be." There is no claim on their part that they attempted to keep accurate separate accounts of the trust estate. The only apology for failing to do so is that they did not know how to classify the two kinds of property. But they were entitled to counsel, at the expense of the trust estate, to assist them, and, if necessary, to the directions of a court of equity in that regard. They certainly had no right to omit a plain legal duty because they may have been in doubt as to how it should be performed. On that theory they might have neglected that duty during the entire period of their trusteeship. At all events, on the report of the first master the court found it necessary to again refer the case to a second master to make a complete statement of the account, and this of necessity greatly increased the costs and expenses of the suit. Appellees cannot therefore justly complain that they were required to pay a considerable part of the whole expense. On the other hand, owing to the large amount and variety of assets belonging to the estate, it was a matter of some difficulty at least, as the result of this litigation shows, to determine just what property belonged to principal and what to income. As before said, appellees were entitled to the advice of counsel, and, if necessary, the aid of the court, to properly settle that question. The statement of the account approved by the court below is therefore for the benefit of all parties interested in the trust estate,—those who take the income, and those who shall finally take the principal; and it cannot be said that either should be entirely exempt from liability for costs and expenses in making it. It is conceded that taxing costs in a chancery proceeding is always within the sound legal discretion of the chancellor, and that his decree in that regard will only be reviewed where it is shown that there has been an abuse of that discretion. We see no reason for interfering in the present case on that ground. It is insisted with great earnestness that the account stated by the last special master, and approved by the court, is erroneous, in that it fails to charge the trustees with interest on the small amounts which had been charged wrongfully by Alden for railroad fare and commissions on insurance. It is perhaps true that the account is inaccurate in that respect, but the matter is of so little importance that no court ought to entertain the objection as reversible error. We have examined the account, and compared it with the proofs in the case, and are satisfied that it is substantially correct, and does justice between the parties, except in the matter of the Marsh indebtedness, as above stated. For that error the decree of the circuit court will be reversed, and the cause will be remanded to the circuit court, with directions to enter a decree in conformity with the views herein expressed. Reversed and remanded.

In re BARKER'S TRUSTS.

Chancery Division. Nov. 6, 1875.

This was a petition under the trustee act, 1850, and the bankruptcy act, 1869, asking for the removal of the sole trustee of a will (who had also a beneficial interest under it), on the ground that he had been adjudicated bankrupt, and for the appointment of a new trustee in his place, and for a vesting order.

Part of the property subject to the trusts of the will consisted of bonds transferable by delivery with coupons. The trusts were to receive the income, and pay it to one of the petitioners during life.

Mr. Chitty, Q. C., and Mr. Bush, in support of petition. Chapman Barber, for trustee. Solicitors: Tatham, Procter & Co.; Walter, Moojen & Co. Mr. Chester, for other parties.

JESSEL, M. R. In my view, it is the duty of the court to remove a bankrupt trustee who has trust money to receive or deal with, so that he can misappropriate it. There may, be exceptions, under special circumstances, to that general rule; and it may also be that, where a trustee has no money to receive, he ought not to be removed merely because he has become bankrupt; but I consider the general rule to be as I have stated. The reason is obvious. A necessitous man is more likely to be tempted to misappropriate trust funds than one who is wealthy; and besides, a man who has not shewn prudence in managing his own affairs is not likely to be successful in managing those of other people.

However, if special circumstances are required for the removal of a bankrupt trustee, I should in the present case find them in the nature of the trust property. Part of the property consists of bonds with coupons, which could very easily be made away with. The trustee must be removed, and I make an order accordingly.

CHICK et al. v. WILLETTS.

(2 Kan. 384.)

Supreme Court of Kansas. Jan. Term, 1864.

Error from district court, Shawnee county.

Nathan P. Case, for plaintiffs in error. J. & D. Brockway, for defendant in error.

CROZIER, C. J. Two questions are presented by the record: First, which law, the twentieth section of the Code, or the second section of the "amendatory act," prescribes the limitation; and, second, when an action upon a promissory note, secured by a mortgage on real estate, is barred by the statute of limitations, has the mortgagee any remedy upon the mortgage? These are the facts: On the sixth day of April, 1858, at Kansas City, in the state of Missouri, the defendant executed to the plaintiffs his promissory note, payable one day after date. Afterwards, and on the 12th day of August of that year, the defendant, to secure the payment of the note, executed, in this state, a mortgage upon some lots in Topeka, which mortgage contained a stipulation that if default was made in the payment of the note for two years from the date of the mortgage, that instrument might be foreclosed, etc. On August 13, 1863, a suit was instituted upon the note and mortgage, and the facts, as above stated, being admitted, judgment was rendered for the defendant. To reverse that judgment this proceeding is instituted.

The note having been made in Missouri, would, under the act of February 10, 1859, have been barred in two years from the passage of that act, if there were nothing else to be considered. By a stipulation in the mortgage, the time of payment was deferred two years from August 12, 1858.

The mortgage having been made in this state, was the arrangement, with reference to our statute of limitations, a Kansas or Missouri contract? Although no change was made upon the face of the note, yet the clause of the mortgage referred to was effective to change its terms as if written across its face. The time of its payment, with reference to the land, was extended two years. Its payment, as against the land, could not be enforced before that time; nor would the limitation laws begin to run against it until the expiration of that time. These changes in the original contract were effected by the paper which was executed in this state. The contract evidenced by the mortgage is essentially different from that set out in the note, and must control it. Therefore, the contract, as it stood, after the making of the mortgage, was a Kansas contract, and would not be barred in two years.

The statutes of limitation of this state are wholly unlike the English statute, and differ materially from the limitation laws of those states which have adhered to the common law forms of action and modes of procedure. Those statutes apply, in terms, to the forms of the action at law and contain no provisions concerning an equitable proceeding. If a party had concurrent remedies, one at law, the other in equity, courts of equity applied the limitation prescribed for the action at law. But in all other cases they were said to act merely in analogy to the statutes, and not in obedience to them.

In this state, the case is entirely different. The distinction between actions at law and suits in equity is abolished; and the statutes of limitation apply equally to both classes of cases. They were made to apply to the subject matter, and not to the form of the action. In England and the states referred to, a limitation different from that prescribed for simple contracts in writing, was prescribed for specialties. Here, "an action upon a specialty, or any agreement, contract or promise in writing," must be brought within three years; and it matters not what the relief demanded may be, whether such as could formerly be obtained only in a court of law, or such as might have been afforded by a court of equity exclusively.

Mortgages here differ essentially from mortgages at common law, and in the states referred to. At common law, a mortgage was a conveyance with a defeasance, and gave the mortgagee a present right of possession. Upon it, even before the conditions were broken, he might enter peaceably or bring ejectment. If the condition was broken, the conveyance became absolute. If the money was paid when due, the estate reverted to the mortgagor; if not so paid, the estate was gone from him forever. After a time, the law of mortgage was so modified that the legal title was not considered as having passed until the condition was broken. At a later day, another still more important innovation was made. While it was considered that, upon the condition broken, the mortgagee became invested with the legal title, and was entitled to possession, yet, in that condition of things, his title was subject to a defeasance. The rents and profits operated as cancellation, pro tanto, of his conveyance; and when they reached a sum sufficient to reimburse his original investment, with such use as the law allowed, the legal title reverted to the mortgagor, and he would be entitled to the possession; and he had a right to facilitate this operation by payment of the money, and upon application to a court of equity, his title would be disencumbered of the cloud the mortgage cast upon it. This right of the mortgagor was called "the equity of redemption," and, considering the then prevalent theory of mortgages, the phrase was peculiarly appropriate and expressive. The title had passed, but he had a right to redeem; and it is among the highest glories of equitable jurisprudence, that at so early a day the means of enforcing this right were supplied. Some of the states still adhere to the common law view, more or less modified by the real nature of the transaction; but in most of them, practically, all that remains of the old theory is their nomenclature. In this state, a clean sweep has been made by statute. The common law attributes of mortgages have been wholly set aside; the ancient theories have been demolished; and if we could consign to oblivion the terms and phrases—without meaning except in reference to those theories—with which our reflections are still embarrassed, the legal profession on the bench and at the bar would more readily understand and fully realize the new condition of things. The statute gives the mortgagor the right to the possession, even after the money is due, and confines the remedy of the mortgagee to an ordinary action and sale of the mortgaged premises; thus negating any idea of title in the mortgagee. It is a mere security, although in the form of a conditional conveyance; creating a lien upon the property, but vesting no estate whatever, either before or after condition broken. It gives no right of possession, and does not limit the mortgagor's right to control it—except that the security shall not be impaired. He may sell it, and the title would pass by his conveyance—subject, of course, to the lien of the mortgagee.

If we are right in these views as to our statute of limitations, and the operation of a mortgage under our law, the English cases and cases in New York and Ohio, cited by counsel for plaintiffs, have no application to the case at bar. The statutes of limitation under which they were made, make distinctions between notes and mortgages which do not exist here; and the operations of notes and mortgages there and here are totally different. The decisions are not authorities in this case, for the reason that they are not applicable, and cannot be made so. If our limitation law omitted mortgages, and our law of conveyances gave the right of possession to the mortgagee, some of them would be in point; but as neither of these conditions exist here, they throw no light upon the questions under consideration in the case at bar.

Our conclusions are, that the twentieth section of the Code prescribes the limitation to an action on the note or mortgage, and as the three years expired on the 12th day of August, 1863, a suit commenced on the 13th was too late. Judgment affirmed.

All the justices concurring.

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. 19, 1888.

Appeal from superior court, Cook county; J. E. Gary, Judge.

Watson S. Hinckley, plaintiff, sued George D. Barrett, Adalina S. Barrett, and William H. Whitehead, impleaded with others, defendants, in ejectment. Judgment for plaintiff, and the above-mentioned defendants appealed.

MULKEY, J. Watson S. Hinckley, claiming to be the owner in fee of the land in controversy, on the twenty-sixth day of February, 1885, brought an action of ejectment in the superior court of Cook county against the appellants, George D. Barrett, Adalina S. Barrett, William H. Whitehead, and others, to recover the possession thereof. There was a trial of the cause before the court without a jury, resulting in a finding and judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. The evidence tends to show the following state of facts: In 1870, Thomas Kearns was in possession of the land, claiming to own it in fee-simple. On August 3d of that year he sold and conveyed it to William H. W. Cushman for the sum of $80,000. Cushman gave his four notes to Kearns for the balance of the purchase money,—one for $12,500, maturing in 30 days; three for $16,875 each, maturing, respectively, in two, three, and four years after date,—and all secured by a mortgage on the premises. The notes seem to have all been paid but the last one. In 1878, Kearns died, and his widow, Alice Kearns, administered on his estate. Previous to his death, however, he had hypothecated the mortgage and last note to secure a loan from Greenebaum. Subsequently, and before the commencement of the present suit, Greenebaum, in his own right, and Mrs. Kearns, as administratrix of her husband, for value, sold and assigned by a separate instrument in writing the mortgage and note to the appellee, Watson S. Hinckley. This is in substance the case made by plaintiff. The defendants showed no title in themselves or any one else. The conclusion to be reached, therefore, depends upon whether the case made by the plaintiff warranted the court below in rendering the judgment it did.

It is claimed by appellants, in the first place, that much of the evidence relied on by appellee to sustain the judgment below was improperly admitted by the court, and various errors have been assigned upon the record questioning the correctness of the rulings of the court in this respect. They, however, go further, and insist that, even conceding the facts to be as claimed by appellee himself, they are not sufficient in law to sustain the action. As the judgment below will have to be reversed on the ground last suggested, it will not be necessary to consider the other errors assigned. We propose to state as briefly as may be some of the reasons which have led us to the conclusion reached. In doing so, it is perhaps proper to call attention at the outset to some considerations that should be steadily kept in mind as we proceed, and to which we attach not a little importance.

It is first to be specially noted that this is a suit at law, as contradistinguished from a suit in equity. It is brought to enforce a naked legal right, as distinguished from an equitable right. The plaintiff seeks to recover certain lands, the title whereof he claims in fee-simple. To do this he is bound to show in himself a fee-simple title at law, as contradistinguished from an equitable fee. Fischer v. Eslaman, 68 Ill. 78; Wales v. Bogue, 31 Ill. 464; Fleming v. Carter, 70 Ill. 286; Dawson v. Hayden, 67 Ill. 52. Has he done this? He attempts to derive title remotely through the mortgage from Cushman to Kearns, but upon what legal theory is not very readily perceived. His immediate source of title, however, seems to be Mrs. Kearns, as administratrix of her husband, and Greenebaum, as pledgee of the note and mortgage. The instrument through which he claims is lost or destroyed, and all we know concerning its character is what the plaintiff himself says about it. As to its contents, he does not pretend to state a single sentence or word in it, but characterizes it as an assignment, and gives the conclusions which he draws from it in general terms only. After stating his purchase of the note and mortgage in January, 1880, he says: "The assignment was from Mrs. Kearns, the administratrix of Thomas Kearns' estate, and Elias Greenebaum, the banker. At the time of the purchase, a separate writing was given to me,—a full assignment. * * * It was a very explicit assignment, or full assignment, of the note and mortgage, and the land, the property, and all the right and title to the land." It will be observed, the instrument is throughout characterized as an assignment only, which does not, like the term "deed" or specialty, signify an instrument under seal. A mere written assignment, founded upon a valuable consideration, is just as available for the purpose of passing to the assignee the equitable title to land as an instrument under seal. Such being the case, we would clearly not be warranted in inferring that the assignment was under seal, from the simple fact that the witness gives it as his opinion that the instrument was "a full assignment" of the land, which is nothing more than the witness' opinion upon a question of law. There not being sufficient evidence in the record to show that the assignment was under seal, it follows that, even conceding the legal title to the property to have been in Mrs. Kearns and Greenebaum, or either of them, it could not have passed to the appellee by that instrument, and, if not by it, not at all, because that is the only muniment of title relied on for that purpose. This conclusion is of course based upon the fundamental principle that an instrument inter partes, in order to pass the legal title to real property, must be under seal. But this is not all. Even conceding the sufficiency of the assignment to pass the legal title, the record, in our opinion, fails to show that the assignors, or either of them, had such title; hence there was nothing for the assignment to operate upon, so far as the legal estate in the land is concerned. Having no such title, they could not convey it. "Nemo plus juris ad alienum transferre potest, quam ipse habet." That the legal estate in this property was not either in Greenebaum or Mrs. Kearns at the time of the assignment to plaintiff is demonstrable by the plainest principle of law. Let us see. Thomas Kearns was the owner of this property in fee. He conveyed it in fee to Cushman. The latter, as a part of the same transaction, reconveyed it by way of mortgage to Kearns. By reason of this last conveyance, Kearns became mortgagee of the property, and Cushman mortgagor. According to the English doctrine, and that of some of the states of the Union, including our own, Kearns, at least as between the parties, took the legal estate, and Cushman the equitable. According to other authorities, Kearns, by virtue of Cushman's mortgage to him, took merely a lien upon the property to secure the mortgage indebtedness, and the legal title remained in Cushman. For the purposes of the present inquiry, it is not important to consider just now, if at all, which is the better or true theory. It is manifest, and must be conceded, that the legal estate in the land, after the execution of the mortgage, was either in the mortgagee or mortgagor, or in both combined. Such being the case, it is equally clear appellee, to succeed, must have deduced title through one or both of these parties. This could only have been done by showing that the legal title had, by means of some of the legally recognized modes of conveying real property, passed from one or both of them to himself. This he did not do, or attempt to do; indeed, he does not claim through them, nor either of them. Not only so; neither Mrs. Kearns nor Greenebaum, through whom appellee does claim, derives title through any deed or conveyance executed by either the mortgagor or mortgagee; nor does either of them claim as heir or devisee of the mortgagor or mortgagee.

As the assignment of the note and mortgage to appellee did not, as we hold, transfer or otherwise affect the legal title to the land, it may be asked, what effect, then, did it have? This question, like most others pertaining to the law of mortgages, admits of two answers, depending upon whether the rules and principles which prevail in courts of equity or of law are to be applied. If the latter, we would say none; because, as to the note, that could not be assigned by a separate instrument, as was done in this case, so as to pass the legal title. Ryan v. May, 14 Ill. 49; Fortier v. Darst, 31 Ill. 213; Chickering v. Raymond, 15 Ill. 362. As to the mortgage, it is well settled that could not be assigned like negotiable paper, so as to pass the legal title in the instrument, or clothe the assignee with the immunity of an innocent holder, except under certain circumstances which do not apply here. Railway Co. v. Loewenthal, 93 Ill. 433; Hamilton v. Lubukee, 51 Ill. 415; Olds v. Cummings, 31 Ill. 188; McIntire v. Yates, 104 Ill. 491; Fortier v. Darst, 31 Ill. 212. But that the mortgagee, or any one succeeding to his title, might, by deed in the form of an assignment, pass to the assignee the legal as well as the equitable interest of the mortgagee, we have no doubt, though there is some conflict on this subject. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 115, and authorities there cited. Yet the assignors, in the case in hand, not having the legal title, as we have just seen, could not, by any form of instrument, transmit it to another. If, however, the rules and principles which obtain in courts of equity are to be applied, we would say that, by virtue of the assignment, the appellee became the equitable owner of the note and mortgage, and that it gave him such an interest or equity respecting the land as entitled him to have it sold in satisfaction of the debt.

There is perhaps no species of ownership known to the law which is more complex, or which has given rise to more diversity of opinion, and even conflict in decisions, than that which has sprung from the mortgage of real property. By the common law, if the mortgagor paid the money at the time specified in the mortgage, the estate of the mortgagee, by reason of the performance of the condition therein, at once determined, and was forever gone, and the mortgagor, by mere operation of law, was remitted to his former estate. On the other hand, if the mortgagor failed to pay on the day named, the title of the mortgagee became absolute, and the mortgagor ceased to have any interest whatever in the mortgaged premises. By the execution of the mortgage, the entire legal estate passed to the mortgagee, and, unless it was expressly provided that the mortgagor should retain possession till default in payment, the mortgagee might maintain ejectment as well before as after default. This is the view taken by the common-law courts of England, and which has obtained, with certain limitations, in most of the states of the Union, including our own, in which the common-law system prevails. In Carroll v. Balance, 26 Ill. 9, which was ejectment by the mortgagee against the assignee of the mortgagor, to recover the mortgaged premises, this court thus states the English rule on the subject: "In England, and in many of the American states, it is understood that the ordinary mortgage deed conveys the fee in the land to the mortgagee, and under it he may oust the mortgagor immediately on the execution and delivery of the mortgage, without waiting for the period fixed for the performance of the condition, [citing Coote Mortg. 339; Blaney v. Bearce, 2 Greenl. 132; Brown v. Cram, 1 N. H. 169; Hobart v. Sanborn, 13 N. H. 226; Paper-Mills v. Ames, 8 Metc. (Mass.) 1]. And this right is fully recognized by courts of equity, although liable to be defeated at any moment in those courts by the payment of the debt." Again, in Nelson v. Pinegar, 30 Ill. 481, which was a bill by mortgagee to restrain waste, it is said: "The complainant, as mortgagee of the land, was the owner in fee, as against the mortgagor and all claiming under him. He had the jus in re, as well as ad rem, and being so is entitled to all the rights and remedies which the law gives to such an owner." So, in Oldham v. Pfeigar, 84 Ill. 102, which was ejectment by the heirs of the mortgagor against the grantee of the mortgagor, this court, in holding the action could not be maintained, said: "Under the rulings of this court, the mortgagee is held, as in England, in law the owner of the fee, having the jus in re, as well as the jus ad rem." In Finlon v. Clark, 118 Ill. 32, 7 N. E. 475, the same doctrine is announced, and the cases above cited are referred to with approval. Taylor v. Adams, 115 Ill. 570, 4 N. E. 837. Courts of equity, however, from a very early period, took a widely different view of the matter. They looked upon the forfeiture of the estate at law, because of non-payment on the very day fixed by the mortgage, as in the nature of a penalty, and, as in other cases of penalties, gave relief accordingly. This was done by allowing the mortgagor to redeem the land on equitable terms at any time before the right to do so was barred by foreclosure. The right to thus redeem after the estate had become absolute at law in the mortgagee was called the "equity of redemption," and has continued to be so called to the present time. These courts, looking at the substance of the transaction, rather than its form, and with a view of giving effect to the real intentions of the parties, held that the mortgage was a mere security for the payment of the debt; that the mortgagor was the real beneficial owner of the land, subject to the incumbrance of the mortgage; that the interest of the mortgagee was simply a lien and incumbrance upon the land, rather than an estate in it. In short, the positions of mortgagor and mortgagee were substantially reversed in the view taken by courts of equity.

These two systems grew up side by side, and were maintained for centuries without conflict or even friction between the law and equity tribunals by which they were respectively administered. The equity courts did not attempt to control the law courts, or even question the legal doctrines which they announced. On the contrary, their force and validity were often recognized in the relief granted. Thus, equity courts, in allowing a redemption after a forfeiture of the legal estate, uniformly required the mortgagee to reconvey to the mortgagor, which was of course necessary to make his title available in a court of law. In maintaining these two systems and theories in England, there was none of that confusion and conflict which we encounter in the decisions of the courts of this country; resulting, chiefly, from a failure to keep in mind the distinction between courts of law and of equity, and the rules and principles applicable to them respectively. The courts there, by observing these things, kept the two systems intact, and in this condition they were transplanted to this country, and became a part of our own system of law. But other causes have contributed to destroy that certainty and uniformity which formerly prevailed with us. Chiefly among these causes may be mentioned the statutory changes in the law in many of the states, and the failure of the courts and authors to note those changes in their expositions of the law of such states. Perhaps another fruitful source of confusion on this subject is the fact that in many of the states the common-law forms of action have been abolished by statute, and instead of them a single statutory form of action has been adopted, in which legal and equitable rights are administered at the same time, and by the same tribunal. Yet the distinction between legal and equitable rights is still preserved, so that, although the action in theory is one at law, it is nevertheless subject to be defeated by a purely equitable defense. Under the influence of these statutory enactments and radical changes in legal procedure, by which legal and equitable rights are given effect and enforced in the same suit, the equitable theory of a mortgage has in many of these states entirely superseded the legal one. Thus, in New York it is said, in the case of Trustees, etc., v. Wheeler, 61 N. Y. 88, "that a mortgage is a mere chose in action. It gives no legal estate in the land, but is simply a lien thereon; the mortgagor remaining both the legal and equitable owner of the fee." Following this doctrine to its logical results, it is held by the courts of that state that ejectment under the Code will not lie at the suit of the mortgagee against the owner of the equity of redemption. Murray v. Walker, 31 N. Y. 399. In strict conformity with the theory that the mortgagee has no estate in the land, but a mere lien as security for his debt, the courts of New York, and others taking the same view, hold that a conveyance by the mortgagee before foreclosure, without an assignment of the debt, is in law a nullity. Jackson v. Curtis, 19 Johns. 325; Wilson v. Troup, 2 Cow. 231; Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns. 41. And this court seems to have recognized the same rule as obtaining in this state, in Delano v. Bennett, 90 Ill. 533.

The New York cases just cited, and all others taking the same view, are clearly inconsistent with the whole current of our decisions on the subject, as is abundantly shown by the authorities already cited. The doctrine would seem to be fundamental that if one sui juris, having the legal title to land, intentionally delivers to another a deed therefor, containing apt words of conveyance, the title at law, at least, will pass to the grantee; but for what purposes or uses the grantee will hold it, or to what extent he will be able to enforce it, will depend upon circumstances. If the mortgagee conveys the land without assigning the debt to the grantee, the latter would hold the legal title as trustee for the holder of the mortgage debt. Sanger v. Bancroft, 12 Gray, 367; Barnard v. Eaton, 2 Cush. 304; Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns. 40. It is true, the interest which passes is of no appreciable value to the grantee. Thus, in the case last cited, Chancellor Kent, in speaking of it, says: "The mortgage interest, as distinct from the debt, is not a fit subject of assignment. It has no determinate value. If it should be assigned, the assignee must hold the interest at the will and disposal of the creditor who holds the bond." In Wait's Actions and Defenses (volume 4, p. 565) the rule is thus stated: "By the common law, a mortgagee in fee of land is considered as absolutely entitled to the estate, which he may devise or transmit by descent to his heirs." In conformity with this view, Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, (volume 3, p. 159,) in treating of this subject, says: "In law, the mortgagee may convey the land itself by deed, or devise it by will, and on his death intestate it will descend to his heirs. In equity, his interest is a mere thing in action, assignable as such, and a deed by him would operate merely as an assignment of the mortgage; and in administering the estate of a deceased mortgagee a court of equity treats the mortgage as personal assets, to be dealt with by the executor or administrator." We have already seen that under the decisions of this court, and by the general current of authority, a mortgage is not assignable at law by mere indorsement, as in the case of commercial paper. But, on the other hand, the estate and interest of the mortgagee may be conveyed to the holder of the indebtedness, or even of a third party, by deed with apt words of conveyance; and the fact that it is in form an assignment will make no difference. 2 Washb. Real Prop. 115, 116. Such an assignee, if owner of the mortgage indebtedness, might, no doubt, maintain ejectment in his own name for his own use. Or the action might be brought in his name for the use of a third party owning the indebtedness. Kilgour v. Gockley, 83 Ill. 109. So, in this case, if the action had been brought in the name of Kearns' heirs for the use of Hinckley, no reason is perceived why the action might not be maintained.

It must not be concluded, from what we have said, that the dual system respecting mortgages, as above explained, exists in this state precisely as it did in England prior to its adoption in this country, for such is not the case. It is a conceded fact that the equitable theory of a mortgage has, in process of time, made in this state, as in others, material encroachments upon the legal theory which is now fully recognized in courts of law. Thus, it is now the settled law that the mortgagor or his assignee is the legal owner of the mortgaged estate, as against all persons except the mortgagee or his assigns. Hall v. Lance, 25 Ill. 250, 277; Emory v. Keighan, 88 Ill. 482. As a result of this doctrine, it follows that, in ejectment by the mortgagor against a third party, the defendant cannot defeat the action by showing an outstanding title in the mortgagee. Hall v. Lance, supra. So, too, courts of law now regard the title of a mortgagee in fee in the nature of a base or determinable fee. The term of its existence is measured by that of the mortgage debt. When the latter is paid off, or becomes barred by the statute of limitations, the mortgagee's title is extinguished by operation of law. Pollock v. Maison, 41 Ill. 516; Harris v. Mills, 28 Ill. 44; Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 383. Hence the rule is as well established at law, as it is in equity, that the debt is the principal thing, and the mortgage an incident. So, also, while it is indispensable in all cases to a recovery in ejectment that the plaintiff show in himself the legal title to the property as set forth in the declaration, except where the defendant is estopped from denying it, yet it does not follow that because one has such title he may under all circumstances maintain the action; and this is particularly so in respect to a mortgage title. Such title exists for the benefit of the holder of the mortgage indebtedness, and it can only be enforced by an action in furtherance of his interests; that is, as a means of coercing payment. If the mortgagee, therefore, should, for a valuable consideration, assign the mortgage indebtedness to a third party, and the latter, after default in payment, should take possession of the mortgaged premises, ejectment would not lie against him at the suit of the mortgagee, although the legal title would be in the latter, for the reason it would not be in the interest of the owner of the indebtedness. In short, it is a well-settled principle that one having a mere naked legal title to land in which he has no beneficial interest, and in respect to which he has no duty to perform, cannot maintain ejectment against the equitable owner, or any one having an equitable interest therein, with a present right of possession. This case, with a slight change of the circumstances, would afford an excellent illustration of the principle. Suppose the present plaintiff had obtained possession under his equitable title to the note and mortgage, and the heirs of Kearns, who hold the legal title, had brought ejectment against him, the action clearly could not have been maintained, for the reasons we have just stated. But it does not follow, because such an action would not lie against him, that he could, upon a mere equitable title, maintain the action against others. Cottrell v. Adams, 2 Biss. 351-353, Fed. Cas. No. 3,272; 9 Myers, Fed. Dec. 240. The question in that case was almost identical with the question in this, and the court reached the same conclusion we have. See, also, Speer v. Haddock, 31 Ill. 439.

For the reasons stated, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

Judgment reversed.

LADUE v. DETROIT & M. R. CO.

(13 Mich. 380.)

Supreme Court of Michigan. July Term, 1865.

Appeal in chancery from Wayne circuit.

The facts, so far as they are necessary to an understanding of the legal questions involved in the case, will be found stated in the opinion.

G. V. N. Lothrop, for complainant. H. H. Emmons and A. Pond, for defendants.

CHRISTIANCY, J. The mortgage, which the bill in this case seeks to foreclose, was executed by John Ladue to the complainant and Francis E. Eldred, composing the firm of Ladue & Eldred, on the 4th day of August, 1852, to secure and indemnify the firm against any indorsements which might be made, or liabilities to be incurred, by them as sureties for John Ladue, as well as for any moneys they might advance for him, according to the condition of a bond to which the mortgage was collateral, and which was of like effect. There was nothing in the papers or in the arrangement between the parties which bound Ladue & Eldred to make any advances or to indorse any paper for John Ladue, or to incur any liability for him, nor was the latter bound to accept any such accommodation. The effect of the arrangement was that such advances and liabilities, if made or incurred, would be purely optional on the part of the mortgagees. This mortgage was duly recorded on the day of its date. On the 9th day of May, 1853, John Ladue, the mortgagor, sold and conveyed the mortgaged premises to Charles Howard (through whom the railroad company derive their title), by warranty deed, which was duly recorded on the 9th day of July, 1853. John Ladue, however, remained in possession, using the premises as before, until his death, December 4, 1854.

No claim is made for any advances made by Ladue & Eldred to John Ladue, but the whole claim under the mortgage is based upon indorsements made for him by the mortgagees, which have been paid by Andrew Ladue, one of the complainants, and all these indorsements, as shown by the proofs, were made some time after the sale to Howard and the recording of his deed. Whatever indorsements were made prior to that time seem to have been taken up by John Ladue; and it does not satisfactorily appear by the evidence that any of these indorsements, made since the recording of Howard's deed, were made in renewal of paper indorsed by them previous to that time. No indorsements made prior to the recording of Howard's deed are in any way involved, and the case may therefore be considered in all respects in the same light as if no such previous indorsements had ever been made, especially as it does not appear that at the time of the sale to Howard, or the recording of his deed, there was any existing unsatisfied indorsement, or any subsisting liability, inchoate or otherwise, incurred by the mortgagees for the mortgagor.

The mortgagees, at the time of the indorsements in question, had no notice of the deed to Howard, unless the record of that deed is to be considered such notice, the deed having been some months previously recorded. The validity of the mortgage, as between the parties, for any amount of advances which might be made, or liabilities incurred under it, after they should have been thus made or incurred, is not questioned by the defendants; nor is it denied that the record of it would be sufficient notice to subsequent purchasers and incumbrancers, of the amount which the mortgagees might actually have advanced or indorsed for the mortgagor; or, in other words, the amount for which it had become an actual and subsisting security, at the time when the question of notice of the mortgage became material, which, for the purposes of this case, is admitted to cover the period from the purchase by Howard down to the time of the recording of his deed, the record of which is claimed to be notice to the mortgagees as regards any advances made to, or liabilities incurred by, them for the mortgagor after the recording of the deed. Nor is it denied, that if the mortgagees, by the contracts or arrangements between them and the mortgagor (to secure which, on the part of the latter, was the object of the mortgage), had been bound to make advances or to indorse for the mortgagor, the record of the mortgage would have been full notice to Howard, and the mortgage would have been good against him, though the advances were not in fact made or the paper indorsed until after the deed to him and actual notice of that deed to the mortgagees. The defendants also admit that the result would be the same under this mortgage, as to any advances made or paper indorsed by the mortgagees for the mortgagor, before they had actual or constructive notice of the sale and deed to Howard. But they insist that, as there was not at the time of Howard's purchase or the recording of his deed any debt of the mortgagor, or any liability incurred for him by the mortgagees, absolute or inchoate, nor any obligation on their part to incur such liability, the mortgage was not then an incumbrance in fact or in legal effect; that it could only become such from the time when the advances or indorsements were actually made; and it being optional with the mortgagees whether they would make any such advances or indorsements, and the indorsements being made subsequent to the recording of Howard's deed, the mortgage is, in legal effect, subsequent to the deed, and the record of the deed was notice to the mortgagees of Howard's rights.

The first question, therefore, for our determination is, what was the legal effect of the mortgage (if any) upon the land, at the time of the recording of the mortgagor's deed to Howard?

That a mortgage in this state, both at law and in equity, even when given to secure a debt actually subsisting at its date, conveys no title of the land to the mortgagee (especially since the statute of 1843, taking away ejectment by the mortgagee); that the title remains in the mortgagor until foreclosure and sale, and that the mortgage is but a security, in the nature of a specific lien, for the debt, has been already settled by the decisions of this court. Dougherty v. Randall, 3 Mich. 581; Caruthers v. Humphrey, 12 Mich. 270; and Crippen v. Morrison, to be reported in 13 Mich. This is in accordance with the well-settled law of the state of New York, from which our system of law in regard to mortgages has been, in a great measure, derived. Jackson v. Willard, 4 Johns. 41; Collins v. Torrey, 7 Johns. 277; Runyan v. Messerean, 11 Johns. 534; Gardner v. Heartt, 3 Denio, 232; Edwards v. Insurance Co., 21 Wend. 467; Waring v. Smyth, 2 Barb. Ch. 119; Bryan v. Butts, 27 Barb. 504; Bank v. Tallman, 31 Barb. 201; Cortright v. Cady, 21 N. Y. 342.

This view of a mortgage is also sustained by several of the English decisions, and substantially this is the more generally received American doctrine, as will sufficiently appear by reference to the decisions, most of which have been carefully collected in the elaborate brief of the defendant's counsel, but which are too numerous to be cited here. There are exceptions and peculiarities in particular states, in some of which, as in some of the New England states and Kentucky, the old idea of an estate upon a condition continues to rankle in the law of mortgages, like a foreign substance in the living organism, but is rapidly being eliminated and thrown off by the healthy action of the courts under a more vigorous application of plain common sense. But few of the incidents of this antiquated doctrine are now recognized in most of the states of this Union; the title, for nearly all practical purposes, being now recognized, both at law and in equity, as continuing in the mortgagor, and the mortgage as a mere lien for the security of the debt. But wherever any vestige of this now nearly exploded idea continues to prevail, in connection with the more liberal doctrines of modern times which the courts have been compelled, from time to time, to adopt, it seems only to confuse and deform the law of mortgages by various anomalies and inconsistencies, making it a chaos of arbitrary and discordant rules, resting upon no broad or just principle; while, by recognizing the mortgage as a mere lien for the security of the debt, at law as well as in equity, and thus giving it effect according to the real understanding and intention of the parties, the law of mortgages becomes at once a system of homogeneous principles, easily understood and applied, and just in their operation.

A mortgage, then, being a mere security for the debt or liability secured by it, it necessarily results:

(1) That the debt or liability secured is the principal, and the mortgage but an incident or accessory. See cases above cited; also, Richards v. Synes, Barnad. Ch. 90; Roath v. Smith, 5 Conn. 133; Lucas v. Harris, 20 Ill. 165; Vansant v. Allman, 23 Ill. 31; Ord v. McKee, 5 Cal. 615; Ellison v. Daniels, 11 N. H. 274; Hughes v. Edwards, 9 Wheat. 489; Green v. Hart, 1 Johns. 580; McGan v. Marshall, 7 Humph. 121; 4 Kent, Comm. 193; McMillan v. Richards, 9 Cal. 365.

(2) That anything which transfers the debt (though by parol or mere delivery), transfers the mortgage with it. See cases above cited, especially Vansant v. Allman, 23 Ill. 31; Ord v. McKee, 5 Cal. 615; Ellison v. Daniels, 11 N. H. 274. See, also, Martin v. Mowlin, 2 Burr. 978; Clark v. Beach, 6 Conn. 164; Southern v. Mendane, 5 N. H. 420; Wilson v. Kimball, 27 N. H. 300, 36 N. H. 39; Crowl v. Vance, 4 Iowa, 434; 1 Blackf. 137; 5 Cow. 202; 9 Wend. 410; 1 Johns. 580.

(3) That an assignment of the mortgage without the debt is a mere nullity. Ellison v. Daniels, 11 N. H. 274; Jackson v. Bronson, 19 Johns. 325; Wilson v. Throop, 2 Cow. 195; Weeks v. Eaton, 15 N. H. 145; Peters v. Jamestown Bridge Co., 5 Cal. 324; Webb v. Flanders, 32 Me. 175; 4 Kent, Comm., ubi supra; Thayer v. Campbell, 9 Mo. 277.

(4) That payment, release, or anything which extinguishes the debt, ipso facto extinguishes the mortgage. Lane v. Shears, 1 Wend. 433; Sherman v. Sherman, 3 Ind. 337; Ryan v. Dunlap, 17 Ill. 40; Armitage v. Wickliffe, 12 B. Mon. 496; Paxon v. Paul, 3 Har. & McH. 399; Perkins v. Dibble, 10 Ohio, 433; Buckenridge v. Ormsby, 1 Marsh. 257; Cameron v. Irwin, 5 Hill, 272. It will be seen from these authorities that some, if not all, of these incidents or characteristics of a mortgage are recognized by some of the courts which still hold the mortgage to be a conveyance of the estate,—an idea, however, with which they are utterly inconsistent, as such incidents can only logically flow from the doctrine that the estate still remains in the mortgagor, and that the mortgage is but a lien for security of a debt.

These propositions being established, the necessary result is that the mortgage instrument, without any debt, liability, or obligation secured by it can have no present legal effect as a mortgage or an incumbrance upon the land. It is but a shadow without a substance,—an incident without a principal,—and it can make no difference in the result whether there has once been a debt or liability which has been satisfied, or whether the debt or liability to be secured has not yet been created, and it requires, as in this case, some future agreement of the parties to give it existence. At most, the difference is only between the nonentity which follows annihilation and that which precedes existence.

The instrument can only take effect as a mortgage or incumbrance from the time when some debt or liability shall be created, or some binding contract is made, which is to be secured by it. Until this takes place, neither the land nor the parties, nor third persons, are bound by it. It constitutes, of itself, no binding contract. Either party may disregard or repudiate it at his pleasure. It is but a part of an arrangement, merely contemplated as probable, and which can only be rendered effectual by the future consent and further acts of the parties. It is but a kind of conditional proposition, neither binding nor intended to bind either of the parties, till subsequently assented to or adopted by both.

Though the question does not properly arise here, we take it for granted, for the purposes of this case, that the mortgage instrument may, if properly executed, go upon the record, and become effectual between the parties when the debt or liability contemplated shall have been created, unless the mortgagor has, in the meantime,—as he had a clear right to do,—parted with the title and deprived himself of the power of creating an incumbrance upon it. But the mere recording of the instrument would not make it a mortgage or incumbrance in legal effect, if it were not so before, nor give it a greater effect as to third persons than it had between the parties. The record of such an instrument might be an intimation that advances and indorsements were contemplated as probable, and that they might, therefore, have been already made; and for this reason might, to this extent, properly put a purchaser or incumbrancer upon inquiry. But unless it is to have a greater effect than the record of other mortgages, it could be notice only of such facts as might have been ascertained by inspection of the instrument and papers referred to, and by inquiry; in other words, by a knowledge of the rights of the parties in respect to the land at the time notice became material, which, for the purposes of this case, as already explained, we shall assume to be from the time of Howard's purchase down to the time when he recorded his deed. The result must, therefore, be the same here as if there had been no record. Had Howard made the most diligent inquiry in connection with the inspection of the papers, what facts could he have ascertained? Nothing material to the rights of the parties or to his own rights beyond the facts already stated,—nothing which, in any manner, interfered with the mortgagor's absolute right of sale. He would have learned, in fact, that the instrument recorded as a mortgage was not, in legal effect, a mortgage, nor upon any principle of justice or equity an incumbrance upon the land; that either party had a perfect right to refuse to give that future assent, or to enter into that future contract or arrangement, by which alone it could acquire vitality or force. He had, therefore, a just right to conclude that the record of his deed would be fair notice to the persons mentioned as mortgagees, as the instrument could only become a mortgage subsequent to that time, and then only by reason of some future debt or liability which it required the further assent and agreement of the parties to create. He had a right to conclude that, upon every sound principle, Ladue & Eldred would, as prudent men, be as likely, and ought to be as much bound, to look to the record before making any such advances, or indorsing paper for the mortgagor, as if a new mortgage for the purpose were to be taken at the time, since they had the same option to make the advances or not, as any new mortgagee would have had, and ought, therefore, to be governed by the same prudential considerations. And they must be presumed to have known that John Ladue, until such advances or indorsements were made by them, had full power to sell the land free from any incumbrance of the mortgage instrument, which had not as yet become a mortgage.

But it is urged, on the part of the complainant, that it was the duty of Howard, on making the purchase, to give actual notice of the fact to the mortgagees, so that they might not afterwards be led to incur further liabilities on the faith of the mortgage. In England, where there is no general registry law by which the record of deeds and mortgages is made notice to all the world, and the state of the title cannot therefore be always ascertained in this way as with us, and where parties, therefore, can only rely upon actual notice, there may be good reason for requiring actual notice in such a case. But upon no principle which I have been able to comprehend, do I think such actual notice should be required in a case like the present. Nor have I been able to see any just or substantial reason why the record of Howard's deed (which was long before this mortgage instrument took effect as an incumbrance, and therefore prior in fact and law) should not be deemed notice to the mortgagees in the same manner, and to the same extent, as if their mortgage had not been executed or recorded until the time when it became effectual as a mortgage by their indorsements. Within the very spirit and purpose of the registry law, it seems to me, the record of the deed must be held notice in the one case as well as in the other. The opposite view, it seems to me, rests upon the erroneous idea that the recording of a mortgage adds something to its validity as between the parties, and that, even as between them, an instrument may be made a mortgage by recording it, which would not have that operation without the record. This, certainly, is not the effect of our registry laws. If Howard could not rely upon the record of his deed for giving notice to these mortgagees, as to future advances or indorsements, without which their mortgage instrument could never become effectual, even as between the parties, then it is difficult to see why he should be allowed to rely upon it as against any person who he might know had contemplated purchasing or taking a mortgage upon the property, and whose efforts or conversations had gone so far as to render it probable to the mind of such person that his preliminary negotiations or conversations might, at some future period, have resulted in a purchase or a mortgage; though at the time of the record of Howard's deed they had not resulted in any binding contract whatever, and both parties were at liberty to disregard them, without any breach of faith. As to all such persons, it has, I think, been generally conceded that the record of a deed is sufficient notice. In Craig v. Tappin, 1 Sandf. Ch. 78, a case cited by complainant's counsel, it was held that notice that a mortgage was about to be made, is not enough to bind a party with notice of the mortgage. And see Cushing v. Hurd, 4 Pick. 252; Warden v. Adams, 15 Mass. 232.

I have thus far endeavored to show that upon principles resulting from the nature of a mortgage, as recognized here, this mortgage should be considered, in fact and in legal effect, subsequent to the deed, and that the registry of the deed should, therefore, be considered notice to the mortgagees. The authorities upon this question are not so numerous as one would be led to expect; but the few which are to be found are conflicting. I shall first notice those which are claimed to be opposed to the conclusion at which I have arrived. The English authorities upon this question I consider of very little, if any, weight, for the reason already stated, and for the further reason that, for several purposes, a mortgage is there still held to be a conveyance of the estate upon condition, and the mortgagee as having the legal title—a doctrine upon which the right of tacking (never recognized in this state) to some extent depends, the legal title coupled with an equity being held to prevail over an equity. 4 Kent, Comm. 117; Coote, Mortg. 410 et seq.; opinion of Lord Cranworth in Hopkinson v. Ralt, 7 Jur. (N. S.) 1209. The latter remark applies also with equal force to the decisions cited from Kentucky. Nelson's Heirs v. Boyce, 7 J. J. Marsh. 401, goes upon the express ground that the mortgage conveys the legal title, and that the mortgagee, therefore, is not bound to notice the record of a mortgage subsequently made by the mortgagor, who has only the equity of redemption. It cites Bank v. Vance, 4 Litt. 173, as supporting the doctrine of tacking upon this ground. Nelson v. Boyce also assigns, as another reason, why the record should not be notice, a provision of their statute allowing sixty days in which to record a mortgage, and says an examination of the record by the first mortgagee might therefore be of no use. Now it is clear that neither of these reasons for refusing to the record the effect of notice exists here. Of the case of Burdett v. Clay, 8 B. Mon. 287 (besides the fact that the mortgagee there holds the legal estate), it may further be noticed that, though the previously recorded mortgage was in part to secure future liabilities, yet all the liabilities were incurred before the subsequent mortgage. There are some few cases in this country, decided mainly, if not solely, upon the authority of Gordon v. Graham, 7 Vin. Abr. p. 52, 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 598, which can have little influence here, not only for the reason above stated, but because the case itself is no longer law, even in England. This case decided that a mortgagee holding a mortgage to secure money lent, and future advances (which he was not bound to make), was entitled to preference over a subsequent mortgagee, even for advances made after notice of the second mortgage. But so far as relates to advances made after such notice, this case was expressly overruled by the house of lords in Hopkinson v. Ralt, 7 Jur. (N. S.) 1209, 5 Law Times (N. S.) 90.

Most of the cases cited by complainant's counsel against the proposition I have endeavored to establish have no bearing upon the particular question we are now discussing. Bank v. Finch, 3 Barb. Ch. 293, only decides that when a mortgage is given to secure an existing debt, the mortgagee does not lose his security by extending the time and taking a renewal note for the same debt. In Craig v. Tappin, 2 Sandf. Ch. 78, the question of notice did not arise, and so far as the reasoning of the court has any bearing upon the present question, it is in favor of the position I have endeavored to establish. In King v. McVickar, 3 Sandf. Ch. 208, Stuyvesant v. Hone, 1 Sandf. Ch. 419, and Stuyvesant v. Hall, 2 Barb. Ch. 151, no question of future advances or liabilities was involved; but the question relating to the effect of the record was similar to that decided in this court in James v. Brown, 11 Mich. 25, and decided the same way,—a question so entirely foreign to that we are now discussing as to require no comment.

Eyer v. Bank, 11 Ill. 381, only decides that a mortgage subsequently executed is entitled to preference over one previously executed for future advances, after notice of the second mortgage to the first mortgagee. The notice in this case happened to be an actual notice, but the question of the effect of the record, as notice, was not involved nor decided. Rowan v. Rifle Co., 29 Conn. 282, has no bearing upon this question. The title had never been in the debtor, but was conveyed by a third person to, and held by, the creditors, in security for future advances for the debtor, which the creditors had agreed to make. The decision stands well upon two grounds: First. The title being in the creditors and not in the debtor, the creditors were not bound to notice the record of a mortgage made by the debtor, who had no title. Second. That the advances were not voluntary, the creditors being bound to advance $40,000, and the balance being advanced to save their interest and to carry the contract into effect. Hence the creditors were allowed priority for all their advances, though part were made after notice of the mortgage.

In Wilson v. Russell, 13 Md. 495, the deed of trust, which was in the nature of a mortgage, recited that the mortgagees had agreed to loan the mortgagors their notes, from time to time, as might be desired, etc. The case seems to have been decided mainly on the authority of Gordon v. Graham,—the authority of which is recognized, though it was not needed in that case. It does not appear whether there was actual notice of the second mortgage, and no difference is intimated between actual notice, and the record. In Taylor v. Man's Ex'rs, 5 Rawle, 51, the question, so far as regarded the effect of the record, was similar to that in James v. Brown. The judgment was, in legal effect as well as in date, a prior incumbrance, and the mortgage, in legal effect as well as in date, subsequent to it. There were no future advances in question.

There are, however, two cases (and they are the only ones cited, or which I have met with) which are directly opposed to the conclusion at which I have arrived, and which go to the point that the record of Howard's deed would not be notice to Ladue & Eldred. McDaniels v. Colvin, 16 Vt. 300, and Truscott v. King, 6 Barb. 346; s. c. on appeal, 6 N. Y. 166. McDaniels v. Colvin rests upon the authority of English cases, among which is that of Gordon v. Graham, which are adopted by the court as authority. The case expressly holds that the record of the second mortgage could not be held notice, even as to subsequent advances, under the first mortgage. Judge Redfield (afterwards chief justice) dissented. See his remarks upon this question (sustaining the views I have adopted). 12 Am. Law Reg. p. 191. And in the extent and character of the actual notice to be given by the subsequent to the prior mortgagee, this case would not probably now be recognized as law in any court in this country. Truscott v. King was the case of a judgment to secure a sum due, as well as future advances which might be made, and a mortgage was subsequently made by the debtor. Advances were made by the judgment debtor after the mortgage was recorded. As decided in 6 Barb. it was held that the judgment took precedence for all advances until actual notice of the mortgage, on the ground that the record is only notice to subsequent, and not to prior, incumbrancers. In the court of appeals (6 N. Y.), where the judgment was reversed on other grounds, Judge Jewett, who gives the leading opinion of the court, does not allude to this point. It is only alluded to by Edmonds, J., who says: "It is well settled that a judgment for future advances is good, not only against the debtor, but also against subsequent incumbrancers, at least up to the time when a subsequent judgment or mortgage should intervene. But when such subsequent incumbrance may be said to intervene is not so well settled, whether at the time it is put upon the record, or at the time the prior incumbrancer has actual notice of it. The supreme court, in deciding the case, held that it ought to be only from the time of actual notice, because the docketing of a judgment or recording of a mortgage was, under the statute, notice only to subsequent, and not to prior, incumbrancers. In this, I am inclined to think, the court was right."

Now, it seems to me, the real question which lay at the basis of the inquiry in the above case, and to which that decided by the court was only incidental and secondary, was, which in legal effect was the prior, and which the subsequent, incumbrance, and this depended solely upon the fact when, as regarded the advances in question, they respectively took effect. Did the judgment, in legal effect, become an incumbrance for such advances before they were made and before there was any agreement that they should be made? What were the relative rights of the parties to the judgment at the time the mortgage was recorded? Could the judgment be enforced as an incumbrance for these advances, by reason of any rights or obligations existing between the parties at that time? If not, then, as to these advances, there was no incumbrance at the time the mortgage was recorded and the incumbrance of the judgment was, in legal effect, subsequent to the mortgage. This, which seems to me to be the main question, is neither discussed nor alluded to either by the supreme court or the court of appeals. The court, therefore, in simply saying that the record of the mortgage is notice only to subsequent incumbrancers, assume, as it seems to me, without an attempt to establish, the main point in controversy. There may, perhaps, be some difference, in principle, between a judgment given as security for future advances, and a mortgage given for a like purpose. But if there is not, and if the decision in Truscott v. King is to be considered as equally applicable to a mortgage, then I cannot resist the conviction that it is in direct conflict with the principles which necessarily result from the uniform course of decision in that state,—holding a mortgage to be a mere security for, and incident of, the debt, incapable of a separate and independent existence.

Having examined the cases relied upon by the complainant's counsel, as tending to controvert the conclusions at which I have arrived, I will now refer to those of an opposite tendency, some of which expressly hold the record to be notice of the intervening conveyance or incumbrance.

In Collins v. Carlisle, 13 Ill. 254, there was a mortgage to secure future advances, and a contract subsequent in date and time of record for the sale of the land by the mortgagor, both recorded. It was held, the mortgage was valid for those advances only which were made prior to the recording of the contract. The principle is not discussed, but it seems to be taken for granted that the record of the contract was notice as to advances afterwards made.

In Kramer v. Bank, 15 Ohio, 253, it was held that a mortgage to indemnify against indorsements to be made for the mortgagor is valid and constitutes a lien, which takes precedence of the lien of a judgment rendered after such indorsements have been made. But it is said the lien of a judgment would probably be preferred to the lien of the mortgage for advances made subsequent to the recovery of the judgment. The liability of the mortgagee had attached before the subsequent judgment, and, therefore, the point was not involved. But in the subsequent case of Spader v. Lawler, 17 Ohio, 371, which was also the case of a mortgage to secure future advances, it was held that the mortgage must be postponed to a mortgage subsequently recorded, but before the future advances were made, thus directly holding the record notice as to advances thereafter made under the first recorded mortgage; in other words, treating the first as a subsequent mortgage in reference to advances made after the record of the second. It is true that one of the grounds upon which the decision seems to be placed is that the record of the mortgage (for the advances) ought to give notice of the amount of the incumbrance.

The first case, so far as I have been able to discover, which fully meets and discusses the question upon principle, is that of Terhoven v. Kerns, 2 Barb. 96. It was the case of a judgment to secure future advances, which were optional; and it was held that such judgment, as to advances made after the rendition of a subsequent judgment, was not a lien as against the latter. The judgments are treated by the court as standing upon the same grounds as mortgages, and the question is discussed generally. It is held, that a mortgage to secure future advances, which are optional, does not take effect between the parties as a mortgage or incumbrance until some advance has been made,—that, if not made until after another mortgage or incumbrance has been recorded, it is, in fact, as to such after advances, a subsequent and not a prior incumbrance; and that the record of the subsequently recorded mortgage is notice, as to such after advances, as much as if the mortgage first recorded had not been executed until after such advances were made. The doctrines of this case were fully as strongly reaffirmed in Bank of Montgomery's Appeal, 36 Pa. 170.

See, also, Parmenter v. Gillespie, 9 Barr. 86, and note "a," as to distinction between cases when the mortgagee is bound to make the advances, and when they are optional. The doctrine of these cases is pronounced reasonable by Sanford, J., delivering the opinion of the court in Boswell v. Goodwin, 31 Conn. 74, and he pointedly asks why such mortgage should not be treated "in all respects as if executed at the time when the advances are made." But one of the judges dissented as to this point, and the case was decided upon other grounds.

Judge Redfield, late chief justice of Vermont, ably discusses this question in a note to the case of Boswell v. Goodwin, 12 Am. Law Reg. p. 92, arriving substantially at the same conclusion as that at which I have arrived. And Mr. Washburn in 1 Washb. Real Prop. p. 542, says it seems now to be the general rule.

The counsel for the complainant have strongly urged the inconvenience which must result, especially to banks and bankers (who are accustomed to take such mortgages), by requiring an examination of the record every time they are called upon to make such advances under such a mortgage. Like Judge Redfield (in the note above cited), I have not "been able to comprehend" this hardship. It is, at most, but the same inconvenience to which all other parties are compelled to submit when they lend money on the security of real estate,—the trouble of looking to the value of the security. But, in truth, the inconvenience is very slight. Under any rule of decision they would be compelled to look to the record title when the mortgage is originally taken. At the next advance they have only to look back to this period, and for any future advance only back to the last, which would generally be but the work of a few minutes, and much less inconvenience than they have to submit to in their ordinary daily business in making inquiries as to the responsibility, the signatures and identity of the parties to commercial paper. But if there be any hardship, it is one which they can readily overcome, by agreeing to make the advances; in other words, by entering into some contract, for the performance of which, by the other party, the mortgage may operate as a security. They can hardly be heard to complain of it as a hardship that the courts refuse to give them the benefits of a contract which, from prudential or other considerations, they were unwilling to make, and did not make until after the rights of other parties have intervened. Courts can give effect only to the contracts the parties have made, and from the time they took effect.

The decree must be reversed, and the bill dismissed, and the appellants must recover their costs in both courts.

MARTIN, C. J., and COOLEY, J., concurred. CAMPBELL, J., did not sit in this case.

AETNA LIFE INS. CO. OF HARTFORD
v. TOWN OF MIDDLEPORT. SAME v.
TOWN OF BELMONT. SAME v. TOWN OF MILFORD.

(8 Sup. Ct. 625, 124 U. S. 534.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Feb.
6, 1888.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois.

This was an appeal from a decree of the circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of Illinois, dismissing on demurrer the bill of the Aetna Life Insurance Company, the present appellant. The substance of the bill is that the complainant is the owner of 15 bonds, of $1,000 each, issued by the township of Middleport, in the state of Illinois, dated February 20, 1871, and delivered to the Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad Company. These bonds were payable to bearer, and were bought of the railroad company by the complainant, who paid value for them. The bill recited that this railroad company was incorporated in 1865 under the laws of the state of Illinois, with power to construct a railroad from a point in Lawrence county, by way of Danville, to the city of Chicago; that an act of the legislature of that state, passed March 7, 1867, authorized cities, towns, or townships, lying within certain limits, to appropriate moneys and levy a tax to aid the construction of said road; and "that said act authorized all incorporated towns and cities, and towns acting under township organization, lying wholly or in part within 20 miles of the east line of the state of Illinois, and also between the city of Chicago and the southern boundary of Lawrence county, in said state, to appropriate such sums of money as they should deem proper to the said Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad Company, to aid it in the construction of its road, to be paid as soon as the track of said road should be laid and constructed through such cities, towns, or townships: provided, however, that a proposition to make such appropriation should first be submitted to a vote of the legal voters of such cities, towns, or townships at a regular, annual, or special meeting, of which at least ten days' previous notice should be given; and also provided that a vote should be taken on such proposition, by ballot, at the usual place of election, and that a majority of the votes cast should be in favor of the proposition. And your orator further avers that said act authorized and required the authorities of such cities, towns, and townships to levy and collect such taxes, and to make such other provisions as might be necessary and proper for the prompt payment of such appropriations so made." It is then alleged that on the eighth day of June, 1867, after due publication of notice according to law, a meeting of the legal voters of said town of Middleport was held, at which they cast their votes by ballot upon the proposition to levy and collect a tax of $15,000 upon the taxable property of the inhabitants of the town to aid in the construction of said railroad, provided Watseka, a city in the county of Iroquois, situated in or near the south line of said town, should be made a point in said road; that it appeared, on counting the votes, that 323 were in favor of and 68 were against such tax, and that thereupon the proposition was duly declared carried, the proceedings relating to the meeting and vote duly attested by the town clerk and the moderator of the meeting, and by said clerk duly recorded in the town records. The bill further averred that the railroad company accepted this vote and appropriation of the township, and, relying upon such vote and the good faith of said town, accepted the condition of the appropriation, and constructed and completed its track through said town; that on the tenth day of February, 1871, the board of town auditors adopted a resolution of which the following is a copy: "Whereas the township of Middleport did, on the eighth day of June, 1867, vote aid to the Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad Company to the amount of fifteen thousand dollars, and it appearing that said township is unable to pay such amount in money, therefore resolved by the board of auditors of said township that bonds issue to said Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad Company to the amount of fifteen thousand dollars, together with a sufficient amount to cover the discount necessary on said bonds in negotiating the same, to-wit, one thousand five hundred dollars; said bonds to be dated February 20, A. D. 1871, and to bear interest at the rate of ten per cent. from date per annum." In pursuance of this resolution, it was alleged that on the twenty-fourth day of March, 1871, the supervisor and town clerk of Middleport executed the 15 bonds which are the subject of this suit; that "the said bonds were numbered one to fifteen, inclusive, and were delivered to the said railroad company, upon the fulfillment of the conditions of said vote, in payment of ninety cents on the dollar of the appropriation made to said company by said vote; both parties believing that said bonds were fully authorized by law, and were legal, valid, and binding on said town, and also believing them to be legal evidences of the debt in favor of said company incurred by said town in voting said appropriation." It was then alleged that on or about the twenty-sixth day of June, 1876, the town of Middleport, which up to that time had paid the interest upon the bonds, filed a bill in equity in the circuit court for the county of Iroquois against the complainant corporation as the holder of said bonds, and certain other persons, "alleging, in substance, the making and issuing of said bonds, as herein stated, that the same were delivered to your orator, and that your orator was the holder thereof, and that the same were made and issued without authority of law, and were invalid, and praying the court so to decree, and to enjoin your orator from collecting the same, and for other relief, as by the record in the cause, upon reference thereto, will fully appear." It was averred that the circuit court dismissed the bill, but that upon appeal to the supreme court of Illinois the decree dismissing it was reversed,—that court holding that these bonds were void, as issued without authority of law; and the case was remanded to said circuit court for further proceedings, whereupon it passed a decree, in conformity with the opinion of said supreme court, adjudging the bonds void, and enjoined their collection. The bill then charged that said supreme court, while holding the bonds to be void, did not deny, but impliedly admitted, the validity of the appropriation by the town, and insisted that by the issue and delivery of said bonds to the railroad company, and their sale by that company to the present complainant, it was thereby subrogated to the rights of action which that company would have on the contract evidenced by the vote of the town, and the acceptance and fulfillment of the contract by the railroad company. It was also alleged that no part of the principal sum named in the bonds, or any part of said appropriation, had ever been paid, but that, on the contrary, the town of Middleport denied all liability therefor; that ever since the purchase of said bonds the complainant had continued to hold, and then held, the same, and had been and then was the holder of all rights which the railroad company or its assigns had against said town by reason of the premises. A decree was then prayed for that the town of Middleport should pay to complainant the amount found due, and should without delay levy and collect all taxes necessary for such payment; also, that the court would enforce the rights of complainant by writs of mandamus, and such other and further orders and decrees according to the course of equity as should be necessary and proper; and also prayed that W. H. Leyford, in whose hands as receiver the Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad Company had been placed by the court, it being insolvent, might be made a party defendant thereto. To this bill the defendant demurred, and assigned the following as causes for demurrer:

First. That said bill does not contain any matter of equity whereon this court can ground any decree or give complainant any relief as against this respondent.

Second. Bill shows it is exhibited against respondent and the Chicago, Danville & Vincennes Railroad Company and William Leyford, its receiver, as respondents thereto, and the facts set forth therein show the same relief cannot be granted against all of said respondents, and fails to state facts showing respondents jointly liable, but stated facts which show this respondent, if liable at all, is not jointly liable or in any manner connected with the others, and the bill is multifarious.

Third. Fails to show any written agreement on which suit is brought that would bind respondent, and fails to state facts showing a cause of action exists against respondent that arose within five years last past before bringing suit.

Fourth. Fails to show any written agreement on which suit is brought binding on respondent on which has arisen a cause of action within the last ten years prior to bringing this suit.

Fifth. Fails to set forth facts showing an excuse for the great delay in bringing suit which is shown on face of bill, and equity will not relieve against laches.

Sixth. Bill contains many blanks of dates and names and nothing on face of bill from which facts can be obtained to fill same.

The court below sustained the demurrer, and dismissed the bill, from which judgment complainant appealed.

O. J. Bailey, Jas. H. Sedgwick, and Francis Fellowes, for appellant. Robert Doyle, for appellee.

Mr. Justice MILLER, after stating the case as above, delivered the opinion of the court.

In the argument of the demurrer before the circuit court, several objections to the bill were taken. The defendant in error, however, relies here upon three principal grounds of defense: First, it denies the right of subrogation, upon which rests the whole case of the complainant; second, it relies upon the statute of limitations of five years; and, third, it asserts that the former decree in the state court is a bar to the action here. The circuit court held that the statute of limitations was a bar to the present suit, and dismissed the bill on that ground.

But we regard the primary question, whether the complainant is entitled to be substituted to the rights of the railroad company after buying the bonds of the township, a much more important question, and are unanimously of opinion that the transaction does not authorize such subrogation. The bonds in question in this suit were delivered by the agents of the town of Middleport to the railroad company, and by that company sold in open market as negotiable instruments to the complainant in this action. There was no indorsement, nor is there any allegation in the bill that there was any express agreement that the sale of these bonds carried with them any obligation which the company might have had to enforce the appropriation voted by the town. Notwithstanding the averment in the bill that the intent of complainant in purchasing said bonds, and paying its money therefor, was to acquire such rights of subrogation, it cannot be received as any sufficient allegation that there was a valid contract to that effect. On the contrary, the bill fairly presents the idea that by reason of the facts of the sale the complainant was in equity subrogated to said rights, and entitled to enforce the same against the town of Middle-port. The argument of the learned counsel in the case is based entirely upon the right of the complainant to be subrogated to the rights of the railroad company by virtue of the principles of equity and justice. He does not set up any claim of an express contract for such subrogation. He says: "The equity alleged in the plaintiff's bill is, as I have said, the equity of subrogation. Before proceeding to call the attention of the court to the facts from which this equity arises, it may be useful to advert to the instances in which the right of subrogation exists, and to the principles on which it rests." He founds his argument entirely upon the proposition that when the complainant purchased these bonds he thereby paid the debt of the town of Middleport to the railroad company, as voted by it, and that, because it paid this money to that company on bonds which are void, it should be subrogated to the right of the company against the town. The authorities on which he relies are all cases in which the party subrogated has actually paid a debt of one party due to another, and claims the right to any security which the payee in that transaction had against the original debtor. But there is no payment in the case before us of any debt of the town. The purpose of the purchase as well as the sale of these bonds, and what the parties supposed they had effected by it, was not the payment of that debt, but the sale and transfer of a debt of the town from one party to another, which debt was evidenced by the bonds that were thus transferred. Neither party had any idea of extinguishing by this transaction the debt of the town. It was very clear that it was a debt yet to be paid, and the discount and interest on the bonds was the consideration which induced the complainant to buy them.

The language of this court in Otis v. Culum, 92 U. S. 447, is very apt, and expresses precisely what was done in this case. In that case Otis & Co. were the purchasers of bonds of the city of Topeka from the First National Bank of that place. These bonds were afterwards held by this court to be void for want of authority, just as in the case before us. A suit was brought against the bank, which had failed and was in the hands of a receiver, to recover back the money paid to it for the bonds. After referring to the decision of Lambert v. Heath, 15 Mees. & W. 486, this court said: "Here, also, the plaintiffs in error got exactly what they intended to buy, and did buy. They took no guaranty. They are seeking to recover, as it were, upon one, while none exists. They are not clothed with the rights which such a stipulation would have given them. Not having taken it, they cannot have the benefit of it. The bank cannot be charged with a liability which it did not assume. Such securities throng the channels of commerce, which they are made to seek, and where they find their market. They pass from hand to hand like bank-notes. The seller is liable ex delicto for bad faith; and ex contractu there is an implied warranty on his part that they belong to him, and that they are not forgeries. While there is no express stipulation, there is no liability beyond this. If the buyer desires special protection, he must take a guaranty. He can dictate its terms, and refuse to buy unless it be given. If not taken, he cannot occupy the vantage ground upon which it would have placed him." Page 449.

Nor can this case be sustained upon the principle laid down in this court in Louisiana v. Wood, 102 U. S. 294. That was a case in which the city of Louisiana, having a right by its charter to borrow money, had issued bonds and placed them on the market for that purpose. These bonds were negotiated by the agents of the city, and the money received for their sale went directly into its treasury. It was afterwards held that they were invalid for want of being registered. Afterwards the parties who had bought these bonds brought suit against the city for the sum they had paid, on the ground that the city had received their money without any consideration, and was bound ex aequo et bono to pay it back. The court said: "The only contract actually entered into is the one the law implies from what was done, to wit, that the city would, on demand, return the money paid to it by mistake, and, as the money was got under a form of obligation which was apparently good, that interest should be paid at the legal rate from the time the obligation was denied."

In the present case there was no borrowing of money. There was nothing which pretended to take that form. No money of the complainants ever went into the treasury of the town of Middleport; that municipality never received any money in that transaction. It did not sell the bonds, either to complainant or anybody else. It simply delivered bonds, which it had no authority to issue, to the railroad company, and that corporation accepted them in satisfaction of the donation by way of taxation which had been voted in aid of the construction of its road. The whole transaction of the execution and delivery of these bonds was utterly void, because there was no authority in the town to borrow money or to execute bonds for the payment of the sum voted to the railroad company. They conferred no right upon anybody, and of course the transaction by which they were passed by that company to complainant could create no obligation, legal or implied, on the part of the town to pay that sum to any holder of these bonds.

City of Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190, 5 Sup. Ct. 820, sustains this view of the subject. That town had issued bonds for the purpose of aiding in the construction of a system of water-works. In that case, as in Louisiana v. Wood, the bonds were so far in excess of the authority of the town to create a debt that they were held by this court to be void, in the case of Buchanan v. Litchfield, 102 U. S. 278. After this decision, Ballou, another holder of the bonds, brought a suit in equity upon the ground that, though the bonds were void, the town was liable to him for the money which he had paid in their purchase. This court held that there was no equity in the bill, on the ground that, if the plaintiff had any right of action against the city for money had and received, it was an action at law, and equity had no jurisdiction. It was also attempted, in that case, to establish the proposition that, the money of the plaintiffs having been used in the construction of the water-works, there was an equitable lien in favor of the plaintiffs on those works for the sum advanced. This was also denied by the court.

One of the principles lying at the foundation of subrogation in equity, in addition to the one already stated, that the person seeking this subrogation must have paid the debt, is that he must have done this under some necessity, to save himself from loss which might arise or accrue to him by the enforcement of the debt in the hands of the original creditor; that, being forced under such circumstances to pay off the debt of a creditor who had some superior lien or right to his own, he could, for that reason, be subrogated to such rights as the creditor, whose debt he had paid, had against the original debtor. As we have already said, the plaintiff in this case paid no debt. It bought certain bonds of the railroad company at such discount as was agreed upon between the parties, and took them for the money agreed to be paid therefor. But, even if the case here could be supposed to come within the rule which requires the payment of a debt in order that a party may be subrogated to the rights of a person to whom the debt was paid, the payment in this case was a voluntary interference of the Aetna Company in the transaction. It had no claim against the town of Middleport. It had no interest at hazard which required it to pay this debt. If it had stood off, and let the railroad company and the town work out their own relations to each other, it could have suffered no harm and no loss. There was no obligation on account of which, or reason why, the complainant should have connected itself in any way with this transaction, or have paid this money, except the ordinary desire to make a profit in the purchase of bonds. The fact that the bonds were void, whatever right it may have given against the railroad company, gave it no right to proceed upon another contract and another obligation of the town to the railroad company. These propositions are very clearly stated in a useful monograph on the Law of Subrogation, by Henry N. Sheldon, and are well established by the authorities which he cites. The doctrine of subrogation is derived from the civil law, and "it is said to be a legal fiction, by force of which an obligation extinguished by a payment made by a third person is treated as still subsisting for the benefit of this third person, so that by means of it one creditor is substituted to the rights, remedies, and securities of another. * * *

It takes place for the benefit of a person who, being himself a creditor, pays another creditor whose debt is preferred to his by reason of privileges or mortgages, being obliged to make the payment, either as standing in the situation of a surety, or that he may remove a prior incumbrance from the property on which he relies to secure his payment. Subrogation, as a matter of right, independently of agreement, takes place only for the benefit of insurers; or of one who, being himself a creditor, has satisfied the lien of a prior creditor; or for the benefit of a purchaser who has extinguished an incumbrance upon the estate which he has purchased; or of a co-obligor or surety who has paid the debt which ought, in whole or in part, to have been met by another." Sheld. Subr. §§ 2, 3. In section 240 it is said: "The doctrine of subrogation is not applied for the mere stranger or volunteer who has paid the debt of another without any assignment or agreement for subrogation, without being under any legal obligation to make the payment, and without being compelled to do so for the preservation of any rights or property of his own." This is sustained by a reference to the cases of Shinn v. Budd, 14 N. J. Eq. 234; Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 117; Hoover v. Epler, 52 Pa. St. 522.

In Gadsden v. Brown, Speer, Eq. 37, 41, Chancellor Johnson says: "The doctrine of subrogation is a pure, unmixed equity, having its foundation in the principles of natural justice, and from its very nature never could have been intended for the relief of those who were in any condition in which they were at liberty to elect whether they would or would not be bound; and, so far as I have been able to learn its history, it has never been so applied. If one with a perfect knowledge of the facts will part with his money, or bind himself by his contract in a sufficient consideration, any rule of law which would restore him his money or absolve him from his contract would subvert the rules of social order. It has been directed in its application exclusively to the relief of those that were already bound, who could not but choose to abide the penalty." This is perhaps as clear a statement of the doctrine on this subject as is to be found anywhere.

Chancellor Walworth, in the case of Sandford v. McLean, 3 Paige, 122, said: "It is only in cases where the person advancing money to pay the debt of a third party stands in the situation of a surety, or is compelled to pay it to protect his own rights, that a court of equity substitutes him in the place of the creditor, as a matter of course, without any agreement to that effect. In other cases the demand of a creditor, which is paid with the money of a third person, and without any agreement that the security shall be assigned or kept on foot for the benefit of such third person, is absolutely extinguished."

In Railroad Co. v. Dow, 120 U. S. 287, 7 Sup. Ct. 482, this court said: "The right of subrogation is not founded on contract. It is a creation of equity; is enforced solely for the purpose of accomplishing the ends of substantial justice, and is independent of any contractual relations between the parties."

In the case of Shinn v. Budd, 14 N. J. Eq. 234, the New Jersey chancellor said (pages 236, 237): "Subrogation as a matter of right, as it exists in the civil law, from which the term has been borrowed and adopted in our own, is never applied in aid of a mere volunteer. Legal substitution into the rights of a creditor, for the benefit of a third person, takes place only for his benefit who, being himself a creditor, satisfies the lien of a prior creditor, or for the benefit of a purchaser who extinguishes the incumbrances upon his estate, or of a co-obligor or surety who discharges the debt, or of an heir who pays the debts of the succession. Code Nap. bk. 3, tit. 3, art. 1251; Civil Code La. art. 2157; 1 Poth. Obl. pt. 3, c. 1, art. 6, § 2. 'We are ignorant,' say the supreme court of Louisiana, 'of any law which gives to the party who furnishes money for the payment of a debt the rights of the creditor who is thus paid. The legal claim alone belongs, not to all who pay a debt, but only to him who, being bound for it, discharges it.' Nolte & Co. v. Their Creditors, 9 Mart. (La.) 602; Curtis v. Kitchen, 8 Mart. (La.) 706; Cox v. Baldwin, 1 Miller, (La.) 147. The principle of legal substitution.

as adopted and applied in our system of equity, has, it is believed, been rigidly restrained within these limits." The cases here referred to as having been decided in the supreme court of Louisiana are especially applicable, as the Code of that state is in the main founded on the civil law from which this right of subrogation has been adopted by the chancery courts of this country. The latest case upon this subject is one from the appellate court of the state of Illinois,—Suppiger v. Garrels, 20 Bradw. 625,—the substance of which is thus stated in the syllabus: "Subrogation in equity is confined to the relation of principal and surety and guarantors; to cases where a person, to protect his own junior lien, is compelled to remove one which is superior; and to cases of insurance. * * * Any one who is under no legal obligation or liability to pay the debt is a stranger, and, if he pays the debt, a mere volunteer." No case to the contrary has been shown by the researches of plaintiff in error, nor have we been able to find anything contravening these principles in our own investigation of the subject. They are conclusive against the claim of the complainant here, who in this instance is a mere volunteer, who paid nobody's debt, who bought negotiable bonds in open market without anybody's indorsement, and as a matter of business. The complainant company has therefore no right to the subrogation which it sets up in the present action.

Without considering the other questions, which is unnecessary, the decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

These principles require, also, the affirmance of the decrees in the cases of the same appellant against the town of Belmont, (No. 1,135,) and the town of Milford, (No. 1,136;) and so it is ordered.

PUSEY v. PUSEY.

(1 Vern. 273.)

Michaelmas Term. Nov. 20, 1684.

Bill was that a horn, which, time out of mind, had gone along with the plaintiff's estate, and was delivered to his ancestors in ancient time to hold their land by, might be delivered to him; upon which horn was this inscription, viz. "Pecote this horn to hold huy thy land."

The defendant answered as to part, and demurred as to the other part, and the demurrer was that the plaintiff did not by his bill pretend to be entitled to this horn, either as executor or devisee; nor had he in his bill charged it to be an heir-loome.

The demurrer was overruled, because the defendant had not fully answered all the particular charges in the bill, and was ordered to pay costs. And the lord keeper was of opinion that if the land was held by the tenure of a horn or cornage, the heir would be well entitled to the horn at law. Vide 1 Inst. 107a.

HALL v. WARREN.

Chancery. July 4, 1804.

The bill was filed to obtain a specific performance of an agreement, executed by the defendant, for the sale of an advowson and estate to the plaintiff, Hall, in trust, for the other plaintiff, Hanson, at such price as the advowson should be valued at by Mr. Morgan, and the other premises by persons to be nominated. The agreement was dated the 9th of March, 1802. On the 8th of May following, under a commission of lunacy, the defendant was found a lunatic from the 1st of May, 1792, with lucid intervals.

Two grounds of defence were taken by the answer of the lunatic, by his committee: 1st, that he was insane at the time of the execution of the contract: 2dly, that the plaintiffs knew his situation, and took advantage of it, to induce him to sell to Hall; concealing the circumstance, that Hanson was the real purchaser; being aware, that from a former quarrel the defendant would not sell to him. A great deal of evidence was gone into, on both sides, as to his state of mind.

Mr. Romilly, Mr. Stanley, and Sir Thomas Turton, for plaintiffs, pressed for an issue; insisting upon their right to a decree, upon the ground, either that the defendant was not a lunatic, when he entered into the contract; or, that it was executed in a lucid interval. They had not traversed the inquiry.

Mr. Piggott, Mr. Fonblanque, and Mr. Cooke, for defendant.—The rule, as laid down by Lord Thurlow, in Attorney General v. Parnter, 3 Brown, Ch. 441, 443, is, that where a person seeks to avoid his own act, by alleging incompetence at the time, the proof is incumbent upon him. But where it has been previously found, that the party to be affected by the transaction, was not competent at a previous date, those who seek to bind him, must show his competence at the time. It is difficult to determine the degree of capacity necessary to characterize a lucid interval. Lord Thurlow seems to think it sufficient, that any man would suppose him capable of transacting for himself. This plaintiff has had the opportunity of traversing the inquiry. In Owen v. Davies, 1 Ves. Sr. 82, Lord Hardwicke takes the distinction between the case of an estate vested in trustees, and in the lunatic himself; observing, that in the latter case that circumstance may prevent the remedy in equity, and leave it at law.

But, independent of the question of sanity, at the date of this transaction, to obtain a performance under such circumstances, the terms of the contract ought to be clearly proved, fair, reasonable, and certain. In this instance, the value of the advowson was to be ascertained by the actuary of an insurance office, who was named; and the value of the other premises by other persons, to be nominated. It does not appear, that these valuers ever were named; and that cannot be supplied by the court; who cannot give the arbitrator the information, which the party could have given. How can this court supply the want of judgment as to the value of the timber? In Emery v. Wase, 5 Ves. 846, 8 Ves. 505, Lord Alvanley considered an agreement to sell according to the valuation of another person, not such as the court would be desirous to enforce. Praying an issue, and undertaking to show a lucid interval at the date of the agreement, they must also show, that the plaintiff was bound at that time. An issue is granted only in aid of a legal right, as that of an heir at law: not where the object is the specific performance of an agreement. In that case the course required, that the plaintiff should have previously ascertained his right at law; that he should show, he had sustained damage, which was not repaired by the verdict; and that the very essence of the relief was, that he should have the thing in specie.

Mr. Romilly, in reply.—An agreement to sell at the valuation of another person is not unusual. The chance is perfectly equal. In Emery v. Wase the decision was not upon that ground. If the party refuses to name a valuer, the court refers it to the master. A plaintiff clearly has a right to a specific performance; even though a jury would give twice the amount in damages. Upon the question of lunacy, it is clear, a lunatic is bound by an act done in a lucid interval; and till the act of Geo. II (St. 15 Geo. II, p. 607, c. 30), even marriage, contracted in a lucid interval, was good. The person who has a contract with the lunatic, is permitted to traverse; as he may show, that the party with whom he contracted never was a lunatic. But the question, whether the defendant was a lunatic at the date of the agreement, could not have been tried in a traverse. In Ex parte Ferne, 5 Ves. 450, 832. Lord Rosslyn's opinion was, that the jury could not find as to any intervening period. But certainly the question, whether he was in a lucid interval, could not have been tried: the inquiry in such a proceeding as to that, being, whether the party is liable to lucid intervals; not as to the particular time. It seems to be supposed, that, if the defendant is now a lunatic, the contract cannot be executed; by analogy to criminal cases, in which a man who becomes a lunatic, at any time before execution, is not punished. But if that objection holds in civil cases, it will apply equally to prevent a decree for a specific performance against the representatives; for they cannot tell what the lunatic might have said. In Owen v. Davies there happened to be trustees: but this party does not object; but chooses to take the title with the defect.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS. The object of this bill is to obtain the specific performance of an agreement. Supposing the contract to have been entered into by a competent party, and to be in the nature and circumstances of it unobjectionable, it is as much of course in this court to decree a specific performance, as it is to give damages at law. See White v. Damon, 7 Ves. 30. The contract is produced and proved. Upon the face of it nothing appears to prevent execution. There is nothing unreasonable, as between the parties, upon the face of it. It fixes no value upon the estate: but it provides a mode, in which the value is to be ascertained, that is perfectly fair and equal between them. It must be supposed, that if competent, they had taken the proper means of getting at the real value, by employing persons of skill to value the advowson and the farms. The first objection against carrying this agreement into execution is, that in consequence of some dispute with Hanson, the defendant had an objection to dealing with him. But the evidence does not bring it up to that; showing, not that he made any declaration to that effect, but only, that some quarrel had taken place, totally unconnected with the subject of the contract. The circumstance, therefore, that Hall is a nominal contractor, is immaterial; for it happens in a vast proportion of cases, that the contract is entered into in the name of a trustee.

But the principal objection to the performance is, that the defendant was not competent, having been insane at the time the contract bears date. That is matter of fact. In support of that fact alleged, the inquisition is produced; by which the defendant is found a lunatic from a period long antecedent, but with lucid intervals. That inquisition, having been taken in the absence of the plaintiff, is not conclusive upon him. But it is evidence prima facie of the lunacy. It is however competent to third parties to dispute the fact; and to maintain, that, notwithstanding the inquisition, the object of it was of sound mind at any period of the time which it covers. An opportunity, it is said, has been already afforded of traversing the inquisition: and undoubtedly, if it would have answered the plaintiff's purpose merely to have traversed and contradicted the finding, by showing that the defendant was not a lunatic, he ought to have embraced that opportunity; and it was unnecessary to come here in the first instance. But if, as it is said, he may have been a lunatic, with reference to the general state and habit of his mind, during a considerable space of time, but with lucid intervals, and the contract was executed during one of those lucid intervals, I doubt very much whether that could have been got at by a traverse; whether, upon that proceeding, it could have been ascertained, that upon a given day he had a lucid interval; which might come to be a material inquiry with reference to the execution of this contract; for though the plaintiff wishes for an issue upon both points, he seems from the general tenour of his statement to confide more in establishing a lucid interval than in negating the fact, that the defendant ever was deranged. It was not therefore improper for the plaintiff, under these circumstances, to waive the opportunity of traversing, and to come here for an issue; upon the supposition, that the contract was entered into, either by a person who was not a lunatic; or in a lucid interval. In the latter case it would be equally binding; for the law upon this subject is, that all acts done during a lucid interval are to be considered done by a person perfectly capable of contracting, managing, and disposing of, his affairs, at that period. This has more frequently occurred upon wills. A multitude of questions has been raised upon the execution of a will during a lucid interval; and, that being proved, the will has been held valid and effectual, to all intents and purposes, for the conveyance of real and personal estate, as if the testator had never been deranged. It must be the same as to contract, or any disposition of property. If he had made an absolute conveyance it would have been good, if made in a lucid interval.

The question, therefore, being reduced to the fact, there is no circumstance to prevent the execution of the contract; supposing the party to have been competent; and the fact of his competence ought to be put in a course of inquiry. I should certainly refuse, upon the evidence before me, to determine that he was not a lunatic; and as to a lucid interval, upon this evidence, I should hesitate considerably; not being sufficiently apprized of all the circumstances of his life at that particular period. The history of the contract itself is not brought forward. The circumstances of the negotiation do not appear. Something material to the competence might arise or result from the very mode in which the negotiation was conducted. In one case, I remember, the manner, in which the will was written and executed, went a great way towards showing, it was in a lucid interval: the mode of the act being part of the evidence of the testator's sanity. See Temple v. Temple, 1 Hen. & M. 476. There is some general evidence with reference to his situation for some considerable time previous to the contract; and very little negative evidence: none applying exactly, or approaching nearly, to the period, except the servant's; and that not of a nature to be conclusive; supposing the evidence strong about the period. But it is for a jury to determine, what was the degree of efficiency and competence of his mind at the time. All the difficulties suggested by the defendant, the plaintiffs will have to struggle with; for, if general lunacy is established, they will be under the necessity of showing, according to Attorney General v. Paruther, that there was, not merely a cessation of the violent symptoms of the disorder, but a restoration of the faculties of the mind, sufficient to enable the party soundly to judge of the act. That is an inquiry much more fit for examination vivâ voce before a jury, than upon written depositions.

There is nothing, therefore, to prevent my sending it to that inquiry. Difficulties indeed are suggested, supposing even that it should be found that the contract was made in a lucid interval, as to the mode in which it is to be carried into execution; for it is said, as to that, there are provisions in it, which cannot now be executed. I do not see those difficulties so strong as to be convinced, that it is impossible to execute it; that the previous inquiry is not to be made, and would be nugatory; for if there was a valid and binding contract, the supervening incapacity of one party cannot deprive the other of the benefit. Nothing appears in the acts to be done, so purely personal, that they cannot be supplied without the intervention of the mind and the act of the party; for they are to be done with reference to a given mode; and with regard to ascertaining the value, a mode equivalent, and as effectual and fair, may be found. So, as to the objection from the difficulty of making the conveyance, the difficulty that struck Lord Hardwicke, in Owen v. Davies, was avoided there; as there were trustees. But it does not appear to me, that, if the plaintiff is satisfied with that which is in truth no title, but only an enjoyment under this court, he ought not to have all the court can give him. It is disadvantage to him, of which the other cannot complain, that he cannot get a good title; but must rest an indefinite period, without a title, having only the enjoyment. These difficulties are not so strong as to preclude the previous inquiry, before we can ascertain the precise mode, in which the subsequent parts are to be carried into execution. Therefore take an issue.

The issue directed was the same as in a former case of Clerk v. Clerk, 2 Vern. 412, whether the defendant was a lunatic at the time of the execution of the contract; and if so, whether he had lucid intervals; and whether the contract was executed during a lucid interval. Niell v. Morley, 9 Ves. 478.

RINDGE v. BAKER.

Commission of Appeals Cases. 1874.

Action to recover one-half the expense of a party-wall in Norwich, Chenango county. The parties agreed by parol, in April, 1869, to construct a basement or cellar-wall of stone eight feet high, one-half of the width of which should stand upon the plaintiff's land and the other half upon the defendant's land, and to build upon the stone wall a partition of wood between their respective adjoining buildings. This agreement as the plaintiff testified, was before the commencement of the construction of the stone wall so far modified that the partition above the stone wall was to be constructed of brick instead of wood. In pursuance of this agreement each party at his own expense built one-half of the basement wall, and laid upon this wall, thus constructed, sleepers upon which to rest the first floor of their respective buildings. The plaintiff so constructed the cellar or basement wall of his building as to correspond to the basement stone wall erected by the parties, and procured his building timber to be cut the proper length for use in the brick wall, in the construction of which the defendant had agreed to join him. The defendant then refused to join the plaintiff in the construction of the brick wall, whereupon the plaintiff gave him notice to join in its construction, and that in case of his failure to do so, he should proceed and construct it and compel him to pay one-half of the expense of its construction. The defendant again refused to join the plaintiff in its construction, and forbade him from constructing it on the defendant's premises. The plaintiff then proceeded and constructed the wall and brought this action to recover one-half of the necessary expenses of its construction. Judgment for plaintiff.

GRAY, C. The contract, under which the parties commenced and proceeded in the construction of the party-wall, was for an interest in land, an easement which could not have been acquired by parol; and the defendant's failure to perform it, however injurious that failure may have been to the plaintiff, would not, had the contract remained wholly unexecuted, have afforded him a cause of action. But the defendant having proceeded with the plaintiff in its execution, so far as to lead the plaintiff to believe that the contract was made not only in good faith but that it would be fully executed on the part of the defendant, insomuch, that the plaintiff had contributed his share to the construction of that part of the wall which by the contract was to be made of stone; had, at the same time, constructed the cellar or basement walls in his own apartment to conform to the party-wall thus constructed by the equal contribution of the parties; and had also procured his timber for use in the construction of the residue of his building, to be cut of the length requisite for use in the brick wall, which by their agreement, the defendant was, after the completion of the stone wall, to join in constructing upon it. His failure, at this stage of the performance of the contract, by refusing to join in that part of the party-wall which was to consist of a brick wall above and to rest upon the stone wall, operated under the circumstances, as a fraud upon the plaintiff; and hence in an action for specific performance an equitable estoppel upon the defendant would have been established, and with the right of the plaintiff to a decree against the defendant for a specific performance of the contract; or, in other words, that he join the plaintiff in constructing the brick wall, as the jury in answer not only to the interrogatory submitted to them, but in substance, by their general verdict, found he had agreed to do. 2 Story, Eq. Jur., § 750; Will. Eq. Jur. 283; Malins v. Brown, 4 N. Y. 403, 407, 411. But, because the plaintiff had, and might have pursued this remedy, it by no means proves that he had no other remedy equitable in its character, which would produce the same result in less time and at less expense, and under the circumstances, better adapted to the ends of justice in a case like the one under consideration. The time which would necessarily have been consumed in the prosecution of an action for specific performance, and the consequent delay in the erection of the wall would, under the exigency of the case in hand, and with all needful arrangements by the plaintiff for completing his half of the wall, and using it in the construction of other parts of his building, result in damages to him nearly as great, if not greater, than the expenses incurred in constructing the defendant's half. Such a remedy was therefore so inexpedient as to amount to a denial of justice, and if the plaintiff has no other equitable remedy, or is not permitted to avail himself of one, he must bear with conceded injustice and blame the law. Such a state of things ought not to be tolerated, and need not be, where established equitable principles prevail. If the wall had been constructed at the joint expense of both parties, as in good conscience it should have been, and repairs upon it had become necessary, each party would have been obliged to contribute to them, and if either party, after notice by the other to do so, had declined, the party giving the notice (as the plaintiff did in this case), might have proceeded, made the repairs, and maintained his action for the amount of one-half of the expense incurred in making them, upon the ground that the benefit was equal, and that even-handed justice would compel each party to bear his share of the burden. Campbell v. Mesier, 4 Johns. Ch. 334, 338, 339, 8 Am. Dec. 570.

A decree for specific performance is nothing more or less than a means of compelling a party to do precisely what he ought to have done without being coerced by a court. Such a decree might well go further, and provide that in case of delay by the defendant beyond some reasonable time, to be fixed by the court after notice of the decree, the plaintiff might proceed and erect the wall, one-half of the necessary expense of which should be paid by the defendant. And now that the plaintiff has, after due notice, borne the defendant's share of the burden, and done exactly what would necessarily be a decree for specific performance have been adjudged that the defendant ought to have done without suit, no good reason can be assigned why, when the exigency of the case has rendered the remedy by action for specific performance wholly inadequate to accomplish the ends of justice, the defendant should not be held responsible for his share of the burden when it is shown that in equity he ought to do so, upon the same principle that a party who ought in equity to contribute one-half of the necessary expense of repairing a wall is bound, after notice and refusal, to pay the adjoining owner who has repaired it one-half of the necessary expenses of the repairs; and notwithstanding the facts which establish the equitable obligation to build may be widely different from such as would establish an equitable obligation to repair, yet the principle upon which contribution is enforced is the same in each case. Contribution was at one time enforced only in a court of equity, and it was said by Baron Parke (6 Mees. & W. 168) that Lord Eldon regretted, not without reason, that courts of law had ever assumed jurisdiction of the subject; they have nevertheless done so, and as Justice Bronson said in Norton v. Coons, 3 Denio, 130, 132, "borrowed their jurisdiction on this subject from courts of equity, and along with it, taken the maxim that equality is equity." And Story, in his work upon Contracts (second volume, § 885), referring to contribution by co-sureties or co-guarantors, says, it was formerly questioned whether at law contribution could be enforced without some positive agreement to that effect; but it is now well established that it may be enforced both in law and equity. The right to maintain such an action at law has not, in this state, been questioned in modern times, and especially where the remedy can be as conveniently administered in an action at law as in equity, since both are administered by the same judge.

The judgment should be affirmed.

DWIGHT, C. This is an action brought to recover the one-half of the amount of the expense incurred by the plaintiff in building a party-wall between the premises of the plaintiff and the defendant. The plaintiff bases his right of action on a parol agreement between him and the defendant. It appeared at the trial, according to the testimony of both parties, that there had been such an agreement to build a stone wall, which was suitable as a foundation for a partition-wall to rest upon, and that was actually carried out by their mutual consent and acts. Whether there was an agreement to go further, and to build a party-wall was contested. The plaintiff's claim was, that there was an agreement to build at joint expense, a wooden partition between buildings to be erected on the respective lots of the parties, and that this was afterward so modified as to substitute a brick partition-wall in its place. The question was submitted to the jury in the following form: "Did the defendant, E. D. Baker, agree with the plaintiff, H. A. Rindge, that he would join with said Rindge in the building of the brick wall in question?" The jury found in the affirmative.

The form in which the case is presented for the consideration of this court is, assuming the existence of the parol agreement, and that the foundation-wall was actually built by both parties, and that the defendant now refuses to go on and complete the brick portion of the wall, can the plaintiff, upon due notice, complete that portion of the wall at his own expense, and recover from the defendant his proportion of the outlay? It is to be observed that this is not the ordinary case of an easement created by parol, but that it is a more special inquiry, whether a parol agreement to build a wall is enforceable in a court of justice, and if so, whether it can be substantially enforced under the facts of the present case by an action to recover the amount necessarily expended in construction. It will be proper to consider at the outset whether a written agreement to build a wall is capable of enforcement in equity. If not, it would of course follow that a parol agreement partly executed cannot be. On the general question of enforcing a covenant to build or to repair, there has been great diversity of opinion, and the decisions are conflicting. The leading authorities in England are Mosely v. Virgin, 3 Ves. Jr. 185; Wilkinson v. Clements, L. R. 8 Ch. App. 96. Other cases are collated in Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 725, 729 (11th Ed.). In Wilkinson v. Clements, supra, one of the latest decisions by the appellate court, it is said to be the settled rule in England that the court will not in general enforce a covenant to build houses. The principal reason seems to be that damages supply an adequate compensation. Where, on the other hand, damages will not answer, the usual rule prevails, and a remedy will be granted in equity, on account of the inadequacy of the relief at law. This was the result in that case; and a party having performed his part of the contract, had his remedy in equity, against the other party. The point in Mosely v. Virgin was, that an agreement to build may be enforced if sufficiently certain and specific. This is the view of Mr. Justice Story. The cases earlier than Wilkinson v. Clements are collected in Beck v. Allison, 4 Daly, 421, in which case the conclusion is maintained, in an elaborate opinion, that in a proper case, the jurisdiction to decree specific performance of a covenant to repair exists, the case being placed on the same general ground as that of a covenant to build. The present case falls within the rule established by these authorities. It was not a general and indefinite covenant. The place on which the wall was to be erected was fixed by the contract; its length, height and thickness were prescribed, as well as the materials of which it was to be constructed. This is the test given in Mosely v. Virgin, supra, and in Story, Eq. § 727. The plaintiff could have had no adequate remedy in damages, as he needed to have the wall stand on the defendant's land, in order to carry out his building as it was planned. The result is that if the agreement had been in writing it would have been enforced by a court of equity.

The next inquiry is, whether the act of building the stone foundation-wall was such a part performance as to take the case out of the statute of frauds. This is not an instance of a mere parol license, executed in part; it is rather that of an agreement, from which the defendant was to receive the same benefit as the plaintiff. The inducement on the defendant's part to allow the plaintiff's wall to stand on his land, and to aid in constructing it, was the fact that he was to receive a benefit from having the same support to his own part of the wall, from the plaintiff's land and a corresponding service and expenditure. If, then, the court will not entertain an action for specific performance in the present case, it will be because there are some parol agreements which have been partly carried out that do not fall within the general rule that part performance takes the case out of the statute of frauds. No reason can be given why an ordinary contract to purchase land in fee shall be withdrawn from the statute by part performance, which will not apply to the present case. Mr. Frye states the rules as follows: (1) The act of parol performance must be referable to the alleged agreement and no other. (2) They must be such as render it a fraud on the defendant, to take advantage of the contract not being in writing. (3) The agreement to which they refer must be such as in its own nature is enforceable by the court. (4) There must be proper evidence of the parol agreement. Fry, Spec. Perf. (Am. Ed.) 251. All of these exist in the present case. In commenting upon the third, he remarks that the agreement must be of such a nature that the court would have had jurisdiction in respect to it in case it had been in writing. It has already been shown that the court would have enforced the contract between the plaintiff and defendant had it been written.

The next inquiry is, whether the plaintiff was bound to resort to the remedy of specific performance? It would seem not. Specific performance is merely a remedy for an existing right; each of the parties, by force of the contract, became a trustee for the other; there was an equality of burdens as well as of rights growing out of the contract relations of the parties. Specific performance is but a single mode of enforcing the equitable duties growing out of these relations. The parties have voluntarily subjected themselves to the rule that "equality is equity;" each of them having thus become equitably bound to pay his share of the amount necessary to construct the wall, is liable in equity to an action for contribution. This has been applied to cases of contribution between co-contractors. Story, Eq. Jur. § 64, f; 1 Pars. Cont. 31. The whole doctrine rests upon principles of natural justice and equity. The plaintiff had his choice of remedies. He might demand specific performance; in which case he would pay only one-half of the expense, and insist upon the defendant's rendering the other half; or, after demand and refusal, he might build the entire wall and bring his action for contribution. He has elected to take the latter course.

It is claimed that the present action is not an equitable one. The fact that it is brought for money is not decisive upon that point. The real test in such an action is this: if it be brought for damages for breach of contract it is a case at law; if it be brought for money, by way of performance of the contract, it is a case in equity. Thus where a vendor, in a contract for the sale of land, sues for the price, his action is equitable. The mutuality of the contract gives each of the parties the same remedy; and yet the recovery by the vendor is simply in money. If this theory did not prevail in respect to contracts partly performed, the vendor would be utterly without remedy, since it is well settled that there is no action at law on a parol contract in part performed. That the vendor can have an equitable action for money is established in Crary v. Smith, 2 N. Y. 60; Brown v. Haff, 5 Paige, 240; Will, Eq. Jur. 290. The action in the present case was brought for relief, and the facts disclose an equitable cause of action. The fact that it was tried by jury, with consent of parties, is immaterial, as the court might, of its own motion, have submitted the questions to a jury; and any informality in the mode of procedure was waived by mutual consent. No preliminary settlement of the issues is required. Colman v. Dixon, 50 N. Y. 572.

the fact that the common-law courts hold that if a tenant in common, or joint tenant, or other person who is under a duty to repair, fails to contribute after a demand by a co-tenant or co-obligor, the latter, on incurring the necessary expense, may bring an action on the case to recover the proportionate share of the defaulting party. Loring v. Bacon, 4 Mass. 575; Mumford v. Brown, 6 Cow. 475, 16 Am. Dec. 440; Doane v. Badger, 12 Mass. 65. This action is based on a failure to discharge the equitable duty imposed on the defendant which is derived from the principle of natural justice lying at the root of the doctrine of contribution. It is however urged that the defendant does not, by this action, obtain an easement of permanent value to himself. The answer is that if he does not he suffers only by his own neglect. The correct view however is that the judgment will establish his right and act as an estoppel against the plaintiff and all claiming under him, as the existence of the easement is the very proposition which it is necessary to establish in order to recover. A final suggestion is that the parol contract having been partly executed, the parties to it are estopped from denying the existence of the easement. The authorities are quite distinct to this effect, and the proposition is fully justified by the rules of estoppel as applied to the case of expenditures made upon land on the faith of the representations of an owner. Brown v. Bowen, 30 N. Y. 541, 86 Am. Dec. 406; 3 Washb. Real Prop. 68, and cases cited. In Campbell v. McCoy, 31 Pa. 263, a parol executed agreement to erect a dam was held to be irrevocable in equity, and that it created a permanent right which would survive the erection itself. Rerick v. Kern, 14 Serg. & R. 267, 16 Am. Dec. 497. The same rule was applied to the laying down of water-pipes in Le Fevre v. Le Fevre, 4 Serg. & R. 241, 8 Am. Dec. 696. In McKellip v. McIlhenny, 4 Watts, 317, 28 Am. Dec. 711, the doctrine was applied to a license to flood land, on which money and labor had been expended, on the faith of the license. Beatty v. Gregory, 17 Iowa, 114, 85 Am. Dec. 546, is a case of a wall partly built on a licensee's land.

There is, in some of the authorities, a confusion growing out of a want of accurate discrimination between cases arising in law and equity. At law a parol license, owing to the statute of frauds, is revocable at the pleasure of the licensor, notwithstanding the expenditure of money on his land by the licensee. The cases on this subject are so numerous and so uniform that it would be a waste of time to refer to them. In equity the rule is quite different. As a court of equity will take a parol contract for the sale of lands out of the statute of frauds, when it is partly performed, it will, on the same principle, treat an executed parol contract for an easement as equivalent to a grant under seal, where the parties cannot be restored to their original position. Under this doctrine the acts of the parties in the present case have created a permanent easement upon the land, of which all who may purchase of them are bound to take notice. The judgment for the plaintiff, in the present case, simply recognizes the existence of that easement, and the added duty or obligation of mutual contribution for its erection and maintenance.

The judgment of the court below should be affirmed.

REYNOLDS, C. It appears to be conceded that the agreement to erect the party-wall created, or was intended to create an easement in land, and that to make it valid, it should have been in writing. It was by parol, and was doubtless void under the statute of frauds. The parties however proceeded under it, so far, as that it is also agreed, that in consequence of part performance the plaintiff might, after the repudiation by the defendant, have appealed to a court of equity to compel him to specifically perform; and yet it is conceded that a resort to this remedy would have been, if successful, inadequate to redress the injury to the plaintiff. In the earlier days of the law, a party having some claim to equitable relief was obliged to resort to a tribunal exercising that sort of jurisdiction, invented, it is said, in some of the old books, to do justice in cases wherein the courts of common law were deficient, and of the common law it has been said that by reason of its flexibility it was capable of affording an adequate remedy in most cases of wrong. It however did happen that separate courts of common law and equity jurisdiction did exist for a long time, and until within a comparatively recent period, existed in this state; and it may not be denied that under this system, by reason of the ignorance of counsel or the learning of judges and chancellors, it occasionally happened that suitors were found in the wrong forum and turned away without relief on payment of costs. Of whatever magnitude such an evil may have been it seems very clear to me, that it was attempted to be remedied by our constitution of 1846 and the Code of 1848, with its multitude of modifications.

It is suggested that the present action is one at common law and cannot be maintained upon a void contract. This general rule no judge or lawyer will dispute. It is further said, the plaintiff's remedy was in equity, where he should have succeeded, but success would have been of no practical value; in other words, the remedy would have been worse than the disease. He came into a court having general jurisdiction both in law and equity, and stated the facts of his case in his complaint, as he was authorized by law to do, and in the most essential particular proved their truth, as is found by the verdict of the jury, and had judgment. If he may not have properly had judgment, it being agreed that he was entitled to relief, where else should he go to obtain it? The court to which he applied had the authority to do him justice in some form, and it could turn him over to none other; for no other court existed to which he could apply for the remedy he was in some form entitled to. Since the radical changes to which reference has been made, it has sometimes been very difficult to distinguish by any thing that appears in a pleading, between an action at law or a suit in equity. Before the change in practice, the distinction between a common-law declaration and a bill in chancery was very well understood. Now both jurisdictions are blended, and a party is permitted to state his case upon its facts, in his own form, and to take such relief as he ought to have, if he be entitled to any, and if he makes any mistake in his allegations the court may, in its discretion, conform the allegations to the facts proved, and give the appropriate judgment which either law or equity demands. General jurisdiction, both in law and equity, having been united in the same court, with a form of procedure common to all cases, it is difficult by the mere inspection of a pleading, to determine whether a given case is to be governed by legal or equitable rules; and I am of the opinion, that the inevitable result of such a system will be the abolition of all substantial distinctions between law and equity. If different and distinct forms of pleading and proceeding were preserved, the two separate jurisdictions might be longer continued, even when the same court took cognizance of both.

It is said that this is a pure and simple action at law, to recover damages for the breach of a void contract. It must be confessed that the complaint bears some of the marks of an old-fashioned common-law declaration, omitting its prolixity. But, as I understand, it also states in a concise form all the facts upon which the plaintiff relies for relief, and these facts have, at least substantially, been found by the jury to be true. Why may not this, under the present system, be called a bill in equity? It is quite true that there is no prayer for specific performance of the partially performed contract, but that is not of the slightest consequence, as has been often held. Marquat v. Marquat, 12 N. Y. 336; Emery v. Pease, 20 N. Y. 62. In the latter case, what was from the prayer of the complaint, regarded by the whole supreme court as an action at law, to recover money due upon an account stated, and the plaintiff nonsuited because he had not appealed to the equity ear of that court was, in the court of appeals, disapproved, because the facts stated entitled the plaintiff to an accounting as in the case of a partnership, and the case thereafter proceeded upon that theory. That case, in principle, does not appear to me to be unlike this, so far as the form of proceeding and forum is concerned. It seems to be clear that the defendant ought to have done as he verbally agreed to do. He had got the plaintiff into more or less difficulty, for the reason that his promises had been not only relied upon, but his fidelity evinced by acts tending to the consummation of the common purpose. He then repudiates, and the plaintiff must suffer great injury if he stops the improvement contemplated, and incur extra cost and expense if he perform the work and furnish the material which the defendant agreed to do and ought to have done.

It is quite true that the defendant forbade the plaintiff from proceeding to complete the party-wall according to the mutual parol agreement, but if the matter had gone so far as that equity would compel him to complete it, his order to stop could be of no more force or effect than that of an ancient monarch who ordered the waves of the ocean to be stayed.

It is further urged that even if the defendant pay the judgment against him, he has no grant of an easement to continue the party-wall on the land of the plaintiff. This in one sense may be entirely true, but the same law that, in effect, compels him to perform his agreement with the plaintiff by paying damages, will protect him in the enjoyment of every right of property which he could have had if he had not made it necessary to appeal to the courts. It does not appear that he ever requested the plaintiff to grant him any easement whatever; and we are not to assume that if he had, and offered to fulfill the conditions of his part of the agreement, it would have been refused. Indeed, if it appeared in his answer in this case that he had offered to pay (which was at least equal to performance) upon the condition that the plaintiff granted an easement equal to what the contract demanded, I think the court ought to and would have so ordered, but the defendant put his right upon an entirely different contingency and must abide the result.

Another objection is made against the propriety of the judgment of the supreme court in this case that there is no precedent for it, and that it is the very first of the kind known to the law. While I do not quite agree to the fact as alleged, I am yet willing to assume that there is no case reported in the books which affords an exact precedent for the judgment I am prepared to give. Where precedents are reasonable they furnish a safe guide to follow; and where they are unreasonable, as is not uncommon, a delicate and difficult question is often presented. But where there are no precedents that appear to be binding upon the conscience of a court, the demands of justice require that, in a proper case, one should be made. In the present case we all agree that the plaintiff has sustained an injury for which he should have redress, and there is no complaint that the judgment below has awarded him more damages than he was fairly entitled to recover. It is possible that a case precisely like this has never before arisen, but if any shall hereafter arise, it may as well be understood that a party thus injured is not without an adequate remedy in the courts.

The judgment of the supreme court should be affirmed, with costs.

ADDERLEY v. DIXON.

(1 Sim. & S. 607.)

Chancery.

The plaintiffs having purchased and taken assignments of certain debts which had been proved under two commissions of bankrupt, agreed to sell them to the defendant for 2s. 6d. in the pound.

The defendant's solicitor, accordingly, gave notice of the sale to the assignees, and prepared an assignment of the debts, and the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the purchase money had not been paid, executed it, and signed the receipt for the consideration money, and left it in the solicitor's hands. The bill was filed to compel the defendant specifically to perform the agreement, and to pay the purchase money to the plaintiffs.

The defendant, by his answer, submitted that the matter of the agreement was not the proper subject of a bill in equity for a specific performance; and claimed the same benefit as if he had demurred to the bill.

Mr. Sugden and Mr. Garratt, for plaintiffs. Mr. Hart and Mr. Treslove, for defendant.

THE VICE-CHANCELLOR. Courts of equity decree the specific performance of contracts, not upon any distinction between realty and personalty, but because damages at law may not, in the particular case, afford a complete remedy. Thus a court of equity decrees performance of a contract for land, not because of the real nature of the land, but because damages at law, which must be calculated upon the general money-value of the land, may not be a complete remedy to the purchaser, to whom the land may have a peculiar and special value. So a court of equity will not, generally, decree performance of a contract for the sale of stock or goods, not because of their personal nature, but because damages at law, calculated upon the market-price of the stock or goods, are as complete a remedy to the purchaser as the delivery of the stock or goods contracted for; inasmuch as, with the damages, he may purchase the same quantity of the like stock or goods.

In Taylor v. Neville, cited in Buxton v. Lister, 3 Atk. 383, specific performance was decreed of a contract for the sale of 800 tons of iron, to be delivered and paid for in a certain number of years and by instalments; and the reason given by Lord Hardwicke, is that such sort of contracts differ from those that are immediately to be executed. And they do differ in this respect, that the profit upon the contract being to depend upon future events, cannot be correctly estimated in damages where the calculation must proceed upon conjecture. In such a case to compel a party to accept damages for the non-performance of his contract, is to compel him to sell the actual profit which may arise from it, at a conjectural price. In Ball v. Coggs, 1 Brown, Pare Cas. 140, specific performance was decreed in the house of lords of a contract to pay the plaintiff a certain annual sum for his life, and also a certain other sum for every hundred weight of brass wire manufactured by the defendant during the life of the plaintiff. The same principle is to be applied to this case. Damages might be no complete remedy, being to be calculated merely by conjecture; and to compel the plaintiff in such a case to take damages would be to compel him to sell the annual provision during his life for which he had contracted, at a conjectural price. In Buxton v. Lister, Lord Hardwicke puts the case of a ship carpenter purchasing timber which was peculiarly convenient to him by reason of its vicinity; and also the case of an owner of land covered with timber contracting to sell his timber in order to clear his land; and assumes that as, in both those cases, damages would not, by reason of the special circumstances be a complete remedy, equity would decree a specific performance.

The present case being a contract for the sale of the uncertain dividends which may become payable from the estates of the two bankrupts, it appears to me that, upon the principle established by the cases of Ball v. Coggs, and Taylor v. Neville, a court of equity will decree specific performance, because damages at law cannot accurately represent the value of the future dividends; and to compel this purchaser to take such damages would be to compel him to sell these dividends at a conjectural price.

It is true that the present bill is not filed by the purchaser, but by the vendor, who seeks, not the uncertain dividends, but the certain sum to be paid for them. It has, however, been settled, by repeated decisions that the remedy, in equity must be mutual; and that, when a bill will lie for the purchaser, it will also lie for the vendor. Vide Withy v. Cottle, 1 Sim. & S. 174. Hamblin v. Dinneford, 2 Edw. 531.

Supreme
HODGES v. KOWING et ux.
 (18 Atl. 979, 58 Conn. 12.)

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut.
 April 15, 1889.

Appeal from superior court, Fairfield county; Fenn, Judge.

Suit by P. H. Hodges against E. W. Kowing and wife for specific performance of a contract for sale of land. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal.

D. B. Lockwood and E. W. Seymour, for appellants. T. W. Wheeler and H. J. Curtis, for appellee.

BEARDSLEY, J. On the 17th day of August, 1887, the defendants entered into the following contract with the plaintiff: "Stratford, August 17th, 1887. We agree to purchase of P. H. Hodges his place in Stratford, Conn., containing fifteen acres, more or less, for the sum of nine thousand five hundred dollars; to pay six thousand cash, and three thousand five hundred on bond and mortgage for one year; to take title immediately, and possession on the first of January, 1888, and have paid him one hundred dollars on account. EDWIN W. KOWING. ELIZA KOWING." No writing relating to the contract was signed by the plaintiff. The court below, upon the petition of the plaintiff, decreed that the defendants should specifically perform the contract, from which decree they appeal to this court. They claim that under the statute of frauds the plaintiff was not bound by the contract, not having signed any memorandum of it, and hence that it should not, in equity at least, be enforced against them, and make this claim the ground of one of their reasons of appeal. The statute requires only that the written agreement shall be "signed by the party to be charged therewith." The defendants rely upon certain cases as authority for their claim, and among others upon the cases of Benedict v. Lynch, 1 Johns. Ch. 370, and Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Schoales & L. 13. Both of these cases are in accord with the claim of the defendants; but the former case is opposed to the numerous decisions in the state of New York on the same subject, and the latter case to nearly all the English decisions. In the case of Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484, Chancellor KENT, after reviewing the New York decisions, says that "it is sufficient if the agreement be signed by the party to be charged." In the same opinion he reviews the English decisions up to that time, and adds: "There is nothing to disturb this strong and united current of authority but the observation of Lord Redesdale in Lawrenson v. Butler, 1 Schoales & L. 13, who thought that the contract ought to be mutual, and that if one party could not enforce it the other ought not." The authority of Lawrenson v. Butler seems not to have been recognized in England. The more recent decisions in that country are referred to in 1 Benj. Sales, §§ 254, 255. There is still some conflict in the decisions in this country, but the weight of authority is that the statute of frauds is satisfied by the signature to the contract of the party sought to be charged only, whether the suit to enforce it be at law or in equity, and whether it relates to the sale of real or personal estate. Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484; McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460; Richards v. Green, 23 N. J. Eq. 536; Railroad Corp. v. Evans, 6 Gray, 33; Sutherland v. Briggs, 1 Hare, 34. We think that there is not sufficient ground for this reason of appeal.

Another reason of appeal is "that the specific execution of the contract should not have been decreed, because it is too uncertain to be enforced, inasmuch as it could not be understood from the writing itself without the necessity of resorting to parol proof." No objection seems to have been made to the contract when it was offered in evidence, and therefore the objection now made, that it is void upon its face, comes too late to be entitled to consideration. But the claim, if seasonably made, would have been unfounded. The defendants do not specify in their reasons of appeal, or in their brief, the particulars in which they claim that the contract is deficient in certainty. We suppose their claim to be that the statement of the location of the land is too indefinite to satisfy the requirement of the statute of frauds. If the only description of the land had been "fifteen acres, more or less, in the town of Stratford," there would have been force in this claim, though according to the decisions of courts of high authority such a description might have been applied to the land intended by it by extrinsic evidence. In the case of Hurley v. Brown, 98 Mass. 545, the only description in the contract of the property agreed to be conveyed was "a house and lot on Amity street." The court admitted evidence that there was only one house and lot on Amity street which the defendant had a right to convey, and that the parties had been in treaty for the purchase and sale of it, and that the subject-matter of the contract might be thus identified. See, also, Mead v. Parker, 115 Mass. 413; Robeson v. Hornbaker, 3 N. J. Eq. 60. In the present case the court finds that the plaintiff owned no other real estate in Stratford, and that the same was occupied by him as a homestead and residence. But we think that the description of the land in this contract is so definite as not to require a resort to extrinsic evidence to identify it, other than such as is always necessary to apply a description of real estate to the premises described. The language of the contract is: "We agree to purchase of P. H. Hodges his place at Stratford, containing fifteen acres, more or less." The import of the word "place" in this connection is reasonably certain. Its popular and correct meaning, as thus used, is the place where one resides; his homestead. Webst. Dict., in verbum. The court finds that the plaintiff told the defendants, before they signed the contract, that the place contained about 15 acres, and that this statement was made in good faith. The defendants assign as a reason of appeal that "there was not about fifteen acres of land." It is enough to say that the court does not find that there were not 15 acres in the place, but evidently declined to make such a finding. The defendants introduced the recitals in two deeds as evidence of the quantity of land in the place. One was the deed to the plaintiff of the land, in which was added to the description of the quantity of land the words "more or less," and the other was a conveyance of a small strip of the land to a railroad company, specifying the quantity conveyed. Except for the words "more or less" in the deed to the plaintiff, it would have appeared that there was a fraction of an acre less than 15 acres in the piece. The court, referring to this evidence, says: "There was no evidence as to the exact quantity of land except the recital in said deeds." It properly regarded those recitals as inconclusive evidence. The remaining reason of appeal is that the plaintiff had adequate remedy at law. The defendants claim that the equitable jurisdiction of the courts in this state was restricted by the provision in the old statute last found in Revision 1875, p. 413, § 5, that courts of equity shall "take cognizance only of matters in which adequate relief cannot be had in the ordinary course of law," and that that provision is still in force. It is unnecessary to inquire whether that provision has not, as the plaintiff claims, been since repealed by the practice act passed in 1879, because, in our view, it did not have the restrictive effect claimed for it. A similar claim was made by the defendant in the case of Munson v. Munson, 30 Conn. 425, and the court say the provision referred to "is simply an affirmation of a well-settled rule of equity." The rule of equity is thus stated by Judge SWIFT: "It is a leading principle that equity will not interpose where there is an adequate remedy at law. It is not sufficient that there is a remedy, but it must be as complete and beneficial as the relief in equity." 2 Swift, Dig. c. 1, § 1. In the action at law for the breach of the contract the plaintiff could only recover the excess, if any, of the sum agreed to be paid for the land above its market value when the contract was to be performed. Such a remedy is manifestly inadequate, and courts of equity, therefore, hold, as a general rule, that when a contract for the sale of real estate has been fairly entered into, the party contracting to sell, as well as the party contracting to buy, is entitled to have it specifically performed. The cases on this question are all one way. It is true courts of equity have, in the exercise of their discretion, refused to apply the rule in certain cases where it would be productive of hardship or inconvenience. The court did so in the case of Whitney v. City of New Haven, 23 Conn. 624. In that case the city had contracted to purchase from the plaintiff land and water-rights for the purpose of providing a water supply, and afterwards voted to abandon the project contemplated by the purchase. The court dismissed the bill for a specific performance, but remark as follows in their opinion: "As a general rule, where the purchaser of real estate can come into a court of equity, to obtain a deed of it, the vendor can come there to get his money, which was agreed to be paid; but the rule is not universally true, and it should not be applied, we think, where it will do unnecessary mischief to one of the parties." In the present case the contract appears to have been fairly made, and is subject to the general rule of equity. There is no error in the judgment complained of. The other judges concurred.

PORTER v. FRENCHMAN'S BAY & MT.

(24 Atl. 814, 84 Me. 195.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Jan. 15, 1892.

Report from supreme judicial court, Hancock county.

Bill in equity by Margaretta B. Porter against Frenchman's Bay & Mt. Desert Land & Water Company, to which respondent demurred. On report. Demurrer sustained, and bill dismissed.

Deasy & Higgins, for plaintiff. Hale & Hamlin, for defendant.

LIBBEY, J. Bill in equity, praying for decree for a specific performance of a contract in writing, made by the defendant with the plaintiff, for the purchase of a lot of land in the village of Sorrento.

It comes before this court on a demurrer to the bill by the defendant, and the question to be determined is whether, upon the allegations in the bill, this court has jurisdiction in equity to decree a specific performance. We think it clear that in a proper case the court has jurisdiction to decree specific performance of a contract in writing for the conveyance of land, in a bill brought by the vendor or by the vendee. Rev. St. § 6, c. 77, cl. 3. But the court in this state does not take jurisdiction in equity when the plaintiff has a plain, adequate, and complete remedy in an action at law. Milliken v. Dockray, 80 Me. 82, 13 Atl. 127; Bachelder v. Bean, 76 Me. 370; Alley v. Chase, 83 Me. 537, 22 Atl. 393.

And we think it must appear by the allegations in the bill, where an action at law may be maintained, that the remedy by it is not plain, adequate, and complete; for it is a well-established rule of equity pleading that the bill must contain allegations showing that the court has equity jurisdiction. Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 10, 34; Jones v. Newhall, 115 Mass. 244, 252, 253.

In this case, we think it perfectly clear that the plaintiff has a right to maintain an action at law for a breach of the contract. That being so, to show jurisdiction in equity, there should be some allegations in the bill showing that the remedy at law would not be adequate and complete. There is nothing of the kind in this bill. After setting out the contract, it alleges that the plaintiff was in possession of the land, and has continued to be in possession of the land, to the time of the filing of the bill; no allegation that her action in regard to the land was in any way changed by the making of the contract; no allegation that anything had been done by either party, in consequence of the making of the contract, which could not be taken into consideration in the assessment of the plaintiff's damages.

Demurrer sustained. Bill dismissed, with costs.

PETERS, C. J., and WALTON, VIRGIN, EMERY, and WHITEHOUSE, JJ., concurred.

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
March 31, 1891.

Appeal and supersedeas from circuit court,
Wood county.

Loomis & Tavener, for appellants. Barna
Powell and Okey Johnson, for appellees.

LUCAS, P. This suit originated by the filing of a bill in chancery by H. E. Bumgardner, a married woman, and H. F. Bumgardner, her husband, against C. P. Leavitt and others, in the circuit court of Wood county. The female plaintiff alleges that the defendant Leavitt induced her to invest \$1,000 in the steam-boat General Dawes, the proposed cost of which was \$7,500. It was understood that the boat was to be put in a joint-stock company, in which the plaintiff H. E. Bumgardner was to have shares in proportion to the money she had advanced, as aforesaid. The plaintiff exhibits with her bill an agreement as follows: "This article of agreement, made and entered into this the 14th day of July, 1884, between C. P. Leavitt, county of Wood, and state of West Virginia, and H. E. Bumgardner of Hockingport, Athens Co., Ohio, witnesseth, that the said C. P. Leavitt, in case of misunderstanding, or not being able to agree, or in case of death of Herman Bumgardner, agent, said Leavitt agrees to take the said stock of Mrs. Bumgardner at not exceeding cost, or, if boat depreciates in value, at fair cash valuation. The said Mrs. H. E. Bumgardner agrees to give said C. P. Leavitt the refusal over any other purchaser. The said stock referred to above is stock in the steamer General Dawes. [Signed] C. P. Leavitt." And there is further exhibited the following notice: "To Chas. P. Leavitt—Sir: I propose to sell you my stock in the Farmer's Trans. Co. in accordance with your contract of July 14, 1884, at cost, or, if the boat has depreciated in value, at its fair cash valuation. Your early attention is called to this matter, the contingency having arisen under which you bound yourself to take said stock. [Signed] H. E. Bumgardner, by H. F. Bumgardner, Ag't. March 31, 1887." The bill supplements the above-written agreement, signed by C. P. Leavitt, by stating that it was a part of the consideration that the husband, H. F. Bumgardner, was to have regular employment on said steam-boat, of which said C. P. Leavitt was to be master. It is further alleged that all of the interests, including the stock owned by Leavitt, (which was a large majority of it,) as well as that owned by H. E. Bumgardner, was capitalized into a corporation known as the Farmer's Transportation Company, or conveyed to said company. The steamer was valued at \$7,600 at that time, and 760 shares of capital stock of the par value of \$10 per share were issued, of which 100 shares were given to said H. E. Bumgardner, and 1 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares to her husband, in order that he might be represented in the company. It is further alleged that C. P. Leavitt took charge as master, and pursuant to the agreement gave H. F. Bumgardner employment, but that they soon disagreed, and said H. F. Bumgardner was discharged. Plaintiffs proceed to aver that since such disagreement they have at all times been ready to give said Leavitt the preference of purchasing said stock, and have urged him to buy said stock according to his agreement, but he has steadily and persistently refused to do so, until the 31st day of March, 1887, when the above notice was written and served. They charge that there has been no depreciation in the value of the boat, but that it has been increased in size and capacity at a large expense, and its value enhanced in consequence. It is further alleged that one E. W. Petty, who is made a defendant, had attached the 101 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares of stock in the circuit court of Wood county in an action at law against H. F. Bumgardner. It is further alleged that the plaintiffs were largely indebted to J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold, both of whom were made defendants, and that the female plaintiff executed a lien upon the said 100 shares of stock to secure said indebtedness. By an agreement and compromise between the plaintiffs and said E. W. Petty his debt is reduced to \$422, which it is agreed shall be paid him out of the proceeds arising from the sale of said 101 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares of stock; and by like agreement with J. W. and L. H. Arnold, they are to receive the residue of the proceeds of said sale as a compromise, and in full settlement of the indebtedness due them from the plaintiffs. Plaintiff H. E. Bumgardner, it is alleged, has always been ready, and has offered, and now offers, to specifically perform the said agreement on her part, by assigning and transferring said 101 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares of the stock free and unincumbered, as of the 31st day of March, 1887. The prayer of the bill is that the court will declare the plaintiff to be entitled to a specific performance and execution of the said agreement, with interest on the said amount from March 31, 1887; second, that the court will decree that the amount ascertained to be due said H. E. Bumgardner from said C. P. Leavitt may be paid over to said E. W. Petty and said J. W. and L. H. Arnold, as above set out; and, thirdly, for all proper accounts and general relief. The bill was demurred to by Leavitt, but the demurrer was overruled, whereupon C. P. Leavitt filed his answer, in which he admits the agreement as set out in the bill, so far as it goes, but he denies it was ever understood or contemplated that the said H. F. Bumgardner should have the right, at any time he might thereafter see fit, to require respondent to buy the stock of said H. E. Bumgardner, and to require respondent to pay therefor the original cost, but in truth it was intended to give respondent refusal and right to buy said stock at any time, provided he paid therefor as much as any other bidder, and provided, furthermore, that respondent so desired. He alleges that the boat is not worth more than \$2,500, about one-third of what she cost at the time said stock was issued; and that the present value of said 101 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares in the bill mentioned is not worth more than \$333.33 $\frac{1}{3}$ at the outside. He denies that the stock has ever been tendered him, or that either of the plaintiffs have ever proffered the same at anything like a fair cash valuation. He admits that on or about the — day of July, 1887, he offered them \$850 for the stock, although he knew that they had immediately before that offered it to another party at \$800. He alleges that it had been assigned by H. E. Bumgardner to Mrs. J. W. Arnold, to secure payment of a debt, and the certificate was then held by one L. N. Tavener, as attorney for said Arnold, who had notified the secretary of the corporation, and requested a transfer on the books. Respondent sets out also that the certificate was incumbered by a lien of said E. W. Petty, and he pleads that the plaintiffs had not title to said stock, and so could not carry out the agreement. Respondent further alleges that his said offer of \$850 was made in good faith, and he was ever ready from the time he offered in 1887 to buy said stock to take the same, but his offer was not accepted, nor was there ever tendered to respondent the said stock at any time, nor could it be, since they had parted with the title. He denies that he ought in equity to be compelled to pay for the stock, which cannot be delivered, and is incumbered to the full amount of its value. J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold filed their joint and separate answer, in which they admit all that is said in the bill about the mortgage or pledge of the stock to them, and admit that they have agreed that out of the proceeds arising from the sale E. W. Petty should be first paid, and that they would accept the residue of the proceeds in full satisfaction of their lien, and that they have accordingly authorized L. N. Tavener, Esq., their attorney, to execute their release, in order that said H. E. Bumgardner may execute to said defendant C. P. Leavitt an unincumbered transfer of said 100 shares of stock in fulfillment of said H. E. Bumgardner's contract on her part, as set out in Exhibit No. 1 of the bill. E. W. Petty likewise answers, and admits all the averments of the bill as to his lien upon the stock by attachment, and also the agreement with reference to his payment out of the proceeds of sale.

A vast amount of testimony was taken, very little of which had anything to do with the case, the bulk of it seeming to be predicated upon some extraneous controversies as to the earnings of the boat, and Leavitt's settlement with the corporation and stockholders. On the 10th of December, 1888, the case came on to be finally heard, and the court decreed that H. E. Bumgardner was entitled to specific execution of the contract; that demand was made by her on the 31st day of March, 1887; and that the 101 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares of stock were then worth \$866.60; and the said C. P. Leavitt is decreed to pay that amount, with interest from 31st day of March, 1887, aggregating the sum of \$954.76, which he is to pay, with interest thereon from the date of decree. The money is to be distributed to the Arnolds and Petty in accordance with their respective liens, and agreements with reference to the same. The decree then proceeds to direct "that L. N. Tavener, who is authorized in a writing filed in the papers in this cause to release the lien of said J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold upon 100 shares of the stock aforesaid, to execute said release of said lien, and, in case said L. N. Tavener shall fail or refuse to execute said release within ten days from this date, then Barna Powell, who is hereby appointed a special commissioner for the purpose, is authorized and directed to execute a release of the lien of said J. W. Arnold and L. H. Arnold, as aforesaid, upon the 100 shares of stock held in the name of H. E. Bumgardner and filed with the papers in this cause, which certificate of 100 shares, as well as the certificate of 101 $\frac{1}{3}$ shares now also in the file in this cause, are to be delivered to said C. P. Leavitt upon payment by him, or some one for him, to the defendants Petty and Arnolds and plaintiffs, the sum hereinbefore decreed by him to be paid." Leave was given the plaintiffs to sue out execution. From this decree the defendant Leavitt has appealed to this court.

The first and pivotal question to be decided in this case is whether the court of chancery had jurisdiction to decree specific performance. If not, the bill should have been dismissed on demurrer. In the first place, regarding the defendant Leavitt, as having for a consideration obtained the refusal of, or, as we may call it, the option on, this stock, could he have maintained a bill for specific performance against Mrs. H. E. Bumgardner in case she had refused to let him have the stock, and had insisted on selling it to some one else? This is an important question, because, if such relief could be granted to the purchaser were he to apply, the seller, who has given the purchaser such preference or option, is entitled to like relief by reason of the operation of the principle of mutuality of right and remedy. The general doctrine upon this subject is thus stated by Mr. Pomeroy: "It is not then sufficient in general that a valid and binding agreement exists, and that an action at law for damages will lie in favor of either party for a breach by the other; the peculiarly distinctive feature of the equitable doctrine is that the remedial right to a specific performance must be mutual." See Moore v. Fitz Randolph, 6 Leigh, 175. This is a general rule, namely, that the right to a specific execution of a contract, so far as the question of mutuality is concerned, depends upon whether the agreement itself is obligatory on both parties, so that upon the application of either against the other the court would grant a specific performance. Duvall v. Myers, 2 Md. Ch. 401. Says Mr. Pomeroy: "It is a familiar doctrine that if the right to the specific performance of a contract exists at all, it must be mutual. The remedy must be alike attainable by both parties to the agreement." Pom. Spec. Perf. § 165. In the present case it appears that the defendant Leavitt, being the owner of about three-fourths of the stock in a steamboat, entered into an agreement with a married woman with reference to $1,000 of the same stock. It is true that the contract was signed by him alone. The circumstance that it was signed by him alone is not material, since it is admitted by both parties that she entered into the contract, and was to be bound by it. Wat. Spec. Perf. §§ 268, 270. Neither is the fact that she was a married woman material in this state, since, by our married woman's act, which went into operation in 1869, (see Code, c. 66,) a married woman may not only take and hold personal property, such as stocks, but, being such a stockholder, she may vote the same in any organized company; consequently she had the right of disposition and the power to sell or contract to sell. It is also true that, according to her statement, personal services entered into a part of the consideration of the contract, and it is a rule almost universal that a contract for personal services cannot be enforced against the party promising such services, and hence for the want of the requisite mutuality specific execution will not be enforced against the opposite party, unless the services have been actually performed, and the contract to that extent been executed, as was the case here. Pom. Spec. Perf. § 310.

These obstacles being disposed of, we may inquire, had Mrs. Bumgardner persisted in selling this stock to a third party, contrary to her agreement, could Leavitt have asked the court of chancery to interfere by injunction, and to compel her to transfer the stock to him upon payment of the price stipulated in the agreement? The question of specific performance of contracts for the delivery of stock is frequently treated by the text-writers in an empirical and unsatisfactory manner, as if there were something peculiar in this character of personal property, which rendered it impossible to classify it under any general rule. Mr. Fry, for example, does not hesitate to say positively that a contract for the sale of stock will not be specifically enforced, although he afterwards admits that railway shares form an exception. Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 24, 27. Mr. Pomeroy's treatment of the subject is equally unsatisfactory. See Pom. Spec. Perf. §§ 17-19. The true principle would seem to be that, as a general rule, courts of equity will not enforce specific performance of contracts for the delivery of shares of stock, but when a purchaser has bargained for such shares, or taken an option upon them, because they have for him a unique and special value, the loss of which could not be adequately compensated by damages at law, the chancellor, in the exercise of a sound discretion, may decree specific execution. This principle we find laid down and insisted upon in the more recent work of Mr. Waterman, (1881.) "The same principles," he says, "govern in contracts for the sale of stock as in the sale of other property,—that is, if a breach can be fully compensated in damages, equity will not interfere; while it will do so when, notwithstanding the payment of the money value of the stock, the plaintiff will still lose a substantial benefit, and thereby remain uncompensated. If a contract to convey stock is clear and definite, and the uncertain value of the stock renders it difficult to do justice by an award of damages, specific performance will be decreed." Wat. Spec. Perf. § 19. Among the many other cases cited in support of this proposition is the leading case of Doloret v. Rothschild, decided by Sir John Leach, vice-chancellor, in 1824, 1 Sim. & S. 590, in which it is said that a bill will lie for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of government stock, where it prays for the delivery of certificates which give the legal title to the stock. There are many other cases, however, both in England and America, which sustain the correct principle as laid down above, but which it is unnecessary to cite. In the present case the purchaser of the refusal of or option upon the stock in the steamboat was dealing for an article which he could not go upon the market and buy, and which no one could deliver to him but the holder, with whom he bargained. The shares of stock evidently had for him a peculiar value, which could not be compensated by mere damages, such as would be recovered at law. Their possession would enable him to control the company, and to retain his position as master of the vessel. For the same reason, therefore, that a contract for railway shares will frequently be specifically performed, viz., whenever such shares are being purchased for the purposes of organization and control, I think a court of equity would have interfered in this case in favor of C. P. Leavitt, had he filed a bill praying for its intervention. It follows, therefore, upon the ground of mutuality of remedy and reciprocity of obligation, that such a bill could be maintained by Mrs. Bumgardner. There is another ground quite as apparent as that stated above, and that is that the legal title to this stock had passed into the hands of a third party, who is properly made a co-defendant. In the case cited above of Doloret v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. & S. 590, the vice-chancellor remarks: "I consider also that the plaintiff, not being the original holder of the scrip, but merely the bearer, may not be able to maintain any action at law upon the contract, and that, if he has any title, it must be in equity." So in the present case the plaintiffs are in a situation in which a court of equity sees its way clearly to administer complete and adequate remedial justice to all parties interested, whereas, if they were remitted to a court of law, if relief could be afforded at all, it could only be done by resorting to several actions, perhaps no less than three. Upon the general principle, therefore, of avoiding circuity of action, and affording relief where the remedy at law is inadequate, it was proper for the court of equity to exercise its jurisdiction. Whenever the remedy at law would be incomplete and inadequate because the court of law cannot give a conditional or modified judgment, and would be unable to preserve the benefit of the agreement to all the parties interested, equity has jurisdiction to enforce the agreement. In the case of Summers v. Bean, the general principle is thus declared by Judge Moncure, (13 Grat. 412:) "Generally an adequate remedy may be had at law for the breach of a contract concerning any other personalty than slaves, and therefore, as a general rule, a court of equity will not enforce the execution of such a contract. But sometimes an adequate remedy at law cannot be had for the breach of such a contract, and then its specific execution will be enforced in equity." As it was said in May v. Le Claire, 11 Wall. 218, in order to oust the equity jurisdiction, the remedy at law must be "as effectual and complete as the chancellor can make it." The same principle is recognized by all the text-writers. See Fry, Spec. Perf. § 18; Pom. Spec. Perf. § 29. Mr. Waterman says tersely: "If, however, the remedy at law would be wholly inadequate or impracticable, specific performance will be decreed." Wat. Spec. Perf. § 17. For these reasons, therefore, we think there was no error in overruling the demurrer to the plaintiffs' bill. Upon the merits, although there was, as we have said, a great deal of unnecessary testimony taken, the plaintiffs' case might have rested, and no doubt did rest, upon the testimony of the defendant C. P. Leavitt himself. Out of the 168 questions propounded to him, of which some were frivolous, and nearly all impertinent, he is asked on the 103d question whether he did not offer Mrs. Bumgardner $850 for her stock, in order to get rid of Bumgardner, to which he replies: "Yes; I wanted to get rid of him. Here is one of the clerks right here who asked him what he would take for it at different times." 104th question: "Did you not make a proposition to buy the stock on account of your obligation under that contract? Answer. Oh, yes; several times. I guess the clerk here knows that I made offers at different times through Mr. Ritchie, and Mr. Baringer can testify to the same thing." The defendant further testifies that these offers were made in March, 1887, or a little after that time, and that the negotiations would have been concluded, except for some trivial and inconsequential dispute about matters foreign to the subject-matter. To take the defendant, therefore, at his own word, and fix the value of the stock at a price only differing by a few dollars from what he himself offered, with interest from the time of his offer, was a judgment of the circuit court of which he has no right to complain, and we think, therefore, that the decree complained of should be in all respects affirmed.

Supreme Court of Illinois. Feb. 14, 1898.

Appeal from appellate court, First district. Bill in equity by George M. Welty to restrain H. R. Jacobs from refusing to perform a contract for the use of a theater, and to enjoin Ulysses D. Newell from the use and occupation of the same. From the decree of the appellate court (64 Ill. App. 285), affirming the decree of the superior court of Cook county, in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Bulkley, Gray & More, for appellant. James E. Purnell, for appellee H. R. Jacobs. Partridge & Partridge, for appellee U. D. Newell.

CARTER, J. This was a bill for an injunction filed December 28, 1895, in the superior court of Cook county, by the appellant, in which he alleged that he was a theatrical manager and proprietor; that on April 9, 1895, he entered into a written contract with H. R. Jacobs, manager, and representing M. J. Jacobs, proprietor, of the Alhambra Theater, in Chicago, to play his company in the "Black Crook" at such theater for seven consecutive nights, commencing December 29, 1895; that Jacobs was to furnish the house, well cleaned, lighted, and heated, together with the stock, scenery, and equipments contained therein, stage hands, stage carpenter, fly men, regular ushers, gas man, property man, janitor, ticket seller, doorkeepers, orchestra, house programmes, licenses, billboards, bill posting, distribution of printed matter, usual newspaper advertisements, and the resources of the theater in stage furniture and properties not perishable; that Welty was to furnish a company of first-class artists, to the satisfaction of Jacobs, together with special scenery, calcium lights, etc., and also, 10 days in advance, certain printing, prepaid and free from all charges, consisting of a variety of bills, etc.; that appellant was to receive 60 per cent. of the gross receipts up to $5,000, and 70 per cent. on all over $5,000; that if the company should not prove satisfactory to Jacobs, whose judgment was to be conclusive, or if the company should prove not to be as represented, then Jacobs should have the right to cancel the contract by giving appellant at least one week's notice, by mail or otherwise; that appellant's company was not to appear at any other house in the city prior to the date of the performance specified; that if, by any unforeseen accident, fire, or for any reason whatever, Jacobs could not furnish the house for said performance the contract was to become null and void. The bill further alleged that appellant had kept and performed all his covenants; that he had tendered the printing as required, and that he was ready to furnish a satisfactory company; that he had received no notice from Jacobs that his company was not satisfactory nor as represented, and had been given no notice of the termination of his contract as therein provided; that within the then last 30 days Jacobs had entered into a contract with U. D. Newell for the Alhambra Theater for the same week that appellant's contract provided for; that Newell claims to be the manager of another company, also engaged in producing the "Black Crook"; that Jacobs and Newell were combining and confederating to injure and defraud appellant, as Newell had agreed to produce the play for a less percentage than appellant; that appellant had 40 performers under contract, and would be obliged to pay them their salaries whether they performed or not, and that he could procure no other place for his performance during said time, and would be compelled to remain idle, at great expense; that the money value of his contract could not be determined, either actually or approximately, in any other manner than by carrying out and fully performing it according to its conditions; that Jacobs and Newell had announced their intention of keeping appellant out of the possession and use of said theater; that appellees were financially irresponsible. The bill prays for an order enjoining appellees from hindering appellant and his company from taking possession of the Alhambra Theater, its appurtenances and stage property, and from hindering, delaying, interfering with, or preventing appellant from producing said play in accordance with said contract, and also restraining appellees from using or occupying said theater, its stock, scenery, and equipments, during said period of seven days, and from allowing any other person or company to use or occupy the same; and also restraining and enjoining appellees from refusing to furnish to appellant, during such period, the usual and necessary light, heat, music, regular stage hands, stage carpenter, etc., and for general relief. The injunction was granted, and served on appellees December 28, 1895. On December 30, 1895, a rule was entered on appellees to show cause why they should not be punished for contempt of court in violating this injunction. The next day an order was entered modifying the injunction so as to permit Newell to produce the play at the Alhambra, and Jacobs was ordered to pay into court 60 per cent. of the entire receipts received by him at the Alhambra for the week, and to pay to Newell 30 per cent. of such receipts, and the cause was continued to January 3, 1896. On that day both appellees answered, replication was filed, and Newell moved for a dissolution of the injunction. Appellee Jacobs in his answer admitted the making of the contract with appellant, but denied that appellant's company was satisfactory or as represented, and alleged that he had notified appellant thereof, and had canceled the contract; denied all combination to injure appellant; admitted that he had made a contract with Newell for the same week he had formerly contracted to appellant; denied that appellant had furnished the printing as required; and that he was without remedy except in a court of equity. Appellee Newell in his answer alleged that he had been informed that appellant's contract had been canceled; that on November 29, 1895, he had made a contract with Jacobs to play the Tompkins Black Crook Company in the Alhambra for seven successive nights, beginning December 29, 1895, the contract being in all particulars like appellant's, except as to the percentage of receipts; that as early as December 27th he had removed to the Alhambra a number of articles belonging to his company and had taken possession of the same; alleged various communications and negotiations between all the parties to this suit from December 16th until the bill was filed; that, becoming alarmed that Jacobs would close up the Alhambra entirely during that week, he (Newell) had procured an injunction from the circuit court on December 27, 1895, and had it served on Jacobs the same day, restraining Jacobs from closing up the theater during said week and excluding his company from presenting their play; charges appellant with laches and bad faith in suppressing all information in regard to such first injunction, and alleged that appellant's contract was in violation of the statutes, which forbid any amusement or diversion on Sunday, so that specific performance could not be enforced.

The cause was heard by the court, and a decree entered finding that the injunction had been violated by appellees, and that under the order modifying the injunction there had been paid into court $1,134.75; that the equities were with the appellees; and that the appellant had a complete and adequate remedy at law, and that the injunction was improvidently issued; and the bill was therefore dismissed, and the money ordered returned to Jacobs. Appellant appealed, and asked that the money be retained in the clerk's hands pending the appeal, which was allowed, and the money ordered left with the clerk until the final determination on appeal. The appellate court affirmed the decree, and appellant has further appealed to this court.

There was no sufficient proof that Jacobs canceled his contract with Welty on any of the grounds stipulated in it, and the question is not whether Jacobs was justified in violating the contract, but whether his bill of complaint for equitable relief can be sustained or he should be remitted to his action at law. Strictly speaking, the bill was not one for specific performance, but for injunction only. It is clear from its allegations and the authorities bearing upon the question that specific performance of the contract could not be decreed. It is not, and cannot be, contended that appellant could have been compelled, by any writ the court could have issued, to occupy the theater with his company of actors and give the performances contracted for, any more than a public singer or speaker can be compelled specifically to perform his contract to sing or speak. Negative covenants not to sing or perform elsewhere at a certain time than a designated place have been enforced by the injunctive process, but further than this such contracts have not been specifically enforced by the courts, by injunction or otherwise. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604; Daly v. Smith, 38 N. Y. Super. Ct. 158. In Lumley v. Wagner there was an express covenant not to sing elsewhere than at the complainant's theater, and the injunction was placed on that ground.

But it is urged that negative covenants may be implied as well as expressed, and, when necessarily implied from the terms of the contract, they will be enforced in like manner; citing the following cases: Montague v. Flockton, L. R. 16 Eq. 189; Great Northern Ry. Co. v. Manchester, S. & L. Ry. Co., 5 De Gex & S. 138; Chicago & A. Ry. Co. v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co., 24 Fed. 516; Singer Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Union B. & E. Co., Holmes, 253, Fed. Cas. No. 12,904; 2 High. Inj. (2d Ed.) § 1150; Fredricks v. Mayer, 13 How. Prac. 566. While there was a negative covenant in the contract under consideration against Welty, it is not important to consider whether or not appellant might have been enjoined from performing elsewhere than at Jacobs' theater at the time in question, for it is manifest he could not have been compelled to perform at said theater. Before a contract will be specifically enforced there must be mutuality in the contract, so that it may be enforced by either; and, as this contract was of such a nature that it could not have been specifically enforced by appellee Jacobs, it should not be so enforced by appellant. Lancaster v. Roberts, 144 Ill. 223, 33 N. E. 27; Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 440, 441; Wat. Spec. Perf. § 196; Cooper v. Pena, 21 Cal. 411.

But it is urged that courts of equity will by injunction restrain the violation of contracts of this character in many cases where they cannot decree specific performance, and the following among other cases are referred to: Western Union Tel. Co. v. Union Pac. Ry. Co., 3 Fed. 423-429; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Oregon R. & Nav. Co., 15 Fed. 561, and 18 Fed. 517; Wells, Fargo & Co. v. Northern Pac. R. Co., 23 Fed. 469. Without determining whether there may not be exceptional cases not falling within the general rule, we think the rule is as stated in Chicago M. G. L. & F. Co. v. Town of Lake, 130 Ill. 42, 22 N. E. 616, and the authorities there quoted. It was there said (page 60, 130 Ill., and page 619, 22 N. E.): "The bill of complaint in this case, though not strictly a bill for the specific performance of a contract, is in substance a bill of that kind. In 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1341, it is said: 'An injunction restraining the breach of a contract is a negative specific enforcement of that contract. The jurisdiction of equity to grant such injunction is substantially coincident with its jurisdiction to compel a specific performance. Both are governed by the same doctrine and rules. It may be stated, as a general proposition, that whenever the contract is one of a class which will be affirmatively specifically enforced, a court of equity will restrain its breach by injunction, if this is the only practical mode of enforcement which its terms permit.' It is plain that, as a general rule, to enjoin one from doing something in violation of his contract is an indirect mode of enforcing the affirmative provisions of such contract, although such an injunction may often fall short of accomplishing its object. It is obvious from what has been said and from the authorities that to enjoin appellee Jacobs, as prayed in the bill, from refusing to furnish the usual and necessary light, heat, music, regular stage hands, stage carpenter, ushers, equipments, etc., provided for in the contract, would be the same, in substance, as to command him to furnish them, and without them the use of the theater building would seem to be of little use. It is practically conceded by counsel for appellant that this part of the contract could not be specifically enforced as prayed, or otherwise, in equity; but it is conceded that this part of the contract is merely incidental to the more important part of it, which was the right to occupy and use the theater and its furnishings, and give therein the performances provided for, and to exclude from a like occupation and use the other appellee, Newell, and that the injunction was proper for that purpose. This would have been an indirect method of enforcing a part performance of the contract, and courts will not enforce specific performance of particular stipulations separated from the rest of the contract, where they do not clearly stand by themselves, unaffected by other provisions. Baldwin v. Fletcher, 48 Mich. 604, 12 N. W. 873. Even if such a decree might have been sustained, we are satisfied the sound legal discretion of the court was not violated in refusing it, or in dissolving the injunction after it was granted. Appellant's remedy, if any he had, was at law. The judgment of the appellate court is affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

JONES v. NEWHALL.

Suffolk. June 20, 1874.

Bill by Leonard S. Jones against Benjamin B. Newhall to enforce specific performance of a contract for the purchase of all the interest of complainant in the Worthington Land Associates, and all the right and interest of Jones in any property belonging to the Dorchester Land Association, the share of said Jones consisting of 14 shares of stock of said land association, together with two certain mortgages. Decree for plaintiff. Case reported to the full court. Bill dismissed.

R. D. Smith & A. E. Jones, for plaintiff.
A. C. Clark, for defendant.

WELLS, J. Jurisdiction in equity is conferred upon this court by Gen. St. c. 113, § 2, to hear and determine "suits for the specific performance of written contracts by and against either party to the contract, and his heirs, devisees, executors, administrators and assigns." The power extends alike to written contracts of all descriptions, but its exercise is restricted by the proviso, "when the parties have not a plain, adequate and complete remedy at the common law." This proviso has always been so construed and applied as to make it a test, in each particular case, by which to determine whether jurisdiction in equity shall be entertained. If the only relief to which the plaintiff would be entitled in equity is the same in measure and kind as that which he might obtain in a suit at law, he can have no standing upon the equity side of the court, unless his remedy at law is doubtful, circuitous, or complicated by multiplicity of parties having different interests. Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 6 Pick. 376, 396; Sears v. Boston, 16 Pick. 357; Wilson v. Leishman, 12 Metc. (Mass.) 316, 321; Hilliard v. Allen, 4 Cush. 532, 535; Pratt v. Pond, 5 Allen, 59; Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, 27; Ward v. Peck, 114 Mass. 121.

In contracts for the sale of personal property jurisdiction in equity is rarely entertained, although the only remedy at law may be the recovery of damages, the measure of which is the difference between the market value of the property at the time of the breach and the price as fixed by the contract. The reason is that, in regard to most articles of personal property, the commodity and its market value are supposed to be substantially equivalent, each to the other, so that they may be readily interchanged. The seller may convert his rejected goods into money; the purchaser, with his money, may obtain similar goods; each presumably at the market price; and the difference between that and the contract price, recoverable at law, will be full indemnity. Jones v. Boston Mill Corp., 4 Pick. 507, 511; Adderley v. Dixon, 1 Sim. & S. 607; Harnett v. Yielding, 2 Schoales & L. 549, 553; Adams, Eq. 83; Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 12, 29.

It is otherwise with fixed property like real estate. Compensation in damages, measured by the difference in price as ascertained by the market value and by the contract, has never been regarded in equity as such adequate indemnity for nonfulfillment of a contract for the sale or purchase of land as to justify the refusal of relief in equity. When that is the extent of the right to recover at law, a bill in equity is maintainable, even in favor of the vendor, to enforce fulfillment of the contract, and payment of the full amount of the price agreed on. Old Colony Railroad v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25.

Although the general subject is within the chancery jurisdiction of the court, yet inadequacy of the damages recoverable at law is essential to the right to invoke its action as a court of chancery in any particular case. The rule is the same whether applied to the contracts for the sale of real or of personal estate. The difference in the application arises from the difference in the character of the subject-matter of the contracts in respect to the question whether damages at law will afford full and adequate indemnity to the party seeking relief. If the character of the property be such that the loss of the contract will not be fairly compensated in damages based upon an estimate of its market value, relief may be had in equity, whether it relates to real or to personal estate. Adderley v. Dixon, 1 Sim. & S. 607; Duncuft v. Albrecht, 12 Sim. 189, 199; Clark v. Flint, 22 Pick. 231; Story, Eq. Jur. § 717; Adams, Eq. 83; Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 11, 23, 30, 37.

The property in question in this case appears to be of such a character. It is not material, therefore, whether the interest of the plaintiff is in the nature of realty or of personalty. But the relief he seeks is not such as to require the aid of a court of equity. At the time this bill was filed the only obligation on the part of the defendant to be enforced either at law or in equity was his express promise to pay a definite sum of money as an installment towards the purchase of certain property from the plaintiff. That promise is supported by the executory agreement of the plaintiff to convey the property, contained in the same instrument, as its consideration; but in respect of performance the several promises of the defendant are separable from the entirety of the contract, and each one may be enforced by itself as an assumpsit. The plaintiff is not obliged to sue in damages upon his contract as for a general breach. He may recover at law the full amount of the installment due. In equity he can have no decree beyond that. He cannot come into equity to obtain precisely what he can have at law. Howe v. Nickerson, 14 Allen, 400, 406; Jacobs v. Peterborough & S. R. Co., 8 Cush. 223; Gill v. Bicknell, 2 Cush. 355; Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69.

The plaintiff has no occasion for any order of the court in regard to performance by himself. At most, all that is necessary for him to do in order to recover his judgment at law, is to offer a conveyance of a portion of his interest corresponding to the amount of the installment due.

We do not regard the fact, stated in the report, that the defendant "also refused to pay an assessment then due, or about to become due," for which he was bound by the contract to provide, and hold the plaintiff harmless; because that is immaterial upon demurrer, there being no allegation in the bill in reference to it. And besides, there would be sufficient remedy at law for such a breach, if it were sufficiently alleged and proved.

If the plaintiff will be compelled to bring several actions for his full remedy at law, it is because he has a contract payable in installments; that is, he may have several causes of action. But he may sue them severally, or he may join them all in one suit, when all shall have fallen due, at his own election. He is not driven into equity to escape the necessity of many suits at law.

It is true, as the plaintiff insists, that a different rule exists in the English courts of chancery, and that in numerous cases, not unlike the present, relief in equity has there been granted by decree for payment of a sum of money due by contract, although equally recoverable at law. The maxim, which, as we apply it, makes the want of adequate remedy at law essential to the right to have relief in equity in each case, has always been attached to chancery jurisdiction. But in the English courts it has been rather by way of indicating the nature and origin of the jurisdiction, and defining the class of rights or subjects to which it attaches, than as a constant limit upon its exercise. Courts of chancery were created to supply defects in proceedings at common law. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 49, 54. Their jurisdiction grew out of the exigencies of the earlier periods in the judicial history of the country, and was from time to time enlarged to meet those exigencies. Its limits, having become defined and fixed by usage, have not contracted as the jurisdiction of the common-law courts was extended. It has always been held that jurisdiction once acquired in chancery, over any subject or class of rights, is not taken away by any subsequent enlargement of the powers of the courts of common law, nor by reason of any new modes of remedy that may be afforded by those courts. Story, Eq. Jur. § 64i; Snell,

Eq. 335; Slim v. Croucher, 1 De Gex, F. & J. 518.

Hence arose a wide range of concurrent jurisdiction, within which chancery proceeded to administer appropriate remedies, without regard to the question whether a like remedy could be had in the courts of law. Colt v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 154; Green v. Barrett, 1 Sim. 45; Blain v. Agar, 2 Sim. 289; Cridland v. De Mauley, 1 De Gex & S. 459; Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174; Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470. One of its maxims was that there must be mutuality of right to avail of that jurisdiction. Accordingly, if the contract or cause of complaint was such that one of the parties might require the peculiar relief which chancery alone could afford, it was frequently held that the principle of mutuality required that jurisdiction should be equally maintained in favor of the other party, who sought and could have no other relief than recovery of the same amount of money due or measure of damages as would have been awarded by judgment in the court of law. Hall v. Warren, 9 Ves. 605; Walker v. Eastern Counties Ry. Co., 6 Hare, 594; Kenney v. Wexham, 6 Madd. 355.

In contracts respecting land there is an additional consideration for maintaining jurisdiction in equity in favor of the vendor as well as the vendee, which is doubtless much more influential with the English courts than it can be here; and that is the doctrine of equitable conversion. It is referred to as a reason for the exercise of jurisdiction at the suit of the vendor, in Cave v. Cave, 2 Eden, 139; Eastern Counties Ry. Co. v. Hawkes, 5 H. L. Cas. 331; Fry, Spec. Perf. § 23.

In Massachusetts, instead of a distinct and independent court of chancery, with a jurisdiction derived from and defined and fixed by long usage, we have certain chancery powers conferred upon the court of common law, whose jurisdiction and modes of remedy as a court of law had already become extended much beyond those of English courts of common law, partly by statutes and partly by its own adaptation of its remedies to the necessities which arose from the absence of the court of chancery. This difference in the relations of the two jurisdictions would alone give occasion for different rules governing their exercise. Black v. Black, 4 Pick. 234, 238; Tirrell v. Merrill, 17 Mass. 117, 121; Baker v. Biddle, Baldw. 394, Fed. Cas. No. 764.

The successive statutes by which the equity powers of this court have been conferred or enlarged have always affixed to their exercise the condition that "the parties have not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at the common law." This has been construed as referring "to remedies at law as they exist under our statutes and according to our course of practice." Pratt v. Pond,

5 Allen, 59. It has also been repeatedly held that, in reference to the range of jurisdiction conferred, the several statutes were to be construed strictly. Black v. Black, and Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, ubi supra. No reason or necessity remains for the maintenance of concurrent jurisdiction, except for the sake of a more perfect remedy in equity when the plaintiff shall establish his right to it. And such we understand to be the purport and intent of our statutes upon the subject. Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 232; Angell v. Stone, 110 Mass. 54.

A similar restriction upon the equity jurisdiction of the federal courts is so construed with great strictness. Oelricks v. Spain, 15 Wall. 211, 228; Grand Chute v. Winegar, Id. 373; Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616; Parker v. Winnipiseogee Lake Cotton & Woollen Co., 2 Black, 545; Baker v. Biddle, Baldw. 394, Fed. Cas. No. 764. See, also, Woodman v. Freeman, 25 Me. 531; Piscataquis F. & M. Ins. Co. v. Hill, 60 Me. 178.

Even in courts of general chancery powers and of independent organization, while the power to entertain bills relating to all matters which in their nature are within their concurrent jurisdiction is maintained, yet the usual course of practice is to remit parties to their remedy at law, provided that be plain and adequate, unless for some reason of peculiar advantage which equity is supposed to possess, or some other cause influencing the discretion of the court. Kerr, Fraud & M. 45; Blsp. Eq. § 200; also, Id. § 37; Snell, Eq. 334; Clifford v. Brooke, 13

The doctrine of Colt v. Woollaston, 2 P. Wms. 154, and Green v. Barrett, 1 Sim. 45, though not expressly overruled, has been questioned (Thompson v. Barclay, 9 Law J. Ch. 215, 219), and does not seem to govern the usual practice of the courts. See cases above cited, and Newham v. May, 13 Price, 749.

But, independently of statute restrictions, the objection that the plaintiff may have a sufficient remedy or defense at law in the particular case is a matter of equitable discretion, rather than of jurisdictional right; and is therefore not always available on demurrer. Colt v. Nettervill, 2 P. Wms. 304; Ramshire v. Bolton, L. R. 8 Eq. 294; Hill v. Lane, L. R. 11 Eq. 215; Barry v. Croskey, 2 Johns. & H. 1.

According to the practice in this commonwealth, on the other hand, under the statutes relating to the exercise of jurisdiction in equity, a bill is demurrable, not only if it show that the plaintiff has a remedy at law, equally sufficient and available, but also if it fail to show that he is without such remedy. Pool v. Lloyd, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 525, 529; Woodman v. Saltonstall, 7 Cush. 181, Pratt v. Pond, 5 Allen, 59; Clark v. Jones, Id. 379; Metcalf v. Cady, 8 Allen, 587; Mill River Loan Fund Ass'n v. Clafin, 9 Allen, 101; Com. v. Smith, 10 Allen, 448; Bassett v. Brown, 100 Mass. 355, 105 Mass. 551, 560. The demurrer, therefore, must be sustained, and the bill dismissed.

FOTHERGILL v. ROWLAND.

Master of the Rolls. Nov. 4, 1873.

Demurrer.

The plaintiffs in this case, Richard Fothergill and Ernest Thomas Hankey, were ironmasters, carrying on the Aberdare Ironworks. The defendant Richard Rowland was lessee of the Newbridge Colliery.

The bill alleged that the plaintiffs had for some time been accustomed to purchase coals of the defendant Rowland, and that at the time of making the agreement hereinafter mentioned there was a subsisting contract, under which Rowland was supplying the plaintiffs from 1871 to the 4th of January, 1872, with a quantity of coal from the said colliery.

That at the time of the making of the agreement of the 6th of December, 1871, the Newbridge Colliery was only opened upon one seam of coal, called "the No. 3 seam," and was only partially opened on that seam; that Rowland was anxious to extend the openings in the seam, and had made representations to that effect to the plaintiffs, and that he (Rowland) was short of capital for extending his works, and that, with a comparatively small outlay, the colliery would produce nearly 300 tons of coal a day, and that if a siding could be had on the Taff Vale Railway, near the Taff Vale Ironworks, he (Rowland) would be able to deliver the coal with greater facility and a considerable reduction of cost.

That the plaintiffs were then in a position to consume at the ironworks a much larger quantity of coal than they had previously taken, and were disposed to make an arrangement with Rowland to supply him with capital to enable him to extend his colliery, and also to make an arrangement with the Taff Vale Railway Company for the construction of a siding, provided that Rowland would enter into a contract of sale to the plaintiffs of all the coal which the said colliery would produce, for a lease of five years, provided that the quantity then supplied should not be less than a stated minimum.

That negotiations for an arrangement upon this footing resulted in an agreement, come to at a meeting, between the plaintiffs and Rowland on the 6th of December, 1871, by which they agreed that Rowland should sell to the plaintiffs, and that the plaintiffs should buy the whole of the get of the coal of the No. 3 seam of the said colliery for five years, the quantity not to be less than that then delivered to the Taff Vale Ironworks, unless the coal should fail, at 6s. per ton, provided that the Taff Vale Railway Company would provide a siding to which Rowland should forthwith make a road, and that the plaintiffs should lend to Rowland £1,000 to aid him in opening the colliery and that this agreement was reduced to writing in the form of a pencil memorandum signed by Rowland, and about the same time the plaintiffs agreed with Rowland that, besides the coal of the said No. 3 seam, another vein should be included in the contract, and, at the option of the plaintiff Fothergill, any other vein of coal within the colliery should be included.

That the said agreements were reduced to writing by a memorandum in the form of a letter of the 4th of January, 1872, addressed to Rowland and confirmed by him in writing, and another memorandum subscribed thereto of the 5th of January, 1872, which were as follows:

"Dear Sir: I have been excessively occupied since our interview last month, and have not found time to sit down and write in detail that which we mutually agreed upon beyond the simple sale of coal described in the pencil memorandum we drew up together in the following terms:

"6 Dec. 1871.

"Sold R. F., Esq., M. P., the whole of the get of the No. 3 coal out of the Newbridge Colliery property for five years, the quantity not to be less than at present delivered to his Taff Vale works, unless the coal should fail, at 6s. per ton payment as usual."

"To which I desire now to add that we arranged, when so required, that you would deliver the said coal into our wagons on a siding of the Taff Vale Railway at such a reduction in price as you could obtain off the cost in comparison with the delivery into the Taff Vale works, provided that the Taff Vale Railway Company would provide such siding (which you had not been able to obtain), and to which you would forthwith make a road; in reference to which I am glad to inform you that I have seen Mr. Fisher, and obtained his consent to his company providing the needful siding, a most valuable concession in prospect of the possibly very large quantities of coal you talked of flooding me with. I also promised to lend you £1,000, to aid you in opening and developing the said colliery at the rate of £5 per cent. per annum interest, to be taken in such proportions monthly as you require in exchange for your acceptances at six months' date, all which please confirm, and I remain,

"Yours faithfully,

"Rich. Fothergill."

"5th Jan. 1872.

"It is understood between us that besides the No. 3 coal named herein that the Forest Vach vein is included in the foregoing contract, and, further, that any other vein of coal worked shall be included at the option of Mr. Fothergill or representatives.

"Rich. Fothergill.

"Richd. Rowland."

That in part performance of the said agreement Rowland had commenced to deliver coal from the said colliery to the ironworks; that the plaintiffs had advanced to him the sum of £1,000, which he had employed in extending the colliery; and that the siding was constructed by the Taff Vale Railway Company under the arrangement made with them by one of the plaintiffs.

That after January, 1872, coal of the description yielded by the colliery increased very much in value, and that Rowland had appealed to the plaintiffs to make some modification in the contract, which they had refused, though they had made an allowance by way of gift to the amount of one-third of the contract price; but that no variations in the contract had been assented to by the plaintiffs.

That coal of the description yielded by the colliery had advanced from 6s. to 13s. per ton.

That the plaintiffs had discovered that Rowland, in violation of the terms of his agreement, was selling coal from the said No. 3 seam to other persons than the plaintiffs; and that the deliveries were greatly below the minimum quantities specified in the contract.

That in August, 1873, the plaintiffs discovered that Rowland had entered into an agreement with the defendants Spickett, Price, Bassett, and Meyer, for the sale to them of the colliery; and that such agreement was entered into for the purpose of evading the performance on the part of Rowland of the agreement between the plaintiffs and himself, and of depriving the plaintiffs of their rights in the premises.

The plaintiffs prayed, first, for an injunction to restrain the defendants from selling, assigning, or disposing of or interfering with the colliery, except subject to the agreement between the plaintiffs and Rowland; and from selling, disposing of or interfering with any coal gotten or to be gotten out of the said colliery, except for the purpose of the performance of the agreement; and, secondly, that it might be declared that the plaintiffs were entitled to the whole of the get of the seam of coal No. 3, and of the Forest Vach vein of the colliery, and also, at the option of the plaintiffs, to the whole of the get of any other seam of coal worked at the colliery during the period of five years, upon the terms of the said agreement embodied in the memoranda of the 6th of December, 1871, and the 4th and 5th of January, 1872.

The defendants demurred to the bill.

Sharp & Ullithorne, agents for Simons & Plews, Merthyr Tydvil, for plaintiffs. I. H. Wrentmore, W. Kelly, and Mr. Gosling, for defendants.

SIR G. JESSEL, M. R. I feel no doubt whatever on the question, therefore I think it is my duty to give a decision. I never did approve, when at the bar, and I do not approve now, when on the bench, of the practice of not deciding a substantial question when it is fairly raised between the parties and argued, simply because it is raised by demurrer. It is a great benefit to all parties to have the question in the case speedily and cheaply determined, and the practice of demurring ought, if possible, to be encouraged.

The question is one which I am sorry to have to decide against the plaintiffs. No honest man, whether on the bench or off it, can approve of the conduct of the defendants. The first defendant, Rowland, has entered into a contract bona fide for valuable considerations to sell a quantity of coal to be raised from his mine to the plaintiffs. He has received the advantages of the contract, and because coal has risen in value and he can get a better price elsewhere, he does not choose to perform his contract. Such conduct ought not to meet with the approval of anybody. Then the question I have to determine is, whether the plaintiffs have come to the right court to obtain that which the law will undoubtedly give them, namely, compensation in some shape or other for the loss they have sustained by this breach of contract. It appears to me, as the law now stands, a court of equity cannot give them any relief.

The first question is, what is the contract for? In my view of the contract it is one for the sale of coals, that is, coals gotten, the get of coal, the severed chattel, and it has no relation whatever to a contract for real estate. That point really was not argued by Mr. Fry, although Mr. Marten did touch upon it. I think it must be assumed, therefore, to be a simple contract for the sale of a chattel of a very ordinary description not alleged to be a peculiar coal, or coal that cannot be got elsewhere. On the contrary, as I read the bill, there is coal that can be got elsewhere of the same description, only at a higher price. The result is that the plaintiffs will incur an amount of damage to be measured by the market price which they may have to pay for the coal of the same description as the coal agreed to be supplied by the defendant Rowland.

It is said, however, that, although you can ascertain the market price as regards all the past nondelivery, you cannot ascertain exactly the market price as to future deliveries. To say that you cannot ascertain the damage in a case of breach of contract for the sale of goods, say in monthly deliveries extending over three years (which is the case here, for there are three years unexpired of the contract), is to limit the power of ascertaining damages in a way which would rather astonish gentlemen who practice on what is called the other side of Westminster Hall. There is never considered to be any difficulty in ascertaining such a thing, therefore I do not think it is a case in which damages could not be ascertained at law.

That being so, what is there to distinguish this from any ordinary contract for the sale of goods? We have been told it has some connection with the colliery. I suppose coals must necessarily have connection with a colliery, and it happens that the person who sold the coal to be produced from a given colliery was also at that time the owner of the colliery. I apprehend there is no difficulty about entering into a contract for the sale of coal coming from a particular colliery by persons not owners of that colliery; that is the common practice. The coals not being delivered, and there being no means of obtaining their delivery without compelling the defendant Rowland to raise them, it has been admitted before me that this is a contract of which you cannot obtain a specific performance in a court of equity.

Therefore any relief to be obtained by the plaintiffs in the shape of compensation must be obtained at law, and I do not understand that the plaintiffs, coming here for an injunction which they ask, are willing to abandon their claim to compensation at law in the shape of damages.

Then it is said, assuming this contract to be one which the court cannot specifically perform, it is yet a case in which the court will restrain the defendants from breaking the contract. But I have always felt, when at the bar, a very considerable difficulty in understanding the court on the one hand professing to refuse specific performance because it is difficult to enforce it, and yet on the other hand attempting to do the same thing by a roundabout method. If it is right to prevent the defendant Rowland from selling coal at all, he not having stipulated not to sell coal, but having stipulated to sell all the coal he can raise to somebody who has promised valuable consideration,—why is it not right to compel him to raise it and deliver it? It is difficult to follow the distinction, but I cannot find any distinct line laid down, or any distinct limit which I could seize upon and define as being the line dividing the two classes of cases—that is, the class of cases in which the court, feeling that it has not the power to compel specific performance, grants an injunction to restrain the breach by the contracting party of one or more of the stipulations of the contract, and the class of cases in which it refuses to interfere. I have asked (and I am sure I should have obtained from one or more of the learned counsel engaged in the case every assistance) for a definition. I have not only not been able to obtain the answer, but I have obtained that which altogether commands my assent, namely, that there is no such distinct line to be found in the authorities. I am referred to vague and general propositions,—that the rule is that the court is to find out what it considers convenient, or what will be a case of sufficient importance to authorize the interference of the court at all, or something of that kind.

That being so, and not being able to discover any definite principle on which the court can act, I must follow what Lord St. Leonards says, in Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, is the proper conduct for a judge, in not extending this jurisdiction. I am not, however, entirely without assistance from authority, because it appears to me that this very case has been put, though only by way of illustration, by a very great judge, Lord Cottenham, in Heathcote v. Railway Co., 2 Macn. & G. 112, where he says: "If A. contract with B. to deliver goods at a certain time and place, will equity interfere to prevent A. from doing anything which may or can prevent him from so delivering the goods?" That is the exact case I have to deal with, because I have decided that the contract is a contract for the delivery of goods. Finding the dictum of Lord Cottenham express on the subject, and the plaintiffs' counsel not having been able to produce to me any authority in which there has been such an injunction granted on the sale of goods or any chattel, in a case in which specific performance could not be granted, I think I shall do right in following that authority; and I say, although I say it with much regret, that it is a case in which equity can afford no relief.

With regard to the question of costs, I think it is undesirable to take the technical admission of the facts of the bill, when a person files a demurrer, to be an admission of the truth of the facts against him for the purpose of costs. If there is no remedy at all at law, I think the rule that the costs should follow the result too valuable a one to be tampered with. On these grounds I allow the demurrer, with the usual consequences.

A petition of appeal was presented against this decision, but the case was compromised before it came to a hearing.

DANFORTH et al. v. PHILADELPHIA & CAPE MAY S. L. RY. CO.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1878.

Bill for specific performance. Heard on bill and answer.

J. W. Griggs, for complainants. W. A. House, for defendants.

RUNYON, Ch. The bill is filed to obtain a decree for specific performance, by the defendants, of a contract entered into between the complainants, partners in business, and them, on the 19th of December, 1877, by which the former agreed to construct, equip and finish, for the latter, a single-track, narrow-gauge railroad, and telegraph line in connection therewith, from the terminus of the Camden, Gloucester & Mount Ephraim Railway to high-water mark in the city of Cape May, with stations, engine and freight houses, machine and repair-shops, turn-tables, water-stations, &c., &c., and all necessary terminal facilities, for $2,000,000, payable in the capital stock and first mortgage bonds of the company.

By the contract, the complainants were to complete the work within five months after the bonds were negotiated and sold at a price not less than ninety cents on a dollar of the par value thereof; and it was stipulated that they should not be sold at less than that price without the consent of both parties.

The bill states that the complainants entered on the work, and proceeded with it from the date of the contract to the 20th of February following; that there was, at the latter date, due to them, under the contract, the sum of $40,000, or thereabouts; that they were then entitled to have an estimate made, but the defendants refused to make it, or to pay them, or to carry out the contract, which the complainants allege would be of great value to them if performed; and, further, that the defendants cannot respond in damages for their refusal to carry out the agreement; and that the complainants could profitably dispose of the bonds and stock stipulated for as payment. The bill prays that the defendants may be decreed to specifically perform the contract generally, and, also, that they may be required to make the estimate before mentioned, and deliver bonds and stock to the complainants for the amount which may be found due them thereon.

The defendants' answer admits the contract and declares their willingness to perform it, but alleges their inability to do so by reason of the provisions of an act of the legislature of this state (a supplement to the general railroad law), approved on the 19th of February, 1878. By one of those provisions the provision of the original act requiring that the articles of association should not be filed until at least $2,000 of stock for every mile of the proposed railroad should have been subscribed and ten per cent. paid thereon, was altered so as to require that the entire amount of $2,000 per mile shall be paid to the treasurer of this state, to be repaid by him to the directors or treasurer of the company in the manner specified in the supplement, as the work of constructing the railroad shall progress. By the other, the provision of the original act which authorized the mortgaging of the road, &c., of the company, to secure the payment of their bonds to an amount not exceeding the amount of the paid-up capital stock, was altered by adding a provision that if any person or persons shall issue such bonds to any greater amount than the amount which at the time of such issue shall have been actually paid up on the capital stock of the company, he, she or they shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and, on conviction, be punished by fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment at hard labor for not more than three years, or both, at the discretion of the court. These provisions of the supplement were therein expressly made applicable to corporations already organized under the original act. The defendants state that they have expended all the money received by them on account of their capital stock in the work on the road, and that they are not able to comply with the provisions of the supplement, and that, by the terms of the supplement, their charter is forfeited, by reason of their failure to comply with the provisions of that act.

There are several considerations which forbid the granting of the relief prayed for in this suit. If this court would undertake the performance of such a contract as that stated in the bill, a contract for building and equipping a long line of railroad, building station, freight and engine houses, &c., &c. (and the current and great weight of authority is decidedly against it,—Story, Eq. Jur. § 726; Ross v. Union Pac. R. Co., 1 Woolw. 26, Fed. Cas. No. 12,080; Fallon v. Railroad Co., 1 Dill. 121, Fed. Cas. No. 4,629; South Wales R. Co. v. Wythes, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 880), the disability of the defendants would be a sufficient reason for refusing. Courts of equity will never undertake to enforce specific performance of an agreement where the decree would be a vain or imperfect act. Tobey v. County of Bristol, 2 Story, 800, Fed. Cas. No. 14,065. And the incapacity of the defendant to carry the contract into execution affords a ground of defence in a suit for specific performance. Fry, Spec. Perf. § 658.

In this case the defendants are willing to perform their part of the contract if they can lawfully do so. They have never refused to issue their bonds and stock to the complainants in accordance with the terms of the contract, except because of the provisions of the supplement above referred to, under which they apprehend they may have lost their corporate existence, and by which, if their corporate existence be not lost, their directors and officers who should act in the matter would be liable to severe and ignominious punishment for so doing. P. L. 1878, p. 23. They have not complied with the provisions of the supplement in reference to the amount to be paid in on their capital stock, and have not been able and are not able to do so. Only ten per cent. of the amount of their capital stock has been paid in. Their corporate powers are, according to the supplement, extinct, and the corporation is dissolved. P. L. 1878, p. 22. The complainants, however, insist that the supplement is an unconstitutional law; that it destroys their contract, which existed when it was passed, and which was founded on the faith of the original act; that it deprives them of their vested rights thereunder, and that it should be declared to be unconstitutional, and its provisions, so far as they are subject to that objection, disregarded. But it is in nowise necessary to consider that question; for, if there were no other valid objection, this court would not, under the circumstances of the case, declare that the apprehensions, or doubts at least, of the defendants, as to the validity of the supplement, are wholly groundless, and direct them to proceed, notwithstanding the penalties above mentioned, to issue bonds according to the contract and in violation of the prohibition of the supplement; to subject themselves to indictment for misdemeanor and the consequences of conviction. It is enough that the legislature has forbidden them to issue the bonds to induce this court to refuse to order them to issue them. But, further, there is at least doubt whether the company still has a corporate existence.

Though the court might, if the case were free from these difficulties, direct the defendants to make the estimate of work already done prayed for in the bill (Waring v. Railway Co., 7 Hare, 482), yet, for the considerations already presented, that relief must also be denied.

The bill will be dismissed.

✓ SOUTHERN EXP. CO. v. WESTERN NORTH CAROLINA R. CO.

(99 U. S. 191.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Oct.
1878.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the Western district of North Carolina.

This is a bill in equity, filed June 18, 1875, by the Southern Express Company, a corporation of Georgia, against the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, a corporation of North Carolina, W. A. Smith, and Henry Clews, for the specific performance of a contract entered into December 2, 1865, between the railroad company and the complainant.

The bill alleges that the railroad company was organized for the purpose of constructing a railroad from Salisbury, North Carolina, to a point on the Tennessee line; that it completed that portion of its line between Salisbury and Morganton, and put it in running order; that the road-bed, rolling-stock, &c., became dilapidated during the war, and that the company in 1865 was without the means to repair the road and make it safe for the transportation of passengers and freight; that the company, having been unsuccessful elsewhere, applied to the complainant for a loan or advance of $20,000; that the complainant having agreed to loan or advance that sum in consideration of securing the exclusive privilege of transporting freights over said road as far as Morganton, and of certain other advantages, entered, with the advice and consent of the stockholders of the railroad company, into the following contract with that company:

"This indenture of agreement, made and entered into this second day of December, A. D. eighteen hundred and sixty-five, between the Western North Carolina Railroad Company, as party of the first part, and the Southern Express Company, as party of the second part, witnesseth as follows:

"Whereas the party of the second part has agreed to loan and advance to the party of the first part the sum of twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars upon the notes of said railroad company, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, which sum is to be expended in repairs and equipments for said road. And whereas the party of the first part is desirous of securing the services of an efficient and responsible agent for the transaction of all of the express business over its road, and is willing to provide the requisite facilities for the proper transaction of said express business in the manner and upon the terms hereinafter specified:

"Now, therefore, in consideration of said loan and advance, and the rents, covenants, and agreements hereinafter made and provided, said party of the first part hereby agrees and binds itself to grant to the said party of the second part the necessary privileges and requisite facilities for the transaction of all the express business over the entire length of their road, extending from Salisbury to Morganton, in North Carolina, and furnish such facilities by all its passenger trains running each way over its road as may be necessary to forward without delay all the express matter that may be offered by said party of the second part, and to do all in its power to promote the convenience of said party of the second part in the transaction of its express business, both at way and terminal stations.

"Said party of the second part agrees to load and unload said express matter by its own agents, at its own proper costs and charges, and save harmless said party of the first part against all claims for loss and damage to the express matter of the party of the second part, except that which occurs from the negligence and carelessness of said party of the first part or its agents.

"The said party of the first part agrees to carry free of charge the messengers in charge of express matter and the officers and agents of the said party of the second part passing over the road upon express business. The said party of the second part agrees to pay to the said party of the first part fifty cents per hundred pounds for all express matter carried over the road. An account of the weights of all express matter shall be taken by said party of the first part whenever they shall see fit to do so, and delivered to the agent of the party of the first part, weekly or monthly, as may be desired.

"The accounts for transportation to be made up monthly, and the sum found to be due to said railroad company for transportation, at the rate hereinafter specified, shall be applied monthly toward the payment of said twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars, until the whole sum, with interest, is paid, after which payments for transportation shall be made by said party of the second part monthly in cash.

"This contract shall remain in force for the full term of one year, from the first day of January, eighteen hundred and sixty-six. If the said sum of twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars, with interest thereon, shall not have been repaid to the said second party at the expiration of said one year, this contract shall continue in force for a further period, and until the whole of said twenty thousand ($20,000) dollars, with interest thereon, shall have been repaid. And the said party of the first part hereby covenants and agrees that it will not furnish express privileges over said road to any other parties during the existence of this contract on any more favorable terms than those herein made with the said party of the second part, both as to rate of transportation paid, advance payments, and total amount paid per annum. It is mutually covenanted and agreed by the parties hereto that any other contracts that may now exist, whether verbal or written, for express service between the parties hereto, shall terminate and cease on the thirty-first day of December, eighteen hundred and sixty-five, at which time this contract shall take effect.

"In witness whereof, the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"Tod R. Caldwell,

"Pres't W. N. C. R. R. Co.

"H. B. Plant,

"Pres't Southern Express Company."

The bill then alleges that the $20,000 was paid in compliance with the contract, and that shortly thereafter the complainant entered upon the road, transported freight according to the terms of the contract, kept regular accounts and exhibited them to the company, which were always approved, and it continued to act under said contract until July, 1873; that in 1870 the railroad company conveyed to Tod R. Caldwell and Henry Clews, as joint tenants, and to the survivor of each,—the former of whom has since deceased,—all its real and personal property, including its franchises, in trust, to secure a large number of its bonds then about to be issued; that $1,400,000 of said bonds were sold or hypothecated, and came into the hands of persons unknown to the complainant, but for much less than their value and not by a bona fide sale; that, notwithstanding, the alleged creditors of the company instituted foreclosure proceedings in the circuit court of the United States for the Western district of North Carolina, and in 1873 obtained a decree ordering the sale of all the property of said company; that the defendant, Smith, having in that suit been appointed receiver of the company, forbade the complainant, in July, 1873, from further using the cars of the company, unless upon conditions whereby said contract was virtually surrendered or ignored; that thereupon the complainant was compelled to abandon said railroad, although the money so loaned, with a portion of the interest thereon, is still due and unpaid. It then alleges that the suit is brought with the consent of said court, and with the privilege of making such parties defendant as might be deemed necessary for that purpose; that the trustees in the mortgage to secure the bonds of the railroad company had express notice of the contract when they accepted the trust, and that it was claimed by the complainant as an existing lien; that the substance of said contract had been published separately at the instance of the stockholders of the railroad company, and was well known to its creditors and to the purchasers of its bonds at the time, and especially to the defendant Smith; and that the railroad company having conveyed away its property, and being in part insolvent, the violation of the contract cannot be compensated by any damages which would be recovered at law. The bill therefore prays for a decree compelling the railroad company to specifically perform its contract, and for such other and further relief as the nature and circumstances of the case may require, and for process against the defendants.

The charter of the railroad company granted in February, 1855, is annexed to the bill and made a part thereof. Its twenty-fifth and twenty-sixth sections are as follows:

"Sect. 25. Be it further enacted, that the said company shall have the exclusive right of conveyance, transportation of persons, goods, merchandise, and produce over the said railroad, to be by them constructed, at such charges as may be fixed on by the board of directors.

"Sect. 26. Be it further enacted, that said company may, when they see fit, farm out their right of transportation over said railroad, subject to the rules above mentioned; and the said company and every one who may have received from it the right of transportation of goods, wares, and merchandise over the said railroad, shall be deemed and taken to be a common carrier, as respects all goods, wares, produce, and merchandise intrusted to them for transportation."

At rule-day in July, 1875, the writ of subpoena was returned executed, and the cause continued until the October term, when it was ordered that the commissioners in possession of the road in the Western district of North Carolina, and Howerton, president of the company, be notified to appear and answer or demur to the bill of complaint at rule-day in January, 1876. The commissioners appeared and demurred. The demurrer was sustained and the bill dismissed. The express company then brought the case here.

Clarence A. Seward, for appellant. A. S. Merrimon, for appellee.

SWAYNE, Justice. The bill avers that it was filed against the receiver appointed by the court below, that he was in possession of the railroad, and that the institution of the suit was by the consent of the court. Without this latter fact the bill could not have been filed or maintained. The suit would have been a contempt of the court which had appointed the receiver, and punishable as such. Davis v. Gray, 16 Wall. 203.

The citizenship of the complainant corporation is sufficiently averred. Express Co. v. Kountz, 8 Wall. 342. Such a complainant need not prove its existence, unless the fact is directly put in issue by the defendant. Society for Propagation of Gospel v. Town of Pawlet, 4 Pet. 480.

To the objection that the requisite corporate power of the complainant is not shown, there are two answers. The contract of a corporation is presumed to be infra vires, until the contrary is made to appear. 2 Waite, Act. & Def. 334.

The charter is set out in the record, and forms a part of it. That leaves no room for doubt upon the subject.

Adequate capacity on the part of the railroad company to make the contract is to be presumed in like manner.

No party defendant was necessary but the receiver. He was in the possession of the property and effects of the railroad company, subject to the order of the court, and could have specifically performed the contract, or paid back the money loaned if the court had so directed. The presence of the other parties was immaterial, and the bill might well have been dismissed as to them. Davis v. Gray, supra; Doggett v. Railroad Co., 99 U. S. 72.

The contract between the express company and the railroad company was that the latter should give to the former the necessary facilities for the transaction of all its business upon the road, forward without delay by the passenger trains both ways all the express matter that should be offered, do all in its power to promote the convenience of the express company, both at the way and terminal stations, and carry free of charge the messengers in charge of the express matter, and the officers and agents of the express company passing over the road on express business. The consideration for these stipulations was a loan by the express company to the railroad company of $20,000, to be expended in repairs and equipments for the road, the loan to bear interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, and the payment of fifty cents per hundred pounds for all express matter carried over the road, to be applied in discharge of the loan and interest. The contract was to continue for one year from the first day of January, 1866, and until the principal and interest of the debt should be fully paid. The bill avers that the receiver had refused to carry out the contract, and that the principal of $20,000 and a part of the interest were unpaid.

The enforcement of contracts not relating to realty by a decree for specific performance is not an unusual exercise of equity jurisdiction. Such cases are numerous in both English and American jurisprudence. They proceed upon the ground that under the circumstances a judgment at law would not meet the demands of justice, that it would be less beneficial than relief in equity, that the damages would not be an accurate satisfaction, that their extent could not be exactly shown, or that the pursuit of the legal remedy would be attended otherwise with doubt and difficulty.

Judge Story, after an elaborate examination of the subject, thus lays down the general rule: "The just conclusion in all such cases would seem to be that courts of equity ought not to decline the jurisdiction for a specific performance of contracts whenever the remedy at law is doubtful in its nature, extent, operation, or adequacy." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 728. See, also, Stuyvesant v. Mayor, etc., 11 Paige, 414; Barr v. Lapsley, 1 Wheat. 151; Storer v. Railway Co., 2 Younge & C. 48; Wilson v. Railroad Co., L. R. 9 Eq. 28.

But we need not pursue the subject further, because there is one provision of the contract in this case which is fatal to the relief sought. A court of equity never interferes where the power of revocation exists. Frye, Spec. Perf. 64.

The contract stipulates that after the first year it shall cease upon the payment of the $20,000 and interest. This might be made immediately upon the rendition of the decree. The action of the court would thus become a nullity.

There is another objection to the appellant's case which is no less conclusive.

The road is in the hands of the receiver appointed in a suit brought by the bondholders to foreclose their mortgage. The appellant has no lien. The contract neither expressly nor by implication touches that subject. It is not a license as insisted by counsel. It is simply a contract for the transportation of persons and property over the road. A specific performance by the receiver would be a form of satisfaction or payment which he cannot be required to make. As well might he be decreed to satisfy the appellant's demand by money, as by the service sought to be enforced. Both belong to the lien-holders, and neither can thus be diverted.

The appellant can, therefore, have no locus standi in a court of equity.

Both these objections appear by its own showing. It was, therefore, competent and proper for the court below, sua sponte, to dismiss the bill for the want of equity upon its face. Brown v. Piper, 91 U. S. 37.

Decree affirmed.

(16 Fed. 37.)

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 20, 1883.

In Equity.

A. J. Dittenhoefer, for plaintiff. Howe

BROWN, J. This action was brought in the state court to restrain the defendant, Helen Braham, otherwise known as Lillian Russell, from violating her agreement with the plaintiff by singing during the current season in any other employment than at the plaintiff's theater, which the complaint alleges she is about to do. A preliminary injunction having been obtained at the time of the commencement of the action, the cause was removed by the plaintiff to this court before answer; and the defendant now moves upon affidavits to dissolve the injunction. By the agreement in writing between the parties, the defendant agreed to sing in comic opera in the employment of the plaintiff whenever required during the season of 1882 to 1883, commencing on or about September 1, 1882, at a stipulated weekly salary. By article 1 the agreement provides that "the artist is engaged exclusively for Mr. John McCaull, and during the continuance of this engagement will not perform, sing, dance, or otherwise exercise her talent in theater, concert halls, churches, or elsewhere, either gratuitously or for her remuneration or advantage, or for that of any other person or other theater or establishment (although not thereby prevented from fulfilling her engagement with Mr. McCaull) without having first obtained permission in writing of Mr. McCaull; and for each and every breach of this rule the artist shall forfeit one week's salary, or her engagement, at the option of Mr. McCaull; but such forfeiture of one week's salary shall not be held to debar Mr. McCaull from enforcing the fulfillment of this contract in such a manner as he may think fit."

By article 3 it is provided that "no salaries will be paid for any night or days on which the artist may not be able to perform through illness or other unavoidable cause; and the artist absenting herself, except from illness or other unavoidable cause, will forfeit one week's salary, or her engagement, at the option of Mr. McCaull, and will also be held liable for any loss that may be sustained by Mr. McCaull owing to such absence. Illness, to be accepted as an excuse, must be attested by a medical certificate, which must be delivered to Mr. McCaull or his representative as early as possible, and before the commencement of the performance. Should such absence exceed two weeks, the engagement may be canceled at the option of Mr. McCaull."

The defendant entered upon the performance of her engagement at the Bijou Opera House in this city in September, 1882, with great success, which was continued until prevented from further performance by protracted illness. Having partially recovered, she attempted to renew her appearances, but after three nights' performances, in December, she suffered a relapse from which she did not recover until about the middle of February, 1883.

By the written contract the plaintiff was to furnish all costumes. This was modified, prior to September, by an oral agreement by which the plaintiff was to pay a larger salary and the defendant to furnish her own costumes. Both parties agree as to the modification of the contract to this extent. The defendant contends that in addition to the above the oral contract was further modified by the plaintiff agreeing to pay her weekly salary as at first fixed during the continuance of any illness; that the sum of about $350, paid to her by the plaintiff during her illness, was paid in pursuance of this modification of the contract; and that since the middle of December the plaintiff has refused to continue such payment during that part of her illness, in violation of the agreement as modified.

The plaintiff denies that the modification of the contract included any agreement to pay her during illness, and asserts that the moneys actually paid her while ill were merely advances on account of future salary to be earned, and so expressly stated at the time. Each party sustains its respective claims in this respect by several witnesses. They leave this branch of the subject in so much doubt that I feel obliged to reject it from consideration, without prejudice to either in regard to their mutual claims in respect to it, since neither party made it a ground of terminating the contract.

Up to the time this action was commenced the defendant had given no notice to the plaintiff terminating the agreement; nor had the plaintiff, as he might have done according to the express provision of the agreement, notified the defendant that it was canceled, owing to her absence beyond two weeks. I must, therefore, hold the agreement as still in force. Contracts for the services of artists or authors of special merit are personal and peculiar; and when they contain negative covenants which are essential parts of the agreement, as in this case, that the artists will not perform elsewhere, and the damages, in case of violation, are incapable of definite measurement, they are such as ought to be observed in good faith and specifically enforced in equity. That violation of such covenants will be restrained by injunction, is now the settled law of England. Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604; Montague v. Flockton, L. R. 16 Eq. 189, 199.

The subject was exhaustively considered by Freedman, J., in the case of Daly v. Smith, 49 How. Prac. 150, in whose conclusions, in accordance with the English cases above cited, I fully concur. In the present case it is, however, urged that the remedy by injunction should not be allowed, on the ground that the plaintiff's damages have been liquidated by the first article of the contract above quoted; namely, that "for each and every breach of this rule the artist shall forfeit one week's salary;" and the cases of Barnes v. McAllister, 18 How. Prac. 534; Nessle v. Reese, 29 How. Prac. 382; Mott v. Mott, 11 Barb. 127, 134; and Trenor v. Jackson, 46 How. Prac. 389, are cited in support of this view.

There is no doubt of the general principle that where the damages for the violation of a covenant are either liquidated by the agreement, or may be easily and definitely ascertained, the parties will be left to their remedy at law. But it is clear that in cases of contract like the present, the damages are not capable of being definitely ascertained or measured; and in the cases first above cited, injunctions were for that reason allowed. The only question in this case, therefore, which distinguishes the present agreement from those, is whether the provision for the forfeiture of a week's wages for every violation of article 1 is such a liquidation of the damages as bars the remedy by injunction. In Barnes v. McAllister and in Nessle v. Reese and Mott v. Mott, supra, there was a covenant to pay a specific sum for failure to observe the covenant in these cases; and these sums were held by the court to be strictly liquidated damages.

Where the provision of the contract is in the nature of a penalty, and not liquidated damages, it is well settled that such a provision will not prevent the remedy by injunction to enforce the covenant specifically; and the provision will be construed as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages, where its plain object is to secure a performance of the covenant, and not intended as the price or equivalent to be paid for a nonobservance of it. Howard v. Hopkyns, 2 Atk. 371; Bird v. Lake, 1 Hem. & M. 111; Fox v. Scard, 33 Beav. 327; Sloman v. Walter, 1 Brown, C. C. 418; Jones v. Heavens, 4 Ch. Div. 636.

Whether the language of the contract is to be construed as a penalty or as liquidated damages is to be determined from its language and its presumed intent to be gathered from the circumstances of the parties and the nature of the agreement. "A penalty," says Lord Loughborough, in Hardy v. Martin, 1 Cox, Ch. 26, "is never considered in this court as the price of doing a thing which a man has expressly agreed not to do; but if the real meaning and intent of the contract is that a man should have the power, if he chooses, to do a particular act upon the payment of a certain specified sum, the power to do the act upon the payment of the sum agreed on is part of the express contract between the parties." Vincent v. King, 13 How. Prac. 234-238; Kerr, Inj. 409.

In Coles v. Sims, 5 De Gex, M. & G., Lord

Justice Turner says, upon this point, (p. 1:) "The question in such cases, as I conceive, is, whether the clause is inserted by way of penalty or whether it amounts to a stipulation for liberty to do a certain act on the payment of a certain sum."

That the clause providing for the forfeiture of one week's salary for each violation of this contract was in the nature of a penalty, and designed solely to secure the observance of article 1, is manifest both from the general nature of the employment and the requirements of a manager of opera, as well as the express language of this article; because (1) the stipulation is not for the payment of a certain sum as liquidated damages, but only for the forfeiture of a week's salary; (2) it gives an option to the plaintiff, instead of such forfeiture, to annul the engagement; (3) it declares that such forfeiture shall not disbar the plaintiff from enforcing the fulfillment of this contract in such a manner as he shall think fit, i. e., by any available legal or equitable remedy. As the remedy by injunction is one of the remedies available, this language is equivalent to an express declaration that the provision for the forfeiture of a week's salary for each violation shall not affect his right to a remedy by injunction. This last stipulation would not, indeed, influence the court, provided it was clear that the damages were intended to be liquidated at a specific sum, for which the defendant was to have the option of singing at any other theater. But these several clauses taken together show conclusively that no such thing was intended, and that the sole object was to secure the specific observance of the contract that the defendant should not sing elsewhere; and the plaintiff is therefore entitled to restrain the violation of it. As the season will close on May 15th and the contract then terminate, there are certain equitable conditions which should be observed, and which it is competent for the court, in continuing the injunction, to impose. Russell v. Farley, 105 U. S. 433, 438.

The injunction of this court must not be used directly or indirectly to enforce the collection by the plaintiff of his alleged but disputed claim for previous advances, through the nonpayment of salary hereafter earned, at least until his right is legally adjudicated. (2) Considering the short period remaining, the defendant must not be sent to California, where by the contract she might have been taken without salary en route going and returning; nor, having respect to her precarious health, should she be sent to any very distant point; (3) the plaintiff should furnish satisfactory security for the prompt payment weekly for the defendant's services at the rate of $150 per week, the contract price, from the time the defendant gives notice in writing of her readiness to sing under the contract, so long as she shall continue in readiness to perform her duties.

In case of failure to pay any future salary earned, the defendant may apply, on two days' notice, to the plaintiff's attorneys for the dissolution of this injunction.

An order may be entered continuing the injunction subject to the above provisions and conditions.

NOTE.

Enjoining Employé from Serving Rival of Employer.—The decisions upon the judicial enforcement of the stipulations common between actors, artists, authors, lecturers, or other professional workers and their employers, that the employé shall not exercise his skill and talent for any other person, are not very numerous, and are somewhat conflicting; but they establish the modern general doctrine to be that the employer is not obliged to submit to a breach of the covenant, and content himself with an action for damages, but, in a proper case, may have an injunction restraining the employé from engaging in any rival service; and this, whether compelling the latter to perform his affirmative engagement to labor for his employer is practicable or not. To reconcile the decisions would be difficult, except upon the explanation that, when suits of this nature were first brought, the inadequacy of the action for damages, as a remedy, was not fully perceived; but that, gradually, as one case after another was presented, it became better understood, and equity judges grew more prompt and willing to exercise their jurisdiction on the ground that employers of public performers cannot well be compensated in damages for departures of artists from their establishments. If an actor, continuing to perform for his general employer, according to his engagement, plays on "off nights" for a rival theater, the question how much the receipts of his employer have been diminished by the opportunity given the public of hearing the favorite elsewhere, is too vague and uncertain to be shown by legal proof. And if, as is frequently the case, he withdraws from his first engagement wholly, and devotes himself to the service of a competitor, the question of damages is rendered still more perplexing by the difficulty of showing what profits the deserted manager would have realized had the performances been continued as agreed; and the latter needs, also, to have some indemnity, difficult to be estimated in money, for his liability to refund for tickets or boxes sold in advance, and for his loss of prestige through failure of his announced entertainments. Obviously courts of justice cannot compel public performers or members of the professions to perform specific services they have promised; there are no means at the command of a tribunal for compelling a person to act, sing, speak, or write, nor is there any standard for determining whether one has done so in good faith and with his best skill. The result, therefore, is that a properly-framed stipulation, in a contract for services of this description, forbidding the employé to serve elsewhere, may be enforced by injunction. Such injunctions are equally obtainable under the codes of procedure, upon complaint in a civil action; or, in states adhering to the old practice, upon bill in equity; or, in the United States circuit court, sitting in equity, if the parties are citizens of different states.

In what cases the fact that the contract of the parties, by liquidating the damages or otherwise, gives the employer a better remedy by action than usual, precludes his resort to injunction, is the question particularly discussed in the text, and nothing need be added to Judge Brown's able and lucid exposition of the principles governing that branch of the subject. This note will indicate the development of the general power of equity to enjoin in these cases.

Early English decisions went upon the theory that although an independent, simple covenant not to undertake specified services may be enforced, when reasonable and consistent with public policy, yet in a contract between A. and B. that B. shall act or sing, etc., for A., and shall not perform for any one else, the negative clause is merely incidental to the affirmative; and unless the case is one in which the court can enforce the affirmative stipulation it ought not to enjoin a proposed breach of the negative. These decisions, therefore, generally denied A.'s prayer for an injunction to restrain B. from performing in the employment of C., unless some special ground of equitable jurisdiction over the case existed. The following are illustrative cases: Price agreed to prepare exchequer reports for Clarke to publish, without, however, engaging not to write for any one else. The lord chancellor refused an injunction, saying that as he had no jurisdiction to compel Price, directly, to write reports for Clarke, he ought not to do so indirectly, by forbidding him to write for any one else. Clarke v. Price (1819) 2 Wils. Ch. 157. A similar application was denied for the same reason, where the engagement of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge with Baldwin's publishing firm was simply to furnish them with certain maps and charts for publication, a thing which the court had no means of compelling directly. Baldwin v. Society (1838) 9 Sim. 393. The actor Kean was advertised to play at Drury Lane theater, while there was yet 10 days unexpired of a prior engagement at Covent Garden. The vice-chancellor denied the application of the Covent Garden proprietors to enjoin him, for the same reason, viz., that there was no jurisdiction to compel him to perform his 10 days' service. Kemble v. Kean (1829) 6 Sim. 333. Upon examination of a special agreement for mercantile services of defendant, containing a stipulation forbidding his working for any other house, the affirmative stipulations of the contract were pronounced too vague and too onerous towards the employé to allow of decreeing a specific performance, and the court would not enjoin the breach of the negative covenant alone. Kimberley v. Jennings (1836) 6 Sim. 340.

Upon the other hand, the case of Morris v. Colman (1812) 18 Ves. 437, illustrates the principle that a covenant not to serve may be enforced by injunction where other facts give equitable jurisdiction of the controversy. Colman, noted as a dramatist, became manager of the Haymarket theater, under an agreement in the nature of a copartnership, which contained a clause restraining him from writing dramatic pieces for any other theater. In a suit which arose between the parties interested in the management, the validity of this clause was questioned before Lord Chancellor Eldon. He pronounced it valid and enforceable, it being between partners, and being neither contrary to public policy nor unreasonable as between the parties. The decision has generally been explained in later cases on the ground that the stipulation was one of several in an agreement of copartnership, and that equity has jurisdiction of disputes among partners, though this explanation has been questioned. 2 Phill. 597.

Early American decisions ran in the wake of the English; our courts did not deny the jurisdiction, but were loth to exercise it. De Riva-folini, while manager of the Italian theater in New York, engaged Corsetti as first bass in operas, the latter agreeing not to make use of his talents in any other theater. But before the opening of the season Corsetti was announced to sail for Cuba, to perform there under another manager. De Riva-folini then sought an injunction, (and ne exeat,) which Chancellor Walworth refused, on the ground that under the circumstances the application was premature, for before commencement of the actor's engagement the manager could not have a right of action. On the general question he said, in effect, that while it is theoretically proper that "a bird that can sing and will not sing must be made to sing," yet there is an obstacle to making a vocalist sing by order of the court of chancery, in the fact that no officer of the court has that perfect knowledge of the Italian language, or possesses that exquisite sensibility in the auricular nerve, which is necessary to the understanding and enjoyment of Italian opera; and it would be difficult for a master to determine whether a defendant sang in faithful performance of his engagement, or ascertain what effect the coercion might produce upon his singing, especially in the livelier airs. De Riva-finoli v. Corsetti (1833) 4 Paige, 264. Similar considerations led Edwards, J., to refuse a similar application in Sanquirico v. Benedetti, 1 Barb. 314.

The comedian Ingersoll agreed with Hamblin, the manager of the Bowery theater in New York, to play for him for three years, also, not to act except for Hamblin during the term; but an injunction was refused because there was no ground of jurisdiction over the affirmative part of the agreement, while the negative was a mere matter between employer and employé. Hamblin v. Dinneford (1835) 2 Edw. Ch. 529. When Burton, the famous comedian of a generation ago, was manager of Front Street theater, Baltimore, he bargained with Burke to withdraw Mrs. Burke's services from the employment of Manager Marshall and bring her to join Burton's company. Marshall then sued for an injunction, which was issued below. On appeal the court held that either of three facts shown, viz., there was no express restrictive clause in the contract between the Burkes and complainant; complainant was prosecuting an action at law; and Mrs. Burke's engagement, if any, would be void as that of a feme covert,—was enough to defeat the suit. Burton v. Marshall (1846) 4 Gill, 487. De Pol v. Sohlke (1869) 7 Rob. Ecc. 280, was decided after Lumley v. Wagner (1 De Gex, M. & G. 604), yet does not mention it, but takes the older doctrine for granted. The opinion assumes, however, that irreparable damage to follow from a breach of a negative covenant may be ground of equitable jurisdiction, and the judge refused to enjoin the danseuse Sohlke from performing for other employers, not for want of power, but because, as the plaintiffs had not a theater in operation in which they could use her services, therefore they could not be irreparably damaged by her dancing elsewhere for the time being. Thus American as well as English courts, down to the middle of our century, were unwilling to enjoin an employé's breach of a collateral promise not to serve elsewhere, unless the affirmative engagement were a proper subject-matter of equitable relief.

Development of the Modern Doctrine.—Since about 1850 a broader and more liberal position has been taken. An advance was distinctly made in Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phill. 52, and Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Sim. 88, (both 1846,) in which the rule adverse to enforcing a negative stipulation was distinctly questioned and limited; though these were not cases of professional services, but of contracts for exclusive employment in mercantile duties. The circumstances of a controlling decision, Lumley v. Wagner, which soon followed them, were that Manager Lumley engaged Mlle. Johanna Wagner to sing at Her Majesty's Theater, London, for three months, in certain specified operas, at a weekly salary of £100. The agreement, as originally signed, did not in so many words forbid her from singing for any other employer; but a few days afterwards the manager objected to the omission, and Mlle. Wagner's agent then added an article, saying: "Mlle. Wagner engages herself not to use her talents at any other theater, nor in any concert or reunion, public or private, without the written authorization of Mr. Lumley." Notwithstanding this, she did accept (for a higher salary, it was said) an engagement from Manager Gye to sing at the Italian opera, Covent Garden, and Lumley sued for an injunction. It was granted below. Lumley v. Wagner, 5 De Gex

& S. 485. On appeal the familiar objection was urged that equity will not enjoin the breach of a negative covenant where it cannot decree performance of the affirmative one to which it is incident. 6 Sim. 333; Id. 340; 3 Macn. & G. 393. But Lord Chancellor St. Leonards said that when the reason why the court could not decree specific performance is not that the plaintiff is not entitled to it, but merely the want of means to compel the defendant to perform, he thought the court need not on that account refrain from doing what was within its power, viz., forbidding a performance which will violate the contract. To the objection that there was a remedy at law by action for damages, the lord chancellor replied that such remedy was no better than exists upon covenants not to practice as attorney, surgeon, etc., within certain limits, which are often enforced by injunction. Another objection was that the promise not to sing elsewhere was not in the original agreement; but the chancellor said that the two papers were not independent, but were in effect one contract; and that even if the stipulation not to sing elsewhere had never been made in writing, he thought it was implied in the original contract; in other words, singing for Mr. Gye was a breach of the spirit and meaning of the contract to sing for Mr. Lumley. Another objection was that the injunction would be mischievous, because it would prevent a popular artist from singing at one theater, while the court could not promote her performing at another; hence the tendency would be to prevent the public from hearing her anywhere; but the chancellor said that the artist had no right to complain on this ground; the injunction would merely forbid her doing what she had engaged not to do. The temporary injunction was, therefore, continued. Lumley v. Wagner (1852) 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604; 13 Eng. Law & Eq. 252. The opinion embodies an elaborate review of the previous English cases on the extent to which equity may go in enjoining breach of negative covenants of various kinds; and the decision has been generally followed in both countries as establishing the jurisdiction to enforce contracts not to serve in public performances or intellectual work.

A firm of French photographers, Fredricks & Co., employed Constant Mayer as "artist painter" for three years, at an annual salary, to retouch proofs in oil at their New York house, and he engaged not to work for any one else; yet he left them and engaged with Gurney. The question whether the court could grant an injunction was decided in their favor, the judge saying that this remedy is not applicable to all restrictive covenants, for many may be protected by action for damages; but contracts for employment of a great actor, or for services which involve exercise of high powers of mind peculiar to the one person, cannot be treated by ordinary rules, but require the special remedy of injunction. Fredricks v. Mayer (1857) 13 How. Prac. 566. But, on the merits of the application under the particular circumstances, the judge denied it; and this was affirmed in Fredricks v. Mayer, 1 Bosw. 227.

Annetti Galletti agreed to dance at the Broadway Music Hall, New York, for six months at a weekly salary, and to "exercise her utmost abilities for the promotion of the exhibition." But the agreement did not contain an express clause forbidding her to perform elsewhere; and on account of this omission the employer's motion for an injunction was denied. Butler v. Galletti (1861) 21 How. Prac. 465.

Hayes, manager of the Olympic theater in New York, engaged Willio to play at the Olympic for three months, and "not to perform at any other establishment," etc. After playing two months, Willio accepted an offer of a higher salary from a Boston theater. An injunction was granted, the court mentioning, with approval, the modern doctrine that a definite contract by an actor not to perform at any other theater than his employer's may be enforced; and saying that this remedy is not impaired by the Code of Procedure. Hayes v. Willio (1871) 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 167.

Montague, manager of the Globe theater, London, engaged Flockton to act at the Globe, without exacting an express stipulation that he should not act elsewhere. But the vice-chancellor said that such a stipulation was implied. An engagement to perform for a definite term at one theater involves an engagement not to perform during the term at any other theater. When a person agrees to act at a particular theater, he agrees not to act anywhere else as plainly as if a negative clause were inserted. Montague v. Flockton (1873) L. R. 16 Eq. Cas. 189; 28 Law J. (N. S.) 581. And the same opinion was expressed, obiter, in Fechter v. Montgomery, 33 Beav. 22, where the suit was by Fechter as manager; and, ex parte, in Webster v. Dillon, 3 Jur. (N. S.) 432.

Manager Daly engaged Fanny Morant Smith to play at his theater in New York city during the seasons of 1874, 1875, and 1876, the contract containing a stipulation that she should not act during the term of the contract at any other New York city theater without his written consent; and that if she should attempt to do so, the plaintiff might, "by legal process, or otherwise, restrain her from so performing on payment to her, during such restraint," of one-fourth her salary under the contract. She, however, allowed herself to be advertised to play at a rival establishment, the Union-square theater, and he brought suit for an injunction. The New York superior court pronounced the stipulation not to perform, valid, and proper to be enforced by injunction; saying that, although the clause as to plaintiff's restraining a breach on paying a quarter salary could not give jurisdiction, yet, as the court had jurisdiction without it, the clause might be regarded as a guide in fixing the terms of the injunction. Therefore, the actress was enjoined from playing within the city, provided the manager should punctually pay to her one-quarter of her agreed salary. Daly v. Smith (1874) 49 How. Prac. 150. The opinion has been commended for its review of the authorities.

For other cases in which the modern doctrine (of Lumley v. Wagner) has been incidentally recognized of discussed, and applied in a way not aiding materially to support it, see Mapleson v. Bentham, 20 Wkly. Rep. 176, where the vice-chancellor denied an application by Mapleson, lessee of the Royal Italian Opera, to enjoin his first tenor from singing elsewhere; Wolverhampton, etc., Ry. Co. v. London, etc., Ry. Co., L. R. 16 Eq. Cas. 433, involving an agreement relative to use of a railroad; and Manufacturing Co. v. Cook, Bost. Law Rep. 547, in which an employé of a manufacturing company was enjoined from breaking his covenant with his employers that he would not for five years disclose their secrets or engage with any other employer; with which latter case compare Estcourt v. Estcourt Hop Essence Co., 32 Law T. (N. S.) 80; reversing same case 31 Law T. (N. S.) 567; Gower v. Andrew, 14 Cent. Law J. 50; and Deming v. Chapman, 11 How. Prac. 382. Judge Lowell's opinion in Singer Sewing-machine Co. v. Union Button-hole, etc., Co., 1 Holmes, 253, is an instructive discussion of the application of the doctrine to ordinary mercantile contracts, in which a promisor agrees not to deal with any other than the promisee; with which case compare Bickford v. Davis, 11 Fed. 549, and Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132. See, also, a note by E. H. Bennett, to Bowen v. Hall, 20 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 578, 587. The suggestion made at the close of this note, that, since modern equity enjoins a breach of a contract not to reveal secrets of business (9 Hare, 241; 9 Eng. Law & Eq. 182), of a contract not to write a particular description of book (2 Sim. & S. 1; 18 Ves. 437), of a contract not to practice a particular trade or calling (125 Mass. 258; 16 Vt. 176; 22 Law Rep. 693; 5 Jur. [N. S.] 976; 15 Sim. 88), although in either case the injured party could maintain an action for damages, there is no good reason for refusing an injunction to forbid breaking a contract for exclusive professional services, is forcible and sound. A curious German case is recounted in 26 Alb. Law J. 3. Cases involving a claim of the artist that the manager first broke the contract by assigning the artist to a part or position less desirable than that which the contract assured, or by failing to give due opportunity for appearances, are: Daly v. Smith, 49 How. Prac. 150, Roserie v. Kiralfy, 12 Phila. 209, and De Pol v. Sohlke, 7 Rob. Ecc. 280.

Must there be an Express Negative Contract?

—Several English cases support the view that an engagement not to serve elsewhere is fairly to be implied from a contract, in general terms, to perform under one manager or at one establishment. But American judges have generally refused to interfere unless there were an express stipulation forbidding the service sought to be enjoined. In other words, in this country a simple engagement to serve leaves the employé at liberty to take other service, provided he faithfully performs the first engagement. Burton v. Marshall, 4 Gill, 487; Butler v. Galletti, 21 How. Prac. 465; Wallace v. De Young, 98 Ill. 638. But compare Manufacturing Co. v. Cook, Bost. Law Rep. 547, 549.

Form of a Restrictive Covenant.—The restrictive clause may well be drawn in the following form—making variations appropriate to the circumstances of the particular case:

And it is further agreed, in consideration of the premises, that the party of the second part (the actor, artist, or other employé) will not, during the term of this agreement, exercise his professional skill and talents as an actor (or artist, etc.) in public, (within the city of New York, or otherwise state the limits to which the restriction is intended to be confined; and the courts are more willing to enforce these restrictions when the locality is limited), either for compensation or gratuitously, and either upon his own account or for another employer or establishment, without the consent in writing of the party of the first part first obtained, under pain of injunction, action for damages, or any other available judicial remedy: provided, however, that the party of the second part may at any time and as often as he thinks fit perform gratuitously at any entertainment charitably given for the burial expenses and relief of the family of a deceased actor, (or otherwise state explicitly any right which the actor desires to reserve.)

Procedure.—Several of the cases indicate that it is proper to join the second employer as co-defendant, and to draw the injunction so as in terms to forbid him to employ the chief defendant, as well as prohibit the latter from performing. Clarke v. Price, 2 Wils. Ch. 157; Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604; Burton v. Marshall, 4 Gill, 487; Hamblin v. Dinneford, 2 Edw. Ch. 528. Whether the practitioner may have a re exeat as well as injunction, see De Rivafinoli v. Corsetti, 4 Paige, 264; Sanquirico v. Benedetti, 1 Barb. 315; Hayes v. Willio, 11 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 167. What action lies in behalf of an injured manager or other employer against a rival or competitor for inducing artists of his company or employés in his establishment to leave his service, see Bowen v. Hall, 20 Am. L. Reg. (N. S.) 578, and note, Id. 587.

BENJAMIN VAUGHN ABBOTT.

New York, N. Y.

CLARKE v. PRICE.

Cases in Chancery. July 21, 22, 1819.

The bill, filed the 15th of June, 1819, stated that in 1814 the defendant George Price, Esq., proposed to compose and write reports of cases argued and determined in the court of exchequer; and the plaintiffs entered into a treaty with him as to the terms upon which the same should be printed and published; and that on the 27th of April, 1814, the following agreement was signed by him: "Memorandum: It is agreed between George Price, Esq., and William Clarke and Sons, as follows: Mr. Price undertakes to compose and write the cases in the court of exchequer, commencing with Easter term, 1814, and to be published periodically; the said William Clarke and Sons to be at the charge of all expenses of paper, printing and advertising, which expenses, when discharged, to divide the profits of the said work equally (that is to say), one moiety to the said George Price, the other to the said William Clarke and Sons; all accounts to be adjusted at Christmas in every year, at the customary trade price and commission: And it is further agreed that Messrs. Clarke shall be at liberty to relinquish the undertaking should they think it advisable."

The bill further stated that, in pursuance of the agreement, Mr. Price composed and wrote divers reports of cases argued and determined in the court of exchequer, and that the plaintiffs printed and published them at their own costs and charges, periodically and in parts; that the first volume consisted of three parts, the first being published in August, 1814, the second in May, 1815, and the third in March, 1816; that on the 2d of March, 1816, a variation in the agreement was made between the plaintiffs and Mr. Price, and that a memorandum thereof was made in writing and signed by Mr. Price, in the words following: "March 2d, 1816. Memorandum of agreement between George Price and William Clarke & Sons: Whereas, by an agreement bearing date the 27th of April, 1814, between the above parties, it was there stipulated that Mr. Price should take the reports in the exchequer, and Messrs. Clarke should print the same, and divide the profits between the respective parties: And whereas the first volume of the Reports in the Court of Exchequer has been printed and published by the said George Price and William Clarke & Sons: And whereas the said George Price is desirous of selling all his copyright and interest in the first volume: In consideration of which, the said William Clarke & Sons agree to give, and the said George Price agrees to accept, of the sum of £166. And the said George Price further agrees to give any further assignment of the copyright, if required from him by the said William Clarke & Sons." That, in pursuance of the second agreement, the plaintiff duly paid to Mr. Price the £166. That in further pursuance of the agreement of the 27th of April, 1814, Mr. Price continued to write and compose reports of cases argued and determined in the court of exchequer; and that before the publication of the first part of the second volume, and on or about the 11th of November, 1816, a further agreement was made between the plaintiffs and Mr. Price, and a memorandum thereof made as follows: "November 11th, 1816. Memorandum of agreement between George Price, Esq., and William Clarke & Sons: Mr. Price agrees to the following terms for writing and composing the second volume of his Reports in the Exchequer, sale of his copyright, and interest in the said volume; Messrs. Clarke, for the considerations above, to pay to Mr. Price, within one month after the publication of each part, the sum of £6 10s. for each sheet of sixteen pages royal octavo, and in the same proportion for any less quantity than a sheet; Mr. Price to be allowed the sum of £2 on each part for corrections; all above that sum to be paid by Mr. Price, and deducted out of the payment for each part; Mr. Price to give a further assignment, if required, at Messrs. Clarke's expense."

The bill further stated that, in pursuance of the agreements, Mr. Price composed and wrote a second volume of reports of cases argued and determined in the court of exchequer, and which the plaintiffs, at their expense, printed and published in four parts, the first part on the 20th of January, 1817, the second on the 23rd of April, 1817, the third on the 1st of June, and the fourth on the 13th of September, 1817; and that the plaintiffs duly paid the sums of money due to Mr. Price for the copyright of the second volume, according to the three memorandums of agreement. That in June, 1817, the plaintiffs and Mr. Price agreed to make a further variation in the terms of the agreement of the 27th of April, 1814, and on the 19th of June, 1817, the following memorandum was signed: "London, June 19th, 1817. Memorandum: Mr. Price agrees with Messrs. Clarke to receive for his interest in the agreement for the exchequer reports, dated 27th of April, 1814, commencing at the third volume, the sum of £7 per sheet, and £3 per part for corrections; all above that sum to be paid by Mr. Price, and if under £3 the difference to be paid to Mr. Price until the sale shall exceed a thousand, but not to apply to any reprints above that number of the parts already published or to be. Mr. Price agrees to give any further assignment of the copyright and future interest to Messrs. Clarke, at their expense."

The bill further stated that in pursuance of the agreements of the 27th of April, 1814, and the 19th of June, 1817, Mr. Price wrote and composed, and the plaintiffs printed and published, at their expense, the third volume, consisting of four parts, and also two parts of the fourth volume, at the times specified in the bill, and that they had paid to Mr. Price the sums which by the agreements were due to him in respect of the third volume, and also divers sums on account of the fourth volume.

The bill further stated that Mr. Price had made some contract with the other defendants, Brooke and Sweet, by which he had bound himself to write and compose new volumes of reports of cases argued and determined in the court of exchequer, and in the exchequer chamber, in order and to the intent that the same might be printed and published by Brooke and Sweet; and the plaintiffs insisted that they were entitled to have an assignment duly made to them of all the copyright in such of the reports as he had written and composed, and to be the printers and publishers, and to have an assignment made to them, of the copyright of all such of the said reports as he shall hereafter write and compose, upon making to him such payments as he is entitled to by virtue of the agreements of the 27th of April, 1814, and the 19th of June, 1817.

The bill prayed that the defendant, Mr. Price, might be decreed specifically to perform the said agreements expressed in the said memorandum by permitting the plaintiffs to print and publish the reports of cases in the court of exchequer, so long as he should continue to compose and write the same, upon the terms agreed upon in the said memorandums, respectively, and delivering to the plaintiffs the manuscripts of said reports for that purpose, and by duly making and executing to the plaintiffs an assignment of the copyright of such parts of the said work as had been published, and should thereafter be written and composed, the plaintiffs being ready to pay to him such sums of money as should be justly due to him; also praying an injunction to restrain Mr. Price from printing or publishing, or employing the other defendants, or any other person or persons than the plaintiffs, to print and publish the fifth or any subsequent volume or part of the same work which Mr. Price should thereafter compose and write, and to restrain the other defendants, Brooke and Sweet, from printing and publishing the said work so written and composed, or to be written and composed, or any part thereof.

The answers submitted that, on the true construction of the agreements, Mr. Price was not bound to employ the plaintiffs as the publishers of all future reports to be written by him; that the plaintiffs were informed in October, 1818, of the contract between Mr. Price and the other defendants; that on the 1st of April, 1819, the work was advertised, as being about to be published, and that the defendants had now printed a considerable part of the fifth volume, and had thereby incurred great expense; and that the plaintiffs, having suffered such expense to be incurred, were not entitled to the assistance of the court.

An injunction having been obtained ex parte, on the filing of the bill and on affidavit, a motion was now made to dissolve it.

Mr. Wetherell, J. Wilson, and Mr. Price, for defendants Price and Sweet. Mr. Heald and Mr. Ching, for defendant Brooke. Mr. Shadwell, for plaintiffs.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. The case of Morris v. Colman is essentially different from the present. In that case, Morris, Colman, and other persons were engaged in a partnership in the Haymarket Theater, which was to have continuance for a very long period, as long indeed as the theater should exist. Colman had entered into an agreement which I was very unwilling to enforce,—not that he would write for the Haymarket Theater, but that he would not write for any other theater. It appeared to me that the court could enforce that agreement by restraining him from writing for any other theater. The court could not compel him to write for the Haymarket Theater, but it did the only thing in its power,—it induced him indirectly to do the one thing by prohibiting him from doing another. There was an express covenant on his part contained in the articles of partnership. But the terms of the prayer of this bill do not solve the difficulty; for, if this contract is one which the court will not carry into execution, the court cannot indirectly enforce it by restraining Mr. Price from doing some other act. This is an agreement which expressly provides that Mr. Price shall write and compose reports of cases to be published by the plaintiffs. In Morris v. Colman, there was a decree directing the partnership to be carried on. It could not be put an end to, and it was the duty of the parties to interfere; but I have no jurisdiction to compel Mr. Price to write reports for the plaintiffs. I cannot, as in the other case, say that I will induce him to write for the plaintiffs by preventing him from writing for any other person, for that is not the nature of the agreement. The only means of enforcing the execution of this agreement would be to make an order compelling Mr. Price to write reports for the plaintiffs, which I have not the means of doing. If there be any remedy in this case it is at law. If I cannot compel Mr. Price to remain in the court of exchequer for the purpose of taking notes, I can do nothing. I cannot indirectly, and for the purpose of compelling him to perform the agreement, compel him to do something which is merely incidental to the agreement. It is also quite clear that there is no mutuality in this agreement. I am of opinion that I have no jurisdiction in this case.

Injunction dissolved.

The bill was afterwards dismissed, with costs, for want of prosecution.

LUMLEY v. WAGNER.

(1 De Gex, M. & G. 604.)

The Lord Chancellor, May 22, 26, 1852.

The bill in this suit was filed on the 22d April, 1852, by Benjamin Lumley, the lessee of her Majesty's Theatre, against Johanna Wagner, Albert Wagner, her father, and Frederick Gye, the lessee of Covent Garden Theatre; it stated that in November, 1851, Joseph Bacher, as the agent of the defendants Albert Wagner and Johanna Wagner, came to and concluded at Berlin an agreement in writing in the French language, bearing date the 9th November, 1851, and which agreement being translated into English was as follows:

"The undersigned Mr. Benjamin Lumley, possessor of her Majesty's Theatre at London, and of the Italian Opera at Paris, of the one part, and Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner cantatrice of the Court of his Majesty the King of Prussia, with the consent of her father, Mr. A. Wagner, residing at Berlin of the other part, have concerted and concluded the following contract: First, Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner binds herself to sing three months at the theatre of Mr. Lumley, her Majesty's, at London, to date from the 1st of April, 1852 (the time necessary for the journey comprised therein), and to give the parts following: 1st. Romeo, Montecchi; 2nd. Fides, Prophète; 3rd. Valentine, Huguenots; 4th. Anna, Don Juan; 5th. Alice, Robert le Diable; 6th. An opera chosen by common accord. Second. The three first parts must necessarily be, 1st, Romeo, 2nd, Fides, 3rd, Valentine; these parts once sung, and then only she will appear, if Mr. Lumley desires it, in the three other operas mentioned aforesaid. Third. These six parts belong exclusively to Mademoiselle Wagner, and any other cantatrice shall not presume to sing them during the three months of her engagement. If Mr. Lumley happens to be prevented, by any cause soever, from giving these operas, he is nevertheless held to pay Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner the salary stipulated lower down for the number of her parts as if she had sung them. Fourth. In the case where Mademoiselle Wagner should be prevented by reason of illness from singing in the course of a month as often as it has been stipulated, Mr. Lumley is bound to pay the salary only for the parts sung. Fifth, Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner binds herself to sing twice a week during the run of the three months; however if she herself was hindered from singing twice in any week whatever, she will have the right to give at a later period the omitted representation. Sixth, If Mademoiselle Wagner fulfilling the wishes of the direction, consent to sing more than twice a week in the course of three months, this last will give to Mademoiselle Wagner 50£ sterling for each representation extra. Seventh, Mr. Lumley engages to pay

Mademoiselle Wagner a salary of 400£ sterling per month, and payment will take place in such manner that she will receive 100£ sterling each week. Eighth, Mr. Lumley will pay by letters of exchange to Mademoiselle Wagner at Berlin, the 15th of March, 1852, the sum of 300£ sterling, a sum which will be deducted from her engagement in his retaining 100£ each month. Ninth, In all cases except that where a verified illness would place upon her a hindrance, if Mademoiselle Wagner shall not arrive in London eight days after that from whence dates her engagement, Mr. Lumley will have the right to regard the nonappearance as a rupture of the contract, and will be able to demand an indemnification. Tenth, In the case where Mr. Lumley should cede his enterprise to another, he has the right to transfer this contract to his successor, and in that case Mademoiselle Wagner has the same obligations and the same rights towards the last as towards Mr. Lumley.

Johanna Wagner,
"Albert Wagner."

"Berlin, the 9th November, 1851."

The bill then stated, that in November, 1851, Joseph Bacher met the plaintiff in Paris, when the plaintiff objected to the agreement as not containing a usual and necessary clause, preventing the defendant Johanna Wagner from exercising her professional abilities in England without the consent of the plaintiff, whereupon Joseph Bacher, as the agent of the defendants Johanna Wagner and Albert Wagner, and being fully authorized by them for the purpose, added an article in writing in the French language to the agreement, and which, being translated into English, was as follows:

"Mademoiselle Wagner engages herself not to use her talents at any other theatre, nor in any concert, or reunion, public or private, without the written authorization of Mr. Lumley.

Dr. Joseph Bacher,

"For Mademoiselle Johanna Wagner, and authorized by her."

The bill then stated that the defendants J. and A. Wagner subsequently made another engagement with the defendant F. Gye, by which it was agreed that the defendant J. Wagner should, for a larger sum than that stipulated by the agreement with the plaintiff, sing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, and abandon the agreement with the plaintiff. The bill then stated that the defendant F. Gye had full knowledge of the previous agreement with the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff had received a protest from the defendants J. and A. Wagner, repudiating the agreement on the allegation that the plaintiff had failed to fulfill the pecuniary portion of the agreement.

The bill prayed that the defendants Johanna Wagner and Albert Wagner might be restrained from violating or committing any breach of the last article of the agreement; that the defendant Johanna Wagner might be restrained from singing and performing or singing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, or at any other theatre or place without the sanction or permission in writing of the plaintiff during the existence of the agreement with the plaintiff; and that the defendant Albert Wagner might be restrained from permitting or sanctioning the defendant Johanna Wagner singing and performing or singing as aforesaid; that the defendant Frederick Gye might be restrained from accepting the professional services of the defendant Johanna Wagner as a singer and performer or singer at the said Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, or at any other theatre or place, and from permitting her to sing and perform or to sing at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, during the existence of the agreement with the plaintiff, without the permission or sanction of the plaintiff.

The answer of the defendants A. and J. Wagner attempted to show that Joseph Bach-er was not their authorized agent, at least for the purpose of adding the restrictive clause, and that the plaintiff had failed to make the stipulated payment by the time mentioned in the agreement. The plaintiff having obtained an injunction from the vice chancellor Sir James Parker on the 9th May, 1852, the defendants now moved by way of appeal before the lord chancellor¹ to discharge his honor's order.

Mr. Bethell, Mr. Malins, and Mr. Martindale, in support of the appeal motion. Mr. Bacon and H. Clarke, contra, in support of the injunction.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. The question which I have to decide in the present case arises out of a very simple contract, the effect of which is, that the defendant Johanna Wagner should sing at her Majesty's Theatre for a certain number of nights, and that she should not sing elsewhere (for that is the true construction) during that period. As I understand the points taken by the defendants' counsel in support of this appeal they in effect come to this, namely, that a court of equity ought not to grant an injunction except in cases connected with specific performance, or where the injunction being to compel a party to forbear from committing an act (and not to perform an act), that injunction will complete the whole of the agreement remaining unexecuted.

I have then to consider how the question stands on principle and on authority, and in so doing I shall observe upon some of the cases which have been referred to and commented upon by the defendants in support of their contention. The first was that of Martin v. Nutkin, 2 P. Wms. 266, in which the court issued an injunction restraining an act from being done where it clearly could not have granted any specific performance; but then it was said that that case fell within one of the exceptions which the defendants admit are proper cases for the interference of the court, because there the ringing of the bells, sought to be restrained, had been agreed to be suspended by the defendant in consideration of the erection by the plaintiffs of a cupola and clock, the agreement being in effect the price stipulated for the defendant's relinquishing bell-ringing at stated periods; the defendant having accepted the benefit, but rejected the corresponding obligation, Lord Macclesfield first granted the injunction which the lords commissioners, at the hearing of the cause, continued for the lives of the plaintiffs. That case therefore, however it may be explained, as one of the exceptional cases, is nevertheless a clear authority showing that this court has granted an injunction prohibiting the commission of an act in respect of which the court could never have interfered by way of specific performance.

The next case referred to was that of Barret v. Blagrove, 5 Ves. 555, which came first before Lord Loughborough, and afterwards before Lord Eldon, 6 Ves. 104. There a lease had originally been granted by the plaintiffs, the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens, of an adjoining house, under an express covenant that the lessee would not carry on the trade of a victualler or retailer of wines, or generally, any employment that would be to the damage of the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens. An under-lease having been made to the defendants, who were violating the covenant by the sale of liquors, the proprietors of Vauxhall Gardens filed a bill for an injunction, which was granted by Lord Loughborough. It has been observed in the argument here, that in granting the injunction, Lord Loughborough said: "It is in the nature of specific performance," and that therefore that case also falls under one of the exceptional cases. When that case came before Lord Eldon he dissolved the injunction, but upon a different ground, namely, on that of acquiescence for many years, and in a sense he treated it as a case of specific performance. As far as the words go, the observation of those two eminent judges would seem to justify the argument which has been addressed to me; in effect, however, it was only specific performance, because a prohibition preventing the commission of an act may as effectually perform an agreement as an order for the performance of the act agreed to be done. The agreement in that case being that the house should not be opened for the purposes of entertainment to the detriment of Vauxhall Gardens, the court granted the injunction; that was a performance of the agreement in substance, and the term "specific performance" is aptly applied in such a case, but not in the sense in which it has been used before me.

It was also contended that the plaintiff's remedy, if any, was at law; but it is no objection to the exercise of the jurisdiction by injunction that the plaintiff may have a legal remedy. The case of Robinson v. Lord Byron, 1 Brown, Ch. 588, before Lord Thurlow, so very often commented upon by succeeding judges, is a clear illustration of that proposition, because in that case the defendant, Lord Byron, who had large pieces of water in his park, which supplied the plaintiff's mills, was abusing his right by preventing a regular supply to the plaintiff's mill, and although the plaintiff had a remedy at law, yet this court felt no difficulty in restraining Lord Byron by injunction from preventing the regular flow of the water. Undoubtedly there are cases such as that cited for the defendants of Collins v. Plumb, 16 Ves. 454, before Lord Eldon, in which this court has declined to exercise the power (which in that instance it was assumed to have had) of preventing the commission of an act, because such power could not be properly and beneficially exercised. In that case the negative covenant, not to sell water to the prejudice of the plaintiffs, was not enforced by Lord Eldon, not because he had any doubt about the jurisdiction of the court (for upon that point he had no doubt), but because it was impossible to ascertain every time the water was supplied by the defendants, whether it was or not to the damage of the plaintiffs; but whether right or wrong, that learned judge, in refusing to exercise the jurisdiction on very sufficient grounds, meant in no respect to break in on the general rules deducible from the previous authorities.

At an early stage of the argument I adverted to the familiar cases of attorneys' clerks, and surgeons' and apothecaries' apprentices, and the like, in which this court has constantly interfered, simply to prevent the violation of negative covenants; but it was said that in such cases the court only acted on the principle that the clerk or apprentice had received all the benefit, and that the prohibition operated upon a concluded contract, and that therefore the injunction fell within one of the exceptional cases. I do not, however, apprehend that the jurisdiction of the court depends upon any such principle. It is obvious that in those cases the negative covenant does not come into operation until the servitude is ended, and therefore that the injunction cannot be required or applied for before that period.

The familiar case of a tenant covenanting not to do a particular act was also put during the argument; but it was said that in such a case the jurisdiction springs out of the relation of landlord and tenant, and that the tenant having received the benefit of an executed lease, the injunction operates only so as to give effect to the whole contract. That, however, cannot be the principle on which this court interferes, for, beyond all doubt, where a lease is executed containing affirmative and negative covenants, this court will not attempt to enforce the execution of the affirmative covenants, either on the part of the landlord or the tenant, but will leave it entirely to a court of law to measure the damages; though with respect to the negative covenants, if the tenant for example has stipulated not to cut or lop timber, or any other given act of forbearance, the court does not ask how many of the affirmative covenants on either side remain to be performed under the lease, but acts at once by giving effect to the negative covenant, specifically executing it by prohibiting the commission of acts which have been stipulated not to be done. So far then each of the cases to which I have referred appears to me to be in direct contravention of the rules which have been so elaborately pressed upon me by the defendants' counsel.

The present is a mixed case, consisting not of two correlative acts to be done, one by the plaintiff and the other by the defendants, which state of facts may have and in some cases has introduced a very important difference,—but of an act to be done by J. Wagner alone, to which is superadded a negative stipulation on her part to abstain from the commission of any act which will break in upon her affirmative covenant,—the one being ancillary to, concurrent and operating together with the other. The agreement to sing for the plaintiff during three months at his theatre, and during that time not to sing for anybody else, is not a correlative contract, it is in effect one contract; and though beyond all doubt this court could not interfere to enforce the specific performance of the whole of this contract, yet in all sound construction and according to the true spirit of the agreement, the engagement to perform for three months at one theatre must necessarily exclude the right to perform at the same time at another theatre. It was clearly intended that J. Wagner was to exert her vocal abilities to the utmost to aid the theatre to which she agreed to attach herself. I am of opinion, that if she had attempted, even in the absence of any negative stipulation, to perform at another theatre, she would have broken the spirit and true meaning of the contract as much as she would now do with reference to the contract into which she has actually entered.

Wherever this court has not proper jurisdiction to enforce specific performance, it operates to bind men's consciences, as far as they can be bound, to a true and literal performance of their agreements; and it will not suffer them to depart from their contracts at their pleasure, leaving the party with whom they have contracted to the mere chance of any damages which a jury may give. The exercise of this jurisdiction has, I believe, had a wholesome tendency towards the maintenance of that good faith which exists in this country to a much greater degree perhaps than in any other; and although the jurisdiction is not to be extended, yet a judge would desert his duty who did not act up to what his predecessors have handed down as the rule for his guidance in the administration of such an equity.

It was objected that the operation of the injunction in the present case was mischievous, excluding the defendant J. Wagner from performing at any other theatre while this court had no power to compel her to perform at her Majesty's Theatre. It is true, that I have not the means of compelling her to sing, but she has no cause of complaint, if I compel her to abstain from the commission of an act which she has bound herself not to do, and thus possibly cause her to fulfill her engagement. The jurisdiction which I now exercise is wholly within the power of the court, and being of opinion that it is a proper case for interfering, I shall leave nothing unsatisfied by the judgment I pronounce. The effect too of the injunction, in restraining J. Wagner from singing elsewhere may, in the event of an action being brought against her by the plaintiff, prevent any such amount of vindictive damages being given against her as a jury might probably be inclined to give if she had carried her talents and exercised them at the rival theatre; the injunction may also, as I have said, tend to the fulfillment of her engagement, though, in continuing the injunction, I disclaim doing indirectly what I cannot do directly.

Referring again to the authorities, I am well aware that they have not been uniform, and that there undoubtedly has been a difference of decision on the question now revived before me. But, after the best consideration which I have been enabled to give to the subject, the conclusion at which I have arrived is, I conceive, supported by the greatest weight of authority. The earliest case most directly bearing on the point is that of Morris v. Colman, 18 Ves. 437. There Mr. Colman was a part proprietor with Mr. Morris of the Haymarket Theatre, and they were partners in that concern, and by the deed of partnership Mr. Colman agreed that he would not exercise his dramatic abilities for any other theatre than the Haymarket. He did not, however, covenant that he would write for the Haymarket, but it was merely a negative covenant that he would not write for any other theatre than the Haymarket. Lord Eldon granted an injunction against Mr. Colman writing for any other theatre than the Haymarket; and the ground on which Lord Eldon assumed that jurisdiction was the subject of some discussion at the bar. It was truly said for the defendants that that was a case of partnership; and it was said, moreover, that Lord Cottenham was mistaken in the case of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phil. Ch. 52, when he said that Lord Eldon had not decided Morris v. Colman on the ground of there being a partnership. I agree that the observations, which fell from Lord Eldon in the subsequent case of Clarke v. Price, 2 Wils. 157, show that he did mainly decide it on the ground of partnership; but he did not decide it exclusively on that ground. In the argument of Morris v. Colman, 18 Ves. 437, Sir Samuel Romilly suggested a case almost identical with the present. He contended that the clause restraining Mr. Colman from writing for any other theatre was no more against public policy than a stipulation that Mr. Garrick should not perform at any other theatre than that at which he was engaged would have been. Lord Eldon, adverting in his judgment to the case put at the bar, said: "If Mr. Garrick was now living, would it be unreasonable that he should contract with Mr. Colman to perform only at the Haymarket Theatre, and Mr. Colman with him to write for the theatre alone? Why should they not thus engage for the talents of each other?" He gives the clearest enunciation of his opinion, that that would be an agreement which this court would enforce by way of injunction.

The late Vice Chancellor Shadwell, of whom I always wish to be understood to speak with the greatest respect, decided in a different way, in the cases of Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333, and Kimberley v. Jennings, Id. 340, on which I shall presently make a few observations. In the former case, he observed that Lord Eldon must be understood in the case of Morris v. Colman, 18 Ves. 437, to have spoken according to the subject-matter before him, and must there be considered to be addressing himself to a case in which Colman and Garrick would both have had a partnership interest in the theatre. I must, however, entirely dissent from that interpretation. Lord Eldon's words are perfectly plain, they want no comment upon them, they speak for themselves. He was alluding to a case in which Garrick, as a performer, would have had nothing to do with the theatre beyond the implied engagement that he would not perform anywhere else; and I have come to a very clear conclusion that Lord Eldon would have granted the injunction in that case, although there had been no partnership.

The authority of Clarke v. Price, 2 Wils. 157, was much pressed upon me by the learned counsel for the defendants; but that is a case which does not properly belong to their argument, because there was no negative stipulation, and I quite admit that this court cannot enforce the performance of such an affirmative stipulation as is to be found in that case. There the defendant having agreed to take notes of cases in the court of exchequer, and compose reports, for the plaintiff, and having failed to do so, the plaintiff, Mr. Clarke, filed a bill for an injunction, and Lord Eldon, when refusing the injunction, in effect said, I cannot compel Mr. Price to sit in the court of exchequer and take notes and compose reports; and the whole of his judgment shows that he proceeded (and so it has been considered in later cases) on the ground that there was no covenant, on the part of the defendant, that he would not compose reports for any other person. The expressions in the judgment are: "I cannot, as in the other case" (referring to Morris v. Colman, 18 Ves. 437), "say that I will induce him to write for the plaintiff by preventing him from writing for any other person;" and then come these important words, "for that is not the nature of the agreement." Lord Eldon therefore was of opinion, upon the construction of that agreement, that it would be against its meaning to affix to it a negative quality and import a covenant into it by implication, and he, therefore, very properly as I conceive, refused that injunction. That case, therefore, in no respect touches the question now before me, and I may at once declare, that if I had only to deal with the affirmative covenant of the defendant J. Wagner that she would perform at her Majesty's Theatre, I should not have granted any injunction.

Thus far, I think, the authorities are very strong against the defendants' contention; but the case of Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333, to which I have already alluded, is the first case which has in point of fact introduced all the difficulties on this part of the law. There Mr. Kean entered into an agreement precisely similar to the present. He agreed that he would perform for Mr. Kemble at Drury Lane, and that he would not perform anywhere else during the time that he had stipulated to perform for Mr. Kemble. Mr. Kean broke his engagement, a bill was filed, and Vice Chancellor Shadwell was of opinion that he could not grant an injunction to restrain Mr. Kean from performing elsewhere, which he was either about to do or actually doing, because the court could not enforce the performance of the affirmative covenant that he would perform at Drury Lane for Mr. Kemble. Being pressed by that passage which I have read from in the lord chancellor's judgment in Morris v. Colman, 18 Ves. 437, he put that paraphrase or commentary upon it which I have referred to; that is, he says: "Lord Eldon is speaking of a case where the parties are in partnership together." I have come to a different conclusion, and I am bound to say that, in my apprehension, the case of Kemble v. Kean was wrongly decided and cannot be maintained.

The same learned judge followed up his decision in that case in the subsequent one of Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Sim. 340. That was a case of hiring and service, and the vice chancellor there virtually admitted that a negative covenant might be enforced in this court, and quoted an instance to that effect within his own knowledge. He said: "I remember a case in which a nephew wished to go on the stage, and his uncle gave him a large sum of money in consideration of his covenanting not to perform within a particular district; the court would execute such a covenant, on the ground that a valuable consideration had been given for it." He admits therefore the jurisdiction of the court, if nothing but that covenant remained to be executed. The learned judge however adds, "but here the negative covenant does not stand by itself. It is coupled with the agreement for service for a certain number of years, and then, for taking the defendant into partnership, * * * this agreement cannot be performed in the whole, and therefore this court cannot perform any part of it." Whatever may have been the mutual obligations in that case, which prevented the court from giving effect to the negative covenant, I am not embarrassed with any such difficulties here, because, as I have already shown, both the covenants are on the part of the defendants.

The case of Hooper v. Brodrick, 11 Sim. 47, was cited, as an instance in which the court had refused an injunction under circumstances like the present; but, in that case, the lessee of an inn had covenanted to use and keep it open as an inn during a certain time, and not to do any act whereby the license might become forfeited. In point of fact the application was that he might be compelled to keep it open, and the vice chancellor makes this observation: "The court ought not to have restrained the defendant from discontinuing to use and keep open the demised premises as an inn, which is the same in effect as ordering him to carry on the business of an innkeeper; but it might have restrained him from doing, or causing or permitting to be done, any act which would have put it out of his power, or the power of any other person, to carry on that business on the premises. It is not, however, shown that the defendant has threatened, or intends to do, or to cause or permit to be done, any act whereby the licenses may become forfeited or be refused; and therefore the injunction must be dissolved." That therefore is an authority directly against the defendants, because it shows that if there had been an intention to break the negative covenant this court would have granted the injunction.

The case of Smith v. Fromont, 2 Swanst. 330, was also relied upon by the defendants, as an instance where the injunction had been refused, but there was no negative covenant. It was an attempt to restrain, by injunction, a man from supplying horses to a coach for a part of a road, when the party who was applying for the injunction was himself incapable of performing his obligation to horse his part of the road. Lord Eldon, in refusing the injunction and deprecating the interference of the court in such cases, there said: "The only instance I recollect of an application to this court to restrain the driving of coaches occurred in the case of a person who, having sold the business of a coach proprietor from Reading to London, and undertaking to drive no coach on that road, afterwards established one. With some doubt, whether I was not degrading the dignity of this court by interfering, I saw my way in that case; because one party had there covenanted absolutely against interfering with the business which he had sold to the other." That again is a direct authority, therefore, against the defendants, as Lord Eldon expressly says he had interfered in the case of a negative covenant, although he could not interfere on that occasion because there was no such covenant.

Some observations have been made upon a decision of my own in Ireland, in the case of Gervais v. Edwards, 2 Dru. & W. 80; that decision I believe to be right, but it is quoted to show that I was of opinion that this court cannot interfere to enforce specific performance, unless it can execute the whole of an agreement. I abide by the opinion I there expressed, and I mean to do nothing in this case which shall in any manner interfere with that opinion. That was properly a case for specific performance, but from the nature of the contract itself there was a portion of it which could not be executed. I said, in effect: I cannot execute this contract which is intended to be binding on both parties; I cannot execute a portion of this contract for one, and leave the other portion of the contract unexecuted for the other; and, therefore, as I cannot execute the whole of the contract, I am bound to execute no part of it. That, however, has no bearing on the present case, for here I leave nothing unperformed which the court can ever be called upon to perform.

In Hills v. Croll, 2 Phil. Ch. 60, Lord Lyndhurst refused to enforce an injunction to restrain the violation of a negative covenant. It was a case in which A. had given to B. a sum of money, and B. covenanted that he would buy all the acids he wanted from the manufactory of A., who covenanted that he would supply the acids, and B. also covenanted that he would buy his acids from no other person. Lord Lyndhurst refused to prohibit B. from obtaining acids from any other quarter, both because the covenants were correlative, and because he could not compel A. to supply B. with acids; and if, therefore, he had restrained B. from taking acids from any other quarter, he might have ruined him in the event of A. breaking his affirmative covenant to supply the acids. That case has never been rightly understood. It is supposed that Lord Lyndhurst's decision was based upon a wrong principle; that he followed the authority of Gervais v. Edwards and such cases, and that he improperly applied the rule which was in that class of cases properly applied, but under the circumstances of the case before him I think the rule was not improperly applied.² The next case which has been so much observed upon was that, before Lord Cottenham, of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phil. Ch. 52. That was a very simple case, and the question upon what principle it was decided formed the subject of discussion before me. A man, in order to obtain a great circulation of his patent medicine, entered into a contract with a vendor of such articles, giving him a general agency for the sale of the medicine, with 40 per cent. discount, and stipulating that he would not supply anybody else at a larger discount than 25 per cent. He violated his contract and was proceeding to employ other agents with a larger discount than 25 per

² The following, containing all the material portions of Lord Lyndhurst's judgment in Hills v. Croll, is taken from the shorthand writer's notes, and has been kindly furnished to the reporters by one of the counsel who was engaged in that cause, and by whom a very full report of the case will be found published, in "Reports of Cases in the Law of Real Property and Conveyancing," volume 1, p. 541:

"THE LORD CHANCELLOR.

"In this case of Hills v. Croll, Croll had obtained two patents for the purpose of purifying gas, and the result of the purification of gas was the manufacture of muriate of ammonia and sulphate of ammonia. He entered into a contract with Hills, who is the plaintiff in this suit, and the contract was to this effect: Mr. Croll was to purchase all the acids that he was to use in his process under his patent from Mr. Hills. Mr. Hills, on his side, was to have the right of purchasing all the ammonia that should be produced as the result of those processes, at certain prices as to the one and as to the other. In addition to this, there was a stipulation that, in all the licenses that were granted for using those patents, the parties to whom those licenses were to be granted should be bound to purchase all the acids which were used in the processes from Mr. Hills, and that Mr. Hills should have the same option that he had in the case of Croll, of purchasing from them all the ammonia that should be produced in the course of the processes. It was also stipulated that Mr. Hills should have the option to supply either muriatic acid or sulphuric acid, as he should think proper, regulating his option by the market prices of the muriate of ammonia and the sulphate of ammonia. I think this is the substance of the original agreement between these parties. The agreement was entered into in the month of March, 1841. It was found, on the part of Mr. Croll, that the mode of payment and other arrangements with respect to this agreement were inconvenient, in consequence of which a correspondence takes place between him and Mr. Hills, in the month of September, 1842, and the agreement was modified according to the terms of a letter, dated, I think, in September, written by him. One of the stipulations in the original agreement was that Mr. Hills should be a signing party in all the licenses that were granted by Mr. Croll for the use of the patent. The first stipulation, in the letter of September, was that he should not be required to be a signing party: but it provided that there should be a covenant in all those agreements, a covenant to the effect stated in the original agreement, namely, that the parties to whom the licenses were granted should purchase their acids from Hills, and give Hills the right to purchase the ammonia. Regulations were also made altering the terms on which the acids were to be purchased and the ammonia to be sold. There were some other subordinate stipulations to cent. An injunction was applied for and was granted. It was said that it was properly granted, because it was a case of partnership. This, however, was not the fact; it was not a case of partnership, but was strictly one of principal and agent; and it was only because there was the negative covenant that the court gave effect to it. It is impossible to read Lord Cottenham's judgment without being satisfied that he did not consider it to be a partnership, though he said it was in the nature of a partnership; and in a popular sense it might be so called, because the parties were there both dealing with respect to the same subject, from which each was to have a benefit, but in no legal sense was it a partnership.

Up to the period when Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phil. Ch. 52, was decided, I apprehend that there could have been no doubt on the law as applicable to this case, except for the authority of Vice Chancellor Shadwell; but with great submission it appears to me that the whole of that learned judge's authority is removed by himself by his decision in the later case of Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Sim. 88. In that case A. B. and C. were partners as tailors. A. and B. went out of the trade on consideration of receiving £1,000 each, and C. was to continue the busi-which it is not necessary at present to advert. The letter, however, concluded with a stipulation to this effect, that if Mr. Croll was in any particular to depart from the agreement so modified the original agreement was to be enforced. I think those two documents, the original agreement and the letter, formed the substance of the contract between the parties as it existed after September, 1842.

"Some doubt was expressed as to whether or not the contract so modified has been acted upon in that shape. It appears beyond all doubt that it was so acted upon, because the accounts were, from time to time, rendered on the footing of the modified agreement, and it is also clear from the letter of Mr. Hills of the 8th of December, in which he refers expressly to the prices that were regulated by the letter of September, 1842."

His lordship here referred to another question raised in the course of the discussion, namely, whether the second or modified agreement had been put an end to by the operation of the clause providing for the enforcement of the first or original agreement; and, after remarking that it was unnecessary for him for the purpose of the present question to come to any conclusive decision on that point, proceeded as follows:

"Those are the facts of the case for the purpose of raising the narrow question, as it appears to me, which the court has to decide. The bill was filed for the purpose of calling on the court to declare that that agreement should be specifically performed.

"Now there is no principle of the court which I understand to be more clearly established than this, that the court will not decree an agreement to be specifically performed, unless it can execute the whole of the agreement." The question, therefore, in this case will be whether the court has power, from the nature of this agreement, to execute the whole of it,—every part of it. Part of the prayer which is consequent upon a specific performance is that the defendant should be restrained from purchasing acids from anybody but Mr. Hills, and also that he should be restrained from granting licenses, except according to the agreement that was in force between the parties.

Now, then, with respect to the first of these points, there is a stipulation on the part of Hills that he will supply the acids; there is a stipulation on the part of Mr. Croll that he will purchase acids from Hills, and from no other person. Has the court any power whatever to compel Mr. Hills to comply with that? Can the court order Mr. Hills to continue the manufacture of acids for the purpose of supplying Mr. Croll? Can the court call upon him, if he should not manufacture acids, and require him to purchase acids for the purpose of supplying Mr. Croll? It is clear, I apprehend, that the court has no such power. There are cases in which the court will do indirectly what it cannot do directly. A case commonly cited for that purpose is the case of a nuisance. The court would not compel a party who had erected a wall to the nuisance of another,—would not compel the party by any direct order to pull down that wall; but the court can make an order requiring him not to continue the nuisance, which would have the effect of compelling him to pull down the wall. In the case of Morris v. Colman, the court restrained Mr. Colman from writing for any other theatre, inferring from that that the order would compel Mr. Colman, or have the tendency to compel Mr. Colman, to write for the Haymarket Theatre. But in this case the court has no power to compel Mr. Hills to supply acids by ordering him not to supply acids to any other person; that is not the agreement, nor was it ever intended that it should be the agreement. Therefore, unless the court can compel him by a direct order to supply Mr. Croll from time to time with the acids that Mr. Croll requires, it is quite clear that this court cannot execute all the parts of this contract. The court cannot, therefore, compel the party specifically to perform the contract.

It was thrown out in the course of the argument, that this court might compel one party to perform his part of the contract, and leave the other party to his remedy at law. No such principle has ever been acted on in this court; it has been so laid down over and over again, and, in a recent case that was cited at the bar (Gervais v. Edwards, 2 Dru. & War. 80), Sir Edward Sugden held that, unless this court can execute every part of the contract, this court will not compel a specific performance of a part. When this cause therefore comes to a hearing, I am of opinion that, according to the facts as they at present stand, and according to the statement of the principle I have mentioned, this court cannot restrain Mr. Croll from purchasing acids elsewhere, because it cannot compel Mr. Hills on his side to furnish all the acids that may be necessary for the manufacture carried on by Mr. Croll. If the court cannot do this, it cannot restrain the parties at the hearing. It is quite clear that upon this interlocutory application the court cannot restrain Mr. Croll from purchasing acids elsewhere. I apprehend therefore that the decision of the vice chancellor, which proceeded on the principle I have stated, and rightly on the grounds I have stated, and which I believe is the principle of this court, and the principle on which the vice chancellor acted as to that part of the case is correct; and equally applies, as it appears to me it does, to that part of the notice of motion with respect to the licenses, because that forms a part of the contract,—the general contract. If the court cannot execute the whole of the contract, it cannot execute the contract in part; therefore I am of opinion that in this case the motion must be refused, and refused with costs.

ness on his own account. A. entered into a covenant that he would not carry on the trade of a tailor, which he had just sold, within certain limits, and C. entered into a covenant that he would employ A. as cutter at a certain allowance. The bill was filed simply for an injunction to prevent A. from setting up as a tailor within the prescribed limits, and the vice chancellor granted that injunction. It was objected that this court could not grant the injunction when there was something remaining to be performed, for that A. had a right to be employed as a cutter, which right this court would not even attempt to deal with or enforce as against C. That case therefore was open to a difficulty which does not occur here; in fact the same difficulty which might have arisen in Hills v. Croll, 2 Phil. Ch. 60, before Lord Lyndhurst. But the vice chancellor held that to be no difficulty at all, observing that the bill simply asked for an injunction which he would grant, although he could not give effect to the affirmative covenant to do the act in respect of which no specific performance was asked. His own decisions in Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333, and in Kimberly v. Jennings, Id. 340, were pressed upon him; but he observed, "that the bills in the cases cited asked for specific performance of the agreement, and that the injunctions were sought as only ancillary to that relief, but the bill in the present case asked merely for an injunction." He no longer put it on the inability of the court to enforce a negative covenant, but he put it on the form of the pleadings. Whether that form was sufficient to justify his opinion is a question with which I need not deal; but I am very clearly of opinion that the case of Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Sim. 88, does remove the whole weight of that learned judge's authority on this subject.

It was said in argument that the injunction prayed in Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Sim. 88, was merely ancillary to the relief; but it will be seen that that was not so, and that the prayer extended only to the injunction, and had nothing to do with relief in the shape of specific performance; and the learned judge himself stated that, if it had gone to that extent, he, following his former decisions, would not have granted the injunction.

From a careful examination of all these authorities I am of opinion that the principles and rules deducible from them are in direct contravention of those principles and rules which were so elaborately pressed upon me during the argument; and I wish it to be distinctly understood that I entertain no doubt whatever that the point of law has been properly decided in the court below. It was nevertheless, and with some reason, said that, although the point of law should be decided in the plaintiff's favor, still he might be excluded from having the benefit of it on the merits of the case.

His lordship here entered into a minute examination of the statements in the answers and affidavits as to the unauthorized addition of the restrictive clause, and as to the nonfulfillment by the plaintiff of his portion of the agreement. In reference to those points he observed that, whether the clause was originally added with or without authority, the evidence showed a clear acquiescence on the part of the defendants to its remaining in the agreement; that the operation of the agreement had been in the first instance postponed to suit the convenience of the defendants; and that as to the payment of the £300 although the plaintiff could not have come into a court of equity to enforce the contract without having tendered the amount stipulated to be paid, yet it was distinctly proved that it had in fact been paid to the common agent of both parties for the purpose of being handed to the defendants. His lordship concluded by saying that, looking at the merits and circumstances of the case, as well as at the point of law raised, he must refuse this motion with costs.

In the course of the argument, and in order to prove the plaintiff's readiness to perform his part of the contract, an affidavit made by Dr. Bacher was read, which was to the effect that he had written and sent a letter to the defendant J. Wagner, informing her of his having received from the plaintiff the £300, and offering to pay that sum according to her instructions. A letter of the same date as that referred to in the affidavit was admitted to have been received by the defendant J. Wagner, but it was positively denied that it contained any such offer. The letter itself was not forthcoming, and its nonproduction was not accounted for. No copy was kept by Dr. Bacher.

The lord chancellor observed that, when the affidavit, as to the contents of the letter was made, Dr. Bacher could not have known that the letter would not be produced; that the affidavit, therefore, if untrue, was at the imminent peril of exposure by the production of the letter; and that under such circumstances the representation in the affidavit must be taken to be true.

MONTAGUE v. FLOCKTON.

May 26, 1873.

This was a motion on behalf of the plaintiff, Henry James Montague, the lessee and manager of the Globe Theater in London, for an injunction to restrain the defendant, Charles Poston Flockton, from acting, or causing his name to be advertised as about to act, at any place other than the plaintiff's theater, or otherwise than for the plaintiff's benefit, for a period of nine months, from the 2d of October, 1872, and in particular from acting at an intended dramatic performance at the Crystal Palace.

In August, 1871, an engagement was proposed to the defendant on behalf of the plaintiff, that the defendant should perform, upon certain terms specified, at the Globe Theater. To this proposal the following answer was returned by the defendant, dated the 16th of August, 1871, and addressed to Mr. Edward English, the plaintiff's agent:

"Dear Sir: I accept the engagement for the Globe Theater, under the management of H. J. Montague, Esq., at a weekly salary of five pounds, and, if required to go into the provinces, traveling expenses paid and 20 per cent. on my London salary. Line of business, old men and character business; to commence on or about 2d October, 1871. For the season of not less than nine months' duration. A fortnight's rehearsal to be given prior to opening, subject to the rules and regulations of the theater.

"[Signed] C. P. Flockton."

During the pendency of the last-mentioned agreement, namely, on the 2d of March, 1872, the plaintiff and the defendant entered into another agreement, which was accepted by the defendant, in these terms:

"I hereby accept the renewal of my engagement with H. J. Montague, Esq., for his next season on the same terms as at present existing between us.

"[Signed] C. P. Flockton."

It appeared that in May, 1872, a notice was posted in the greenroom of the Globe Theater to the effect that the season would close on the 4th of June, on which day all pending engagements would terminate, and the house was accordingly closed upon that day.

A company was then formed by the plaintiff for certain theatrical performances in the provinces, in which the defendant took part, and these performances commenced on the 4th of June, and terminated on the 28th of September, 1872.

The next London season at the Globe Theater commenced in October, 1872, and the defendant, Mr. Flockton, played at the theater as he had previously done till the 10th of March, 1873, when he requested the plaintiff to allow him to perform at the Regent's Park Theater, which was to be opened in May. Upon this occasion, according to the plaintiff's statement, the defendant said: "I only ask you to lend me, and I shall finish my engagement with you afterwards." The plaintiff declined to accede to the defendant's request, on the ground that he should require his services for the next piece that was to be brought out. On the 2d of April the defendant wrote the following letter to the plaintiff:

"Dear Sir: As you are aware my engagement with you terminated on the 2d of December last, pursuant to our agreement bearing date the 2d of March, 1872, I am desirous to close my connection with your theater, and therefore now give you four weeks' notice in pursuance of such my desire."

The matter was then placed by the plaintiff in the hands of his solicitors, Messrs. Lumley, who wrote to the defendant stating that he had taken a wrong view of the terms of the contract, which did not in fact terminate until nine months after the commencement of the season, in October, 1872; that the defendant was causing Mr. Montague considerable inconvenience and loss, by not attending the rehearsal of a new play soon to be produced, although every reasonable notice had been given him; and they called upon him to be in attendance the following morning at 11 o'clock to rehearse the part assigned to him.

This summons not being attended to by the defendant, the plaintiff was obliged to engage another actor, Mr. Palmer, to perform the part assigned to the defendant.

The plaintiff then discovered that the defendant was negotiating for an agreement to act at a new theater in course of erection in London, before the expiration of the term alleged to be comprised in the agreement of the 2d of March, 1872, and on the 28th of April, 1873, the plaintiff also discovered that the defendant was advertised as intending to act on the 3d of May at the Crystal Palace in the part of Polonius in Hamlet, and consequently this bill was filed for an injunction in the terms already stated.

It was alleged by the defendant that, according to the prevailing custom, the manager had the right of closing the season by notice, and that he had done so. The plaintiff alleged that the notice did not close the season. There was conflicting evidence on this point.

SIR R. MALINS, V. C., after reading the letter of the defendant, dated the 16th of August, 1871, accepting the engagement to perform for the plaintiff during the season of at least nine months, continued:

The first question is, what is the meaning of that contract? It has been argued that it was an engagement for the season, and that it left the performer at the mercy of the proprietor to terminate the season whenever he thought fit. It is said that Mr. Montague having put up a notice in the greenroom of the theater in the month of May, 1872, notifying that the season's engagements would terminate on the 4th of June then next, that that has put an end to the contract. My opinion is that if an actor engages himself for the season he leaves himself at the mercy (within reasonable limits of construction) of the proprietor of the theater to fix what the season is. But that is not the meaning of this contract; because, while the proprietor, Mr. Montague, engages Mr. Flockton for the season, there is a stipulation, which is for the protection of the performer, that that season is not to be one month, two months, or three months, as the proprietor may think proper, but that, whenever he may choose to terminate his season, that season, for the purpose of paying the actor, is not to be less than nine months. In my opinion, it was absolutely impossible, provided Mr. Flockton performed his part of the contract, for Mr. Montague to evade performing his part of it by paying the stipulated salary for a period of not less than nine months.

This contract, then, being, as I am bound to assume, understood, in the only way it could be understood, by each of the parties, was commenced in or about the month of October, and matters went on satisfactorily on both sides, as I must assume, because in the month of March, five months after the contract had been commenced, and while Mr. Flockton was still performing for Mr. Montague, a proposal was made by Mr. Montague, and was accepted by Mr. Flockton, in these terms: "I hereby accept the renewal of my engagement with H. J. Montague, Esq., for his next season, on the same terms as at present existing between us." Now, what is the meaning of "the next season"? I am perfectly clear that it was a repetition of the old contract; it was to be the next season commencing in October, 1872, lasting for not less than nine months. It follows that, for the season beginning in 1872 and ending in 1873, Mr. Montague, accepting these terms, is bound to pay Mr. Flockton for nine months, and Mr. Flockton is equally bound to perform for Mr. Montague, if Mr. Montague requires him to do so. I am surprised that by any ingenuity Mr. Flockton should have persuaded himself that the meaning of that contract was, as he stated in his letter, that the next season was not the London season, but the country season. The thing is, in my opinion, perfectly absurd. It has nothing to do with the country season; because the original contract was this: He is to have £5 a week if required to go into the provinces; assuming, therefore, that he may be required to go, he will agree to do so, and in that case he is to have his traveling expenses paid, and 20 per cent. additional upon his London salary. The original contract is for a London engagement, with the privilege on Mr. Montague's part of requiring him to go into the provinces, where he would be entitled to 20 per cent. additional and all traveling expenses paid. Therefore, when he says the next season, it is subject to the same stipulation; it is for the London theater, with the right on the part of Mr. Montague to require him to go into the provinces upon those terms. The contention of Mr. Flockton that the next season commenced in the month of June and ended in the month of September is, in my opinion, simply ridiculous. I totally differ from it, and I am clear that it meant the next season, commencing in October and terminating at the earliest at the end of nine months.

Then let us see what was the view of the parties themselves, and how this was acted upon. If it were according to Mr. Flockton's view, how did it happen that he commenced acting for Mr. Montague again in the month of October last, and continued uninterruptedly and amicably, as I understand, to act for him down to the month of April? The object of it is evidently that which is stated by the plaintiff in his affidavit filed the 6th of March; and, as it is not contradicted by Mr. Flockton, I must take it to be perfectly accurate. Mr. Montague says: "On or about the 20th day of March, 1873, I was in my dressing room at the Globe Theater with a friend, and the defendant came in and asked me if I would allow him to go and play a very fine part at the Regent's Park Theater, which it was proposed to open in the month of May, and, he added [now, here is an admission of the whole case], 'Of course, you will lend me for a time only; then I will come back and finish my engagement.' I said, in reply, 'I am sorry, my dear Flockton, I cannot, as I hope to have you in my next piece.' On my saying that, he walked away rather annoyed." That was on the 20th of March. Then what is the next thing he does? I am satisfied from the evidence that, there being a piece then in preparation, it was the intention of Mr. Montague that Mr. Flockton should take a part in it; but, unfortunately, before it came out Mr. Flockton, on the 2d of April, adhering to this most unjustifiable view of the contract, writes to Mr. Montague this letter: "As you are aware my engagement with you terminated on the 2d of December last, pursuant to our agreement bearing date the 2d of March, 1872, I am desirous to cease my connection with your theater, and therefore now give you four weeks' notice in pursuance of such my desire." Now, he knew perfectly well that Mr. Montague was not aware of any such thing as the termination of the agreement in December, for he knew that the conversation of the 20th of March which occurred between them took an entirely different view of the case, and after making that admission himself to Mr. Montague I cannot conceive that anything could be more unjustifiable than that Mr. Flockton should say, "As you are aware, my engagement with you terminated on the 22d of December last." That was objected to by Mr. Montague, who, I think, acted in perfect good faith. He remonstrated, and, finding his remonstrances were not attended to, he applied to his solicitors. So far from Mr. Montague not performing his part of the contract or being desirous to avoid employing Mr. Flockton in his new piece, as was suggested, Messrs. Lumley wrote a letter to this effect: "Mr. Montague states, further, that you are even now causing him considerable inconvenience and loss by your not attending to the rehearsal of a new play soon to be produced, although every reasonable notice has been given you, and we now call upon you to be in attendance to-morrow on the stage to rehearse the part assigned to you at 11 o'clock, at which hour the company assemble for the purpose of rehearsal." Therefore it is Mr. Flockton who is now repudiating his contract. He is called upon to perform it, but he adheres to his refusal, and seeks an engagement, first at the Regent's Park Theater, and secondly at the Crystal Palace. Now, unless theatrical managers are to be completely at the mercy of their performers, the performers are not to be suffered to break their engagements whenever they think fit. I can readily believe, if Mr. Flockton had requested Mr. Montague to allow him to perform the part of Polonius in Hamlet at the Crystal Palace, that his request would have been acceded to, and this suit would not have been instituted; but that was not all that Mr. Flockton wanted. In setting his contract at defiance, it is perfectly clear his object was not simply to perform at the Crystal Palace, but also to perform at the Regent's Park Theater, either because he could get a better salary or be enabled to play a higher class of characters, which perhaps to an actor is as strong an inducement as any money that can be given to him. But he is, in my opinion, entirely wrong.

If he is put upon his contract, he is bound to perform for Mr. Montague for the season; and I am glad to hear from his counsel, Mr. Hemming, that Mr. Flockton expresses his willingness, if the court puts a different construction upon it to his own, to submit to the opinion of the court, and perform his part of the contract.

Now, that being the effect of the agreement between the parties, that is, that Mr. Flockton has bound himself for the whole of the season which commenced in October last for nine months, which, on the one hand, obliges Mr. Montague to pay him his salary for nine months, and obliges Mr. Flockton, on the other hand, to perform for Mr. Montague for the same period, it is said, in order to avoid this, that he is not bound, because there is no negative stipulation in the contract. I certainly am under the impression that in the case of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, if there had been no negative stipulation the court would have interfered; and I gather this particularly from the passage in Lord St. Leonard's judgment, Id. 618, where he says: "The agreement to sing for the plaintiff during three months at his theater, and during that time not to sing for anybody else, is not a correlative contract; it is, in effect, one contract, and though, beyond all doubt, this court could not interfere to enforce the specific performance of the whole of this contract, yet, in all sound construction, and according to the true spirit of the agreement, the engagement to perform for three months at one theater must necessarily exclude the right to perform at the same time at another theater." It happened that that contract did contain a negative stipulation, and, finding it there, Lord St. Leonards relied upon it; but I am satisfied that if it had not been there he would have come to the same conclusion, and granted the injunction, on the ground that Mdlle. Wagner, having agreed to perform at Mr. Lumley's theater, could not at the same time be permitted to perform at Mr. Gye's. But, however that may be, it is comparatively unimportant, because the subsequent authorities have completely settled this point. It appears to me, on the plainest ground, that an engagement to perform for nine months at Theater A. is a contract not to perform at Theater B., or at any other theater whatever. How is a man to perform his duty to the proprietor of a theater if, when he has engaged himself to perform for him, he is to go away any night that he may be wanted to another theater? I must treat Mr. Flockton as if he were the greatest actor in the world, and as if wherever he went the public would run after him; and according to this, if a proprietor engages an actor to perform for him, he is not, because he is only wanted for three nights in the week, to be at liberty to go and perform at any other theater during the other three nights, and thereby take away the advantage of the contract which he has entered into with his employer. That, in my opinion, is utterly inconsistent with the proper construction of the contract. There is no doubt whatever that the proper construction of these contracts is, that where a man or woman engages to perform or sing at a particular theater for a particular period, that involves the necessity of his or her not performing or singing at any other during that time.

That does not rest upon my opinion only, because it was acted upon in Webster v. Dillon, 3 Jur. (N. S.) 432. In that case there was, it seems, no argument on the part of the defendant. I suppose they did not argue it because they found they could make nothing of it. The defendant Dillon, an actor, having agreed to perform at Sadler's Wells Theater in certain characters for twelve successive nights, proposed to perform during the same period at another theater. Mr. Swanston applied for the injunction, and Vice Chancellor Sir W. Page Wood "thought the words of Lord St. Leonards were sufficiently strong to justify his making the order, and he granted an injunction restraining the defendant from acting at any other place than the plaintiff's theater during the ordinary hours of performance there of twelve consecutive nights, commencing on the 20th of April, the plaintiff undertaking to abide by such order as to damages as the court might direct." He fully adopts there the principle that it is not necessary to have a negative covenant in order to prevent the performance at another theater. In Fechter v. Montgomery, 33 Beav. 22, I think all men must concur in the reasonableness of the views of the master of the rolls. Mr. Fechter had engaged Mr. Montgomery, who had been a provincial actor, and desired to appear on the London boards to perform Shakespeare's characters, and Mr. Fechter had kept Mr. Montgomery for five months idle, but he paid him his salary. Mr. Montgomery's object was to be occupied; he did not want to be kept idle, he wanted to show his talents to London audiences, and it being clear that Fechter had kept him five months perfectly idle, and, for all that appeared, was likely to keep him idle for another five months, Mr. Montgomery would not submit to it, and broke his engagement. Mr. Fechter then filed a bill for an injunction, and in my opinion the master of the rolls could not have come to any other conclusion than that Mr. Fechter had broken his part of the contract, and therefore he would not enforce it as against Montgomery. The contract there did not contain any negative stipulation that he would not perform except for Mr. Fechter. The master of the rolls in that case says (33 Beav. 26): "But having regard to the situation of the parties, having regard to the nature of a contract of this description, and having regard also to the previous letter of the 21st of June, 1862, written to Mr. Barnett, and the conversation which took place prior to this agreement being entered into, with respect to which conversation there does not appear to me to be much difference on either side, I am of opinion that it was an agreement entered into by Mr. Fechter to employ Mr. Montgomery, during a reasonable time, to act at this theater, and that it was an agreement on the other side that he (Mr. Montgomery) should not perform elsewhere without the consent of Mr. Fechter; there was a mutuality in the agreement entered into on both sides; on the one side, that he should have an opportunity of displaying what his abilities and talents were before a London audience, and on the other side, that he should not act elsewhere unless with the permission of the plaintiff." There are, therefore, Sir W. Page Wood, when vice chancellor, and the master of the rolls, Lord Romilly, taking precisely the same view, that an engagement to act at one theater is a prohibition against acting at any other. There is also the whole principle involved in the case of De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De Gex & J. 276, which was with regard to a totally different subject undoubtedly, namely, the chartering of a ship. The ship was chartered for a particular voyage, and the charterer proposed to sell her, and employ her in a totally different manner. There the court decided that there was a contract that she should not be employed for any other purpose, and granted an injunction against her being so employed accordingly. I think, therefore, that it is decidedly established, and I should desire, as far as my opinion is of value on the subject, that it should be considered my opinion, that a man agreeing to act in one particular theater during the season is party to a contract that he will act there and not anywhere else. A negative contract is as necessarily implied as if it had been plainly expressed. Then the result is: here is a contract entered into for value. It is said by Mr. Flockton that the plaintiff has refused to perform his part of the contract, and has also refused to allow him to perform. That is explained in the affidavits. It is not attempted to be answered. It is perfectly clear that, in consequence of Flockton having absented himself, and given the notice of the 2d of October, when this new piece was about to be brought out, Mr. Montague was obliged to apply to another actor, a Mr. Palmer, to act in the place of Mr. Flockton, and that, in consequence of the default of Mr. Flockton to perform his contract, he has brought this trouble upon himself. Mr. Montague very properly said: "I have engaged Mr. Palmer. I cannot turn him out. You have brought this upon yourself, and while this piece lasts I cannot employ you to perform in it." But if he had not done that, I am perfectly clear that he would have continued to employ him there, and that the circumstance of his not being employed is entirely in consequence of his attempting to repudiate his own contract.

Under these circumstances, I am clearly of opinion that Mr. Montague has established that Mr. Flockton is under an engagement to perform for him, and, being under that engagement, is not at liberty to perform at any other theater whatever without his permission. I think it is a matter of very great importance for actors to understand, that entering into a contract to perform at Theater A. obliges them to perform there alone, and that they cannot be permitted to perform anywhere else so long as the other party performs his part of the agreement.

I am, therefore, of opinion that Mr. Montague is entitled to the injunction.

Mr. Hemming asked that the injunction might not be extended to prevent Mr. Flockton from fulfilling the engagement he had already entered into to perform once more at the Crystal Palace.

The Vice Chancellor recommended Mr.

Montague to concede this request as a favor.

Mr. Glasse said that Mr. Montague would not object to the defendant's performing once more at the Crystal Palace.

The Vice Chancellor thereupon granted the injunction in the terms of the prayer, but so as not to interfere with Mr. Flockton's playing one more day at the Crystal Palace.

DONNELL v. BENNETT.

Chancery. Feb. 8, 1883.

By an agreement dated the 15th of December, 1882, and made between the plaintiff, J. Donnell, a manure manufacturer, of the one part, and Cormack, a fish curer and fish smoker, of the other part, it was agreed that Cormack should sell and that the plaintiff should buy all parts of fish not used by Cormack in his business of a fish curer and fish smoker at the price of 23s. per ton for the space of two years from the 31st of December, 1882, and in consideration thereof Cormack further agreed that he would not sell during the said space of two years any fish or parts of fish to any other manufacturer whatever; and the plaintiff further agreed that he would take and pay for all fish or parts of fish which Cormack should deliver to him at the said price of 23s. per ton delivered at the plaintiff's works.

It was admitted that the defendant never delivered any fish or parts of fish under the contract to the plaintiff, but that he entered into a contract with the defendant Bennett to deliver all the parts of fish which he did not require in his business to Bennett; it was also admitted that the plaintiff had suffered damage by this breach of contract, and that the defendant Bennett had paid Cormack considerable sums of money to induce him to break his contract with the plaintiff, in order that Bennett might obtain the substantial monopoly of all the refuse of fish in Grimsby or the neighborhood.

This was an action by the plaintiff against Bennett and Cormack as co-defendants asking for an injunction to restrain Cormack from selling any fish to Bennett or any other manufacturers except the plaintiff, and to restrain Bennett from buying any such fish from Cormack.

FRY, J. The question which arises is by no means an easy one. It is difficult because of the state of the authorities upon the point. It appears to me that the tendency of recent decisions, and especially the cases of Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132, and of Wolverhampton and W. Ry. Co. v. London and N. W. Ry. Co., L. R. 16 Eq. 433, is towards this view—that the court ought to look at what is the nature of the contract between the parties; that if the contract as a whole is the subject of equitable jurisdiction, then an injunction may be granted in support of the contract whether it contain or does not contain a negative stipulation; but that if, on the other hand, the breach of the contract is properly satisfied by damages, then that the court ought not to interfere whether there be or be not the negative stipulation. That, I say, appears to me to be the point towards which the authorities are tending, and I cannot help saying that in my judgment that would furnish a proper line by which to divide the cases. But the question which I have to determine is not whether that ought to be the way in which the line should be laid down, but whether it has been so laid down by the authorities which are binding on me.

Now several cases have been cited by the plaintiff as authorities in favor of his contention. In the first place there is the case of Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phil. Ch. 52, in which undoubtedly the court enforced by way of injunction a stipulation not to sell except in a particular manner, and there the whole contract was one which could not have been performed specifically by the court. Still more, in Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, the court enforced by way of injunction a portion of a contract the whole of which could not have been enforced by way of specific performance; and Lord St. Leonards in considering that case discussed the question whether an injunction ought to be granted in some cases in which specific performance cannot be granted, and he determined that question plainly in the affirmative. He made these observations (Id. 619): "Wherever this court has not proper jurisdiction to enforce specific performance it operates to bind men's consciences, as far as they can be bound, to a true and literal performance of their agreements; and it will not suffer them to depart from their contracts at their pleasure, leaving the party with whom they have contracted to the mere chance of any damages which a jury may give. The exercise of this jurisdiction has, I believe, had a wholesome tendency towards the maintenance of that good faith which exists in this country to a much greater degree perhaps than in any other; and although the jurisdiction is not to be extended, yet a judge would desert his duty who did not act up to what his predecessors have handed down as the rule for his guidance in the administration of such an equity." It is plain, therefore, that Lord St. Leonards did not adopt the view which has occurred to me as that towards which the more recent cases have been tending.

That is the way in which the direct authorities stand in cases in which there is a negative clause, and they appear to me to show that in cases of this description where a negative clause is found, the court has enforced it without regard to the question whether specific performance could be granted of the entire contract.

Then it is said by Mr. Cozens-Hardy that in all those cases the negative contract enforced was but a part of a larger contract, and that it was a separable part of that larger contract, and that those cases do not apply to a case like the present, in which, as he suggests, the negative contract is co-extensive with the positive contract.

Upon that argument two inquiries arise. In the first place, is it true to say that the negative contract is in the present instance coextensive with the positive? In my judgment it is not. The affirmative contract is that the vendor will sell all his fish refuse for two years to the purchaser. The negative contract is that during two years he will not sell any refuse fish to any other manufacturer whomsoever; leaving it open to him so far as regards the negative contract, either not to sell at all, or to sell to some person other than a manufacturer. But in the next place one must inquire whether the authorities support any such distinction as that which has been urged by Mr. Cozens-Hardy. It appears to me that they do not.

In Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, the contract was that Mdle. Wagner would sing three months at Her Majesty's Theater in London. The negative contract was that she would not "use her talents at any other theater, nor in any concert or reunion, public or private, without the written authorization of Mr. Lumley." It is quite true that the contract contains certain stipulations as to how many nights she should be required to sing, but it appears to me to be evident that the substantial contract—the affirmative contract—was that she would sing there for three months. Of course she could not be always singing, and therefore the contract must state necessarily some limits as to how often she was to sing, but when she did sing during the three months she was to sing at Her Majesty's Theater; the negative terms were that during the three months she would not sing anywhere else than at Her Majesty's Theater. It appears to me that those two contracts are substantially coextensive. But further than that it is to be borne in mind that Lord St. Leonards does not dwell on the distinction which is now sought to be drawn, and so far as I am aware no trace of it is to be found in the earlier authorities.

But then comes the case of Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. 654, before the Lords Justices, in which Hills v. Croll, 2 Phil. Ch. 60, was referred to. Now Hills v. Croll was a case which contained an affirmative and negative contract, and Lord Justice Giffard expressly said that if that case is to be taken as laying down that the court is to refuse to act on a negative covenant wherever there is a correlative obligation which it cannot enforce, it does not apply. If it is taken as going that length, it is contrary to the case of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, and must be considered as overruled.

It appears to me, therefore, that that point which has been urged upon me does not receive any sanction from the earlier authorities.

I have come to the conclusion, therefore, upon the authorities, which are binding upon me, that I ought to grant this injunction. I do so with considerable difficulty because I find it hard to draw any substantial or tangible distinction between a contract containing an express negative stipulation and a contract containing an affirmative stipulation which implies a negative. I find it exceedingly difficult to draw any rational distinction between the case of Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132, and the case now before me. But at the same time the courts have laid down that, so far as the decisions have already gone in favor of granting injunctions, the injunction is to go.

It appears to me that this case is within the earlier decisions, and although I should be far from sorry if the court of appeal were to take a different view, I think I am bound here by the authorities, and therefore I grant the injunction till the hearing of the cause.

WM. ROGERS MANUF'G CO. v. ROGERS.

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Feb. 17, 1890.

Appeal from superior court, Hartford county; FENN, Judge.

This was a suit to enjoin the violation of a contract between Frank W. Rogers and the Wm. Rogers Manufacturing Company and the Rogers Cutlery Company as follows: "(1) That said companies will employ said Rogers in the business to be done by said companies, according to the stipulations of said agreement, for the period of twenty-five years therein named, if said Rogers shall so long live and discharge the duties devolved upon him by said Watrous as general agent and manager of the business to be done in common by said companies, under the directions and to the satisfaction of said general agent and manager; it being understood that such duties may include traveling for said companies, whenever, in the judgment of said general agent, the interest of the business will be thereby promoted." (2) The said companies agree to pay said Rogers for such services so to be rendered, at the rate of $1,000 per year for the first five years of such services, and thereafter the same or such larger salary as may be agreed upon by said Rogers and the directors of said companies, said salary to be in full during said term of all services to be rendered by said Rogers, whether as an employe or an officer of said companies, unless otherwise agreed. (3) The said Rogers, in consideration of the foregoing, agrees that he will remain with and serve said companies under the direction of said Watrous, as general agent and manager, including such duties as traveling for said companies, as said general agent may devolve upon him, including also any duties as secretary or other officer of either or both of said companies, as said companies may desire to have him perform at the salary hereinbefore named for the first five years and at such other or further or different compensation thereafter during the remainder of the twenty-five years as he, the said Rogers, and the said companies may agree upon. (4) The said Rogers during said term stipulates and agrees that he will not be engaged or allow his name to be employed in any manner in any other hardware, cutlery, flatware, or hollow-ware business either as manufacturer or seller, but will give, while he shall be so employed by said companies, his entire time and services to the interests of said common business, diminished only by sickness, and such reasonable absence for vacations or otherwise as may be agreed upon between him and said general agent." The complaint was held insufficient, and the plaintiffs appealed.

ANDREWS, C. J. Contracts for personal service are matters for courts of law, and equity will not undertake a specific performance. 2 Kent, Comm. 258, note b; Hamblin v. Dinneford, 2 Edw. Ch. 529; Sanguirico v. Benedetti, 1 Barb. 315; Haight v. Badgley, 15 Barb. 499; De Rivafinoli v. Corsetti, 4 Paige, 264. A specific performance in such cases is said to be impossible because obedience to the decree cannot be compelled by the ordinary processes of the court. Contracts for personal acts have been regarded as the most familiar illustrations of this doctrine, since the court cannot in any direct manner compel the party to render the service. The courts in this country and in England formerly held that they could not negatively enforce the specific performance of such contracts by means of an injunction restraining their violation. 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 754; Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 340; Burton v. Marshall, 4 Gill, 487; De Pol v. Sohlke, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 280; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333; Baldwin v. Society, 9 Sim. 393; Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132. The courts in both countries have, however, receded somewhat from the latter conclusion, and it is now held that where a contract stipulates for special, unique, or extraordinary personal services or acts, or where the services to be rendered are purely intellectual, or are peculiar and individual in their character, the court will grant an injunction in aid of a specific performance. But where the services are material or mechanical, or are not peculiar or individual, the party will be left to his action for damages. The reason seems to be that services of the former class are of such a nature as to preclude the possibility of giving the injured party adequate compensation in damages, while the loss of services of the latter class can be adequately compensated by an action for damages. 2 Story, Fq. Jur. § 958a; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 754; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1343; California Bank v. Fresno Canal, etc., Co., 53 Cal. 201; Singer Sewing-Machine Co. v. Union Button-Hole Co., 1 Holmes, 253, Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604; Railroad Co. v. Wythes, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 880; Montague v. Flockton, L. R. 16 Eq. 189. The contract between the defendant and the plaintiffs is made a part of the complaint. The services which the defendant was to perform for the plaintiffs are not specified therein, otherwise than that they were to be such as should be devolved upon him by the general manager; "it being understood that such duties may include traveling for said companies whenever, in the judgment of said general agent, the interests of the business will be thereby promoted;" and also "including such duties as traveling for said companies as said general agent may devolve upon him, including also any duties as secretary or other officer of either or both of said companies as said companies may desire to have him perform." These services, while they may not be material and mechanical, are certainly not purely intellectual, nor are they special, or unique, or extraordinary; nor are they so peculiar or individual that they could not be performed by any person of ordinary intelligence and fair learning. If this was all there was in the contract it would be almost too plain for argument that the plaintiffs should not have an injunction.

The plaintiffs, however, insist that the negative part of the contract, by which the defendant stipulated and agreed that he would not be engaged in or allow his name to be employed in any manner in any other hardware, cutlery, flatware or hollow-ware business, either as a manufacturer or seller, fully entitles them to an injunction against its violation. They aver in the complaint, on information and belief, that the defendant is planning with certain of their competitors to engage with them in business, with the intent and purpose of allowing his name to be used or employed in connection with such business as a stamp on the ware manufactured; and they say such use would do them great and irreparable injury. If the plaintiffs owned the name of the defendant as a trade-mark, they could have no difficulty in protecting their ownership; but they make no such claim, and all arguments or analogies drawn from the law of trade-marks may be laid wholly out of the case. There is no averment in the complaint that the plaintiffs are entitled to use, or that in fact they do use, the name of the defendant as a stamp on the goods of their own manufacture, nor any averment that such use, if it exists, is of any value to them. So far as the court is informed, the defendant's name on such goods as the plaintiffs manufacture is of no more value than the names of Smith or Stiles or John Doe. There is nothing from which the court can see that the use of the defendant's name by the plaintiffs is of any value to them, or that its use as a stamp by their competitors would do them any injury other than such as might grow out of a lawful business rivalry. If by reason of extraneous facts the name of the defendant does have some special and peculiar value as a stamp on their goods, or its use as a stamp on goods manufactured by their rivals would do them some special injury, such facts ought to have been set out so that the court might pass upon them. In the absence of any allegation of such facts we must assume that none exist. The plaintiffs also aver that the defendant intends to make known to their rivals the knowledge of their business, of their customers, etc., which he has obtained while in their employ. But here they have not shown facts which bring the case within any rule that would require an employee to be enjoined from disclosing business secrets which he has learned in the course of his employment, and which he has contracted not to divulge. Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452. There is no error in the judgment of the superior court. The other judges concurred.

METROPOLITAN EXHIBITION CO. v.
EWING.

Circuit Court, S. D. New York. March 25, 1890.

In Equity. On bill for injunction.

Joseph F. Choate and George F. Duysters, for plaintiff.

Henry Bacon, for defendant.

WALLACE, J. This action is brought to restrain a threatened breach of contract for the performance of personal services which require special aptitude, skill, and experience. It is a case in which an action at law would not afford the plaintiff an adequate remedy for the breach, and in which the power of the court should be exercised by preventive interposition, if it is found that the contract is such as the plaintiff claims it to be. The circumstances are such that, unless a preliminary injunction is granted, the plaintiff will obtain no effectual remedy, because, before the cause can be brought to final hearing, the time will have passed within which the relief sought would be practically useful, and, if it be then adjudged that the plaintiff is entitled to a permanent injunction, the judgment will be declaratory merely. Although preliminary relief is not to be granted in a case in which it is doubtful whether the plaintiff will be finally successful, yet, where the questions are such that they can be fully considered and as safely decided upon a motion for a preliminary injunction as at final hearing, it is the duty of the court to consider and determine them, and not defer the party invoking its assistance to a time when a decree, if awarded, would be too late.

The contract upon which the plaintiff founds its claim for relief is in form between the New York Base-Ball Club as party of the first part, and the defendant as party of the second part; but there is no reason to doubt that the New York Base-Ball Club was the agent of the plaintiff in entering into the contract, that the plaintiff is the real principal, that the contract was intended to inure for the benefit of the plaintiff, and that the plaintiff is entitled to enforce it against the defendant to the extent that the New York Base-Ball Club could do so. The doctrine is now generally recognized that, while a court of equity will not ordinarily attempt to enforce contracts which cannot be carried out by the machinery of a court, like that involved in the present case, it may nevertheless practically accomplish the same end by enjoining the breach of a negative promise, and this power will be exercised whenever the contract is one of which the court would direct specific performance, if it could practically compel its observance by the party refusing to perform through a decree for specific performance. It is indispensable, where the contract does not relate to realty, that it be one for the breach of which damages would not afford an adequate compensation to the plaintiff. It must be one in which the plaintiff comes into court with clean hands, and which is not so oppressive as to render it unjust to the defendant to enforce it. It must be one in which there are mutual promises, or which is founded on a sufficient consideration. It must be one the terms of which are certain, and in respect to which the minds of the parties have distinctly met, so that there can be no misunderstanding of their rights and obligations.

The contract is executed as of the date of April 29, 1889. It is a formal document, consisting of 20 articles, by which the New York Base-Ball Club employs the defendant, and the defendant undertakes to perform professional services as a base-ball player for the club for the season (specified in article 2) beginning April 1, 1889, and ending October 31, 1889. Article 20 provides that the salary to be paid the defendant shall be $2,000, payable semi-monthly. Among other things, the contract provides by different articles that the club may at any time terminate the contract on 10 days' notice to the defendant, whereupon the obligations of both parties are to cease; that the club shall provide the defendant while "abroad" with proper board and lodging, and pay all necessary traveling expenses; that if the defendant, during the term of his employment, be guilty of any excessive indulgence in liquor, or of gambling, or of insubordination, he shall be liable to certain specified penalties; and that, if the club ceases to be a member of the National League of Professional Base-Ball Clubs, either compulsorily or voluntarily, the "defendant shall, if the right of reservation be transferred" by the club to any other club, receive from that club at least the same amount in salary that he receives by the present contract. It contains, also, the following provision: "Article 18. It is further understood and agreed that the party of the first part shall have the right to 'reserve' the said party of the second part for the season next ensuing the term mentioned in paragraph 2, herein provided, and that said right and privilege is hereby accorded to said party of the first part upon the following conditions, which are to be taken and construed as conditions precedent to the exercise of such extraordinary rights or privileges, viz.: (1) That the said party of the second part shall not be reserved at a salary less than that mentioned in the 20th paragraph herein, except by the consent of the party of the second part; (2) that the said party of the second part, if he be reserved by the said party of the first part for the next ensuing season, shall not be one of more than 14 players then under contract,—that is, that the right of reservation shall be limited to that number of players, and no more."

day of October, 1889, plaintiff exercised its option to reserve the defendant for the season of 1890 by giving the defendant due and timely notice, in writing, of its intention to do so; and that, notwithstanding the exercise of this option, the defendant has engaged his services for the season of 1890 to another organization, to act for it as a base-ball player during that season. The plaintiff insists that, by the terms of the contract, it is entitled to the services of the defendant as a base-ball player for the season of 1890 upon the terms and conditions of the contract for the season of 1889, except the condition giving a right to reserve him for a subsequent season.

The case turns upon the meaning and effect of the clause and contract which gives the club the right to reserve the defendant for the season next ensuing. It is plain enough that the option is a right of reservation for the next ensuing season only,—the season ensuing the term mentioned in article 2,—and does not extend beyond the term from April 1, 1890, to October 31, 1890. It is equally plain that the salary for the ensuing season is to be the same as that for the season of 1889, unless the parties mutually consent to a change. But what is the character of the option which the plaintiff is permitted to exercise? What is the right to "reserve" the defendant? If it is the right to retain and have his services as a base-ball player for the season of 1890, when is the right of election to be manifested, and upon what terms are these services to be rendered? Can the club wait until April 1, 1890, before it manifests its intention to exercise the option? Is the club to pay the defendant's board and lodging while he is "abroad," serving the club, during the season of 1890? Can the club discharge him at any time during that season on 10 days' notice? Are the penalties for intoxication, gambling, or insubordination enforceable during the season of 1890? In short, does the contract embody the definite understanding of the parties to it in respect to their reciprocal rights and obligations after the season of 1889 shall have ended? If the term, "the right to reserve," has no defined meaning, and there were no extrinsic sources by which to ascertain the sense in which it is used by the parties, it would be an ambiguous phrase. As applied to a contract for personal services, the right to reserve would convey a very unintelligible conception of the conditions and incidents of the service to be rendered or enjoyed. A contract by which one party agrees, for an equivalent, to reserve himself for another for a stated period, or to reserve himself as a lawyer or doctor or artist or laborer for a specified term, would very inadequately express a promise to devote his professional or manual services exclusively to the other during that period; and the promise of a base-ball player to reserve himself for a particular club for a given season would hardly, without more, convey any definite meaning of the understanding of the parties. It certainly would not bind him to submit to any special rules or regulations respecting the performance of his services not expressly consented to, or not to be necessarily implied from the nature of the employment and the situation of the contracting parties. If it had been the meaning of the contract to allow the club to renew the engagement of the defendant for a second season upon the same conditions as those for the first season, that intention could have been easily and unequivocally expressed. As it is, it is left wholly to implication, unless the "right to reserve" is a term having a defined and specific signification. This ambiguity suggests such grave doubt as to the meaning of the clause that in two adjudged cases, in which it has been considered by the courts, the judges have thought it too indefinite to be enforceable. In Exhibition Co. v. Ward, 9 N. Y. Supp. 779, (in the supreme court of this state,) Mr. Justice O'Brien was of the opinion that the failure to provide for the terms and conditions of the contract for the second season rendered the clause so indefinite and uncertain that it could not be the basis of equitable relief, or that it meant that every player is bound for the ensuing season upon the same terms and conditions as those of the first season, including the signing of a new contract containing the option to reserve. In Philadelphia Ball Club against Hallman, in the court of common pleas of Philadelphia, Judge Thayer was of the opinion that the failure to designate the terms and conditions of the new engagement under which the player is to be reserved rendered the contract of reservation wholly uncertain, and therefore incapable of enforcement.

Where the terms employed to express some particular condition of a contract are ambiguous, and cannot be satisfactorily explained by reference to other parts of the contract, and the parties have made other contracts in respect to the same subject-matter, and apparently in pursuance of the same general purpose, it is always permissible to examine all of them together in aid of the interpretation of the particular condition; and, if it is found that the ambiguous term has a plain meaning by a comparison of the several contracts and an examination of their provisions, that meaning should be attributed to it in the particular condition. So, also, if it appears that the term used has an established meaning among those engaged in the business to which the contract has reference, and, unless it is given that meaning, is indefinite and equivocal, it should be treated, in interpreting the contract, as used according to that understanding; and in construing a contract the court is always at liberty to look at the surrounding and antecedent circumstances, and avail itself of the light of any extrinsic facts which will enable it to view the contract from the standpoint of the parties at the time when it was made. In the present case, it will satisfactorily appear, by resort to these sources of interpretation, that the term "right to reserve" is used in the contract in the sense that obtains in base-ball nomenclature, and that it is intended to signify an option, the character of which was well understood by base-ball clubs and professional players when the present contract was made. Obviously, the right to reserve given by the eighteenth clause of the contract is the same thing as the right of reservation mentioned in that part of the contract which provides that the present club may disband, and transfer its right of reservation to some other club. The agreement is in a form common to all contracts between base-ball clubs organized under what is known as the "national agreement" and professional players, a form which is prescribed by the national agreement. The national agreement is a compact between the various base-ball associations constituting the National League Base-Ball Clubs and the American Association of Base-Ball Clubs, made with a view to regulate the rights and obligations of the members as respects one another. One of its paramount features consists of provisions regulating the privilege of clubs to reserve a stated number of players. The provisions are framed to prevent any club of the National League or the American Association from engaging a player already reserved by another, and to render the player so reserved ineligible for employment by any other club. They require each club, on the 10th day of October in each year, to transmit to all the other clubs a reserved list of players, not exceeding 14 in number, then under contract, and of such players reserved in any prior list who have refused to contract for another year, and declare such players ineligible to contract with any other club. Inasmuch as the parties to the national agreement comprise all, or substantially all, the clubs in the country which employ professional players, this national agreement, by indirection, but practically, affects every professional player, and subordinates his privilege of engaging as he chooses to the option of the club by which he is under reservation. As is stated in a recent publication edited by a prominent professional player: "The most important feature of the national agreement, unquestionably, is the provision according to the club members the privilege of reserving a stated number of players. No other club of any association under the agreement dare engage any player so reserved. To this rule, more than any other thing, does base-ball, as a business, owe its present substantial standing. By preserving intact the strength of the team from year to year, it places the business of base-ball on a permanent basis, and thus offers security to the investment of capital. The reserve rule itself is a usurpation of the player's rights; but it is, perhaps, made necessary by the peculiar nature of the ball business, and the player is indirectly compensated by the improved standing of the game. The reserve rule takes a manager by the throat, and compels him to keep his hands off his neighbor's enterprise."

In the contracts between clubs and players as framed prior to November, 1887, there was no provision by which the player consented to the option for reserve on the part of the club. But the contracts did contain a condition that the player should conform to, and be governed by, the constitution and provisions of the national agreement; and the player thereby assented to become ineligible for engagement by any other club of the league during the season of his engagement by a particular club, or while the option of re-engaging him for an ensuing year on the part of that club remained in force. Changes were made from time to time in various features of the national agreement. The players were obliged to inform themselves of the latest changes, in order to understand the precise terms of their contract with the clubs. They became unwilling to consent to a form of contract by which they were to be subjected to conditions not mentioned in the contract itself. In November, 1887, a committee representing the professional players met a committee representing the parties to the national agreement for the purpose of agreeing upon certain changes to be made in the form of the contract. The committees finally agreed that the obnoxious clause in the contract should be omitted, and the clause now found in the eighteenth article should be inserted. This was the origin of the clause giving to the club, by the contract itself, the option of reserve. The clause was manifestly inserted in order to give, by an express condition, the right of reservation to the clubs which theretofore the players had only given by agreeing to be bound by the terms of the national agreement. By ascertaining what that right of reservation was, it can be plainly seen what the parties had in mind in using the term in the present contract. If, when the contract was made, the term had a well-understood definition, there was no necessity to particularize in the contract the conditions or characteristics of the option.

Reference has already been made to the provision of the national agreement requiring each club, on the 10th day of October in each year, to transmit to all the other clubs a reserved list of players, and declaring such players ineligible to contract with any other club. This provision is to be read in connection with another provision of the national agreement, which prescribes that no contract shall be made "for the services of any player by any club for a longer period than seven months, beginning April 1st and terminating October 31st, and no such contract for services to be rendered after the expiration of the current year shall be made prior to the 20th day of October of such year." The two provisions, read together, allow a period of 10 days to intervene between the time when a club can exercise the privilege of placing a player upon its reserved list and the time when it can make a contract with him for services to be rendered in an ensuing year, thus emphasizing a distinction between the right to treat the player as reserved and the contract which is to fix the terms upon which the reservation is to be complete. The effect of these provisions is that, when the club has exercised its privilege of reservation, no other club is permitted to negotiate with the player; but the club which has placed him upon the reserved list, and no other, is then at liberty to enter into a contract with him to obtain his services for an ensuing year. Consequently the right of reservation is nothing more or less than a prior and exclusive right, as against the other clubs, to enter into a contract securing the player's services for another season. Until the contract is made which fixes the compensation of the player and the other conditions of his service, there is no definite or complete obligation upon his part to engage with the club. He agrees that he will not negotiate with any other club, but enjoys the privilege of engaging with the reserving club or not, as he sees fit. Read with this understanding, the clause in question by which the privilege of reserving the defendant is given to the club expresses definitely the terms of the option. If the club exercises the right of reservation, it agrees in advance that the player shall receive at least as large a salary as he has received during the current year, and leaves it open to him to contract on that basis for the next season, or to insist on a larger salary. All the other terms of the engagement are matters of negotiation between the club and the player. The law implies that the option of reservation is to be exercised within a reasonable time; but when this has been done the right to reserve the player becomes the privilege, and the exclusive privilege, as between the reserving club and the other clubs, to obtain his services for another year if the parties can agree upon the terms. As a coercive condition which places the player practically, or at least measurably, in a situation where he must contract with the club that has reserved him, or face the probability of losing any engagement for the ensuing season, it is operative and valuable to the club. But, as the basis for an action for damages if the player fails to contract, or for an action to enforce specific performance, it is wholly nugatory. In a legal sense, it is merely a contract to make a contract if the parties can agree. It may be that heretofore the clubs have generally insisted upon treating the option to reserve as a contract by which they were entitled to have the services of the player for the next season upon the terms and conditions of the first season, and even requiring him to enter into a new contract containing the option for reservation; and it may be that the players have generally acquiesced in the claims of the clubs. However this may be, the players were not in a position to act independently; and, if they had refused to consent to the terms proposed by the clubs, they would have done so at the peril of losing any engagement. The facts, therefore, are not such as to permit any weight to be given to the acts of the parties as evincing their own construction of the contract.

It follows that the act of the defendant in refusing to negotiate with the club for an engagement for the season of 1890, while a breach of contract, is not the breach of one which the plaintiff can enforce. The motion for an injunction is denied.

ALLEGHENY BASE-BALL CLUB v.
BENNETT.

Circuit Court, W. W. Pennsylvania. November 18, 1882.

In Equity. Bill to enforce compliance with agreement to enter into contract to give personal services.

Bill in equity by the Allegheny Base-ball Club, a corporation of Pennsylvania, against Charles W. Bennett, a citizen of Michigan, to compel the respondent to execute a formal contract to give his exclusive services as a base-ball player to the complainant during the base-ball season of 1883, and also for an injunction to restrain him from executing a like agreement with the Detroit Base-ball Club, and from performing such services for any other person or corporation than the complainant during the season named.

The bill was filed on the fifth day of October, 1882, and was based upon the following written instrument, to-wit:

"It is hereby agreed, this third day of August, 1882, between the Allegheny Base-ball Club and Charles W. Bennett, that said Charles W. Bennett hereby promises and binds himself that between the fifteenth and thirty-first days of October, 1882, he will sign a regular contract of the Allegheny Base-ball Club, a chartered company belonging to the American Association of Base-ball Clubs, which contract shall bind him to give his services as a base-ball player to said club for the season of 1883, and shall bind said Allegheny Club to pay him the sum of $1,700 for and during such season of 1883; and in consideration of his agreement to sign such a contract in October, the sum of $100 is now paid to said C. W. Bennett, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged. Witness our hands and seals this third day of August, 1882.

"H. D. McKnight, President. [Seal.]

"C. W. Bennett. [Seal.]

"A. G. Pratt, Witness."

The bill averred substantially that the complainant was engaged in the business of playing base-ball for profit, and that by the expenditure of much time and large sums of money it made preparations for the exhibition of such games, and expected to receive large returns from the same; that the respondent was a skillful player of base-ball, and, in consequence of his agreement with complainant, E. N. Williamson and James F. Galvin, two other skillful players, had entered into a similar agreement with complainant; that respondent had refused to sign the "regular contract" referred to, and had entered into a like contract with the Detroit Base-ball Club; that, accordingly, Williamson and Galvin refused to keep their said engagement with complainant, and that the base-ball season had now so far advanced that complainant could not secure other players of equal skill with said Bennett, Williamson, and Galvin, whereby complainant "would be seriously damaged, to an amount of not less than $1,000."

The bill prayed that Bennett be required to sign the "regular contract," and perform his covenants, and also that he be restrained from entering into a similar contract with the Detroit Base-ball Club, or any other association or person, and from playing base ball "for hire," during the base-ball season of 1883, for any other than complainant.

The complainant moved for a preliminary injunction. The motion was argued by James Bakewell, and was opposed by A. Tausig, and was denied. The respondent then filed a general demurrer, on the grounds: (1) That the bill was prematurely brought; (2) that the agreement was a mere preliminary arrangement, anticipating the making of a final contract, and that, therefore, there was no contract before the court capable of specific enforcement; (3) that the agreement was unlimited as to place, and was, therefore, unreasonable and void as against public policy, as covenants in restraint of trade; (4) that the complainant had an adequate remedy at law.

A. Tausig, A. W. Duff, and Marshall Brown, for demurrer.

To maintain a suit there must be a cause of action when such suit is commenced. 55 Ga. 329; 29 Ill. 497; 4 Sneed, 583. One who has anything to do on a particular day has the whole of that day to perform such act, so that suit for a breach of performance cannot be instituted until the next day. 102 Mass. 65; 6 Watts & S. 179; 18 Cal. 378. And, in general, the time within which a contract is to be executed is as much the essence of it as any other part. 6 Wis. 120; 43 Me. 158; 18 Ind. 365; 17 Me. 316; 22 Me. 133.

(1) The present bill for an injunction to restrain the defendant from playing with the Detroit Club, as in violation of the alleged agreement, will not lie for the reason the contract is a mere preliminary arrangement, and not a final agreement. What are the terms of the alleged contract? They provide and contemplate the execution of a regular agreement, in order to bind the parties and render the contract mutual, final, and conclusive. The preliminary contract shows that it was executed with reference to a future and final agreement between the parties. A contract requires mutuality as to all its essential terms, stipulations, and conditions. Is there any allegation upon the face of the bill that a final, regular contract was ever agreed upon between the parties? There is no contract, therefore, capable of being enforced in a court of equity, and the present bill must be dismissed. Railway Co. v. Wythes, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 888. Specific performance will not be decreed if it is not clear that the minds of the parties have come together. Wistar's Appeal, 80 Pa. 484.

(2) Specific performance will not be enforced, directly or indirectly, unless the agreement is mutual, its terms certain, its enforcement practicable, and the complainant is without adequate redress in an action at law, (Bisp. Eq. § 377, and cases cited; 10 Wall. 339; 5 De Gex, M. & G. 888;) and it will not be enforced when it is doubtful whether an agreement has been concluded, (14 Pet. 77; 81 Pa. 484;) nor where the duties are continuous and require skill and judgment, (10 Wall. 339.) A court of chancery will not decree the specific performance of a contract, where it would be impossible for the court to enforce the execution of its decree, or where the literal performance, if enforced, would be a vain and idle act. Bisp. Eq. 436.

(3) Even if the alleged contract is legal and binding on the defendant, the demurrer should be sustained, because the plaintiff has an adequate remedy at law. It may have to pay a higher salary to secure a player of Bennett's skill, and the difference would be the measure of damages for breach of contract.

(4) Even if the court should be of the opinion that a contract was executed, full, final, and mutual as to all its terms, conditions, and stipulations, and also of opinion that negative covenants not to exercise a trade, profession, or calling within reasonable limits may be enforced by injunction, such conclusion would have no application to enjoin and restrain the defendant. The contract is unreasonable and void on grounds of public policy, as in cases of covenants in restraint of trade, because it is unlimited. McClurg's Appeal, 58 Pa. 51; Gillis v. Hall, 2 Brewst. 342; Catt v. Tourle, L. R. 4 Ch. App. 654.

(5) The demurrer should be sustained because equity will not indirectly enforce specific performance of a contract for personal services where the services require a succession of acts whose performance cannot be accumulated by one transaction, but will be continuous and require the exercise of special knowledge, skill or judgment. Pom. Spec. Per. § 312; Ford v. Jermon, 6 Phila. 6; De Pol v. Sohlke, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 280; Sanquiricio v. Benedetti, 1 Barb. 315; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333; Hills v. Croll, 2 Phila. 60; Rolfe v. Rolfe, 15 Sim. 88; Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132; Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Sim. 340. The personal acts with respect to which courts of equity entertain jurisdiction to decree specific performance have reference to property of some kind. There is none where a contract for personal services alone has been actively enforced. There are several, however, in which the court has interfered negatively. Thus, in the case of a theater, considered as a partnership, a contract with the proprietors not to write dramatic pieces for any other theater is valid, and a violation of it will be restrained by injunction. Clark v. Price, 2 Wils. 157; Willard, Eq. 278. But where there is no partnership between the parties, and the defendant has violated his engagement to one theater and formed a conflicting engagement with another, a court of equity will not interfere either actively to compel performance of one contract, or negatively to prevent the performance of the other. Willard, Eq. 278; Kemble v. Kean, 6 Sim. 333. The cases where injunctions have issued relate (1) to partnership agreements; (2) to property of some kind; (3) to express negative covenants. Willard, Eq. 277, 278.

(6) If the court should be of opinion that the alleged contract is complete, mutual, certain, and final, and that under it the plaintiff has no full, complete, and adequate remedy at law, the present bill will not lie for the following reasons: (1) It is prematurely brought. No injury to plaintiff (if any) can arise until the ball season of 1883 commences. As the plaintiff will not be actively engaged under the alleged contract until the regular season of 1883 opens, no damage can result until that time from the act which it is sought to enjoin. (2) There is no right to, or necessity for, an injunction, for it cannot appear, at the present time, that defendant will play ball during the season of 1883, in violation of said alleged contract. De Rivafinoli v. Corsetti, 4 Paige, 264; De Pol v. Sohlke, 7 Rob. (N. Y.) 283. If the injury be doubtful, eventual, or contingent, equity will not enjoin. Rhodes v. Dunbar, 57 Pa. 274; Huckenstein's Appeal, 70 Pa. 108. If the alleged injury is only problematical, according as other circumstances may or may not arise, or if there is no pressing need for an injunction, the court will not grant it until a tort has actually been committed. Kerr, Injunc. 339.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Sept. 20, 1849.

Appeal from district court, Allegheny county, in equity.

On the 6th September, 1847, Z. W. Remington filed a bill in equity, setting forth that, prior to the grievances complained of, he had been for many years a surveyor and regulator of the streets, lanes, and alleys of the city of Pittsburgh, and other places around said city, and as such had made many plans and plots of ground in said city and throughout said county, and maps of lands and grades of streets and roads, and drafts of surveys of plantations in other counties adjoining, and possessed certain furniture and instruments of surveying, which were of great value to him, a list of which is appended to this bill, and prayed to be made and taken as part thereof,—marked as "Exhibit A."

That on or about 1st April, 1843, intending to engage in other occupations and to remove from Pittsburgh, where he had before resided and had his office for several years, and reposing all confidence in the defendant, the defendant having been for several years under the complainant's tuition and under his service as a surveyor, the complainant, desirous and intending to benefit defendant, who purposed to succeed and follow in the business pursued by the complainant, left in the care and custody of defendant, and for the mere purpose of promoting the interest and business of defendant, all his plots of survey and plans, drafts and property, as set forth in Exhibit A, besides other plots and drafts, which he cannot recollect, that defendant might refer to and use in his said business until they would be required by complainant, he, complainant, expecting some day to resume his old business of surveyor at Pittsburgh, in case he should not succeed in his new occupation.

That complainant, after he had left the said plots, plans, drafts, and property with defendant, went to dwell in Beaver county, and left them in the office which complainant had occupied before and at his said departure from Pittsburgh, and the possession of which said office he gave up to defendant along with the said plots, plans, drafts, and furniture and instruments aforesaid, all which things are of real value to complainant, and very difficult and impossible to replace or procure, and no damages for which in a court of law could compensate.

That complainant had used efforts since to procure his papers, furniture, and instruments, to no purpose, defendant refusing to deliver them up, and now threatening that he will destroy them rather than give them up to complainant.

And complainant believes and is informed that the defendant is now engaged in copying many of said plots, plans, and drafts for his own use, and to be used by him as a surveyor in and about said city of Pittsburgh and adjoining counties, to the great injury of complainant; and complainant believes that defendant is disposed and is likely to injure, and fraudulently intends to destroy or secrete said plots, plans, drafts, and instruments, so that complainant may not recommence his business.

That complainant returned to Pittsburgh in the spring of this year, and some time in July last went to defendant's office and demanded of defendant the return of his said plots, plans, drafts, and instruments, informing him that he had returned to Pittsburgh and opened an office, and resumed his business as a surveyor; defendant refused to deliver them to complainant, and said there were some of them he, defendant, could not get along without.

The bill then went on to propound interrogatories to the defendant touching the several allegations of fact before made, and prayed that McGowin be decreed to deliver up to the plaintiff the said plots, etc., and any copies thereof made since demand. The bill further prayed an injunction to restrain McGowin from copying, and from destroying, or injuring, or secreting said plots, etc., and a subpoena to answer. The exhibit, marked A, contained a detailed list of plots, drafts, furniture, instruments, etc., demanded.

The subpoena issued forthwith, and September 9, a bond having been filed, application was made for an injunction, which was awarded and issued. 4th October rule to plead, answer or demur by first Monday in November. 29th October demurrer filed, which was overruled 22d December, and a second special injunction awarded. 3d January, 1848, answer filed, and motion to dissolve injunction.

The answer was to the following effect: It admitted that Remington was a surveyor, and as such had in his possession plans, plots, maps, etc., such as were specified in the bill, with certain exceptions, particularized in a schedule of explanations; that he removed to Beaver, and that respondent occupied his office after he left. The answer affirmed that the plans, etc., were greatly overrated in value, and have no such peculiar characteristics as to make them subjects of equity jurisdiction, by reason of their unique and original description; that most, if not all of them, could be supplied or substituted from other offices, and from private individuals, and from the public records of the county and state, being generally copied, and mostly from papers unofficial and unauthenticated. It affirmed that the plans, etc., belonged, some of them to the respondent, some to other persons, and denied the demand for them, etc.

The complainant filed a replication, and took evidence of his having made the demand mentioned in his bill. On 13th January, 1849, the cause having been heard on the bill, answer, exhibits, and proofs, and on argument of counsel, the court ordered and decreed that the clerk of the court do deliver to the complainant the papers, maps, and plans, which have been placed by order of the court in his custody, and it is ordered and decreed further that the defendant deliver unto Read Washington, Esq., one of the masters in chancery, all the plots, plans, drafts, furniture, and instruments, left in defendant's possession as set forth in the bill of complainant, and which are not now in the possession of the clerk of this court, and also of any copies thereof which may have been made by respondent since the day of the demand thereof stated in the bill, and that the master have power, and is hereby required to ascertain by interrogatories to be exhibited in writing to defendant, whether there are any of the said plans, maps, plots, drafts, furniture, or instruments disclosed in said bill in his possession undelivered, and that the master require defendant to answer thereto upon oath, and to inquire upon interrogatories of defendant, to be administered to him under oath, what copies of or copying from said papers he may have made, and whether the same have been delivered up; and that said master make report (if required by further order) to this court thereof.

And further ordered that the injunction heretofore issued be continued and made perpetual, and that the said master deliver to the complainant the said plans, plots, drafts, furniture, and instruments which may be placed in his hands by virtue of this decree.

And further ordered that the costs and fees in this suit be taxed by the clerk, and that the bill thereof be immediately paid by the defendant into court.

On 20th January, 1849, defendant appealed from this decree, and 20th June following decree was made for a specific delivery, for refusing obedience to which a rule for attachment was taken, and on 4th September respondent appealed. In this court these exceptions were taken:

- (1) Want of jurisdiction over subject-matter of the bill.
- (2) The bill presents no sufficient ground for the interference of a court of equity in Pennsylvania.
- (3) The courts of law have adequate remedies.
- (4) The decree covers some descriptions of property which are not the subject of equity jurisdiction under any state of facts.

Craft & McCandless, for appellant. Mr. Dunlop, for appellee.

BELL, J. The defendant having failed to sustain, by proof, his allegation of sale or gift of the articles sought to be recovered by this bill, the contest in this court is reduced to two questions: First, whether the bill presents sufficient grounds to warrant the interference of a court of equity, in this state, under the statute conferring equitable jurisdiction? Secondly, whether that portion of the decree which covers the surveying instruments and furniture described in the exhibits annexed to the bill can be sustained?

As to the first point, the defendant insists that the only remedy is at law. Though the action of replevin is, with us, a broader remedy than in England, lying in all cases where one man improperly detains the goods of another, it is in no instance effective to enforce a specific return of chattels, since a claim of property and bond given is always sufficient to defeat reclamation, no matter what may be the eventual issue of the contest. As, therefore, our common-law tribunals are as powerless for such a purpose, as the similar English courts, the propriety of exerting the equitable jurisdiction now invoked must depend with us on the same reasons that are deemed sufficient to call it into action there. Here, as there, the inquiry must be whether the law affords adequate redress by a compensation in damages, where the complaint is of the detention of personal chattels. If not, the aid of a court of chancery will always be extended to remedy the injury, by decreeing a return of the thing itself.

The precise ground of this jurisdiction is said to be the same as that upon which the specific performance of an agreement is enforced, namely, that fruition of the thing, the subject of the agreement, is the object, the failure of which would be but illy supplied by an award of damages. Lowther v. Lowther, 13 Ves. 389. In the application of this rule some difficulty has been experienced. The examples afforded by the English books are usually those cases, where, from the nature of the thing sought after, its antiquity, or because of some peculiarity connected with it, it cannot easily, or at all, be replaced. Of these may be instanced the title deeds of an estate and other muniments of property,—valuable paintings (Lowther v. Lowther, supra); an antique silver altar piece (Duke of Somerset v. Cookson, 3 P. Wms. 389); an ancient horn, the symbol of tenure, by which an estate is held (Pusey v. Pusey, 1 Ves. 273); heirlooms (3 Ves. & B. 18); and even a finely carved cherry-stone (Amb. 77). Such articles as these are commonly esteemed not altogether, or perhaps at all, for their intrinsic value, but as being objects of attachment or curiosity, and, therefore, not to be measured in damages by a jury, who cannot enter into the feelings of the owner. So too the impossibility, or even great difficulty, of supplying their loss, may put damages out of the question as a medium of redress. But these are not the exclusive reasons why chancery interferes, for there may be cases in which the thing sought to be recovered is susceptible of reproduction or substitution, and yet where damages could not be so estimated as to cover present loss or compensate its future consequent inconvenience. And I take it this is always so, where, from the nature of the subject or the immediate object of the parties, no convenient measure of damages can be ascertained; or, where nothing could answer the justice of the case but the performance of a contract in specie. Of this Buxton v. Lister, 3 Atk. 384, furnishes an example in the analogous instance of a contract for the sale of personalty,—contracts, which are most commonly left to be dealt with at law. It was a bill to enforce the performance of an agreement for the purchase of several large parcels of growing wood, to be severed by the defendants, who were to have eight years to dispose of it, and to pay for it in six yearly installments. Lord Hardwicke was, at first, extremely reluctant to entertain the bill, but after discussion came to the conclusion that, though relating to a personal chattel, it was such an agreement that the plaintiff might come into chancery for a specific performance. He instanced the case of Taylor v. Neville, which was a bill for the performance of articles for the sale of eight hundred tons of iron, to be paid for in a certain number of years, by installments, where the decree prayed for was made; and proceeded to observe: "Such sort of contracts as these differ from those that are immediately to be executed. There are several circumstances which may concur. A man may contract for the purchase of a great quantity of timber, as a ship carpenter, by reason of the vicinity of the timber; and this is on the part of the buyer. On the part of the seller, suppose a man wants to clear his land in order to turn it to a particular sort of husbandry; there nothing can answer the justice of the case but the performance of the contract in specie." Similar in principle is the case of Falls v. Reid, 13 Ves. 70, where the plaintiffs prayed the restoration of an engraved silver snuffbox, used for many years by a society, as the symbol of their association; and Nutbrown v. Thomson, where a tenant brought a bill against his lessor, who, under the pretense of the tenant's covenant, had repossessed himself of the land, and seized upon the stock of cattle, which by the lease the tenant was to enjoy for seven years. The objection was that the tenant's remedy, if he was entitled to one at all, was at law, in damages. But how, asked Lord Eldon, are damages to be estimated in such a case? The direction to a jury must be to give, not the value of the chattels, but their value to the tenant! A similar question may well be propounded in our case. By what standard would you measure the injury the plaintiff may sustain in futuro from being deprived, even for a brief period, of the use of papers essential to the prosecution of his business? Their intrinsic value might, perhaps, be ascertained by an estimate of the labor necessary to their reproduction, admitting the means to be at hand, and within the power of the plaintiff. But how could a tribunal ascertain the probable loss which, in the meantime, might be sustained? The present pecuniary injury might be little or nothing, and so possibly of the future; or it might be very great, depending upon the unascertainable events of coming time, as these may be influenced by the misconduct of the defendant. These considerations show, I think, the case is not one for damages. Besides, as many of the maps, plans, surveys, and calculations are said to be copies of private papers, we are by no means satisfied they could be replaced at all. Certainly not without permission of the owners; a risk to which the plaintiff ought not unnecessarily to be exposed. If to these reflections we add the fact that some of these documents are the original work of the plaintiff, of value as being predicated upon data possibly no longer accessible, a wrong is perpetrated which a chancellor ought not to hesitate in relieving. It is enough for this purpose that a perfect relief at law is not apparent. The thing to be guarded against is, not the invasion of the defendant's rights, for he stands here absolutely without any, except the common interest every citizen has in preserving the proper line of distinction that divides the jurisdiction and limits the powers of the several courts. What is to be avoided is an unnecessary trespass upon the province of the common-law tribunals, and this is to be tested by the simple query whether they offer a full remedy for the wrong complained of?

But there is another ground upon which this proceeding may be sustained. In Falls v. Reid, the snuffbox was deposited with the defendant, as a member of the society, upon certain terms, to be redelivered upon the happening of certain events. Lord Rosslyn held that under these facts, the defendant was a depositary on an express trust which, upon a common ground of equity, gave the plaintiff title to sue in that court; and in this he was supported by Lord Eldon, in the subsequent case of Nutbrown v. Thornton. According to the proof in our case, the papers and documents claimed were left with the defendant under the express understanding that they were to be redelivered whenever the plaintiff should see fit to resume the business of his then profession in this city. It is then the case of direct confidence violated,—a spell sufficiently potent to call into vigorous activity the authority invoked.

As to the second question, it is perhaps enough to say that, when once a court of equity takes cognizance of a litigation, it will dispose of every subject embraced within the circle of contest, whether the question be of remedy or of distinct yet connected topics of dispute. If the jurisdiction once attaches from the nature of one of the subjects of contest, it may embrace all of them, for equity abhors multiplicity of suits. Thus, in the case last cited, the chancellor ruled that where a person is found wrongfully in possession of a farm, over which the court had undoubted power, and also in possession of the stock upon it, at the same time and under the effect of the same wrong, the court will undoubtedly make him account for and deliver back the whole. In the case at bar the surveying instruments and office furniture stand in the same category with the maps, drafts, etc., were delivered to the defendant at the same time, and are withheld by an exertion of the same wrong. In short, they enter into and make part of the same transaction, and may, therefore, be the objects of the same measure of redress.

Decree affirmed.

PROSPECT PARK & C. I. R. CO. v. CONEY ISLAND & B. R. CO.

Court of Appeals of New York. Dec. 11, 1894.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, Second department.

Action by the Prospect Park & Coney Island Railroad Company against the Coney Island & Brooklyn Railroad Company for specific performance. From a judgment of the general term (21 N. Y. Supp. 1046) reversing a judgment for plaintiff, it appeals. Reversed.

George W. Wingate, for appellant. William N. Dykman, for respondent.

BARTLETT, J. The parties to this action entered into a contract June 1, 1882, and the plaintiff seeks to compel its specific performance. The special term rendered judgment for plaintiff; the general term reversed the judgment; and the plaintiff comes here under the usual stipulation in case of affirmance. The reversal was for error both of law and fact, and, the failure to insert a certificate that the case contains all the evidence having been cured by the amendment of the return by the supreme court, we are called upon to review the facts as well as the law.

At the time of making the contract, the plaintiff owned a steam surface railroad, usually known as "Culver's Coney Island Railroad," which extended from Coney Island to a depot at the corner of Ninth avenue and Twentieth street, in the city of Brooklyn, and adjoining Greenwood Cemetery; the plaintiff also owned certain horse-car railroads, which were entirely distinct from the steam railroad, extending from the depot to Fulton ferry; the plaintiff also owned a charter entitling it to construct a horse-car line from the depot to Hamilton Ferry and other points. The defendant, at the time of executing the contract, was operating certain horse-car lines which ran from Hamilton, Fulton, and other ferries, and from the East River bridge, to Ninth street and Ninth avenue, and through Ninth avenue to Fifteenth street, on Fifteenth street to Coney Island avenue, and thence to Coney Island. These lines were operated wholly by horses. By the contract the plaintiff granted the defendant the right to use its tracks on Ninth avenue from Fifteenth street to the depot at Ninth avenue and Twentieth street, free of charge, for 21 years from June 1, 1882. The defendant covenanted to run during the spring, summer, and fall months, to plaintiff's depot, cars to connect with the ferries and all plaintiff's trains to and from Coney Island. The plaintiff agreed to furnish defendant necessary terminal facilities at the depot. This contract was obviously advantageous to both parties.

The plaintiff secured passengers to Coney Island from defendant's lines, and the defendant greatly increased its travel by having a direct connection with steam transit to Coney Island. The defendant's horse-car line to Coney Island could not successfully compete with plaintiff's steam route. The plaintiff provided defendant with the necessary terminal facilities as required, and the contract was acted upon by both parties until the month of October, 1889. At that time there was a change in defendant's management, and the company contracted for an electrical equipment from the Parade Ground to Coney Island, commonly known as the "Trolley System." The plaintiff, in May, 1890, finding that defendant was not running cars to the depot as required by the contract, requested performance, and was advised that the defendant was under no obligations to run the cars, and did not intend to do it. This action was commenced the following October.

It is insisted by the defendant that the adoption of the trolley system is, in contemplation of law, a use of steam, under the clause in the contract which provides that if the defendant shall use steam as a motive power between Ninth avenue and Fifteenth street, in the city of Brooklyn and Coney Island, either party can terminate the contract on six months' notice, and that the correspondence and answer in this case are equivalent to notice, and the contract no longer exists. We agree with the special term that the electrical system adopted by the defendant cannot be regarded as the use of steam as a motive power. Hudson River Tel. Co. v. Watervliet Turnpike & Ry. Co., 135 N. Y. 393, 402, 32 N. E. 148. It would be in disregard of the natural and obvious meaning of language to hold otherwise. We cannot agree with the general term that the use of the words "steam as a motive power" was only another form of referring to rapid transit, by whatever means accomplished. To so hold would be to make a new contract for the parties.

The defendant insists, further, that by reason of certain acts of plaintiff, and by changes in the surrounding circumstances, it would be inequitable and unjust to enforce a specific performance of the contract. This leads us to consider some additional facts disclosed by the record.

On the 9th of December, 1885, plaintiff leased to the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company all its franchises to construct and operate horse-car railroads in the city of Brooklyn, and on May 27, 1887, in pursuance of chapter 282 of the Laws of 1886, conveyed said rights and interests absolutely. The lease and conveyance were made expressly subject to the contract in question, and reserved all the defendant's rights thereunder. They also required the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company to operate the Vanderbilt Avenue Railroad Company as had been previously done by the plaintiff. The defendant made no objection to this transfer until after its refusal to perform the contract. Defendant urges that it was greatly damaged by the fact that the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company had completed, under the franchise obtained from plaintiff, a horse-car line to the Hamilton ferry. We are unable to perceive how defendant has suffered any damage, in view of the fact that it purchased with full knowledge of plaintiff's franchise, and its desire to dispose of the same. It appears by the uncontradicted evidence that defendant sought to purchase of plaintiff this franchise to complete a route to the Hamilton ferry either just before or about the time the contract was executed.

The defendant further contends that the plaintiff, under a proper construction of the contract, was not at liberty to sell out its street-car interests, although not restrained by any positive provision. This contention is based mainly on the alleged fact that the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company is an active rival of defendant, and did not have the same motive to deal fairly with defendant that plaintiff had while seeking to build up its Coney Island business. The principal complaint against the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company is based upon the manner in which it performed the contract in regard to defendant's terminal facilities at the depot, corner Ninth avenue and Twentieth street. The evidence does not satisfy us that there was any persistent effort to delay the cars of defendant at that point, or to prevent passengers from the steam road selecting from the cars in waiting the one in which to ride, without undue interference. We think the contract was substantially performed by plaintiff and its grantee in regard to terminal facilities of defendant, and, even if this were not the case, the defendant could have compelled the observance of its contract rights in every particular by resort to the court. The fact already referred to, that defendant continued to act under the contract for more than four years after this lease to the Atlantic Avenue Railroad Company, without objection, must be taken very strongly against it in a court of equity. It seems to us very clear that when the management of defendant was changed in October, 1889, and the road from the Parade Ground to Coney Island was operated by electricity, it at once became an active and successful rival of the plaintiff in securing passengers to and from Coney Island, and had every motive to rid itself of the contract, if it could be legally done. We agree with the learned trial judge that while it is impossible, under the state of the proofs, to determine to what extent plaintiff has been damaged by defendant's adoption of the trolley system, yet it is clear that it has suffered considerable loss. It is, of course, entirely legitimate for defendant to secure to itself whatever share of the Coney Island travel it can by the exercise of proper business methods, but we are unable to perceive any reason, under the proofs as presented, why defendant should be released from the obligations of a contract entered into in good faith by both parties, and that has been practically construed by years of performance. It may very well be that, under a contract having 21 years to run, there may be such a change of conditions as will affect unfavorably the one party or the other; but this offers no reason for refusing specific performance, unless subsequent events have made performance by the defendant so onerous that the enforcement would impose great hardship and cause little or no benefit to the plaintiff. Trustees v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 316, 317; Murdfeldt v. Railroad Co., 102 N. Y. 703, 7 N. E. 404. In the case at bar the plaintiff, we think, would be benefited by defendant running the transfer car in Ninth avenue from Fifteenth street to its depot at Twentieth street. On the other hand, it may be assumed that the defendant, by cheaper fare, and its ability to carry passengers to Coney Island without transfer, will be able to secure its full share of the passengers to and from the seashore. The result of compelling the specific performance of this contract will be to afford the general public an opportunity, when traveling over the line of defendant from the ferries, to make choice of the route they will take to Coney Island when arriving at Ninth avenue and Fifteenth street. While it may be somewhat to the disadvantage of defendant to perform its contract, under the present circumstances, when active competition exists between plaintiff and defendant, yet that fact presents no legal reason for discharging it from the obligations of its contract.

As a final point, the learned counsel for the defendant insists that equity will not enforce the specific performance of a contract having some years to run, which requires the exercise of skill and judgment, and a continuous series of acts. While there is some conflict in the cases, and all are not to be reconciled, yet the great weight of authority permits specific performance in the case at bar. The special term enjoined the defendant from operating any of its cars unless it performs its contract with the plaintiff. The provisions of this contract are neither complicated nor difficult, and are such as a court of equity can enforce, in its discretion. A few of the cases may be referred to, as illustrating the power vested in a court of equity to compel the specific performance of contracts similar to the one at bar. In Storer v. Railroad Co., 2 Younge & C. N. R. 48, the court compelled the defendant to construct and forever maintain an archway and its approaches. The court said there was no difficulty in enforcing such a decree. In Wilson v. Railway Co., L. R. 9 Eq. 28, the defendant was compelled to erect and maintain a wharf. See, also,

Greene v. Railroad Co., L. R. 13 Eq. 44. In Wolverhampton & W. R. R. v. London & N. W. R. R., L. R. 16 Eq. 433, the agreement between the two companies was that the defendant should work the plaintiff's line, and, during the continuance of the agreement, develop and accommodate the local and through trade thereof, and carry over it certain specific traffic. The bill was filed to restrain the defendant from carrying a portion of the traffic which ought to have passed over the plaintiff's line by other lines of the defendant. The point was made that the court could not undertake to enforce specific performance, because it would require a series of orders and a general superintendence to enforce the performance, which could not conveniently be administered by a court of justice. The injunction issued, and Lord Selborne said (page 438): "With regard to the argument that, upon the principles applicable to specific performance, no relief can be granted, I cannot help observing that there is some fallacy and ambiguity in the way in which, in cases of this character, those words 'specific performance' are used. * * * The common expression, as applied to suits known by that name, presupposes an executory, as distinct from an executed, agreement. * * * Confusion has sometimes arisen from transferring considerations applicable to suits for specific performance, properly so called, to questions as to the propriety of the court requiring something or other to be done in specie. * * * Ordinary agreements for work and labor to be performed, hiring and service, and things of that sort, out of which most of the cases have arisen, are not, in the proper sense of the word, cases for 'specific performance'; in other words, the nature of the contract is not one which requires the performance of some definite act, such as the court is in the habit of requiring to be performed by way of administering superior justice, rather than to leave the parties to their remedies at law. * * * The question is whether, the defendants being in possession, they are not at liberty to depart from the terms on which it was stipulated that they should have that possession." The American cases are equally clear. In Lawrence v. Railway Co., 38 Hun, 467, the defendant was, among other things, to erect a depot at which all trains were to stop. Specific performance was decreed; the court holding that although, under the agreement, the defendant could not be compelled to run trains upon its road, yet it might properly be enjoined from running any regular trains which did not stop at the station. The objection that the judgment in this case involves continuous acts, and the constant supervision of the court, is well met by the reasoning in Central Trust Co. v. Wabash, St. Louis & P. Ry. Co., 29 Fed. 546, being affirmed as Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 1, 47, 50, 11 Sup. Ct. 243, where Judge Blatchford wrote the opinion. As to inconvenience, or circumstances which affect the interest of one party alone, constituting a reason why performance should not be decreed, the case of Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339, 358, furnishes a clear discussion of the general principles involved. The rule established by the above and kindred cases is that a contract is to be judged as of the time at which it was entered into, and, if fair when made, the fact that it has become a hard one by the force of subsequent circumstances or changing events will not necessarily prevent its specific performance. See, also, Stuart v. Railway Co., 15 Beav. 513; Mortimer v. Capper, 1 Brown, Ch. 156; Jackson v. Lever, 3 Brown, Ch. 605; Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. 349; Paine v. Hutchinson, L. R. 3 Eq. 257; Telegraph Co. v. Harrison, 145 U. S. 459, 472, 473, 12 Sup. Ct. 900. A large number of other cases might be cited, sustaining the power of the court to decree the specific performance of this contract, but we do not deem it necessary. There can be no well-founded doubt as to the power of the court in the premises, and the important question is whether, in the exercise of a wise discretion, and in view of all the circumstances, specific performance should be decreed. After a most careful consideration of this case, we have reached the conclusion that the plaintiff is entitled to have the contract specifically performed. The order of the general term is reversed, and the judgment of the special term is affirmed, with costs in all the courts. All concur, except ANDREWS, C. J., who dissents on the ground that plaintiff, having established a rapid-transit road, although the propulsion is by electricity, has met the condition of the contract which entitled it to terminate such contract, or at least has placed itself in such a position that a court of equity will not enforce specific performance. Ordered accordingly.

WILLARD v. TAYLOE.

Supreme Court of the United States. Dec., 1869.

Appeal from the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

This was a suit in equity for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of certain real property situated in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, and adjoining the hotel owned by the complainant, Willard, and known as Willard's Hotel.

The facts out of which the case arose were as follows:

In April, 1854, the defendant leased to the complainant the property in question, which was generally known in Washington as "The Mansion House," for the period of ten years from the 1st of May following, at the yearly rent of twelve hundred dollars. The lease contained a covenant that the lessee should have the right or option of purchasing the premises, with the buildings and improvements thereon, at any time before the expiration of the lease, for the sum of twenty-two thousand and five hundred dollars, payable as follows: two thousand dollars in cash, and two thousand dollars, together with the interest on all the deferred instalments, each year thereafter until the whole was paid; the deferred payments to be secured by a deed of trust on the property, and the vendor to execute to the purchaser a warranty deed of the premises, subject to a yearly ground-rent of three hundred and ninety dollars.

At the time of this lease gold and silver, or bank bills convertible on demand into it, were the ordinary money of the country, and the standard of values. In 1861 the rebellion broke out, lasting till 1865. In the interval, owing to the influx of people, property in the metropolis used for hotels greatly increased in value, and as was alleged by Tayloe, who produced what he deemed a record to show the fact, the complainant, Willard, assigned an undivided half of the property which had been leased to him as above-mentioned to a brother of his. In December, 1861, the banks throughout the country suspended payments in specie, and in 1862 and 1863, the federal government issued some hundred millions of notes, to be used as money, and which congress declared should be a tender in the payment of debts. Coin soon ceased to circulate generally, and people used, in a great degree, the notes of the government to pay what they owed.

On the 15th of April, 1864, two weeks before the expiration of the period allowed the complainant for his election to purchase—the property having greatly increased in value since 1854, the year in which the lease was made—the complainant addressed a letter to the defendant, inclosing a check, payable to his order, on the Bank of America, in New York, for two thousand dollars, as the amount due on the 1st of May following on the purchase of the property, with a blank receipt for the money, and requesting the defendant to sign and return the receipt, and stating that if it were agreeable to the defendant he would have the deed of the property, and the trust deed to be executed by himself, prepared between that date and the 1st of May. To this letter the defendant, on the same day, replied that he had no time then to look into the business, and returned the check, expressing a wish to see the complainant for explanations before closing the matter.

On the following morning the complainant called on the defendant and informed him that he had two thousand dollars to make the first payment for the property, and offered the money to him. The money thus offered consisted of notes of the United States, made by act of congress a legal tender for debts. These the defendant refused to accept, stating that he understood the purchase-money was to be paid in gold, and that gold he would accept, but not the notes, and give the receipt desired. It was admitted that these notes were at the time greatly depreciated in the market below their nominal value.¹ On repeated occasions subsequently the complainant sent the same amount—two thousand dollars—in these United States notes to the defendant in payment of the cash instalment on the purchase, and as often were they refused by him. On one of these occasions a draft of the deed of conveyance to be executed by the defendant, and a draft of the trust deed to be executed by the complainant, were sent for examination, with the money.

This last was prepared for execution by the complainant alone, and contained a provision that he might, if he should elect to do so, pay off the deferred payments at earlier dates than those mentioned in the lease. These deeds were returned by the defendant, accompanied with a letter expressing dissatisfaction at the manner in which he was induced to sign the lease with the clause for the sale of the premises, but stating that as he had signed it he "should have carried the matter out" if the complainant had proffered the amount which he knew he had offered for the property, meaning by this statement, as the court understood it, if he had proffered the amount stipulated in gold. No objection was made to the form of either of the deeds.

Soon afterwards the defendant left the city of Washington, with the intention of being absent until after the 1st of May.

On the 29th of April the complainant, finding that the defendant had left the city, and perceiving that the purchase was not about to be completed within the period prescribed by the covenant in the lease, and apprehensive that unless legal proceedings were taken by him to enforce its execution his rights thereunder might be lost, instituted the present suit.

In the bill he set forth the covenant giving him the right or option to purchase the premises; his election to purchase; the notice to the defendant; the repeated efforts made by him to obtain a deed of the property; his offer to pay the amount required as the first instalment of the purchase-money in United States notes, and to execute the trust deed stipulated to secure the deferred payments, and the refusal of the defendant to receive the United States notes and to execute to him a deed of the premises. It also set forth the departure of the defendant from the city of Washington, and his intended absence beyond the 1st of May following, and alleged that the appeal was made to the equitable interposition of the court, lest on the return of the defendant he might refuse to allow the complainant to complete the purchase, and urge as a reason that the time within which it was to be made had passed. The bill concluded with a prayer that the court decree a specific performance of the agreement by the defendant, and the execution of a deed of the premises to the complainant; the latter offering to perform the agreement on his part according to its true intent and meaning.

The bill also stated some facts, which it is unnecessary to detail, tending to show that the acquisition of the property in question was of especial importance to the complainant.

The answer set up that the complainant, even on his own showing, had no case; that there was no proper tender; that even if the complainant once had a right to file a bill in his sole right—the way in which the present bill was filed—he had lost this right by the transfer of the half to his brother; that the complainant had not demanded an execution even of the contract which he himself set forth, but by the drafts of the trust deed sent to Tayloe, and which was the trust deed of which he contemplated the execution, he proposed to pay, at his own option, the whole purchase-money before the expiration of the ten years, and thus would interfere with the duration of that security and investment in the identical property leased, which had been originally contemplated and provided for; thus subjecting the defendant to risk and expense in making a new investment. The answer concluded with an allegation, that “by the great national acts and events which had occurred when the complainant filed his bill, and which were still influencing all values and interests in the country, such a state of things had arisen and now existed, as according to equity and good conscience ought to prevent a decree for specific performance in this case, upon a demand made on the last day of a term of ten years, even if in strict law (which was denied) the complainant was entitled to make such demand.”

Both Tayloe and Willard were examined as witnesses. The former testified, that when the lease was executed he objected to a stipulation for a sale of the premises, and that Willard said it should go for nothing. Willard swore that he had said no such thing.

The court below dismissed the bill, and Willard took the present appeal.

Curtis, Poland & Howe, for appellant. Cox & McPherson, contra.

Mr. Justice FIELD, after stating the facts of the case, delivered the opinion of the court.

The covenant in the lease giving the right or option to purchase the premises was in the nature of a continuing offer to sell. It was a proposition extending through the period of ten years, and being under seal must be regarded as made upon a sufficient consideration, and, therefore, one from which the defendant was not at liberty to recede. When accepted by the complainant by his notice to the defendant, a contract of sale between the parties was completed. Railroad Co. v. Bartlett, 3 Cush. 224; Welchman v. Spinks, 5 Law T. (N. S.) 385; Warner v. Willington, 3 Drew. 523; Railroad v. Evans, 6 Gray, 25. This contract is plain and certain in its terms, and in its nature and in the circumstances attending its execution appears to be free from objection. The price stipulated for the property was a fair one. At the time its market value was under fifteen thousand dollars, and a greater increase than one-half in value during the period of ten years could not then have been reasonably anticipated.

When a contract is of this character it is the usual practice of courts of equity to enforce its specific execution upon the application of the party who has complied with its stipulations on his part, or has seasonably and in good faith offered, and continues ready to comply with them. But it is not the invariable practice. This form of relief is not a matter of absolute right to either party; it is a matter resting in the discretion of the court, to be exercised upon a consideration of all the circumstances of each particular case. The jurisdiction, said Lord Erskine (12 Ves. 332), “is not compulsory upon the court, but the subject of discretion. The question is not what the court must do, but what it may do under [the] circumstances, either exercising the jurisdiction by granting the specific performance or abstaining from it.”

And long previous to him Lord Hardwicke and other eminent equity judges of England had, in a great variety of cases, asserted the same discretionary power of the court. In Joyne v. Statham, 3 Atk. 388, Lord Hardwicke said: “The constant doctrine of this court is, that it is in their discretion, whether in such a bill they will decree a specific performance or leave the plaintiff to his remedy at law." And in Underwood v. Hitchcox, 1 Ves. Sr. 272, the same great judge said, in refusing to enforce a contract: "The rule of equity in carrying agreements into specific performance is well known, and the court is not obliged to decree every agreement entered into, though for valuable consideration, in strictness of law, it depending on the circumstances."

Later jurists, both in England and in the United States, have reiterated the same doctrine. Chancellor Kent, in Seymour v. Delancy, 6 Johns. Ch. 222, upon an extended review of the authorities on the subject, declares it to be a settled principle that a specific performance of a contract of sale is not a matter of course, but rests entirely in the discretion of the court upon a view of all the circumstances; and Chancellor Bates, of Delaware, in Godwin v. Collins, recently decided, upon a very full consideration of the adjudged cases, says, that a patient examination of the whole course of decisions on this subject has left with him "no doubt that, as a matter of judicial history, such a discretion has always been exercised in administering this branch of equity jurisprudence."

It is true the cases cited, in which the discretion of the court is asserted, arose upon contracts in which there existed some inequality or unfairness in the terms, by reason of which injustice would have followed a specific performance. But the same discretion is exercised where the contract is fair in its terms, if its enforcement, from subsequent events, or even from collateral circumstances, would work hardship or injustice to either of the parties.

In the case of City of London v. Nash, 1 Ves. Sr. 12, the defendant, a lessee, had covenanted to rebuild some houses, but, instead of doing this, he rebuilt only two of them, and repaired the others. On a bill by the city for a specific performance Lord Hardwicke held that the covenant was one which the court could specifically enforce; but said, "The most material objection for the defendant, and which has weight with me, is that the court is not obliged to decree a specific performance, and will not when it would be a hardship, as it would be here upon the defendant to oblige him, after having very largely repaired the houses, to pull them down and rebuild them." In Faine v. Brown (cited in Ramsden v. Hylton, 2 Ves. Sr. 306) similar hardship, flowing from the specific execution of a contract, was made the ground for refusing the decree prayed. In that case the defendant was the owner of a small estate, devised to him on condition that if he sold it within twenty-five years one-half of the purchase-money should go to his brother. Having contracted to sell the property, and refusing to carry out the contract under the pretence that he was intoxicated at the time, a bill was filed to enforce its specific execution, but Lord Hardwicke is reported to have said that, without regard to the other circumstance, the hardship alone of losing half the purchase-money, if the contract was carried into execution, was sufficient to determine the discretion of the court not to interfere, but to leave the parties to the law.

The discretion which may be exercised in this class of cases is not an arbitrary or capricious one, depending upon the mere pleasure of the court, but one which is controlled by the established doctrines and settled principles of equity. No positive rule can be laid down by which the action of the court can be determined in all cases. In general it may be said that the specific relief will be granted when it is apparent, from a view of all the circumstances of the particular case, that it will subserve the ends of justice; and that it will be withheld when, from a like view, it appears that it will produce hardship or injustice to either of the parties. It is not sufficient, as shown by the cases cited, to call forth the equitable interposition of the court, that the legal obligation under the contract to do the specific thing desired may be perfect. It must also appear that the specific enforcement will work no hardship or injustice, for if that result would follow, the court will leave the parties to their remedies at law, unless the granting of the specific relief can be accompanied with conditions which will obviate that result. If that result can be thus obviated, a specific performance will generally in such cases be decreed conditionally. It is the advantage of a court of equity, as observed by Lord Redesdale in Davis v. Hone, 2 Schoales & L. 348, that it can modify the demands of parties according to justice, and where, as in that case, it would be inequitable, from a change of circumstances, to enforce a contract specifically, it may refuse its decree unless the party will consent to a conscientious modification of the contract, or, what would generally amount to the same thing, take a decree upon condition of doing or relinquishing certain things to the other party.

In the present case objection is taken to the action of the complainant in offering, in payment of the first instalment stipulated, notes of the United States. It was insisted by the defendant at the time, and it is contended by his counsel now, that the covenant in the lease required payment for the property to be made in gold. The covenant does not in terms specify gold as the currency in which payment is to be made; but gold, it is said, must have been in the contemplation of the parties, as no other currency, except for small amounts, which could be discharged in silver, was at the time recognized by law as a legal tender for private debts.

Although the contract in this case was not completed until the proposition of the defendant was accepted in April, 1864, after the passage of the act of congress making notes of the United States a legal tender for private debts, yet as the proposition containing the terms of the contract was previously made, the contract itself must be construed as if it had been then concluded to take effect subsequently.

It is not our intention to express any opinion upon the constitutionality of the provision of the act of congress, which makes the notes of the United States a legal tender for private debts, nor whether, if constitutional, the provision is to be limited in its application to contracts, made subsequent to the passage of the act. See Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wall. 603. These questions are the subject of special consideration in other cases, and their solution is not required for the determination of the case before us. In the view we take of the case, it is immaterial whether the constitutionality of the provision be affirmed or denied. The relief which the complainant seeks rests, as already stated, in the sound discretion of the court; and, if granted, it may be accompanied with such conditions as will prevent hardship and insure justice to the defendant. The suit itself is an appeal to the equitable jurisdiction of the court, and, in asking what is equitable to himself, the complainant necessarily submits himself to the judgment of the court, to do what it shall adjudge to be equitable to the defendant.

The kind of currency which the complainant offered, is only important in considering the good faith of his conduct. A party does not forfeit his rights to the interposition of a court of equity to enforce a specific performance of a contract, if he seasonably and in good faith offers to comply, and continues ready to comply, with its stipulations on his part, although he may err in estimating the extent of his obligation. It is only in courts of law that literal and exact performance is required. The condition of the currency at the time repels any imputation of bad faith in the action of the complainant. The act of congress had declared the notes of the United States to be a legal tender for all debts, without, in terms, making any distinction between debts contracted before, and those contracted after its passage. Gold had almost entirely disappeared from circulation. The community at large used the notes of the United States in the discharge of all debts. They constituted, in fact, almost the entire currency of the country in 1864. They were received and paid out by the government; and the validity of the act declaring them a legal tender had been sustained by nearly every state court before which the question had been raised. The defendant, it is true, insisted upon his right to payment in gold, but before the expiration of the period prescribed for the completion of the purchase, he left the city of Washington, and thus cut off the possibility of any other tender than the one made within that period. In the presence of this difficulty, respecting the mode of payment, which could not be obviated, by reason of the absence of the defendant, the complainant filed his bill, in which he states the question which had arisen between them, and invokes the aid of the court in the matter, offering specifically to perform the contract on his part according to its true intent and meaning. He thus placed himself promptly and fairly before the court, expressing a willingness to do whatever it should adjudge he ought in equity and conscience to do in the execution of the contract.

Nothing further could have been reasonably required of him under the circumstances, even if we should assume that the act of congress, making the notes of the United States a legal tender, does not apply to debts created before its passage, or, if applicable to such debts, is, to that extent, unconstitutional and void.

In the case of Chesterman v. Mann, 9 Hare, 212, it was held by the court of chancery of England, that where an underlessee had a covenant for the renewal of his lease, upon paying to his lessor a fair proportion of the fines and expenses to which the lessor might be subjected in obtaining a renewal of his own term from the superior landlord, and on any increased rent upon such renewal, and there was a difference between the parties as to the amount to be paid by the underlessee, he might apply for a specific performance of the covenant, and submit to the court the amount to be paid. So here in this case, the complainant applies for a specific performance, and submits the amount to be paid by him to the judgment of the court.

We proceed to consider whether any other circumstances have arisen since the covenant in the lease was made, which render the enforcement of the contract of sale, subsequently completed between the parties, inequitable. Such circumstances are asserted to have arisen in two particulars; first, in the greatly increased value of the property; and second, in the transfer of a moiety of the complainant's original interest to his brother.

It is true, the property has greatly increased in value since April, 1854. Some increase was anticipated by the parties, for the covenant exacts, in case of the lessee's election to purchase, the payment of one-half more than its then estimated value. If the actual increase has exceeded the estimate then made, that circumstance furnishes no ground for interference with the arrangement of the parties. The question, in such cases, always is, was the contract, at the time it was made, a reasonable and fair one? If such were the fact, the parties are considered as having taken upon themselves the risk of subsequent fluctuations in the value of the property, and such fluctuations are not allowed to prevent its specific enforcement. Wells v. Railway Co., 9 Hare, 129; Low v.

Treadwell, 12 Me. 441; Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 235, 252. Here the contract, as already stated, was, when made, a fair one, and in all its attendant circumstances, free from objection. The rent reserved largely exceeded the rent then paid, and the sum stipulated for the property largely exceeded its then market value.

The transfer, by the complainant to his brother, of one-half interest in the lease, assuming now, for the purpose of the argument, that there is, in the record, evidence, which we can notice, of such transfer, in no respect affects the obligation of the defendant, or impairs the right of the complainant to the enforcement of the contract. The brother is no party to the contract, and any partial interest he may have acquired therein, the defendant was not bound to notice. The owners of partial interests in contracts for land, acquired subsequent to their execution, are not necessary parties to bills for their enforcement. The original parties on one side are not to be mixed up in controversies between the parties on the other side, in which they have no concern.

If the entire contract had been assigned to the brother, so that he had become substituted in the place of the complainant, the case would have been different. In that event, the brother might have filed the bill, and insisted upon being treated as representing the vendee. The general rule is, that the parties to the contract are the only proper parties to the suit for its performance, and, except in the case of an assignment of the entire contract, there must be some special circumstances to authorize a departure from the rule.

The court, says Chancellor Cottenham, in Tasher v. Small, 3 Mylne & C. 69, "assumes jurisdiction in cases of specific performance of contracts, because a court of law, giving damages only for the non-performance of the contract, in many cases, does not afford an adequate remedy. But in equity, as well as at law, the contract constitutes the right, and regulates the liabilities of the parties; and the object of both proceedings is to place the party complaining, as nearly as possible, in the same situation as the defendant had agreed that he should be placed in. It is obvious, that persons, strangers to the contract, and, therefore, neither entitled to the rights nor subject to the liabilities which arise out of it, are as much strangers to a proceeding to enforce the execution of it as they are to a proceeding to recover damages for the breach of it."

When the complainant has received his deed from the defendant, the brother may claim from him a conveyance of an interest in the premises, if he have a valid contract for such interest, and enforce such conveyance by suit; but that is a matter with which the defendant has no concern.

It seems that the draft of the trust deed, to secure the deferred payments, sent to the defendant for examination, was prepared for execution by the complainant alone, and contained a stipulation that he might, if he should so elect, pay off the deferred payments at earlier dates than those mentioned in the covenant in the lease; and it is objected to the complainant's right to a specific performance, that the trust deed was not drawn to be executed jointly by him and his brother, and that it contained this stipulation. A short answer to this objection is found in the fact, that the parties had disagreed in relation to the payment to be made, and until the disagreement ceased no deeds were required. It is admitted that the form of the trust deed was not such a one as the defendant was bound to receive, but as it was sent to him for examination, good faith and fair dealing required him to indicate in what particulars it was defective, or with which clauses he was dissatisfied. Whether it was the duty of the complainant or defendant to prepare the trust deed, according to the usage prevailing in Washington, is not entirely clear from the evidence. There is testimony both ways. The true rule, independent of any usage on the subject, would seem to be that the party who is to execute and deliver a deed should prepare it. It is, however, immaterial for this case, what rule obtains in Washington. Until the purchase-money was accepted, there was no occasion to prepare any instrument for execution. So long as that was refused the preparation of a trust deed was a work of supererogation. Besides, the execution of the trust deed by the complainant was to be simultaneous with the execution of a conveyance by the defendant. The two were to be concurrent acts; and if the complainant was to prepare one of them, the defendant was to prepare the other, and it is not pretended that the defendant acted in the matter at all.

The objection to the trust deed, founded upon the omission of the name of the complainant's brother as a co-grantor, does not merit consideration. All that the defendant had to do was to see that he got a trust deed, as security for the deferred payments, from the party to whom he transferred the title.

The defendant states in his testimony that when the lease was executed he objected to the stipulation for a sale of the premises, and that the defendant told him that it should go for nothing. And it has been argued by counsel that this evidence should control the terms of the covenant. The answer to the position taken is brief and decisive. First, nothing of the kind is averred in the answer; second, the testimony of the defendant in this particular is distinctly contradicted by that of the complainant, and is inconsistent with the attendant circumstances; and third, the evidence is inadmissible. When parties have reduced their contracts to writing, conversations controlling or changing their stipulations are, in the absence of fraud, no more received in a court of equity than in a court of law.

Upon a full consideration of the positions of the defendant we perceive none which should preclude the complainant from claiming a specific performance of the contract.

The only question remaining is, upon what terms shall the decree be made? and upon this we have no doubt.

The parties, at the time the proposition to sell, embodied in the covenant of the lease, was made, had reference to the currency then recognized by law as a legal tender, which consisted only of gold and silver coin. It was for a specific number of dollars of that character that the offer to sell was made, and it strikes one at once as inequitable to compel a transfer of the property for notes, worth when tendered in the market only a little more than one-half of the stipulated price. Such a substitution of notes for coin could not have been in the possible expectation of the parties. Nor is it reasonable to suppose, if it had been, that the covenant would ever have been inserted in the lease without some provision against the substitution. The complainant must, therefore, take his decree upon payment of the stipulated price in gold and silver coin. Whilst he seeks equity he must do equity.

The decree of the court below will, therefore, be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to enter a decree for the execution, by the defendant to the complainant, of a conveyance of the premises with warranty, subject to the yearly ground-rent specified in the covenant in the lease, upon the payment by the latter of the instalments past due, with legal interest thereon, in gold and silver coin of the United States, and upon the execution of a trust deed of the premises to the defendant as security for the payment of the remaining instalments as they respectively become due, with legal interest thereon, in like coin; the amounts to be paid and secured to be stated, and the form of the deeds to be settled, by a master; the costs to be paid by the complainant.

The CHIEF JUSTICE, with NELSON, J., concurred in the conclusion as above announced,—that the complainant was entitled to specific performance on payment of the price of the land in gold and silver coin,—but expressed their inability to yield their assent to the argument by which, in this case, it was supported.

FISH v. LESER et al.

Supreme Court of Illinois. Sept. Term. 1873.

Appeal from superior court, Cook county; Joseph E. Gary, Judge.

This was a bill for specific performance, filed by John Fish against John Leser and Johanna Leser, his wife. The substance of the material facts is given in the opinion of the court.

Nissen & Barnum, for appellant. Wilkin-son, Sackett & Bean, for appellees.

CRAIG, J. This was a bill, filed in the superior court of Cook county, by John Fish, appellant, against John Leser and Johanna Leser, appellees, to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a certain lot in Chicago. Upon the hearing of the case, the court entered a decree dismissing the bill and the complainant prosecuted this appeal.

Courts of equity will not always enforce the specific performance of a contract. Such applications are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and the court must be governed, to a great extent, by the facts of each case, as it is presented.

A specific performance will not be decreed unless the agreement has been entered into with perfect fairness, and without misapprehension, misrepresentation or oppression. Frisby v. Ballance, 4 Scam. 287; Underwood v. Hitchcock, 2 Ves. Sr. 279. The contract must be fair, equitable and just, and the complainant should be prepared to show that it will not be unjust or oppressive on the defendant to have the contract enforced. Stone v. Pratt, 25 Ill. 25.

We will, then, examine some of the leading facts in this case, and see if the complainant has brought himself within the principles announced, which are necessary in order to enable him to obtain the relief he asks, in a court of equity.

It appears that the defendants, or one of them, in the fall of 1871, were the owners of the property in question, and had owned and resided upon it for many years. The appellees are foreigners by birth with but little education, and are not well acquainted with our language; they transacted but little business,—indeed, the evidence shows that John Leser has, for several years, been scarcely competent to transact any business; they can write, but are unable to read our writing.

The house in which they resided, on the property in question, together with other property on the same street, was destroyed by the fire of October 9, 1871. Previous to the fire their property was not desirable, and could not readily be sold in the market, on account of the bad repute of other houses on the same street. The fire, however, removed this objection to the street, and property immediately began to advance. Farwell & Co. commenced to build on the same street, on the next block west, which also caused property to advance. These facts were unknown to the Lesers, but were well known to enterprising business men. Under these circumstances, the Lesers, soon after the fire, were sought out by one John P. White, a real estate agent in the city, who desired to get an agency to sell their property.

This property, at the time of the sale, as near as we are able to judge from the evidence, was worth $30,000—some of appellees' witnesses place it as high as $35,000, while appellant's witnesses fix its value at $21,000 to $22,000. Burt, who owned the east half of the same lot, testifies he fixed the price of his lot at $30,000, but withdrew it from market, and would not sell at that price, and his opinion is this lot is worth that amount.

White had several interviews with the Lesers. He wanted to act as their agent; advised them to sell; claimed that property would depreciate rather than increase in value. He never informed them that Farwell & Co., and others, were buying and preparing to build in that neighborhood,—a fact that was well known to business men.

Johanna Leser, in her evidence, says: "White came again; said he had a man to buy the lot, and he would give $20,000, and we told him we would not sell for that; he said it would not be worth more in ten years. My husband said, if you give me $21,000 I will sell to you. This he refused. White told me to coax my husband to take $20,000. I told him I would not. He then said, well, I will not take another step towards selling your lot, and before spring you will offer it to me for $18,000."

During this time appellant was frequently at White's office, and he and White were negotiating on the lot.

White, in his testimony, says, they had given him verbal authority to sell the lot; that, after having several interviews, he called on them with an offer from appellant of $20,000 cash for the property. This they did not decide to take, but the next day he called again to see if they would accept the offer he had made them for appellant. He prepared and took with him a paper for them to execute, authorizing him to sell the lot. After discussing the matter some time, they would not accept appellant's offer, but they made this proposition: they would take $16,000 cash, and the purchaser assume and pay a mortgage of $5,000 that was on the lot, and pay commissions to White; he informed them he did not believe appellant would give that, but he would make him the offer.

The next day, which was November 1st, White called on John Leser, where he and his two sons were at work, and obtained his signature to a paper, which turned out to be authority to sell the lot, which reads as follows:

"Chicago, Oct. 31, 1871.

"John P. White, real estate agent. In consideration of one dollar, by us received,

we hereby authorize you to sell our lot, being the west half of lot 7, in block 94, in the school section addition to Chicago, for the sum of twenty one thousand dollars ($21,000) net; you to have all over that amount you can get, for your commissions for such sale. The terms of payment we require is all cash, except the assumption of a mortgage of $5,000 by the buyer, now upon said lot; we to furnish abstract showing title good in us, subject to the said $5,000 mortgage. This proposition good for ten days from date hereof.

"Yours, etc.,

"John Leser. [Seal.]
"Johanna Leser. [Seal.]"

White testifies that the paper was read to Leser, and he and his two sons understood what it was. But in this he is contradicted by Leser and his two sons. They swear a portion of it was read in a low tone, but none of them understood it. They did not know that Leser was giving any authority to White to sell the lot; supposed it was a writing that Leser would wait ten days before making a sale, but did not know it was anything further.

White then carried the paper to Johanna Leser, and she, as she testifies, saw her husband had signed it, and not knowing what it was, also executed the paper.

On November 8th White sold the property to appellant, by written contract, as follows:

"Chicago, Nov. 8, 1871.

"Received of John Fish five hundred dollars ($500) to apply as a payment on the following described real estate, this day bargained and sold to the said Fish, to wit: the west half of lot seven (7), in block ninety-four (94), in the school section addition to Chicago, sold at and for the price or sum of twenty-one thousand dollars ($21,000), upon the following terms of payment, to wit: the said Fish is to assume and pay a certain mortgage of five thousand ($5,000) dollars, which is now upon said property, with interest from date hereof, according to its tenor and effect, and the remainder of the purchase money, to wit: fifteen thousand five hundred ($15,500) dollars, as soon hereafter as we deliver him a good and sufficient deed of conveyance to the said described real estate, with release of dower, free and clear of all liens or incumbrances, except the above mentioned $5,000 mortgage, which the said Fish assumes; we to furnish an abstract showing title good in us, said abstract to be delivered within ten days from date hereof, and the said deed to be delivered within thirty days from date hereof.

"Witness our hand and seals this day and date first above written.

"John Leser. [Seal.]
"Johanna Leser. [Seal.]
"By John P. White, Their Agent.
"John Fish."

When appellees were notified of the contract, they refused to ratify it.

Can it be said that this contract, which appellant is seeking to enforce, has been entered into with fairness, and without misapprehension? Important facts were artfully concealed from the Lesers by one who claimed to be their agent, and if they had been known, it cannot be pretended the authority would have been given to sell.

The fact is apparent, the Lesers, who were weak-minded and unacquainted with business,—terror-stricken with the great fire which, in a moment, swept away the home they had occupied for years,—were overreached by a shrewd real estate dealer, who acted in the interest of another, under the guise of a friend and agent of them.

The contract can neither be said to be fair, equitable, or just. To take from them property worth $30,000 for $21,000, when considered in connection with the other facts disclosed by this record, is an outrage that a court of equity cannot for a moment tolerate or sanction.

There is, however, another principle which, when applied to this case, forbids a court of equity from decreeing a specific performance of this contract. An agent employed to sell, cannot himself become the purchaser; or an agent employed to buy, cannot be the seller. And, upon the same principle, it is held that a contract made by one who acts as the agent of both parties may be avoided by either principal. Story, Ag. § 211.

Before this written authority to sell was given, White came to the Lesers with a proposition from appellant of $20,000, and urged them to accept it. His commissions were to come from appellant. As soon as he executes the contract of sale, he goes with appellant to the recorder's office and has it placed on record. Under his counsel and advice, appellant makes a tender of the purchase money. He takes appellant to an attorney for advice, and introduces him; nor does he stop at this. He offers to pay appellees' counsel their fees, not to exceed $1,000, if, upon an examination of the papers, they should advise and effect a ratification of the contract by appellees.

These facts tend to show that this agent was employed to buy as well as to sell. Appellees had bargained for the skill and labor of White, their agent, and had a right to expect and demand his undivided services in their behalf and for their interest. This they have not secured, and a court of chancery will not lend its aid to enforce a contract which, in equity, is regarded as constructively fraudulent.

Other questions have been discussed by the counsel on each side of this case, but, in the view we have taken of the case, it becomes unnecessary to decide them.

The decree of the superior court will be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

STONE v. PRATT.

(25 Ill. 16.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. April Term, 1860.

Appeal from the superior court of Chicago.

This was a bill of chancery, filed by Horatio O. Stone against Jeremiah H. Pratt and Amos Pratt.

The bill charges, in substance, that, in 1849, one Calvin D'Wolf was the owner in fee of the north fifteen acres of the W. $\frac{1}{2}$, S. W. qr., sec. 34, T. 39 N., R. 14 E., in Cook county, Ill., and that, in May, 1852, by subsequent sales and conveyances, Amos Pratt acquired the title to said land; that on September 28, 1852, Amos Pratt, by an agreement in writing, sold the same, with other lands, to Clement H. D'Wolf for the sum of \$4,050, of which sum \$100 was paid in hand, and said D'Wolf agreed to pay the balance, as follows: \$600 in one year, \$670 in two years, \$670 in three years, \$670 in four years, \$670 in five years, and \$670 in six years from the date of the agreement, and to pay all assessments and taxes on the land. The agreement provided that, upon the performance on the part of the purchaser, Pratt should make and deliver to D'Wolf a quitclaim deed for the premises, with covenant of warranty as to the acts of Pratt only, and also provided for a forfeiture of the agreement, at the election of Pratt, in case of default of any of the payments, in which event D'Wolf was to be treated as tenant of Pratt.

The bill then charges that on September 23, 1853, Amos Pratt purchased certain other lands of one Warren Parker, for the sum of $8,000, payable as follows: $2,666.66 on October 10, 1853, the like sum on September 23, 1854, and the same sum on September 23, 1855; that, to secure the payment of the first installment, he assigned to Parker his agreement with D'Wolf, before stated, and the same, with his written agreement with Parker, was deposited with Brown & Hurd, to be held by them till Pratt's first installment became due; and if Pratt paid the same when due, the papers were to be returned to him, otherwise to be delivered to Parker, who was to have the right to sell at public sale the agreement between Pratt and D'Wolf, and retain out of the proceeds $1,000 as liquidated damages for Pratt's default; that Pratt failed to pay Parker the first installment, and that he, on January 24, 1854, sold said agreement at public auction, having first given due notice of the sale, and that complainant became the purchaser of the same for the sum of $1,000.

The complainant insisted that by said purchase he became the owner of all Pratt's right, title, and interest in the land, and the said agreement with D'Wolf, with power to enforce the same, and that if Pratt had any interest in the land, he held only a naked legal title as trustee for the complainant.

The bill then charged that on January 15,

1853, the complainant bought of Clement H. D'Wolf the said fifteen acres of land for $4,225 to be paid in the manner following: $275 cash; $600 on September 28, 1853, and $670 on September 28th in each of the years 1854, 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1858; that the contract gave complainant the right to make all the payments, except the first, to Amos Pratt, upon his agreement with D'Wolf, and that, upon payment in either way D'Wolf was to convey the fifteen acres to complainant; that after the purchase, by complainant, of the agreement between Amos Pratt and D'Wolf, the latter made a deed of the land to complainant, and the agreement between the complainant and D'Wolf was canceled; that complainant had requested Pratt to execute to him a deed for said fifteen acres of land, which he refused to do, and that the complainant had been informed that he had conveyed the premises to Jeremiah H. Pratt, his brother, and that the deed to him was without consideration, and made to defraud the complainant, and that Jeremiah H. Pratt had full notice of the rights and equities of complainant; that complainant had demanded a conveyance also from said Jeremiah H. Pratt, but that he refused to make it, and claimed to own the land.

The bill prayed for a decree compelling the Pratts to release and quitclaim the fifteen acre tract to the complainant, and for general relief.

Jeremiah H. Pratt answered the bill, and also filed a cross-bill, making Clement H. D'Wolf a party, praying for the cancellation of the agreement between Amos Pratt and D'Wolf as rescinded for nonpayment of the purchase money.

The complainant answered the cross-bill, and replications were filed to the several answers. The original bill was taken as confessed as to Amos Pratt. The cause was heard by the court upon the pleadings and proofs, and a decree entered, dismissing the original bill.

Scates, McAllister & Jewett, for appellant. S. W. Randall and Snapp & Cone, for appellees.

CATON, C. J. On the 23d of September, 1852, A. Pratt by indenture, agreed to sell, and convey to D'Wolf, or his assigns, several parcels of land for the gross sum of four thousand and fifty dollars, all on time except one hundred dollars; and D'Wolf, by the same instrument, agreed to pay the purchase money as therein stipulated.

On the 23d of September, 1853, Pratt agreed that certain covenants with one Parker should be performed on the 10th of October, 1853, and, upon his failure to do so, was to forfeit and pay the sum of one thousand dollars as stipulated damages, to secure which he deposited with Brown & Hurd the obligation of D'Wolf to pay him the purchase money, and they were authorized to deliver it to Parker, in case Pratt failed to perform or to pay the thousand dollars. And Parker was authorized to sell this contract of D'Wolf, in open market, and thus raise the money with which to pay himself the thousand dollars.

Before the 11th of October, 1853, Pratt, alleging that he had been defrauded by Parker, forbade Brown & Hurd delivering the contract, which had been deposited with them, to Parker. On the 15th of January, 1853, Stone purchased of D'Wolf fifteen acres, part of the premises which Pratt had sold and agreed to convey to D'Wolf. Brown & Hurd delivered the contract which Pratt had left with them, as above stated, to Parker, who, on the 28th of January, 1854, sold it in pursuance of his original contract with Pratt, and Stone became the purchaser for one thousand dollars, which was just sufficient to pay the forfeiture provided for in the contract between Pratt and Parker.

Stone, insisting that by the purchase of the contract, he was entitled to recover the money due thereon in place of Pratt, and that Pratt was thereby in effect fully paid the purchase money for which he had agreed to convey the premises sold to D'Wolf, filed this bill to compel Pratt to convey to him the fifteen acres, which he had purchased of D'Wolf, parcel of that which D'Wolf had bought of Pratt.

With the view we take of the case, it is unnecessary to advert to the sale of the premises by A. Pratt to J. H. Pratt.

It is a well settled rule of law, that an entire contract cannot be divided so as to compel a party to perform it in parcels, either to different persons or at different times. When D'Wolf sold a part of the premises to Stone, he could not thereby impose the legal obligation upon Pratt to convey that portion to Stone, and the balance to himself. That would be making it in fact two contracts instead of one. It was asking him to make satisfaction of two instead of one. In case of disagreement it exposed him to two prosecutions instead of one, and required him to make two deeds instead of one. This is a hardship which the common law will never allow to be imposed upon a promisor or an obligor. Nor is this principle of the common law ignored by courts of equity, although in exceptional cases they will overlook it, where it is necessary to protect the rights of an innocent, fair, and bona fide purchaser against a contemplated fraud.

This is a bill for the specific performance of an agreement by one who at law has no claims whatever upon the defendant, at least in his own name. Such a bill is always addressed to the sound discretion of the court, which must be governed by the circumstances of each case as it is presented. In the case of Lear v. Chouteau, 23 Ill. 39, this court said: "In order to induce a court of equity to enforce specifically a contract, it must be founded on a good consideration, it must be reasonable, fair and just. If its terms are such as our sense of justice revolts at, this court will not enforce it, though admitted to be binding at law." It may be added that the complainant must show no oppression or unconscionable advantage, when he comes into a court of conscience asking for a remedy beyond the letter of his strict rights. He must not ask for a favor beyond his technical legal rights when he bases his claim to that favor upon a hard, oppressive, technical advantage. He must stand before the court prepared to meet its scrutiny without a blush, relying upon the advocacy of a well regulated conscience in his favor. Such must not only be his own position, but he must show that it is not unjust or oppressive to the defendant, to compel him to perform specifically.

Let us then examine for a moment the position of these parties respectively. Waiving the question of the division of the contract, the complainant, before he could call on the defendant to convey to him this land, was obliged to satisfy an obligation which secured to the defendant about four thousand dollars. He attempts to do this, not by paying him or any one else having a right to receive the money, the actual amount due, or to become due, on the contract, but he purchases the contract at a forced sale for one thousand dollars. This is the extent of his merit. The defendant, by his contract with D'Wolf, was entitled to receive about the sum of four thousand dollars, before he could be asked, even by D'Wolf himself, to convey any portion of the premises. Now, what has he realized for this four thousand dollars' worth of land? Absolutely nothing. His claim, or right to receive the money, was sold (and upon the validity or effect of that sale we pass no opinion) to pay a forfeit. Nothing more, —nothing for which he had received value. Now all of this may have been a strictly legal transaction. The defendant, by his own folly, may have frittered away his legal right to this money or to the land, but it is not such a transaction as should induce a court of equity to throw down the legal barriers which surround the defendant, and compel him to do more for the ease and benefit of the complainant than the strict rules of law will give him. Equity will never give the pound of flesh, although it is in the bond, but will leave the law to give its value only. We shall not compel the defendant to recognize a dividing up of his obligations under this contract, but shall allow him, without regret, to insist upon his legal rights.

The decree of the court below is affirmed.
Decree affirmed.

THOMPSON v. WINTER.

(43 N. W. 796, 42 Minn. 121.)

Supreme Court of Minnesota. Nov. 30, 1889.

Appeal from district court, Redwood county; WEBBER, Judge.

John H. Bowers, for appellant J. M. Thompson, for respondent.

GILFILLAN, C. J. This is an action to compel specific performance of a contract in the nature of one to convey real estate. The defendant had purchased the land from the state, paying 15 per cent. of the purchase price, and receiving certificates of purchase. February 1, 1886, these parties entered into a contract in writing, whereby defendant agreed that, upon full performance on the part of the plaintiff, he would transfer by deed of assignment the said land certificates. Plaintiff was to pay therefor $590, according to two promissory notes,—one for $190, due October 1, 1886, with interest at 10 per cent., and one for $400, due two years from February 1, 1886, with interest at 8 per cent.,—and pay all taxes and assessments, and the unpaid purchase money to the state. The plaintiff fully performed this contract on his part. In March, 1886, the parties made an oral agreement, by which defendant agreed to make certain improvements for the plaintiff on the land, by breaking, erecting buildings, and digging a well, for which plaintiff agreed to pay him the cost thereof, with interest; such payment not to be made before the expiration of five years from the time of making the improvements. Afterwards, pursuant to such agreement, defendant made such improvements to the amount of $500, no part of which has been paid. The plaintiff was insolvent. On these facts the court below denied specific performance.

From the memorandum filed by the court below it appears that the specific performance was refused, in the exercise of what the court deemed its discretionary power, the reasons for so exercising that power being stated; that plaintiff has become insolvent; that the value of the improvements is equal to the purchase price; and that plaintiff can be compensated in damages. The mere fact that a person has a contract for the conveyance to him of real estate does not entitle him, as of right, to the interposition of a court of equity to enforce it. The matter of compelling specific performance is one of sound and reasonable discretion,—of judicial, not arbitrary and capricious, discretion. There must be some reason, founded in equity and good conscience, for refusing the relief. Such reason has been generally found, by the court refusing it, in some mistake or fraud or unconscionableness in the contract, or in some laches on the part of the plaintiff changing the circumstances so as to make it inequitable to compel a conveyance, or where the claim is stale, or there is reason to believe it was abandoned. But, whatever the reason may be, it must have some reference to, some connection with, the contract itself, or the duties of the parties in relation to it. We have never found a case where the court refused the relief as a means of enforcing some independent claim of the defendant against the plaintiff, nor because the defendant had some independent claim which he might not be able to enforce against the plaintiff. If such could be regarded as an equitable reason for denying relief, every action of the kind might involve the investigation of all unclosed transactions between the parties, whether relating to the contract or subject-matter of the action, or entirely distinct from it. In this case there is no reason to suppose the contract other than a fair one. The plaintiff has been prompt in performing on his part, and in seeking his remedy. The defendant has a claim against plaintiff, entirely independent of the contract to convey, which claim, by the terms of the agreement under which it arose, was not to become due for more than three years after the time when he was to convey. The possibility that when it becomes due he may not be able to enforce it, by reason that plaintiff's insolvency may continue, does not make it inequitable to enforce this contract already matured. That a purchaser may have an adequate remedy by action for damages, although a reason for not holding what he has done to be part performance to take the case out of the operation of the statute of frauds, is of itself no reason for withholding the proper remedy, where the contract is valid under the statute. The order is reversed, and the court below will enter judgment on the findings of fact in favor of plaintiff for the relief demanded in the complaint.

FALCKE v. GRAY.

(4 Drew. 651.)

High Court of Chancery. 1859.

In this case the bill was filed for a specific performance of a contract entered into between the plaintiff, Mr. Falcke, and Mrs. Gray, one of the defendants, by which Mrs. Gray had agreed that, at the expiration of a six-months lease to the plaintiff of her furnished house, he should have the option of purchasing two china jars at the price of £40.

In January, 1859, the plaintiff, being desirous of finding a furnished house, applied to Mrs. Gray, who was willing to let hers, and, on looking over it, he observed the two jars, the subject of the suit. He had for twenty-five years carried on the business of a dealer in curiosities, china, etc., and was eminent in his trade, and was well acquainted with the prices which articles of this kind would fetch.

Shortly afterwards he had an interview with Mrs. Gray at her house; and Mr. Brend, from the office of Boyle & Bryden, estate and house agents, who were Mrs. Gray's agents in the matter, attended to advise Mrs. Gray. A discussion arose as to the terms of letting, and ultimately a rent of seven guineas per week was agreed upon, with an option to the plaintiff that he should, at the end of the term, be at liberty to purchase certain articles of furniture at a valuation, to be inserted in the agreement, including the two china jars, which were valued at £40.

With regard to the valuation of these jars at £40, it appeared from the evidence that Mr. Brend told Mrs. Gray that he did not know the value of the jars, but he should think they were worth £20 apiece; and the agreement was drawn up, putting the value of £40 on the jars, and was signed by Mrs. Gray and the plaintiff. On the 26th of January the plaintiff went to the house while his agent was taking the inventory, and then the jars had been removed; and on the same day Mrs. Gray came to Mr. Falcke's house, and informed him of the removal of the jars. During the interval between the 19th and the 26th of January Mrs. Gray, having begun to doubt whether the price placed on the jars was fair, was advised that it would be as well to take the opinion of Mr. Watson, also a dealer in curiosities; and, on the 26th, she accordingly went to Mr. Watson, and desired him to come in the evening to value the jars. This he did; and on seeing the jars he was so much struck with their beauty, etc., that he offered Mrs. Gray his check for £200 for them at once. Mrs. Gray then asked Mr. Watson if he thought she would be doing anything wrong in so selling them, and he told her it was all right; and she then took his check and Mr. Watson took away the jars. Mr. Watson was made a defendant to the bill.

The plaintiff now insisted that he was entitled to a decree for specific performance against Mrs. Gray, and to delivery of the jars as against Mr. Watson; and on that part of the case the question was whether the transaction was a bona fide one on the part of Watson, or whether he knew of the contract between Mrs. Gray and the plaintiff. The defendant insisted that it was a contract for chattels, and could not be enforced.

The evidence as to the actual value of the vases was conflicting, but, putting it at the lowest, it greatly exceeded £40.

Mr. Baily and Mr. Waller, for plaintiff. Mr. Glasse and Jones Bateman, for Mrs. Gray. Mr. Greene and Mr. Speed, for Mr. Watson.

THE VICE CHANCELLOR (after stating the facts above stated). The first ground of defense is that, this being a bill for the specific performance of a contract for the purchase of chattels, this court will not interfere; but I am of opinion that the court will not refuse to interfere simply because the contract relates to chattels, and that if there were no other objection the contract in this case is such a contract as the court would specifically perform.

What is the difference in the view of the court between realty and personalty in respect to the question whether the court will interfere or not? Upon what principle does the court decree specific performance of any contract whatever? Lord Redesdale in Harnett v. Yeilding, 2 Schoales & L. 549, says: "Whether courts of equity in their determinations on this subject have always considered what was the original foundation for decrees of this nature, I very much doubt. I believe that, from something of habit, decrees of this kind have been carried to an extent which has tended to injustice. Unquestionably the original foundation of these decrees was simply this, that damages at law would not give the party the compensation to which he was entitled; that is, would not put him in a situation as beneficial to him as if the agreement were specifically performed." So that the principle on which a court of equity proceeds is this: "A court of law gives damages for the nonperformance, but a court of equity says, 'that is not sufficient,—justice is not satisfied by that remedy'; and therefore a court of equity will decree specific performance, because a mere compensation in damages is not a sufficient remedy and satisfaction for the loss of the performance of the contract.

Now why should that principle apply less to chattels? If in a contract for chattels damages will be a sufficient compensation, the party is left to that remedy. Thus if a contract is for the purchase of a certain quantity of coals, stock, etc., this court will not decree specific performance, because a person can go into the market and buy similar articles, and get damages for any difference in the price of the articles in a court of law; but, if damages would not be a sufficient compensation, the principle on which a court of equity decrees specific performance is just as applicable to a contract for the sale and purchase of chattels as to a contract for the sale and purchase of land.

In the present case the contract is for the purchase of articles of unusual beauty, rarity, and distinction, so that damages would not be an adequate compensation for non-performance; and I am of opinion that a contract for articles of such a description is such a contract as this court will enforce; and, in the absence of all other objection, I should have no hesitation in decreeing specific performance.

The next ground of defense is that the contract in the present case is a hard bargain between the plaintiff and Mrs. Gray; and it is insisted that the inadequacy in price is so great that on that ground the court will not decree specific performance. Now the price put on these jars was £40. What was their actual value? Certainly to talk of their value is to talk of something which is very artificial and fluctuating, depending upon the taste and caprice of the community; but still the jars derive their value from their beauty, distinction, and rarity, and those qualities give them a selling value. They have a value in the market. According to the plaintiff's own statement their value would be £100, or, if between persons not brokers, £125; and it is the interest of the plaintiff to represent their value as low as possible. A better test of their value is what Mr. Watson has given for them; and I think I may assume that £200 at least would be a fair price, though I cannot help thinking that their real value rather exceeded than fell short of that sum; but, taking £200 as the fair value, the price placed on the jars by Mr. Brend was only one-fifth of their selling value. That this was a hard bargain in the sense of its being for a very inadequate price there can be no doubt; and the defendant insists that, on this ground, the court will not enforce specific performance.

On the other hand, the plaintiff insists that, although it is true that in hard bargains, using the terms in one sense, the court will not decree specific performance, still that that does not apply to cases of mere inadequacy of price; and this is the question I have now to consider.

The general rule with regard to hard bargains is that the court will not decree specific performance, because specific performance is in the discretion of the court for the advancement of justice; such discretion, indeed, to be exercised, not according to caprice, but on strict principles of justice and equity. In the case of White v. Damon, 7 Ves. 30, Lord Eldon says: "I agree with Lord Rosslyn that giving a specific performance is matter of discretion, but it is not an arbitrary, capricious discretion. It must be regulated upon grounds that will make it judicial." The principle upon which the court acts with respect to hard bargains appears to me to have been truly expressed by Lord Langdale in the case of Wedgwood v. Adams, 6 Beav. 600; and the passage in which he enunciates the principle has been quoted with approbation by Lord Justice Turner in Watson v. Marston, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 239. Lord Langdale in Wedgwood v. Adams says that the court exercises its discretion and decrees specific performance unless it would be highly unreasonable to do so, and that what is more or less unreasonable cannot well be defined. It must depend on the circumstances of each particular case.

As it is admitted by the plaintiff that in cases of hard bargains generally the court will not interfere, it is not necessary to go into any of the cases on the subject other than those which turn more or less on inadequacy of price; and here I may observe that in some cases the court has refused specific performance on the ground of the hardness of the bargain, where there has been not the least impropriety of conduct on the part of the person seeking specific performance. In most of the cases there has been some other ingredient besides mere inadequacy of price, but I will refer to those in which I find the opinion of the judges express on that particular point.

In Young v. Clerk, Prec. in Chan. 538, the defendant agreed to grant a lease of certain lands to the plaintiff for fourteen years at a rent of £40. The plaintiff had already been lessee of the same lands for many years, and knew that the value of the lands was not £40, but £167, and in that case specific performance was refused; but there was in that case the circumstance that the defendant, having recently come into possession of the land, came to look at it, and stayed at the plaintiff's house, and desired to see the plaintiff's underleases, in order to ascertain what the plaintiff had realized from the property. The plaintiff evaded showing him the underleases, and the defendant remained in ignorance of the true value of the land. If the bill had been to set aside the contract, it would not have succeeded. Lord Thurlow said: "I must take it to be the law that if a man contracts to purchase an estate for a certain price, and the intending purchaser knows at the time that there are mines under the estate of which the vendor is ignorant, still, as this court is not a court of honor, the court will not set aside the contract on a bill by the vendor; but nobody can doubt that the court would not decree specific performance of such a contract, and there is a wide distinction between a case in which the court would, on the one hand, decree specific performance of an incomplete contract, and, on the other, set aside a complete contract." And in giving judgment the lord chancellor said that this court was not bound to decree a specific execution of articles where they appeared to be unreasonable or founded on a fraud, or where it would be unconscionable to assist them.

The next case is Kien v. Stukeley, 1 Brown, Parl. Cas. 191; Gilb. 155, which was a bill in the equity side of the court of exchequer by the vendor for the specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of land, for which the purchaser had agreed to pay forty years' value. It was proved in the case that the plaintiff had left his deed with the defendant, and that there were no objections to the title; but a decree was made for specific performance. On appeal, the house of lords entertained great doubt whether such a bargain should be carried out by a court of equity, but they came to no decision on that point.

The next case is Southwell v. Nicholas, reported in a note to Howell v. George, 1 Mad. 9. In this case the plaintiff's father and the defendant Nicholas' brother, having some houses in Spring Gardens, agreed to purchase two old houses and pull them down to make an entrance into Spring Gardens. The houses were pulled down, and the plaintiff's father paid his share of the purchase money. The defendant's brother died, and his estates were sold for the payment of his debts. On a bill by the plaintiff for the specific performance of the agreement as to the two houses, it was contended by the defendant that there should be no specific performance, as his brother's estates had been sold, and there would be no consideration accruing to him for the expense he would be at. The master of the rolls was inclined to decree that the parties should pay for the two houses in proportion to the value of their houses to be benefited, but the matter was compromised by parties agreeing that the plaintiff should pay two-thirds and the defendant one-third for the two houses.

The next case is Vaughan v. Thomas, 1 Brown, C. C. 556. In this case the defendant agreed with the plaintiff for the sale to him of an annuity of £300 a year for the defendant's life, at five years' purchase. The defendant then represented himself as being only fifty-five of age, and the plaintiff insured the defendant's life on that footing; but two years afterwards he discovered that the defendant was sixty-one years of age at the time of granting the annuity, and the plaintiff was obliged in consequence to increase the insurance. Upon his representing this to the defendant, it was agreed that the plaintiff should grant to the defendant an additional annuity, which was expressed to be granted for £250, but in fact no money was paid on that occasion. In December, 1779, the defendant applied to the plaintiff to repurchase the annuity, and an agreement was entered into by them by which the plaintiff agreed to give up the annuity on payment of £1,500, the original purchase money, and all arrears then due, deducting the sum of £200, the amount for four years of the additional annuity of £50. The arrears then due were £475, so that the sum settled for the repurchase was £1,775. After the agreement had been signed the plaintiff struck out his name, and two days after another agreement was prepared, whereby the plaintiff relinquished the annuity and all arrears for £2,000. The plaintiff filed a bill for the specific performance of this agreement. It was referred to the master to find the value of the original and additional annuity and the defendant's age. The master found that the annuity was worth nine years' purchase when it was granted. The plaintiff contended that the bargain was fair, and that he was entitled to the assistance of the court to carry it into execution; but the master of the rolls was of opinion that if they assisted the plaintiff they would be sanctioning a very unconscionable bargain, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to the aid of the court. The bill was therefore dismissed.

In the case of Heathcote v. Paignon, 2 Brown, 167, there was nothing but inadequacy of price, and the master of the rolls referred it to the master to report on the actual value. The master found a value of £500, for which only £200 had been given, and the court refused specific performance. On appeal, this decision was affirmed by Lord Thurlow, and the contract was set aside as being unjust.

The next case I shall mention is Day v. Newman, 2 Cox, 77. In that case the court refused to decree specific performance, but left the parties to their remedies at law on the ground of inadequacy in price. That case appears to me to be a distinct decision on the question.

White v. Damon, 7 Ves. 30, was a case of a purchase at an auction; yet Lord Rosslyn, on the simple ground of inadequacy in price, refused specific performance. This case therefore shows that inadequacy in price is a sufficient ground for refusing specific performance. Lord Eldon took a different view, but it was on the ground that the sale was by auction.

Now these two last-mentioned cases appear to me to be decisive on the point; and I am of opinion that in the present case I ought to refuse specific performance on the mere ground of inadequacy of price, even if there were none other.

But there is another circumstance in this case besides mere inadequacy. What was the nature of the transaction? It was not the case of a bargain between seller and buyer, the one trying to get the highest, and the other to give the lowest, price. The intention of the parties was that a fair and reasonable price should be placed on the articles, and that the plaintiff should have the option of purchasing at such fair and reasonable price. Mrs. Gray, though she was told by Mr. Brend that he was not a judge of the value, thought that the £40 mentioned by him was such a fair price as a competent person would place on the jars; and it was upon that footing that she made the agreement. She was not herself a competent judge, though she knew they were of considerable value. Mr. Falcke knew that she was contracting on that footing, and he knew that the price put upon the jars by Brend was not a fair price. (The vice chancellor, after going through the plaintiff's evidence, from which it appeared that he, knowing that £40 was greatly insufficient, it being only two-fifths of the value, as he said, allowed the contract to be signed on that footing, proceeded:) The question is whether he can come to the court to compel Mrs. Gray to sell the jars to him for £40. I admit that this court is not a court of honor, but it appears to me that, although Mr. Falcke has done nothing he was legally bound not to do, yet, consistently with the authorities and justice of the case, I must refuse specific performance.

It has, however, been contended that Mrs.

Gray, having sold the jars to the defendants the Watsons, should not have been made a defendant; but Mrs. Gray has placed herself in such a position that the suit could not go on without her being made a party. The bill, therefore, must be dismissed without costs as against her.

With regard to the defendants the Watsons, the question is whether they had notice, when they purchased from Mrs. Gray, that she had entered into an agreement by virtue of which she could not sell them to another person. Now I cannot help entertaining some suspicion that the Watsons knew something more than that a mere question had arisen as to value; but the onus of proving that they had notice lies on the plaintiff, and I think that, although there is some doubt on the evidence, notice to them has not been sufficiently proved. Under all the circumstances, I think the bill, as against the defendants the Watsons, must be dismissed, with costs.

PAINE v. MELLER.

Upon the 1st of September, 1796, the plaintiffs sold to the defendant, by auction, some houses in Ratcliffe Highway, upon the usual terms, a deposit of 25l. per cent, and a proper conveyance to be executed upon payment of the remainder of the purchase money at Michaelmas next. The premises were with others subject to certain annuities: but a trust of stock was declared for the payment of these annuities. The first abstract delivered was clearly defective: so that the purchase could not be completed at that time. A further abstract was delivered to the solicitor for the defendant, at the end of September, or the beginning of October. He insisted upon having a release from the annuitants. The treaty continued through October; and about the end of that month the defendant's solicitor agreed to waive all objections, if the plaintiff would allow him eleven guineas, and if the trustees of the stock would join in the conveyance; and refused a proposal to give up the purchase. The plaintiff agreed to make the allowance desired. On the 4th or 5th of November the defendant's solicitor sent a draft of a conveyance. The trustees of the stock were prevailed upon to join in the conveyance by a new declaration of trust. The draft was returned to the defendant's solicitor; the deeds were engrossed; and upon the 16th or 17th of December he declared himself satisfied with the title; and said, the deeds would be ready in two or three days; and that he should complete the purchase under the promise of the eleven guineas. Upon the 18th of December the houses were burnt: the insurance having been suffered to expire at Michaelmas 1796. On the 20th of December the defendant's solicitor wrote a letter; observing, that he had taken an objection to the freehold title; and should not have thought anything more of the purchase, but for the covenant of indemnity from the trustees, inserted in the draft by him, and approved by one of the trustees of the stock: but as that had been struck out by another trustee, he could not advise his client to accept the title; and he should call for the deposit.

The bill was then filed, praying a specific performance of the contract; and a decree was made by the late lord chancellor, simply referring it to the master to see whether a good title could be made. This decree was dissatisfactory to both parties, as not deciding the question; and a petition of rehearing was presented by the plaintiff.

Mr. Mansfield and Mr. Cox, for plaintiff, insisted, that the objection to the title from the charge of the annuities was frivolous: there being a fund of stock with a trust declared upon it.

Mr. Sutton and Mr. Lewis, for defendant.—The delay in performing this contract arose from the defect of the title; and the plaintiff ought to have acquainted the defendant with the circumstance of the insurance expiring. In Stent v. Baylis, 2 P. Wms. 217, referred to in Mortimer v. Capper, 3 Brown, Ch. 156, Sir Joseph Jekyll expresses a clear opinion upon this case. 2 P. Wms. 220. Pope v. Roots, 7 Brown, Ch. 184.

Mr. Mansfield, in reply.—All the cases referred to are got rid of by Jackson v. Lever, 3 Brown, Ch. 605. The former cases proceeded upon this fallacy, that the party could not have the thing bought; for chance had decided against him: but he had the chance; and he must take it each way. In the case of a life it might last fifty years, and might drop the next day. But this is not a purchase of property depending upon the contingency of life, like an annuity. A man purchasing a house is to consider with himself, whether he will insure or not. Not a word was said about insurance: therefore notice was not incumbent on the plaintiffs; and there was as much negligence in the defendant in not inquiring about that. Such an accident did not occur to either of them. If in the sale of a house nothing is said about insurance, it could not enter into the bargain.

LORD CHANCELLOR.—The abstract first delivered was undoubtedly imperfect in certain respects. It did not go back further than forty-three years; and there was no specific mention of the property in Ratcliffe Highway in the abstract. There was also the objection upon the annuities. Unquestionably that abstract was not satisfactory; and the express condition of the sale could not be complied with. Harrington v. Wheeler, 4 Ves. 686; Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265. Of course the defendant could not be called on to pay his purchase money. Then it was with the vendee to choose to go on with the bargain, or to put an end to the contract. The agent however chose not to put an end to it; and though a circumstance took place at Michaelmas sufficient to put an end to any action of law, the contract was kept alive, at least to the 10th of December. It is clear, the objection was given up as to the freehold title; and the only difference was as to the indemnity against the annuities, affecting these with other premises. I do not consider whether this objection is of form or substance: but leave it to be determined, when it may be necessary, whether the purchaser under such circumstances has not a right to insist, that the annuitants shall release the premises; or whether this court will say, under all circumstances the purchasers shall take the premises burthened with the annuities, with a great number of others, and seek their indemnity against the trust property and the trustees, if they preferred a personal covenant by the trustees. If in equity these premises belonged to the vendee, he would have a title to the rents and profits at Michaelmas by relation; and he must pay the purchase money with interest from that time. First, it is said, the title was never accepted in fact: 2dly, if not, under these circumstances a court of equity will not compel a specific performance. As to the second point, the objection is grounded upon two circumstances: 1st, the simple fact of the fire; 2dly, that the premises had been insured prior to the contract; that that fact, and the fact that the insurance expired at Michaelmas 1796, were not disclosed; and that the premises afterwards remained uncovered by any insurance. The authority of Sir Joseph Jekyll has been mentioned: but no case has been cited in support of that dictum; and it is in a degree suggested, not admitted, at the bar, that it may be considered over-ruled by subsequent cases. As to the mere effect of the accident itself no solid objection can be founded upon that simply; for if the party by the contract has become in equity the owner of the premises, they are his to all intents and purposes. See Foster v. Foust, 2 Serg. & R. 11. They are vendible as his, chargeable as his, capable of being incumbered as his; they may be devised as his; they may be assets; and they would descend to his heir. If a man had signed a contract for a house upon that land, which is now appropriated to the London Docks, and that house was burnt, it would be impossible to say to the purchaser, willing to take the land without the house, because much more valuable on account of this project, that he should not have it. As to the annuity cases and all the others, the true answer has been given; that the party has the thing he bought, though no payment may have been made; for he bought subject to contingency. If it is a real estate, he of course has it. Then as to the non-communication, I cannot say that, in my judgment, forms an objection; for I do not see how I can allow it, unless I say this court warrants to every buyer of a house that the house is insured, and not only insured, but to the full extent of the value. The house is bought, not the benefit of any existing policy. However general the practice of insuring from fire is, it is not universal; and it is yet less general that houses are insured to their full value, or near it. The question, whether insured or not, is with the vendor solely, not with the vendee; unless he proposes something upon that; and makes it matter of contract with the vendor, that the vendee shall buy according to that fact, that the house is insured. I am therefore of opinion, that if the agent on behalf of this purchaser did accept this title previously to the destruction of the premises, the vendors are in the situation in which they would have been if the title and the conveyance were ready at Michaelmas 1796, but by the default of the vendee were not executed, but the title was accepted, and the premises were burnt down on the quarter day. As to the fact, where there has been a great deal of treaty, and a considerable hardship must fall upon one party, if the case is to be put entirely upon the fact, the court must guard against surprise; and I am not sure, even the plaintiff's witnesses accurately understand the nature of the facts they depose to. It is to be observed, they are all the plaintiff's agents, subject to the influence necessarily belonging to that situation. The case is therefore not sufficiently clear upon the fact, and there ought to be some reference to the master or an inquiry before a jury; but that must not be upon the validity of the title; for it is clear, the objection to the freehold title, that it was not old enough, and the other objection, that the purchaser had a right to insist upon a release of the annuities, were waived. The question between them is, whether the parties agreed that an indemnity should be given in any form; and if so, in what form. The inquiry must be, whether the title had been accepted by the agent on behalf of the defendant on or before the 18th of December 1796. That inquiry will miscarry, unless the master, or the jury, if satisfied that there was an acquiescence in the proposal, shall be of opinion, that is an acceptance of the proposal. I should think, a court of law would hold that: but if there is any doubt of it, I would rather refer it to the master to inquire, whether the agent on behalf of the defendant had accepted or acquiesced in the proposal; with a direction, that he should be examined; and they will appreciate the credit due to him; and will not forget, that he was bartering for himself for eleven guineas; if that appears.

The decree was reversed; and the reference to the master directed accordingly.

GOULD v. MURCH.

(70 Me. 288.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Oct. 29, 1879.

C. L. Jones, for plaintiff. Walton & Walton, for defendant.

LIBBEY, J. The notes in suit, with three others, were given in payment for a lot of land on which were a dwelling house and other buildings; and on payment of the notes at maturity, the plaintiff agreed to convey the premises to the defendant. The defendant was to have possession of the premises till he made default of payment as agreed, and he entered into possession under the agreement. Within a year from that time the buildings were burnt without the fault of either party.

The question presented to the court is whether the destruction of the buildings can be set up by the defendant as a defense to the notes. We think it can be.

When the owner of a lot of land with buildings upon it agrees to convey it at a future day on payment of the purchase money by the purchaser, and before payment and conveyance the buildings are destroyed by fire without the fault of either party, the loss must fall upon the vendor; and if the buildings formed a material part of the value of the premises, the vendee cannot be compelled to take a deed of the land alone, and pay the purchase money; and if he has paid it he may recover it back. Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, and cases there cited. Gould v. Thompson, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 224; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514.

In Thompson v. Gould, the authorities bearing upon the question were elaborately examined and considered, and Wilde, J., in the opinion of the court says: "In respect to the loss of personal property, under the like circumstances, the principle of law is perfectly clear and well established by all the authorities. When there is an agreement for the sale and purchase of goods and chattels, and after the agreement and before the sale is completed the property is destroyed by casualty, the loss must be borne by the vendor; the property remaining vested in him at the time of the destruction. Tarling v. Baxter, 9 Dowl. & R. 276; Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 558; Rugg v. Minett, 11 East, 210. No reason has been given, nor can be given, why the same principle should not be applied to real estate. The principle in no respect depends upon the nature and quality of the property, and there can therefore be no distinction between personal and real estate."

In Wells v. Calnan the same rule was affirmed. Gray, J., in the opinion of the court, very clearly and tersely states it as follows: "When property, real or personal, is destroyed by fire, the loss falls upon the party who is the owner at the time; and if the owner of a house and land agrees to sell and convey it upon the payment of a certain price which the purchaser agrees to pay, and before full payment the house is destroyed by accidental fire, so that the vendor cannot perform the agreement on his part, he cannot recover or retain any part of the purchase money."

The reasons upon which the rule is based are clearly and fully stated in the cases cited, and it is unnecessary to repeat them here.

But the use and occupation of the premises by the defendant, from the time the agreement for the sale and purchase was made, formed a part of the consideration for the notes; and the plaintiff can recover in this action a sum equal to the value of the use of the premises while the defendant occupied them. Wells v. Calnan, supra.

In accordance with the stipulations in the report, the action must stand for trial.

(4 S. W. 225, 85 Ky. 536.)

Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 5, 1887.

Appeal from circuit court, McLean county.

Owen & Ellis and W. B. Noe, for appellants. Jep. C. Jonson, for appellee.

LEWIS, J. Appellee having sold, and by deed executed October 24, 1884, conveyed, to appellants three tracts of land adjoining, and constituting one farm, instituted an action to recover judgment on the notes given for the purchase money, and to subject the land to satisfy it. In defense, appellants state that the deed as written does not contain the whole contract entered into between the parties, but a portion of it was by mistake omitted, and that they accepted the deed upon the condition of the execution by appellee of the following writing, which embraces the omitted part:

"I have this day sold to James A. and Samuel C. Marks my farm known as the 'Daniel McFarland Farm.' I agree to cover said house, and put two coats of paint on the outside, and deliver the same to said parties by or on the first day of January, 1885. Eleven thousand of the shingles is to be hand-shaved shingles, and the remainder to be cut shingles. I also agree to furnish as much as 200 feet of sheeting if needed on said house; and, if any more is needed, said Marks is to furnish it. T. C. Tichenor."

It is further stated that about November 29, 1884, the dwelling-house mentioned was destroyed by fire, in consequence of which appellee never did deliver it, and they therefore ask that the notes sued on be credited by the value of the house, which they aver was $1,000. It is stated in the reply, and not controverted, that, at the time of the sale of the land, it was in the possession of a tenant of appellee, whose term did not expire until January 1, 1885, of which fact appellants were aware, and that time was agreed on in view of such tenancy.

In the sale of land it becomes the real property of the vendee from the execution, delivery, and acceptance of the written contract. "It is vendible as his, chargeable as his, and capable of being devised or descending as his." Consequently it is a well-established and reasonable rule that the destruction of buildings thereon by fire, between the time of such contract of sale and the time fixed upon in the contract for the delivery of possession by the vendor to the vendee, must be the loss of the latter and not of the former. Calhoon v. Belden, 3 Bush, 674. There are only two exceptions to this rule. The first is when, as was the case in Combs v. Fisher, 3 Bibb, 51, there is an express contract to deliver the possession of the land, with the improvements or buildings thereon, in the same situation as was the case when the sale was made. The second is when, as was in Cornish v. Strutton, 8 B. Mon. 586, the building has been destroyed by the culpable negligence of the vendor.

There is no allegation or proof that the destruction of the dwelling-house in this case was caused by the negligence of the vendor, or any other person; nor do we think the contract, fairly construed, amounts to an express agreement by the vendor to assume the risk of the destruction of the buildings by fire. The purpose of the supplemental contract executed by appellee was to provide for the repair by him of the house as therein agreed, and which the evidence shows he did do, but not to insure it against destruction by fire, or to shift the risk from appellants to himself. He simply covenanted to deliver possession, without any express undertaking to sustain any loss that might arise from the burning of the house.

Judgment affirmed.

(12 N. E. 32, 105 N. Y. 661.)

Court of Appeals of New York. April 26, 1887.

Application to modify interlocutory judgment.

This was an action for specific performance, brought against defendants, as executors, upon a contract for the sale of land, in pursuance of a power in the testator's will. The plaintiff deposited the unpaid portions of the purchase money at the time when the conveyance should have been executed. Upon a former appeal (9 N. E. 41) the interlocutory judgment against the executors was, with some modifications, affirmed, by which the plaintiff's prayer for specific performance was granted, and he was not required to pay interest on the purchase money. The object of this application is to have such interest allowed the executors.

Milton A. Fowler, for appellants. O. D. M. Boker, for respondent.

RAPALLO, J. When this case was before us on the appeal from the interlocutory judgment, it appeared from the findings that the unpaid portion of the purchase money ($10,500) had been tendered to the executors on the first of March, 1882, and that, on their refusal to accept the same, and deliver the deed, that sum had been deposited by the plaintiff in the First National Bank of Lowville to the credit of the executors, to be paid to them on the delivery of the deed. There was nothing to show that after that deposit the plaintiff had derived any benefit from the use of the fund, and presumptively it had lain idle and unproductive. Therefore the purchaser was not charged with interest on the purchase money.

It is now shown, by affidavits, that, shortly after this deposit, the fund was wholly or in part withdrawn from the bank by the plaintiff, and we are now asked to add to the modifications directed in the opinion a further provision charging the plaintiff with interest on the amount so withdrawn. If the fact had appeared in the case when before us on appeal, this modification would doubtless have been proper, and even now we might find means to make it, if no other facts were shown on the part of the plaintiff raising a counter equity. But, in opposition to the application of the defendants, the plaintiff presents affidavits showing that during the pendency of this action, in consequence of neglect and mismanagement on the part of the defendants, the ditches on the premises have been allowed to be filled up, the buildings to become dilapidated, the water-works to go to decay, the fences to be destroyed, and the value of the property to be thus depreciated to an amount exceeding the interest on the unpaid purchase money. If these facts had appeared, they undoubtedly would have influenced our judgment in respect to allowing interest upon the purchase money, or making some other provision for compensating the plaintiff for the damages alleged to have been sustained. Where specific performance is decreed, the court will, so far as possible, place the parties in the same situation they would have been in if the contract had been performed at the time agreed upon, and by the application of the rule of courts of equity, by which things which ought to have been done are considered as having been done at the proper time, the vendor is regarded as trustee of the land for the benefit of the purchaser, and liable to account to him for the rents and profits, or for the value of the use and occupation, and the purchaser is treated as trustee of the purchase money unpaid, and charged with interest thereon, unless the purchase money has been appropriated, and no benefit has accrued from it to the purchaser.

But this is not the only manner which the court has adopted to adjust the equities of the parties. For instance, where the subject of the purchase was a leasehold estate in a mill, and the delay of performance of the contract was attributable to the vendor for his failure to show good right to assign his lease, and dilapidations had occurred, he was charged with the expenses of repairs required to put the mill in tenantable condition, and of those which had been incurred for keeping up the machinery until the purchaser could prudently take possession. And in Ferguson v. Tadman, 1 Sim. 530, where the estate had deteriorated in value by reason of mismanagement and neglect, during five years which elapsed between the filing of the bill for specific performance and the decree, the amount of the deterioration, with interest, was ascertained, and allowed to the plaintiff out of the purchase money which had been paid into court. In Worrall v. Munn, 38 N. Y. 137, these principles were recognized; and the vendee, having obtained a decree for specific performance, was allowed the damages sustained, during the pendency of the suit, by deterioration from waste committed by the defendant during the pendency of the suit.

If the matter should now be opened for the purpose of letting the defendants in to claim interest on the purchase money, it would be no more than just that the same indulgence should be extended to the plaintiff, to let him in to prove the damages he claims by reason of deteriorations caused by mismanagement and neglect. These points appear to be the only ones as to which the parties have been unable to agree, in settling the form of the judgment. From the affidavits presented, it would seem that the damages claimed by the plaintiff would about equal the interest claimed by the defendants; but, if the judgment below is modified so as to admit the allowance of interest, it should also be modified so as to admit proof of the damages claimed. If the statements in the affidavits are correct, justice would apparently be done by leaving the matter as it is, and confining the modifications of the interlocutory judgment to those directed in the original opinion of this court, which appear to be substantially contained in the modified judgment as proposed on the part of the plaintiff. The details, however, are subject to settlement in the supreme court. But if the defendants desire to insist upon their claim to be allowed interest, and to contest the amount of damages resulting from deterioration and mismanagement, the modified judgment should contain provisions referring it to the referee to ascertain what amount of the sum deposited in the bank was withdrawn by the plaintiff, or subject to his control, and for what length of time, and charging him with interest thereon during that time. The amount of deterioration of the property, by reason of mismanagement and neglect, between the first of March, 1882, and the time of plaintiff's obtaining possession, should also be ascertained and charged, either to the defendants, as executors, or to the defendant Emily P. Beach, as the equities may appear. She certainly has no reason to complain of any loss she may sustain through this litigation, as it appears to have been caused by her persistent refusal to carry out the contract, which, according to the findings of fact, was intelligently entered into by her, and was a fair contract for the full value of the farm, and was beneficial to all concerned in the estate. By this unjustifiable refusal on her part, all parties have been subjected to damage, and there is no reason why the loss should fall upon the plaintiff, who seems to have been always ready to perform his part of the contract.

It is to be hoped that, upon the principles here indicated, the counsel for the respective parties may be able to agree upon the form of judgment to be entered. Otherwise it may be settled by the supreme court, and the interlocutory judgment may be modified so as to provide for the ascertainment and allowance of the interest claimed by the defendants, and also of the damages claimed by the plaintiff, at the election of the defendants. If the defendant shall not consent to have the damages ascertained and allowed, the application for the allowance of interest is denied.

(23 Wall. 119, 23 L. Ed. 113.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Oct. 1874.

Appeal from the Circuit Court for the Western District of Arkansas.

SWAYNE, Justice. Upon the execution of the notes and the title-bond between Lewis and Hawkins, Lewis held the legal title as trustee for Hawkins; and Hawkins was a trustee for Lewis as to the purchase-money. Hawkins was cestui que trust as to the former and Lewis as to the latter. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 789; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1212; 1 Sugd. Vend. 175; Swartwout v. Burr, 1 Barb. 499; Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 402. The seller under such circumstances has a vendor's lien, which is certainly not impaired by withholding the conveyance. The equitable estate of the vendee is alienable, descendible, and devisable in like manner as real estate held by a legal title. The securities for the purchase-money are personalty, and in the event of the death of the vendor, go to his personal representative. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1212. It does not appear that the title-bond authorized Hawkins to take possession, or that he did so. If there were no such authority, and he entered into possession, he held as a licensee or tenant at will. Suffern v. Townsend, 9 Johns. 35; Dolittle v. Eddy, 7 Barb. 75. The vendee cannot in such cases dispute the title of his vendor any more than the lessee can dispute that of his lessor. Whiteside v. Jackson, 1 Wend. 422; Hamilton v. Taylor, 1 Litt. Sel. Cas. 444. Any other person coming into possession under the vendee, either with his consent or as an intruder, is bound by a like estoppel. Jackson v. Walker, 7 Cow. 637. Hamiter, having bought and assumed the payment of the purchase-money stipulated to be paid by Hawkins, took the property subject to the same liabilities, legal and equitable, to which it was subject in the hands of Hawkins. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 789; 1 Sugd. Vend. (Perkins' Ed.) 175; Champion v. Brown, 6 Johns. Ch. 402; Muldrow's Ex'rs v. Muldrow's Heirs, 2 Dana, 387; 2 Har. & J. 64; Shipman v. Cook, 16 N. J. Eq. 254.

The discharge in bankruptcy released Hawkins from personal liability for his debt, but the statute of limitations cannot avail to protect the land from the vendor's lien upon it, for the purchase-money which Hawkins agreed to pay, and which Hamiter, when he bought the land, assumed and agreed to pay for him.

We have already shown that as between Lewis and Hawkins there was a trust which embraced the purchase-money and fastened itself upon the land. The debt did not affect his assignee personally, but as we have shown also it continued to bind the land in all respects as if the transfer had not been made. The trust was an express one. Its terms and purposes were evinced by the title-bond, and the promissory notes to which that instrument referred. "As between trustee and cestui que trust, in the case of an express trust, the statute of limitation has no application, and no length of time is a bar. Accounts have been decreed against trustees extending over periods of thirty, forty, and even fifty years. The relations and privity between trustee and cestui que trust are such that the possession of one is the possession of the other, and there can be no adverse possession during the continuance of the relation. * * * A cestui que trust cannot set up the statute against his co-cestui que trust, nor against his trustee. These rules apply in all cases of express trusts." Perry, Trusts, § 863.

"As between trustees and cestui que trust, an express trust, constituted by the act of the parties themselves, will not be barred by any length of time, for in such cases there is no adverse possession, the possession of the trustee being the possession of the cestui que trust." Hill, Trustees, 264*.

The same principle applies where the cestui que trust is in possession. He is regarded as a tenant at will to the trustee. "Therefore, until this tenancy is determined there can be no adverse possession between the parties." Id. 266*. The relation once established is presumed to continue, unless a distinct denial, or acts, or a possession inconsistent with it are clearly shown. Whiting v. Whiting, 4 Gray, 236; Creigh's Heirs v. Henson, 10 Grat. 231; Spickernell v. Hotham, Kay, 669; Gardard v. Tuck, 65 E. C. L. 249, 8 Man. G. & S. 231; Decouche v. Savetier, 3 Johns. Ch. 190; Anstice v. Brown, 6 Paige, 448; Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90.

In many of the cases it is held that the lien of the vendor under the circumstances of this case is substantially a mortgage. Lingan v. Henderson, 1 Bland, Ch. 236; Moreton v. Harrison, Id. 491; Relfe v. Relfe, 34 Ala. 504. It is well settled that the possession of the mortgagor is not adverse to that of the mortgagee. In the case last cited it is said that to apply the statute of limitations "would be like making the lapse of time the origin of title in the tenant against his landlord." That the remedy upon the bond, note, or simple contract for the purchase-money is barred in cases like this, in no wise affects the right to proceed in equity against the land. As in respect to mortgages, the lien will be presumed to have been satisfied after the lapse of twenty years from the maturity of the debt, but in both cases laches may be explained and the presumption repelled. Moreton v. Harrison, supra. The principles upon which this opinion proceeds are distinctly recognized in Harris v. King, 16 Ark. 122. That case alone would be decisive of the case before us. The considerations which apply where the vendor in such cases resorts to an action of ejectment were examined by this court in Burnett v. Caldwell, 9 Wall. 290.

The bill avers the tender of a deed by the complainant to Hawkins before the bill was filed. The answer of Hawkins denies the allegation. The testimony of Lewis sustains the bill; that of Hawkins the answer. The averment is not established. Except as to the costs the point is of no significance. If the tender of a deed had been properly made, and there had been no unjustifiable resistance to the taking of the decree by the complainant, to which he is entitled, he would have been required to pay all the costs. There being a contest, and it appearing that a tender would have been without effect, the costs must abide the result of the litigation. Keiselbrack v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. 144; Hanson v. Lake, 2 Younge & C. 328.

There is manifest error in the decree, but the bill is defective in not making the heirs-at-law of Hamiter parties, unless there is some statutory provision of the State of Arkansas which obviates this objection.

If necessary the bill can be amended in the court below.

Decree reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to proceed in conformity with this opinion.

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—42

BISSELL v. HEYWARD.

(96 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 678.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Oct. 1877.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of South Carolina.

William C. Heyward, who was seised in fee of certain lands in the state of South Carolina, made his last will and testament, bearing date Jan. 20, 1852. So much thereof as relates to them is as follows: "I give to my brother, Henry Heyward, of New York" (here is a description of the lands), "for and during the term of his natural life, and, after the determination of that estate, I give the same to my friend, William C. Bee, and his heirs, to prevent the contingent remainders hereinafter limited from being barred; in trust, nevertheless, during the lifetime of my said brother, to apply the income thereof to his use and benefit; and, from and after his decease, I give the use of the same estate, real and personal, to his eldest son, Henry Heyward, Jr., if then living, until he attains the age of twenty-one years; and if he should survive his father, and attain the age of twenty-one years, to him and his heirs for ever: but in case the said Henry Heyward, Jr., should not survive his father, and attain the age of twenty-one years, then I give the whole of the said estate, real and personal, after the decease of my brother, Henry Heyward, for the use of the person who may thereafter, from time to time, sustain the character of heir male of the body of my said brother, Henry Heyward, as such term was used in the common law before the abolition of the rights of primogeniture, until such person shall attain the age of twenty-one years, or the expiration of twenty-one years from the death of my said brother, whichever may first happen; and, after the happening of either of those events, to the then heir male of the body of my brother, absolutely and for ever."

On the eighteenth day of June, 1863, William C. Heyward contracted to sell, for $120,000, said lands, to John B. Bissell; who took immediate possession of them, which he has ever since retained. On July 31, following, he paid $20,000 of the purchase-money. During that year, and before the completion of the purchase, Heyward died, and said Bee, appointed the executor of his will, duly qualified as such. Owing to the civil war and other causes, matters remained unaltered in their main features until March, 1870, when said Henry Heyward, a citizen of New York, filed his bill against said Bissell and said Bee, citizens of South Carolina, to compel the specific performance, by Bissell, of his agreement to purchase. The answer of Bissell admits the agreement and his possession of the property, and his payment of $20,000; and alleges that he was provided with the means of paying the balance of the purchase-money; that neither said William

C. Heyward, nor, since his death, said Bee, tendered him a conveyance; and that he was willing to pay when he should receive a valid conveyance; that he sold sixty-three bales of cotton, for cash in Confederate notes, and on Feb. 11, 1864, tendered the said balance, in said notes, to the executor, who declined to receive them, on the ground that he could not make a good title. Bee, in his answer, admitted the tender to him by Bissell, and his refusal to accept it, on the ground that he was advised that he could neither make a title nor safely accept payment in Confederate currency. It was admitted, on the hearing below, that said money was tendered at that date, in such currency; that the parties through whom a good title could be made lived in New York; and that, after Bee's refusal to accept the notes tendered, Bissell used them for other purposes.

It does not appear by the pleadings, the evidence, or the agreed statement of facts on file, whether Henry Heyward, Jr., who was living when the bill was filed, and had then attained the age of twenty-one years, is now living. There is neither allegation nor proof of his death.

The court decreed that Bissell should perform his contract of purchase, and pay, in United States currency, a sum equal to the value of $100,000 in Confederate currency on June 18, 1863, the day of sale, with interest thereon until Feb. 11, 1864; from and after which day he should pay interest only on such a sum as was the value of $100,000 on said 18th of June, less its value on said 11th of February; said values and interest to be ascertained by the clerk of the court to whom the cause was referred, as master, to state and report the same; that upon Bissell's making the payment as stated and reported, that the clerk, "as master to said William C. Bee, executor of William C. Heyward," convey the premises in fee-simple; but that, upon his failure so to pay, the master should sell the property, at public auction, for cash.

Said Henry Heyward died before the execution of the decree. On Nov. 23, 1874, Zefa Heyward, his wife, Zefita Heyward, his daughter, and Frank Heyward, his son, filed their bill of revivor, reciting the original bill, the proceedings thereunder, the reference to the master, the death of said Henry,—leaving a last will and testament, which was duly proved before the surrogate of the county of New York,—their appointment to execute the same, and that said Zefa alone took upon herself the execution thereof, and qualified accordingly, and praying that the bill might be revived. This bill was duly served; no answer was made, and an order of revivor was entered accordingly.

The master subsequently reported that the balance found by him to be due upon the contract was $28,353.50; and that, in reaching that result, he compared the value of the Confederate currency, in which the contract was payable, with United States paper currency at the date of the contract and of the tender. He found that, on the 18th of June, 1863, $1 in United States currency was worth $5.20 in Confederate currency; and that on the 14th of February, 1864, the value was $1 to $13.01. The court confirmed the report, Dec. 15, 1874; and decreed that the interlocutory decree previously rendered be carried into execution. Bissell thereupon appealed to this court, Bee declining to join in the appeal.

William A. Maury, for appellant. Edward McCrady, for appellee.

MR. JUSTICE HUNT, after stating the case, delivered the opinion of the court.

It is objected that there is a fatal defect of parties complainant. The point of this objection is that Henry Heyward and William C. Bee were not able together to make a title that ought to be satisfactory to Bissell, and hence that the decree should be reversed.

The will of William C. Heyward took effect only upon his death. Until the occurrence of that event, the devisees therein named had no more title to or interest in the property in question than if their names had not been mentioned in the will. If he had consummated his contract with Bissell by executing a deed of the property, this would have worked an absolute revocation of the devise as to this property. The execution of the contract (with the partial payment thereon) was a transfer in equity of the title of the land to Bissell; leaving in the representatives of William C. Heyward simply a naked title as trustee for Bissell, to be conveyed upon performance on his part. By the terms of the will, this legal title was vested in William C. Bee, the trustee to preserve remainders.

Henry Heyward was tenant for life, and as such offered to convey to Bissell, "by feoffment, and livery of seisin, and to procure the release of right of entry and action by William C. Bee, the remainder-man for preserving contingent remainders;" and he avers in his bill that this would have made a good and effectual conveyance of the legal estate.

Bee held the legal title under the will, and his title to the legal estate continued in force as long as the remainders were contingent; and there is nothing in any part of the record showing that such was not the condition of the title when Heyward offered to convey, and that it is not so at the present time.

Chancellor Kent says (4 Kent, Comm. p. 256), "The trustees are entitled to a right of entry in case of a wrongful alienation by the tenant for life, or whenever his estate for life determines in his lifetime by any other means. The trustees are under the cognizance of a court of equity, and it will control their acts, and punish them for a breach of trust; and if the feoffment be made by the purchaser with notice of the trust, as was the fact in Chudleigh's Case, a court of chancery will hold the lands still subject to the former trust. But this interference of equity is regulated by the circumstances and justice of the particular case. The court may, in its discretion, forbear to interfere; or it may and will allow, or even compel, the trustees to join in a sale to destroy the contingent remainder, if it should appear that such a measure would answer the uses originally intended by the settlement." To this he cites many authorities.

We think this objection is not well taken.

Was there error in the amount decreed to be paid?

One of the statements of fact in the case sets forth that Bissell tendered the money; and fails to state that he deposited it, or in any manner set it apart or appropriated it for the purpose of the tender. The other states that he used the money he had thus provided. The legal effect is the same. To have the effect of stopping interest or costs, a tender must be kept good; and it ceases to have that effect when the money is used by the debtor for other purposes. Roosevelt v. Bank, 45 Barb. 579; Giles v. Hart, 3 Salk. 343; Sweatland v. Squire, 2 Salk. 623.

The defendant insists that the value of the Confederate notes should be reduced to gold or sterling exchange, which would still farther depreciate their value.

This objection cannot be sustained. By the laws of the United States, all contracts between individuals could then be lawfully discharged in the legal-tender notes of the United States. These notes, and not gold or sterling exchange, were the standard of value to which other currencies are to be reduced to ascertain their value. Knox v. Lee, 12 Wall. 457; Thorington v. Smith, 8 Wall. 1; Dooley v. Smith, 13 Wall. 604; Rev. St. S. C. p. 285.

Confederate notes, although without the authority of the United States, and, indeed, in hostility to it, formed the only currency of South Carolina at the date of the transactions in question. United States currency was unknown, except when found upon the person of the soldiers of the United States taken and held as prisoners.

Confederate notes can in no proper sense be treated as commodities merely. The contract in question was made payable in terms in dollars; but both parties agree in writing that Confederate-note dollars were intended. The $20,000 was paid in Confederate notes; and, when the defendant tendered his $100,000, he tendered it in Confederate notes as dollars, and he obtained them by selling sixty-three bales of cotton for Confederate dollars. Stewart v. Salamon, 94 U. S. 434.

Decree affirmed.

WETZLER v. DUFFY.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Nov. 25, 1890.

Appeal from circuit court, Ashland county; J. K. Parish, Judge.

Cole & O'Keefe, for appellant. Sleight & Foster, for respondent.

TAYLOR, J. The facts in this case are substantially as follows: On the 14th of May, 1887, the plaintiff agreed to convey to the said defendant a certain lot of land situate in Ashland county, described as follows: "Commencing at the north-west corner of lot No. one, (1,) in block No. six, (6,) of the village of Hurley, according to the recorded plat thereof; thence east twenty-five (25) feet; thence south ninety (90) feet; thence west twenty-five (25) feet; and thence north ninety (90) feet to the place of beginning,"—for the consideration of $2,500 agreed to be paid by the defendant. That on the same day the plaintiff executed a deed of conveyance to the said defendant, which both parties supposed contained a correct description of the property sold to the defendant; but, in fact, the description was imperfect, and does not describe the land sold and intended to be conveyed. The description in the deed is as follows: "The following described real estate situated in the county of Ashland, and state of Wisconsin,—to-wit: commencing at the north-west corner of lot number one, (1,) in block number six, (6,) in the village of Hurley, according to the recorded plat thereof; running thence west twenty-five (25) feet; thence south ninety (90) feet; thence east twenty-five (25) feet; thence north ninety (90) feet to the original point of beginning." Said deed was recorded in the proper recorder's office, and on the same day the defendant executed and delivered to the plaintiff a mortgage upon the property sold by the plaintiff to the defendant, in which mortgage the property is correctly described, to secure the payment of $1,000, part of the purchase money. The complaint alleges the non-payment of a part of the money due upon the mortgage, and asks judgment, first to correct the description in the deed from the plaintiff to the defendant, and for a judgment to foreclose the said mortgage. The answer admits all the material allegations of the complaint, and further admits that, supposing the plaintiff's deed had conveyed to her the land she purchased, she went into the possession of the same, and paid $300 of the sum secured by said mortgage; that on the 27th day of June, A. D. 1887, a fire broke out in the frame store building situate on said lot, and it was wholly destroyed by fire, the defendant having no insurance thereon, thereby destroying the greater part of the value of said lot to the defendant. It is admitted that this frame building was on the lot when the plaintiff agreed to convey the same to the defendant, and at the time the deed was in fact made, and the mortgage back to the plaintiff given to secure the $1,000, part of the purchase price. The defendant also alleges in her answer that, at the time she purchased the lot of the plaintiff, the building on said lot was insured by the plaintiff for the sum of $800, in a reliable insurance company; and that he agreed to transfer said insurance policy to the defendant, for the sum of $40, to be paid by the defendant; and that the plaintiff neglected and refused to transfer said insurance policy to the defendant, to her damage. The defendant also alleges a refusal on the part of the plaintiff to make a good deed of conveyance of the property actually purchased by her, and sets up, as a counter-claim, a demand for the money actually paid by her upon such purchase. The action was tried by the court, and, after hearing the testimony offered by the respective parties, the court decided in favor of the plaintiff and gave judgment reforming the deed and for a foreclosure of the mortgage. The defendant excepted to the findings of fact and conclusions of law. After a careful reading of the testimony, we think it very clear that the findings of fact are fully sustained by the evidence, and the conclusions of law, and the judgment thereon in favor of the plaintiff, are clearly right.

The learned counsel for the defendant contends that the judgment is erroneous, because it clearly appears from the findings and the evidence that, before the commencement of this action, and before a perfect deed had been given by the plaintiff to the defendant, for the real estate in dispute, the building situate thereon had been burned; and so the plaintiff could not make a perfect title to the premises sold to the defendant, the house burned being a very material part of the lot sold. He argues that when a party agrees to convey real estate to another for a fixed price, and when a considerable portion of such price is paid for the buildings situate thereon, and such buildings are destroyed by fire, without the fault of the purchaser, before the title is conveyed to him, he may refuse to take a conveyance, and recover the purchase money already paid, and to this proposition he cites Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, and Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514. We think this case is clearly distinguishable from the cases cited. In those cases the buildings on the premises were destroyed before the time for making the deed had arrived, and it does not appear in the case last cited that the purchaser had taken possession under his contract. In the case at bar, the contract was a sale to be paid for on delivery of a deed, and the deed was to be delivered immediately. A deed was delivered which was supposed to convey the land to the defendant, and she took actual possession, as owner thereof, gave back a mortgage to secure part of the purchase * money, the other part having been paid in cash. We think it very clear that, when this imperfect deed was given, the purchase price paid, and possession taken of the property intended to be conveyed by the defendant, the whole equitable title, at least to the land, vested in the defendant; and while such equitable title was vested in the defendant, the house was destroyed by fire. Upon its destruction the defendant did not seek to avoid her contract, but rebuilt on the lot, and continued in the actual possession of the same up to the time of the commencement of this action. Under such a state of facts, we think the defendant must be considered the owner of the premises at the time of the fire, and the loss must fall on her. Whether we would feel bound to follow the decisions of the court of Massachusetts, had the defendant been in possession of the lot under a contract for a deed to be executed at some future time, and before that time had arrived the house had been destroyed by fire, without the fault of either party, need not be determined in this case. For all practical purposes, the defendant was the owner of the house and lot when the fire occurred, and the Massachusetts cases place their decision upon the ground that the actual owner must stand the loss. In addition to this, when the court by its judgment corrected the deed, the legal estate became vested in the defendant from the time of the execution and delivery of the deed.

The learned counsel for the appellant urges another point as error, viz.: That the court did not make any findings upon his counter-claim for damages for a breach of contract on the part of plaintiff to transfer to her the policy of insurance he held upon the building at the time the same was burned. We have looked into the testimony which bears upon that question, and think it is entirely insufficient to sustain a finding thereon in favor of the defendant. But the counsel for the defendant insists that, if it be admitted that the evidence is insufficient to sustain a finding in favor of the plaintiff, still, it was error for the court not to make a finding on the question. The exceptions of the defendant are not sufficient to raise that question in this court. The record does not show that he called the attention of the court to the matter, or that he asked the court to make a finding on that point. All he did was to except to the findings because there was no finding on that question. These exceptions are not made in court, and probably never came to the knowledge of the court until he was asked to sign the bill of exceptions in the case. The rule was established in this court in Wilkinson v. Wilkinson, 59 Wis. 557, 560, 18 N. W. 527; Barry v. Schmidt, 57 Wis. 172, 15 N. W. 24; Wrigglesworth v. Wrigglesworth, 45 Wis. 255-257; Mead v. Supervisors, 41 Wis. 205; Williams v. Lumber Co., 72 Wis. 487, 40 N. W. 154,—that, if a party to an action desires any particular finding of fact, he must call the attention of the court to the matter of fact upon which he desires a separate finding; otherwise, he cannot avail himself of the neglect of the court to make such finding. This rule is only applicable to a case where the testimony sustains the findings made by the court, and there is not sufficient evidence in the case to require, as a matter of law, a finding different from those found by the court upon some other material matter. In this case, the court having omitted to find for either party on the counter-claim made by the defendant in her answer, and the evidence being of such a character as would have clearly justified the court in finding against such counter-claim, we must infer, from his omission to make a special finding on that point, that he found against the defendant's claim. We think the case was fairly tried, and that the judgment is right.

The judgment of the circuit is affirmed.

(36 S. E. 796, 111 Ga. 346.)

Supreme Court of Georgia. July 12, 1900.

Error from superior court, Richmond county; E. L. Brinson, Judge.

Action by Leonard Phinizy against C. H. Guernsey and others. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff brings error. Reversed.

COBB, J. This was an action brought for the purpose of compelling the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. According to the allegations of the petition, the defendants, who were the owners of a city lot upon which was situated a building, entered into a written agreement to sell the same to the plaintiff for the sum of $16,000, of which $5 was paid when the writing was signed, and the balance was to be paid when the vendee should satisfy himself that the vendors' title to the property was good. The plaintiff had agreed to take the property, but, though it is not affirmatively stated in the petition, it is clearly inferable therefrom that he never entered into possession. The written agreement to sell the property was signed on January 28, 1899. A conveyance of the property was delayed while the plaintiff was investigating the title, and after this investigation a further delay was occasioned by the fact that the defendants could not have canceled a security deed which they had given to the property, for the reason that the holder thereof refused to cancel the same until his bond for titles was surrendered, and that paper had been lost by the defendants. Pending this delay, on June 8, 1899, the building on the bargained premises was destroyed by fire through no fault of the defendants. There were at the date of the fire in full force policies of fire insurance for amounts aggregating the sum of $10,000. The plaintiff avers his desire to comply with the contract of sale, so far as it is possible, in the changed condition of affairs, to carry the same into effect. He alleges that he is willing to take the land, and that the amount to be paid by him should be ascertained by the application of equitable principles. There was no agreement between the parties with reference to the ownership of the policies of insurance prior to the actual conveyance of the property, though it was agreed that when the property was conveyed in accordance with the terms of the contract the policies of insurance should be assigned to the plaintiff. The prayers of the petition were that the defendants be decreed to make to plaintiff a conveyance of the land under the terms set forth in the contract of sale, the court to make an abatement in the purchase price to the extent of the value of the improvements destroyed by fire, and for general relief. By amendment, prayers were added that, in the event the court should be of opinion that the plaintiff is not entitled to an abatement of the purchase money by reason of the destruction of the improvements, a decree should be entered that upon payment of the purchase money the defendants should be required to make to plaintiff a deed to the land, and turn over to him the insurance money collected. There was a demurrer to the petition on the ground that the facts set forth did not entitle the plaintiff to the relief prayed, and that on account of the changed condition in affairs a specific performance of the contract was impracticable. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the petition, and to this ruling the plaintiff excepted.

1. "When a binding agreement is entered into to sell land, equity regards the vendor as a trustee of the legal title for the benefit of the vendee, while the latter is looked upon as a trustee of the purchase money for the benefit of the former." Bisp. Eq. (5th Ed.) § 364. This rule, however, is not applicable unless there is an ability as well as a willingness on the part of the vendor to convey; the purchaser not being considered as the owner from the date of the contract unless the vendor is prepared to convey a clear title and is not in default. 1 Warv. Vend. p. 195. In the case of Mackey v. Bowles, 98 Ga. 730, 25 S. E. 834, it was held that if, after the parties had entered into a binding executory contract to sell, the property was damaged before the vendor was in a condition to convey, the loss fell upon the vendor, and not on the purchaser. The loss in that case arose out of the destruction by fire of a building situated upon the land which was the subject-matter of the sale. See, also, in this connection, Kinney v. Hickox, 24 Neb. 167, 38 N. W. 816; Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134. Applying the principles above alluded to to the present case, as the vendee had not gone into possession before the fire, and the vendors were not, prior to that occurrence, in a position where they could make to the vendee an unincumbered title to the property, they were the owners of the property at the date the fire occurred, and the loss resulting therefrom must fall upon them. If the contract has been so far completed that the vendee is to be treated as the owner of the premises, then the loss falls upon him, as was the case in Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. 349, where it was held that when there was a contract for the sale of houses, which, on account of defects in the title, could not be completed,—the treaty, however, proceeding upon a proposal to waive the objection upon certain terms,—and the houses were burned before the conveyance, the purchaser was bound if he accepted the title; and the fact that the vendor allowed insurance on the houses to expire on the day on which the contract was originally to have been completed, without notice to the vendee, makes no difference.

2. The next question to be determined is,

who was entitled to collect the insurance? As has been seen, the loss occasioned by the fire fell upon the vendors, and it would seem that the indemnity against loss should belong to them. This is, we believe, the rule in such cases. If the contract of sale had been so far completed that the vendors would have held the legal title as trustees for the vendee, then they would likewise have held title to the policies in the same capacity. But, as they were the owners of the property to the extent that the loss occasioned by the fire fell upon them, they will also be treated as owners of the property so far as the right to the insurance on the building is concerned. In Poole v. Adams, 33 L. J. (N. S.) 639, it was held that a purchaser of property insured, which was destroyed by fire, does not by the mere fact of purchase acquire a right to the insurance money. It has been held in some cases that, where a contract of sale is so far completed that the vendor is to be treated as the trustee of the vendee, the vendor would also hold in trust for the vendee a policy of insurance which was on the property at the time the contract was made, and that, if a loss by fire occurred between the date of the contract and the time fixed for the delivery of the deed, the vendor would be compelled to account to the vendee for the insurance money collected on the policy, as he was in equity the owner of the property at the time of the fire, and the loss fell upon him. Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. St. 200. See, also, Insurance Co. v. Updegraff, 21 Pa. St. 513; Williams v. Lilley, 67 Conn. 50, 34 Atl. 765, 37 L. R. A. 150; Grange Mill Co. v. Western Assur. Co. (Ill. Sup.) 9 N. E. 274. The rule is thus stated by the supreme court of Ohio in Gilbert v. Port, 28 Ohio St. 276 (Syl., point 8): "As between vendor and vendee under a valid and subsisting contract of sale of real estate, covered by a policy of insurance, where a loss insured against occurs after the date of the contract and before conveyance, the true test for determining for whom the money recovered on the policy belongs, in the absence of stipulations governing, is to determine who was the owner, and which party actually sustained the loss." As in the present case the loss fell upon the vendors, they were entitled to collect and hold the money due by the insurance companies on the policies issued on the property.

3. When there has been a binding agreement to sell improved real estate, and before the property is conveyed the improvements upon the property are destroyed by fire without the fault of the vendor, will a court of equity compel, at the instance of the vendee, a specific performance of the contract? Section 4041 of the Civil Code declares: "The vendor seeking specific performance must show an ability to comply substantially with his contract in every part, and as to all the property; but a want of title, or other inability as to part, will not be a good answer to the vendee seeking performance, who is willing to accept title to the part, receiving compensation for the other. If the defects in the vendor's title be trifling or comparatively small, equity will decree at his instance granting compensation for such defects." The section quoted is but a modification of the general rules recognized by courts of equity in reference to application for the specific performance of contracts. "It is settled that immaterial deficiencies will not deprive the vendor of his right to have the contract performed as against the vendee, provided that the deficiencies are such as may be compensated in money. Under such circumstances, the vendee may be compelled to take the property, and a suitable deduction will be made in the price. But, if the deficiencies are material and important, the vendee will not be compelled to take the property. He is entitled to have what he bargained for, and it would obviously be extremely unjust to force anything upon him which he had not designed or contracted to buy. If there is a failure in that which is an inducement to the purchase, he will not be compelled to take." Bisp. Eq. (5th Ed.) § 389. In Gould v. Murch, 70 Me. 288, it was held: When the owner of land with a building thereon agrees to convey it at a future day on payment of the purchase money, and before payment and conveyance the building is destroyed by fire without the fault of either party, the loss must fall upon the vendor; and, if the building formed a material part of the value of the premises, the vendee cannot be compelled to take a deed to the land alone, and pay the purchase money. See, also, Smith v. Cansler, 83 Ky. 367; Wells v. Calnan, 107 Mass. 514; Powell v. Railroad Co., 12 Or. 488, 8 Pac. 544; Kinney v. Hickox, 24 Neb. 167, 38 N. W. 816; Huguenin v. Courtenay, 21 S. C. 403. It may be stated as a general rule that, where property which is the subject of a contract of sale has been substantially damaged or materially changed between the date of the contract of sale and the time when the vendor offers to convey, the courts will not decree a specific performance of the contract at the instance of the vendor. The reason for this is apparent. The vendor has no right to force upon the vendee something which he has not agreed to buy. The rule is different, however, when the application for specific performance comes from the vendee. There is a manifest reason for this difference. The vendee has a right, if he sees proper to do so, to accept less than he bargained for, and compensation for the loss of that which he does not obtain. If, for any reason, the vendor cannot convey to the vendee substantially what the contract calls for, of course a specific performance of the contract according to its terms is impossible. Such obstacles to a specific performance may arise from a defect in the title to some portion of the premises bargained for, or from the fact that the interest of the vendor is different from that described in the contract, or the property may be subject to liens or incumbrances, or, if the subject of the contract is land, it may be deficient in quantity or quality or value. "In such a case there are only three possible alternatives for a court of equity to pursue: Either to refuse its remedy entirely; or to enforce the contract without any regard to the partial failure, compelling the purchaser to take what there is to give, and to pay the full price, as agreed; or to decree a conveyance of the vendor's actual interest, and allow to the vendee a pecuniary compensation or abatement from the price proportioned to the amount and value of the defect in title or deficiency in the subject-matter." Pom. Cont. § 434. In the same connection the author just quoted says: That the first alternative might often contravene the wishes and interests of both parties, and cannot, therefore, be taken as the universal rule. That the second one would be extremely unjust and inequitable, though it is occasionally resorted to when the vendee is not in a situation which entitles him to favorable consideration. That the third is based upon equitable principles. It endeavors to preserve the rights of both parties, and is therefore constantly resorted to and applied by courts of equity in aid of a vendee, and sometimes, although under more and greater restrictions, in aid of the vendor. But that there are circumstances under which even a vendee is not allowed to avail himself of the doctrine. In section 435 the same author says: "If the purchaser is willing and desirous to take the partial interest which the vendor can convey, and especially if he is the party calling upon the court for relief, there can be but little difficulty in granting him the remedy of performance, with a reasonable compensation for the defects." Mr. Bispham, in his work on the Principles of Equity, thus states the rule: "It may sometimes happen that defects exist which render the property less valuable than the contract price, but which nevertheless may not be of so vital a character as to induce the purchaser entirely to throw up his bargain. In such a case the equity of specific performance with compensation comes into play for the benefit of the vendee. He is entitled to have the agreement carried out, and yet at the same time to have an abatement or allowance made by reason of the defects." Bisp. Eq. (5th Ed.) § 390. See, also, Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) §§ 1222, 1223; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) § 779; 2 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) § 589, p. 1311; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. §§ 624, 627; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (1st Ed.) pp. 942, 943; Harbers v. Gadsden, 6 Rich. Eq. 284, 62 Am. Dec. 390. The text-books and cases cited show that the doctrine of specific performance, with compensation for defects when the vendor cannot convey exactly what his contract calls for, is thoroughly established, and it is in rare cases where the court will refuse such relief at the instance of the vendee. It is true that in nearly if not quite all of the cases the inability on the part of the vendor to convey what the contract called for arose from some fact which was in existence at the time the contract of sale was made, such as defects in the title to a part of the premises, deficiency in quantity or quality or value of the property which was the subject-matter of the contract, and the like. There does not seem, however, to be any good reason why the principle should not be applicable where the inability of the vendor to convey a part of that which his contract stipulated for arose subsequent to the making of the contract, out of some transaction in which the vendee was not involved; and the fact that the vendor was himself without fault would not seem to be an obstacle which would prevent the application of the rule. Requiring a vendor to pay damages to his vendee for a failure to convey property which subsequent to the execution of the contract of sale was destroyed by fire is no greater hardship than requiring a vendor to pay damages on account of his having ignorantly, though honestly, and after the exercise of all possible diligence, bargained away something which he did not own, but which he believed was his own. That he would be required to pay damages in the latter case, no one will doubt. That he should be in the former case, ought not, it would seem, to be questioned, upon principle. In Lombard v. Chicago Sinai Congregation, 64 Ill. 477, which was a case of an executory contract for the sale of real estate, where the vendor was to furnish an abstract of title, and, if not satisfactory, he was to have the option of perfecting the title, or annulling the contract and returning the money paid, and the abstract failed to show title, and the vendor failed to exercise his option, after notice to do so, until after buildings thereon were destroyed by fire, the vendor still remaining in possession, it was held, on a bill by the vendee for the specific performance of the contract as to the land, and compensation for the buildings and property destroyed, that the contract was not so complete as to make the land the property of the vendee, so as to throw upon him the loss of the buildings, and that upon specific performance being ordered the vendee was entitled to compensation for the loss, to be deducted from the purchase money, and that the vendor was entitled to interest on the unpaid purchase money only from the time a good title to the property was shown, the vendor being entitled to the rents and profits up to such time. The case just referred to is the only one which has been called to our attention which is at all similar to the present case. Upon principle, however, we have no hesitancy in holding that the vendee in a case like the present is entitled to have a conveyance made to him of the land, and compensation for the loss of the building, provided the loss thus sustained is capable of computation. If the plaintiff sustains his allegations, a decree should be entered that the defendants convey to him the land which was the subject-matter of the contract, and that the purchase price be abated in such an amount as is just and reasonable in view of the changed condition of the property.

4. If the difference in value between the interest contracted for and the interest that can be conveyed is incapable of computation, of course the court will not undertake to enter a decree for specific performance, with compensation for defects. But, as has been said, in the light of many adjudicated cases, "It is conceived that the court will seldom now consider a difficulty of this kind insuperable." Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) § 1240. We do not think the present case falls within the rule above referred to, as it seems to us that the amount which should be allowed to the plaintiff as compensation for the loss sustained by him in not obtaining a conveyance of the land with the building on it can be made the subject of exact computation. Let it be kept in mind that the plaintiff is entitled to be placed, so far as property and money will place him, in exactly the same position that he was in on the day that the contract of sale was entered into. If on that day the property was worth more than he agreed to pay for it, he is entitled to the profit on his bargain. If, on the other hand, the property was worth less than he agreed to pay for it, he must suffer the loss. Let it be ascertained what was the market value of the property with the building on it on the day that the contract was entered into. Let it also be ascertained what was the market value of the lot without regard to the building on that day. If the market value of the improved lot was more than the contract price, the difference between these two sums would be the profit that the plaintiff would have realized on his bargain. Deduct the amount of profit from the market value of the lot alone, and the sum remaining will be the amount which the plaintiff should be required to pay. If the market value of the property and the contract price are the same, then the plaintiff should be required to pay a sum which would equal the market value of the lot without the building. If the market value of the whole property was less than the contract price, then the plaintiff should be required to pay the market value of the lot without the building, and in addition to this the difference between the market value of the lot and building and the contract price, provided that in no event should the plaintiff be required to pay more than $16,000. While we find no rule for computing the amount of compensation in such cases, we think the above rules are in accordance with equitable principles, and are deducible from the general rules which seem to have been recognized by the courts and text writers. See, in this connection, Smith v. Kirkpatrick, 79 Ga. 410, 7 S. E. 258; 2 Suth. Dam. (2d Ed.) pp. 1311, 1312; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 629; Wilcoxon v. Calloway, 67 N. C. 463; Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) § 1239. The prayers of the petition were broad enough to authorize relief along the lines above indicated. The court erred in sustaining the demurrer, and the case should be tried in the light of what is here laid down. Judgment reversed. All the justices concurring.

Supreme Court of Illinois. Oct. 27, 1893.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county; E. D. Youngblood, Judge.

Bill by Elizabeth A. Leonard against J. McKendree Crane and others. A cross bill was filed by Isaac Crane. A decree was entered dismissing the bill and granting the prayer of the cross bill. Complainant appeals. Affirmed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by PHILLIPS, J.:

A bill was filed by appellant for specific performance, and substantially alleges that complainant, in consideration of certain personal property and a certain amount to be paid in cash, purchased a house and lot occupied by J. McKendree Crane and wife. It is alleged by the complainant that the contract was consummated by a deed having been signed by the parties, which was delivered to the husband of complainant, who was present with a notary public, by whom the acknowledgment was to be taken; and it is further claimed that the deed was acknowledged. It is further averred by the complainant that the wife of J. McKendree Crane, on the morning after the trade was consummated, got possession of the deed for the purpose of examining it, and refused to surrender the same, and subsequently destroyed it. A supplemental bill was filed, in which it is alleged that J. McKendree Crane and wife made a conveyance of same lot to Isaac Crane, who at the time held a mortgage on the premises. It is further averred that after the conveyance to Isaac Crane the premises were occupied by his tenant, and appellant commenced a proceeding in forcible detainer, and recovered a judgment against the tenant, which was not appealed from; and that said Isaac Crane had notice of the claim of appellant at the time he received a deed conveying the premises to him. The answer denies the execution and delivery of a deed conveying the premises to complainant, as alleged in her bill, and avers the premises were occupied as a homestead; and that the signing of the deed by the wife of J. McKendree Crane was procured by threatening to institute a lawsuit against her; and that at the time of the signing of the said deed by said McKendree Crane he was so intoxicated as to be wholly incapable and incompetent to do business, and the complainant had notice thereof. A cross bill was filed by Isaac Crane, which averred the conveyance of the premises to him by J. McKendree Crane and wife, and that he entered into possession of the same by placing on said premises his tenant, against whom proceedings were instituted in forcible detainer; and that said tenant conspired and colluded with the appellant to deprive the said Isaac Crane of possession, and neglected to sign an appeal bond; and prays in said cross bill for an accounting for rents, and that the possession of the premises may be restored to him. A decree was entered dismissing the original and supplemental bills and granting the relief prayed in the cross bill of Isaac Crane, and appellant excepted, and brings the record to this court by appeal.

Albert Watson and John W. Burton, for appellant. J. M. Durham and C. H. Patton, for appellees.

PHILLIPS, J., (after stating the facts.) The evidence of this record clearly shows the premises were occupied by J. McKendree Crane and wife as a homestead, and were in value less than $1,000. The testimony shows that a deed signed by J. McKendree Crane and wife contained a clause relinquishing the homestead right, but there is no evidence to show that the acknowledgment as claimed to have been made by the notary public contained any clause with that relinquishment. By the conveyance act it is requisite that in the deed there shall be contained a clause waiving the right of homestead, and a similar clause must be contained in the acknowledgment of both the husband and wife; and the estate of homestead thus created can be relinquished only in the mode pointed out by the statute, or by abandonment. This rule is sustained by the uniform decision of this court. Richards v. Greene, 73 Ill. 54; Eldridge v. Pierce, 90 Ill. 474; Trustees, etc., v. Hovey, 94 Ill. 394; Browning v. Harris, 99 Ill. 459. Where a bill is filed to restore a deed, by which deed a conveyance of the homestead is sought to be consummated, the proof must be such that it must show a deed that would be sufficient to convey the homestead; not only by evidence of the relinquishment of the homestead in the body of the deed, but the acknowledgment must contain a relinquishment of the homestead, acknowledged by the husband and wife. The evidence also shows that the husband of the complainant, with a notary, accompanied J. McKendree Crane to his house, and that others subsequently came to the house, and for more than one hour efforts were made to induce the wife to sign the deed, which had been prepared before the visit of the husband with the notary to the house; and the proof clearly shows that at the time J. McKendree Crane was much intoxicated, and that both he and the complainant's husband sought to induce Mrs. Crane to sign the deed by persuasion; and that further, complainant's husband said that he had purchased the property, and that it would save her trouble if she would sign it, and that threats of abandonment were made by her husband, and other threats were made by him unless she signed the deed, and during this period of time of more than an hour in which these efforts were made to induce the wife to sign this deed she was seeking to have the execution of the deed put off until next morning, claiming that her husband was too much intoxicated to do business, and claiming that it was the only home she had, and, in tears, begging for time to be allowed to consult with her father-in-law, but, overcome by the persistence with which the demand on her to execute the deed was made, she signed the deed, and just before signing her husband gave her $20, which was to be her own, and that sum she tendered the husband of the complainant when on the next morning he offered to pay the balance of the purchase money, he having previously paid Crane $20. There is no evidence in the record showing any acknowledgment of the deed by her other than the simple signing of the same, nor is there evidence showing any inquiry made of her by the notary.

On this state of facts a court of equity may well refuse specific performance. It was held in Fitzpatrick v. Beatty, 1 Gilman, 454: "Nor will a court of equity decree a specific performance where the contract is founded in fraud, imposition, or mistake, or where it would be unconscientious to enforce it." In Frisby v. Ballance, 4 Scam. 287, it was held: "An application for the specific performance of a contract is addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court, and it is not a matter of course that it will be decreed, because a legal contract is shown to exist. Indeed, the origin and ground of this jurisdiction is that a compensation for damages is inadequate to the full measure of the parties' equitable rights. It is not necessary to authorize this court to refuse a specific performance that the agreement should be so tainted with fraud as to authorize a decree that it should be given up and canceled on that account. * * * A specific performance will not be decreed unless the agreement has been entered into with perfect fairness, and without misapprehension, misrepresentation, or oppression." To the same effect are Race v. Weston, 86 Ill. 91; Proudfoot v. Wightman, 78 Ill. 553. There is some conflict in the evidence as to whether the deed was taken from the table, after it was signed, by the notary public or by the husband and agent of the complainant, but from the view we take of this record that question is immaterial.

The evidence in this record shows the personal property which was sought to be transferred as a part consideration was valued at $300 between Leonard and Crane, and the weight of proof shows that the value of the property was not to exceed $150; and this fact, in connection with the condition in which J. McKendree Crane was, and the circumstances under which the signature of the wife was obtained, are such that it would be unconscionable for a court of equity to order a conveyance to be made. In the absence of proof that the acknowledgment contained a clause relinquishing the rights of homestead, a court of equity cannot decree the title as vested in the complainant by reason of execution of the deed shown by the evidence. Thus, it was not error to dismiss the original and supplemental bills of complainant; and, the complainant having wrongfully obtained possession of the premises as against Isaac Crane, and he being entitled to the same, it was not error to grant the relief prayed for in the cross bill. The decree is affirmed.

GRAYBILL et al. v. BRAUGH.

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. April 20, 1893.

Appeal from circuit court, Botetourt county.

Bill by E. J. Braugh against Mary W. T. Graybill and others for the specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. From a decree in complainant's favor, defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. & E. N. Pendleton, for appellants.
Benj. Haden, for appellee.

FAUNTLEROY, J. This is an appeal from decrees of the circuit court of Botetourt county, rendered on the 20th day of May, 1890, and the 27th day of January, 1891, in a chancery suit in said court depending, in which E. J. Braugh is complainant and Mary W. T. Graybill and Lewis H. Graybill, her husband, and A. Nash Johnston, are defendants. It appears from the record in this case that on the 12th day of March, 1888, Lewis H. Graybill bought of J. H. H. Figgatt, special commissioner of the circuit court of Botetourt county, in the cause therein pending of J. P. Thrasher vs. Brierly and others, a tract of land in Botetourt county, Va., containing about 50 acres; that on the 3d day of February, 1890, before the purchase money had been paid, and before any deed had been made to Graybill for the land, the said Graybill gave to E. J. Braugh an option in writing and under seal for the purchase of this land by Braugh for the nominal consideration of one dollar, but, in fact, nothing, it is admitted, was ever paid to Graybill by Braugh, not even the one dollar for the said option. On the 20th of March, 1890, J. H. H. Figgatt, the commissioner aforesaid, upon the payment of the purchase money for the land by the judicial purchaser, Lewis H. Graybill, conveyed the land to Mary W. T. Graybill, the wife of Lewis H. Graybill, by the direction of said Graybill, as he was ordered by the decree of sale to do. On the 22d of March, 1890, Lewis H. Graybill and wife conveyed this land to A. Nash Johnston for $2,000. At the time of this purchase Johnston was informed that Lewis H. Graybill had given an option to E. J. Braugh on this land for the period of 10 months from February 3, 1890, but that nothing had been paid by Braugh on said option, and that it bound Braugh to pay or do nothing whatever, and it was therefore not binding on Lewis H. Graybill. At the April rules, 1890, of the circuit court of Botetourt county E. J. Braugh filed his bill in this suit, asserting the said option as a binding contract, which he prayed to have specifically performed, and that the deed from J. H. H. Figgatt, commissioner, to Mary W. T. Graybill, and the deed from Lewis H. Graybill and Mary W. T. Graybill, his wife, to A. Nash Johnston, be set aside, vacated, and annulled, and charging Mrs. Graybill, Lewis H. Graybill, A. Nash Johnston, and J. H. H. Figgatt, commissioner, with notice of his option, and with fraud in the execution of the deeds aforesaid.

The said parties filed their demurrers and answers, and denied the allegations and equities of the bill, and the circuit court of Botetourt county, by the decrees complained of, decided that both Mrs. Graybill and A. Nash Johnston had notice of the said option at the time of receiving their respective deeds, and that said option is an enforceable contract, and binding on all the parties, including A. Nash Johnston, and directing A. Nash Johnston to convey the land to E. J. Braugh, without retaining a lien on the land, upon the payment by E. J. Braugh of the cash payment and first deferred payment, and executing bonds for the second and third deferred payments of the purchase money, "with security approved by the clerk of this court," etc., "thereby substituting for the vendor's lien to secure the deferred payments of the purchase money mere personal security, and that, too, not such as might be satisfactory to the parties interested, nor such as should be approved by the court, but with security approved by the clerk," etc. Johnston did not buy the land from Lewis H. Graybill, but from Mrs. Mary W. T. Graybill. Lewis H. Graybill never had any title to the land, and the interest of Braugh, if any, by virtue of a mere naked option to buy, which did not bind him to buy in any event whatever, was not such an interest in the subject of which a purchaser for value is bound to notice, or which equity will regard. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 692. Unilateral or option contracts are not favored in equity, and the want of mutuality of obligation and risk may generally be urged as bar to their specific enforcement. 2 Warv. Vend. p. 769. "Equity requires an actual consideration, and permits the want of it to be shown, notwithstanding the seal, and applies the doctrine to covenants, settlements, and executory agreements of every description." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 383. In respect to voluntary contracts, or such as are not founded on a valuable consideration, courts of equity do not interfere to enforce them as against the party himself, or as against volunteers claiming under him. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 706a. In Duval v. Bibb, 4 Hen. & M. 116, it was held that in equity either party to a deed may aver and prove against the other the true and actual consideration on which the deed was founded, though a different consideration be expressed therein. Equity disregards the form and looks to the substance. The nominal consideration of one dollar in the option, it is admitted, was never paid, and the option says: "It is agreed by the parties hereto that there shall be no obligation upon the said E. J. Braugh by virtue of this agreement, unless within the period of the said ten months he pays one third of the purchase money." He did not sign the option, and it did not bind him to do anything. He attempted to make a large profit on an investment of nothing, and without the obligation to do anything, and he simply failed. The complainant's bill should have been dismissed in the circuit court for want of mutuality of obligation in the option sued upon. It professes to bind one of the parties absolutely, and stipulates only for the indefinite pleasure of the other; and it cannot, therefore, be specifically enforced. Ford v. Euker, 86 Va. 79, 9 S. E. 500. It, moreover, appears that neither party contemplated a sale subject to the wife's (Mrs. Graybill's) contingent right of dower, and in this respect this case is ruled by the case of Dunsmore v. Lyle, 87 Va. 391, 12 S. E. 610, where specific performance was refused, even though the bill offered to take a deed from Lyle subject to the wife's dower. In this case the complainant Braugh seeks to enforce a conveyance of the land free from the dower interest of Mrs. Graybill, who never signed the option, and who, on hearing of it, interposed her remonstrance immediately, and communicated her refusal to be bound by it to Braugh. "Specific execution of an agreement to sell and convey will not ordinarily be decreed against the vendor, a married man, whose wife refuses to join in the deed, when there is no proof of fraud on his part in her refusal, unless the purchaser is willing to pay the full purchase money, and accept the deed without her joining." 2 Warv. Vend. p. 769. See Clarke v. Reins, 12 Grat. 98. Mrs. Graybill held the legal title to the land, and she is in no manner bound by the option of her husband, to which she was not a party, and against which she protested, from the first moment that it came to her knowledge. Dunsmore v. Lyle (Va.) 12 S. E. 611; McCann v. Janes, 1 Rob. (Va.) 256; Clarke v. Reins, 12 Grat. 98; Booten v. Scheffer, 21 Grat. 474; Iron Co. v. Gardiner, 79 Va. 305; Litterall v. Jackson, 80 Va. 604; Cheatham v. Cheatham's Ex'r, 81 Va. 395; Railroad Co. v. Dunlop, 86 Va. 346, 10 S. E. 239. The circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer of Graybill and wife to the complainant's bill, and we are of opinion that the decrees appealed from are wholly erroneous, and our judgment is to reverse and annul them, and to enter a decree here dismissing the complainant's bill.

Reversed.

HALL et al. v. HALL et al.

Supreme Court of Illinois. May 9, 1888.

Appeal from circuit court, Kane county; Charles Killum, Judge.

This is a bill for the specific performance of an agreement, entered into between the heirs of Alexis Hall, to set aside a will made by him, brought against the widow and minor heirs of Eugene Hall, one of the parties to the agreement.

Sherwood & Jones, for appellants. A. J. Hopkins, N. J. Aldrich, F. H. Thatcher, and Charles Wheaton, for appellees.

SHELDON, C. J. The defense set up in this case is that the contract of January 19, 1883, was not a complete contract, and that, not being complete, it is as no contract, and so that alleged agreement cannot be specifically enforced; that the only complete contract there could have been in the case would have been that of February 10, 1883, had the papers of that date all been executed and delivered, but as they were not, the attempted contract of February 10th was not completed, and hence there is no contract whatever to be specifically performed. It would seem from the evidence that the will of Alexis Hall, made on December 7, 1881, had come to the knowledge of his children, and had created a family dissatisfaction from its giving to Eugene the larger part of the estate, and its being executed under the circumstances it was; and that threats had been made by the other children that they would contest the will. To reconcile this family difference, the writing of November, 1882, appears to have been made, and signed by all the children, whereby they agreed that there should be an equal distribution of their father's estate between his four surviving children when the time for such distribution should come. It seems that another cause of difficulty had sprung up between Eugene and his sister Matilda, and her husband, from a long-standing note for $2,300 which had been given by the two latter to Eugene, and was unpaid, and for which the latter had taken collateral securities, which had failed to be collected from the negligence of Eugene, as was contended. This additional difficulty was amicably composed by these brothers and sisters by their all generously sharing equally among them and the widow the burden of this Plummer indebtedness; and soon after the death of Alexis Hall they came together, and executed this second agreement, of January 19, 1883. By this agreement all the four children and the widow agreed to settle the demands of Eugene on Matilda Plummer and her husband, by each bearing one-fifth part of the Plummer indebtedness; and they renew their former agreement of November previous to set aside the will of Alexis Hall, and that there should be a distribution of his estate as intestate estate. This agreement is signed by the widow, who did not sign the November agreement.

This is an agreement of a most praiseworthy kind,—an amicable arrangement among brothers and sisters of difficulties between them, which would have been carried out to the entire satisfaction of them all but for the sudden death of Eugene. It is an agreement which a court of equity will look upon favorably, and readily interpose its specific performance, unless there be some insuperable bar to prevent. The written agreement of January 19th is plain, clear, and full; it bears upon its face evidence of ample consideration, and is of itself a complete contract. That this would be an obligatory contract, although it was understood at the time that there should thereafter be a more formal instrument drawn up and executed to express the parties' agreement, is abundantly established by the authorities. Fowle v. Freeman, 9 Ves. 351; Chinnock v. Marchioness of Ely, 4 De Gex, J. & S. 638; Pratt v. Railroad Co., 21 N. Y. 305; Wharton v. Stoutenburgh, 35 N. J. Eq. 266. All there is that can be urged against the completeness of this written contract of January 9th is that it omits to state one alleged term of the contract which was then made, viz., that Eugene was to have the home farm at an appraisal to be fixed by appraisers. This is an independent matter, separate and distinct from the two subjects of agreement named in the writing,—the Plummer indebtedness, and the setting aside of the will. The bill does not ask to have performed a contract resting partly in a writing and partly in parol. It does not depend upon, or seek anything whatever respecting, the alleged parol part of the contract; but it is the defendants who are placing reliance upon this parol part of the contract, setting it up in defense, and in defeat of the performance of the contract in writing. If the defendants would not have the enjoyment of the parol part of the contract, and so not have the benefit of what they contracted for, there would be some equity in such a defense. The heirs of Eugene allege, against the performance of this written contract, that he was to have the home farm, and that this is not expressed in the writing. But if he does not get the home farm, and the other children convey their interest in it to him or his heirs, there would seem to be no equity in such a defense of the mere omission of the writing to say that Eugene was to have the home farm at a price to be fixed by appraisers. And just such is the case presented here. Two of the children, Stephen A. and Matilda Plummer, have executed agreements for conveying to Eugene their interest in the home farm. The other of the three children, Mrs. Summers, is ready and willing, and offers by the bill, to make a like agreement for conveyance of her interest in the home farm; so that the defendants do or will, under the offer of the bill, get the entire benefit of the parol part of the contract. There is no equity, then, in the defense which is set up, that this parol part of the contract was not expressed in the writing of January 9th; and we think the authorities establish that such a defense is not sustainable where the defendant gets secured to him all the benefit of the parol portion of the contract. In Railway Co. v. Winter, 1 Craig & P. 57, a bill by the company for the specific performance of a written contract for the purchase of real estate, where there had been a subsequent parol agreement that the company should also pay for timber on the land, and for certain expenses, performance was decreed, subject to the parol variation; and Lord Chancellor Cottonham said: "This is not a case within the meaning of those decisions in which the court has said that it will not specifically perform the contract with a variation. If the court finds a written contract has been entered into, and the plaintiff says, 'That was agreed upon,' but then there were certain other terms added, or certain variations made, the court holds that in such a case the contract is not in the writing, but in the terms which are verbally stated to have been the agreement between the parties, and therefore refuses specifically to perform such an agreement. On the other hand, it is quite competent for the defendant to set up a variation from the written contract; and it will depend upon the particular circumstances of each case whether that is to defeat the plaintiff's title to have a specific performance, or whether the court will perform the contract; taking care that the subject-matter of this parol agreement or understanding is also carried into effect, so that all parties may have the benefit of what they contracted for." See Robinson v. Page, 3 Russ. 114; Price v. Dyer, 17 Ves. 357. In 3 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 389, the author says: "It is a principle of equity jurisprudence that parol evidence is admissible to rebut, but not to raise, an equity; and this principle or rule gives rise here to an important distinction. Although, to resist a specific performance, a defendant may show by parol that the written document does not fully represent the contract between the parties, and thus defeat the bill, or compel the plaintiff to accept a performance with a variation, yet a plaintiff cannot have a decree for a specific performance of a written contract with a variation upon parol evidence." In Park v. Johnson, 4 Allen, 259, after a review of the English cases upon the subject, the court says: "The weight of authority seems clearly with the plaintiff on this point, [of having specific performance, where ready to take the written agreement, and fully to perform the omitted stipulation:] and, while the court would refuse to give them aid in compelling the literal execution of a written contract which does not contain the whole agreement, they allow the objection to operate no further than to require the party seeking the aid of the court to modify the written contract so as to embrace all the stipulations that are alleged to have been omitted or subsequently varied."

When Mr. Aldrich met the parties on February 10th he brought with him five papers, namely: (1) The agreement between the four children to set aside the will; (2) an agreement between the widow and children to settle the Plummer indebtedness; (3) a renunciation of the will by the widow; (4) an agreement between Stephen A. Hall and Eugene A. Hall for a conveyance by the former of an undivided one-fourth of the Alexis Hall farm; (5) a like agreement between Mrs. Plummer and Eugene A. for conveyance of a like undivided one-fourth. The first three were on that day executed by all the parties there present, and delivered to Mr. Aldrich; Mrs. Summers being the only party absent. The first three papers contained, essentially, nothing more than the agreement of January 19th, amplified by legal verbiage; and the signing of them by Mrs. Summers was of no moment, as she had signed the 19th January agreement. The other two agreements for conveyances by Stephen A. and Mrs. Plummer were also signed by them, respectively, on February 10th. A like agreement for a conveyance by Mrs. Summers, who was absent, was thereafter to be executed by her, which she has ever been ready and willing, and offers by the bill, to execute. Whatever of incompleteness there may be in these papers of February 10th, or any one of them, has no bearing, as we conceive, upon the present bill. It does not call in aid that transaction, and in no way depends upon it. The bill is rested wholly upon the agreement of January 19, 1883, and asks the specific performance of that agreement. As the specific performance is only asked subject to the defendants having all the benefit of the alleged parol part of the agreement which is claimed to have been made, we are of opinion the complainants are entitled to have the agreement of January 19, 1883, specifically performed.

It is claimed that the defendant Marion O. Hall has a dower interest in the land. Whether that be so or not is no objection to a decree of specific performance against the heirs of Eugene A. Hall. Any decree of conveyance might be made subject to whatever right of dower, if any, Marion O. Hall may have in the land.

The decree will be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with this opinion.

KELSEY et al. v. CROWTHER et al.

Supreme Court of Utah. Sept. 12, 1891.

Appeal from district court, Salt Lake county; Elliot Sanford and T. J. Anderson, Judges.

Suit in equity by Lewis P. Kelsey and J. K. Gillespie against W. J. Crowther, J. T. Lynch, and William Glassman, to enforce a specific performance of a contract to sell land. Complaint was dismissed, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

BLACKBURN, J. This is a suit in equity to enforce the specific performance of the following contract: "Salt Lake, Utah, September 13, 1887. Received of Lewis P. Kelsey and J. K. Gillespie the sum of fifty dollars, being part consideration of the purchase price, to wit, $2,750.00, at which the undersigned agrees and contracts to sell, and by good and sufficient warranty deed convey, free of all liens, to said Kelsey & Gillespie, the following described lot of ground, to wit: The east thirty (30) acres of the south half of the southwest quarter of section three, (3) township one (1) south, of range one (1) west, of Salt Lake meridian. Said purchaser to have after this date thirty (30) days for the examination of the title of said premises, and, in case said title is adversely reported on by the attorneys of the said purchasers, then the said part consideration hereby receipted shall be at once returned to said purchasers; but if said title is approved I hereby contract and agree to and with said Kelsey & Gillespie that I will at once, on the payment of said balance of agreed purchase money, to-wit, $2,700.00, duly execute, sign, and acknowledge a full and perfect warranty deed conveying to said purchasers the entire title to said premises, and I agree to at once furnish an abstract of title to said premises and other needful papers." The complaint alleges a tender of the money, although an abstract was not furnished, a demand for a deed, and the failure to make same. The answer is a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint. A trial was had by the court, findings of fact, and a judgment that the complaint be dismissed, from which judgment the plaintiffs appeal. The testimony is all in the record, and we do not deem it important to review the findings of fact made by the trial court. The claim of the appellants is that the evidence does not justify the judgment. It shows that the contract was signed and delivered on the 13th day of September, 1887; that the defendants failed altogether to furnish an abstract; that at no time within the 30 days did the plaintiffs offer to pay the purchase money and demand a deed, but on the 31st day, October 14, 1887, defendant Crowther went to the office of plaintiffs, and told Kelsey, one of the plaintiffs, that he did not come round yesterday, and that his time was up, and Kelsey said that he had forgotten it, and Crowther further told him that he had forfeited his $50; but he further said—but this Kelsey denies—he offered him back the $50. This occurred on the street in front of the office of plaintiffs, Crowther being in his buggy with his wife; and Kelsey went immediately into his office, and brought a bag with money in it, and said, "Here is your money," but Crowther drove off, and refused to wait. Kelsey says the amount of money required was in the bag. Kelsey further says that the offer of the money was on the condition that Crowther's wife would also sign the deed. We think this judgment must be affirmed.

1. The contract is an option. The plaintiffs had 30 days in which to tender the money and demand a deed. By the terms of the contract they did not have 31 days, and, having failed in that time to tender the money, they lost their right to enforce the contract. Nor do we think the failure of the defendant to furnish an abstract extended the time. It might make him liable for damages, but not enlarge or change the terms of the contract.

2. It does not appear from the evidence in this case that the plaintiffs have not a full and complete remedy at law for all the damages they may have suffered by reason of any and all breaches of this contract, if any were committed by the defendant Crowther; and as a rule specific performance of contracts is not enforced in equity, where the parties injured by breach of contract can be completely compensated in a suit at law.

3. The plaintiff Kelsey says that he offered the money on the condition that the wife of the defendant Crowther would sign the deed. A husband cannot contract away his wife's right of dower. A court of equity has no power on the husband's contract to compel a wife to relinquish her dower rights. Therefore the offer of the money was upon a condition that could not be complied with, and that was not obligatory upon the defendant, and that a court of equity could not enforce, and was no offer at all. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1400 et seq. We see no reason for the reversal of this judgment. It is therefore affirmed.

COMBS v. SCOTT et al.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. April 29, 1890.

Appeal from circuit court, Lincoln county; CHARLES M. WEBB, Judge.

Curtis & Curtis, for appellants.

Bump & Hetzel, for respondent.

ORTON, J. This is an action for specific performance, brought by the plaintiff, Harrison Combs, against Walter A. Scott, trustee of the estate of Thomas B. Scott, deceased, and his heirs as defendants, of the following contract, viz.: "May 1, 1882. In consideration of one dollar and other valuable considerations, to-wit, settlement of all suits, actions, differences, and matters of difference, I agree to give to Harrison Combs, of Applington, Iowa, on or before July 1, 1882, a good and sufficient deed in fee-simple of all my right, title, and interest of, in, and to the stump lands which I now own, lying within one and one-half or two miles of Hay Meadow creek, in Lincoln county, Wisconsin, not being adjacent to and along Prairie river, all in town thirty-two, in ranges six and seven, and town thirty-three, in ranges six and seven; the intention being to convey to said Combs all the lands lying on and along Hay Meadow creek from below, adjacent, and above the dam on said creek, not including cedar lands on lower end of Hay Meadow, or lands below the meadow; the intention being to include all stump lands opposite, above, and in the vicinity of the dam of Combs, on Hay Meadow creek,—lands that the outlet of hauling off timber that would go to Prairie river not to be included. [Signed] THOMAS B. SCOTT, [Seal.] In presence of D. W. McLEOD." The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that he demanded a conveyance of said lands of Thomas B. Scott in his life-time, and that he refused so to convey the same; and that he demanded a conveyance of the same of the defendant Walter A. Scott, the trustee of said estate, and that he also refused so to do; and that he has no adequate remedy at law for the breach of said contract, and that said lands have greatly increased in value since the breach thereof; and that he owns a mill in the vicinity of said lands, built for the purpose of manufacturing the timber thereon, which will be greatly depreciated in value in case said lands are not conveyed to him. The plaintiff also alleged the location and description of said lands, according to the terms of the contract, to consist of certain 40 acre tracts lying in townships 32 and 33, ranges 6, 7, and 9, in Lincoln county, Wis., appended to the complaint. The defendant Walter A. Scott, as such trustee, answered said complaint, and alleged that said contract was incomplete, and that it was intended thereby that the plaintiff and Thomas B. Scott should thereafter select and locate said lands, and agree to such selection, and that the plaintiff neglected to cause such selection to be made for more than four years, and until the death of said Scott, and that now it is impossible to ascertain what lands were intended by said contract. He denied that said list of lands, so appended, contained the lands contemplated by the agreement, excepting, perhaps, about seven 40-acre tracts in township 32, in range 6; and alleged, further, that he is ignorant of many of the facts alleged in the complaint, and that it is now impossible, by reason of the death of his father, Thomas B. Scott, to execute said memorandum, and that the plaintiff ought not to have specific performance of the same, on account of his laches and unreasonable delay in attempting to enforce the same. On the trial both parties introduced testimony to show what lands were intended as "stump lands," and what lands come within the boundaries mentioned in the contract, and the testimony relating thereto was quite contradictory, but the circuit court found, upon what appears to have been, perhaps, a preponderance of the testimony, and as correctly and accurately as practicable and possible, that certain 29 of said 40-acre tracts were the lands within the intent and meaning of said contract; and rendered judgment that the defendant Walter A. Scott, as such trustee, convey the same to the plaintiff. From that judgment this appeal is taken.

The objection to this judgment that has peculiar force, and makes the strongest appeal to a court of equity, is that specific performance ought not to have been adjudged in this case on account of the laches and unreasonable delay of the plaintiff in bringing his suit. The contract is dated May 1, and was to be performed July 1, 1882. Thomas B. Scott died October 7, 1886, and this action was commenced in April, 1888. These lands, July 1, 1882, when the contract was to have been performed, according to the testimony of the plaintiff himself, were of the value of only $10 for each 40-acre tract, and at the time of the trial they were worth from 20 to 50 times as much, or from $200 to $500 for each 40-acre tract. The timber on these lands has become much more valuable by the long delay, and a railroad has been built, and is in operation, through these lands, and the country generally has been greatly improved since July 1, 1882. The plaintiff has never taken any care of the lands, and has neglected to pay any taxes on them, and has allowed many of them to be sold for taxes; and Thomas B. Scott, in his life-time, paid all the taxes on them, and redeemed them from previous sales for taxes; and the defendant, as trustee, has paid all the taxes since the death of Thomas B. Scott, at an expense of many hundred dollars,—many times as much as the value

The enforcement of the contract at maturity would have been of merely nominal expense and damage to Thomas B. Scott, but will now impose an enormous claim upon his estate of many thousands of dollars. There was a delay of over four years while Thomas B. Scott was living, and nearly two years since, before bringing the suit, and without extenuation or excuse. It would be difficult to find a case in the books of greater change in the situation and value of the lands, and the circumstances material to the relief occasioned by the delay, or in which specific performance has ever granted under such circumstances. Although it may not be impossible to select, locate, and identify the lands within the intention of the contract, it has certainly been rendered much more difficult and uncertain by the death of one of the parties whose personal knowledge would seem to be requisite, if not necessary, to determine what lands were meant by "stump lands," and the meaning of the other unusual conditions of the contract. The material testimony of Thomas B. Scott has been utterly lost by the delay. He refused to convey the lands, and could do no more than to await the suit of the plaintiff for the specific performance or for the breach of the contract. The plaintiff waited until the statute of limitations had nearly run on the contract before bringing his suit. "It is a settled principle that a specific performance of a contract of sale is not a matter of course, but rests entirely in the discretion of the court, upon a view of all the circumstances." Chancellor KENT, in Seymour v. Delancey, 6 Johns. Ch. 222. "A matter not of absolute right in the party, but of sound discretion in the court." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 769. "Specific performance will not be decreed when for any reason it would be inequitable. 'It is an application to sound discretion.'" Chief Justice RYAN, in Williams v. Williams, 50 Wis. 311, 6 N. W. Rep. 814. "The unquestionable jurisdiction * * * is not compulsory upon the court, but the subject of discretion." Lord ERSKINE, in Radcliffe v. Warrington, 12 Ves. 331. The learned counsel of the appellant has cited in his brief numerous authorities to the same effect, but the principle is elementary, and the above authorities are sufficient. In consideration of the peculiar circumstances of this case, we cannot but think that it would be an abuse of sound discretion to grant such relief. "Unreasonable delay in bringing suit for the specific performance of a contract to convey will be a defense to the relief, especially where the other party has made improvements in the mean time, or the property has greatly increased in value." Johns v. Norris, 22 N. J. Eq. 102. The delay of only about two years was held sufficient to defeat the action in Haughwout v. Murphy, 21 N. J. Eq. 118, and Merritt v. Brown, Id. 401. Where one party to the contract has notified the other party that he will not perform it by refusing to convey as in this case, acquiescence in this by the other party, by a comparatively brief delay in enforcing his right, will be a bar to this remedy. McDermid v. McGregor, 21 Minn. 111. Change in the circumstances of the parties, and in the situation of the subject-matter of the contract, the destruction of evidence, and the death of one of the parties to the contract, who if living could make clear what his successor might not be able to explain, are mentioned in Anthony v. Leftwich, 3 Rand. (Va.) 238, as reasons for denying the relief. In Ruff's Appeal, 117 Pa. St. 319, 11 Atl. Rep. 553, a railroad had been built, which brought the lands within reach of market, and greatly enhanced their value, and some of the lands had been sold, and the plaintiff laid by for years while these changes were going on. It was held inequitable to decree specific performance. That was very much like this case. The lands have been sold for taxes, and yet the plaintiff waited until they became vastly enhanced in value by railroad and other improvements. Specific performance will not be enforced if for any reason it is inequitable to do so. Williams v. Williams, supra. The following authorities enforce the principle that laches and unreasonable delay in bringing suit will defeat an action for specific performance of a contract to convey. Pom. Spec. Perf. §§ 407, 408, and cases cited; Fry Spec. Perf. §§ 1072, 1078, 1079; Eads v. Williams, 4 De Gex, M. & G. 691; Watson v. Reid, 1 Russ. & M. 236; Southcomb v. Bishop of Exeter, 6 Hare, 226; Harrington v. Wheeler, 4 Ves. 686; Alley v. Deschamps, 13 Ves. 225; McWilliams v. Long, 32 Barb. 194; Delavan v. Duncan, 49 N. Y. 485; Davison v. Associates, 71 N. Y. 333; Henderson v. Hicks, 58 Cal. 364; Taylor v. Merrill, 55 Ill. 52; Smith v. Lawrence, 15 Mich. 499; Holt v. Rogers, 8 Pet. 420; Preston v. Preston, 95 U. S. 200; State v. West, 68 Mo. 229. See other cases cited in appellants' brief. The reasons are abundant why equitable relief should be denied in this case. The disparity in the value of the lands, of from 20 to 50 fold over their value when the contract was made, as of when it was to have been performed, is ample reason to leave the plaintiff to his legal remedy for the breach of the contract.

In analogy to all other like cases, as in the sale of personal property, or for breach of the covenant of seisin in deeds, the plaintiff would be entitled only to recover the consideration paid and interest, or the difference between that and the value of lands when they ought to have been conveyed, or at most, and by the most liberal rule, the value of the lands at the time of the breach of the contract. The equitable remedy in this case would be so extravagantly greater than at law that it would scarcely seem to be in the same case. Being compelled to remit the plaintiff to his remedy at law, the rule of damages in such a case may as well be considered. The rule seems not to be uniform in the different courts. In Loomis v. Wadhams, 8 Gray, 557, a case much like this, where the lands had to be selected, the rule was that the plaintiff might recover the value of the lands that might have been selected at the time the conveyance ought to have been made. Where the vendor acted in bad faith in refusing to convey on account of the enhanced value of the land, the damages were the difference between the contract price and the enhanced value when the conveyance should have been made. 1 Sedg. Dam. top p. 368; Baldwin v. Munn, 2 Wend. 399; McNair v. Compton, 35 Pa. St. 23. In Key v. Key, 3 Head. 448, the rule was the consideration paid and interest, whether the vendor acted in bad faith or not. The rule in the supreme court of the United States is the price of the land as settled by the contract at the time of its breach. Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. 109. This is in analogy to the sale of personal property. In Gale v. Dean, 20 Ill. 320, the rule was the value of the land at the time of the breach of the contract. It would seem that in the majority of cases the rule is the consideration money and interest, or the difference between the consideration and the value of the land when it should have been conveyed. It would be fruitless to examine the cases to any greater extent. In cases of property consideration, or cases where the consideration is other than money, or barter contracts, the value of the land at the time of the breach is the rule from necessity, and as approximating nearer to what the plaintiff has lost. Brigham v. Evans, 113 Mass. 538. The rule in such a case as this has not been settled in this state. For non-delivery of chattels, the damages are their value at the time when they shall have been delivered, and interest to the time of trial. Ingram v. Rankin, 47 Wis. 406, 2 N. W. Rep. 755. In Hall v. Delaplaine, 5 Wis. 206, it was a contract to convey, but with some peculiar features, and the rule was the consideration and interest. In Yenner v. Hammond, 36 Wis. 277, the penalty was fixed in the contract, but Chief Justice RYAN discusses the rule in such cases, and leaves the question open whether, in some cases, the vendee may recover damages in excess of the consideration and interest. The rule, so far as it has been considered by this court is, unquestionably, that nothing in excess of the consideration and interest can be recovered, or perhaps I ought to say that such is the general rule. This rule is in harmony with cases of breach of the covenant of seisin. Rich v. Johnson, 2 Pin. 88; Messer v. Oestreich, 52 Wis. 684, 10 N. W. Rep. 6. In this case the consideration is very small and indefinite. The contract is based on a final settlement of suits and other matters between the parties. The learned counsel of the appellant has well said in his brief that "of course the amount claimed in these suits would afford no criterion as to the amount the plaintiff was to receive," or, I may add, that it was understood by the parties he did receive, by the contract. The best, if not the only, criterion of that amount, would seem to be the value of the lands at the time the contract was made, or when the deed was to be made, which would be the same thing; for there is no evidence that their value had changed in the mean time. That would be the most favorable rule to the plaintiff that could be adopted in this case. Such a rule, we have seen, has been sanctioned in many cases, and, if applied to this case, must stand as an exception to what I understand is the general rule already established by this court, in consequence of the impossibility of ascertaining with any certainty the consideration of the contract in money or values. The real consideration must have been very small in amount, and scarcely more than nominal, for it appears that Thomas B. Scott paid the plaintiff, on such settlement, the sum of $5,000 in money. The value of the lands, at the time the deed was to be made, was only $10 for each 40 acres, or $290 in gross, according to the testimony of the plaintiff himself. That sum, and interest thereon to the time of the trial, is all the compensation in money the plaintiff is entitled to recover, and of this he, at least, has no reason to complain.

The question remains, what can be done with this suit? The usual practice would be to dismiss this complaint, and leave the plaintiff to proceed in an action at law to recover his compensation in money for the breach of the contract by the defendant. But it seems that the statute of limitations has already run on the contract, and the plaintiff has no remedy at law. We have concluded, therefore, that the circuit court ought to retain this suit in equity, to do complete justice between the parties. The usual rule in equity is, if the court cannot grant the relief prayed, to grant such relief as the party is entitled to upon the facts, and in cases of specific performance, if for any reason the title cannot be conveyed, to hold the case for compensation to the plaintiff. Story, Eq. Jur. § 19, and cases there referred to. Hall v. Delaplaine, supra. But in this case the court deems it inequitable to adjudge the conveyance of the land, notwithstanding the defendant is able to convey. This is an unusual case for retaining jurisdiction in equity to grant compensation, but there does not appear to be any reason why it may not be done as well as in cases of inability of the defendant to convey, on the well-known principle that a court of equity, having obtained jurisdiction for one purpose, may retain it for another, to give full relief, or to do justice between the parties, pertinent to the facts of the case. "When the impossibility of a specific performance is disclosed at the hearing, and the suit was brought by the plaintiff in ignorance of such fact, the court will award the remedy of damages." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1410, and note. In Hopkins v. Gilman, 22 Wis. 476, a bill was filed for specific performance of an agreement to arbitrate, and to execute a lease, and the court held that such relief could not be granted. The present chief justice says in his opinion: "Now, although the facts alleged are insufficient to justify a decree for specific performance, yet we think a court of equity may retain the suit for the purpose of awarding compensation for the value of the improvements. Undoubtedly an action for damages for non-performance of the contract would be the usual remedy. But must this suit be dismissed, and the plaintiff turned over to that remedy alone? It seems to us not, but that the court, having acquired jurisdiction of the cause, should provide and grant any relief consistent with the case made by the complaint and embraced within the issue;" citing Tenney v. Bank, 20 Wis. 152; Leonard v. Rogan, Id. 540; Greason v. Ketel- tas, 17 N. Y. 491; and Barlow v. Scott, 24 N. Y. 40. We think this case comes within the principle and practice of that case, and may be retained for the purpose of awarding compensation as above determined. The circuit court applied the same principle in giving compensation to the plaintiff for one 40-acre tract, which had been sold and conveyed for non-payment of taxes, but in doing so adopted a rule of damages unsupported by any authority, by giving the plaintiff the present value thereof. The present attitude of this case was not anticipated sufficiently for the counsel to argue or cite authorities upon the above question, but to save time and expense, and make a full disposition of the case in this court, and determine the mandate to be sent to the circuit court, we have concluded to decide all questions necessary to a full disposition of the case. We think that the selection and location of the lands, and the identification thereof, made by the finding of the circuit court, should be taken as the lands within the meaning of the contract, and $10 for each 40-acre tract thereof should be taken as the value of said lands at the time when a conveyance thereof was to be made according to the contract, and interest thereon from that time to the time of the trial, as full compensation and damages for the breach of said contract by the said Thomas B. Scott, deceased, and by the defendant as trustee of his estate, and judgment should be rendered accordingly. But this, we think, should be left optional with said defendant, or to have a new trial to determine what lands are within the intent and meaning of said contract, and the value thereof on the 1st day of July, 1882, the time fixed in said contract for the conveyance thereof. We do not think that the contract is so uncertain that it cannot be executed or enforced, and we think that the finding of the circuit court as to the lands embraced in the contract, and the value thereof at $10 for each 40-acre tract at the time aforesaid, are supported by the evidence, and are as near correct as practicable. It is doubtful if the result of another trial to determine the same facts would be of any advantage to either party. But inasmuch as the defendant contends that the finding of what lands are embraced within the contract is not supported by the evidence, and as the retaining of the suit for damages to avoid the operation of the statute of limitations, and the rule of damages established, are favorable to the plaintiff, we have concluded to make a new trial in the case optional with the defendant. The judgment of the circuit court is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to render judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with this opinion, or to grant a new trial at the option of the defendant, to determine the above facts, viz.: (1) What lands are embraced in the contract; and (2) their value on the 1st day of July, 1882; and to render judgment accordingly.

(9 S. E. 901, 32 W. Va. 463.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
June 26, 1889.

Appeal from circuit court, Braxton county; HENRY BRANNON, Judge.

This was a chancery suit, brought September 12, 1887, in the circuit court of Braxton county. The bill was filed at October rules, 1887, and it alleged that the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, was the son of William B. Frame, deceased, who was a former resident in said county. That the plaintiff lived with his father, and worked, aided, and assisted him on his farm till the plaintiff married, on May 1, 1855. That the said father owned seven or eight different tracts of lands in said county, and, being desirous of compensating the plaintiff for his services and of starting him in life, proposed to him, if he would go upon a certain tract of land, situated on the south side of Elk river, about one mile from Frame's mill, in said county,—containing 100 acres,—and cultivate and improve the same, that he would give him said land, and make him a deed therefor. This tract was granted to said William B. Frame by the commonwealth of Virginia, by patent dated September 30, 1846, a copy of which is filed with the bill, and shows the metes and bounds of this tract. That the plaintiff accepted the proposition, and, on or about May 12, 1855, moved upon said tract of land, and has ever since lived upon said land, claiming, as the bill says, and holding, the same adversely to all the world,—and further alleged that the plaintiff's possession has been open, notorious, and exclusive from that day to this,—a period over 32 years,—and he still owns, possesses, and claims the same. Some years after the plaintiff moved upon said tract of land, his father became the surety of one A. W. Wilson, on a constable's bond, in the month of May, 1868. Being apprehensive that he might be made liable, by reason of such suretyship, for the default of said Wilson, he determined to convey all of his lands to his two sons, John W. Frame and Thomas J. Frame; and accordingly, by deed bearing date the 26th of May, 1868,—a copy of which was filed with the bill,—he conveyed to his said two sons seven different tracts of land, one of the said tracts being the same tract which 13 years previously he had granted to the plaintiff, and placed him in possession of. Why his father, William B. Frame, included the plaintiff's tract of land in said conveyance, the plaintiff is not advised. "Certain it is that it was never intended by his father or by his brothers to deprive him of the ownership or possession of said tract of land, even if they could legally have done so. His said brothers well knew all the facts in relation to the agreement under which he went into possession of said land; well knew his long possession, improvement, and cultivation of the same, and well knew he was entitled to a deed therefor. In fact, they never disputed the plaintiff's right to said land, never attempted to oust him from the possession thereof, never set up any claim thereto, nor did any act in the least tending to assert a claim thereto, except as hereinafter stated. The character of said conveyance was well understood by the said William B. Frame and his said two sons, the said William B. Frame remaining in possession of said lands, except the tract sold to the plaintiff, until his death, and paying taxes therein, except the tract owned by the plaintiff, the taxes upon which were paid by the said plaintiff. It was not until July, 1886, that either of said brothers did any act which in the slightest asserted any claim to the plaintiff's land. On the 1st day of July, 1886, John H. Frame, by deed of that date, conveyed an undivided half of five of said tracts of land, including the tract owned by the plaintiff, to George Goad, trustee, to secure to Jelenko & Bro. the sum of $482.54, evidenced by a negotiable note of that date and payable six months after date, also to secure to Jelenko & Loeb the sum of $536.54, evidenced by note of that date, payable six months after date, with provision that upon default of payment of said notes, or either of them, said trustee should, upon request of the holder of said notes or either of them, sell the said undivided half of said land according to law, for cash. A copy of said deed is here filed as part hereof, marked 'Exhibit No. 3.' The firm of Jelenko & Bro. is composed of the defendants Jacob Jelenko and Gustavus Jelenko, and the firm of Jelenko & Loeb is composed of the defendants William Jelenko and Charles Loeb. At the time of the conveyance by John H. Frame to said George Goad, trustee, the plaintiff was still in the open, notorious, and exclusive possession of said 100 acres of land, and by law the said George Goad and Jacob Jelenko and Gustavus Jelenko and William Jelenko and Charles Loeb had constructive notice of the rights of the plaintiff to said 100 acres of land, and his ownership thereof, and, in addition thereto, had actual notice of such right and ownership. That on the 22d day of August, 1877, the said John H. Frame having made default in the payment of said notes, the said George Goad, as trustee, sold the said undivided one-half of said five tracts of land, including the plaintiff's tract of 100 acres, at public auction, to the highest bidder, at which sale the said defendant Charles Loeb became the purchaser of said undivided one-half of said five tracts of land, including the land of plaintiff, at the price of $700. That the said George Goad is about to convey the same to the said Loeb by a deed as such trustee. The plaintiff says that the said deed from William B. Frame to his sons Thomas J. and John H. Frame, and the trust-deed from the said John H. Frame to the said Goad, constitute a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff to said 100 acres of land; and the deed from Goad to Loeb, when made, will still further cloud his title. He is advised that he has a right to have said clouds removed, and to have specific execution of his said contract, made with his said father, and the legal title to said land conveyed to him. He therefore asks that said contract be specifically executed; that the said George Goad be restrained and enjoined from conveying the undivided one-half of said 100 acres to the said Charles Loeb; that the said John H. Frame, Thomas J. Frame, George Goad, and the parties secured by said deed of trust, be held to have no interest in said 100 acres of land; that the clouds arising from the conveyance hereinbefore set out be removed by this honorable court; that the said John H. Frame, Thomas J. Frame, and George Goad be required to unite in a deed conveying said 100 acres of land to the plaintiff, and that he have such other, further, and general relief as the court may see fit to grant."

The parties defendant to this bill were the plaintiff's said two brothers, and the trustee George Goad, and said two firms secured by said deed of trust, and Charles Loeb, the purchaser of this tract of land at the public sale under the deed of trust. The exhibits referred to in the bill were all filed with it. The following is the answer of Thomas J. Frame, filed December 5, 1887: "To the Hon. Henry Brannon, etc.—Defendant, for answer to said bill, says that he does not desire to controvert the right of the said L. M. Frame to have specific execution of his contract, as set out in said bill, and he here tenders a deed for all his right, title, and interest in the said 100-acre tract of land, and, having answered, asks to be hence dismissed, with his costs. THOMAS J. FRAME." The deed referred to in this answer was filed with this answer, and thereupon this order was made: "Thomas J. Frame this day filed his answer to plaintiff's bill, to which the plaintiff replies generally, and the said Thomas J. Frame, having by his answer tendered a deed for all his right, title, and interest in the tract of 100 acres of land in the bill mentioned, which deed is accepted by the plaintiff, it is ordered that this cause be dismissed as to the said Thomas J. Frame, but be retained for further proceedings against the other defendants; and said L. M. Frame hath leave to withdraw said deed from the papers of this cause."

At the October rules, 1887, all the other defendants other than John W. Frame filed their joint and several answers, which were as follows: "These defendants, for answer to said bill, say that it is true, as alleged in the plaintiff's said bill, that defendants Jelenko & Bro. and Jelenko & Loeb were creditors of John H. Frame in the sums and at the times set out in the plaintiff's bill, respectively, and for which the said John H. Frame, in order to secure them in their respective sums on the — day of —, 188—, conveyed to the defendant George Goad, trustee, his undivided half interest in the five tracts of land in the plaintiff's bill mentioned, situated on Elk river, near Frame's Mill, in Braxton county, among which was a tract containing 100 acres, claimed by plaintiff in his bill filed in this cause. It is also true that the said undivided half interests in the said five tracts of land conveyed to the said George Goad, trustee, as aforesaid, were on the 22d day of August, 1887, by order of the defendants Jelenko & Bro. and Jelenko & Loeb, sold by the said George Goad, trustee, after giving notice as required by law, at public auction, at the front door of the court-house of Braxton county, for cash, to Charles Loeb, at the price of $700.00, he being the highest bidder therefor, which amount was paid on day of said sale by said Loeb. A deed was obtained by said Loeb from said trustee, on 1st day of October, 1887, which is here filed, marked 'Exhibit No. 1,' and made part of this answer. These respondents deny that the plaintiff ever had any title, or semblance of title, to the said 100 acres of land claimed by him in his said bill, or that his possession thereof was adverse and exclusive for the period of time alleged in his bill, or it ever was so held by him for any period of time from the time his said father obtained his grant from the commonwealth of Virginia therefor to the present time. These respondents here expressly deny ever having had any notice, either actual or constructive, of any claim of title by plaintiff to said tract of land, or of any right thereto by him whatever. These defendants, for further answer, say that they are advised and believe and charge that plaintiff never had any contract of purchase with his said father for said 100 acres of land, but that, if he had any such contract, it was without consideration, and cannot affect the title of either George Goad, trustee, or defendant Charles Loeb, to said land; that if the plaintiff ever occupied, resided on, or controlled in any manner said tract of land in the life-time of his said father, it was a mere tenancy at will, and not under a contract of purchase. These defendants also deny that William B. Frame, in his lifetime, ever made plaintiff any proposition to the effect that if he (plaintiff) would move upon said 100 acres of land, and improve it, that he would give said land to him. These defendants, having answered fully all material allegations in the plaintiff's bill charged, pray hence to be dismissed, with their costs in this behalf expended, and they will ever pray," etc.

The exhibits referred to in this answer were filed as exhibits with it. Depositions were taken both by the plaintiff and by the defendants. The plaintiff proved by one witness, a nephew of William B. Frame, that the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, had had possession of and lived upon the 100-acre farm named and described in the bill for 31 years, —ever since 1856. That he, the witness, went to the residence of plaintiff's father one morning in 1856, and William B. Frame told him he had given the plaintiff, "Lemuel, a farm yesterday morning," and he pointed out this 100-acre tract, which was in sight,

"across the river," as the farm he had given him; and he said he had given his other lands to John and Thomas, his sons. He said that "Lemuel could go to work, or starve." He said they would have to give a woman who was in the house on this farm two bushels of corn in order to get her to leave and give up the house to Lemuel, so he could move in. Lemuel Frame, the plaintiff, moved on the place a week or 10 days afterwards, and has been in the occupation of it ever since. The witness proved, also, that he had since then gotten timber trees off this tract of land. He got the timber trees of the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, who always claimed this as his farm. These trees were sawed for the witness at the mill of the plaintiff's father, William B. Frame, who knew where these trees came from, but set up no claim to them. He never disputed about them, and never claimed that the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, did not own this tract of land, as he claimed. The members of William B. Frame's family,—his wife, sons, and daughter, and a son of the plaintiff's family,—who were all examined, all testified they had never heard of William B. Frame's giving his sons John H. Frame and Thomas J. Frame any lands in 1856, as had been testified to by their cousin. But the daughter testified that she had lived with her father in 1856, up to 1864, and at that time she heard him say frequently he had given L. M. Frame the farm he claimed in this suit; that he moved on the land within a month after it was given to him, and has lived on it ever since. Her father always called it "Lemuel's place." The widow of William B. Frame, whom he married in 1864, proves the same statement that she heard made by William B. Frame frequently. She never heard him say he had given any other lands to his other children in 1856. The plaintiff himself testified that he had lived on the 100-acre farm in controversy since the 18th or 20th of May, 1856; that his father gave it to him, and he moved on it and occupied it as his own, and he did not occupy it as a tenant of his father. His occupancy of it has been open, notorious, and visible. He has cultivated the land, cleared it, fenced it, and cut saw-logs from it. He cleared and fenced on it some 72 acres. The whole of this was fenced prior to 1871. He has planted on it 800 apple-trees, and some 50 peach-trees, and, while the house he lived in was on the land when he went there, he had put up another house on the land; also, a log stable. John H. Frame and Thomas J. Frame, his brothers, to whom he had conveyed this and other tracts of land in 1868, frequently got timber trees off of the land, buying them from him and not disputing his ownership of the land. John H. Frame had in this way bought timber from him off of this land in 1868 and 1869. The plaintiff's son proved that about 18 months ago his father, Lemuel M. Frame, had offered to sell this farm of 100 acres to one T. A. Reip at $50 for the house and garden, and $1 apiece for the bearing apple-trees and walnut-trees. Witness told John H. Frame of this offer, which he had declined. John H. Frame said witness' father had better have reduced the price of the trees to 50 cents, rather than miss the sale. He knew of John H. Frame on several occasions buying a stick of timber off of this tract of land and paying witness' father for it. He proved his father had lived on this land from his earliest remembrance, and he was now 30 years old. He always claimed the farm as his own, and every one spoke of it as his father's farm. He had cleared and inclosed about three-fourths of it. On the other fourth was a maple-sugar orchard of 15 or 16 acres, from which his father made sugar every year. He knew of his father more than once selling a stick of timber off of this land to his grandfather, William B. Frame. He bought one of these sticks of wood about 1866. William B. Frame died in 1876.

It was also proved by other witnesses that the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, had lived on this tract of land some 30 years; that during all that time he claimed it as his own farm; that, although it was taxed to his father, William B. Frame, till 1868, and after that to John H. Frame, and Thomas J. Frame, yet the taxes were always paid by plaintiff, L. M. Frame. He testified that about 1882 he refused to pay the taxes on this tract of land, unless the sheriff made out a separate receipt for this tract, and did not have it as it had been on the receipt for the taxes of all the lands owned by John H. Frame and Thomas J. Frame, and after that a separate receipt was made out by the sheriff for this tract of land. The defendants Jelenko & Bro. and Jelenko & Loeb were wholesale merchants, doing business in Charleston, Kanawha county, W. Va. John H. Frame was a retail merchant at Frametown, Braxton county, W. Va. He purchased goods of these two wholesale firms in 1882, and continued thereafter to do so. When he commenced doing business with these firms they made inquiry of the clerk of the county court of Braxton with reference to his financial condition, and what real estate he owned, and with what personal property he was taxed, and whether there were any liens on his property. They were informed that he owned a moiety of the seven tracts of land conveyed to him and his brother Thomas J. Frame. They included the 100-acre tract now claimed by the plaintiff, L. M. Frame. At the foot of a copy of this deed for these seven tracts of land from William B. Frame to Thomas J. Frame and John H. Frame was this memorandum, sent to a member of the firm by said county clerk: "The only lien on record against the above, so far as I have been able to find, is a judgment lien against John H. Frame, in favor of Philip Frankenberger, for $143.90, with interest from the 13th day of June, 1885, and $1.90 costs. I find that John H. Frame is assessed on the personal property book of this county with the aggregate sum of $96, consisting of 3 head of cattle, at $40; 2 hogs, $4; 1 watch or clock, at $2; farming implements, $5; household, etc., $45; I have given the boundary to each tract as it is in the deed above mentioned."

A member of one of the firms, Charles Loeb, went up to Braxton county, to try and collect the amount due them for boots and shoes they had sold to John H. Frame, which amounted to $536.54. He said he could not pay it, but was willing to secure them on his real estate, if they would give him six months' longer credit. To this Charles Loeb, one of the members of said firm, agreed; whereupon John H. Frame gave his note for the balance due the firm, payable in six months, and a deed of trust dated July 1, 1886, on an undivided moiety of five tracts of land, including the 100-acre tract claimed by the plaintiff. "When I made this arrangement for my firm, Jelenko & Loeb, I also, as the agent of the firm of Jelenko & Bro., wholesale dry-goods merchants in Charleston, settled the balance due them from him to Jelenko & Bro., bought of them by John H. Frame. This balance was $482.54, for which he executed his note to Jelenko & Bro., dated July 1, 1886, payable in six months, which was secured by said deed of trust on said five tracts of land, including the 100-acre tract claimed by the plaintiff." This deed was executed, and duly acknowledged and recorded in the county court clerk's office of Braxton county, on July 2, 1886, both by John H. Frame and his wife, Amanda Frame. The trustee in this deed of trust, George Goad, pursuant to the provisions in this deed of trust, sold the said one undivided moiety of these five several tracts of land, and Charles Loeb became the purchaser thereof for $700, which being paid in cash, said trustee executed and delivered to him a deed for one undivided moiety of these five tracts of land, including this 100-acre tract claimed by the plaintiff. This deed is filed with the answer of the defendants, it having been recorded. A lawyer, on behalf of Lemuel M. Frame, when these lands were being offered for sale and before they were sold, publicly announced that the party purchasing this 100-acre tract claimed by Lemuel M. Frame could not get any title thereto, as he had claimed the land for 30 years, and lived upon it, and the trustee, Goad, said: "Certainly, you can only get such title as is in me."

J. F. Brown, for appellants. W. E. R. Byrne, for appellee.

GREEN, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The first question presented by this record is, will a court of equity specifically enforce in any case, or against any one, a verbal gift of land from a father to a child, as in some cases it is difficult, if not impossible, in principle, to distinguish gifts and sales? I will, before considering directly this question, state briefly the law in reference to the specific enforcement of verbal sales of land, and the principles on which it is based. By the statute of frauds, passed in 1677, and a similar statute to be found wherever the common law prevails, "No action shall be brought upon any contract or sale of land, tenements or hereditaments, or interest in or concerning them, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing and signed by the party to be charged therewith, or by some person thereunto by him lawfully authorized." See Code W. Va. 1887, c. 98. The English courts, very soon after the passage of their statute of frauds, took the view that, while the chancery courts were as much bound by this statute as the common-law courts, yet, as it was the peculiar province of a chancery court to relieve against fraud, a court of chancery, despite this statute, would specifically enforce a verbal contract for the sale of land when the refusal to execute the contract would itself amount to the practicing of fraud by the defendant on the plaintiff. In so doing, they said, they were engrafting no exception on this statute, but simply proceeding to prevent fraud upon general principles which prevailed universally in courts of equity, and it would never do to so construe the statute of frauds, as to promote instead of suppressing fraud, as it was intended to do. See Browne, St. Frauds, § 457. If the defendant has partly performed his part of such contract, and his act of part performance is incapable of compensation in damages, it would obviously be fraud on the plaintiff to permit the defendant to refuse to execute such contract because it was verbal; and in such case a court of equity will compel the specific performance of such verbal contract. If, for example, the vendor of real estate, by a verbal contract, has delivered possession of the land to the vendee, this will entitle the vendee who is in possession of the land to compel a specific performance of the contract by making a deed therefor on the payment of the purchase money; for otherwise the vendor might sue the vendee as a trespasser, and to permit him to do so after he has put the vendee in possession under the verbal contract would be to permit him to take advantage of his own wrong, in repudiating his obligation, and it would be punishing the vendee, who has complied with his own obligation. If the vendee has taken possession of the land, the courts regard that the wrong done by compelling him to surrender the possession of it as a trespasser is such an injury as could not be compensated in damages, and hence there is no other way of punishing the recalcitrant vendor for committing a fraud on the vendee, who has complied with his contract, by treating him as a trespasser. The authorities supporting these views are numerous, both in England and America. See 2 Lomax, Dig. p. (40,) 55; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 761; Wat. Spec. Perf. § 270. It is also settled, both in England and America, that, if the vendee under a verbal agreement for the purchase of real estate expends labor or money in improving the same, the contract is thereby partly performed, and the statute of frauds has no application to it. In such a case the improvements by the vendee in possession constitute valuable and equitable consideration, and entitle him to specific execution of the contract which he complies with fully on his part. There is, then, First, the verbal agreement; second, the delivery and taking possession of the estate in accordance with the agreement; and, third, the expenditure of money in consequence and in faith of the agreement; and, fourth, a complete compliance with the agreement by the vendee, by the payment of the entire purchase money. If the first of these circumstances alone exists, the statute of frauds denies all remedy. When the second ensues, the vendee has partly performed his contract, and has taken a step which would render it a fraud on the part of the vendor to divest him of his possession and refuse him a deed. When the third circumstance follows, in expenditures to improve the land, all the powers of equity are summoned into action to protect the vendee on several grounds, each sufficient and each distinct in its nature. It will then, when the vendee fully complies with his contract, compel specific execution by the vendor—First, because it would be a fraud in him to refuse it; secondly, he would profit by his own fraud, in acquiring the improvements with the land he sold; and, thirdly, because the vendee has introduced a valuable consideration, which, if he lost it, could not be restored to him, and is not ordinarily of a nature to be compensatory in damages. These views are well sustained by both English and American authorities. See 1 Sugd. Vend. (8th Amer. Ed.) p. (151,) 226; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 761; Browne, St. Frauds, § 487a; Wat. Spec. Perf. § 280; Rhea v. Jordan, 28 Grat. 683; Tracy v. Tracy, 14 W. Va. 243. If a donee, being a child, under a parol gift of real estate by a father, take possession and expend money or labor to improve it as against the donor, he stands upon the same footing as a purchaser for a valuable consideration. The statute of frauds has no application to the transaction, and equity will compel its specific performance by requiring him to execute his deed to consummate his gift. We will now consider parol gift specially. If A. points to a house and lot, and says to his child, B., "I give you this house and lot," and B. says, "I accept the gift," and nothing more passes in reference to the matter, a court of equity will take no cognizance of it. B., if he had paid A. for the house and lot, without taking possession, could not compel him to execute a deed, because he could have his remedy in recovering the money he had paid, with interest, in a court of law. A fortiori, a court of equity will not entertain B. when he has paid nothing; and, if B. should sue at law, he can recover nothing, because A.'s promise or gift was without consideration,—a nudum pactum,—and B. has suffered no damages. The donee has not changed his situation, and there is no basis for an appeal to a court of equity to interpose. But suppose B. enters the house and makes it his home, and goes on to act as owner, and improves the premises by the expenditure of money or labor. He digs ditches and enriches the land. He builds fences for its permanent protection. He plants out trees, clears the land and lives in the house. These acts change the situation and fix the gift. Why? Because valuable consideration has now entered into the transaction. The agreement of gift has been partly performed, by acts which cannot be undone. A valuable consideration may be a detriment to the promisee or a benefit to the promisor. What was in its inception? A promise sustained only by a good consideration—the love and affection of a father to a child—has by such acts become in effect a promise sustained by a valuable consideration.

It may be regarded as settled law in this state and in Virginia that a verbal donee of land—a child, who, under the verbal gift, has taken possession of the land and improved it—has a right to demand in a court of equity a specific performance of the contract by the execution of a deed by the father, thereby consummating his verbal gift. This was so held in Shobe's Ex'rs v. Carr, 3 Munf. 10, decided as long ago as 1811, and this case has been repeatedly followed or recognized as law by numerous Virginia decisions ever since. See Darlington v. McCooles, 1 Leigh, 36; Reed's Heirs v. Vannorsdale, 2 Leigh, 569; Pigg v. Corder, 12 Leigh, 69; Cox v. Cox, 26 Grat. 305. There are also numerous authorities in other states to the like effect. Freeman v. Freeman, 43 N. Y. 34; Loddell v. Loddell, 33 How. Pr. 347; Shepherd v. Bevin, 9 Gill, 32; Young v. Glendenning, 6 Watts, 510; Galbraith v. Galbraith, 5 Kan. 409; Kurtz v. Hibner, 55 Ill. 521; McLain v. School-Directors, 51 Pa. St. 196; Neale v. Neales, 9 Wall. 1; Hardesty v. Richardson, 44 Md. 617. If, however, a father give his child verbally a farm, and put him in possession thereof, but he neither spends money nor labor in improving the land, it is very questionable in Virginia and in West Virginia whether the child, in a court of equity, could compel the father to make him a deed. It was so decided in the cases of Stokes v. Oliver, 76 Va. 72, and Keffer v. Grayson, Id. 517. In these cases it was held that the love and affection of a father to a child is not enough, of itself, to warrant a decree for a specific performance, even when the agreement to make the gift is in writing, and the child in possession of the farm. But the contrary was held by this court in Marling v. Marling, 9 W. Va. 79. But, in delivering the opinion of the court, in that case, on page 95, I express my own opinion, that, while such agreement need not be under seal, it must be a formal agreement, in writing, duly delivered as such, and while in such case, the consideration being good, though not valuable, a court of equity could properly dispense with the seal to it, yet it could not dispense with its being a formal agreement in writing, and a verbal agreement to give a farm to a child could not be enforced specifically, even when the child had been put in possession of the farm, but such agreements of gift, when performed in part by putting the donee in possession, have been enforced in some states. See TILGHMAN, C. J., in Lessee of Syler v. Eckhart, 1 Bin. 380; Big. Fraud, 386; Smith, Eq. 254, 255; Mahon v. Baker, 26 Pa. St. 519. And it must be admitted that the reasoning which supports the enforcement of a verbal contract of sale partly performed by the simple delivery of possession appears equally applicable when there is a verbal gift of land by a father to a child, accompanied by the delivering of the possession of the land. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 761, and articles of John W. Daniel in the April, 1883, number of Virginia Law Journal, where the question we are considering is elaborately discussed in an able article. Many of the views taken in said article I have adopted in this opinion.

I have thus far been discussing the right of a donee or vendee of real estate by a verbal agreement to enforce specifically such verbal agreement when the donor has put the donee in possession of the land. We will now consider whether the law is modified when the vendee or donee in possession of the land seeks to have his contract specifically enforced against a subsequent purchaser for valuable consideration of the donor, or against a judgment creditor of the vendor or donor. In the first place, it must be observed that when the vendee or donee is in possession of the land, openly and notoriously living upon it, for instance, there cannot be a purchaser of the land for valuable consideration without notice from the vendor or donor, because such possession by the vendee or donee of itself conveys notice to the whole world of the equitable title of the vendee or donee, and of his right to the legal title; the possession of realty being the fact of most comprehensive and far-reaching consequences that bears upon its title. The perfect legal title was originally conferred by this delivery of possession or livery of seisin. A fee was not perfect without this delivery of possession, but, if accompanied by such delivery of possession, it was perfect, even though it was a mere verbal transfer. The earth has been described as that universal manuscript, open to the eyes of all. When, therefore, a man proposes to buy or deal with realty, his first duty is to read this public manuscript; that is, to look and see who is there upon it and what are his rights there. And, if the person in possession has an equitable title to it, he is as much bound to respect it as if it was a perfect legal title, evidenced by a deed duly recorded. See 2 Sugd. Vend. 866; Sedg. & W. Tr. Title Land, § 717; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 400; Big. Fraud, 293, 294; Floyd v. Harding, 28 Grat. 410; Merithew v. Andrews, 44 Barb. 207; Grimstone v. Carter, 3 Paige, 421; Had- duck v. Wilmarth, 5 N. H. 181; Knox v. Thompson, 1 Litt. (Ky.) 350; Tuttle v. Jackson, 6 Wend. 213; Parks v. Jackson, 11 Wend. 442; Morgan v. Morgan, 3 Stew. (Ala.) 383. When the sale or gift of the land is by a verbal agreement, the terms of such agreement must be definite and made out with reasonable certainty. See Wright v. Pucket, 22 Grat. 370. By reasonable certainty is not meant a mathematical certainty; but what is meant is that the evidence adduced must leave the court satisfied and convinced as to the terms of the agreement, and it must be so definite as to guide the court safely into carrying it into execution. The plaintiff who seeks a specific performance of a verbal contract or gift of land, or, indeed, who seeks the aid of a court of equity to enforce any equitable right, must show that he has used reasonable diligence, and that his claim is not a stale claim. See 1 Bart. Ch. Pr. § 23. As there stated, it is a familiar doctrine of the courts of equity that nothing can call them into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence. Where these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing.

We will assume, first, that a verbal gift of this 100 acres of land, patented to William B. Frame September 30, 1846, was by him, about May 12, 1856, made to his son Lemuel M. Frame, and the donee then took possession of this 100 acres, exercising an undisputed ownership over it from that time, selling timber off it to his father and others, and had lived upon it and cleared it up and cultivated it ever since, and that considerable time and money had been spent by him in improving this tract of land. These facts the counsel of the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, regard as clearly proven. If they are really proven, with the requisite degree of distinctness and certainty, then, on the authorities we have cited, it would seem clear that the son of L. M. Frame had a right to specifically enforce this agreement against his father, William B. Frame, provided he used reasonable diligence in instituting his suit, and did not permit his claim to become too stale before he brought his suit. It is claimed by the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, that he was in the exclusive and uninterrupted possession of this farm, claiming against all the world, and especially against his father, the donor,—actually selling him timber off this land. It was unnecessary for him to institute this suit while this state of things existed. The donee, L. M. Frame, was not called upon to act, no one disputing his right to the same, and he having held possession and use of it. There is much strength in this view; and, so long as this state of things existed, the court might be disposed to excuse the plaintiff, L. M. Frame, for not instituting this suit for a specific performance. How long did this state of things exist? The record shows until May 26, 1868. But not thereafter, for William B. Frame, the father, exercised the most decisive act of ownership over this 100-acre tract; for on that day, for a consideration stated on the face of the deed to have been $500, he and his wife conveyed to their sons Thomas J. and John W. Frame seven different tracts of land, including the tract of 100 acres claimed to have been given verbally to said L. M. Frame 13 years before. This put it entirely out of his power to make a deed of this land to L. M. Frame, knowing that he could not acquire a valid title for this tract of land, on which he was living, except by instituting in a court of equity a suit for the specific performance of the verbal agreement to give it to him, made by his father some 13 years before. He never could have acquired a good title to this tract of land by living upon it, claiming it as his own, and exercising rights of ownership over it, no matter how notorious, undisputed, and exclusive such possession was. For, as he entered upon the land by permission of his father, who had the legal title, his possession was admitted in subordination to his father's title, and was not, therefore, and could not become, adversary to his father's title, or the title of those claiming by deed under his father. See Hudson v. Putney, 14 W. Va. 561. He knew, therefore, as early as June, 1868, that if he wanted a title to this 100-acre tract, on which he lived, he would have to get it by asking a court of equity to compel the legal owners to convey the land to him, as the true equitable owner. It was his duty, therefore, if he did not mean to abandon his equitable title, to have instituted this suit in a reasonable time after January 1, 1868. It may be said that he did not know that his father then conveyed this tract of land to his two brothers. But though, perhaps, we cannot assume that he knew this deed was made to his brothers by his father simply because it was promptly put on record, yet there is his own statement in his deposition of facts, which shows that he did know of the making of this deed to his brothers, for he says he always paid the taxes on this land, though it was taxed in his father's name until 1868, and then in the name of his brothers; that the tax-bill was thus made out, and he paid the taxes on this tract, though the tax-bills were made out against his brothers, and that he refused to pay them after a while, if not differently made out. He was thus reminded each year by these tax-bills, that the legal title of this land was in his father till 1868; after that, in his brothers. It was clearly his duty, when it was thus made known to him that he could not acquire legal title to this land except by suit, for him to have brought such suit with reasonable promptness, especially as 13 years had already expired since he claimed the equitable right to this land. But he did not institute such suit for more than 19 years, and some 32 years after the alleged verbal promise of his father to give him this land. In the mean time his father had died, and one of his brothers, to whom, in 1868, his father had conveyed this land, and the records of the clerk of the county court showed that, upon the fact that he owns this land, this brother had acquired a credit, and been trusted, and, on his giving security to pay debts so owed, in the shape of a deed of trust on his interest in this and other lands, the trustee had sold said interest in said land at public auction for cash. There is a strong contrast between the care and diligence of the plaintiff in protecting his rights and that of the defendants. Before they extended credit to the plaintiff's brother, and took this deed of trust of him, they had the clerk's records in the county court of Braxton, where his brother lived, examined, to ascertain what lands he owned, and whose liens were upon them, and all they now ask is that, as they have used every precaution in conducting their business, the court will not deprive them of the security they took by setting up an equitable title of the plaintiff, of which they had no actual notice and of which the plaintiff must have, in the nature of things, known that they could take no notice. They were wholesale merchants, living remote from Braxton county, in Charleston. The defendant John H. Frame was engaged in the mercantile business in the county of Braxton, and his brother, (the plaintiff,) who lived near him, must have known that in conducting such business he would buy his goods of wholesale merchants, at a distance, and thus incur debts, and such creditors would have no means of knowing his pecuniary condition, except as it was shown by the records in the clerk's office of the county court. So, by his neglect in bringing the suit the plaintiff must have known he was furnishing his brother John H. Frame the means of imposing on the wholesale merchants, of whom he was buying his goods on credit, as to his pecuniary condition. Just what might have been expected did occur, and loss must now be sustained. Should this loss be sustained by the plaintiff, who was so grossly careless, or by the defendants, who acted with caution and diligence? Vigilantibus non dormientibus jura subveniunt.

But the staleness of the plaintiff's claim is not the only difficulty in making out this case, as presented by this record. I have heretofore assumed that he proved the verbal gift of this 100 acres of land from his father in 1856. But has he proven the agreement to make this gift with the requisite degree of certainty and distinctness, such as a court of equity should require, especially when it is borne in mind that the plaintiff, who alleges this verbal agreement, asks to have it specifically enforced, to the obvious loss of purchasers from his brother for valuable consideration, without any actual notice of such verbal gift? The bill alleges that the plaintiff lived with his father, and worked and assisted him on his farm, until his marriage, which occurred on May 1, 1855; that his father at that time was the owner of seven or eight different tracts of land in Braxton county, W. Va., and being desirous of compensating the plaintiff for his services, and starting him in life, proposed to him that if he would go upon a certain tract of land, situated on the south side of Elk river, about one mile above Frame's mill, in said county, containing 100 acres, and cultivate and improve the same, he would give said land to him, and make him a deed therefor. The plaintiff accepted this proposition of his father and on or about May 12, 1855, moved upon said land, and has since held and claimed the same adversely to all the world. This possession has been open, notorious, and exclusive from that day to this,—a period of over 32 years. "Some years after the plaintiff moved on this land,—in the month of May, 1868,—being apprehensive that he might be made liable by reason of his suretyship of a constable named Wilson, because of his default, he determined to convey all of his said land to his two sons, the defendants Thomas J. and John H. Frame. He made them a deed, duly recorded, a copy of which is filed with the bill. On the face of the deed the consideration purports to be $500 cash." This verbal agreement by the plaintiff's father to give him this tract of land was not an absolute promise to give him the land, and make him a deed therefor, but was only a conditional promise that he would do so if the plaintiff (his son) would cultivate and improve the same. In what way he was required to improve the same is not stated in the bill, if it were specified by the father at the time. But, as the bill states that "the plaintiff [the son] accepted the proposition, moved upon the land, erected a house thereon, and commenced to cultivate and improve the same," it is very probable that the building of a dwelling-house on this farm, as a residence for his son and his family, (he having married,) was an improvement required of the son by the father. This is the more probable as we may infer from the proof in the case that the house then on the land was a very indifferent one,—in fact, one not fit to be occupied by his son's family as their dwelling. But even this very indifferent house was then occupied by a woman, who might not surrender the possession of it. There is no direct proof as to the character of this house that was on the land, but the plaintiff's son proves that about a year before this suit was brought his father (the plaintiff) offered to sell to T.A. Reip the house and garden at $50, and his brother John said his father should have taken less than he asked for it. We may, I think, fairly infer from this that the house was hardly fit for a man and his family to occupy. The plaintiff testified he built a house on this land. But I assume it was a very poor house, as he continued to live in a house worth less than $50. When he built this house does not appear. It only appears that the son (the plaintiff) moved into the house on the place when the gift was made by the father. This, the proof shows, was not at the time he was married, on May 1, 1855. There is nothing said about his marriage in the evidence. If the agreement was that the father would make the deed to the plaintiff, (the son,) if he would build a residence on the farm and improve it, as the bill says, such an agreement was a conditional agreement.

The building of the residence and improving the farm being a condition precedent to the son's acquiring a right to demand a deed of the father, and if a time was named when the house was to be built, if the son failed to build the house in the specified time, or of the character named, he lost forever a right to demand a deed of the father. Keffer v. Grayson, 76 Va. 517. Some 12 years after this parol agreement to make a gift on certain conditions to his son, (the plaintiff,) the father actually conveyed this land to two other sons. "Why he did so," the bill says, "the plaintiff is not advised. Certain it is that it was never intended by his father or his brothers to deprive him of the ownership or possession of this tract of land." It seems to me, a probable explanation of the conduct of the father and brothers to the plaintiff is that, he having failed to comply with the condition on which only the father was to convey him the land,—that is, as I surmise, to build in a certain specified time a house of a particular character,—he had no right to demand a deed of his father, and his father was at liberty to convey it to his other sons; and this he did because of the failure of the plaintiff to comply with the condition imposed on him by his father, the plaintiff, and his family, after 12 years, still living in a house worth less than $50. The answer of the defendants to the appellee's bill denied this verbal gift by the father to his son (the plaintiff) of this land. This put on him the burden of proving this parol agreement of his father to give him this land; and the law, we have seen, required him to prove the agreement with definiteness and accuracy. Has this been done? It seems to me, it has not. No one who was present when the alleged verbal agreement was entered into by the father and son for the gift of this tract of land testifies in the case to what then transpired, or as to the terms of, or conditions attached to, the gift. That it was a conditional agreement we only learn from the allegations in the bill. There is not one particle of evidence showing what the terms or conditions of this gift were. The whole proof consists of subsequent admission by the father that he had given this land to his son (the plaintiff) or admission by conduct or by acts that he regarded this farm as belonging to his son (the plaintiff.) But such statements and conduct are what would naturally have occurred had the verbal gift of this farm to his son (the plaintiff) been a conditional one, such as is set out in the bill, or such as I have above suggested. Naturally, the father would have expected the condition precedent attached to the gift would in good time have been complied with by the son, and the gift thus perfected; and, anticipating that this would be the case, the father would naturally speak and act as if this farm belonged to his son, and though he had no right to demand a deed for this farm unless he complied strictly with the conditions precedent to the gift, whatever they were. The most direct and satisfactory evidence of this verbal agreement was deposition of a nephew of the father, giving what was said casually by the father to the witness the day after this verbal gift of this farm to his son, (the plaintiff.) This we will analyze. He says in his deposition taken October 17, 1887: "L. M. Frame, the plaintiff, has resided on this farm of 100 acres about 31 years. I went to his father's, William B. Frame's, one morning, and he said to me: 'I have made way with my land.' I said, 'Have you?' and he said, 'Yes. I gave Lemuel a farm yesterday,'—and he pointed to the 100-acre farm across the river as the one he had given him. He said he let John and Tom have the balance. He had owned six or seven tracts of land. He said: 'Now Lemuel can go to work, or starve.' He said too, they would have to give Nancy Jones, to get her out of the house, two bushels of corn, before Lem could move in." Though this witness is so definite as to what was said then, still it is obvious that his testimony is far from being satisfactory. It gives the details of a casual conversation in which the witness had had no interest and which occurred some 31 years before. We know there must have been very substantial errors in it. For instance, the bill does not pretend that William B. Frame gave all his land to his three sons at that time, in 1856; but it says he gave this one farm of 100 acres to his son (the plaintiff) then, and the balance of his land to his two other sons, John and Tom, some 12 years afterwards, and not one member of the family, or a single other witness, ever heard of any gift at that time of any of his lands by William B. Frame to any of his children except this 100 acres to his son, (the plaintiff.) This, I suppose, was a mistake made by the nephew as to what his uncle, William B. Frame, then said to him. He heard this many years afterwards. This witness said the father said, "Now Lemuel," (the plaintiff,) "must go to work." This does not look as if the gift was made, as stated in the bill, "to compensate the plaintiff for his past services, and to start him in life." He had lived with his father, but we may infer from what his father said that he did not think his past services deserved compensation, but rather considered that he had heretofore supported him in idleness, and he proposed to do so no longer, but he must "go to work or starve." There is in this conversation corroborative evidence of the small value of the house on this 100 acres of land, for it was supposed Nancy Jones would let the son move into this house, and she would give it up, for the trifling compensation of two bushels of corn. She could not have regarded the house at all desirable to live in, if she could surrender it so easily. This conversation took place before the son (the plaintiff) had taken possession of this farm, and when, of course, the conditional gift named in the bill was imperfect, and when, of course, the son had no right to demand a deed of the father; and, though the statements and acts of the father subsequently show simply that he had given his son (the plaintiff) this farm, and were made after he had taken possession, yet none of them are inconsistent with the gift being conditional and the condition not complied with, and this, one suspects, was the case, from his father having some 12 years afterwards made to two other sons a deed for this farm. It seems to me, therefore, that the plaintiff has failed to show with the requisite degree of distinctness and accuracy the terms of the verbal agreement made by his father, giving him this land, because of the great lapse of time (31 years) before the institution of this suit.

The court below ought to have dismissed his bill at his costs. The court below, obviously, by its order made December 5, 1887, properly dismissed the bill as to the defendant Thomas J. Frame, he tendering with his answer a deed to the plaintiff for his moiety of the land, which the plaintiff was willing to accept, but the court below erred in its decree of May 2, 1888, specifically enforcing said alleged verbal contract against the other defendants. This decree must be set aside, annulled, and reversed, and the appellants must recover of the appellee, L. M. Frame, their costs in this court expended, and this court, entering such order as the court below should have done, must dismiss the bill of the plaintiff, and the defendants below, other than Thomas J. Frame, must recover of the plaintiff below their costs expended in the court below.

Supreme Court of the United States. March 3, 1890.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Nebraska.

This is a suit to compel the specific performance by the appellant, Cheney, of a written agreement entered into May 28, 1880, between him and the appellee, Libby, whereby the former demised and let to the latter the possession and use of, and contracted, bargained, and agreed to sell to him, two sections of unimproved land in Gage county, Neb. The defendant claimed that the contract was forfeited, long before this suit was brought, by Libby's failure to comply with its stipulations. Upon that ground he resists the granting of the relief asked. The circuit court adjudged that the plaintiff was entitled to a decree.

The question to be determined is whether there was any such default upon the part of the plaintiff, Libby, as deprived him of the right to specific performance.

The sum agreed upon for the possession, use, occupancy, and control of the land was $1,361.60 yearly, represented in Libby's notes, and in the taxes assessed and to be assessed against the land. The price for the land was $8,960, of which $1,600 was paid at the date of the contract. The balance was to be paid, "without notice or demand therefor," in annual installments, at the times specified in promissory notes, of even date with the contract, which were executed by Libby to Cheney at Tecumseh, Neb. The notes were made payable to the order of Cheney, at the office of Russell & Holmes, private bankers in that city. Eight of the notes represented the balance of the principal debt,—each one being for $920,—and were payable, respectively, in 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10 years after date. The remaining 10 notes represented the annual interest.

Libby agreed to meet the notes as they respectively matured, pay the taxes on the land for 1880 and subsequent years, and, during that year, (the weather permitting,) break 200 acres, and build on the land a frame barn of 16 feet by 20, and a frame dwelling-house of a story and a half. Cheney undertook to pay the taxes of 1879 and previous years, and bound himself to convey the land, in fee-simple, with the ordinary covenants of warranty, (reserving the right of way that might be demanded for public use for railways and common roads,) upon the payment by Libby of the several sums of money aforesaid at the times limited, and the strict performance of all and singular the conditions of the contract.

It was further stipulated between the parties that "time and punctuality are material and essential ingredients in this contract."

That if Libby failed to perform and complete all and each of the payments, agreements, and stipulations in the agreement mentioned, "strictly and literally," the contract should become void; in which event all the interests created by the contract in favor of Libby, or derived from him, should immediately cease and determine, and revert to and revest in Cheney, without any declaration of forfeiture or re-entry, and without any right in Libby of reclamation or compensation for moneys paid or services performed.

That, in case the contract was forfeited, Cheney could take immediate possession of the land, with all the crops, improvements, fixtures, privileges, and appurtenances thereon or appertaining thereto; Libby to remain bound for all taxes then assessed against the premises, and all installments of principal or interest then due on the contract to be regarded as rent.

That whenever one-half of the purchase price was paid, with all accrued interest and taxes, Cheney should execute a deed, as provided for in the contract, and take notes and a mortgage for the remaining payments, to run the unexpired time.

That when Libby's right to purchase the land terminated by reason of non-performance of his covenants, or his failure to make the payments, or any of them, at the time specified, he should be deemed to have only the rights of a tenant, and to hold the land under the contract as a lease, subject to the statute regulating the relation of landlord and tenant; with the right in Cheney to enforce the provisions of the contract, and recover possession of the land, with all the fixtures, privileges, crops, and appurtenances thereon, as if the same was held by forcible detainer.

The agreement also contained these stringent provisions: That no court should relieve Libby from a failure to comply strictly and literally with the contract; that no modification or change of the contract could be made, except by entry thereon in writing signed by both parties; and that no oversight or omission to take notice of any default by Libby should be deemed a waiver by Cheney of the right to do so at any time.

Libby went into possession under the contract. He, and those in possession under him, had, prior to the commencement of this suit on the 26th of February, 1887, broken up and cultivated most of the land, and made improvements thereon of a permanent and substantial character. Nearly all of these improvements were made prior to the 1st of January, 1885. He met all the obligations imposed upon him with respect to the breaking up of the land and its improvement by the erection thereon of buildings. His evidence, which is uncontradicted, was: "We have broken up and cultivated about 1,200 acres; built five houses and stable and outbuildings to each house; made wells to each house; erected two wind-mills; fenced one whole section with wire and posts, and fenced half of other section with hedge; we have set out some fruit-trees and shrubbery,—all to the value of about ten thousand dollars. All was done under and in pursuance of this contract."

He also met promptly all the notes given for principal and interest maturing prior to 1885. The total amount paid by him prior to that date, including $1,600 paid at the execution of the contract, was in excess of $5,000.

But the defendant insists that there was such default upon the part of the plaintiff, with respect to the notes maturing May 28, 1885, as worked a forfeiture of the contract, and, consequently, that specific performance cannot be decreed. The precise grounds upon which this contention rests, as well as those upon which the plaintiff relies in support of his claim for relief, cannot be clearly understood without a careful scrutiny of all that passed between the parties in reference to the lands in question.

The plaintiff resided in Iowa, while the defendant resided at Jerseyville, Ill. The notes given by the former were upon blanks furnished by the latter's agent, who caused them to be made payable in Tecumseh, Neb., at the private bank of Russell & Holmes, through whom the defendant had, for many years prior to 1880, made collections, and with whom he had kept an account. The first payment under the contract was made in bank drafts delivered to the defendant's agent in Tecumseh. All the other notes falling due in 1880 to 1884, inclusive, (except the interest note maturing in 1882,) were paid by bank drafts sent to Russell & Holmes, who placed the proceeds to the credit of Cheney in their bank. The checks of the latter upon that bank, on account of those deposits, were always paid in current funds. The draft to pay the interest note for 1882 was also sent to Russell & Holmes, but, as Cheney had not transmitted that note to them, the draft was forwarded to him. He received it, and sent the note to Libby. In no single instance prior to 1885 did he make objection to the particular mode in which Libby provided for the payment of his notes, or intimate his purpose to demand coin or legal-tender notes in payment. In every instance, except as to the interest note for 1882, the notes were paid at the banking-house of Russell & Holmes, and by drafts sent to and used by them for that purpose.

But it is quite apparent from the evidence that Cheney, in 1885, indulged the hope that he could bring about a forfeiture of the contract for non-compliance upon the part of Libby with its provisions, and that he would, in that or some other way, get the land back. It is proper to advert to the circumstances justifying that conclusion.

On the 4th of March, 1885,—all previous installments having been punctually met,—Libby offered, in writing, to pay all the principal notes mentioned in the contract, as well as the interest note due May 28, 1885, if a deed was made to him. To this offer Cheney replied, under date of March 19, 1885: "Your letter of the 4th has just reached me. I have no papers with me, and cannot attend to the matter as you request. I expect to go to New Orleans to the Exposition, and to be at home in time to see to it properly. If I am behind time, no harm will come to you." Libby wrote again, under date of May 20, 1885, renewing the offer contained in his letter of March 4th. Under date of May 23, 1885,—only five days before the notes for 1885 matured,—Cheney replied: "Yours of 20th is received. I think it probable that I can do as you suggest, but I will be in Beatrice [the county-seat of Gage county, where the lands are] between the 1st and 10th of June on other business, and will then make inquiries, and see if I can lend the money to good hands, and will then let you know more certainly."

On the 26th of May, 1885, Libby sent to Russell & Holmes a draft upon the First National Bank of Omaha, Neb., made by one Stuart, a private banker doing business at Madison, in the same state, for $1,251.20, which was the amount of Libby's two notes for principal and interest that matured May 28, 1885. It was sent in payment of those notes, and was received for that purpose by Russell & Holmes. They accepted it for the amount of money named in it, and were therefore ready to take up Libby's two notes when presented for payment at their office.

On the 28th of May, 1885, A. W. Cross, of the First National Bank of Jerseyville, Ill.,—where Cheney resided,—appeared at the banking-house of Russell & Holmes, and made a deposit of $5,000, all in current funds, and a good portion of it in bills of his own bank. While there he inquired of Russell & Holmes (without disclosing the reason for his inquiry) whether they kept "a legal-tender revenue, [reserve,] as national banks were required to do." He was told that they did not, but that a supply of legal tender was on hand. About 2 o'clock of the 1st of June—which, as May 31st fell on Sunday, was the last day of grace for Libby's two notes due in 1885, (Comp. St. Neb. c. 41, § 8)—one of Cheney's attorneys went into the bank of Russell & Holmes, and asked if he could begin $5,000 in legal-tender notes in exchange for other currency. His request was complied with. At a later hour of the same day Cheney appeared in the bank, without having responded to Libby's offer, twice made, to pay all the notes for the principal debt, and the interest note maturing in 1885. He came there with checks, drawn by Cross, to be cashed, and asked, as an accommodation to him, that they be paid in legal-tender notes. He was promptly accommodated to the extent of $2,500. But, when he asked for $2,500 more in legal-tender notes, Holmes suspected there was a scheme to exhaust his bank of legal-tender notes, and refused to comply with this request. After Russell & Holmes had thus, by way of accommodation, paid to Cheney and his attorney $7,500 in legal-tender notes,—but not until the hour for closing the bank, on that day, against the public had passed,—Libby's two notes were presented by Cheney, and payment thereof demanded in coin or legal-tender notes. The bank offered to pay in current funds, as they had previously done in respect to Libby's notes, but Cheney declined to take in payment anything except coin or legal-tender notes. The notes were then placed by him in the hands of a notary, who was conveniently present, and the latter presented them for payment, announcing that he would not receive anything except United States notes or legal-tender funds. Payment in such funds was refused by the bank, and the usual protest was made. The notary and Cheney then left the room, the latter saying, before leaving, that "he would call in the morning." But he did not call the next or upon any subsequent day.

Within 15 or 20 minutes after Cheney and his notary left the bank, Holmes, of the firm of Russell & Holmes, went to the office of the notary to find Cheney and pay the notes in the funds demanded. But Cheney was not there, and the notes were in his hands. Inquiry was made at the principal hotel and at other places, but he could not be found. Holmes was informed that he had left town.

Libby having been notified of the protest of the notes, notwithstanding he had, in due time, sent a bank draft to Russell & Holmes to be used in paying them, directed Stuart, the banker at Madison, Neb., to go immediately to Tecumseh. The latter arrived there on the 9th of June, and, having learned what passed between Cheney and Russell & Holmes, determined to pay off the notes in such funds as Cheney demanded. He informed the notary, who had protested the notes for non-payment, that he was then ready, in behalf of Libby, to pay them in gold. The latter did not have the notes, did not know where Cheney had gone, and said that the latter "did not want the money, but that he wanted the land back."

Stuart having knowledge of Cheney's letter, in which he notified Libby of his purpose to visit Beatrice between the 1st and 10th of June, went to that place in search of Cheney, but could not find him.

Libby wrote to Cheney, under date of June 12, 1885, informing him that gold was deposited at Russell & Holmes' office to pay the two notes due May 28, 1885. This letter was received by Cheney in due course of mail. On the 20th of June, 1885, the latter inclosed to Libby twelve unpaid notes, (including the two due May 28, 1885,) saying that the contract of May 28, 1880, was "terminated and ended by your failure to pay the two notes due May 28, 1885, and otherwise to comply with the contract, which is now null and void." How Libby had "otherwise" failed to meet his obligations under the contract does not appear. Under date of June 23, 1885, Russell & Holmes advised Cheney by letter of the fact that they were authorized by Libby to pay, and they were ready to pay, the notes due May 28th, including protest fees, in legal-tender notes or coin. Libby, under date of June 25, 1885, replied to Cheney's letter, saying: "I refuse to accept said notes, excepting the two which were paid, and have this day sent them to your bankers, Messrs. Russell & Holmes, of Tecumseh, Neb., for your use and benefit, and subject to your order. I shall make payments as fast as they become due, and shall require you to execute a conveyance of the land in accordance with the terms of the contract. It will be useless for you to send me any of these notes, except you send them for payment." Under date of June 29, 1885, Russell & Holmes advised Cheney that they had received from Libby his notes, amounting to $6,679.20, subject to his (Cheney's) order. The latter wrote July 9, 1885, in reply to Libby's letter of June 25th, that he did not recognize the notes placed with Russell & Holmes as being subject to his order.

On the 20th of August, 1885, Libby, by his attorney, made a tender to Russell & Holmes of $120 in gold coin as a balance of one-half of the purchase money, and offered to surrender the contract and execute a mortgage and notes for the balance of the purchase money, as stipulated in the contract, and demanded a deed; of all which Cheney was notified. The latter replied, under date of August 22, 1885, that he would not receive any money from Libby, and refused to make a deed.

It further appears that the plaintiff punctually paid into the bank of Russell & Holmes the amounts of the notes due in 1886 and 1887. The funds remained in that bank and are now there, subject to Cheney's order, on presenting the notes. Of these payments he was promptly informed.

Shortly before the commencement of this suit Libby again offered to Cheney to pay in cash all the unpaid portion of the principal debt named in the contract, and all interest due at that date. He also renewed his offer to execute a mortgage on the land to secure all unpaid installments not due, and demanded a deed. But those offers being declined, the present suit was brought.

A. A. Goodrich, for appellant. S. P. Davidson, for appellee.

Mr. Justice HARLAN, after stating the facts in the foregoing language, delivered the opinion of the court.

The peculiar wording of the written contract renders it somewhat doubtful whether there was a sale of the lands to the appellee to be made complete by a conveyance of the legal title or defeated altogether, according to his performance or failure to perform the conditions upon which he was to receive a deed; or whether he was simply given possession, paying a fixed amount, annually, for use and occupancy, with the privilege of purchasing, and with the right to demand a conveyance in fee-simple, upon the performance of those conditions. Taking the whole contract together, we incline to adopt the former as the true interpretation. Such was the view taken by the supreme court of Nebraska of a similar contract as to land between Cheney and one Robinson. Robinson v. Cheney, 17 Neb. 673, 679, 24 N. W. Rep. 378. But it is not necessary to express any decided opinion upon this question; for, in any view, it is clear from the contract, not only that appellant could retain the legal title until the appellee's obligations under it had all been performed, but that he could resume possession immediately upon the failure of the appellee to meet, punctually, any of the conditions to be performed by him. Time may be made of the essence of the contract "by the express stipulations of the parties, or it may arise by implication from the very nature of the property, or the avowed objects of the seller or the purchaser." Taylor v. Longworth, 14 Pet. 172, 174; Secombe v. Steele, 20 How. 94, 104; Holgate v. Eaton, 116 U. S. 33, 40, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Brown v. Trust Co., 128 U. S. 403, 414, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 127. The parties in this case, in words too distinct to leave room for construction, not only specify the time when each condition is to be performed, but declare that "time and punctuality are material and essential ingredients" in the contract, and that it must be "strictly and literally" executed. However harsh or exacting its terms may be, as to the appellee, they do not contravene public policy; and therefore a refusal of the court to give effect to them, according to the real intention of the parties, is to make a contract for them which they have not chosen to make for themselves. 1 Sugd. Vend. (8th Amer. Ed.) 410, (268;) Barnard v. Lee, 97 Mass. 92, 94; Hipwell v. Knight, 1 Younge & C. 401, 415. These observations are made because counsel for the appellant insists, with some confidence, that an affirmance of the decree below will necessarily be a departure from the general principles just stated.

But there are other principles, founded in justice, that must control the decision of the present case. Even where time is made material, by express stipulation, the failure of one of the parties to perform a condition within the particular time limited will not in every case defeat his right to specific performance, if the condition be subsequently performed, without unreasonable delay, and no circumstances have intervened that would render it unjust or inequitable to give such relief. The discretion which a court of equity has to grant or refuse specific performance, and which is always exercised with reference to the circumstances of the particular case before it, (Hennessey v. Woolworth, 128 U. S. 438, 442, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 109,) may and of necessity must often be controlled by the conduct of the party who bases his refusal to perform the contract upon the failure of the other party to strictly comply with its conditions. Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 265, 279; Levy v. Lindo, 3 Mer. 81, 84; Hudson v. Bartram, 3 Madd. 440, 447; Lilley v. Fifty Associates, 101 Mass. 432, 435; Potter v. Tuttle, 22 Conn. 512, 519. See, also, Ahl v. Johnson, 20 How. 511, 518.

To this class belongs, in our judgment, the case before us. Although the contract between Cheney and Libby called for payment in dollars, the latter might well have supposed, unless distinctly informed to the contrary, that the former would be willing to receive current funds; that is, such as are ordinarily received by men of business or by banks; and such funds were received in payment of all of Libby's notes falling due in 1880 to 1884, inclusive. While this course of business was not an absolute waiver by Cheney of his right to demand coin or legal-tender paper in payment of notes subsequently falling due, such conduct, during a period of several years, was calculated to produce the impression upon Libby's mind that current or bankable funds would be received in payment of any of his notes; and therefore, upon every principle of fair dealing, Cheney was bound to give reasonable notice of his purpose, after 1884, to accept only such funds as under the contract, strictly interpreted, he was entitled to demand. No such notice was given. On the contrary, the just inference from the testimony is that Cheney designed to throw Libby off his guard, and render it impossible for the latter, or for the bankers to whom he sent drafts to be used in paying his notes, to supply the requisite amount of coin or legal-tender paper on the very day the notes matured, and at the moment of their presentation for payment. The efforts of Russell & Holmes, within a few moments after Cheney left their bank on the 1st of June to find him, and to pay off the notes in legal-tender paper, and the efforts of Libby, by his agent, as soon as he was informed of Cheney's demand for payment in coin or legal-tender paper, to reach him, and to pay off the notes maturing in 1885, in lawful money, and his repeated offers, subsequently, to pay them in such money, showed the utmost diligence, and sufficiently excuse his failure to pay in coin or legal-tender paper on the very day his notes matured. To permit Cheney, under the circumstances disclosed, to enforce a forfeiture of the contract, would enable him to take advantage of his own wrong, and to reap the fruits of a scheme formed for the very purpose of bringing about the non-performance of the contract.

But it is contended that the provision in the contract forbidding its modification or change, "except by entry thereon in writing signed by both parties," coupled with the provision that no court should relieve Libby from a failure to comply strictly and literally with the contract, stands in the way of a decree for specific performance. It is sufficient, upon this point, to say that such provisions—if they could in any case fetter the power of the court to do justice according to the settled principles of law—cannot be applied where the efficient cause of the failure of the party seeking specific performance to comply strictly and literally with the contract was the conduct of the other party. If the defendant had agreed, in writing, signed by himself alone, to accept current funds, and not to demand coin or legal-tender notes, and, notwithstanding such agreement, he had demanded coin or legal-tender notes, under circumstances rendering it impossible for the plaintiff to meet the demand on the day limited by the contract, would he be permitted to say that the contract was forfeited for the failure to make payment according to its provisions? We suppose not, although, according to his argument, such an agreement, not having been signed by both parties and indorsed on the contract, would not estop him from insisting upon a strict and literal compliance with its terms.

It results from what has been said that the failure of the plaintiff, Libby, in person or by agent, to pay the notes maturing in 1885 in coin or legal-tender paper, at the time they were presented by Cheney for payment at the banking-house of Russell & Holmes, did not work a forfeiture of the contract, and does not stand in the way of a decree for specific performance.

In respect to the notes falling due in 1886 and 1887, the evidence satisfactorily shows that the plaintiff, at the times and place appointed for their payment, offered, and was then and there ready, to pay them in lawful money, but, the notes not being on either occasion in the hands of Russell & Holmes for collection, he could not make actual payment, but left the money at their bank to be paid over to Cheney whenever the notes were presented at that place. The notes due in those years were, it is true, in the manual possession of Russell & Holmes, but they were not in their custody by direction of Cheney, for collection or for any other purpose. Libby did all that he could do with respect to the notes falling due in those years in order to comply "strictly and literally" with the contract. Indeed, after the surrender by Cheney in 1885 of the notes due in that and subsequent years, and his formal notification to Libby that he regarded the contract as forfeited and would not receive any money from him, Libby was not bound, as a condition of his right to claim specific performance, to go through the useless ceremony of tendering payment at the banking-house of Russell & Holmes of the notes maturing in 1886 and 1887. Brock v. Hidy, 13 Ohio St. 306; Deichmann v. Deichmann, 49 Mo. 107, 109; Crary v. Smith, 2 N. Y. 60. In Hunter v. Daniel, 4 Hare, 420, 433, it was said: "The only remaining point insisted upon was that the making of every payment was a condition precedent to the right of the plaintiff to call for the execution of the agreement, or, in fact, to call for the benefit of it; and it was argued that the bill could not properly be filed before the plaintiff had, out of court, fully performed his agreement. The general rule in equity certainly is not of that strict character. A party filing a bill submits to do everything that is required of him; and the practice of the court is not to require the party to make a formal tender where, as in this case, from the facts stated in the bill, or from the evidence, it appears that the tender would have been a mere form, and that the party to whom it was made would have refused to accept the money." Whether that be a sound view or not with reference to the particular contract here in question, Libby did, in fact, make a proper tender of payment as to these notes. Before the bringing of this suit he had paid, and offered to pay, more than one-half of the price for the land and all accrued interest and taxes, and therefore was entitled by the terms of the contract to a deed, he executing notes and a mortgage for the remaining payments to run the unexpired time, as stipulated in the agreement.

The court below found that the notes falling due in 1885, 1886, and 1887 were paid; that the plaintiff had deposited with the clerk for the defendant a mortgage on the land to secure the payments due 8, 9, and 10 years after the date of the contract; and that he had fully done and performed every obligation imposed upon him to entitle him to a deed. It was adjudged that the defendant, within 40 days from the decree, execute, acknowledge, and deliver to the plaintiff a good and sufficient deed, with the usual covenants of warranty, (excepting the right of way that may be demanded for public use for railways or common roads,) conveying to him the land in question, and in default of which it was adjudged that the decree itself should operate, and have the same force and effect, as a deed of the above description.

We are not able to concur in the finding that the notes falling due in 1885, 1886, and 1887 had been paid when this decree was passed. If those notes had been placed by Cheney with Russell & Holmes for collection, and the latter had collected the amounts due on them, then they would have been paid; for, in such case, that firm would have been the agent of the payee to collect the notes, and the money received by them would have belonged to him.

In Ward v. Smith, 7 Wall. 447, 450, the question arose as to whether a bank at which certain bonds were made payable was the agent of the holder to receive payment. The court said: "It is undoubtedly true that the designation of the place of payment in the bonds imported a stipulation that their holder should have them at the bank, when due, to receive payment, and that the obligors would produce there the funds to pay them. It was inserted for the mutual convenience of the parties. And it is the general usage in such cases for the holder of the instrument to lodge it with the bank for collection, and the party bound for its payment can call there and take it up. If the instrument be not there lodged, and the obligor is there at its maturity with the necessary funds to pay it, he so far satisfies the contract that he cannot be made responsible for any future damages, either as costs of suit or interest, for delay. When the instrument is lodged with the bank for collection, the bank becomes the agent of the payee or obligee to receive payment. The agency extends no further, and without special authority an agent can only receive payment of the debt due his principal in the legal currency of the country, or in bills which pass as money at their par value by the common consent of the community. In the case at bar only one bond was deposited with the Farmers' Bank. That institution, therefore, was only agent of the payee for its collection. It had no authority to receive payment of the other bonds for him or on his account. Whatever it may have received from the obligors to be applied on the other bonds, it received as their agent, not as the agent of the obligee. If the notes have depreciated since in its possession, the loss must be adjusted between the bank and the depositors; it cannot fall upon the holder of the bonds." See, also, Adams v. Commission, 44 N. J. Law, 638, where this question is elaborately examined; Hills v. Place, 48 N. Y. 520; Gas Co. v. Pinkerton, 95 Pa. St. 62, 64; Wood v. Saving Co., 41 Ill. 267.

Russell & Holmes, then, did not become the agent of Cheney to receive the amount of the notes, by reason simply of the fact that the notes were made payable at their bank. The funds left by Libby with them to be applied in payment of the notes of 1885, 1886, and 1887 are therefore his property, not the property of Cheney. The utmost effect of Libby's offer, within a reasonable time after June 1, 1885, to pay the note of that year in lawful money, and of his offers, at the appointed times and place, to pay the notes of 1886 and 1887, was to prevent the forfeiture of the contract, and to save his right to have it specifically performed, so far as that right depended upon his paying those notes. But they must be actually paid by him before he is entitled to a deed, or to a decree that will have the force and effect of a conveyance. Under the circumstances it was not absolutely necessary that he should have brought the money into court for the defendant at the time he filed his bill. His offer in the bill to perform all the conditions and stipulations of the contract was sufficient to give him a standing in court. Irvin v. Gregory, 13 Gray, 215, 218; Hunter v. Bales, 24 Ind. 299, 303; Fall v. Hazelrigg, 45 Ind. 576, 579. But the decree of specific performance ought not to become operative until he brings into court for the defendant the full amount necessary to pay off the notes for principal and interest falling due in 1885, 1886, and 1887. Caldwell v. Cassidy, 8 Cow. 271; Haxton v. Bishop, 3 Wend. 13, 21; Hills v. Place, supra; Wood v. Saving Co., supra; Webster v. French, 11 Ill. 254, 278; Carley v. Vance, 17 Mass. 389, 391; Doyle v. Teas, 4

Scam. 202, 261, 267; McDanel v. Kimbrell, 3 G. Greene, 335. The defendant is not entitled to interest after the respective tenders were made, because it does not appear that the plaintiff has, since the tenders, realized any interest upon the moneys left by him for Cheney at the bank of Russell & Holmes. Davis v. Parker, 14 Allen, 94, 104; January v. Martin, 1 Bibb, 586, 590; Hart v. Brand, 1 A. K. Marsh. 159, 161; 2 Sug. Vend. (8th Amer. Ed.) 314, 315, (627, 628.)

The decree below is affirmed. But it is adjudged and ordered that the said decree be and is hereby suspended, and shall not become operative until the plaintiff brings into the court below for the defendant the full amount of the notes for principal and interest executed by him to the defendant, and made payable on the 28th days of May, 1885, 1886, and 1887, without interest upon any note after its maturity.

CHICAGO, M. & ST. P. RY. CO. v. DURANT et al. SAME v. HOSPES. SAME v. STAPLES. SAME v. UNION DEPOT ST. RY. & T. CO.

Supreme Court of Minnesota. Oct. 7, 1890.

Appeal from district court, Washington county; McCLUER, Judge.

W. H. Norris, for appellant. Fayette Marsh, for E. W. Durant and others. J. N. & I. W. Castle, for E. L. Hospes and Isaac Staples. Searles & Gail, for Union Depot St. Ry. & T. Co.

VANDEBURGH, J. The demurrers to the complaint interposed in behalf of defendants Durant, Hospes, Hersey, Staples, the Union Depot Company, and O'Gorman, receiver, were sustained by the trial court, and the complaint held sufficient as to the other defendants. From the order sustaining the demurrer the plaintiff appeals, and the principal question presented for our determination is whether the complaint states a cause of action in respect to the defendants above named. Generally, in equitable actions of this kind, the merits can be best determined upon proofs after answer; but we will examine and consider such questions as are fairly before us on this appeal.

1. If the action were brought solely against the defendants who executed the contract for the right of way, whom, for convenience, we will style "obligors," though equitable relief is demanded, a recovery might be had for damages, and treating it as an action for damages, the defendants would, if they required it, be entitled to a jury trial. Davison v. Associates, 71 N. Y. 334. But certain lots, through which the right of way was bargained for, are alleged to have been conveyed to certain other defendants, who are joined in the action, and who are not parties to the agreement, and against whom equitable relief, by way of specific performance, is sought. The two causes of action—one for damages and one for the special relief—cannot properly be united, and this is one ground of the demurrer. The action, then, must be treated as an equitable one for specific performance, with incidental relief, by way of compensation for such portion of the property in question as cannot be reached; and the sufficiency of the complaint must be determined solely in respect to the right of the plaintiff to such relief.

2. It is charged in the complaint that, in order to induce the plaintiff to construct a line of its railroad from a point on its River Division from Hastings to the city of Stillwater, the defendants Staples, Durant, Hospes, Hersey, and Sabin, with one Torinus, since deceased, on the 15th day of July, 1881, agreed in writing with this plaintiff that the city of Stillwater would and should give this plaintiff a right of way, 56 feet wide, through certain real property, as described in the complaint; and that on its part the plaintiff, in and by the same agreement, in consideration of the premises, undertook and agreed, among other things, that it would at once begin the construction of such branch line, and continue the same with all practical dispatch until the completion thereof; and that it did in all things well and truly fulfill and perform such agreement on its part. There is no doubt as to the sufficiency of the consideration to uphold the undertaking of the defendants, or that the parties are mutually bound, subject to the conditions of the contract. Railroad Corp. v. Babcock, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 346.

3. In respect to the defendants in whose favor the demurrer was sustained, it is not claimed that any of them now own or are interested in the property in question here, except the Union Depot Company, and O'Gorman, receiver. The last named are not parties to the agreement, but are properly joined as having some interest in the property. But the decree of the court for specific performance of the contract could only be made operative against them, or any other persons than the original obligors, in so far as they have acquired from the latter portions of the right of way contracted for with notice. As to such lands, such parties would stand in their shoes, and be bound; but as to the lots acquired by the Union Depot Company of other parties, by purchase or condemnation, the contract is entirely nugatory, and in respect to the several tracts of land designated in the complaint as having been so acquired by the Union Depot Company, it could not be bound in this action. From the terms of the contract providing that the city would give a right of way, and the specification of the ownership of the several lots set forth in the complaint, it will not be implied that the defendants at any time owned or had title to any of them, save as therein set forth. From the complaint it appears that the Union Depot Company acquired title to the north 49 feet of lot 2, in block 28, from Helen M. Torinus and Louis E. Torinus, her husband. What the latter's interest was, does not appear. The defendant Sabin, one of the signers of the agreement in question, acquired, by purchase from Torinus, an undivided half of the south 35 feet, in width, of lot 7, and of the north 56 feet of lot 8, September 16, 1881. Sabin also purchased of defendant Durant and another, September, 1881, the north 15 feet in width of lot 7, and the undivided half of the south 35 feet in width thereof, and the undivided half of the north 56 feet in width of lot 8; and at the same time purchased of Torinus the other undivided half of south 35 feet of lot 7, and north 56 feet of lot 8. Sabin also purchased lot 5, and a portion of lots 5, 7, and 8, described in the complaint, was conveyed by him to the Union Depot Company, and is included in the right of way, 56 feet in width, described in the agreement. It is also alleged that the title in fee to the south 30 feet in width of lot 8 to lot 9, and the north 75 feet in width of lot 10, block 28, appear to be in the city of Stillwater, since 1875, as and for a part of Nelson street, and as part and parcel of the "Levee," so called. It further appears that the depot company have acquired divers other parcels of the same block from other persons, not parties to the contract, and have also granted to the plaintiff a certain portion of the lots 2, 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, in block 28, lying within such 56-foot strip, or right of way. The defendant Sabin is the only one of the signers of the contract who appears to have title to any of the land in question, in block 28, and his interest is confined to that part of lots 5, 7, and 8, above described, and not already conveyed to the depot company. The only land in block 28, within the right of way, which, in case specific conveyance were decreed under the contract, would be subject to be so conveyed, is the land held by Sabin, and so much of the land of the depot company within the right of way not already conveyed to the plaintiff by it as it derived from Sabin, as above stated. As before intimated, land procured by the depot company from strangers to the contract would not be affected by it. As to block 27, the obligors, by the same contract, further agreed to purchase so much of block 27 as lay east of the alley, and to grant such right of way, as aforesaid, through the same to the plaintiff. As respects the lots in this half block, through which the right of way in question was in fact located, it appears that on September 15, 1881, the Union Depot Company, defendant, acquired title from Isaac Staples to one-half of lot 1, and lots 3, 4, and 5; and March 1, 1882, from defendant Hersey and others, to the other half of lot 1; and March 23, 1882, to lot 2, from Seymour, Sabin & Co., of which firm defendant Sabin was a member. It does not appear, however, what interest Hersey and Sabin had in the lots conveyed.

4. The city has not furnished the right of way, as agreed, and the defendants have not caused it to be done, or procured it themselves, through either block. The question now arises whether, upon the facts herein stated, a case is made for the interposition of a court of equity so as to warrant a decree for specific performance as to the defendants Union Depot Company and Sabin, and to award a judgment for damages against other defendants, by way of compensation for the deficiency. The court will not undertake to compel the defendants, jointly or severally, to purchase the specific property, or to procure the right of way from the city. And it is not a case for compensation, because, conceding that the court might compel the depot company and Sabin to convey a partial interest representing a relative or proportionate share of individual obligors, as above described, the same would be relatively so small, as compared with the whole amount embraced in the contract, that the compensation or damages would apparently be the main object of the suit. In such cases a court of equity will not assess damages as compensation, but only where they are incidental to the principal ground of relief, and the court will leave the party to his action at law, unless he will consent to accept the part subject to conveyance without damages. Earl of Durham v. Legard, 34 Law J. Ch. 590. In some cases, however, where the vendor shows title to a portion only of the land contracted, or has wrongfully parted with part, justice may be done by an apportionment of the consideration, if the vendee consent to take part with an abatement of the price. 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. (4th Ed.) pt. 2, p. 1146. So, where the vendee knows at the time of entering into the contract (as may be implied in this case from the terms of the contract) that the vendor has title to a part only of the land, compensation will be denied. Wat. Spec. Perf. § 506; 5 Wait, Act. & Def. 781. This is not a case between vendor and vendee. By the contract the right of way was to be procured by or from others by gift or purchase. The plaintiff did not contract for a conveyance from the defendants. It did not rely upon the individual ownership of the obligors. The city was to give the right of way; and, as to block 27, the defendants were to purchase the entire half block jointly, and jointly bear the burden. It was not fairly within the contemplation of the parties that the interests which the individual obligors might have in some of the land embraced in the proposed right of way should be made subject to enforced conveyance under the contract, if unfulfilled in its scope and purpose by the obligors, who jointly entered into it. Equity, it is true, looks at the substance of the contract, and, when the agreement can be substantially, though not literally, carried out, without changing the nature of the contract, or substituting a new one, and do justice between the parties, it will be so enforced. The doctrine of compensation rests upon this principle. And so where land is held as tenants in common by several persons, who have jointly agreed to convey the same, some of whom are not bound, or are deceased, those who are liable, or who survive, may be compelled, in a suit on the contract, to convey their individual or proportionate interests as tenants in common. Hooker v. Pyncheon, 8 Gray, 550. But such is not this case. The contract did not contemplate a conveyance of individual interests, but the acquisition of the right of way by the public, and by the joint act or purchase by the obligors; and, as to block 27, an essential condition and inducement to the parties was the purchase of the half block, and not the right of way merely. In any view of the case, and apart from the question of laches, considering the nature of the contract, the state of the title, the indefiniteness and uncertainty in the description set forth in the contract, we think that the parties should be left to their action at law, and the interposition of a court of equity is not warranted. Order affirmed.

HAFFEY v. LYNCH.

Court of Appeals of New York. Oct. 9, 1894.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, first department.

Action by Michael H. Haffey against Sarah Lynch for specific performance of a contract for the sale of land. From a judgment of the general term (23 N. Y. Supp. 59) affirming a judgment dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

EARL, J. At an auction sale of the defendant's real estate the plaintiff purchased a parcel of land described in the complaint at the price of $7,800, and paid 10 per cent. of the purchase price, besides certain fees and expenses. The parties signed a written contract specifying the terms of sale, and the time and place of full performance by the parties. By the written contract the defendant was to convey the land "by the usual deed containing full covenants with warranty." The defendant did not tender to the plaintiff such a deed as he claimed he was entitled to, and then he commenced this action against her to compel the specific performance of the contract. Until the trial of the action it appeared that she had at the time of the sale such a title to the land as she was bound to give. But subsequently one Nathaniel Jarvis, Jr., claiming the land in fee, brought an action of ejectment against her to recover the land, and filed a lis pendens. The plaintiff knew of this claim and the lis pendens when he commenced this action; and solely on account of the existence of the lis pendens, and such knowledge thereof, the court refused specific performance, and dismissed the complaint. We think the learned court fell into error, and that, upon the undisputed facts found, it should have given to the plaintiff judgment for specific performance.

We must first notice the issue joined by the pleadings. The plaintiff alleged in his complaint the contract; that he had performed the same, and was ready and willing to perform the same upon receiving such a conveyance as he was entitled to; that after several postponements of time for the performance of the contract, at the request of the defendant, her attorney tendered to him a deed of the land, at the same time saying to him that she could not give him a valid and marketable title to the land, because it was incumbered; that he rejected the deed on the ground of the alleged incumbrance upon the land, at the same time notifying her that he was ready and willing to perform on his part if she would give him such a deed as he was entitled to; that she refused to give him such a deed; that the title to the land was incumbered and rendered unmarketable by the lis pendens filed in the ejectment action; that the defendant could at all times have obtained the cancellation and discharge of the lis pendens, and could have conveyed to him such a title as the contract entitled him to. She, in her answer, admitted the making of the contract; denied that he had performed, or was ready and willing to perform, the contract, on his part; admitted the commencement of the ejectment suit, and the filing of the lis pendens; alleged that she had tendered to him such a deed as she was bound to give; denied that she was at any time unable or unwilling to convey the land; and alleged that she could at all times since the execution of the contract have conveyed the title of the land to him according to the contract, had she been so disposed, and that she has at all times been ready and willing so to do. It thus appears that the issue between the parties was as to the performance of the contract, the plaintiff alleging that he had performed, and was ready and willing to perform, and the defendant alleging that she had performed, and was ready, willing and able to perform, on her part. On the trial the plaintiff was the sole witness sworn, and the trial judge, after finding the ownership of the land by the defendant, and the making of the contract, found as follows: "That the plaintiff has in all things performed all the terms and conditions of said contract, and has been, on his part, ready and willing to fulfill the same, and accept a conveyance of the fee of the said property." "That the said defendant, through her attorneys, has, prior to the commencement of this action, refused to make said conveyance under the said agreement, notwithstanding the plaintiff's frequent requests therefor." "That such refusal on the part of the defendant to make such conveyance was due to the fact that one Nathaniel Jarvis, Jr., had, after said sale, but before the day fixed for the delivery of the deed thereunder, commenced an action in ejectment in this court against said defendant, claiming the ownership of the premises in question, and had filed a notice of the pendency of said action in the office of the clerk of the city and county of New York, on March 6, 1889." "That thereafter, and before the trial of this action, the said ejectment suit was brought to trial, and the complaint therein was dismissed, and from the judgment entered on which dismissal an appeal was taken to the general term of this court, which court affirmed said judgment; and no appeal from said order of the general term has been taken to the court of appeals, and the time to do so has now expired." "That the said plaintiff has expressed his consent at the trial of this action to accept from the defendant a conveyance of said land by the usual deed containing full covenants with warranty, subject to the reservations contained in the eighth paragraph of the said terms of sale." "That less than three years have passed since the rendering of judgment and the filing of the judgment roll in the said decision of Jarvis v. Lynch." And he found, as conclusions of law, "that the sale having been made in good faith, and the question as to the title of the said premises having arisen since the sale, the defendant should not be compelled to give a warranty deed, or procure a policy of title insurance of the Lawyers' Title Insurance Company, insuring the title to the said premises to the plaintiff;" "that the defendant is entitled to judgment dismissing the complaint upon the merits of the action;" "that such judgment should be without prejudice to the right of the plaintiff to bring an action for damages for breach of the contract set forth in complaint."

The plaintiff has been defeated in his action thus far on the ground that it was impossible for the defendant to perform her contract at the time of the commencement of the action, and that he knew it was. She did not set up such a defense in her answer, but, on the contrary, alleged that she was able and ready to perform her contract, and there was no proof showing that it was then impossible for her to perform the contract. There was no evidence showing what basis, if any, the claim of title to the land by Jarvis had. It may have been colorable, and not real or substantial. It did not appear that she had made any effort whatever to remove the incumbrance of the lis pendens. It was her duty to perform the contract, and to make all reasonable efforts to remove any obstacle which stood in the way of her performance. The plaintiff was not in fault for refusing to accept a deed which the defendant at the time declared would convey an incumbered title. He was entitled to a marketable title. Moore v. Williams, 115 N. Y. 586, 22 N. E. 233; Vought v. Williams, 120 N. Y. 257, 24 N. E. 195. It is a general rule in equity that the specific performance of a contract to convey real estate will not be granted when the vendor, in consequence of a defect in his title, is unable to perform. In such cases specific performance is denied because the court cannot enforce its judgment, and because, also, it would be oppressive to the vendor. But if the defect in the title existed at the date of the contract, or was due to some fault or to some act of the vendor subsequent to the contract, the court will generally entertain an action for specific performance, and retain jurisdiction for the purpose of awarding damages for the breach of the contract. But where, as in this case, the defect in the title arises after the making of the contract, without any fault of the vendor, and the vendee knew of the defect in the title when he commenced his action, the court will not retain the action for the purpose of awarding the damages. Wiswall v. McGowan, Hoff. Ch. 125; Morss v. Elmendorf, 11 Paige, 277. This rule was adopted because the vendee should not commence a fruitless action in equity simply to recover there his damages for a breach of contract. The rule has been modified since the Code practice, which authorizes the joinder of legal and equitable causes of action; and, while the equitable relief will be denied in such a case, now the action will be retained, and the issue as to the breach of contract and damages will be sent to a jury for trial. Sternberger v. McGovern, 56 N. Y. 12. But this rule was adopted in equity not solely because at the time of the commencement of the action the defects in the title existed, to the knowledge of the vendee, but also because the case was such that at the time of the rendition of the judgment the court could not grant the equitable relief. The rule and the ground upon which it is based have no application to a case where the defect has disappeared at the time of the trial, and the court can then give an effective judgment for the equitable relief demanded; and no case can be found, prior to this, where an equity court has denied specific performance because the vendor's title was defective at the commencement of the action, but valid and perfect at the time of the trial. In such a case, why should not the vendor perform? He is able to, and the vendee is entitled to performance unless some other defense has intervened, and the court is able to enforce performance. Here the plaintiff was willing to take such a title as the defendant could convey at the trial. The ejectment suit had finally resulted in favor of the defendant. The lis pendens had ceased to be operative, and could, if necessary, have been removed. The fact that Jarvis could have paid the costs and taken a new trial under the statute is of no importance. There was final judgment against him, and the contingency that he might take a new trial is of no more importance than the contingency that some other person might at some time commence an action to recover the same land. Equity courts, in awarding relief, generally look at the conditions existing at the close of the trial of the action, and adapt their relief to those conditions. The plaintiff in an equity action, as a general rule, should not be turned out of court on account of any defense interposed to his action, if at the time of the trial the facts are such that if he then commenced his action he would be entitled to the equitable relief sought. If a vendor has no title, or a defective title, to land which he contracts to sell, and subsequently obtains a perfect title, he can be compelled by his vendee to perform his contract. Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Ed.) 480. And why should the vendor not be compelled to perform if he perfects his title while the action for specific performance is pending? A perfect title by the vendor is no part of the vendee's cause of action, and he is just as much entitled to the equitable relief, and the equity court is just as competent to give it, whether the title of the vendor was perfected before or after the commencement of the action. It does not appear that anything occurred after the commencement of the action which should bar the relief asked by the plaintiff. There are no complications growing out of the lapse of time, and no material change in the situation of the parties, or of the land in controversy. We therefore see no reason to doubt, upon the facts found, that the plaintiff was entitled to specific performance of the contract; and the judgment should be reversed, and a new trial granted, costs to abide event.

Judgment reversed.

GOTTHELF v. STRANAHAN.

Court of Appeals of New York. June 6, 1893.

Appeal from city court of Brooklyn, general term.

Action by Charles Gotthelf against James S. T. Stranahan to compel specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands. From a judgment of the general term (19 N. Y. Supp. 161) affirming a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

George G. Dutcher, (Wm. C. De Witt, of counsel,) for appellant. George G. & F. Reynolds, for respondent.

ANDREWS, C. J. The original contract, made on the 7th day of January, 1891, was by its terms to be completed by a conveyance and payment of the unpaid purchase money on the 9th day of February in the same year. The vendee was to pay for the property the sum of $22,500, as follows: $2,000 on the execution of the contract, $4,750 on the execution of the deed, and the balance of $15,750 in five years, with interest, to be secured by mortgage on the land. The vendor was to convey the land by warranty deed in fee simple, free from all incumbrance. The vendee, on the execution of the contract, paid the sum of $2,000 as provided. If the contract had been performed on the 9th day of February, 1891, according to its terms, the question now presented would not have arisen. The assessments had not then been laid and, if the deed had been given on that day, they would have become a charge on the land subsequent to the conveyance, and the defendant would have been under no obligation, legal or equitable, to pay them. They would have attached as a charge upon the title acquired by the plaintiff. But by the mutual assent of the parties the completion of the contract was postponed from time to time, in all for a period of three months, until May 4, 1891. The first postponement, until February 16, 1891, was for the accommodation of the plaintiff; the others were for the accommodation of the defendant, to enable him to clear the land of squatters who had gone upon it without permission and erected shanties and hovels in which they lived, and between whom and the defendant, in some cases, an irregular sort of tenancy had grown up by the payment and receipt from time to time of small sums as rent. During this period of three months two assessments on the property for local improvements were laid and confirmed by the city of Brooklyn,—one on the 3d day of March, 1891, for $901.12, for the grading and paving of Bush street; and one on the 20th day of April, 1891, for $1,079.33, for the grading and paving of William street. This action is brought by the vendee against the vendor to compel a specific performance of the contract of sale. The defendant is ready and willing and has offered to convey the premises with covenant of warranty as of the 9th day of February, 1891, the day originally fixed for the execution of the deed. The plaintiff insists that the vendor is bound to warrant the title as against the assessments mentioned. This is the controversy in the case, and the point for determination is whether the plaintiff, upon equitable principles, is entitled to the relief he seeks, and to cast upon the defendant the burden of paying the assessments. He does not ask to be relieved from the contract. He elects to have a decree for performance upon such conditions as the court shall determine, in case it shall be held that upon principles of law or equity he is not entitled to demand a covenant by the defendant covering the lien created by the assessments.

The premises contracted to be sold consisted of a block and part of a block of land in one of the outlying wards of Brooklyn, which, when the contract was made, was partly covered by water, and was unfenced and commons. Bush street, adjoining the southerly side of the land, was a traveled road, and had been such for many years. It was graded to some extent, but had not been paved. It was an ordinary country road. One of the assessments was for the contemplated improvement of Bush street. William street, to which the other assessment related, was mostly under water. In view of the peculiar system of local improvements prevailing in Brooklyn, one question presented is whether the assessments in question constituted incumbrances on the land in May, 1891, when the defendant offered to convey, within the true meaning of the contract of sale. The charter of Brooklyn is unique in respect to its system of local improvements. The district of assessment is to be prescribed, and the estimated cost of contemplated local improvements is required to be assessed on the district benefited, and a warrant for the collection of the assessments issued, and at least one-third of the aggregate assessment must have been collected before any contract for making the improvement is authorized to be made; and the city may, even after the assessments have been collected, decline to make a contract, or to go on with the improvement, and may discontinue the proceedings, returning the money collected on the assessments. Laws 1888, c. 583, tit. 19, §§ 1-8, inclusive. In other cities, assessments for local improvements follow the performance of the work. In Brooklyn they precede the execution, and are collectible in advance. The contemplated improvements of Bush and William streets, for which the assessments in question were laid have not yet been made. There is no explanation of the delay. When the proceedings were initiated does not appear, and, referring to the charter provisions, there can be no inference that any step whatever had been taken when the contract of sale was executed, or prior to the 9th of February, 1891, when, by the original contract, the deed was to have been given. The parties entered into a contract for the sale of unimproved land. The consideration to be paid and received was presumably based on the value of the land in its existing condition. William street had no existence except on the city map, and Bush street was an ordinary road. Whether this condition would be changed at any time, and whether William street would be raised and made dry land, and Bush street be improved and brought to the condition of an ordinary city street, could not be known by the parties to the contract. If they anticipated that at some time the city would enter upon the improvement of this section of the city, they knew that any charge which might be imposed on the property embraced in the contract for the expense of such improvement would represent the benefit received by it from the improvement, as the theory of such assessment is that the value of the land would be enhanced by at least an equivalent amount. It is impossible to suppose that the parties contemplated when the contract was executed that incumbrances created by the force of public law for improvements initiated after the making of the contract and intermediate that date and the time fixed for the conveyance should be paid by the vendor. If the contract can have this construction, then the plaintiff is entitled to property not in the condition it was in when he contracted to purchase it, but an improved estate, improved at the expense of the vendor by the act of the city, which he could not control, initiated after the contract was made. This construction would compel the vendor to pay out of the purchase money the cost of an improvement which by so much has increased or will increase the value of the property, and the vendee would acquire property which he did not pay for.

The question as to the true meaning of the contract to convey free from all incumbrances is quite different from that which would be presented by an assessment made intermediate the date of the contract and the time fixed for the conveyance for a local improvement made before the contract was entered into. In that case the purchaser buys with the improvements made, and presumably pays a price fixed with reference to the land in its existing condition. The case of periodical taxes for the support of government, assessed and laid between the date of a contract and the time fixed for the conveyance, would constitute an incumbrance within the meaning of the covenant. The time of the imposition of such taxes is known in advance, and unless excepted from the covenant would be deemed to be covered thereby. But under the charter of Brooklyn assessments for local improvements are made in advance of the execution of the work. They represent, or are supposed to represent, benefits thereafter to be secured to the property assessed. The time when improvements will be initiated cannot be known.

The contract to convey free from incumbrances ordinarily has reference to incumbrances or liens actually existing when the contract is executed, or thereafter created, or suffered by the act or default of the vendor. While the assessments in question constituted, under the charter of Brooklyn, liens on the lands assessed from the time of their confirmation by the common council, and are, in a strict sense, incumbrances thereon, we are of opinion that they are not incumbrances within the meaning of the contract. They did not diminish the value of the subject of the contract. The plaintiff will acquire what the defendant intended to sell and what he expected to receive, and, but for the postponement of the time of the execution of the deed, the plaintiff would have taken his title before the assessments were laid. This incident ought not to impose upon the defendant a loss pro tanto of so much of the purchase money. But even if the contract, by its true interpretation, imposes upon the defendant the legal obligation to pay the assessment, this is not decisive of the right of the plaintiff to relief by way of specific performance. This equitable remedy cannot be claimed as a matter of right. It is discretionary with the court to grant or withhold it in furtherance of justice or to prevent injustice. Where, by reason of circumstances attending the making of the contract, such as fraud, accident, mistake, or where unconscionable advantage has been taken, or where, by reason of circumstances which have intervened between the making of the contract and the bringing of the action, the enforcement of the equitable remedy would be inequitable, and produce results not within the intent or understanding of the parties when the bargain was made, and there has been no inexcusable laches or inattention by the party resisting performance, in not foreseeing and providing for contingencies which have subsequently arisen, the court may and will refuse to specifically enforce the contract, and will leave the party to his legal remedy. The cases are very numerous under this head, and no hard and fast rule can be formulated by which it can be readily determined how the discretion of the court in a given case should be exercised. But it seems to us to be very clear that to enforce the contract in this case by requiring the defendant to covenant against the assessments in question would violate the spirit of the contract, and convert the equitable power of the court into an instrument for the accomplishment of rank injustice. The case of Willard v. Tayloe, 8 Wall. 564, contains an able discussion of the principles governing the courts in administering relief by way of specific performance of contracts, and Mr. Justice Field, in his opinion in that case, so fully cites the authorities that a further reference to them here is unnecessary. We think the judgment of the special and general terms should be modified by excepting from the scope of the covenant in the deed to be given by the defendant the assessments in question, and that, as modified, the judgment should be affirmed, with costs to the defendant in all courts. All concur, except GRAY, J., not voting. Judgment accordingly.

CORBIN v. TRACY et al.

(34 Conn. 325.)

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Sept. Term, 1867.

Bill in equity, brought by the petitioners, a joint stock corporation, to the superior court for Hartford county, to compel the specific performance of a contract to assign a patent right. The superior court (Loomis, J.) passed a decree in favor of the petitioners, and the respondents filed a motion for a new trial and a motion in error. The case is sufficiently stated in the opinion.

C. E. Perkins, in support of the motions. Mr. Hubbard and C. E. Mitchell, contra.

CARPENTER, J. It appears that the contract set out in the plaintiffs' bill was not, at the time of its execution, duly stamped pursuant to the laws of the United States. On the 26th day of March, 1867, the collector of the first collection district of this state caused said instrument to be stamped, and then and there entered upon its margin the following certificate:

"I have this day affixed the proper stamp, required by law, to this instrument, and satisfactory evidence having been furnished that the omission to affix a stamp at the proper time was the result of inadvertence, and without design to evade the law, the penalty is remitted. Hartford, March 26, 1867. H. A. Grant, Collector."

To the admission of this instrument, thus stamped, in evidence, the respondents objected, but the court received it. The correctness of this ruling is the only question presented by the motion for a new trial.

The law of the United States (Stat. 1865-66, p. 142) makes the instrument, if executed without a stamp, "with intent to evade the provisions of this act," "invalid and of no effect." The act further provides that the collector of the revenue shall, upon the payment of the price of the proper stamp required by law, and of a penalty of fifty dollars, affix the proper stamp to such instrument, and note upon the margin thereof the date of his so doing, and the fact that such penalty has been paid; and the same shall thereupon be deemed and held to be as valid, to all intents and purposes, as if stamped when made or issued. But this provision does not apply to this case as the respondents seem to suppose; for there is no pretense that this instrument was executed without a stamp with the intent to evade the provisions of this act, but, on the contrary, the proper officer has expressly found that the omission to fix stamps was the result of inadvertence, and without design to evade the law.

There is, however, a proviso in the act which is applicable to this case. That proviso is as follows: "That when it shall appear to said collector, upon oath or otherwise, to his satisfaction, that any such instrument has not been duly stamped at the time of making or issuing the same, by reason of accident, mistake, inadvertence, or urgent necessity, and without any willful design to defraud the United States of the stamp, or to evade or delay the payment thereof, then and in such case, if such instrument, &c., shall within twelve calendar months after the first day of August, eighteen hundred and sixty six, or within twelve calendar months after the making and issuing thereof, be brought to the said collector of revenue to be stamped, and the stamp tax chargeable thereon shall be paid, it shall be lawful for the said collector to remit the penalty aforesaid, and to cause such instrument to be duly stamped." The act further provides that such instrument "may be used in all courts and places in the same manner and with like effect as if the instrument had been originally stamped."

The certificate of the collector brings this case within the spirit and letter of this part of the act, and the contract was properly received in evidence.

A new trial is not advised.

2. Under the motion in error, it is objected that the petitioners have not made out a case for the interference of a court of equity,—that courts of equity in this state will not interfere to enforce agreements to sell personal property unless the circumstances are such as to make a trust, because there is in such a case a remedy at law by an action for damages.

The objection assumes that there is a distinction, in questions of this character, between real and personal property. If any such distinction exists, it does not go to the extent claimed.

The ground of the jurisdiction of a court of equity in this class of cases is that a court of law is inadequate to decree a specific performance, and can relieve the injured party only by a compensation in damages, which, in many cases, would fall far short of the redress which his situation might require. Whenever, therefore, the party wants the thing in specie, and he cannot otherwise be fully compensated, courts of equity will grant him a specific performance. They will decree the specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands, not because of the peculiar nature of land, but because a party cannot be adequately compensated in damages. So in respect to personal estate; the general rule that courts of equity will not entertain jurisdiction for a specific performance of agreements respecting goods, chattels, stocks, choses in action, and other things of a merely personal nature, is limited to cases where a compensation in damages furnishes a complete and satisfactory remedy. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 717, 718.

The jurisdiction, therefore, of a court of equity, does not proceed upon any distinction between real estate and personal estate, but upon the ground that damages at law may not, in the particular case, afford a complete remedy. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 716-718, and cases there cited; Clark v. Flint, 22 Pick. 231. When the remedy at law is not full and complete, and when the effect of the breach cannot be known with any exactness, either because the effect will show itself only after a long time, or for any other reason, courts of equity will enforce contracts in relation to personality. 3 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 373.

An application of these principles to the case before us relieves it of all difficulty. The contract relates to a patent right, the value of which has not yet been tested by actual use. All the data by which its value can be estimated are yet future and contingent. Experience may prove it to be worthless, another and better invention may supersede it, or it may itself be an infringement of some patent already existing. On the other hand it may be so simple in its principle and construction as to defy all competition, and give its owner a practical monopoly of all branches of business to which it is applicable. In any event its value cannot be known with any degree of exactness until after the lapse of time; and even then it is doubtful whether it can be ascertained with sufficient accuracy to do substantial justice between the parties by a compensation in damages. On the whole we are satisfied that justice can only be done, in a case like this, by a specific performance of the contract.

There is therefore no error in the decree complained of.

The other judges concurred.

HICKS et al. v. TURCK et al.

Supreme Court of Michigan. November 1, 1888.

Appeal from circuit court, Clinton county, in chancery; Vernon H. Smith, Judge.

This is a suit by John Hicks, Robert M. Steel, Josiah Upton, and Cornelius Bennett against William S. Turck and Townsend A. Ely, for the specific performance of a contract. Defendants appeal from an order overruling their demurrer to the bill.

James L. Clark and Geo. P. Stare, for appellants. O. L. Spaulding, for appellees.

SHERWOOD, C. J. The bill in this case is filed to obtain a decree for the specific performance of a contract reading as follows:

"Riverton, Neb., October 31, 1885.

"Due David S. French, attorney in fact for Hicks, Bennett & Co., eighteen thousand three hundred and sixty-six dollars, ($18,366.00,) being the balance on consideration of one-half interest in personal property and lands this day sold Robert M. Steel, John Hicks, William S. Turck, and Townsend A. Ely; above sum to be paid by assignment of a certain mortgage on lands in Gratiot county, Michigan, to said David S. French, attorney, for $2,000; and balance of sixteen thousand three hundred and sixty-six dollars ($16,366) to be paid by promissory note due and payable on or before five years from date, with annual interest at seven per cent. per annum, said note secured by mortgage on the undivided one-half interest in said ranch property, as collateral security for payment of said sum of sixteen thousand three hundred and sixty-six dollars, and interest as aforesaid. Wm. S. Turck.

"Townsend A. Ely."

The bill states that at the time the note was given the complainants were a firm located and doing business under the name of Hicks, Bennett & Co., in Michigan, and were seized of a large quantity of lands in the county of Franklin, in the state of Nebraska, the particular description of which is fully set out in the bill; that on that day said firm by David S. French, its attorney in fact, conveyed by full covenant warranty deed the lands described in the bill to John Hicks and Robert Steel, who resided at St. Johns, Mich., and the defendants, who resided at Alma, Mich., for the sum of $32,732; that the purchasers upon said sale entered upon said premises, and ever since have had the actual possession thereof; that on the same day Hicks, Bennett & Co. sold to the grantees in said deed all the cattle, stock, hay, grain, farming implements, tools, and other personal property on said land for the sum of $10,000; that in consideration of the premises, and in payment to the complainants for the undivided one-half of the said real and personal property, Turck and Ely, who knew all about the lands, the title of complainants thereto, and the condition of the personal property, agreed to pay to complainants $21,366, being one-half of the total purchase price of the land and personal property, the payments to be made as follows: $3,000 in their promissory note due in two years, and which they gave, and that they would secure and pay the balance of the purchase price by assigning to the said French, who was attorney in fact of the complainants, a certain real-estate mortgage of $2,000 on lands in Gratiot county, Mich., and for the remaining sum of $16,366 would at once execute and deliver to French, for complainants, their promissory note for that amount, due on or before five years from the date thereof, with annual interest at 7 per cent, and secure the payment of the same by mortgage on the undivided half of the lands so deeded to them; that the said $2,000 mortgage was assigned, as promised by the said defendant Turck, but the said defendants refused to and have not made the note and mortgage to complainants for the $16,366, as they agreed to do, and still refuse to comply with complainants' request for them so to do. Complainants further say and aver in their bill that they have complied in all things with and fully kept their agreement with said defendants, and performed all its requirements on their part in the premises, and are now entitled to have said note and mortgage from said defendants as they promised to make it, in accordance with the written agreement hereinbefore referred to, and which was, after being made by defendants, duly given to said French, for the complainants, who now have the same. The complainants ask the court, upon the foregoing facts, to decree that defendants specifically perform their agreement with the complainants, and execute and deliver to them said note and mortgage. The defendants appeared in the case, and demurred to complainants' bill, assigning two grounds of demurrer: (1) That the facts set up in the bill are not sufficient to entitle complainants to the relief prayed; (2) that complainants have a complete and adequate remedy at law touching all matters set up in the bill. The cause was heard before Judge Smith in the Clinton circuit, who made a decree overruling the demurrer, and allowing defendants 20 days in which to answer.

We are satisfied this decree was proper. The defendants had received the full consideration for what the complainants asked. The complainants might have had a remedy at law; but we are by no means sure it would be an adequate one. On the contrary, the remedy at law, when resorted to, is liable to a very great variety of perplexities and embarrassments arising from the want of the note promised, the refusal to give which is a gross violation of their contract, for which the demurrer concedes no excuse can be given. The note was liable to run five years, and complainants had the right to have the amount owing thereon during all the time it did run secured by the mortgage. The land was not within the jurisdiction of the courts in this state. It could be easily transferred to bona fide holders, and the perils of insolvency are not beyond the possibilities among business men, as all experience shows. All these are circumstances of more or less embarrassment when the remedy at law is resorted to. It is but equitable and just that this contract should be specifically performed upon the showing made in this bill. This bill is not filed for an accounting, nor to enforce payment of a debt, but to compel a party to comply with his promise, after receiving the full consideration upon which it was made, to make and execute evidence of indebtedness, and give security for the payment thereof. There is no proceeding at law which can accomplish this. Equity alone can take cognizance of such a case, and do justice between the parties. The bill furnishes a clear case for the exercise of that sound legal discretion which the court must always use in awarding specific performance, and the learned circuit judge was right in so holding. The decree below will be affirmed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the circuit judge to allow defendants 20 days in which to answer the bill after remittitur shall have been filed. The complainants will recover their costs. The other justices concurred.

GAGE v. FISHER.

(65 N. W. 809, 5 N. D. 297.)

Supreme Court of North Dakota. Nov. 11, 1895.

Appeal from district court, Burleigh county; W. H. Winchester, Judge.

Action by J. R. Gage against Asa Fisher. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

G. W. Newton and S. L. Glaspell, for appellant. Alexander Hughes, for respondent.

CORLISS, J. We have reached the conclusion in this case that we must decide against the defendant and respondent, on his own theory. Taking the view of the facts which is most favorable to him, we are yet compelled to hold that he has neither any defense to the note sued on, nor any valid counterclaim against the plaintiff for money paid by him to plaintiff in part payment of such note. We will state our reasons for this conclusion as briefly as the complicated nature of the case will permit.

The action is on a promissory note for $3,000 given by defendant to plaintiff. The consideration for the note was the sale by plaintiff to defendant of 10 shares of the stock of the First National Bank of Bismarck, N. D. The date of this transaction was December 19, 1893. The capital stock of the bank was $100,000, divided into 1,000 shares of $100 each. For some time prior to 1888, plaintiff and defendant had both been directors of this bank, and defendant had been president thereof. In 1888 plaintiff was dropped from the directory, and in 1889 the defendant also ceased to be a director. The control of the bank was then in the hands of a number of stockholders, who acted in unison, and who were more or less hostile to defendant and plaintiff. Among these stockholders were George H. Fairchild, H. R. Porter, and Daniel Eisenberg. This group of stockholders will be designated in the course of this opinion as the "Fairchild interest." The defendant, for the purpose of securing control of the bank, began purchasing its stock, and in the summer of 1892 he found himself the owner of 489 shares of such stock, and in the possession of a proxy to vote 16 shares more, owned by a Mrs. Shaw. Had this condition of affairs remained unchanged until the next annual stockholders' meeting, in January, 1893, the defendant would have been master of the situation, and would have secured full control of the bank, electing his own board of directors, and, through them, such officers of the corporation as he might see fit to elect. While this condition existed, the defendant claims that he was induced to part with his control over the Shaw stock at the suggestion of plaintiff, and under his promise to allow him (the defendant) to control, or in other words to direct, the voting of this stock at the next annual stockholders' meeting, in January, 1893. Relying on this promise of the plaintiff to defendant, who, unquestionably, could have voted the Shaw stock at such meeting, had he so desired, defendant notified Mrs. Shaw that she could sell this stock to the Fairchild interest. The plaintiff, the defendant, and Mrs. Shaw were all hostile to the Fairchild interest; and the motive which prompted defendant in releasing his control over the Shaw stock, and in suggesting to Mrs. Shaw that she sell it to the enemy, was apparently a desire to induce the Fairchild interest to assume the heaviest possible burden, without at the same time giving them control of the majority of the stock. Defendant, having purchased 2 more shares, was now the owner of 491 shares; and, when plaintiff promised him control of his 10 shares, defendant felt sure of a majority, and therefore permitted the control of the Shaw stock to pass from him. Plaintiff now held the balance of power. The Fairchild interest began to bid for his stock. Finding that plaintiff, despite his promise to allow defendant to control his stock at the meeting, intended to sell to the enemy unless he (the defendant) purchased it for the sum of $5,000, he finally yielded to this demand, and the contract of sale was entered into on this basis. It is not claimed, however, that plaintiff, from the start, intended to inveigle by his promises the defendant into a position where he could take advantage of the necessities of his situation to extort from him an exorbitant price for the stock. Fraud is not claimed, except as it is urged that plaintiff's subsequent conduct was fraudulent in contemplation of law. Two thousand dollars of the purchase price was paid at the time of the sale, and the note in suit, for $3,000, was given for the balance of the consideration. Subsequently the defendant paid $1,000 on this note, and thereafter this suit was brought to recover the remaining $2,000 due thereon, with interest. The defendant interposed as a counterclaim a claim to recover back the $3,000 so paid; having, as he insists, rescinded the contract, and offered to restore to plaintiff the 10 shares of stock delivered under it. The trial court rendered judgment in his favor, both on the plaintiff's claim against him, and on his claim against the plaintiff; directing that the note be canceled, and that defendant recover from plaintiff the consideration paid, namely, $3,000. It is true that the plaintiff claims, and he so testified, that the agreement between him and the defendant was that he would give defendant the preference in purchasing the stock, in case he offered as much for it as the Fairchild interest; and, if this be the case, he was acting strictly under the contract, in demanding the sum of $5,000 for his stock from the defendant. In that event, both law and good morals would approve the course. But the trial court found that the contract was as we have stated, and we will assume, for the purpose of this decision, that this finding is correct. The defendant certainly cannot, and he does not, claim that he proved a case more favorable to himself than the findings, nor does he pretend that he can ever establish a stronger case on another trial.

Taking these findings as the basis of our decision, we are very clear that the court erred in deciding the case in favor of the defendant. The court erred in its conclusions of law that the facts found established a defense to the note, and also a valid counterclaim for the $3,000 paid on account of the purchase price. We regard the contract for the sale of the 10 shares of stock for $5,000 as entirely legal, and we do not consider that the defendant is in position legally to claim that, because an unconscionable price was extorted from him on account of the necessities of the situation, he has any right, after having, with full knowledge of the facts, submitted to the demand, to rescind the contract he deliberately made. If it is true (but we express no opinion on this question of fact) that the plaintiff, after having induced the defendant to part with the control of the corporation, by letting the Shaw stock slip from him on promise to substitute his (plaintiff's) stock for the Shaw stock, and to allow defendant to use the plaintiff's stock as he (the defendant) could have used the Shaw stock at the next annual meeting, his subsequent conduct in repudiating his agreement was an act of gross perfidy, and the using of his power, under such circumstances, to coerce the defendant into paying an exorbitant price for this stock, which was worth in the general market not over $500, was base and dishonorable in the extreme. But the decision of this case turns on a larger question,—the question of public policy. There is no pretense that plaintiff was guilty of any fraud in the sale of the stock. The parties both dealt at arm's length. There was no concealment of any fact. There was no misrepresentation. Whatever relation of confidence which theretofore existed between the plaintiff and defendant must have ceased, whatever esteem which the defendant had entertained for the plaintiff must have instantly perished, when he was confronted by the plaintiff with this, to the defendant, unconscionable demand that he pay him $5,000 for stock which, as defendant understood, the plaintiff had agreed he was to have the right to use at the meeting without compensation. Whatever defendant did at this time must have been done, not cheerfully, in a spirit of confidence, but reluctantly, with anger in his heart, and therefore with no disposition on his part to yield to any demand, except so far as coerced by the necessities of his position.

It is said that plaintiff having, by his promises, induced the defendant to place himself in the plaintiff's power, the plaintiff should not be allowed to take advantage of the situation to extort from him an exorbitant price for the stock. The fallacy of this reasoning lies in its untenable assumption that defendant, at the time he bought the stock for $5,000, under the stress of necessity, could have maintained an action against plaintiff to compel the specific performance by him of his contract to allow defendant to vote his (the plaintiff's) stock. If, at the time defendant agreed to pay $5,000 for this property, he was powerless to secure redress in a court of equity,—if at that time the plaintiff could not be compelled to permit him (the defendant) to vote the stock,—then plaintiff had a perfect legal right to sell to whom he pleased, for such price as he could obtain, and therefore had an undoubted legal right to sell to defendant for $5,000, so long as defendant, being under no other pressure than that of his necessities, agreed to pay that sum for it. Defendant has no right to insist that he was unexpectedly placed in this peculiar position, relying on the promise of plaintiff; for, if it was a promise which a court of equity would not enforce, he had no right to rely on such promise. He was bound to know that the plaintiff might refuse to carry out his agreement, and that in that event he (the defendant) would be powerless to compel its performance, but must, to save himself from being baffled in his scheme, buy the stock at such a figure as it could be purchased for. Even assuming the contract to allow defendant to control the stock to be valid, so that its breach would subject plaintiff to liability for damages, still defendant cannot use the breach of that promise as a basis for rearing upon it this argument that plaintiff took advantage of his necessities, unless such contract could be specifically enforced in equity. Plaintiff had a legal right to take advantage of his necessities, and exact such price as he could under the circumstances secure, if he could not be compelled by a court of equity to allow defendant to vote the stock. If plaintiff could break this promise without liability for damages, because it was void, he could charge what he chose for the stock, and defendant would have no legal ground for complaint. So if the breach of this promise, assuming it to be valid, subjected him to liability only for damages, he yet could break it, and compel the defendant to buy the stock and pay him what he asked for it, without rendering himself liable to the charge of having, in legal contemplation, extorted an unconscionable contract from the defendant. Suppose that the contract was valid, and that its breach would have subjected the plaintiff to liability for $500 damages. He might have broken it, and then have taken the position that, while he was liable for these damages, he yet had the undoubted legal right to break such contract and incur such liability, and thereupon sell the stock to whom he pleased, without being liable for anything more; and, if the defendant desired to purchase on the same terms as another person had offered, he had a legal right to make a new contract of sale with him (the defendant), and the contract would be as valid as a sale to a stranger. The defendant could not complain that an unfair advantage had been taken of him, for, if it is the law that a court of equity will not enforce such an agreement as the original one in this case, but will leave the party to his action for damages, then defendant was bound to know that he was all the time at the mercy of the plaintiff, who might at any moment repudiate the contract, without other liability than for damages; and the defendant was in this position because he had failed to take the precaution to secure a promise that would fully protect him. He has no legal right to appeal to equity for relief because the plaintiff took advantage of this struggle for supremacy to exact from him (defendant) an enormous price for his stock, if he (the defendant) failed to secure from plaintiff such a contract to protect him against such exaction as a court of equity would enforce for his protection. Before this promise to allow the defendant to vote the stock was made, plaintiff might have sold his stock to defendant for $5,000 without the possibility of any rescission of the contract. If defendant saw fit to let the Shaw stock go, without securing in place of it an agreement that he could enforce in equity against the plaintiff, and without securing the plaintiff's stock itself, he voluntarily relinquished his vantage ground without taking the precaution to protect himself legally, and trusted himself and his interests to the honor of the plaintiff; knowing full well, as he testifies himself, that the plaintiff, in the impending struggle for supremacy, would be sorely tempted to desert him, and, being only human, might fall.

If we should affirm this judgment, we would give the defendant all the benefit he could have obtained from a decree of specific performance, rendered before the stockholders' meeting, that defendant be allowed to vote the stock. Defendant would recover his money; plaintiff would have back his stock; and it is undisputed that defendant has in fact voted the stock in the manner he desired to vote, and has, through the use of this stock, secured control of the corporation. We are satisfied that, both on principle and under sound authority, the true rule is that a court of equity should never specifically enforce a contract by which one person agrees that another should control his stock without purchasing it, where the sole ground of the appeal to equity is the desire of the party making the appeal to secure control of a corporation through the use of the stock he is thus seeking to control. It is a general rule that a court of equity will not enforce a specific performance of a contract for the sale of personal property. Corporate stock comes within the scope of this rule, unless there are peculiar features calling for the interposition of a court of equity. But, when such peculiar features exist, equity will decree specific performance. Eckstein v. Downing (N. Mining Co.*, 23 Cal. 390; True v. Houghton, 6 Colo. 318; Bumgardner v. Leavitt (W. Va.) 13 S. E. 67. When the only peculiar feature is the desire of the plaintiff, with the aid of the stock he is seeking to obtain, to secure the control of a corporation, this, perhaps, so far from being a ground for taking the case out of the ordinary rule, may be a reason for denying the relief sought. While it is not illegal for a stockholder to buy up a controlling interest in a corporation, and so absolutely rule its affairs, and while it is also true that agreements to vote stock together are not, when carried out, illegal, in the sense that the law regards the vote as void or voidable, yet it may be contrary to public policy for a court of equity to decree specific performance of contracts touching the control of stock, where the sole object of the person who is seeking to enforce the contract is thereby to secure control of the corporation. We do not say that such a contract is necessarily void, as repugnant to public policy, but we are by no means clear that a court of equity would specifically enforce it. It may be that sound public policy demands that a court of equity should never lend its aid to the enforcement of a contract relating to stock, when the sole object of the person who wishes it enforced is to give that person control of the corporate affairs. Efforts are often put forth to secure the management of a corporation, which are inspired by laudable motives. But it is also true that many of these schemes to obtain the control of a corporation are conceived and carried on in a spirit inimical to the interests of the minority stockholders, and not infrequently for the purpose of so managing the affairs of the corporation as to force them to sell their holdings at practically such a figure as the majority stockholders should dictate. Should courts of equity adopt the practice of giving to a minority stockholder the right to enforce specific performance of a contract to buy stock, simply to enable him to control the corporation, or, what is still more indefensible, the right to vote or control the voting of stock that he does not own, to enable him to secure control of the corporation, they would find that in many cases they had suffered their functions to be perverted by designing men; that they had in fact been lending to dishonorable schemes such effectual aid as to insure their consummation. Proof that the object was legitimate, that the motive was pure, would furnish no guaranty that the real purpose was not to wreck or mismanage the corporate affairs. In no case can a court determine with certainty just what course the minority stockholder, when armed by the court with this absolute power over the corporation, will pursue when he has attained his vantage ground. It is therefore possible that the question whether specific performance should be decreed ought not to turn on the court's surmise or guess as to the ulterior purpose of the person who is seeking to secure control; but because there is always danger that such purpose may be dishonest, and because the court can never surely know the truth as to the real motive, it may be that courts of equity should inflexibly refuse to aid the minority stockholder in his effort to obtain control. In this case the defendant's motive appears to have been honorable, and we have no doubt that such is the fact. He was merely seeking to take the management of the bank from persons who, in his judgment, were mismanaging it, and resume control of its affairs, that it might be built up for the benefit, necessarily, of all stockholders. But perhaps this fact should not influence us. If the specific enforcement of such a contract is to turn on the opinion of the court touching motives, it is obvious that in many cases dishonest projects will receive effectual equitable aid. The decision of the Pennsylvania supreme court in Foll's Appeal, 91 Pa. St. 434, strongly supports the view that equity would not specifically enforce a contract for the sale of stock where the only ground for invoking the aid of the court is the peculiar value of the stock to the person who has contracted to buy it, because of his desire to secure control of the corporation. The bill in that case was filed to compel specific performance of a contract to purchase stock in a national bank. The basis of the application to equity was the desire of the plaintiff to secure control of the bank. The court unanimously held that, on grounds of public policy, the relief should be denied. The court said: "While the legal right of the complainant to buy up sufficient of the stock of this bank to control it in the interest of himself and friends may be conceded, it is by no means clear that a court of equity will lend its aid to help him. A national bank is a quasi public institution. While it is the property of the stockholders, and its profits inure to their benefit, it was nevertheless intended by the law creating it that it should be for the public accommodation. It furnishes a place, supposed to be safe, in which the general public may deposit their moneys, and where they can obtain temporary loans upon giving the proper security. There are three classes of persons to be protected,—the depositors, the noteholders, and the stockholders. We have no intimation that the bank, as at present organized, is not prudently and carefully managed. The stock, as now held, is scattered among a variety of people, and held in greater or lesser amounts. It is difficult to see how the small stockholders, who have their modest earnings invested in it, the depositors, who use it for the safekeeping of their moneys, or the business public, who look to it for accommodation in the way of loans, are to be benefited by the concentration of a majority of its stock in the hands of one man, or in such way that one man and his friends shall control it. * * * We are in no doubt as to our duty in the premises. We are of opinion that the end sought to be attained by this bill is against public policy, and for that reason we refuse our aid."

It is true that some stress was laid by the court on the fact that the plaintiff was operating with borrowed capital, in his efforts to secure control of the bank. But this fact was not treated as decisive, and it is clear from the whole trend of the opinion that the absence of this fact would not have resulted in a different ruling in the case. Moreover, this fact was adverted to as tending to show that the object was to speculate, and not to invest funds in corporate stock. But in the case at bar the defendant never intended to invest a dollar in plaintiff's stock until he was compelled to do it to enable him to accomplish his real purpose, which was to secure control of the bank. In Moses v. Scott (Ala.) 4 South. 742, after stating that a vote based upon a prior agreement to vote as a unit would not necessarily be illegal, the court say, at page 744: "Whether an agreement to vote as a unit, or as an agreed majority may dictate, for any given length of time, is a contract so binding in its terms that no party to it can withdraw from it or disregard it without the consent of his fellows, may be a different question. Possibly public policy may exert an influence in the solution of this problem. And even if such a contract be lawful, and on its face exert a continuing force, the grave question comes up, will a court of chancery, in its enlightened discretion, lend its aid to the enforcement of a contract of so doubtful policy?" However, we are not called upon to settle this interesting question in this case. The case before us presents a stronger one against the exercise of the equitable powers of the courts to enforce specific performance than a contract for the purchase of stock; for here the contract was to give the minority stockholder the right to dominate and direct the judgment of the plaintiff, as stockholder, in the voting of his stock, without owning the stock himself. Every other stockholder in the bank had the right to demand that the plaintiff should, if he desired so to do, exercise at the very time of the annual meeting his own judgment as to the best interests of all the stockholders, untrammelled by dictation, and unfettered by the obligation of any contract. We know of no case where a court of equity has enforced such an agreement. We regard as controlling on this question the rule that an irrevocable proxy to vote stock is revocable. See Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law, § 610, note 6.

There is another reason, and to our mind a still stronger reason, for holding that defendant could not have secured in a court of equity a decree specifically enforcing this contract. The plaintiff's promise to allow the defendant to control his stock was based upon an illegal consideration,—one condemned by public policy,—and the promise was therefore not binding in law. The trial court found that before defendant suffered the Shaw stock to pass beyond his control, and before plaintiff had agreed to permit defendant to control his stock, defendant had informed the plaintiff that it was his purpose to vote his own and the Shaw stock to make plaintiff one of the directors of the bank, and that it was also his purpose to cause him (plaintiff) to secure employment in the bank when the new board of directors was elected; that he desired the advice and co-operation of plaintiff in securing such control, and the selection of suitable persons to put in the directory to carry out his plans, etc. The court also found that thereafter plaintiff represented to defendant that he did not need the Shaw stock "to accomplish his said purpose," that he had better let the Fairchild interest purchase that stock, and that he (the plaintiff) would not permit his stock to be bought or controlled by the Fairchild interest, but that he would vote his stock with the defendant's stock at the next annual stockholders' meeting, for the persons agreed upon by plaintiff and defendant for directors, and would in every way aid and assist defendant in the consummation of his plans for securing the possession, control, and management of the bank and its affairs. These findings make it apparent that one of the considerations, if not the main consideration, which influenced plaintiff in agreeing to give defendant control of his stock, was the previous statement of defendant that he intended to make plaintiff a director, and see that he was employed in the bank by the new board of directors to be elected at the approaching stockholders' meeting. That both parties understood that at least a portion of the consideration for plaintiff's co-operation with defendant in the project to obtain control of the corporation was the promise of defendant to give him employment in the bank is apparent from a written contract subsequently entered into between the parties. On the 19th of December, but entirely separate from the contract of sale, the defendant signed and delivered to plaintiff, who accepted the same, the following memorandum of agreement: "Bismarck, N. D., Dec. 19, 1892. In consideration of J. R. Gage joining me in effecting the controlling interest of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Bismarck, I hereby agree to furnish said J. R. Gage a position as cashier of said bank at a salary of not less than $100 per month, payable monthly, beginning at the 11th day of January, 1893, and during his ability to perform his duties as cashier, provided such control is assumed at such time.

Asa Fisher." In connection with this agreement the court made a finding of fact which conclusively shows that, all along, one of the inducements to plaintiff's promise to vote his stock with defendant's stock was the promise of the latter to give him a place in the bank. "That said agreement was signed by the defendant, Fisher, and was then and there, on said 19th day of December, 1892, delivered to plaintiff, J. R. Gage, by the defendant, and was then and there accepted and retained by said plaintiff, and he, the said plaintiff, then and there promised to perform said agreement on his part; that said contract, interpreted and explained by the circumstances under which it was made and the subject to which it relates, was intended by each of the parties thereto as follows: That the plaintiff would vote his said ten shares of stock at the annual meeting of the stockholders of said bank, to occur in the month of January following, for the persons agreed upon by the plaintiff and defendant for the directors of said bank, and that he would aid, assist, and co-operate with the defendant in carrying out the plans which they had previously discussed and agreed upon for the management of said corporation, as hereinbefore set forth, and that the defendant would use his influence with the said persons proposed and agreed upon for directors, when chosen, to elect the plaintiff to the position of cashier of said bank, at a salary of not less than $100 per month, during his ability to perform said duties."

It is apparent from the findings that this written agreement represents the previous oral understanding between the parties, reduced to writing. It is not claimed that the parties entered into three different contracts. There were only two agreements made. One related to the control of the stock by defendant without buying it. The other was the contract of sale. The court expressly finds that this written contract was no part of the contract for the sale of the stock. That one of the considerations which induced plaintiff to enter into an agreement to vote his stock with defendant's stock was the defendant's promise to secure his employment in the bank, is apparent from the findings to which we have referred; and as it is not pretended, and does not appear, that two different contracts relating to the control of plaintiff's stock by defendant preceded the contract of sale, we can find no escape from the conclusion that the promise on which defendant relied in parting with the Shaw stock was a promise made by plaintiff under the expectation, justified by defendant's promise, that he (plaintiff) was to have a place on the board of directors, and also a position in the bank, at a salary. We are strengthened in this view by the consideration that, unless the promise to give plaintiff employment was part of the original arrangement, the subsequent written promise of defendant would be without consideration. If plaintiff, for a sufficient consideration, had already promised to let defendant control his stock, an agreement on the part of defendant to give him an additional consideration for the right which was already his would be a purely gratuitous promise, not binding in law. So far from its appearing that defendant regarded that he was making such a promise, he shows by the written agreement signed by him that the sole consideration running to plaintiff for his agreement to permit defendant to control his stock was defendant's promise to secure him a position as cashier in the bank. It is impossible to conceive that so shrewd a man as the defendant would have promised in writing to give plaintiff a position in the bank, if such had not been part of the original understanding; for, unless it was part of it, the defendant had already secured, by his contract with plaintiff, all he could ever obtain by making additional promises. The case would be similar to that of a person, after having secured a contract for the sale to him of stock for a specified consideration, promising in writing that in consideration of such sale he would give the owner of the stock a place in the corporation. Such a promise would not be made by a reasonable being under such circumstances. The fact that such a contract was made in this case is convincing to our minds that the real consideration running to plaintiff for his original promise to let defendant control the stock was the promise of defendant to give him employment in the bank. This was what induced plaintiff to make the promise. At least, we are satisfied that it was one of the inducements. The contract was therefore contrary to public policy and void. At least a portion of the consideration was illegal, and hence the promise founded on it was a promise which no court would enforce. The law in such a case leaves both parties where it finds them. To neither will it give redress. That a contract relating to the purchase or control of corporate stock, founded in whole or in part upon a promise to secure for the person who owns the stock employment in the corporation, and an office therein, is illegal and void, is a doctrine supported by the unanimous voice of the decisions. Woodruff v. Wentworth, 133 Mass. 309; Noel v. Drake, 28 Kan. 265; Guernsey v. Cook, 120 Mass. 501; Forbes v. McDonald, 54 Cal. 98; Cone's Ex'rs v. Russell (N. J. Ch.) 21 Atl. 847; West v. Camden, 135 U. S. 507, 10 Sup. Ct. 838. In the case last cited the court, referring to a contract, one element of which was a promise to give one of the parties to it permanent employment as manager of a corporation in which he was a stockholder, said: "It was a contract, the purpose and effect of which was to influence the defendant, as a stockholder and officer of the company, 'in the decision of a question affecting the private rights of others, by considerations foreign to those rights,' and the defendant, by the contract, was placed under direct and very powerful 'inducement to disregard his duties to other members of the corporation, who had a right to demand his disinterested action in the selection of suitable officers.' He was to be in a relation of trust and confidence, which would require him to look only to the best interests of the whole uninfluenced by private contracts. We think this salutary rule is applicable in this case, notwithstanding the alleged contract was not corruptly made for private gain on the part of the defendant. There were other stockholders in the company. The defendant and the Standard Oil Company, for whose benefit it is alleged the contract was made, were not all the stockholders; and it seems to us that it was certainly the right of those other stockholders to have the defendant's judgment, as an officer of the company, exercised with a sole regard to the interests of the company." It cannot be claimed that the illegal parts of this contract could have been separated from the remainder, and the agreement sustained to that extent. The case falls within no exception to the general rule that where a part of a contract is illegal the whole agreement is void. It was not a case where the contract had been executed on one side, and the person who had received the benefit of it was asked to pay only the legal consideration he had agreed to pay, the illegal consideration being waived. In such a case the agreement can be sustained to the extent of the legal consideration. Casady v. Woodbury County, 13 Iowa, 113; 1 Pars. Cont. 380. So far as any consideration ran to plaintiff, there was only a single consideration to induce him to make his promise to allow defendant to vote his stock, i. e. the promise to give him employment in the bank. But even if he had been induced to make this promise for money, in addition to the agreement to give him a position in the bank, still the legal part of the consideration could not have been separated from the illegal, for no court could say, in the light of the actual contract, that he would have made the promise to allow his stock to be voted by another solely for the cash consideration. To separate the legal from the illegal consideration, under such circumstances, and then sustain and enforce the contract as so radically altered, would be to make a new contract for one wrongdoer, to enable him to enforce against the other wrongdoer, who would be no more culpable, an agreement which he never made. See Greenh. Pub. Pol. p. 17, rule 21, and page 24, rule 25, and cases cited; 2 Add. Cont. pt. 2, bottom paging, 762, and cases in note 1; Tobey v. Robinson, 99 Ill. 222-233; Comp. Laws, § 3533. For both of the reasons set forth in this opinion, we are clear that, at the time plaintiff and defendant made the contract of sale sought to be rescinded by defendant, the latter was powerless to compel the plaintiff to carry out his promise to allow defendant to vote his stock, and that, therefore, as defendant, to secure control of the bank, saw fit to buy the plain-tiff's stock for the sum of $5,000, he could not, after availing himself of all of the advantages growing out of the possession of such stock, rescind the sale, on the theory that he was coerced by his necessities into making a hard bargain.

The confidential relations existing between the plaintiff and defendant would not transmute into a contract binding in equity a contract which otherwise would not be enforced by a court of equity. Equity will not grant or withhold relief because the promisor was or was not trusted by the promisee, but it will withhold relief, in all cases of this character, irrespective of the question of confidential relations, because public policy demands that equitable aid should not be extended to what is in fact an illegal scheme. Nor is there any force in the contention that the case is brought within the scope of the doctrine that a court will relieve a party who has made a contract under the stress of great necessity. As we have already demonstrated, the defendant has only himself to blame for trusting to a promise the fulfillment of which equity would not compel. He was in no different position from that which he would have occupied had the promise of plaintiff never been made. And it is too clear to justify argument that had plaintiff demanded $5,000 for this stock, without having made any prior promise to permit defendant to control it, the defendant, if he saw fit to yield to this demand, would have been entitled to no relief on the ground that it was a hard bargain, extorted from him by the necessities of his situation. It would be a novel and dangerous doctrine that a party who, in his anxiety to secure property, had paid more than its market value, could appeal to equity to relieve him, because he had been impelled by his desires to pay a large price for the thing bought. The cases cited by counsel for defendant do not lay down any such doctrine. They are cases where one person has taken advantage of the financial distress of another to extort from him an unconscionable contract. See Hough's Adm'rs v. Hunt, 15 Am. Dec. 569, and note. Neither can it be said that the defendant was compelled to pay more for the stock than the market price. The strife of the controlling factions to secure control of the majority of the stock, to be used at the approaching stockholders' meeting, had temporarily given to this stock a value above its intrinsic value. To the purchaser of it, it meant victory and supremacy in the management of corporate affairs. Why should defendant claim that an exorbitant price had been extorted from him, if he was paying only what plaintiff could have secured from the opposing faction, had defendant declined to buy at that figure? The counsel for the defendant, in his learned and exhaustive brief, and in his very able oral argument before the court, has presented everything that could possibly be urged in favor of the case he represents; and this, too, with great ingenuity and force. But while we fully agree with him that, if the facts found be true, his client has a just grievance in the forum of conscience, yet we are unable, because of the considerations of public policy to which we have alluded, to give him any legal redress. The judgment of the district court is in all things reversed, and that court is directed to modify its conclusions of law in accordance with this opinion, and to enter judgment for the plaintiff for the full amount due on the note, for principal and interest. All concur.

NEW ENGLAND TRUST CO. v. ABBOTT.

Suffolk. Oct. 18, 1894.

Report from superior court, Suffolk county.

Action by the New England Trust Company against Abbott, executor of the will of Josiah G. Abbott, deceased, to compel a transfer to the company of certain shares of its stock held by defendant's testator, and to enjoin defendant from further prosecuting an action at law to recover the dividends on said shares. Judgment for plaintiff.

W. G. Russell and J. L. Stackpole, for plaintiff. L. S. Dabney and F. J. Stimson, for defendant.

MORTON, J. This is a bill brought by the plaintiff to compel the transfer to it, by the defendant, as executor of the will of Josiah G. Abbott, of certain shares in the plaintiff corporation, which were held by said Abbott at his decease, and which, it is alleged, he agreed, when the certificates were issued to him, should be appraised at his death by the directors, and transferred to the plaintiff at the appraisal, if the directors so elected. The bill also seeks to enjoin the defendant from prosecuting an action at law brought by him against the plaintiff to recover certain dividends upon said shares that have been declared by it.

The plaintiff was organized in 1869, under a special charter (Acts 1869, c. 182), with a capital of $500,000, which was afterwards increased to $1,000,000. The terms of the alleged agreement are found in the by-laws, of which all that is now material is as follows:

"Art. 7. Any member of this corporation who shall be desirous of selling any of his shares, the executor or administrator of any member, deceased, and the grantee or assignee of any shares sold on execution, shall cause such, their shares, respectively, to be appraised by the directors, which it shall be their duty to do on request, and shall thereupon offer the same to them for the use of the corporation at such appraised value; and, if said directors shall choose to take such shares for the use of the corporation, such member, executor, administrator, or assignee shall, upon the payment or tender to him of such appraised value thereof, and the dividends due thereon, transfer and assign such share or shares to said corporation; provided, however, the said directors shall not be obliged to take said shares at the appraised value, unless they shall think it for the interests of the company; and if they shall not, within ten days after such shares are offered to them in writing, take the same, and pay such member, executor, administrator, or assignee the price at which the same shall have been appraised, such member, executor, administrator, or assignee shall be at liberty to sell and dispose of the same shares to any person whatever.

"Art. 8. The directors shall have power, and it shall be their duty, to sell and dispose of the shares which may be transferred as aforesaid to the corporation, whenever, in their judgment, it can be done with safety and advantage to the corporation; and in all sales made by the directors, under any of the aforesaid provisions, it shall be their duty to sell the shares to such persons as shall appear to them, from their situation and character, most likely to promote confidence in the stability of the institution; no greater number than one hundred shares being assigned to any one person, nor, in the case of a person already a member, a greater number than will be sufficient to increase his previous number to one hundred shares."

These by-laws were adopted before any certificates of stock were issued. Afterwards, but before the capital was increased, article 7 was duly amended by adding to it the following:

"It shall be the duty of such executor, administrator, grantee, or assignee to offer said shares for appraisal, and to be taken by the corporation, if it shall so elect, whenever requested by the actuary or secretary, and no dividends or interest shall be paid or allowed after a failure to comply with such request: provided, that such request shall not be made until after the payment of one dividend and the expiration of six months from the death of the owner or sale as aforesaid, but the offer may be made at any earlier period if the party shall prefer."

Every certificate contained on its face, as part of the certificate, the provision that "said shares are transferable only in person or by attorney, duly constituted, on the books of the company, and in the manner and upon the conditions expressed in the by-laws of the company, printed upon the back of this certificate." On the backs of the certificates were printed by-laws 7 and 8. By-law 7 was printed as amended on the backs of those issued after the increase. There were also on the stubs from which the certificates were detached, in the certificate books, two receipts given and signed by the defendant's testator at the time the two certificates were issued to him in the original and increased capital, which were each as follows: "Received the above certificate subject to the conditions and restrictions therein referred to, and to the by-laws of the company, to which I agree to conform." The defendant contends that these by-laws are void. We have not found it necessary to consider that question, and we express no opinion upon it. We think that the case may well stand on the ground that the defendant's testator entered into an agreement with the plaintiff to do what the plaintiff now seeks to compel his executor to do. It is manifest that a stockholder may make a contract with a corporation to do or not to do certain things in regard to his stock, or to waive certain rights, or to submit to certain restrictions respecting which the stockholders might have no power of compulsion over him. In Adley v. Whitstable Co., 17 Ves. 315, 322, Lord Eldon says: "It has been frequently determined that what may well be made the subject of a contract between the different interests of a partnership would not be good as a by-law. For instance, an agreement among the citizens of London that they would not sell except in the markets of London would be good; yet it has been declared by the legislature that a by-law to that effect is void." See, also, Davis v. Proprietors, etc., 8 Metc. (Mass.) 321; Bank of Attica v. Manufacturers' & Traders' Bank, 20 N. Y. 505, 6 Cook, Stocks & S. § 408. In the present case the certificates were issued to the defendant's testator in consideration of the payment by him to the corporation of the amount due for the stock, and of the agreements with it on his part which they contained. By accepting them without objection, and by signing the receipts, he must be held to have agreed to the conditions printed on the backs of the certificates. The fact that the conditions were contained in by-laws which may have been invalid as such does not render his agreement void, if the contract was in substance one which the corporation had power to make. We think that it had such power. It is held in this state that a corporation, unless prohibited, may purchase its own stock (Dupee v. Water Power Co., 114 Mass. 37); and we see nothing opposed to public policy in such an agreement as this, with corporations like this. If honestly carried out by the directors, it tends to secure a trustworthy body of stockholders, from which those having the care and management of the affairs of the corporation naturally would be selected. It certainly cannot be contrary to public policy that the managers of this and similar institutions should be persons of skill who possess the confidence of the public. The restraint upon alienation is no greater than is often agreed to. In England it is not unusual to find in the deeds of settlement or articles of association under which corporations or joint-stock companies have been organized, and which correspond to the charter and by-laws here, provisions requiring the stockholder, in case he wishes to transfer his stock, to offer it to the directors, or to submit to them the name of the transferee for approval. Bargate v. Shortridge, 5 H. L. Cas. 297; Poole v. Middleton, 29 Beav. 646; Ex parte Penney, 8 Ch. App. 446; Moffatt v. Farquhar, 7 Ch. Div. 591; Chappell's Case, 6 Ch. App. 902. No objections seem to have been made to these provisions. In this state, the legislature, in numerous instances, has provided, in the charters of corporations like this, that the shares shall be transferable according to such rules and regulations as the stockholders shall establish, and not otherwise. It is hardly possible that the legislature was ignorant of the construction which has been put upon the power thus conferred, and which in the case of the first corporation of the kind chartered in the commonwealth, the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company (Acts 1818, c. 180), was shown, it is said, by the adoption of by-laws from which those in this case were copied. It is true that this charter contains no provision in regard to by-laws or to the transfer of shares; but the policy of the legislature cannot be affected by such an omission, especially in view of the fact that many of the charters since granted contain this provision.

Neither do we think that the agreement is void for the reason that it authorizes the plaintiff to invest, as the defendant contends, in its own stock, or because it compels the defendant to submit to the appraisal of the directors. If the enumeration in its charter of certain things in which it may invest is to be construed as excluding, among others, its own stock, we think that the object of the agreement is not to secure the transfer of the shares to the plaintiff as an investment, but to enable the directors to dispose of it to such person or persons as shall appear to them, from their situation and character, most likely to promote confidence in the stability of the institution; and though, pending its disposition by the directors, it may, for convenience's sake, be placed with the company's securities, and dividends, if declared, collected upon it, that does not alter the essential character of the tenure upon which the company holds it. It is settled that one may agree to sell his property at a price to be determined by another, and that he will be bound by the price so fixed, even though the party establishing it was interested; provided the interest was known, and no objection made by the parties, and no fraud or bad faith is shown. Brown v. Bellows, 4 Pick. 179, 189; Palmer v. Clark, 106 Mass. 373, 389; Haley v. Bellamy, 137 Mass. 357, 359; Fox v. Hazelton, 10 Pick. 275; Strong v. Strong, 9 Cush. 569; Benj. Sales (6th Am. Ed.) § 88, note 3.

The defendant objects that there was no real appraisal, and that he did not offer the stock for appraisal. The records of the plaintiff show that at a directors' meeting, at which were present 16 directors, it was voted that the defendant's stock be appraised at $220 per share, and taken for the use of the corporation. The directors were not bound to give the defendant notice or a hearing (Palmer v. Clark, supra); and we must assume that they gave the matter such attention as, in their opinion, was necessary, and that the appraisal correctly expresses their judgment, after taking into account such matters as they thought should be considered. There is nothing to show that they were so mistaken about the facts that what they did was in no fair sense an appraisal of this stock, but of something else. It is said that they omitted the good will. If so, it was, at most, an error of judgment, which would not invalidate the appraisal. It was not a condition precedent to the appraisal that the defendant should offer the stock. The agreement of defendant's testator was, in substance, that the stock should be appraised by the directors, and that it might be taken at the appraisal by them if they so elected; and that has been done. The offer was for the purpose of fixing a time from which the 10 days should begin to run at whose expiration the stockholder could dispose of his stock if the directors had not elected to take it. If the directors appraised the stock, and voted to take it at the appraisal, an offer was unnecessary.

Lastly, the defendant contends that the plaintiff is not entitled to specific performance, because the stock was greatly undervalued, and because the plaintiff has a remedy at law. It is evident that to remit the plaintiff to an action at law for damages would defeat the very purpose of the contract, and would not, we think, furnish an adequate remedy. No stock in the plaintiff company has ever been sold in the market, and all the shares that have been transferred have been transferred to the plaintiff, and disposed of by the directors in the manner provided. About three-fourths of the stock of the original subscribers has been thus transferred. There is no evidence that the testator ever objected to this mode of dealing with it; and we see no good reason why the plaintiff should be obliged to accept damages for which it might be difficult to lay down a clear rule, instead of performance. Railroad Corp. v. Babcock, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 346; Cushman v. Manufacturing Co., 76 N. Y. 365. The case would perhaps stand differently if the shares were bought and sold in the market like most stocks. Adam v. Messenger, 147 Mass. 185, 17 N. E. 491. The defendant does not charge the directors with any fraud in the appraisal. He expressly disclaims that. It is well settled that where one agrees that another may fix the price for certain property, or the sum to be paid for material or services, the decision of the party selected cannot be impeached by showing that he has committed an error of judgment, or failed to avail himself of all the information which he might have obtained, or has valued the property too high or too low. Palmer v. Clark, supra; Flint v. Gibson, 106 Mass. 391; Robbins v. Clark, 129 Mass. 145; Railroad Co. v. March, 114 U. S. 549, 5 Sup. Ct. 1035; Stevenson v. Watson, 4 C. P. Div. 148; Sharpe v. Railway Co., 8 Ch. App. 597; Richards v. May, 10 Q. B. Div. 400; Tullis v. Jackson [1892] 3 Ch. Div. 441; Ranger v. Railway Co., 5 H. L. Cas. 72. The evidence that was offered by the defendant relating to the value of the stock was therefore rightly excluded. It is equally well settled that specific performance of an agreement to convey will not be refused merely because the price is inadequate or excessive. The difference must be so great as to lead to a reasonable conclusion of fraud, mistake, or concealment in the nature of fraud, and to render it plainly inequitable and against conscience that the contract should be enforced. Chute v. Quincy, 156 Mass. 189, 30 N. E. 550; Lee v. Kirby, 104 Mass. 420; Park v. Johnson, 4 Allen, 259; Railroad Co. v. Babcock, 6 Metc. (Mass.) 346, 352; Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. 271; Underhill v. Van Cortlandt, 2 Johns. Ch. 339; Belchier v. Reynolds, 2 Keny. pt. 2, p. 87; Weekes v. Gallard, 21 Law T. (N. S.) 655; Fry, Spec. Perf. (3d Am. Ed.) § 424, note 1. It is to be observed that this is a suit directly between the company and a stockholder, to enforce a contract made with the company by the latter, and that the rights of third parties are not involved. Many of the cases cited and relied upon by the defendant are cases where the rights of third parties are involved, and therefore inapplicable to this.

The result is that the plaintiff is entitled to a decree compelling the defendant to convey the shares upon payment by it of the amount of the appraisal, with interest, and enjoining him from prosecuting the action at law. Ordered accordingly.

CONGER et al. v. NEW YORK, W. S. & B. R. CO.

Court of Appeals of New York, Second Division. March 18, 1890.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, second department.

Action by Clarence R. Conger and another against the New York, West Shore & Buffalo Railroad Company. A judgment in favor of defendant, entered upon the decision of the special term, was affirmed at the general term, and plaintiff again appeals.

Clarence R. Conger, for appellants. Calvin Frost, for respondent.

HAIGHT, J. This action was brought to compel a specific performance of a contract. The Jersey City & Albany Railway Company was incorporated for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from Fort Montgomery, in the county of Orange, to a point on the Hudson river opposite to the city of New York. As such incorporation it entered into a written agreement with one Catherine A. Hedges, the plaintiffs' grantor, in and by the terms of which she gave to the company a right of way across her premises in Rockland county upon certain conditions, one of which was that the company should locate a station in the gorge commonly known as the "Long Clove," and stop thereat five express trains each way daily. Subsequently the Jersey City & Albany Railway Company was consolidated with the North River Railway Company, under the name of the North River Railroad Company, and that company was consolidated with the defendant, which was incorporated for the purpose of constructing and operating a railroad from the New Jersey state line, through the state of New York, to the city of Buffalo. The defendant has entered upon the lands of the said Catherine A. Hedges, and constructed its road-bed across the same, but it has not constructed any station thereon in the Long Clove gorge, or stopped any of its express trains thereat. The trial court has found as facts that a suitable station for the accommodation of passengers, and the receipt and delivery of freight, at the Long Clove gorge, could be built by the defendant only at a considerable expense, because of the nature of the ground at that point; that the place where the plaintiffs demand that the station be located is near the mouth of a long tunnel, and at a sharp curve in the defendant's railroad, upon the side of a steep mountain approached by steep grades in both directions; that it is sparsely settled.

and if a station were established there it would be of no use to the public; that very little, if any, benefit would result to the plaintiffs, by the erection of a station, or the stoppage of the trains thereat; that the public convenience would not be promoted, but the public travel would be delayed; and, as a conclusion of law, that a specific enforcement of the agreement would work hardship and injustice to the defendant, and such enforcement will not subserve the ends of justice; that specific performance should be denied, and the plaintiffs left to their action for damages for a breach of the contract. The evidence sustains the findings of the trial court, which have been affirmed by the general term. The questions for our consideration are therefore narrowed to a determination as to whether the conclusions of law reached are justified under the findings of fact.

It has been the well-settled doctrine of this court that the specific performance of a contract is discretionary with the court, and that performance will not be decreed where it will result in great hardship and injustice to one party, without any consideration, gain, or utility to the other, or in a case where the public interest would be prejudiced thereby. Clarke v. Railroad Co., 18 Barb. 350; Trustees v. Thacher, 87 N. Y. 311-317; Murdfeldt v. Railway Co., 102 N. Y. 703, 7 N. E. Rep. 404; Day v. Hunt, 112 N. Y. 191-195, 19 N. E. Rep. 414.

As we have seen, the Long Clove gorge is located upon the side of a steep mountain, in a sparsely settled district, and is approached by a steep grade, and that a passenger station, with an approach thereat, could be constructed only at a considerable expense. These are reasons worthy of consideration, but, if there were no others, the trial court might not have deemed them sufficient to refuse specific performance. But they are followed by another, which gives additional force and weight, and that is that the public travel will be delayed by the stoppage of the trains, and that the public convenience will not be promoted. The defendant is a corporation organized under the laws of the state, and is a common carrier of passengers and freight. Its duties are largely of a public nature, and it is bound to so run its trains and operate its road as to promote the public interest and convenience, and, in view of the fact that but little if any benefit would result to the plaintiffs by the erection of a station and the stoppage of trains thereat, as found by the trial court, it appears to us that that court properly refused to decree specific performance and remanded the plaintiffs to their action for damages. The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur, except BROWN, J., not sitting.

ROSS et al. v. PARKS.

Supreme Court of Alabama. Nov. 18, 1890.

Appeal from chancery court, Jackson county; Thomas Cobbs, Chancellor.

Bill to enforce specific performance of a contract to convey land. The title to the land in controversy was in one Jeremiah French. On the 15th day of December, 1887, French agreed, in writing, to convey the land to the complainant, Parks, if Parks would pay him $200 by December 15, 1888. At the execution of this option, 50 cents was paid, and expressed in the contract as the consideration. This contract to sell, or option, was signed by French and his wife, but was not signed by Parks. It was recorded in the probate office, and defendants, Ross and McClendon, had actual notice of its execution. After the execution of this contract, French moved to Texas. Subsequently, Ross and McClendon sent an agent out to Texas where French was, and through said agent offered French $300 for the land in controversy, and thereby, on November 21, 1888, procured a deed from French and his wife, conveying to Ross and McClendon the legal title to the land in controversy. Before the expiration of his option, under the contract of French, Parks paid French the $200 purchase money as therein agreed, and received a deed to said lands from said French and his wife, which was executed on and bore the date of 23d of November, 1888. On December 21, 1888, the said Ross and McClendon brought an action of ejectment against Parks to recover the possession of the land in controversy, of which Parks was in possession. Thereupon, on January 29, 1889, Parks filed the bill in this case against said Ross and McClendon, and prayed to have the ejectment suit enjoined; the deed made by French and wife to Ross and McClendon canceled; and to have Ross and McClendon specifically perform the contract entered into by French and wife,—making to the complainant a good and perfect title to the land in controversy. On a final hearing upon the pleadings and proof, the chancellor granted the relief prayed, and the defendants now appeal, and assign this decree as error.

J. E. Brown and Watts & Son, for appellants. L. W. Days and D. D. Shelby, for appellee.

COLEMAN, J. A general rule governing cases of specific performance is that the contract must be mutual, and that either party is entitled to the equitable remedy of a specific performance. Exceptions to this general rule are well established, and one class of contracts to which the exceptions may be applied are those which are unilateral in form. Pom. Cont. §§ 167, 168. The exception as to unilateral contracts has been fully recognized and adopted in this state. The case of Moses v. McClain, 82 Ala. 370, 2 South. 741, was for a specific performance of the following contract: "For and in consideration of the sum of one dollar in hand paid, I hereby give A. J. Moses an option on my lands and improvements situated near Sheffield, and known as my 'House Place,' containing one hundred and twenty acres, more or less, for the sum of eight thousand dollars. * * * This option good for 2 days. [Signed] J. W. McClain." It was contended that Moses, the covenantee, bound himself by no writing, and not having bound himself, he could not in this proceeding hold McClain bound; that the contract not being mutually binding, chancery will not compel its specific performance. The court declared as follows: "Mutuality is frequently said to be one of the conditions of a rightful suit for specific performance. The authorities, however, do not carry it to the length contended for. Where the contract is fair, just, and reasonable in all its parts, and the party sought to be charged has so bound himself as to meet the requirements of the statute of frauds, the election of the other contracting party to treat the contract as binding, and to enforce it, meets all the requirements of the rule," citing Wilks v. Railroad Co., 79 Ala. 180; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1405, and notes; Wat. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 201; Cherry v. Smith, 39 Am. Dec. 150. The case of Johnston v. Trippe (C. C.) 33 Fed. 530, is an authority directly on the point in question, the contract being almost identical in its provisions. The different authorities are very generally quoted and commented on, and the conclusion the same as held by this court. The evidence fails to show that there was such forcible entry and unlawful detainer as to deprive complainant of his right to file a bill to remove a cloud from title, but the equity of the bill does not depend upon that principle. "The complainants, holding the equitable title, bring their bill to compel a conveyance of the legal title by those who hold it in trust for them. In such a case, the jurisdiction in no wise depends upon possession." Gray v. Jones (C. C.) 14 Fed. 83; Shipman v. Furniss, 69 Ala. 562.

The doctrine is well settled that when the vendor, after entering into a contract of sale, conveys the land to a third person, who has knowledge or notice of the prior agreement, such grantee takes the land impressed with the trust in favor of the original vendee, and holds it as trustee for such vendee, and can be compelled, at the suit of the vendee, to specifically perform the agreement by conveying the land in the same manner, and to the same extent, as the vendor would have been liable to do had he not transferred the legal title. Pom. Cont. § 465, and note. The same rule is declared in Dickinson v. Any, 25 Ala. 424; Meyer v. Mitchell, 75 Ala. 475. It may be stated as a sound principle of law, if an owner of land in writing gives another an option on land, for a valuable consideration, whether adequate or not, agreeing to sell it to him at a fixed price, if accepted within a specified time, it is binding upon the owner, and upon those who purchase from the owner with a knowledge of such agreement. Moses v. McClain, 82 Ala. 370, 2 South. 741; 33 Fed. 530, supra; Maull v. Vaughn, 45 Ala. 134, and authorities. Under such circumstances, the fixed time is a material part of the contract, and when supported by a valuable consideration, the owner of the land cannot revoke the offer before the time has expired within which the offer may be accepted. We do not declare that if no specified, definite time was fixed by the parties, and the contract of offer was not supported by a valuable consideration, such an offer could not be revoked. We express no opinion upon this question. Johnston v. Trippe (C. C.) 33 Fed. supra; Wilks v. Railway Co., 79 Ala. 185; Falls v. Gaither, 9 Port. 617; Cherry v. Smith, 3 Humph. 19; 1 Story, Cont. § 496; 1 Pars. Cont. *481, bottom p. 511; Bish. Cont. § 325; Benj. Sales. § 42.

We find no error in the decree of the chancellor. Affirmed.

JOHNSTON v. TRIPPE.¹

Circuit Court, N. D. Georgia. December 19, 1887.

in equity. Bill for specific performance by complainant J. L. Johnston against R. B. Trippe, defendant. On demurrer.

G. A. Howell, for complainant.
Hopkins & Glenn, for defendant.

NEWMAN, J. This is a bill filed by complainant against defendant to enforce the specific performance of a certain conditional or optional contract for the sale of land. The bill, after stating some preliminary correspondence and negotiation between complainant and defendant, relative to the sale of certain land in White county, Georgia, by the latter to the former, alleges that in January, 1887, defendant prepared and executed the following written instrument:

"Georgia, Fulton County. This agreement witnesseth, that the undersigned R. B. Trippe, of said state and county, agrees that if said J. Lamb Johnston, of Charleston, S. C., or any one for him, pays or causes to be paid to the said R. B. Trippe, one thousand dollars, on or before January 20, 1888, that the said R. B. Trippe, for himself, his heirs and assigns, covenants and agrees that he will make to the said Johnston good and sufficient title to lots of land numbers 9 and 25, in 3d district, White county, said state. And it is further agreed that if a draft for $50.00 this day drawn by R. B. Trippe, with this option bond attached, is paid at sight, then said R. B. Trippe will make said title, if nine hundred and fifty dollars is paid him on or before January 20, 1888; if said sums of money are not paid within the time mentioned, that is, $50.00 on sight draft and $950.00 within twelve months from this date, then this bond to be null and void; and it is understood that if the balance of one thousand dollars (i. e., $950.00) is not paid by January 20, 1888, the $50.00 paid on sight draft is forfeited to said R. B. Trippe, and that this option bond is null and void, otherwise of full force and effect.

"Witness my hand and seal, this January 20, 1887.

"[Signed]

R. B. Trippe.

"Witness:

"[Signed] J. H. Curtright, M. L. Cohen."

This instrument was sent, about the time of its execution, by defendant to complainant by mail to his home in Charleston, South Carolina, and received by complainant. Defendant also drew on complainant a sight draft for $50, which was sent, with the foregoing written instrument, to Charleston. His draft was honored and paid at once by complainant, and defendant received the $50. Some time after this, defendant wrote to complainant, saying he had an offer of $1,500 for the land, and offering, if complainant would release him from his obligation, to return the $50 paid him, and to pay complainant $50 in addition, if the other sale was made. In the same letter defendant stated that the bond sent by him to complainant was not legally binding anyway. Complainant promptly replied, both by wire and letter, to defendant, refusing to release him from his obligation to convey the land in pursuance of the before stated contract. In the same letter in which the complainant refused to release defendant, he instructed defendant to submit his deeds to complainant's attorney, and that, upon their approval by him, complainant would pay the balance, $950. This defendant failed and refused to do, but wrote complainant that he declined to furnish the titles or convey the land in accordance with his contract; and in the same letter inclosed a check payable to his, defendant's, order, and indorsed by him in blank, which he tendered as a repayment of the $50. This letter was received by complainant in Nacoochee, Georgia, on the night of March 17, 1887. On the next day, March 18th, complainant went to Atlanta, the home of defendant, sought an interview with him, and immediately returned to him the $50 check which he had received from him; stating to defendant that he refused to receive it; and defendant now has the check in his possession. Complainant at the same time tendered to defendant $950 in cash, and demanded that defendant make complainant a good and sufficient title to the land in controversy, which tender defendant refused, and refused to convey, and repeatedly refused to carry out his contract with complainant. A tender is made in the bill of $950; and the prayer is for a decree for specific performance against defendant, with an alternative prayer for damages, in the event specific performance cannot be obtained. An amendment has been filed to this bill, which amendment alleges that the property described in the bill, bargained by defendant to complainant, is now worth the sum of $3,000, and also that the damages to complainant resulting from such refusal and the failure of the defendant to perform his contract, exceed $3,000. To this bill a demurrer has been filed, which demurrer is on two grounds: First, that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject-matter in the bill stated; and, second, that the complainant has not shown a right to any relief against defendant.

The first ground is based upon the fact that the amount in controversy, as shown by the original bill, is not sufficient to give this court jurisdiction; the bill having been filed since the passage of the act of March

3, 1887. This objection seems to be obviated by the amendment since filed, fixing the value of the land at $3,000 and the damages at not less than that sum. There was very little discussion upon this point, in the argument, and it was not strongly urged. The serious and main question in the case arises under the second ground of the demurrer, that the complainant has not shown a right to any relief against defendant. The question made is that this contract between defendant and complainant lacks the element of mutuality, which is necessary to authorize a court of equity to decree a specific performance. That is to say, that, as complainant was not compelled by his contract to take the land and pay defendant the remainder of the purchase money, defendant could not be required to carry out the agreement. There is a general rule of law, undoubtedly, that this element of mutuality must exist to justify enforcement of specific performance. Fry, Spec. Perf. § 286; Wat. Spec. Perf. § 196. It is also true that there are clear exceptions to this rule. In Fry on specific performance it is stated in section 291, as follows: "The contract may be of such a nature as to give a right to the performance to the one party which it does not give to the other; as, for instance, where a lessor covenants to renew upon the request of his lessee, or where the agreement is in the nature of an undertaking. But the more accurate view of such cases as the first,—perhaps of all that could be treated as wanting mutuality,—seems to be that they are conditional contracts; and when the condition has been made absolute, as, for instance, in the case above stated, by a request to renew, they would seem to be mutual, and capable of enforcement by either party alike."

In Wat. Spec. Perf. § 200, in discussing the matter of exceptions to this general rule, the author says: "But it is well settled that an optional agreement to convey, or to renew a lease, without any covenant or obligation to purchase or accept, and without any mutuality of remedy, will be enforced in equity if it is made upon proper consideration, or forms part of a lease or other contract between the parties that may be the true consideration for it, though such an agreement can perhaps scarcely be called an exception; for, being in fact a conditional contract, when the condition has been made absolute by a compliance with its terms, the contract becomes mutual, and capable of enforcement by either party. A contract for the sale of real estate, at the option of the vendee only, upon election and notice, may not only be specifically enforced, but the refusal of the vendor to accept the purchase money will not destroy the mutuality, though the vendee could thereupon withdraw his election."

The decisions upon this question have been numerous, and it has been discussed ably and at length by many courts of high authority. The case very generally referred to and relied upon to sustain the rule requiring that a contract must be mutually binding to justify its enforcement, is the decision of Lord Redesdale in the case of Lawenson v. Butler, 1 Schoales & L. 13. A careful examination of that case and the argument and reasoning of the Lord Chancellor will show that the decision was put mainly upon the ground that where parties enter into an agreement, each supposing the other to be bound thereby, and it transpires that one was not bound, such party could not have specific performance of the contract by the other. He says, in concluding the opinion, (page 21:) "No man signs an agreement but under a supposition that the other party is bound, as well as himself; and therefore, if the other party is not bound, he signs it under a mistake. That mistake might be a ground for relief in equity, but is surely not a ground for specific performance. Under these circumstances, the impression upon my mind is that I must dismiss the bill. This agreement was signed in mistake. It is manifest that Butler could not have executed a lease in compliance with it; and as he could not, it is manifest that this is not the agreement he meant to sign."

From a note to this case, (page 21,) it would seem that the Lord Chancellor was not himself entirely satisfied with the decision, as he proposed that the case lie over until the next day to look into the cases cited, when plaintiff's counsel stated that they were content with a dismissal of the bill without costs, and it was ordered accordingly. These comments upon and citations from this much-quoted case, are not made to question the existence of the general rule alluded to, but to show that its application, even in its origin, was a matter of difficulty, and its extent uncertain.

Counsel for defendant relied in argument here mainly on the cases of Marble Co. v. Ripley, 10 Wall. 339; Tyson v. Watts, 1 Md. Ch. 1; Duvall v. Meyers, 2 Md. Ch. 401; and Peacock v. Deweese, 73 Ga. 570. In the case of Marble Co. v. Ripley, other questions were made growing out of complex and intricate partnership relations; but one reason why specific performance should not be decreed was want of mutuality. After stating this as a reason why specific performance should be refused in that case, the court proceeds to give what is termed a "still more satisfactory reason for withholding a decree for specific performance." But want of mutuality was undoubtedly recognized as applicable to that case. In the later case of Butler v. Thomson, 92 U. S. 412, the court, in the opinion, uses the following language: "There may be an offer to sell subject to acceptance, which would bind the party offering, and not the other party until acceptance. The same may be said of an optional purchase upon a sufficient consideration." The court then alludes to a class of cases under the statute of frauds where one party signed a contract and the other did not. The language as quoted seems to me to indicate a recognition by the court of offers to sell subject to acceptance, and optional purchases upon sufficient consideration, as exceptions to this general rule requiring mutuality of obligation in the contract. It would be far from clear that Marble Co. v. Ripley, even standing alone, should be regarded as controlling in this case; but the language used in the later case of Butler v. Thomson shows clearly, I think, that that court would not so regard it. The two cases from the Maryland Chancery Decisions referred to may be disposed of with the remark that in neither case cited were the facts at all like the facts that are presented in the case now before this court. In the case of Peacock v. Deweese, the supreme court of Georgia held that the contract sought to be enforced in that case lacked the element of mutuality, and stated that as one reason why specific performance would not be decreed. The court also stated, however, that "the agreement is gratuitous, and entirely voluntary on the part of the defendant in error. A court of equity never decrees a specific performance of a voluntary or gratuitous contract. Code, § 3189. Any fact showing the contract to be unjust or unfair or against good conscience, justifies the court in refusing to decree a specific performance. Code, § 3190." The undertaking of the two Deweeses in that case was entirely without consideration to them. Peacock agreed to make such tests of the land for the discovery of minerals as were "satisfactory to himself." The two Deweeses had their land tied up by this option for six months without receiving any remuneration therefor, and it was evidently the view of the court that the agreement by Peacock to make such tests as were "satisfactory to himself" was not such a consideration as would support the contract. This may be gathered, I think, from the use of the language "voluntary or gratuitous contract." This, then, was an optional agreement to sell, wholly without consideration.

I have thus far given attention principally to the authorities relied upon by the eminent counsel for defendant in this case, without referring to the long line of decisions which, it seems, hold that contracts such as the one before the court will be enforced. In the case of Fowle v. Freeman, 9 Ves. 351, it was held that an agreement in writing for the sale of an estate was binding if signed only by the vendor, and followed by direction to his attorney to prepare a proper agreement for both parties to sign. In the case of Ormond v. Anderson, 2 Ball & B. 363, where the court dismissed the bill upon another ground, the following language was used in the opinion: "An objection has been made to the execution of this agreement, on the ground that it has not been signed by the plaintiff, and that the defendant could not have enforced it against the plaintiff. I am very well aware that a doubt has been entertained by a judge in this court, of very high authority, [referring to Lord Redesdale, in Lawenson v. Butler,] whether courts of equity would specifically execute an agreement where one party only was bound. There exists no provision in the statute of frauds to prevent the execution of such an agreement; and Sir James Mansfield, who certainly had great experience in courts of equity, lays it down in the case of Allen v. Bennet, [3 Taunt. 169,] that a contract signed by one party would be enforced in equity against that party, and that such was the daily practice of that court."

He proceeds to say that "in a case where the court finds a party who has been and is endeavoring to obtain some undue advantage, or has been playing what is called 'fast and loose,' the court would not assist him." In the case of Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484, the chancellor, after discussing, among other cases, those I have just cited, concludes thus: "I have thought, and often intimated, that the weight of argument was in favor of the construction that the agreement concerning lands, to be enforced in equity, should be mutually binding; and that the one party ought not to be at liberty to enforce, at his pleasure, an agreement which the other was not entitled to claim. It appears to be settled (Hawkins v. Holmes, 1 P. Wms. 770) that though the plaintiff has signed the agreement he never can enforce it against the party who has not signed it. The remedy, therefore, in such cases is not mutual. But, notwithstanding this objection, it appears from the review of the cases that the point is too well settled to be now questioned."

In a later case in New York—In re Hunter, 1 Edw. Ch. 1—the vice-chancellor uses the following language: "In the next place, it is said the covenant to sell is not mutual, the lessee not being bound to purchase, and that, as this is a 'one-sided' agreement, the court will not decree a specific performance. The cases of Parkhurst v. Cortlandt, 1 Johns. Ch. 282, and Benedict v. Lynch, Id. 370, have been referred to as establishing this point. Chancellor Kent there intimated that such was the rule; but in a subsequent case in the court of errors—Clason v. Bailey, 14 Johns. 484—he had occasion to review that opinion, which he found to be erroneous, and admits that the point is too well settled the other way to be questioned. The court may, therefore, in a proper case, where there is a covenant on one side, and no mutuality, decree a performance. Besides, in a case like the present, it may be peculiarly proper. The rent may have been fixed at $500 as an inducement to the power of purchasing the property. This is a fair inference."

ciple is that where the contract is incapable of being enforced against one party, that party is equally incapable of enforcing it against the other. But the principle does not apply where the contract, by its terms, gives the one party a right to the performance, which it does not give to the other party." And in the case of Howralty v. Warren, 18 N. J. Eq. 124, after stating the general rule as the existence of mutuality, and that unilateral or optional contracts are not favored in equity, the court proceeds: "But modern authorities have narrowed this doctrine down to cases in which there is no other consideration. And it is now well settled that an optional agreement to convey, or renew a lease, without any covenant or obligation to purchase or accept, and without any mutuality of remedy, will be enforced in equity, if it is made upon proper consideration, or forms part of a lease or other contract between the parties, that may be the true consideration for it."

A number of cases are then cited by the court to sustain this view, among them the cases I have just referred to. The language last quoted seems to me to be a very clear statement of the correct rule in this matter. In Smith's Appeal, 69 Pa. 474, the matter before the court being an optional contract for the sale of land, it was held that the contract would be enforced. In the case of Rogers v. Saunders, 16 Me. 92, 33 Amer. Dec. 637, the court cites the decision of Chancellor Kent in Clason v. Bailey, and states that this appears to be now the generally received doctrine. In Vassault v. Edwards, 43 Cal. 458, it is held that: "A proposal to sell real estate, reduced to writing and signed by the vendor alone, in which he recites that he has sold to the vendee the land for a price named, and has received a certain sum as a deposit, as part payment, which the vendor was to refund if the title was rejected or bad, the sale to be subject to a search of and approval of title, the vendee to have twenty days for the examination of the title, is a valid contract of sale entered into between the parties."

To the same effect is the case of Schroeder v. Gemeinder, 10 Nev. 355. The court, after stating that there are many exceptions to the rule in the cases, as to mutuality, says: "We think it may now be considered as well settled by all, or nearly all, of the modern authorities, that a court of equity, in actions for the specific performance of optional contracts and covenants to lease or convey land, will enforce the covenant, although the remedy is not mutual, provided it is shown to have been made upon a fair consideration, or where it forms part of a contract, lease, or agreement, which may be the true consideration for it."

Entering into the discussion of this question, in many of the cases, is that part of the statute of frauds providing that contracts for the sale of land must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged thereby, or some person by him lawfully authorized. (This law as codified in Georgia, is in section 1950, Code 1882.) It is held in some of these cases that the question should be controlled by the language of the statute just quoted; and that, as the contract need be signed by only one party, viz., the party to be charged thereby, it is only necessary that he should be bound. It seems to me, however, that the question of mutuality is one distinct and apart from any question that might arise under the statute of frauds. It is a matter separate from, if not over and above it, and I have considered it in that view. I think it is settled by the above authorities, and others that might be cited, that where an owner of land gives another, for a sufficient consideration, an option or privilege to purchase the land within a given time, in writing, with full knowledge of the fact that he is bound and the other party is not, it is such a contract as will be enforced in equity at the instance of the party holding the option. Does such a contract indeed lack mutuality? The seller, for fair consideration, agrees to give the proposed purchaser a certain fixed time in which to make the contract mutual, by acceptance of the offer to sell. If he accepts within the specified time, both parties are fully bound.

Now, as to this case. Here, for a reasonable consideration, the sum of $50, the defendant agrees that the complainant shall have the privilege of buying his land within a year; that is, the defendant sells to him for $50 the privilege of purchasing the land within a year. That contract, the sale by defendant to complainant of the privilege of purchasing, is executed by the payment by complainant of the sum agreed upon. The remainder of the contract is conditional upon the complainant's accepting within a year the continuing offer of the defendant to sell him the land. I see no reason why a court of equity should not enforce such a contract. On the contrary, it seems to me it would be inequitable to refuse its enforcement. I am clear, therefore, that this case does not come within the class where lack of mutuality will prevent enforcement of the contract, and that it does come within a well-recognized exception to that rule, of optional sales upon fair consideration. This case is considered now, of course, upon the facts as stated in the bill. How it may be affected by what the defendant can hereafter show must be a matter for future consideration. My conclusion is that the demurrer must be overruled on both grounds, and it will be ordered accordingly.

(30 Atl. 1061, 53 N. J. Eq. 15.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Jan. 21, 1895.

Bill by Lawrence O'Connor against Peter Tyrrell and others for specific performance of a contract to convey land. On motion to dismiss bill. Motion denied.

Charles L. Corbin, for the motion. John Garrick, opposed.

McGILL, Ch. The motion is made in virtue of the 213th rule, and takes the place of a demurrer to the bill. The case presented by the bill is this: James Tyrrell, for himself, and as attorney in fact for others, who are cotenants with him of certain land in the city of Bayonne, on the 20th of April, 1894, agreed to sell that land to the complainant for $7,250, of which $250 was to be paid upon the execution of the agreement of sale, and the balance was to be paid upon the delivery of the deed, on the 21st of the following May,—$5,000 in cash, and the remainder by assumption of the payment of a mortgage of $2,000, by which the property was incumbered. Upon examination of the title, it was discovered that the power of attorney under which James Tyrrell assumed to act for his cotenants, who lived in Ireland, though duly executed, was defectively acknowledged by some of the cotenants. Therefore, it was agreed that, instead of having the power of attorney reacknowledged, the deed should be directly executed by all owners of the property, and be sent to Ireland for that purpose. As more time would be required in such execution than the terms of the contract of sale would admit of, a new agreement was entered into on the 8th of May, by which the former contract was annulled, and the 26th of June was fixed for the delivery of the deed, and the full consummation of the transaction. The latter agreement contains this stipulation. "Said party of the second part [O'Connor] shall have possession of said premises on the 14th day of May, 1894; and, in the event of the failure of said parties of the first part to deliver the deed at the time and in the manner hereinafter referred to, the said parties of the first part hereby agree to repay to said party of the second part the said sum of $250, heretofore paid as part of the consideration money, and, in addition thereto, such sum, not exceeding $1,250, as said party of the second part shall have paid upon the examination or guaranty of the title to said premises, or in the repair, improvement, or furnishing of the building, or ground, or the survey thereof, or shall have in any way incurred or expended in the preparation for the purchase of and taking of title to said premises, not exceeding the said sum of $1,250; such payment to be accepted by said party of the second part as liquidated damages for any breach of this agreement by the said parties of the first part; and, in event of the failure of said parties of the first part so to deliver said deed at the time herein stated, said party of the second part hereby agrees to surrender possession of said premises, within fifteen days from June 26th, 1894, to James Tyrrell, one of said parties of the first part hereto. And said party of the second part shall not, under any circumstances, be held to be liable for any rental for the occupancy of said premises." In pursuance of this agreement, the complainant paid $250 in cash, broke up his home in the city of New York, and moved to the premises contracted to be conveyed to him, upon which he made repairs which have cost him nearly $2,000. On the 26th of June, 1894, he duly tendered the $5,000 he was then to pay, and demanded a deed, in accordance with the terms of the agreement. To which tender and demand, James Tyrrell replied that, as attorney in fact, he was unable to deliver the deed, and that he desired a statement of the complainant's expenditures, contemplated by the clause of the contract which has been quoted, in order to ascertain and pay the sum agreed upon as liquidated damages, and also that he desired to fix a day, within the terms of the contract, upon which the complainant would surrender to him possession of the land.

The only question presented in the argument was whether this court will compel a conveyance to the complainant, notwithstanding the provision for the payment of liquidated damages upon the breach of the contract; the contention in behalf of the defendants being that by the agreement the parties have expressly stipulated the measure of the damages which will result from the defendants' nonperformance of the agreement, and therefore equity will leave the complainant to the recovery of those damages, on the ground that an appeal to equity is unnecessary, since the legal relief, by agreement, has been rendered adequate.

For the breach of contracts the common law gives a single remedy. It requires the wrongdoer to pay a sum of money as compensation. When the contract broken is an obligation to pay money, that remedy amounts to specific performance. But there are many contracts, for the breach of which such a remedy is inadequate; and that inadequacy has given rise to the jurisdiction of chancery to enforce specific performance of contracts, requiring the performance or omission of the very acts agreed upon. The remedy is thus made identical with the right withheld, and the defendant is thereby deprived of the option, which the legal remedy practically gives him, to disregard the actual obligation by which he is bound, and pay a sum of money in the place thereof. Pom. Spec. Perf. Cont. § 3. The inadequacy of the legal remedy, by compensation in damages, is generally regarded as conspicuous in cases of agreements for the sale and purchase of real estate, each parcel of which differs in some respects from others.

Such property is usually bought because it possesses some feature which attracts by personal gratification, and determines the purchaser to make some particular use of it. The present case is not an exception to this usual condition. The description of the property discloses its boundary upon the shore of the Newark Bay, with its expanse of water, and the occupancy of it by the complainant indicates that he has determined to make it his residence, and his expenditures upon it give evidence of his appreciation of its situation and surroundings. It is thus made plain that compensation in damages will not be the full measure of relief which a breach of the contract by the defendants, in justice, demands. This situation primarily leads to a critical examination of the contract and the meaning of its clause which I have quoted, to ascertain the correctness of the defendants' assumption that a stipulated sum has been fixed as damages to be had for the mere non-performance of the contract by the defendants. That which was contracted for was the purchase and sale of land. A portion of the purchase money was to be paid at once, and the purchaser was to go into possession pending the execution and delivery of the deed, when the remainder of the purchase money was to be paid. It was in contemplation that he would proceed to repair, improve, and furnish the property. In the event of the defendants' failure to deliver the deed, he was to surrender the possession of the land to their agent; receive back the purchase money paid, together with his expenditures, not exceeding $1,250. That repayment and surrender were expressly made dependent upon the failure of the defendants to deliver the deed. In this arrangement, which contemplated repayment upon the happening of the one event,—failure to deliver the deed,—was interpolated the parenthetical clause, that such repayment was to be accepted by the complainant as liquidated damages for "any breach" of the contract by the defendants. As the repayment was limited to a single event, and made payable upon the happening of that event only, the words "any breach," in the parenthetical clause, could not have a broader significance than failure to deliver the deed, for the complainant was bound to accept the repayment only in that event. It is to be noted that, upon the defendants' failure to deliver the deed, the complainant is to have merely pecuniary reimbursement, and not compensatory damages. He is to have nothing for his disappointment, trouble, and discomfort. The inference from a submission to such inadequate damages is, I think, that a stronger meaning was intended to be given to the word "failure" than mere arbitrary refusal of the defendants to deliver the deed. "Failure" is the result of action which predicates earnest effort, and not mere inaction and refusal to do. It is in this sense, I think, that the word was used in this contract. It demanded from the defendants a bona fide effort to deliver the complainant a deed which would vest in him the title to the property. It was failure after such effort that was to constitute the breach for which reimbursement was to be accepted as satisfaction. It is obvious that the contract was not an alternative one, to convey or pay damages. Damages were to be paid upon a "breach" of the contract, which primarily required an honest effort to perform, and failure, and do not become a factor in the consideration of remedies until that precedent condition is performed. The professed inability of James Tyrrell to deliver the deed required does not prove the inability of him and his cotenants to carry out the contract upon their part. The case presented, then, is this: A certain sum is agreed upon as satisfaction to the complainant, if bona fide effort to make him title fails. So far as it appears by the bill, the defendants can make that title, and the aid of this court is invoked to compel them to do so. I think that, as the facts now appear, the complainant is clearly entitled to a decree, and that the case is not brought within the controversy referred to in Crane v. Peer, 43 N. J. Eq. 557, 4 Atl. 72, or affected by the intimation of Chancellor Halsted in St. Mary's Church v. Stockton, 8 N. J. Eq. 520, as the defendants' proposition suggests. The motion will be denied, with costs.

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Dec. 22, 1894.

Appeal from circuit court, Botetourt county.

Bill by one Sharkey and others against one Grubb and others. Decree for complainants, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Benj. Haden and John H. Lewis, for appellants. J. H. H. Figgatt and C. M. Lunsford, for appellees.

LEWIS, P. This was a suit for specific performance. In April, 1887, the appellees conveyed to the appellants a tract of land containing about 19 acres, adjoining the lands of the Lynchburg Iron Company, situate in Botetourt county. Below and contiguous to this land is a grazing farm owned by the appellees, which, at the time of the conveyance to the appellants, was mainly, if not solely, watered by a stream flowing through both tracts. The land was purchased by the appellants for the purpose of erecting and operating thereon an ore washer. It was accordingly covenanted in the deed of conveyance that if the said stream should be made continuously muddy by the proposed ore washing, so as to render the water therein unfit for stock, the appellants would lay a $\frac{3}{4}$ -inch pipe from a certain spring branch above, so as to conduct a supply of clear water over the land to a designated point on the appellees' farm, and there erect a trough for the use of stock. The bill, which was filed in October, 1889, after setting out substantially the foregoing facts, alleges that this covenant has not been observed by the defendants (the appellants here); that they have not laid a pipe and erected a trough, as they covenanted to do, notwithstanding the water in the said stream has been continually muddy and unfit for stock, in consequence of washing ores on the land, since the date of the conveyance, and although they have often been requested so to do. The bill also states that the complainants have been compelled, in consequence of the defendants' default, to drive their stock a considerable distance to water, whereby they have been greatly inconvenienced and damaged. And the prayer of the bill is that the defendants be required to specifically perform their covenant, and to make proper compensation to the complainants for the damage sustained by them, etc.

The defendants being nonresidents, there was an order of publication. An attachment was also sued out, which was levied on the said 19 acres of land. At the May term, 1890, a decree was entered for the specific performance of the contract, with a further provision that the defendants pay to the complainants $750 damages for the breach of the contract. At the ensuing October term, the defendants appeared, and filed their petition, praying that the decree be set aside, and that they be allowed to make defense. They thereupon, with the leave of the court, demurred to the bill, and also answered. In their answer they stated, among other things, that since the commencement of the suit they had laid the pipe and erected a trough as they had agreed to do, and that this was done before the decree was entered. The cause was then referred to a commissioner, with directions to ascertain and report, among other things, what damages, if any, the complainants had sustained by reason of the alleged breach of the contract, in obedience to which the commissioner subsequently reported that they had been damaged to the amount of $900. This finding was afterwards, upon exceptions to the report, reduced by the court to $750, and by the same decree it was ordered that "performance of said contract be confirmed to the complainants."

1. A number of objections have been urged to this decree, none of which, in our opinion, are well founded. In the first place, the case stated in the bill is undoubtedly within the jurisdiction of a court of equity. The contract therein sought to be enforced is not one requiring personal labor, or the exercise of any peculiar skill or judgment, or involving the performance of continuous duties and supervision. On the contrary, it is such a contract as could be readily performed by almost any ordinary workman, and its nature is such that the remedy at law for its breach is inadequate. This brings the case within the general rule that a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce specific performance of a contract by a defendant to do defined work upon his own property, in the performance of which the plaintiff has a material interest, and which is not capable of adequate compensation in damages; as, for example, an agreement on the part of a railway company to make an archway under its tracks, or to construct a siding at a particular point for the convenience of an adjoining landowner. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 721a; Storer v. Railway Co., 2 Young & C. Ch. 48; Greene v. Railway Co., L. R. 13 Eq. 44. It is, moreover, well settled that, as auxiliary to its authority to decree specific performance, a court of equity may award damages for a breach of the contract, to be assessed either by an issue of quantum damnificatus or by a master, at its discretion. Phillips v. Thompson, 1 Johns, Ch. 131; Nagle v. Newton, 22 Grat. 814; Campbell v. Rust, 85 Va. 653, 8 S. E. 664. This, indeed, is not disputed. But the appellants contend that their performance of the contract in question before the entry of the decree, although subsequent to the filing of the bill, left nothing to be specifically enforced, and consequently that the auxiliary power to decree damages was likewise at an end. In other words, the contention is that, after the pipe was laid and the trough erected, the suit was nothing more than a suit to recover damages, of which equity has not jurisdiction.

But this is a mistaken view. The court having acquired jurisdiction of the case upon equitable ground, no subsequent act of the defendants could oust that jurisdiction. It is a familiar principle, as laid down by Judge Staples in Walters v. Bank, 76 Va. 12, that, when a court of equity has once acquired jurisdiction of a cause, it may go on to a complete adjudication, even to the extent of establishing legal rights and granting legal remedies, which would otherwise be beyond the scope of its authority. That is a very strong case. The object of the suit was to subject the estate of a married woman to the payment of a certain negotiable note, upon which the appellant was indorser, or to require the appellant to pay it. In the progress of the case, it appeared that there was no separate estate, whereupon it was insisted that, as the supposed existence of a separate estate was the sole ground for going into equity, the court could proceed no further, and that the bill should be dismissed. But this view was rejected, and a decree rendered against the appellant for the debt, which this court affirmed, on the principle above stated. So it has been held that where the complainant was originally entitled to a specific performance, but pending the suit the subject-matter of the litigation is established or destroyed, he will not be turned round to his remedy at law, but compensation or damages will be decreed him. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 794; Nelson v. Bridges, 2 Beav. 239; Chapman v. Railroad Co., 6 Ohio St. 119.

2. As to the further point made by the appellants in the petition for appeal, upon the authority of Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714, that state courts have no power to render judgments or decrees in personam against nonresident defendants, who are summoned merely by publication, it is enough to say that here the defendants, after rendition of the decree of the May term, 1890, appeared and defended on the merits, thus submitting themselves to the jurisdiction of the court; so that the case stands upon the same footing, so far as the power and jurisdiction of the court are concerned, as if they had been personally served with process at the commencement of the suit.

3. Both sides complain of the amount of damages awarded; the appellants contending that the amount is excessive, while the appellees insist that the sum reported by the commissioner, viz. $900, ought to have been allowed, and that the circuit court erred in reducing the amount to $750. Without reviewing the evidence before the commissioner, we deem it sufficient to say that we see no reason to disturb the decree on this or any other point. It is therefore affirmed. Decree affirmed.

ROGERS LOCOMOTIVE & MACHINE
WORKS v. ERIE RY. CO.

(20 N. J. Eq. 379.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1869.

This was a motion for a preliminary injunction. The argument was had upon a rule to show cause upon the bill filed and an affidavit of James Fisk, Jr., in reply to the allegation of the bill as to the insolvency of the Erie Railway Company.

The bill sets forth that the Erie Railway Company, by virtue of the provisions of the charter of the Paterson & Hudson River Railroad Company, of the lease of that road, and the acts of the legislature giving validity to that lease, and authorizing it to finish and extend that road to the Hudson river, and confirming the reorganization of the Erie Railway Company under its present name, became a common carrier between the city of Paterson and the present termination of its railway near the Hudson river, at the Long Dock; that it was bound to carry freight from Paterson to Long Dock at the rates fixed in these acts, which, for a locomotive engine of the size usually made and sent away by the complainants, would amount to $31.80 for each locomotive; that the company or some of its directors have devised a scheme for the purpose of illegally increasing the rate to be charged for such transportation; that they procured the company to be chartered by the name of the "Union Locomotive Express Company," with power to forward and carry locomotives and other property; and that the Erie Railway Company or its stockholders or directors are using this express company, and combining with its directors, for the purpose of increasing the rates of transportation from Paterson to Long Dock; and that it has entered into an agreement with the express company that it should have the exclusive right of transporting locomotives over the road; that the express company have the power to charge for forwarding without any limit as to amount, and do actually charge $250 for transporting each locomotive, and assume only the liability of forwarders, and the Erie Railway Company refuses to accept for transportation at its depot at Paterson any locomotive to be transported to Long Dock, or to transport the same, unless through the express company; that the complainant built two trucks, on which it was in the habit of placing its engines and drawing them over the street railway from the manufactory to the depot of the Erie Railway Company at Paterson, which were suitable to run upon that road, and which could be taken to Long Dock with the locomotives thus loaded upon them; that the Erie Railway Company, when these trucks so loaded were last tendered to it for transportation, caused them to be taken over its road in the opposite direction, into the state of New York, and detains and keeps them there, so that the complainant has no means to offer its locomotives to the Erie Railway Company for transportation, and that this is done intentionally to carry out the fraudulent combination with the express company, so that the latter must be employed, at their exorbitant rates, to carry all the locomotives; and that new trucks cannot be constructed or provided under several months.

The bill further alleges that the manufacture of locomotives has become a large and important business in Paterson, and that the complainant and others have established their works there on faith of the means of transportation provided by law over the railway of the defendants; that being compelled to pay such sum for transportation will compel them to add the amount to the price of their locomotives, and will injure their business in competition with other establishments, and omission to deliver would make them liable to damages.

The bill alleges that this combination of the Erie Railway Company is a fraud upon the stockholders, because they receive by the agreement only $10 for each locomotive transported by the express company, when, by law, they would be entitled to receive, and would receive from the complainant and others, more than three times that amount for the same service, if performed directly for them.

The bill prays for an injunction to direct and compel the Erie Railway Company to return the two trucks to Paterson into the possession of the complainant, and to transport to the wharf, at Long Dock, all locomotive engines of the complainant that may be delivered at the depot at Paterson, at the rates prescribed by law, and to direct and compel it to perform its duty as a common carrier; also to restrain it from removing the complainant's trucks out of its possession, and from preventing it from obtaining possession thereof, and restraining the other defendants, that is, Jay Gould, James Fisk, Jr., the Union Locomotive Express Company, N. Marsh Kasson, James G. Dudley, Henry J. Smith, and C. Valletta Kasson, from entering into any agreement or doing anything to prevent or hinder the Erie Railway Company from transporting the locomotives of the complainant over its road.

The bill charges that the Union Express Company was got up by Jay Gould, James Fisk, Jr., and Frederick A. Lane, three of the directors of the Erie Railway Company, in combination with N. Marsh Kasson, James G. Dudley, Henry J. Smith, C. Valletta Kasson, and P. K. Randall, as a contrivance to shift the duties of common carriers from the Erie Railway Company, and to enable the defendants, or some of them, to make illegal and exorbitant charges for transportation.

A. B. Woodruff, for the motion. L. Zabriskie, opposed.

THE CHANCELLOR. If the allegations of the bill are true, and they are supported by the affidavits annexed, and are not denied by answer or affidavit, they present a flagrant case of refusal to perform the duties imposed upon it by law, and for which its franchises were granted, by a corporation public in its object and almost such in its character. Railway companies have delegated to them as part of their franchises much of the sovereign power of the state, in consideration of their discharging part of what are the proper duties of government, that is, providing the means of commerce and intercourse by constructing the roads which are the avenues of that commerce. And when, being authorized, they assume to operate these roads, they have devolved upon them in consideration of that franchise the additional duty, which is not one of the proper functions of the government, of common carriers, and are obliged to transport all merchandise and passengers on the terms fixed in the grant through which they obtain their franchises. In this case the wrong is attempted to be aggravated by the charge that it is done through a corrupt combination between the directors of the company and others, by which these directors, in violation of their duties and trust, conspire for their own emolument to cause the company under their control to refuse to perform the duties imposed on it by law, in such manner that the public are injured by extortionate charges, and the stockholders defrauded of their just dues, and also in such manner that the state can cause the valuable franchises of which they are possessed as a right of property to be annulled and forfeited for the willful violation of the compact by which they were granted.

These allegations may not be true, and may be totally disproved at the hearing; but as their truth is sworn to, and is not denied, I am bound to treat them as true for the purposes of this application. So far as they relate to dereliction in duty to the stockholders of the Erie Railway Company, the complainant cannot have here any relief based upon them.

I will also assume for the purposes of this application that the Erie Railway Company having, as the legal assignees of the Paterson & Hudson River Railroad Company, and of their franchises, including the right to finish the road to the Hudson river and to tunnel Bergen hill, constructed the extension of the road to the Hudson river, holds it as part of that road, and subject to all the restrictions and duties imposed upon that road by the charter of the original company; and that it is therefore a common carrier, bound to transport goods over this extension, as well as over the residue of the road, at the rates fixed in the charter.

Whether this duty could be performed by delegating to another person or company who would discharge it in the same manner, and for the same compensation, and with the same liabilities, need not be discussed here. They have attempted to delegate it to a company who do not attempt or offer to perform the duty as common carriers, or subject to the liabilities of common carriers, but only as forwarders, and who charge for this imperfect performance more than four times the rate authorized to be charged by the Erie Railway Company. They therefore do not provide any one to discharge the duty required of them, and they utterly refuse to perform it themselves, and have bound themselves by a contract that no one but the express company shall perform it. Such contract may be void, both as ultra vires and contrary to law, yet it is proper to be considered as showing the intention of the company not to perform this part of their duty.

The injury to the complainant, too, is of that nature, that while there may be a remedy at law, as by recovery of damages for injury, yet is such that cannot be adequately relieved by suits for damages. It is continually recurring, and will require continued and repeated suits, and continued litigation, and the expenses of each suit would make the recovery of the excess paid an inadequate remedy. I now assume that the Erie Railway Company is, and will remain, solvent. The affidavit of the proper officer of the company, which is legally before the court, clearly shows that the company is not solvent, or likely to prove so.

But, although the injury is proved, and the subject-matter is such that a court of equity will not refuse relief, on the ground that there is adequate relief at law, the question remains whether the injunction here applied for can be granted, or any part of it. There are injuries which this court cannot redress, although there may be no satisfactory remedy at law, and those which this court can redress, for which no preliminary injunction can issue.

The two chief objects for which the injunction is asked are to compel the railway company to return to the complainant its trucks, and to compel it to transport the locomotives of the complainant from Paterson to Long Dock at the legal rates of freight. These are to compel the company to act, not to refrain from acting. And the act commanded is the whole duty of the company, and its performance is the whole right of the complainant. It is not the case of a prohibition of keeping up a structure or maintaining some material object, the erection and continuance of which is the act that deprives the complainant of his right, and the destruction or removal of which would restore the enjoyment of it.

It is contended by the defendant that a mandatory injunction, or one which commands the defendant to do some positive act, will not be ordered, except upon final hearing, and then only to execute the decree or judgment of the court, and never on a preliminary or interlocutory motion. Or that, if it ever does so issue, it is only in cases of obstruction to easements or rights of like nature, in which a structure erected and kept as the means of preventing such enjoyment will be ordered to be removed, as part of the means of restraining the defendant from interrupting the enjoyment of the right.

Although there is some conflict in the authorities and decisions, I am of opinion, after examining into them, that this position, with the limitation, is the established doctrine of the courts of equity, and that it is a proper and discreet limitation of the use of the preliminary injunction, as well as sustained by the weight of authority.

Justice Story, in 2 Eq. Jur. § 861, says: "A writ of injunction may be described to be a judicial process, whereby a party is required to do a particular thing, or to refrain from doing a particular thing, according to the exigency of the writ. The most common form of injunction is that which operates as a restraint upon the party in the exercise of his real or supposed rights, and is sometimes called the remedial writ of injunction. The other form, commanding an act to be done, is sometimes called the judicial writ, because it issues after a decree, and is in the nature of an execution to enforce the same."

Mr. Eden begins his treatise on Injunctions by saying: "An injunction is a writ issuing by the order and under the seal of a court of equity, and is of two kinds. The one is the writ remedial; for, in the endless variety of cases in which a plaintiff is entitled to equitable relief, if that relief consists in restraining the commission or continuance of some act of the defendant, a court of equity administers it by means of the writ of injunction. The other species of injunction is called the judicial writ, and issues subsequent to a decree, and is properly described as being in the nature of an execution."

In Drew, Inj. p. 260, it is laid down: "It seems settled that equity has not jurisdiction to compel, on motion, the performance of any substantive act."

In 3 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1767, it is said: "It is to be observed that the court will not, by injunction granted upon interlocutory application, direct the defendant to perform an act, but might, upon motion, order the defendant to pull down a building which was clearly a nuisance to the plaintiff."

Lord Hardwicke, in an anonymous case in 1 Ves. Jr. 140, restrained the further digging of a ditch, but refused, on motion before answer, to order the part dug to be filled up.

Chancellor Vroom, in Attorney-General v. New Jersey R. & Transp. Co., 3 N. J. Eq. 141, says: "The injunction is a preventive remedy. It interposes between the complainant and the injury he fears or seeks to avoid. If the injury be already done, the writ can have no operation, for it cannot be applied correctively, so as to remove it." In that case, the injury done was driving piles for a bridge, so as to obstruct navigation. A mandatory injunction to remove them would have remedied the whole evil.

In Hooper v. Broderick, 11 Sim. 47, a preliminary injunction to restrain a tenant from discontinuing to keep an inn was dissolved on the ground that it was mandatory, the same as if he was commanded to keep an inn.

In Blakeman v. Navigation Co., 1 Mylne & K. 154, Lord Brougham, after a review of the cases (page 183) and quoting with approbation what Lord Hardwicke said in Ryder v. Bentham, that "he had never known an order to pull down on motion, and but rarely by decree," refused so much of the injunction prayed for as directed the defendant, Powell, to fill up the collateral pond. The cases of the East India Co. v. Vincent, 2 Atk. 83; Spencer v. London and Birmingham Railway Co., 8 Sim. 193; and of Durell v. Pritchard, 1 Ch. App. 244, are to the same effect. And in the last case, Lord Romilly, M. R., held that the court, upon final hearing, could not issue a mandatory injunction directing a wall to be taken down; yet the lords justices on appeal held that it had the power, but that in the case before them it should not be exercised, and dismissed the appeal.

There are cases in which mandatory injunctions have been ordered on motion, but they are all, or nearly all, cases in which some erection placed and maintained by the defendant to effect the injury complained of was ordered to be removed, or its maintenance forbidden, on the ground that the defendant effected the act he was restrained from doing by continuing such erection.

In Robinson v. Lord Byron, 1 Brown, Ch. 588, which is referred to as the leading case for mandatory injunction, Lord Thurlow ordered an injunction to restrain defendant from using his dams and other erections, so as to prevent the water from flowing to the complainant's mill in such quantities as it had ordinarily done before April 4, 1785. The effect of this may have been to compel the removal of the part erected after 1785. But as the case states the injury complained of to be that Lord Byron so used his dam and gates as to let the water flow irregularly, to the complainant's injury, I do not see in the report any direction, express or implied, to take down anything, or to do any act whatever.

In Lane v. Newdigate, 10 Ves. 192, the object of the injunction was to compel the restoring of a stop gate which was wrongfully removed. Lord Eldon would not order it to be restored, but restrained the preventing the use of the water by complainant by the removal of a stop gate, which was equivalent to an order to restore it, and was so intended.

In Ranken v. Huskisson, 4 Sims. 13, the court restrained the defendant from permitting an erection to remain. This was equivalent to an order to remove it; but it is like the others, simply removing that by which the defendant continued the nuisance to be restrained.

In Mexborough v. Bower, 1 Beav. 127, Lord Langdale ordered an injunction to restrain permitting the communication complained of, by which complainant's mine was flooded, to remain open. The injunction was to prevent the flowing of the mine, by restraining or removing the means by which the defendant continued to do it.

In North of England Ry. Co. v. Clarence Ry. Co., 1 Colly. 507, the injunction prayed for was against maintaining a wall, and after the rights of the parties had been referred to, and settled in the court of the exchequer, Vice Chancellor Bruce hesitated to grant the injunction, although he held (page 521) that mandatory injunctions might be granted; yet he referred the case to Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, who, it is stated, granted the injunction in nearly the terms of the prayer; but whether it included this mandatory part does not distinctly appear. The case established the right of the complainant to build a bridge over the railway of the defendant, and to rest the supports of the scaffolding on the soil; and the mandatory prayer was that defendants should remove a wall placed on their grounds to hinder it.

In Greatrex v. Greatrex, 1 De Gex & S. 692, the injunction was against preventing the plaintiffs from having access to the books of the firm, and against removing them from, or keeping them at, any other place than the place of business of the partnership, as the defendant had removed the books. This was equivalent to an order to restore them, but yet it did not command any act to be done.

In Heracy v. Smith, 1 Kay & J. 389, the injury was covering with tiles the chimneys from the butler's pantry of the complainant. Lord Hatherly (the present lord chancellor, then vice chancellor. Sir W. P. Wood), on the authority of Robinson v. Lord Byron, granted an injunction the effect of which was, and was intended to be, to compel the defendant to remove the tiles; but he declined to adopt the mandatory form, but restrained the defendant from doing any act to prevent the smoke from arising. The substance of the judgment is grounded on the power of the court to remove an erection made by the defendant to effect the injury to be redressed, when that erection is the means by which the defendant continues to inflict the injuries from which the court intended to restrain; and the form of it is an acknowledgment of the general principle that an interlocutory injunction should not command the doing of any positive act.

A number of authorities and cases were cited on the argument to show that courts of equity will, in certain cases, decree the restitution of particular chattels; but these are all cases where it was so ordered upon final hearing. There is no case of any interlocutory injunction being granted or even applied for, for such purpose. It would be a simple and easy substitute for the action of replevin; and there is nothing in this case to warrant such order, even upon final decree. The value of these trucks can be fully recovered at law, and, as to the use of them in the meantime, new ones could be built sooner than a suit in equity be brought to final hearing.

I feel, therefore, constrained to refuse the injunction so far as these mandatory prayers are concerned. As to so much of the prayer as asks to restrain James Fisk, Jr., and the other defendants named in it, from entering into any agreement, or doing anything to prevent or hinder the Erie Railway Company transporting the complainant's locomotives, I think the injunction ought to be granted. They are conspiring with the Erie Railway Company to injure the complainants in a way for which the redress at law is not adequate, and therefore should be enjoined from doing any acts to that end.

I do not intend to intimate any opinion upon the question whether this court has power on the final hearing to give the complainants the relief they seek by compelling the Erie Railway Company to transport their locomotives at the established fares.

WHITECAR et al. v. MICHENOR et al.

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. May Term, 1883.

Bill for injunction. On motion for mandatory injunction. On order to show cause. On bill and answer.

S. K. Robbins and B. D. Shreve, for complainants. R. S. Jenkins, for defendants.

THE CHANCELLOR. The complainants are Rev. Dr. Charles H. Whitecar, a minister of the Methodist Episcopal denomination, who has been duly appointed for the present conference year to the charge over the Methodist Episcopal Church at Moorestown, and certain of the members of that church. The defendants are the trustees of that church. The bill states that the defendants, on the 29th of March last, closed the church against the members and congregation, and have kept it closed ever since. It prays an injunction to compel them to open it for the religious uses to which it was dedicated. It appears from the bill and the admissions of the answer that the church was organized under the rules, regulations, and discipline prescribed by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, and was duly incorporated on or about the 21st of August, 1815, under the act "to incorporate trustees of religious societies," by the name of "The Methodist Episcopal Church at Moorestown"; that Rachel S. Andrews, in September, 1858, conveyed to Deacon Brock, Caleb Fenimore, Thomas Marter, James Moore, John Ireland, Isaac Browning, and Paul Crispin, "trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Moorestown, in the county of Burlington and state of New Jersey," the lot of land on which the church edifice is built, for the use and benefit of the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Moorestown, and that afterwards the members of that church built thereon the church edifice in question as a place of worship, according to the rules of faith of the Methodist Episcopal Church in the United States, and subject to its discipline, and that the church edifice has been used as such from the time of its erection until it was closed by the trustees on the 29th of March last; that on the 27th of that month the Rev. Dr. Wiley, one of the bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, and in whom, by the rules and regulations of the general conference, was reposed the power, and on whom was imposed the duty, of appointing for the present conference year the ministers for the various churches constituting the New Jersey Annual Conference, to which annual conference the church at Moorestown belongs, appointed Dr. Whitecar to that church for that year (being his second annual appointment to that church) as minister in charge, and the latter accordingly entered upon the discharge of his duties, and in the course thereof proceeded to the church building on the 29th of March for the purpose of holding the usual prayer meeting there, but found the doors of the church locked and a notice thereon dated that day, and purporting to be given by the board of trustees and signed by its secretary, that the church would remain closed until further notice; that he and the members of the church there assembled were compelled to disperse without gaining entrance to the church; that the members present appointed a committee of six of their number to call with the minister upon the president of the board of trustees and learn the cause of the closing of the church and preventing the minister and the members from holding service therein; that the committee called on the president and made inquiry; that at the time another of the trustees was present with the president; that in reply to the inquiry the president said that he had not the keys and did not know where they were, and, at the same time, said to the committee that the trustees had the power and authority to close the church, but gave no reason for doing so; that the committee, on the same occasion, asked him to show them the deed of the church property, but he, while admitting that he had it in his house, where the interview took place, refused to show it to them. It also appears, by like statement and admission, that the trustees have kept the church locked ever since the date mentioned, the 29th of March, and have refused to permit it to be used for public worship or even for the meeting of the quarterly conference, which is presided over by the elder of the district. The defendants, by their answer, assert their loyalty to the Methodist Episcopal Church in all respects, and their willingness to obey its rules, regulations, and discipline so far as they comport with their legal obligations, as they understand them, under the before-mentioned deed of trust, and allege that their action in closing the church against Dr. Whitecar is in accordance with the expressed wishes and determination of the majority of the members of the church, and because they are of opinion that the welfare of the church demands that he should not be its pastor.

On the argument of this motion it was stated in behalf of the defendants, and it is so averred in the answer, that their action in closing the church was due to the fact that, in view of the trust in the deed for the land on which the church edifice is built, they considered it their duty to obey the wishes of the majority of the members of the church as to who should officiate as its settled pastor, notwithstanding those wishes may be in conflict with the rules, regulations, and discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church. This view, however, is entirely erroneous. Not only so, but there is, in fact, no ground whatever for assuming that, by reason of anything in the deed, they are under any obligation different from that which would devolve upon them merely as trustees of the church had the deed been made directly to the corporation and expressed no trust. The deed, as before stated, was made, not to the corporation, but to certain persons who, at the date of the conveyance, were the trustees of the church. It conveys the property to them with the addition of "Trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Moorestown, in the County of Burlington and State of New Jersey," after their names, in trust for that church, and the only proper use and behoof of the members thereof. Neither the defendants nor any of them are parties to that deed, and neither they nor any of them claim by descent, grant, or devise from the grantees therein. They are merely trustees of the corporation, elected in February, 1882. Neither the legal nor the equitable title to the property is in them. The latter title is in the corporation, and they merely represent the corporation as trustees holding the title of the corporation on a simple trust which makes them bare depositaries of the title. Morgan v. Rose, 22 N. J. Eq. 583. And the case would not be different if they held the legal title under the deed. But they do not hold that title. By the act of incorporation the trustees did not acquire the authority which they claim to close the church building at their discretion. Morgan v. Rose, ubi supra.

Nor have they power, under the discipline of the church, to close it against the duly appointed preacher, though a majority of the members are desirous that they should do so. Nor have they such power under the trust in the deed. The trust is that the grantees therein named, and the survivors of them, their successors and assigns, will hold the property for the only proper use and behoof of the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church at Moorestown, their successors and assigns, forever. It is admitted that that church was organized under the rules, regulations, and discipline prescribed by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States, and it is not denied that it has been so ever since. It was incorporated in 1815, now nearly seventy years ago. The very name of the corporation indicates its character and connection. As a Methodist Episcopal church it is subject to those rules, regulations, and discipline. It is not alleged that the appointment of the preacher was unauthorized or irregular, but that a majority of the members of the church desire that the preacher appointed shall not be permitted to act as the pastor of the church,—to discharge the duties of the place to which he has been duly appointed. It is not claimed that there is any warrant in the discipline of the church for the action of the trustees, nor that the discipline provides that the wishes of the majority of the members shall determine whether the preacher appointed to the charge shall act as such or not. If the church belongs to the Methodist Episcopal connection, as it is admitted it does, there is no warrant of law, discipline, or usage for the acts of the defendants. What is known as the itinerancy of the preachers, and the absolute power of the bishops over the appointments of the preachers to the churches, is part of the discipline.

Chief Justice Gibson said, in Com. v. Cornish, 13 Pa. 288, 290, that in the Methodist Episcopal Church in England and America the election and ordination of the priesthood by the general or annual conference, the ordination of them by laying on of hands by a bishop and elders, and fixing of their appointments by the bishop, are cardinal points, the last of them a distinctive one. He adds that it is the rock on which the church is founded and on which it has prospered. Remove the church from it, he says, and it ceases to be Methodist; and he also says that the election and ordination of elders, and the fixing of their appointments, are regulated by articles which are fundamental. Said Judge Edmonds, in the case of People v. Steele, 2 Barb. 397, 413: "I am irresistibly conducted to the conclusion that the itinerancy of the priesthood, enforced by the power of the episcopacy, is now and for more than a century has been the well-established practice of this church, is clearly defined in the doctrines and discipline, and has been again and again understandingly and advisedly justified and defended by the highest ecclesiastical tribunal known in its constitution." In the case last cited, which is the leading case on the subject, and which in its circumstances was substantially identical with this, the very question presented here as to the right of the trustees of a Methodist Episcopal church to exclude the bishop's appointee was judicially decided against the trustees. There, as here, the trustees claimed to be supported in their action by the majority of the members of the church. See, also, Brunnenmeyer v. Buhre, 32 Ill. 183.

But it is urged by the defendants that according to the practice of this court there should be no mandatory injunction in this case before the final decision of the cause. On the filing of the bill an injunction was granted, but it was not mandatory in its character. It indicated that in the judgment of the court, on the case made by the bill, the defendants ought to be restrained from closing the church building against the preacher and the church. It did not, however, require them to open it, and they refused to open it under the non-mandatory prohibition. Their refusal was not a violation of the command of the writ, and the application for an attachment against them for contempt was therefore properly denied. The present application was subsequently made to me for a mandatory injunction. I thereupon granted an order to show cause why such an injunction should not be granted, and the defendants then put in their answer. The whole case is now before me, and the defendants have been heard upon the application. I am of the opinion that judged by their answer, and assuming the truth of the facts therein alleged, they are without justification for the act complained of; and I see no reason, either jurisdictional or prudential, for refusing the writ. While the jurisdiction of the court to interfere by way of mandatory injunction should be exercised with the greatest possible caution, yet where the right to restrain the violation of which the injunction is asked for is clearly made out, and there is a present want of the use of that right, the court should not hesitate. The court is always very reluctant to grant a mandatory injunction on an interlocutory application, but where extreme or very serious damage would ensue from withholding it, as in cases of interference with easements or other cases demanding immediate relief, it will be granted.

Joyce, Prin. Inj. 57; Rogers Locomotive & Machine Works v. Erie R. Co., 20 N. J. Eq. 379; Thropp v. Field, 26 N. J. Eq. 82; Longwood Valley R. R. Co. v. Baker, 27 N. J. Eq. 166. In this case it is not reasonable, under the circumstances, to permit the defendants to deprive the church of the use of the edifice until the final hearing. The property is held by the defendants on a simple trust, and they are unwarrantably withholding the use of it from those for whose use they hold it. They have been heard and their defense fully laid before the court and considered. There will be an injunction commanding them to desist and refrain from continuing to keep the church closed at such times as to prevent the preacher, Dr. Whitecar, and the members of the church, from using it for the purpose of religious worship and church business.

WATSON v. SUTHERLAND.

Supreme Court of the United States. Dec., 1866.

Appeal from circuit court of the United States for the district of Maryland.

Watson & Co., appellants in the suit, having issued writs of fieri facias on certain judgments which they had recovered in the circuit court for the district of Maryland against Wroth & Fullerton, caused them to be levied on the entire stock in trade of a retail dry goods store in Baltimore, in the possession of one Sutherland, the appellee. Sutherland, claiming the exclusive ownership of the property, and insisting that Wroth & Fullerton had no interest whatever in it, filed a bill in equity, to enjoin the further prosecution of these writs of fieri facias, and so to prevent, as he alleged, irreparable injury to himself. The grounds on which the bill of Sutherland charged that the injury would be irreparable, and could not be compensated in damages, were these: that he was the bona fide owner of the stock of goods, which were valuable and purchased for the business of the current season, and not all paid for; that his only means of payment were through his sales; that he was a young man, recently engaged on his own account in merchandising, and had succeeded in establishing a profitable trade, and if his store was closed, or goods taken from him, or their sale even long delayed, he would not only be rendered insolvent, but his credit destroyed, his business wholly broken up, and his prospects in life blasted.

The answer set forth that the goods levied on were really the property of Wroth & Fullerton, who had been partners in business in Baltimore, and who, suspending payment in March, 1861, greatly in debt to the appellants and others, had, on the 27th October, 1862, and under the form of a sale, conveyed the goods to Sutherland, the appellee; that Sutherland was a young man, who came to this country from Ireland a few years ago; that when he came he was wholly without property; that since he came he had been salesman in a retail dry goods store, at a small salary, so low as to have rendered it impossible for him to have saved from his earnings any sum of money sufficient to have made any real purchase of this stock of goods from Wroth & Fullerton, which the answer set up was accordingly a fraudulent transfer made to hinder and defeat creditors.

It further stated that the legislature of Maryland had passed acts staying executions from the 10th of May, 1861, until the 1st of November, 1862; that previous to the 1st November, 1862, Wroth & Fullerton had determined to pay no part of the judgments rendered against them; and that from the 10th May, 1861, until the 1st November, 1862, judgments, amounting to between $30,000 and $40,000 had been rendered against them; that between the date of the suspension, March, 1861, and the 27th October, 1862, they had sold the greater portion of their goods, and collected a great many of the debts due them, but had paid only a small portion of those which they owed; secreting for their own use the greater portion of the money collected, and with the residue obtaining the goods levied upon.

It added that there was no reason to suppose that the levy aforesaid, as made by said marshal, would work irreparable injury to the appellee, even if the goods so levied on were the property of the complainant, as property of the same description, quantity, and quality, could be easily obtained in market, which would suit the appellee's purpose as well as those levied upon, and that a jury would have ample power, on a trial at common law, in an action against the respondents, now appellants, or against the marshal on his official bond, to give a verdict commensurate with any damages the said appellee could sustain by the levy and sale of the goods aforesaid.

On the filing of the bill a temporary injunction was granted, and when the cause was finally heard, after a general replication filed and proof taken, it was made perpetual.

These proofs, as both this court and the one below considered, hardly established, as respected Sutherland, the alleged fraud on creditors.

The appeal was from the decree of perpetual injunction.

Mason, Campbell & McLaughlin, for defendants. Wallis & Alexander, contra.

Mr. Justice DAVIS delivered the opinion of the court.

There are, in this record, two questions for consideration. Was Sutherland entitled to invoke the interposition of a court of equity? and, if so, did the evidence warrant the court below in perpetuating the injunction?

It is contended that the injunction should have been refused, because there was a complete remedy at law. If the remedy at law is sufficient, equity cannot give relief, "but it is not enough that there is a remedy at law; it must be plain and adequate, or in other words, as practical and efficient to the ends of justice, and its prompt administration, as the remedy in equity."¹ How could Sutherland be compensated at law, for the injuries he would suffer, should the grievances of which he complains be consummated?

If the appellants made the levy, and prosecuted it in good faith, without circumstances of aggravation, in the honest belief that Wroth & Fullerton owned the stock of goods (which they swear to in their answer), and it should turn out, in an action at law instituted by Sutherland for the trespass, that the merchandise belonged exclusively to him, it is well settled that the measure of damages, if the property were not sold, could not extend beyond the injury done to it, or, if sold, to the value of it, when taken, with interest from the time of the taking down to the trial.²

And this is an equal rule, whether the suit is against the marshal or the attaching creditors, if the proceedings are fairly conducted, and there has been no abuse of authority. Any harsher rule would interfere to prevent the assertion of rights honestly entertained, and which should be judicially investigated and settled. "Legal compensation refers solely to the injury done to the property taken, and not to any collateral or consequential damages, resulting to the owner, by the trespass."³ Loss of trade, destruction of credit, and failure of business prospects, are collateral or consequential damages, which it is claimed would result from the trespass, but for which compensation cannot be awarded in a trial at law.

Commercial ruin to Sutherland might, therefore, be the effect of closing his store and selling his goods, and yet the common law fail to reach the mischief. To prevent a consequence like this, a court of equity steps in, arrests the proceedings in limine; brings the parties before it; hears their allegations and proofs, and decrees, either that the proceedings shall be unrestrained, or else perpetually enjoined. The absence of a plain and adequate remedy at law affords the only test of equity jurisdiction, and the application of this principle to a particular case, must depend altogether upon the character of the case, as disclosed in the pleadings. In the case we are considering, it is very clear that the remedy in equity could alone furnish relief, and that the ends of justice required the injunction to be issued.

The appellants, in their answers, deny that the property was Sutherland's, but insist that it was fraudulently purchased by him of Wroth & Fullerton, and is subject to the payment of their debts. It seems that Wroth & Fullerton had been partners in business in Baltimore, and suspended payment in March, 1861, in debt to the appellants, besides other creditors. Although the appellants did not recover judgments against them until after their sale to Sutherland, yet other creditors did, who were delayed in consequence of the then existing laws of Maryland, which provided that executions should be stayed until the 1st of November, 1862. Taking advantage of this provision of law, the answer charges that Wroth & Fullerton, after their failure, collected a large portion of their assets, but appropriated to the payment of their debts only a small portion thus realized, and used the residue to buy the very goods in question, which Sutherland fraudulently purchased from them on the 27th of October, 1862, in execution of a combination and conspiracy with them to hinder, delay, and defraud their creditors. The answers also deny that the injury to Sutherland would be irreparable, even if the stock were his, and insist that he could be amply compensated by damages at law. After general replication was filed, proofs were taken, but, as in all contests of this kind, there was a great deal of irrelevant testimony, and very much that had only a remote bearing on the question at issue between the parties. It is unnecessary to discuss the facts of this case, for it would serve no useful purpose to do so. We are satisfied, from a consideration of the whole evidence, that Wroth & Fullerton acted badly, but that Sutherland was not a party to any fraud which they contemplated against their creditors, and that he made the purchase in controversy, in good faith, and for an honest purpose.

The evidence also shows conclusively, that had not the levy been arrested by injunction, damages would have resulted to Sutherland, which could not have been repaired at law.

The decree of the circuit court is, therefore, affirmed.

McHENRY v. JEWETT.

Court of Appeals of New York. 1882.

Appeal from order which affirmed an order granting a preliminary injunction, restraining defendant from voting upon stock in person or by proxy, or from giving a proxy pendente lite.

W. W. MacFarland, for appellant. B. F. Dunning, for respondent.

ANDREWS, C. J. The complaint shows that the plaintiff is pledgor of shares of railroad stock transferred on the books of the company to the defendant as trustee for the pledgee, and the action is brought to restrain the defendant from voting upon the shares at the meetings of stockholders, which it is alleged he has heretofore done, and claims the right to do in the future by reason of his title and right as trustee of the stock. The order from which this appeal is taken granted a temporary injunction restraining the defendant, pendente lite, from voting on the shares. We think the injunction was improperly allowed, for the reason that it does not appear from the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the final relief for which the action is brought, and in such case a temporary injunction is unauthorized. Code, § 603. It is claimed on the part of the plaintiff that within the general rule that a pledgee has no right to use the thing pledged, the defendant is not entitled to vote upon the shares, which it is insisted is a use of the shares in violation of this rule. On the other hand, the defendant claims that the voting power passes to the pledgee of corporate shares transferred on the books of the corporation to the pledgee, as incident to the pledge, and according to the presumed intention of the parties. Without considering this question, but conceding the plaintiff's claim, it does not follow that he is entitled to an injunction restraining the defendant from voting on the shares. It is not sufficient to authorize the remedy by injunction that a violation of a naked legal right of property is threatened. There must be some special ground of jurisdiction, and where an injunction is the final relief sought, facts which entitle the plaintiff to this remedy must be averred in the complaint and established on the hearing. The complaint in this case is bare of any facts authorizing final relief by injunction. It is true that it is alleged that the defendant by the use of the shares has been enabled to a great extent to control the management of the corporation in the interest of the New York, Lake Erie & Great Western Railway Company, with little or no regard to the best interests of the company issuing the shares. But there are no facts supporting this allegation, nor is it averred that the interests of the latter company have been prejudiced, or that the value of the shares has been impaired by the acts of the defendant. So also it is alleged that it is greatly against the plaintiff's interest as a shareholder to permit the defendant to vote upon the shares, and that the plaintiff will suffer great and irreparable injury if the defendant is permitted to do so. But no facts justifying these conclusions are stated, and the mere allegation of serious or irreparable injury, apprehended or threatened, not supported by facts or circumstances tending to justify it, is clearly insufficient. Neither injury to the plaintiff's property, inadequacy of the legal remedy, or any pressing or serious emergency, or danger of loss, or other special ground of jurisdiction, is shown by the complaint. The complaint therefore does not show that the plaintiff is entitled to final relief by injunction. Corporation, etc., v. Mapes, 6 Johns. Ch. 46; Printing Establishment v. Fitch, 1 Paige, 98; High, Inj. §§ 22, 34, 35, and cases cited. The preliminary injunction was granted upon the complaint, and an affidavit verifying the statements therein, without stating any additional facts. It is doubtless sufficient that a probable or prima facie case be made, to justify the granting of an injunction pendente lite, but where, as in this case, it clearly appears that the complaint shows no cause of action, then a preliminary injunction is unauthorized, and the granting of it is error of law, which may be reviewed by this court on appeal. Code, § 190, subd. 2; Allen v. Meyer, 73 N. Y. 1; Wright v. Brown, 67 N. Y. 1; Collins v. Collins, 71 N. Y. 270; Paul v. Munger, 47 N. Y. 469.

The order of the general and special terms should therefore be reversed, with costs. All concur, except RAPALLO, J., dissenting, MILLER and TRACY, JJ., absent.

Order reversed.

STEINAU v. CINCINNATI GAS-LIGHT & COKE CO.

(27 N. E. 545, 48 Ohio St. 324.)

Supreme Court of Ohio. May 5, 1891.

Error to circuit court, Hamilton county.

Action was brought in the court of common pleas by the gas company against the plaintiff in error to obtain an injunction. In its petition the company alleged the execution of the following contract: "This contract, entered into this 16th day of March, 1886, by and between the Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Company and Chas. J. Steinau, proprietor and occupant of the premises known as 'The Palace,' and situated No. 80 West Fourth street, between Walnut and Vine streets, witnesseth: First. The said the Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Company, for and in consideration of the continued use of not less than three-fourths the present average consumption of gas on said premises, or other premises which the party of the second part may occupy or remove to, hereby agrees and binds itself to supply, under existing rules and regulations, at the premises above described,—except in cases of unavoidable accident,—all the gas which may be required to properly illuminate the same, for a period of ten years next ensuing. The gas so furnished shall at no time be of less power or purity than the present legal standard. That it will accept in full payment for gas so furnished in accordance with the terms of this contract the sum of one dollar and thirty cents per thousand cubic feet, if paid at the office of said gas company within the first three business days after presentation of bill for gas supplied during the period covered by said bill, but in case such payment is not made within the time specified, then the price shall be one dollar and forty cents per thousand cubic feet. Second. That the said Charles J. Steinau, for himself, his heirs, or assigns, for and in consideration of the reduction in price above specified, hereby agrees to receive from the said the Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Company all the gas necessary for the proper illumination of the premises above described, or of other premises to which he may remove, in quantity not less than three-fourths of the present average consumption; and that he will not, during the period above named, introduce into or use on said premises oil lamps, electric lights, or other material or power for general illuminating purposes; or any other gas than that supplied by the said the Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Company. Third. It is further agreed and understood by both parties to this contract that if during the period above named the city council shall pass, and the gas company accept, any ordinance by virtue of which the price of gas to all private consumers in said city is reduced below the price above specified, then, in that case, the said Chas. J. Steinau shall not thereafter be required to pay any price in excess of that named in said ordinance; but in all other respects this contract shall continue in force during the period aforesaid." It further alleged, in substance, that at the date of the contract the regular price for gas to private consumers was $1.70 per thousand cubic feet, with a discount of 10 cents per thousand on monthly bills paid within 5 days after presentation. That price continued until February 28, 1887, when the price was fixed by the city council at $1.25, with same rate of discount as before. The average monthly consumption of gas for the current year on the premises would be over 18,000 cubic feet if the defendant fulfilled his contract. The plaintiff duly performed all the stipulations and conditions of the contract on its part, and was ready, able, and willing to continue to do so. But the defendant, disregarding his obligations under the contract, refused to receive all the gas necessary for the proper illumination of the premises, and has introduced and is using for general illuminating purposes material or power other than the gas supplied by plaintiff, viz., the Edison incandescent light. "By means of the light so created the consumption of gas for illuminating purposes will be and has been largely reduced below the quantity agreed to be consumed on said premises, as stated in said contract, if not wholly done away with, and the company will lose the benefit of said contract and the gain and profit it is entitled to therefrom, and will suffer irreparable damage." Wherefore plaintiff asks that defendant be enjoined from using said electric light, or any material other than gas supplied by plaintiff, for general illuminating purposes on said premises, and for such other and further relief as the nature of the case may require. A demurrer to the petition was overruled, and final decree of injunction entered against the defendant. This judgment was affirmed by the circuit court. To reverse both judgments this error proceeding is brought.

Kramer & Kramer, for plaintiff in error.
E. A. Ferguson, for defendant in error.

SPEAR, J. (after stating the facts as above). In consideration of the continued use of not less than three-fourths the present average consumption of gas by Steinau, the company stipulated that it would furnish him, for 10 years, all the gas necessary for the lighting of his place of business at a price much lower than the then regular price, to be paid monthly. Steinau stipulated to receive the gas in quantity not less than three-fourths of the then average monthly consumption, for the time named, and further stipulated not to introduce or use electric lights or material for general illuminating purposes other than gas to be furnished by the company. No past consideration appears. The obligations of each party are wholly in covenant, and are wholly executory. In other words, they are promises merely. The prayer is for injunction to restrain Steinau from using the electric light or any material for general illuminating purposes other than the gas to be furnished by the company. Injunction is frequently resorted to as a means of obtaining specific performance. In this case the purpose intended is to prevent the use of electric lights in order that Steinau shall thus be compelled to comply with his contract, and use the company's gas. The object thus sought is specific performance. Against the demand of the company it is insisted that a court of equity will not grant an injunction to restrain a breach of negative covenants where the result will be to effect specific performance of affirmative covenants unless the affirmative stipulations of the complaining party can be specifically enforced against him, and that the petition does not show but that the company has an adequate remedy at law. If either proposition is sound, the demurrer was improperly overruled. As already stated, the object of the proceeding is, and the result reached, if it is successful, will be, to specifically enforce the contract as against Steinau. It seems plain that, if the situation of the parties were reversed, and specific performance were sought against the company, the court would have no power to compel a full compliance by the company with its stipulations to furnish all the gas needed for the period provided for in the contract. It might be in the power of the court to enjoin the company from turning the gas off from Steinau's service pipes so long as he complied with its reasonable rules and regulations, and it is possible that the company could, by mandamus, be compelled to furnish gas to Steinau while it continued to use the franchises and privileges accorded it as a corporation by virtue of the statute and the ordinances of Cincinnati. But these partial remedies, if they might be available, would be wholly apart from the contract; and, be this as it may, it admits of no question that, upon any state of facts appearing by the allegations of this petition, it is beyond the power of any court to compel the company to manufacture and supply gas for a period of 10 years. How can the court order the company to continue the manufacture of gas for the purpose of supplying this consumer? How can it prevent this company from dissolving and going out of business, or from selling out to another which would not be bound by its personal contracts? The inquiry, then, is, if the contract could not be specifically enforced against the company, may it be specifically enforced in its favor? The authorities on the point are numerous, and, to some extent, conflicting. Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Contracts, § 163, observes: "The peculiarly distinctive feature of the equitable doctrine is that the remedial right to a specific performance must be mutual. If, therefore, from the nature or form of the contract itself, from the relations of the parties, from the personal incapacity of one of them, or from any other cause, the agreement devolves no obligation at all upon one of the parties, or if it cannot be specifically enforced against him, then, and for that reason, he is not in general entitled to remedy of a specific performance against his adversary party, although otherwise there may be no obstacle arising, either from the terms of the contract or from his personal status and relations, to an enforcement of the relief against the latter individually." Again, (section 165,) he says that "it is a familiar doctrine that if the right to the specific performance of a contract exists at all it must be mutual. The remedy must be alike attainable by both parties to the agreement." To this general rule the courts have made an exception where peculiar skill and labor are involved, and this, apparently, upon the ground that the element of personal and artistic skill renders the chances of damages at law uncertain and conjectural. Of this class the case of Lumley v. Wagner, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 604, is perhaps the leading case. The defendant was a celebrated singer. She was under contract to sing for a certain period at the plaintiff's theater, and not to sing at any other. The court restrained her from the threatened breach of this negative covenant. Later cases have followed this, and the exception appears to be quite well established.

There are cases, besides those above referred to, both in England and in this country, which sustain the holding of the circuit court, (2 Ohio Cir. Ct. R. 286,) that "where there is a clear and continuing breach of a negative covenant in a contract, and where an injunction against the breach of it will do substantial justice between the parties by obliging the defendant to carry out his contract or lose the benefit of a breach of it, and the remedy at law is not adequate, or the damages for such a breach are not susceptible of proper assessment by a jury, a court of equity may properly restrain the defendant from such a breach, though the court might not be able to enforce a complete specific performance of the contract against the other party." Singer Sewing-Mach. Co. v. Union Button-Hole, etc., Co., 1 Holmes, 253, Fed. Cas. No. 12,904; Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. New York, etc., Ry. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 516; People v. Gas-Light Co., 45 Barb. 137; Dietrichsen v. Cabburn, 2 Phil. Ch. 52. However, after a somewhat careful examination of the numerous cases cited by counsel, and many others, we are inclined to the conclusion that the general doctrine laid down by Mr. Pomeroy is sustained by the apparent weight of authority. Hills v. Croll, 2 Phil. Ch. 60; Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132; Bailey v. Col- lins, 59 N. H. 459; Pingle v. Conner, 66 Mich. 187, 33 N. W. 385; Iron Age Pub. Co. v. W. U. Tel. Co., 83 Ala. 498, 3 South. 449; Pullman Palace Car Co. v. Texas & P. Ry. Co., 4 Woods, 317, 11 Fed. 625; Meason v. Kaine, 63 Pa. 335; Tyson v. Watts, 1 Md. Ch. 13; Richmond v. Railway Co., 33 Iowa, 423. It is important to note that an essential element of the proposition quoted above is that the complaining party has no adequate remedy at law, and that his damages are not susceptible of proper assessment by a jury. It goes without saying that if this element is found wanting the rule laid down cannot apply. On the part of the company it is insisted that the condition referred to is present in the case at bar. Let us see. The stipulation of Steinau was that he would receive gas in quantity not less than three-fourths of the present average consumption. The contract was to continue for 10 years. It had been in force at the commencement of the action about one year. The "present average consumption" was a quantity easy of ascertainment. So long as Steinau used the quantity of gas specified he was in full performance of his contract. When he ceased taking that quantity he violated the contract, and when he established electric lights in his place, and proceeded to illuminate in that way, it was clear that he intended to wholly break and abandon the contract. The company had the right to regard the contract as at an end, and no pretense or claim of Steinau, so long as he refused to perform, could avail to prevent the company from so treating it. All contractual relations between the parties would then be terminated. By force of the ordinance, and at prices fixed by the ordinance, and subject to all reasonable regulations, the company might still be bound to furnish gas, but it could not be required to furnish a foot of gas under the contract. The contract being thus, by the action of Steinau, at an end so far as he was concerned, the company's cause of action was immediate. It could, if the damages were susceptible of proper assessment at any time, have an action at once for its entire damages for the breach, and this remedy did not involve a multiplicity of suits. James v. Allen Co., 44 Ohio St. 226, 6 N. E. 246, is a case, in principle, like this one. This court there held that where the offending party had wholly broken and abandoned the contract the party injured by the breach could bring his action at once, and recover his entire damages for the breach, and that one judgment upon such claim would be a bar to a future recovery. That rule, we think, applies to this case. What would stand in the way of adequate damages being awarded by a jury? The amount of gas agreed to be used each month, the duration of the time, the price to be paid per thousand, (subject to changes, if any, produced by the new ordinance,) were all shown by the contract. If, added to these facts, the jury should be put in possession of the amount of "gain and profit" the company were making per thousand, what would prevent a clear ascertainment of damages upon that basis, reduced probably on account of payment in advance? Fothergill v. Rowland, L. R. 17 Eq. 132; Chicago, etc., Ry. Co. v. New York, etc., Ry. Co. (C. C.) 24 Fed. 516. It is doubted by some members of the court whether a court of equity, in a case of specific performance, where the granting or refusal of relief may depend so largely upon the court's discretion, should exercise it in favor of the enforcement of covenants which deprive a party of new and valuable discoveries of science, and, in a measure, tend to create a monopoly by contract. But a decision of this question is not necessary to a disposition of the case at bar, and that, as well as whether a court of equity should, in any case, where full performance cannot be enforced, decree performance of negative covenants of one party, may properly be left to be determined when a case arises which necessarily requires a decision upon them. We are content to rest the decision of this case upon the ground that the remedy of the defendant in error is at law, and not in equity.

Judgment reversed.

(23 N. J. Eq. 161.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. May Term, 1872.

Bill for an injunction. Heard on a rule to show cause why an injunction should not issue.

Mr. McCarter, for complainant. I. W. Scudder and Mr. Winfield, for defendants.

ZABRISKIE, Ch. The complainant is a corporation of the state of New York, doing business at Communipaw. The defendant, the stock yard company, a corporation of this state, owns a large and extensive abattoir or slaughter-house at Communipaw. It has not, for some years, slaughtered animals there, but let to butchers the privilege of slaughtering their animals in the abattoir. Previous to August, 1870, the blood and other remains of animals thus slaughtered there by the butchers, not being removed or properly cared for, had created a stench which became a nuisance to the adjoining country, and the company was restrained by an injunction from permitting the business to be carried on there, unless on condition of having the blood and offal perfectly cared for. The butchers paid for the privilege of slaughtering there, and left the blood and offal on the premises, to be cared for by the stock yard company. These difficulties became a serious embarrassment in the enterprise. The complainant undertook to manage this, and to remove and manufacture the blood and other abandoned refuse left on the premises by the butchers, so as to prevent any public or private nuisance that might else arise from them.

To effect the objects of this arrangement, the stock yard company, on the 5th of August, 1870, made a lease to the complainant of certain premises adjoining the abattoir, for the specified business of manufacturing and preparing fertilizers and manures, and the materials for that purpose. The term was for twenty years from April 20th, 1867, with privilege of renewal, and the rent to be paid was fifteen per cent. of the net profits of the business. The lease contained this provision: "The parties of the second part shall also have the refusal and exclusive right of saving and taking all the blood of animals slaughtered in the abattoir and sheep-house of the parties of the first part, and of saving and taking the animal matter and ammonia from the rendering tanks of the parties of the first part, and of using the same in their business;" and also this agreement on part of the complainant: "Said parties of the second part hereby bind themselves to save all that is possible of the blood from the animals slaughtered, and the animal matter and ammonia from the tanks, to prevent any effluvia or stench from escaping, and to prevent any and all nuisance from being created in any manner whatsoever, either in saving the blood, animal matter, or ammonia, or in converting the same into articles of commerce."

The lease was executed by the president of the stock yard company, in the name of the company, by affixing its common seal and his signature. The execution was duly proved, and the lease recorded in Hudson county clerk's office, August 20th, 1870.

The complainant, on faith of the lease, erected on the demised premises expensive buildings and machinery for the purpose of the manufacture. These were completed by January 9th, 1871. In the meantime arrangements had been made by the complainant with the stock company and its employes for coagulating the blood on the premises, and for preventing nuisances arising from slaughtering in the abattoir. Part of this coagulated blood had, with complainant's acquiescence, been delivered to John J. Craven, one of the defendants, for making experiments or manufacturing it.

In April, 1871, the stock yard company leased its abattoir to Henry R. Payson and David H. Sherman, two of the defendants, who have since carried on the business under the name of D. H. Sherman & Co. The defendant, Isaac Freese, who was in the employ of the stock yard company as superintendent, and continued in the employ of D. H. Sherman & Co. in the like capacity, entered into partnership with the defendant Craven, who was also in the employ of the stock yard company at the making of its lease to the complainant, and with the defendant Sherman, under the name of "The Bergen Manufacturing Company," for the purpose of manufacturing albumen and fertilizers.

After January 9th, 1871, the complainant demanded all the blood of the animals slaughtered at the abattoir, but Craven made an arrangement with certain butchers who slaughtered there, for saving and taking the blood of the animals slaughtered by them, and this was permitted by Sherman & Co., and Freese, their superintendent; and a large part of the blood is thus taken and delivered to Sherman, Freese and Craven, and is lost to the complainant.

By the record of the lease to the complainant, Sherman, Craven and Freese had constructive notice of its contents, and also it is clear that they, as well as Payson, had actual notice. They do not deny this, but take the ground that the blood, like all other parts of the animal slaughtered, belongs to the butcher, and that they or the stock yard company can no more control or deliver it than they could control the flesh or hides. That the butchers having discovered that the blood has a merchantable value, have a right to dispose of it for their own benefit; and that when they had determined to sell it, and not to abandon it, Craven was under no obligation not to buy it, and his firm might receive it through him without breach of faith.

This defence, at first sight, is seemingly good; but it wholly rests upon the correctness of the premises, to wit, that the stock yard company had not the right or power to control the disposition of the blood. It is not claimed that it had, before the complainant's lease, granted to any one the privilege of slaughtering there. If it had, for a term unexpired, it would have lost the control. Before that, they had permitted butchers to slaughter there without any provision about disposing of the blood or offal. It may, by custom, have been the effect of such contract, that the butcher might leave the blood and offal to be removed by the company. If left, the company was liable for any nuisance occasioned by it. It cannot be doubted that the company could have required, as a condition, that the butcher should remove the blood and offal. It had the right to prevent any one from using the abattoir who would not comply. Before the lease to the complainant, this condition would have been deemed a burden on the butchers, and might have injured the business of the company. It was in difficulty by reason of the nuisance caused by leaving these matters, and the injunction growing out of it. It was relieved by this lease. The consideration was the exclusive right to take the blood and offal which was secured by covenant to the complainant. After that, the company had the same right to demand of every one using the abattoir that he should leave these matters for the complainant, as it had to require him to remove them. This could have been annexed as a condition to every permission to use the abattoir, as well as the condition to pay for the use. And this, by its covenant, the company was bound to do. D. H. Sherman & Co., as the lessees, are bound by the same covenant. And Freese, Craven and Sherman having notice of this obligation before they commenced their business, are bound to refrain from interfering with these rights of the complainant, and from taking the blood and other matters which it is entitled to take. Tulk v. Moxhay, 2 Phila. 774; De Mattos v. Gibson, 4 De Gex & J. 276.

The facts that Freese and Craven transferred to the complainant their claim to a patent for making albumen from blood, and took part in the arrangements for the lease by the company in whose employ they were, and that Craven interfered by these negotiations with the butchers after he was repulsed in his attempt to get into the employ of the complainant, do not give greater validity to the complainant's right; they may show bad faith and vindictiveness, and that they are not entitled to any favorable consideration beyond their legal rights.

The injunction applied for is not a mandatory injunction; it is not to require the delivery of the blood, but to restrain Craven from taking it, and the other defendants from suffering or permitting any other person than the complainant to take it.

For this injury there is a remedy at law, but it is not an adequate remedy. The value of the blood is no measure of the injury, and it is hardly possible to compute the damages which the injury may occasion. And redress at law could only be obtained by a continued series of suits through the twenty or forty years of the complainant's term. It is a case peculiarly proper for the preventive remedy by injunction. Shreve v. Black, 4 N. J. Eq. 177.

The defendants, in their answers, deny that the seal of the stock yard company was affixed to the lease by authority of the directors. The bill alleges that the stock yard company made and executed the lease under its corporate seal, and sets out a lease with the seal affixed, and signed by the president. The answer of the company is not verified by any one who has knowledge of the facts. The present secretary swears that he believes the facts to be true. Any deed of a corporation, under its corporate seal and signed by the proper officer, is presumed to have been executed by authority of the corporation, until the contrary is clearly shown. Leggett v. New Jersey Manuf'g & Banking Co., 1 N. J. Eq. 541. There is no proof here to overcome this presumption.

The injunction must issue as prayed for.

GODFREY v. BLACK.

(17 Pac. 849, 39 Kan. 193.)

Supreme Court of Kansas. April 7, 1888.

Error to district court, Sedgwick county; C. Reed, Judge.

Action of injunction, commenced by Robert Black against F. S. Roberts and M. O. Roberts, partners as Roberts Bros., and C. E. Godfrey, to restrain Roberts Bros. from subletting any portion of the Manhattan Hotel, situated in the city of Wichita, and to restrain C. E. Godfrey from occupying the hotel office as a real-estate and brokerage office. In his petition, Black stated, in substance, that he was the owner of the premises, and had constructed the building thereon to be used as a first-class hotel, and that he let the same to the Roberts Bros., to be used as an hotel, from the 1st day of July, 1885, to the 1st day of July, 1886, for a stipulated rent, payable in monthly installments. It was further provided in the lease, which was in writing, that Roberts Bros. might elect to take the premises for the further period of four years after July 1, 1886, upon the same terms, by giving to Black a written notice of such election at any time prior to the 1st day of May, 1886. In pursuance of that stipulation, Roberts Bros., within the time, elected to retain the lease for the additional four years, and gave written notice to that effect to the plaintiff. It was further provided in the lease that Roberts Bros. might carry on any business in the building incident to the hotel business; but it was expressly stipulated that they should not lease nor underlet, nor permit any persons to occupy the premises, without the consent of the plaintiff in writing having been first obtained. He alleges that he has never given Roberts Bros. any consent to occupy the building for any purpose other than that of an hotel, nor to lease or underlet the building or any part thereof, nor to permit any persons to occupy the same except as guests of the hotel. He alleges that the premises were to be occupied only as an hotel, and that it is injurious to the hotel to carry on, in the office thereof, the business of a real-estate agency and brokerage, and that it is such an injury as cannot be compensated in damages. Notwithstanding the premises, he avers that Roberts Bros. have leased to C. E. Godfrey a portion of the hotel building used as the hotel office; and that Godfrey, his agents and employes, are occupying the same as a real-estate office and place of business. He further states that Roberts Bros. are threatening and intending to continue said lease and underletting to Godfrey, and that Godfrey intends to occupy the room in the transaction of the real-estate business, against the protest and without Black's consent, and to his irreparable injury. He asks that injunction issue prohibiting Roberts Bros. from leasing or underletting the hotel building and premises, or any part thereof, to Godfrey for a real-estate office, and restraining Godfrey and his agents and employes from occupying the office of the hotel, or any part thereof, as a real-estate office. The petition was verified and introduced in evidence in support of the application for a temporary injunction. In addition, the affidavits of several persons were offered, tending to show that the carrying on of a real-estate business in the office of a first-class hotel brings a crowd and an excitement which interferes with the convenience and comfort of guests, and tends to drive them away, and to render the hotel unpopular. C. E. Godfrey testified that he had leased from Roberts Bros. a space 8 by 20 feet, in the corner of the hotel office, and put a railing around and furnished the same, and was carrying on a real-estate business therein. Upon a hearing had upon due notice, a temporary injunction was granted against Godfrey during the pendency of the action, enjoining him, and his agents and employes, from further using any portion of the office of the hotel as a real-estate office. To reverse the order granting the temporary injunction, C. E. Godfrey brings the case to this court.

Sankey & Campbell, for plaintiff in error.
Campbell & Dyer, for defendant in error.

JOHNSTON, J. (after stating the facts as above). We see no reason to disturb the order granting the temporary injunction. The building in question was constructed for use as a first-class hotel, was rented for that purpose, and it was expressly specified in the lease that the lessee should not sublet the premises, or permit any one else to occupy the same, without the consent in writing of the lessor having first been obtained. In direct violation of the terms of the lease, Roberts Bros. sublet a portion of the hotel office, to be used by Godfrey in carrying on a business inconsistent with the hotel business, and which, the testimony says, detracts from the reputation and popularity of the house. They had no right to sublet or permit the hotel to be used by Godfrey, and he acquired no right by the agreement made with them.

It is claimed that injunction is not the proper remedy in such case; and actions to recover possession and to recover damages for trespass, where the defendants could have the issues submitted to a jury, are suggested. The lessor is not confined to these remedies, nor are they adequate. He has a right to insist that the covenants of the lease shall be observed, and that the premises shall be used only for the purposes agreed upon. It does not appear that the lease was to terminate upon a breach of the covenants; but, even if the lessor had a right to re-enter, that would not preclude him from obtaining equitable relief to prevent a forbidden use of the premises. Presumably the continuance of the lease for the full term is beneficial to the lessor, and he is entitled to a performance in accordance with the contract made. Upon this ground the mere re-entry is held to be an inadequate remedy, as it does not leave the lessor in as good a position as the enforcement of performance by the tenant would leave him in. Bodwell v. Crawford, 26 Kan. 292, is cited as an authority against maintaining the action. The two cases are very dissimilar. There no contractual relation existed between the parties, and the possession of the premises by the defendant was wholly unauthorized. In giving the opinion in that case, the writer carefully distinguished it from those like the present one; holding that injunction to restrain parties from putting leased property to a use not authorized by the lease could be maintained. In speaking of a re-entry by the landlord, it was there remarked: "True, he may perhaps declare the lease forfeited, and recover the property; but he may not desire to do this. He may not be able to lease for the same rent, or to an equally responsible tenant; and the lessee ought not to be permitted to compel the lessor either to take back the property or tolerate a forbidden use." Stees v. Kranz, 32 Minn. 313, 20 N. W. 241; 2 High, Inj. §§ 1138, 1144.

Neither is the right of the lessor to bring an action to recover compensatory damages for the trespass a sufficient ground for withholding the remedy of injunction. Equitable relief may be properly extended in some cases against trespass. An action at law against the trespasser here would not be an adequate remedy. A new cause of action would arise every day for the constantly recurring grievance, which would lead to a multiplicity of suits; and the necessity of preventing these is an exception which warrants the exercise of the equitable jurisdiction of the court. Besides, the lessor has a right to insist upon his property being used in the manner fixed by agreement in the lease; and the testimony tends to show that the carrying on of the real-estate business in the office of the hotel will deteriorate its value, and seriously injure the hotel; and in such cases equity will interfere to restrain the continuance of the injury. 2 High, Inj. § 1142; Steward v. Winters, 4 Sandf. Ch. 587; Macher v. Hospital, 1 Ves. & B. 188; Stees v. Kranz, 32 Minn. 313, 20 N. W. 241.

Under the pleadings and the proofs, the temporary injunction was properly allowed, and the order granting the same will be affirmed.

All the justices concurring.

APPEAL OF McCLURG.

(58 Pa. 51.)

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 20, 1868.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Chester county. In equity.

Dr. Benjamin Thompson filed a bill against Dr. John R. McClurg, averring as follows: That the defendant, being a practicing physician at Ohandlerville, Chester county, agreed, on the 22d of January, 1859, with the plaintiff, to sell him his office fixtures and furniture, etc., with his good will in his profession, for $125, and bound himself to remove not less than twelve miles from the place, and never thereafter to establish himself as a physician within twelve miles without the plaintiff's consent, to use his influence to throw his practice to the benefit of the plaintiff, and give countenance to no other in that direction, averring further that the defendant had established himself as a physician within five miles of his former location without the plaintiff's consent. The bill prayed that he might be restrained from practice in his present location, and from establishing himself elsewhere within the prescribed limits.

The answer alleged that the fixtures, etc., were worth at least $300; that the agreement as written did not contain the whole agreement of the parties; that the restraint was to have application only so long as the plaintiff should remain on the property then occupied by the defendant; that the plaintiff had ceased to occupy that property, and the defendant had not interfered and did not intend to interfere with the plaintiff's practice.

The case was referred to Joseph Hemphill, Esq., as examiner and master.

The agreement given in evidence is dated January 22, 1859, and, besides the agreement to sell to the plaintiff the defendant's fixtures, etc., "with the good will of his profession," for $125, contains this covenant:

"The said J. R. McClurg hereby binds and pledges himself to remove not less than twelve miles from his present location, and for ever hereafter not to establish himself in the practice of his profession, within twelve miles, without the free consent of the said Dr. Thompson; also to use all his influence to throw all his practice to the benefit of the said Thompson, and to give countenance to no other in that direction."

The evidence of plaintiff was that defendant moved away in the spring of 1859, and the plaintiff left his residence, gave up his practice at another place, and went into the property, where he remained till the summer of 1864, when he moved to a house about three-quarters of a mile from it, and shortly afterwards removed about a quarter of a mile further: he continued to practice as a physician; defendant moved to Prestonville, five or six miles from his former place, with the declared intention of practicing as a physician; that there was nothing in the article to which the defendant had not assented.

The defendant gave evidence that $125 was the price only of the articles sold, and the scrivener added "good will"; also that the restraint was applicable only whilst the plaintiff occupied defendant's former place.

The master reported that the evidence sustained the allegations of the bill, and that there was no evidence offered of fraud or mistake in drawing the agreement, and reported in conclusion:

"Upon the whole, neither fraud or mistake having been established, the subscriber is of opinion that the plaintiff having proven his bill, and the defendant failed to establish any effective answer thereto, the law and equity of the case gives to the plaintiff the right to the injunction prayed for and costs of suit."

Exceptions were filed by the defendant to the report, which was confirmed, and the court (Butler, P. J.) decreed that "an injunction be issued restraining the defendant from establishing himself in the practice of his profession of medicine within the limits of twelve miles from the location on the 22d day of January, 1859, or remaining, as at present established, within said limits, and from practicing his said profession within the circle of his practice at the date aforesaid."

The defendant appealed, and assigned the decree for error.

W. Darlington, for appellant. W. MacVeagh and J. S. Futhey, for appellee.

SHARSWOOD, J. That contracts restraining the exercise of a trade or profession in particular localities are valid, when there is a fair and reasonable ground for the restriction, as in the case of the sale of the good will of a trade or business when the vendor covenants not to pursue the same business within certain prescribed limits, is beyond question. The leading case is Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, in which C. J. Parker delivered a long and elaborate opinion. The doctrine has been at rest ever since, as Lord Kenyon declared in Davis v. Mason, 5 T. R. 118, in which a bond by a surgeon not to practice within ten miles of the place where the obligee lived was held good, and a similar undertaking by an apothecary, not to set up his business within twenty miles, was sustained in Hayward v. Young, 2 Chit. 407. The appellee had therefore a clear legal right under his contract. Ought a court of equity to enforce it by injunction?

When Mr. Eden wrote his valuable treatise on the law of injunction, he stated that he had not been able to find any reported cases in which the court had interfered by that process to restrain the breach of such a covenant. He admits, however, that it may be inferred from Lord Eldon's observations in Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. 335, that there is no reasonable objection to the exercise of such a jurisdiction. Eden, Inj. 223, 224. In that case, however, there was no contract, but merely the sale of a trade with the good will, which, without express covenant or fraud, was held not to prevent the vendor from setting up the same business. Lord Eldon said, "A man might stand by and give encouragement generating a confidence that he would not engage in such a trade, inducing other persons to involve themselves, on the ground of which conduct this court might interpose." If equity would enforce an implied contract within reasonable limits, a fortiori they ought to interfere in the case of an express one. Accordingly several subsequent decisions both in England and America have acted on this principle. Harrison v. Gardner, 2 Madd. 198, was the case of a retiring partner, who, according to the statement of the bill, had given an assurance verbally that he would not set up in the same line of business in the street in which it had been carried on before, or its immediate vicinity. The vice chancellor, Sir Thomas Plumer, said, "Suppose there was no dispute as to the facts stated in the bill, but that they were admitted, it is clear the court would relieve." In Williams v. Williams, 2 Swanst. 253, Lord Eldon granted an injunction in a similar case of a retiring partner where, however, there was an express agreement in writing. Butler v. Burleson, 16 Vt. 176, was like this, a contract between two practicing physicians, and it was enforced by injunction. "When there is an express covenant," said C. J. Williams, "and an uncontroverted mischief arising from the breach of it, equity will grant an injunction to restrain the breach. In this case there is an express contract. The mischief arising from the breach of it cannot be repaired, nor can it well be estimated. A suit at law would afford no adequate remedy, and the damages will be continuing and accruing from day to day, and, furthermore, the object of the contract can only be obtained by the parties conforming expressly and exactly to its terms. It seems, therefore, to be a very proper case for a court of chancery to enforce the contract by granting an injunction to prevent the breach of it, according to the acknowledged principle on which courts of equity act in similar cases." The same doctrine was maintained in Beard v. Dennis, 6 Ind. 200. Judge King also recognized it as established in Palmer v. Graham, 1 Pars. Eq. Cas. 476, and awarded an injunction on the ground of the inadequacy of an action at law to give the party aggrieved a full and perfect remedy for such a breach of good faith.

We see nothing to distinguish this from the cases cited. It has been objected that the consideration was inadequate. Upon that subject C. J. Tindal, delivering the opinion of the court of exchequer chamber, in Hitchcock v.

Coker, 6 Adol. & E. 438, said: "If there is no consideration, or a consideration of no real value, the contract in restraint of trade, which in itself is never favored in law, must either be a fraud upon the rights of the party restrained, or a mere voluntary contract, nudum pactum, and therefore void. But if, by adequacy of consideration, more is intended, and that the court must weigh whether the consideration is equal in value to that which the party gives up or loses by the restraint under which he has placed himself, we feel ourselves bound to differ from that doctrine. A duty would thereby be imposed upon the court, in every particular case, which it has no means whatever to execute. It is impossible for the court, looking at the record, to say whether in any particular case the party restrained has made an improvident bargain or not." This is not like a bill for the specific performance of an unexecuted contract, where, if the bargain is a hard one or founded on an inadequate consideration, a chancellor will refuse to interfere, but leave the party to his legal remedy. This agreement was fully executed. The appellant removed, and the appellee, on the faith of it, gave up his practice at the place where he was before established, and settled in the new neighborhood. He cannot be put in statu quo. We cannot, by our decree, restore to him the practice he has given up, nor could any damages a jury would give be an adequate compensation. Even if it should be a sum which would purchase a life annuity equal to his former income, that would not provide for that increase from year to year which enlarged experience and widening reputation would, in all probability, have insured to him had he remained where he was. The appellant has returned and established himself within the prescribed limits in violation of his agreement. It was said that he did not mean to interfere with the appellee's practice; but how can he well avoid it if he is called upon by his old patients and others? It was with a view to this that the contract stipulated that he should not establish himself in the practice of his profession within twelve miles. This distance was doubtless named because it was considered sufficient to render the practice in the appellant's old circle, reaching a distance of five or six miles on either side, secure to the appellee. We agree with the court below that such a restraint is not unreasonable, nor greater than the appellee's protection may require.

Decree affirmed at the costs of the appellant.

THOMPSON, C. J., dissenting, not on the ground of want of power in the court, but because not a case in which specific performance should be decreed, but the party left to his action at law.

GRAND RAPIDS SCHOOL FURNITURE
CO. v. HANEY SCHOOL FURNI-TURE CO. et al.

Supreme Court of Michigan. July 28, 1892.

Appeal from circuit court, Kent county, in chancery; William E. Grove, Judge.

Bill by the Grand Rapids School Furniture Company against the Haney School Furniture Company, Elijah Haney, and George A. Bullard for an injunction. There was a demurrer to the bill, which was sustained, and complainant brings error. Reversed.

Taggart, Wolcott & Ganson, for appellants. Taggart & Denison, for appellees.

LONG, J. The bill of complaint in this case alleges that the complainant is a manufacturing corporation, having its office and manufactory at Grand Rapids; that ever since its organization, in 1887, the defendants have been engaged in circulating thousands of circulars, containing the statement that the goods of complainant infringed a certain patent issued to the defendant Haney, who was and is the president of the corporation, and threatening to bring suit against any and all persons purchasing or using goods of the complainant's manufactory; that these claims and threats were made in bad faith, and with full knowledge that the patent was invalid, and that the complainant was in possession of facts and proofs sufficient to defeat any suit that might be brought for its infringement; that said threats were made for the purpose of intimidating parties who were likely to be customers of the complainant, and had to a considerable extent accomplished their object; but no suits having been brought for infringement of said patent, the threats had lost their force, and hence a fraudulent and collusive suit had been instituted for the purpose of obtaining a decree which could be used to deceive and intimidate the public; that such decree had been obtained, and the defendants had begun to use it for the purpose aforesaid, and were intending so to use it continuously, and on a very large scale, to the great injury of the complainant's business, though the amount of such injury was very difficult to prove or determine by any accurate measure. The prayer of the bill is that the defendants may be perpetually enjoined and restrained from stating, publishing, or claiming, in any manner, that the said decree is anything other or different from a decree obtained by collusion, and from claiming that it is an adjudication upon the merits as to the validity of the said Haney patent, and from using such decree in any way or form to influence or threaten any person or party against purchasing the school furniture manufactured and sold by the complainant. To this bill the Haney School Furniture Company, one of the said defendants, filed a general demurrer; and, the case having come on to be heard thereon, the court held that the bill of complaint did not set up any facts giving a court of equity jurisdiction to grant relief, and entered a decree sustaining the demurrer, and dismissing the complainant's bill. From this decree the complainant appeals to this court.

The English courts, by recent decisions, have exercised the injunctive jurisdiction to restrain injurious publications concerning property which operate as a slander of the owner's title, and libelous publications which are injurious to the plaintiff's business, trade, or profession, and the wrongful use of a name by which the public would be misled, and the plaintiff injured in his business. Thus far, however, most of the American courts seem unwilling to follow the example of the recent English decisions, and decline to extend the jurisdiction, so as to restrain such torts as libels on business, slanders of title, and the like. In Massachusetts the English decisions are expressly repudiated. Boston Diatite Co. v. Florence Manuf'g Co., 114 Mass. 69; Whitehead v. Kitson, 119 Mass. 484. Injunctions to restrain libelous publications concerning plaintiff's business were also refused in Association v. Boogher, 3 Mo. App. 173; Mauger v. Dick, 55 How. Prac. 132; and Singer Manuf'g Co. v. Domestic Sew. Mach. Co., 49 Ga. 70. In the case of Emack v. Kane, 34 Fed. 46, Judge Blodgett allowed the injunction. It appears that Kane issued and widely distributed circulars in which he claimed that Emack's goods infringed his patent. He stated that he should not sue Emack, but should bring suits against all customers of Emack, and collect royalty and damages from all of them. Judge Blodgett said: "The gravamen of this case is an attempted intimidation by the defendant of complainant's customers by threatening them with suits which defendant did not intend to prosecute. * * * If a court of equity cannot restrain an attack like this upon a man's business, then the party is certainly remediless, because an action at law in most cases would do no good, and his ruin would be accomplished before an adjudication could be reached." In the recent case of Casey v. Typographical Union, 45 Fed. 135, the case of Emack v. Kane, supra, was cited and approved by Judge Sage. It appeared in the Casey Case that parties had conspired together to injure the complainant in his business. Circulars were gotten out and widely distributed, containing threats of pecuniary loss and injury to those who should do business with the complainant. The claim was made in that case, as in this, that equity had no jurisdiction, because the injurious publication was merely a libel on complainant's business, and, for any loss which the union inflicted, he had a plain and adequate remedy at law. Judge Sage remarked, however, that it is idle to say that such publications are nothing more than libels, and that the only remedy for the injury inflicted is an action at law; that, while they have certain characteristics of libels, they are more than libels, and there is no plain and adequate remedy at law for such injuries.

We think the bill in this case states a case materially different from the Massachusetts cases and the other cases holding that equity has no jurisdiction to restrain a libel. Here it is claimed and alleged in the bill that Elijah Haney and the Haney School Furniture Company entered into a conspiracy with defendant Bullard to obtain a decree in favor of Haney and against Bullard, which might and should be used by the conspirators to injure the complainant. The fact is recited that, in pursuance of such conspiracy, a bill was filed in the United States court for the eastern district of Michigan, and a decree obtained by fraud and collusion, for the purpose of benefiting the trade of the Haney School Furniture Company at the expense of complainant; that the defendants well knew the patent was invalid; and that the complainant was in possession of facts and proofs sufficient to defeat any suit that might be brought for the infringement of said patent. The prayer of the bill is, not that defendants be enjoined from making whatever claims they see fit concerning their patent, nor from threatening to bring suits, even though such threats be made in bad faith; but that the defendants be restrained from using a decree fraudulently and collusively obtained to the injury of complainant, and from claiming that such decree is an adjudication upon the merits as to the validity of such patent; or from using it in any way or form to influence or threaten any person or party against purchasing the school furniture manufactured and sold by complainant. The case, as stated in the bill, is certainly more than a mere claim for an injunction arising out of a libel of complainant's business. A conspiracy is claimed to have been entered into between the defendants for the very purpose of injuring the complainant, and that by such conspiracy a false and fraudulent decree was obtained, settling the rights of the Haney School Furniture Company to the patent, under which the complainant was and is operating; that the defendants are publishing to the world, and especially to the customers of the complainant, that such decree was valid, the defendants well knowing it to be false and fraudulent; and that, in any court where the complainant had the right to appear and be heard, it could establish the fact that such patent was absolutely void, and that Mr. Haney and the Haney School Furniture Company had no rights under it, and that complainant was legally entitled to its use. Admitting that the weight of authority in this country is against the proposition that a court of equity has jurisdiction by injunction to restrain the publication of a libel upon one's business, it is no answer to the questions here raised. The complainant has no adequate remedy at law, under the circumstances here stated. It cannot be said that it should lie by and wait the slow and uncertain processes of a suit for damages for its redress. Under the charge in the bill, which we must take as true, the complainant is rightfully operating under such patent, and it has no remedy adequate for the fraud and wrong perpetrated upon it, except as aided by a court of equity. The facts stated make a much stronger case than those in Casey v. Typographical Union, supra, calling for the aid of the injunctive power of a court of equity. The decree of the court below must be reversed, with costs, and the demurrer overruled. The defendants will have 20 days to answer the bill. The other justices concurred.

O. & W. THUM CO. v. TLOCZYNSKI.

Supreme Court of Michigan. Sept. 14, 1897.

Appeal from circuit court, Kent county, in chancery; Allen C. Adsit, Judge.

Bill by the O. & W. Thum Company against Appollonious A. Tloczynski. From a decree for complainant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Certain of the secrets sought to be protected by this bill were protected by patent, while others were not.

C. L. Fitch (Frederick W. Stevens, of counsel), for appellant. Earle & Hyde and Butterfield & Keeney, for appellee.

MOORE, J. The complainant is the successor of the firm of O. & W. Thum, who were manufacturers of sticky fly paper. It filed a bill of complaint to restrain defendant communicating to others the secret processes and methods, and the knowledge of secret machinery, which were learned by him while in the employ of O. & W. Thum. The court below granted an injunction, as prayed in the bill of complaint. Defendant appeals.

The testimony is voluminous, and very conflicting. We are satisfied, however, that it establishes, by a very clear preponderance, as follows: The defendant entered the employ of O. & W. Thum in 1887. They at that time were manufacturing sticky fly paper by machinery, and from formulæ known only to themselves. They at that time had but one man and one boy in their employ. The business was carried on in the attic of the house, and in a small building in the back yard. The processes and machinery that were regarded as secret, and of great value to the firm, were used only by the members of the firm. As the business grew, it became necessary to employ more persons, and among others employed was the defendant. Because of the increase in the business and the employment of more persons, other precautions were taken, as the necessity grew for taking them. The public were excluded from the premises. The employes at one machine were not allowed to inspect other machines used in the manufacture, and were not allowed to visit all portions of the premises. Very rigid and careful requirements were made and enforced to guard the formulæ, the processes of manufacture, and knowledge of the machinery used, so that no one could learn them, or either of them, to the detriment of the firm. The business of the firm steadily grew in magnitude, so that when defendant left its employ, in 1892, about $100,000 was invested in the business, and a large number of persons were given employment. Shortly before this bill was filed, complainant received the following letter: "Grand Rapids, Mich., Jan. 7, 1893. The O. & W. Thum Co., City. Mr. Wm. Thum—Dear Sir: It is about fifteen months since I left your shops, and during that time have been more or less troubled by outside people in regards to fly paper and its manipulations at your works; not so much so until lately, when there were representatives from two large firms, one from Ohio, which was represented by the president and their attorney, which I looked up in G. R. Dun's, who quote them at $500,000, who were here for one week, and were directed by some people here in the city to me. They told me that they had sufficient artillery to put the paper on the market, but were a little short on cavalry in its workings; also told me that they were ready at any time to make arrangements,—that is, as soon as I say yes. I can show letters from the above firm and others. I have not said a single word of its manufacture since I left you, but do not think it's my place to keep mum unless you desire it. Awaiting your early reply, I remain, yours, truly, A. A. Tloczynski." It very soon became evident that defendant was negotiating with others to engage in the manufacture of the same product the complainants were making, and this bill was filed.

The terms of employment were not reduced to writing, and there is a sharp conflict of testimony between the defendant and O. & W. Thum as to the terms of his employment, so that it becomes necessary to consider carefully all the testimony in the case to arrive at the truth. One cannot read all the testimony, in the light of the facts and circumstances surrounding the condition of the business at the commencement of the defendant's employment, and its subsequent development and growth, without coming to the conclusion that the defendant and his employer regarded his relation to them as a confidential one, and that he should not disclose or make improper use of the secrets of the business. The conclusion is irresistible that defendant would not have been employed, and information which was imparted to him would not have been conveyed, if it had been understood that he might sever his relations with his employers at any time, and sell the valuable information which had been imparted to him whenever he could find a market. The inception, growth, and development of the business; the manner in which it was conducted; the care taken to exclude the public from means of obtaining knowledge of the processes; the fact that, when new machinery was to be constructed, part of it was got at one place, and part at another, so that no person outside of the members of the firm and their immediate employes, should see a completed machine in operation; the fact that employes in one department of the manufactory were not allowed in other departments; and the care which was taken to prevent employes from obtaining knowledge of any branch of the business, except that in which the employé was immediately engaged, of all of which the defendant had knowledge,—all indicate conclusively that the business and processes were secret, and that no one knew that fact better than the defendant. We think it clearly established by the testimony that the employment was upon the agreement that defendant would not use the information imparted to him to the harm of his employer.

In our view, the only important question involved in the case is whether an employé, when his employment terminates, may make use of secrets confided to him by his employer, necessary to be confided to him in the conduct of the business, when it is understood and agreed that he shall not make use of the secret knowledge so imparted to the detriment of the employer, and, if he attempts so to do, may he be restrained by writ of injunction?

It is said by counsel that the remedy by injunction will not be granted in such a case as this, where, from the nature of the subject, there could be no decree for a specific performance; citing Newbery v. James, 2 Mer. 446; Williams v. Williams, 3 Mer. 157; Kimberley v. Jennings, 6 Sim. 340.

It is also said that a decree for a specific performance will not be granted where the court has not the means of seeing that its decree shall be carried out; citing Voorhies v. Frisbie, 25 Mich. 482; Blanchard v. Railway Co., 31 Mich. 43; Bumpus v. Bumpus, 53 Mich. 346, 19 N. W. 29. An examination of the Michigan cases cited shows that in those cases the court was asked to decree the performance of an affirmative act, where the agreement was of an indefinite and uncertain character, instead of being asked to enforce a definite agreement not to do an act. As to the other cases, if they tend to sustain the contention of the defendant, they are contrary to the great weight of authority. Is it not true that, if one discovers a process of manufacture or an invention which is of use to individuals and the community, he has a property right in it, and that an agreement which must be respected may be made in relation to keeping the process of manufacture or the invention a secret between the discoverer or owner and an employé, which agreement is made one of the conditions of the employment? It has been said by a very able justice: "If one invents or discovers and keeps secret a process of manufacture, whether a proper subject for a patent or not, he has not, indeed, an exclusive right to it as against the public, or against those who, in good faith, acquire knowledge of it; but he has a property in it which a court of chancery will protect against one who, in violation of contract and breach of confidence, undertakes to apply it to his own use, or to disclose it to third persons. Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452." And, again, Mr. Justice Gray, who delivers the opinion, says: "In this court it is settled that a secret art is a legal subject of property, and that a bond for the conveyance of the exclusive right to it is not open to the objection of being in restraint of trade, but may be enforced by action at law, and requires the obligor not to divulge the secret to any other person. Vickery v. Welch, 19 Pick. 523; Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 373, 374. In Jarvis v. Peck, 10 Paige, 118, such a bond was held valid in equity." In Salomon v. Hertz, 40 N. J. Eq. 400, 2 Atl. 379, the court adopts the language of Justice Gray, and holds that there is a property in a secret process of manufacture. Hardware Co. v. Waibel (S. D.) 47 N. W. 814.

A recent and instructive case is that of Eastman Co. v. Reichenbach (Sup.) 20 N. Y. Supp. 110. "To briefly summarize, then, the established facts of this case, it appears that the plaintiff is the owner of valuable trade secrets, which were either discovered by one or more of the defendants, or necessarily disclosed to them, while occupying a confidential relation towards the plaintiff; that as to such trade secrets as were discovered by either Reichenbach or Passavant, they have undertaken and agreed to give plaintiff the exclusive property in and control over the same; and that, in violation of this agreement, they are now proposing to make use of them, or some of them, in such a manner as to materially injure the plaintiff's business. With these facts established, the application of the legal principles which must govern the disposition of the case does not appear to be a very formidable undertaking. It may be safely assumed at the outset, I think, that whatever remedy plaintiff may have does not reside in a court of law. The very nature of the case, the peculiar character of the injury liable to be inflicted, and the incalculable damages which may possibly result, all show most conclusively that legal relief is totally inadequate for plaintiff's protection, and that its only resort must be to a court of equity. The learned counsel for defendants has contended, with all the adroitness and skill at his command, which is but another way of saying that such contention has been put forth with all possible adroitness and skill, that this case is not one of which a court of equity can take jurisdiction; and several authorities of both English and American courts are cited in support of this claim. I am constrained, however, to hold that the weight of authority is opposed to his view of the law. The question presented is an interesting one, and would justify a somewhat analytical review of the cases which bear upon either aspect of it did time permit; but, for the purposes of this adjudication, it will be necessary to advert to such only as are deemed conclusive upon this court. In Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241, which is an English case, it was held that an injunction would issue to restrain the use of a secret in the compounding of a medicine not being the subject of a patent, and to restrain the sale of such medicine by a party who acquired knowledge of the secret in violation of the contract of the party by whom it was communicated, and in breach of trust and confidence. An appeal was taken from the decision of the vice chancellor, and in 1852 the case was affirmed by the court of chancery, and it was there held that 'there is no doubt whatever that where a party who has a secret in trade employs persons under contract, either express or implied, or under duty, express or implied, those persons cannot gain knowledge of that secret, and then set it up against their employers.' Morison v. Moat, 21 Law J. Ch. 248. In 1868 the supreme court of Massachusetts recognized and followed the authority of Morison v. Moat, and in the opinion of Gray, J., the law is thus stated: If a party 'invents or discovers and keeps secret a process of manufacture, whether a proper subject for a patent or not, he has not indeed an exclusive right to it as against the public, or against those who in good faith acquire knowledge of it, but he has property in it which a court of chancery will protect against one who, in violation of contract and breach of confidence, undertakes to apply it to his own use, or to disclose it to a third person. The jurisdiction in equity to interfere by injunction to prevent such a breach of trust when the injury would be irreparable, and the remedy at law inadequate, is well established by authority.' Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452. The language above quoted was cited with approval in Salomon v. Hertz, 40 N. J. Eq. 400, 2 Atl. 379, and it is almost identical with that employed by elementary writers of recognized standing in discussing the same question. Judge Story says: 'Courts of equity will restrain a party from making a disclosure of secrets communicated to him in the course of a confidential employment, and it matters not in such cases whether the secrets are secrets of trade or secrets of title, or any other secrets of the party important to its interest.' 2 Story, Eq. Jur. 952. See, also, 1 High. Inj. (2d Ed.) p. 15. The same doctrine has obtained in this state for at least half a century, and has been enunciated by a line of decisions which, with a single exception, is unbroken. Jarvis v. Peck, 10 Paige, 118; Hammer v. Barnes, 26 How. Prac. 174; Champlin v. Stoddart, 30 Hun, 300; Tabor v. Hoffman, 118 N. Y. 30, 23 N. E. 12. The Champlin Case was decided by the general term of this department, Smith, P. J., writing the opinion, in the course of which he takes occasion to say that 'a secret in trade is fully recognized as property in equity, the disclosure of which will be restrained by injunction.' By a careful reading of the various decisions upon this subject, it will be seen that some are made to depend upon a breach of an express contract between the parties, while others proceed upon the theory that where a confidential relation exists between two or more parties engaged in a business venture, the law raises an implied contract between them that the employé shall not divulge any trade secret imparted to him or discovered by him in the course of his employment, and that a disclosure of such secrets, thus acquired, is a breach of trust, and a violation of good morals, to prevent which a court of equity should intervene. It should also be observed in this connection that the word 'property,' as applied to trade secrets and trade inventions, has its limitations; for it is undoubtedly true that when an article manufactured by some secret process, which is not the subject of a patent, is thrown upon the market, the whole world is at liberty to discover, if it can by any fair means, what the process is, and, when the discovery is thus made, to employ it in the manufacture of similar articles. In such a case the manufacturer's or inventor's property in his process is gone, but the authorities all hold that, while knowledge obtained in this manner is perfectly legitimate, that which is obtained by any breach of confidence cannot be sanctioned; and this distinction is quite forcibly presented in a recent decision of the court of appeals, to which the attention of this court has been directed by the supplemental brief of defendant's counsel. Judge Landon, in his opinion, speaking of the plaintiff's claim, says: 'His case is unlike those in which the injunctive process of the court is sought to restrain the disclosure of a secret or the publication of a letter which may prove injurious to business or character.' Bristol v. Society, 132 N. Y. 264-267, 30 N. E. 506. But without multiplying citations or prolonging consideration of the legal aspect of this case, it may be said, by way of conclusion, that the principle contended for by the plaintiff is not only abundantly supported by authority, but is likewise founded in good common sense, and is peculiarly applicable to the case in hand. Here is a party, which, by the expenditure of large sums of money, and the exercise of much skill and ingenuity, has built up a large and prosperous business, the capital of which consists largely in certain inventions and discoveries made by its officers, servants, and agents. The world at large knows nothing of these inventions and discoveries, because they are locked within the brains of those who conceived them. The defendants, who have been largely instrumental in perfecting them, while under both an express and implied contract to give plaintiff the benefit of their inventive genius, propose now to disregard their legal and moral obligations by creating a new establishment, where these inventions and discoveries may be employed to plaintiff's serious injury. This is not legitimate competition, which it is always the policy of the law to foster and encourage, but it is contra bonos mores, and constitutes a breach of trust, which a court of law, and much less a court of equity, should not tolerate." Fralich v. Despar (Pa. Sup.) 30 Atl. 521.

It is argued in this case that there is no express contract shown, and that an implied contract is not such a one as will be enforced. We think the testimony discloses very clearly an express agreement between the employer and the employed, but, if it may be stated that the only agreement is an implied one, growing out of oral statements taken in connection with the facts and circumstances surrounding the business, the parties, and their acts, still, if it is clearly established by all that was said and done that the secrets confided to the defendant were not to be disclosed by him to others, and were not to be used by him except when he was in the employment of those who imparted to him the secret, or their legal representatives, and that was one of the conditions of his employment, we do not think it would make any difference in the principle involved. The knowledge came to him in the course of a confidential employment, relying upon his using the knowledge only for the benefit of the employer. It is said by an eminent writer: "On the whole, the doctrine may be generally stated that wherever confidence is reposed, and one party has it in his power, in a secret manner, for his own advantage, to sacrifice those interests which he is bound to protect, he will not be permitted to hold any such advantage." Story, Eq. Jur. § 323. The same authority, when discussing the subject of what cases injunction will be issued in, says: "Upon similar grounds of irreparable mischief, courts of equity will restrain a party from making a disclosure of secrets communicated to him in the course of a confidential employment; and it matters not, in such cases, whether the secrets be secrets of trade, or secrets of title, or any other secrets of the party important to his interests. Thus a party has been restrained from using the secret of compounding a medicine not protected by patent, when it appeared that the secret was imparted to him, to his own knowledge, in breach of faith or contract on the part of the persons communicating it." Story, Eq. Jur. § 952, and many cases there cited. 10 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 949; High, Inj. § 19; Davies v. Clough, 8 Sim. 262; Williams v. Assurance Co., 23 Beav. 338; Morrison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241; Yovatt v. Winyard, 1 Jac. & W. 394; Tipping v. Clarke, 2 Hare, 393; Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452; Champlin v. Stoddart, 30 Hun, 300; Salomon v. Hertz, 40 N. J. Eq. 400, 2 Atl. 379.

The case of Little v. Gallus (Sup.) 38 N. Y. Supp. 487, is against the contention of the defendant. In that case the plaintiff was a maker of typewriter ribbons by secret processes and formulæ. The defendants entered his employ when they were minors. The court says: "It seems, therefore, too plain for controversy that the plaintiff was the owner of a process or invention which possessed great value, and which he had secured at the cost of much time, trouble, and expense; that the defendants, Gallus and Bostwick, occupying a confidential relation towards the plaintiff, gained a knowledge of the process and formulæ employed by him in conducting his business; that they well understood the nature of his business, their relations to it, and the care which was used to keep the same secret; and that, notwithstanding the knowledge thus obtained, and in violation of the faith and confidence reposed in them, they surreptitiously made memoranda of these formulæ, and are now using the same, as well as all the other knowledge obtained while in the plaintiff's service, to start and operate a rival establishment. The only question therefore, to be determined upon this state of facts, is whether or not they shall be permitted to carry out their intentions. It is contended by the plaintiff that his case is brought directly within the rule laid down in that of Kodak Co. v. Reichenbach, 79 Hun, 183, 29 N. Y. Supp. 1143, recently decided by the general term in the Fifth department; and the defendants, while conceding that the law of the case is there correctly stated, insist that the facts do not warrant its application here. We find ourselves unable to concur in the view thus taken, and which was carefully elaborated upon the argument by the learned counsel for the defendants. The facts of this case differ somewhat from those of the Reichenbach Case, in that there was no written agreement entered into between these parties by which the employes undertook to give to their employers exclusive right in, or control over, any inventions discovered by, or disclosed to, the former; but we are unable to see how this strengthens the defendants' contention. In the case cited there happens to be an express contract, but, nevertheless, it is asserted, in the opinion of the court, and such is unquestionably the correct rule, that the law raises an implied contract that an employe who occupies a confidential relation towards his employer will not divulge any trade secrets imparted to him or discovered by him in the course of his employment; and we do not see why the defendants, Gallus and Bostwick, are not under just as strong an obligation to observe and keep sacred the trust reposed in them as they would be had they reduced the contract which the law implies to writing. Nor does the fact that they entered the plaintiff's service while minors, and at first performed duties comparatively unimportant in their character, relieve them from a faithful observance of their obligation. Gallus, at least, was ultimately advanced to a position of great responsibility, and both of them had attained their majority before attempting to take improper advantage of the knowledge imparted to them while in the plaintiff's employ, and their present experiments are not in the direction of legitimate competition, but involve a breach of trust which we think the court should prevent." Tabor v. Hoffman, 118 N. Y. 31, 23 N. E. 12; Tuck v. Priester, 19 Q. B. Div. 629; Pollard v. Photographic Co., 40 Ch. Div. 345.

It is the contention of the defendant that the contract sought to be enforced is void as against public policy because it is in restraint of trade; citing Richardson v. Buhl, 77 Mich. 632, 43 N. W. 1102; Association v. Starkey, 84 Mich. 76, 47 N. W. 604. These cases are not in point. They are cases where the purpose of the contract was to create a monopoly, by providing by contract that established industries should cease to do business, which, of course, is unlawful; but that is not the purpose of the contract under consideration. Here processes and machinery have been invented which the owners believe would be of great value to them if they could be used upon a large scale. To use them upon a large scale required the employment of a number of persons, to some of whom some of the secrets of the business and the machinery must be disclosed. If these secrets were disclosed to others, who might use them to establish a business of like character, they would cease to be valuable to the owner. Is there anything unreasonable in enforcing an agreement that such secrets shall not be disclosed by the employé? It has been repeatedly held that contracts for the exclusive use of a secret art are not in restraint of trade, for the public has no right to the secret. See Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 372, and cases cited; Cloth Co. v. Lorisont, L. R. 9 Eq. 345. We cannot see how it can be against public interest to allow an employer to make such conditions of employment with his employés as will give him the fullest protection to his property right in his process or invention, and at the same time enable him to employ a great many employés in its production. To enable one to do this would be a benefit to the public in many ways. It would secure employment to more persons than would otherwise be employed, and a larger output would be made of a useful article. The evidence discloses that it does not require a man of special skill to do the work done by defendant when in the employ of the predecessors in business of the complainants. To restrain him from making use of what he has not discovered is not an injustice to him, and does not abridge his right to work along those lines which would not be harmful to those to whom he has sustained a position of confidence. It is to the advantage of both parties that such a contract should be allowed. By means of it the defendant secured employment which he could not have secured without it, and at the same time his employers were secured against competition which might be ruinous. Beal v. Chase. 31 Mich. 531.

DUNCOMBE v. FELT.

Supreme Court of Michigan. June 6, 1890.

Appeal from circuit court, Van Buren county, in chancery; GEORGE M. BUCK, Judge.

F. J. Atwell, for appellant. Spafford Tryon and A. J. Mills, for complainant.

LONG, J. The bill was filed in this cause for an injunction to restrain the defendant from cutting and removing any of the timber or trees standing or growing upon the premises described in the bill, and from committing or permitting any waste of said premises. The bill alleges that complainant is the owner in fee of the premises, containing about 160 acres subject to a life-estate in the defendant. That the complainant derived his title through a sheriff's deed, upon an execution sale to satisfy a judgment against Seth H. Felt. That said Seth H. Felt derived his title through a deed made and executed to him by the defendant, Horatio O. Felt, and his wife. That at about the time of conveyance of said premises to Seth H. Felt he made, executed, and delivered a lease in writing to Horatio O. Felt and wife. This lease is set out in full in the record. The bill also alleges that said Horatio O. Felt is in actual possession and occupancy of the premises under and by virtue of said lease, and that his wife is now deceased. That upon about nine acres of said premises is growing and standing a large amount of valuable oak and other timber, fit for sawing and lumbering purposes, and that said timber constitutes a large portion of the value of said premises. The bill then states: "Your orator further shows that the said Horatio O. Felt has caused to be cut, and is causing to be cut, and is cutting, lumbering, and removing from said premises, a large portion of said timber and trees growing thereon, and threatens to continue so to do, and has already cut about five acres of said timber. Your orator further shows that thereby the said Horatio O. Felt is committing waste upon said premises and irreparable injury thereto, and materially lessening the value thereof. Your orator further shows that if the said Horatio O. Felt is permitted to continue to cut down said timber and lumber, and commit waste upon said premises, as aforesaid, and is not restrained from so doing by an order and injunction of this honorable court, the value thereof will be depreciated to the amount of at least five hundred dollars. And your orator further shows that said cutting and removing of said timber and said lumber upon said premises by said Felt has been and is being done without the authority or consent of your orator, and against his wishes and direction thereon, and without any authority or right in said Felt so to do. All of which acts and doings of the said Horatio O. Felt, who is made defendant herein, are contrary to equity and good conscience, and tend to the manifest wrong, injury, and oppression of your orator." The lease set out in the bill of complaint was executed before the complainant derived his title under the sheriff's deed, and contains the following clause. "To have and to hold the said demised premises, with the appurtenances, unto the said parties of the second part, their executors, administrators, and assigns, for and during and until the full end and term of their natural lives, so long as either of them shall live, yielding and paying therefor, during the continuance of the lease, unto the said party of the first part, nothing; this lease being given in consideration of the second parties having conveyed the premises herein described to the first party, and under no consideration whatever are the second parties to be removed from the possession of the said premises except as they shall voluntarily surrender their rights under this lease. And it is expressly understood that the second parties are to have as full and complete control of said premises, while they or either of them shall live, as though such conveyance had not been made." A general demurrer was filed, and on the hearing in the court below was overruled, and decree entered for complainant making the injunction perpetual. Defendant appeals.

The claim of counsel for the complainant is that on the premises there are only about nine acres of growing timber; that this timber is needed for the use of the farm, and its destruction makes a case of actionable waste, to be restrained by injunction. The rights of the parties must be determined by the construction given to these clauses in the lease above quoted. The title to the premises was in defendant, Horatio O. Felt. When he and his wife deeded the same, they took back this lease, by the terms of which they were to have and to hold the premises "for and during and until the full end and term of their natural lives, so long as either of them shall live, yielding and paying * * * nothing." The consideration was the conveyance of the premises to Seth H. Felt. It is further provided in the lease that the lessees are not to be removed from the premises on any consideration whatever, except as they might voluntarily surrender their rights under the lease. Then follows the clause which it is claimed gives the defendant the right to take the timber in question. "And it is expressly understood that the second parties are to have as full and complete control of said premises, while they or either of them shall live, as though such conveyance had not been made." The complainant acquired all the rights in the premises under his purchase at the execution sale that Seth H. Felt had, but with notice of all the conditions in this lease. It is therefore contended by counsel that the lease gave defendant the same interest or property in the estate as he had before he and his wife conveyed the lands to Seth H. Felt, and that he can deal with it in all respects as though he was the owner, the only limitation being that of duration of the estate, and that the clauses in the lease above set out in effect are equivalent in meaning with the old clause in leases without impeachment for waste.

Counsel for defendant insists that the doctrine laid down in Stevens v. Rose, 69

Mich. 260, 37 N. W. Rep. 205, fully sustains his claim that the defendant has the right to remove this timber, and do all other acts that he could have done as owner in fee, and that the defendant's estate is not impeachable for waste. His claim is not sustained by that case. It was there held that the words "to have and to hold, and to use and control as the lessee thinks proper for his benefit during his natural life," clearly import a lease without impeachment for waste, and that the defendant had the right to do all those acts which such a tenant may exercise, but that the words were not to be treated as importing a license to destroy or injure the estate, but to do all reasonable acts consistent with the preservation of the estate which otherwise might in law be waste. In the present case it is conceded that there are only 9 acres of timber on the whole 160-acre tract, that the defendant has already cut about 5 acres, and threatens to cut and carry away the remainder. I have never understood the rule of the common law to be so broad as contended for by counsel for defendant. The clause "without impeachment for waste" never was extended to allow the very destruction of the estate itself, but only to excuse permissive waste. 10 Bac. Abr. p. 468, tit. "Waste." In Packington v. Packington, decided in 1744, and cited by Bacon, (reported 3 Atk. 215,) the plaintiff alleged that the defendant, Sir H. Packington, had cut down a great number of trees, and had threatened to cut down and destroy them all. Lord HARDWICKE granted an injunction to restrain the waste. The lease in the case was made without impeachment of waste. Mr. Greenleaf in his Cruise on Real Property, (volume 1, p. 129,) lays down the rule thus: "The clause without impeachment of waste, is, however, so far restrained in equity that it does not enable a tenant for life to commit malicious waste so as to destroy the estate, which is called 'equitable waste,' for in that case the court of chancery will not only stop him by injunction, but will also order him to repair if possible the damage he has done." In 10 Bac. Abr. tit. "Waste," p. 469, it is said: "So, where a lease was made by a bishop for twenty-one years without impeachment of waste, of land that had many trees upon it, and the tenant cut down none of the trees till about half a year before the expiration of his term, and then began to fell the trees, the court granted an injunction; for, though he might have felled trees every year from the beginning of his term, and then they would have been growing up again gradually, yet it is unreasonable that he should let them grow till towards the end of his term, and then sweep them all away; for, though he had power to commit waste, yet this court will model the exercise of that power;"

citing Abraham v. Buhl, Freem. Ch. 53. At the common law no prohibition against waste lay against the lessee for life or years deriving his interest from the act of the party. The remedy was confined to those tenants who derived their interest from the act of the law, but the timber cut was, at common law, the property of the owner of the inheritance, and the words in the lease "without impeachment of waste" had the effect of transferring to the lessee the property of the timber. Bowles' Case, 11 Coke, 79; Co. Litt. 220a. The modern remedy in chancery by injunction is broader than at law, and equity will interpose in many cases, and stay waste where there is no remedy at law. Chancery will interpose when the tenant affects the inheritance in an unreasonable and unconscientious manner, even though the lease be granted without impeachment of waste. 4 Kent, Comm. (13th. Ed.) 78; Perrot v. Perrot, 3 Atk. 94; Aston v. Aston, 1 Ves. Sr. 264; Vane v. Barnard, 2 Vern. 738; Kane v. Vanderburgh, 1 Johns. Ch. 11. In the case of Kane v. Vanderburgh, supra, it was said: "Chancery goes greater lengths than the courts of law in staying waste. It is a wholesome jurisdiction, to be liberally exercised in the prevention of irreparable injury, and depends on much latitude of discretion in the court." In this state an action on the case for waste is authorized by chapter 271, How. St. This has superseded the common-law remedy, and relieves the tenant from the penal consequences of waste under the statute of Gloucester, as the owner now recovers no more than the actual damages which the premises have sustained, while that statute gave by way of penalty the forfeiture of the place wasted, and treble damages; and this harsh rule was adopted by many of the American states by the early statutes. This statute giving a right of action in courts of law for waste does not, however, deprive the court of chancery of jurisdiction in proceedings to restrain threatened waste.

There can be no doubt that the defendant in the present case has much of the character of a tenant in fee, but he cannot destroy the inheritance. He may take the timber for his own use, and do all those acts which a prudent tenant in fee would do. He cannot pull down the buildings or destroy them, or cut and destroy fruit trees, or those planted for ornament and shelter; neither can he be permitted to entirely strip the land of all timber, and convert it into lumber, and sell it away from the inheritance. It is not claimed that the timber is being used for betterments on the premises, but it is admitted that the life-tenant is selling it for his own gain and profit. The demurrer was properly overruled. The decree of the court below will be affirmed, with costs. The other justices concurred.

GRIFFITH v. HILLIARD.

(25 Atl. 427, 64 Vt. 643.)

Supreme Court of Vermont, General Term.
Nov. 5, 1892.

Appeal from chancery court, Rutland county; TAFT, Chancellor.

Action by Silas L. Griffith against John H. Hilliard. From a decree sustaining a demurrer to plaintiff's bill for an injunction and dismissing the bill pro forma, orator appeals. Reversed and modified. J. C. Baker, for orator. H. A. Harman, for defendant.

START, J. The defendant, John H. Hilliard, by the demurrer contained in his answer, claims that a court of equity has no jurisdiction of the matters alleged in the bill. The bill alleges, among other things, that the orator is the owner of the land in question; that its substantial value is made up of the wood and timber growing thereon; that some of the defendants, under a license from the defendant, Hilliard, have entered upon the land, are engaged in cutting and drawing timber therefrom, and threaten to continue to do so. For the purpose of determining the question now before the court, these allegations must be taken as true. To permit this wood and timber to be cut in the manner the defendants are doing, and threatening to do, under a license from defendant, Hilliard, is to permit a destruction of the orator's estate as it has been held and enjoyed. The power of a court of equity to interpose by injunction to prevent irreparable injury and the destruction of estates is well established, and this power has been construed to embrace trespasses of the character complained of in the orator's bill. Where trespass to property consists of a single act, and it is temporary in its nature and effect, so that the legal remedy of an action at law for damages is adequate, equity will not interfere; but if, as in this case, repeated acts are done or threatened, although each of such acts, taken by itself, may not be destructive to the estate, or inflict irreparable injury, and the legal remedy may, therefore, be adequate for each single act if it stood alone, the entire wrong may be prevented or stopped by injunction. Smith v. Rock, 59 Vt. 232, 9 Atl. Rep. 551; Langdon v. Templeton, 61 Vt. 119, 17 Atl. Rep. 839; Erhardt v. Boaro, 113 U. S. 539, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 555; Iron Co. v. Reymert, 45 N. Y. 703; Power Co. v. Tibbetts, 31 Conn. 165; Irwin v. Dixon, 9 How. 28; Livingston v. Livingston, 6 Johns. Ch. (Law Ed.) 496; High, Inj. 724-727; Shipley v. Ritter, 7 Md. 408; Scudder v. Trenton Delaware Falls Co., 1 N. J. Eq. 694; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 245; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1357; Murphy v. Lincoln, 63 Vt. 278, 22 Atl. Rep. 418.

In the case of Murphy v. Lincoln, supra, the bill charged the committing of several trespasses by the defendants by drawing wood and logs across the orator's land. The defendants claimed a right of way. The court found the issue of fact in favor of the orator, and held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to enjoin the commission of a series of trespasses, although the legal remedy be adequate for each single act if it stood alone. It is said by Judge Story in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, (volume 2, §§ 928, 929:) "If the trespass be fugitive and temporary, and adequate compensation can be obtained in an action at law, there is no ground to justify the interposition of courts of equity. Formerly, indeed, courts of equity were extremely reluctant to interpose at all, even in regard to cases of repeated trespasses; but now there is not the slightest hesitation if the acts done or threatened to be done to the property would be ruinous or irreparable, or would impair the just enjoyment of the property in the future. In short, it is now granted in all cases of timber, coals, ores, and quarries, where the party is a mere trespasser, or where he exceeds the limited right with which he is clothed, upon the ground that the acts are, or may be, an irreparable damage to the particular species of property." In Iron Co. v. Reymert, supra, it is said that mines, quarries, and timber are protected by injunction, upon the ground that injuries to and depredations upon them are, or may cause, an irreparable damage, and also with a view to prevent a multiplicity of actions for damages, which might accrue from continuous violations of the rights of the owners; and that it is not necessary that the right should be first established in an action at law. In Erhardt v. Boaro, supra, Mr. Justice FIELD says: "It is now a common practice in cases where irreparable mischief is being done or threatened, going to the destruction of the substance of the estate, such as the extracting of ores from a mine, or the cutting down of timber, or the removal of coal, to issue an injunction, though the title to the premises be in litigation. The authority of the court is exercised in such cases, through its preventive writ, to preserve the property from destruction pending legal proceedings for the determination of the title."

When it appears that the title is in dispute, the court may, in its discretion, issue a temporary injunction, and continue it in force for such time as may be necessary to enable the orator to establish his title in a court of law, and may make the injunction perpetual when the orator has thus established his title; or the court may proceed and determine which party has the better title; or it may dismiss the bill, and leave the orator to his legal remedy. Bacon v. Jones, 4 Mylne & C. 433; Duke of Beaufort v. Morris, 6 Hare, 340; Campbell v. Scott, 11 Sim. 31; Kerr, Inj. 209; Ingraham v. Dunnell, 5 Metc. (Mass.) 118; Rooney v. Soule, 45 Vt. 303; Wing v. Hall, 44 Vt. 118; Lyon v. McLaughlin, 32 Vt. 423; Hastings v. Perry, 20 Vt. 278; Barnes v. Dow, 59 Vt. 530, 10 Atl. Rep. 258; Barry v. Harris, 49 Vt. 392. In Bacon v. Jones, supra, Lord COTTENHAM says: "The jurisdiction of this court is founded upon legal right. The plaintiff coming into court on the assumption that he has the legal right, and the court granting its assistance on that ground. When a party applies for the aid of a court, the application for an injunction is made either during the progress of the suit or at the hearing; and in both cases, I apprehend, great latitude and discretion are allowed to the court in dealing with the application. When the application is for an interlocutory injunction, several courses are open. The court may at once grant the injunction simpliciter, without more,—a course which, though perfectly competent to the court, is not very likely to be taken where the defendant raises a question as to the validity of the plaintiff's title; or it may follow the more usual, and, as I apprehend, more wholesome, practice in such a case, of either granting an injunction, and at the same time directing the plaintiff to proceed to establish his title at law, and suspending the grant of the injunction until the result of the legal investigation has been ascertained, the defendant, in the mean time, keeping an account. Which of these several courses ought to be taken must depend entirely upon the discretion of the court, according to the case. When the cause comes to a hearing, the court has also a large latitude left to it; and I am far from saying that a case may not arise in which, even at that stage, the court will be of opinion that the injunction may properly be granted without having recourse to a trial at law. The conduct and dealings of the parties, the frame of the pleadings, the nature of the patent right and of the evidence by which it is established, these and other circumstances may combine to produce such a result, although this is certainly not very likely to happen, and I am not aware of any case in which it has happened. Nevertheless it is a course unquestionably competent to the court, provided a case be presented which satisfies the mind of the judge that such a course, if adopted, will do justice between the parties. Again, the court may at the hearing do that which is the more ordinary course,—it may retain the bill giving the plaintiff the opportunity of first establishing his right at law. There still remains a third course, the propriety of which must also depend upon the circumstances of the case,—that of dismissing the bill at once." Although Bacon v. Jones was a case relative to a patent right, the remarks of the lord chancellor are applicable to any case in which the orator's title is in dispute. The case of the Duke of Beaufort v. Morris, supra, was a bill for an injunction to protect the orator's coal mines from injury from the water flowing into them from the defendant's colliery; and it was ordered that the bill be retained for 12 months, with liberty to the orator to bring such actions as he might be advised were necessary, and that the injunction issued in the cause be continued for such time.

We think the granting of the temporary injunction in this case was a proper exercise of the discretionary power which the court possesses. The orator, by his bill, makes out a strong case for equitable consideration. The sole value of the premises in question is in the wood and timber growing thereon. The orator has heretofore held and occupied them for the purpose of manufacturing lumber and charcoal from such timber and wood. He has expended large sums of money in the erection of mills and coal kilns, in building roads, and in procuring teams and workmen for the prosecution of said business, and has made contracts for the sale of said manufactured products. The defendants are engaged in cutting and removing that which constitutes the chief value of the estate, and threaten to continue to do so. These acts, if continued, will work a destruction of the estate, and render it of no value for the purpose for which it has been held and enjoyed. The case is one peculiarly within the province of a court of equity, through its preventive writ, to interpose and stop the mischief complained of, and preserve the property from destruction. The defendant, John H. Hilliard, having, before any evidence has been taken or hearing had, put in issue the orator's title, insisted that this issue be tried in a court of law, the case is one in which the court may properly, in its discretion, require the orator to establish his title in such court before proceeding further with the cause, and such will be the order of this court. The pro forma decree of the court of chancery is reversed; the demurrer contained in the answer of the defendant, John H. Hilliard, is overruled; the orator's bill is adjudged sufficient, and defendant's (Hilliard's) answer is ordered brought forward, from which it appears that the orator's title to the premises is in controversy; therefore the cause is remanded to the court of chancery, with direction to that court to retain the cause, and continue in force the injunction for such time as, in the opinion of said court, may be necessary to enable the orator to bring and prosecute to final judgment such action or actions as may be necessary to establish his title in a court of law; and, in default of the orator so establishing his title within the time aforesaid, the orator's bill to be dismissed, as against the defendant, John H. Hilliard, with costs. But if the orator shall, within the time aforesaid, by a final judgment in his favor in a court of law, establish his title to the premises as against the defendant, John H. Hilliard, then the court will enter a decree making perpetual the temporary injunction, and make such order in relation to costs as to the court shall seem meet.

WHEELOCK v. NOONAN.

Court of Appeals of New York. January 17, 1888.

Appeal from general term, superior court, city of New York.

Suit for mandatory injunction, by William A. Wheelock, respondent, against Michael Noonan, appellant.

FINCH, J. The findings of the trial court establish that the defendant, who was a total stranger to the plaintiff, obtained from the latter a license to place upon his unoccupied lots, in the upper part of the city of New York, a few rocks for a short time, the indefiniteness of the period having been rendered definite by the defendant's assurance that he would remove them in the spring. Nothing was paid or asked for this permission, and it was not a contract in any just sense of the term, but merely a license which by its terms expired in the next spring. During the winter, and in the absence and without the knowledge of plaintiff, the defendant covered six of the lots of plaintiff with "huge quantities of rock," some of them 10 or 15 feet long, and piled to the height of 14 to 18 feet. This conduct was a clear abuse of the license, and in excess of its terms, and so much so that if permission had been sought upon a truthful statement of the intention it would undoubtedly have been refused. In the spring the plaintiff, discovering the abuse of his permission, complained bitterly of defendant's conduct, and ordered him to remove the rocks to some other locality. The defendant promised to do so, but did not, and in the face of repeated demands has neglected and omitted to remove the rocks from the land. The court found as matter of law from these facts that the original permission given did not justify what was done either, as it respected the quantity of rock or the time allowed; that after the withdrawal of the permission in the spring, and the demand for the removal of the rock, the defendant was a trespasser, and the trespass was a continuing one which entitled plaintiff to equitable relief; and awarded judgment requiring defendant to remove the rocks before March 15, 1886, unless for good cause shown the time for such removal should be extended by the court.

The sole question upon this appeal is whether the relief granted was within the power of the court, and the contention of the defendant is mainly based upon the proposition that the equitable relief was improper since there was an adequate remedy at law. The plaintiff objects that no such defense was pleaded. If it arises upon the facts stated in the complaint, it can scarcely be said to be new matter required to be stated in the answer, and I doubt whether, under the present system of pleading, the technical objection is good. It is better, therefore, to consider the defense which is interposed. One who would justify under a license or permission must bring his acts within the terms of the license. He exceeds them at his peril. There is no equity in allowing him to strain them beyond their fair and reasonable interpretation. The finding shows permission asked for "a few stone," described as "a portion" of what defendant was getting from the boulevard. The plaintiff was justified in inferring that for the bulk of his stone the defendant had a place of deposit and only wanted additional room for a small excess,—for a few stone. Under this permission defendant was not justified in covering six lots with heavy boulders to a height of 14 to 18 feet. The thing done was gravely and substantially in excess of the thing granted, and the license averred does not cover or excuse the act. Beyond that the permission extended only to the spring of 1880, and expired at that date. The immediate removal of the stone was then demanded, and from that moment its presence upon plaintiff's lands became a trespass, for which there was no longer license or permission. Such parol license, founded upon no consideration, is revocable at pleasure, even though the licensee may have expended money on the faith of it. Murdock v. Railroad Co., 73 N. Y. 579. And this was a continuing trespass. So long as it lasted it incumbered the lots, prevented their use and occupation by the owner, and interfered with the possibility of a sale. It is now said that the remedy was at law, that the owner could have removed the stone and then recovered of the defendant for the expense incurred. But to what locality could the owner remove them? He could not put them in the street; the defendant presumably had no vacant lands of his own on which to throw the burden; and it would follow that the owner would be obliged to hire some vacant lot or place of deposit, become responsible for the rent, and advance the cost of men and machinery to effect the removal. If any adjudication can be found throwing such burden upon the owner, compelling him to do in advance for the trespasser what the latter is bound to do, I should very much doubt its authority. On the contrary, the law is the other way. Beach v. Crain, 2 N. Y. 97. And all the cases which give to the injured party successive actions for the continuance of the wrong are inconsistent with the idea that the injured party must once for all remove it. Such is neither an adequate remedy nor one which the plaintiff was bound to adopt.

But it is further said that he could sue at law for the trespass. That is undoubtedly true. The case of Uline v. Railroad Co., 101 N. Y. 98, 4 N. E. 536, demonstrates upon abundant authority that in such action only the damages to its date could be recovered, and for the subsequent continuance of the trespass new actions following on in succession would have to be maintained. But in a case like the present, would that be an adequate remedy? In each action the damages could not easily be anything more than the fair rental of the lot. It is difficult to see what other damages could be allowed, not because they would not exist, but because they would be quite uncertain in amount and possibly somewhat speculative in their character. The defendant, therefore, might pay those damages, and continue his occupation, and if there were no other adequate remedy, defiantly continue such occupation, and in spite of his wrong make of himself in effect a tenant who could not be dispossessed. The wrong in every such case is a continued unlawful occupation, and any remedy which does not or may not end it is not adequate to redress the injury or restore the injured party to his rights. On the other hand, such remedy in a case like the present might result to the wrong-doer in something nearly akin to persecution. He is liable to be sued every day, die de diem, for the renewed damages following from the continuance of the trespass; and while, ordinarily, there is no sympathy to be wasted on a trespasser, yet such multiplicity of suits should be avoided, and especially under circumstances like those before us. The rocks could not be immediately removed. The courts have observed that peculiarity of the case, and shaped their judgment to give time. It may take a long time, and during the whole of it the defendant would be liable to daily actions. For reasons of this character it has very often been held that while, ordinarily, courts of equity will not wield their power merely to redress a trespass, yet they will interfere under peculiar circumstances, and have often done so where the trespass was a continuing one, and a multiplicity of suits at law was involved in the legal remedy. The doctrine was recognized and the authorities cited in the Murdock Case, supra, and the rule deemed perfectly settled. That case, and those referred to, it is true, were cases of intrusion where no consent had been given for the entry of the intruder, but whether the trespass was such from the beginning, or became one after a revocation of the license, can make no difference, as it respects the adequacy of the legal remedy. That is the same in either event. Two cases of the former character were cited in the Uline Case. Bowyer v. Cook, 4 Man. G. & S. 236; Holmes v. Wilson, 10 Adol. & E. 503. In one stumps and stakes had been left on plaintiff's land and in the other buttresses to support a road; in each an action of trespass had been brought, and damages recovered and paid; and in each, after a new notice to remove the obstruction, a further action of trespass was brought and sustained,—so that, as I have said, the legal remedy is identical, however the trespass originated.

It is a general rule that a court of equity will act in such cases only after the plaintiff's right has been established at law; but that rule has its exceptions. Troy & B. R. Co. v. Boston, H. T. & W. Ry. Co., 86 N. Y. 128. Where the facts are in doubt, and the right not clear, such, undoubtedly, would be a just basis of decision, though the modern system of trying equity cases makes the rule less important. Where, as in an intrusion by railroad companies whose occupation threatens to be continuous, the injury partakes of that character, an action at law to establish the right has not been required. Indeed, I am inclined to deem it more a rule of discretion than of jurisdiction. In Avery v. Railroad Co., 106 N. Y. 142, 12 N. E. 619, to which we have been referred since the argument, we were disposed to sustain a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to remove so much of a fence as obstructed plaintiff's right of way, although the obstruction was not a nuisance, but an invasion of a private right. In that case the equitable remedy was not challenged by either counsel or the court, and evidently stood upon the grounds here invoked; those of a continuing trespass, the remedy for which at law would be inadequate, and involve repeated actions by the injured party for damages daily occurring.

These views of the case enable us to support the judgment rendered. It should be affirmed, with costs.

WILSON v. CITY OF MINERAL POINT et al.

(39 Wis. 160.)

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Aug. Term, 1875.

Bill for an injunction. A demurrer to the bill was overruled, and the defendants appealed.

M. M. Cothren, for appellants. Wilson & Jones, for respondent.

LYON, J. It is sufficiently averred in the complaint that the defendant Weidenfeller, acting under the authority and orders of the regularly constituted authorities of the defendant city, is about to destroy fences, fruit and ornamental trees and shrubbery standing and growing upon premises owned by the plaintiff and occupied by him as his residence and homestead; that the pretense for so doing is that such fences, trees and shrubbery are within the limits of public streets; but that such pretense is unfounded in fact, and the defendants have no lawful authority to do the threatened acts.

On the facts averred it is clear that the plaintiff is entitled to an injunction as prayed in the complaint. It is quite true that the courts will not interfere by injunction to restrain the committing of a mere trespass, for which, if committed, the recovery of damages in an action at law would be an adequate remedy. It is also true that the courts will interfere by injunction and prevent a threatened injury, which, if inflicted, will be irreparable.

An injury is irreparable when it is of such a nature that the injured party cannot be adequately compensated therefor in damages, or when the damages which may result therefrom cannot be measured by any certain pecuniary standard. High, Inj. § 460, and cases cited. It is said by Judge Story that: "If the trespass be fugitive and temporary, and adequate compensation can be obtained in an action at law, there is no ground to justify the interposition of courts of equity. Formerly, indeed, courts of equity were extremely reluctant to interfere at all, even in regard to cases of repeated trespasses. But now there is not the slightest hesitation, if the acts done or threatened to be done to the property would be ruinous or irreparable, or would impair the just enjoyment of the property in future." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 928.

That the threatened injuries which this action was brought to prevent, would, if inflicted, be irreparable, in the legal acceptance of that term, and would greatly impair the just enjoyment of the plaintiff's property, is perfectly well settled. No one will seriously contend that a money compensation is an adequate remedy for the loss of the trees and shrubbery which the complaint avers the defendants threaten to destroy; and it would be a denial of justice were the courts to refuse the plaintiff the protection he asks, and thus permit his home to be permanently despoiled. See High, Inj. § 467, and cases cited.

We think the complaint states a cause of action against both defendants, and that there is no misjoinder of causes of action, and no defect of parties. We do not decide whether or not the complaint states facts sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover damages, but only, that if the averments therein contained are true, he is entitled to the injunction prayed.

Order affirmed.

GARDNER v. TRUSTEES OF VILLAGE
OF NEWBURGH et al.

Chancery. Aug. 22, 1816.

The bill, which was for an injunction, stated, that the plaintiff is owner of a farm, in the village of Newburgh, through which a stream of water has, from time immemorial, run, having its source from a spring in the adjoining farm of the defendant, Hasbrouck, and after entering the plaintiff's land, continues its whole course through his farm until it empties into the Hudson river. That this stream greatly fertilizes his fields, and, running near his house, serves for watering his cattle, and for various domestic and economical purposes. That it supplies water to a brick-yard on the farm of the plaintiff, where most of the bricks used in Newburgh are made; it also supplies a large distillery erected by him at great expense, and a churning mill, and water for a mill-seat, where the plaintiff is about to erect a mill for grinding plaster of paris. That the trustees of the village of Newburgh, the defendants, by false representations, obtained an act of the legislature, passed the 27th of March, 1809 (Sess. 32, ch. 119, vol. 5, Webst. Ed. 489), to enable the said trustees to supply the inhabitants of the village with pure and wholesome water. That the trustees applied to the plaintiff for leave to divert the stream, offering him a trifling and very inadequate compensation, which he refused. That the said trustees having obtained leave from the defendant, Hasbrouck, the owner of the spring, to use and divert the water, or a part thereof, that is, a stream one inch and a quarter in diameter, taken from a great elevation, have commenced a conduit, and threaten to divert the stream, or a great part thereof, from the plaintiff's farm. That the plaintiff is apprehensive that if this is done, there will not, in a dry season, be water sufficient even for his cattle, &c. The plaintiff, therefore, prayed an injunction to prevent the defendants from diverting the water, &c. The bill was sworn to, and the plaintiff produced several affidavits, which stated that the stream was not more than sufficient for the distillery, brick-yard, &c., of the plaintiff, and if diverted through a pipe, or tube, of the proposed diameter, would greatly injure, if not render the works useless. One of the affidavits stated, that the whole stream would pass through a tube of one inch diameter, with a head of five feet.

Mr. Burr and J. V. N. Yates, for plaintiff.

THE CHANCELLOR. The statute under which the trustees of the village of Newburgh are proceeding (Sess. 32, c. 119), makes adequate provision for the party injured by the laying of the conduits through his land, and also affords security to the owner of the spring, or springs, from whence the water is to be taken. But there is no provision for making compensation to the plaintiff, through whose land the water issuing from the spring has been accustomed to flow. The bill charges, that the trustees are preparing to divert from the plaintiff's land, the whole, or the most part of the stream, for the purpose of supplying the village. The plaintiff's right to the use of the water is as valid in law, and as useful to him as the rights of others who are indemnified or protected by the statute; and he ought not to be deprived of it, and we cannot suppose it was intended he should be deprived of it, without his consent, or without making him a just compensation. The act is, unintentionally, defective, in not providing for his case, and it ought not to be enforced, and it was not intended to be enforced, until such provision should be made.

It is a clear principle in law, that the owner of land is entitled to the use of a stream of water which has been accustomed, from time immemorial, to flow through it, and the law gives him ample remedy for the violation of this right. To divert or obstruct a water course is a private nuisance; and the books are full of cases and decisions asserting the right and affording the remedy. Fitzh. Nat. Brev. 184; Moore v. Browne, Dyer, 319, b; Lutterel's Case, 4 Coke, 86; Glynne v. Nichols, Comb. 43, 2 Show. 507; Prickman v. Trip, Comb. 231.

The court of chancery has also a concurrent jurisdiction, by injunction, equally clear and well established in these cases of private nuisance. Without noticing nuisances arising from other causes, we have many cases of the application of equity powers on this very subject of diverting streams. In Finch v. Resbridge, 2 Vern. 390, the Lord Keeper held, that after a long enjoyment of a water course running to a house and garden, through the ground of another, a right was to be presumed, unless disproved by the other side, and the plaintiff was quieted in his enjoyment, by injunction. So, again, in Bush v. Western Prec. Ch. 530, a plaintiff who had been in possession, for a long time, of a water course, was quieted by injunction, against the interruption of the defendant, who had diverted it, though the plaintiff had not established his right at law, and the court said such bills were usual. These cases show the ancient and established jurisdiction of this court; and the foundation of that jurisdiction is the necessity of a preventive remedy when great and immediate mischief, or material injury would arise to the comfort and useful enjoyment of property. The interference rests on the principle of a clear and certain right to the enjoyment of the subject in question, and an injurious interruption of that right which, upon just and equitable grounds, ought to be prevented. Anon., 1 Vern. 120; East India Co. v. Sandys, Id. 127; Hills v. University of Oxford, Id. 275; Anon., 1 Ves. 476; Anon., 2 Ves. 414; Whitchurch v. Hide, 2 Atk. 391, 2 Ves. 453; Attorney General v. Nichol, 16 Ves. 338.

In the application of the general doctrines of the court to this case, it appears to me to be proper and necessary that the preventive remedy be applied. There is no need, from what at present appears, of sending the plaintiff to law to have his title first established. His right to the use of the stream is one which has been immemorially enjoyed, and of which he is now in the actual possession. The trustees set up no other right to the stream (assuming, for the present, the charges in the bill,) than what is derived from the authority of the statute; and if they are suffered to proceed and divert the stream, or the most essential part of it, the plaintiff would receive immediate and great injury, by the suspension of all those works on his land which are set in operation by the water. In addition to this, he will lose the comfort and use of the stream for farming and domestic purposes; and, besides, it must be painful to any one to be deprived, at once, of the enjoyment of a stream which he has been accustomed always to see flowing by the door of his dwelling. A right to a stream of water is as sacred as a right to the soil over which it flows. It is a part of the freehold of which no man can be disseised "but by lawful judgment of his peers, or by due process of law." This is an ancient and fundamental maxim of common right to be found in magna charta, and which the legislature has incorporated into an act declaratory of the rights of the citizens of this state. Laws, Sess. 10, c. 1.

I have intimated that the statute does not deprive the plaintiff of the use of the stream, until recompense be made. He would be entitled to his action at law for the interruption of his right, and all his remedies at law, and in this court, remain equally in force. But I am not to be understood as denying a competent power in the legislature to take private property for necessary or useful public purposes; and, perhaps, even for the purposes specified in the act on which this case arises. But to render the exercise of the power valid, a fair compensation must, in all cases, be previously made to the individuals affected, under some equitable assessment to be provided by law. This is a necessary qualification accompanying the exercise of legislative power, in taking private property for public uses; the limitation is admitted by the soundest authorities, and is adopted by all temperate and civilized governments, from a deep and universal sense of its justice.

Grotius (De Jur. B. & P., bk. 8, c. 14, § 7), Puffendorf (De Jur. Nat. et Gent. bk. 8, c. 5, § 7), and Bynkershoek (Quæst Jur. Pub. bk. 2, c. 15), when speaking of the eminent domain of the sovereign, admit that private property may be taken for public uses, when public necessity or utility require it; but they all lay it down as a clear principle of natural equity, that the individual whose property is thus sacrificed, must be indemnified. The last of those jurists insists, that private property cannot be taken, on any terms, without consent of the owner, for purposes of public ornament or pleasure; and, he mentions an instance in which the Roman senate refused to allow the prætors to carry an aqueduct through the farm of an individual, against his consent, when intended merely for ornament. The sense and practice of the English government are equally explicit on this point. Private property cannot be violated in any case, or by any set of men, or for any public purpose, without the interposition of the legislature. And how does the legislature interpose and compel? "Not," says Blackstone (1 Bl. Comm. p. 139) "by absolutely stripping the subject of his property, in an arbitrary manner, but by giving him a full indemnification and equivalent for the injury thereby sustained. The public is now considered as an individual treating with an individual for an exchange. All that the legislature does is to oblige the owner to alienate his possessions for a reasonable price, and even this is an exertion of power which the legislature indulges with caution, and which nothing but the legislature can perform."

I may go further, and show that this inviolability of private property, even as it respects the acts and the wants of the state, unless a just indemnity be afforded, has excited so much interest, and been deemed of such importance, that it has frequently been made the subject of an express and fundamental article of right in the constitution of government. Such an article is to be seen in the bill of rights annexed to the constitutions of the states of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Ohio; and it has been incorporated in some of the written constitutions adopted in Europe, (Constitutional charter of Lewis XVIII. and the ephemeral, but very elaborately drawn, constitution de la Republique Francaise of 1795.) But what is of higher authority, and is absolutely decisive of the sense of the people of this country, it is made a part of the constitution of the United States, "that private property shall not be taken for public use, without just compensation." I feel myself, therefore, not only authorized, but bound to conclude, that a provision for compensation is an indispensable attendant on the due and constitutional exercise of the power of depriving an individual of his property; and I am persuaded that the legislature never intended, by the act in question, to violate or interfere with this great and sacred principle of private right. This is evident from the care which this act bestows on the rights of the owners of the spring, and of the lands through which the conduits are to pass. These are the only cases in which the legislature contemplated or intended that the act could or should interfere with private right, and in these cases due provision is made for its protection, or for compensation. There is no reason why the rights of the plaintiff should not have the same protection as the rights of his neighbours, and the necessity of a provision for his case could not have occurred, or it, doubtless, would have been inserted. Until, then, some provision be made for affording him compensation, it would be unjust, and contrary to the first principles of government, and equally contrary to the intention of this statute, to take from the plaintiff his undoubted and prescriptive right to the use and enjoyment of the stream of water.

In the case of Agar v. Canal Co., Cooper,

77, an injunction was granted, on filing a bill supported by affidavit, restraining defendants acting under a private act of parliament, from cutting a canal through the land of the plaintiff, in a line and mode not supposed to be within the authority of the statute.

I shall, accordingly, upon the facts charged in the bill, and supported by affidavits, as a measure immediately necessary to prevent impending injury, allow the injunction, and wait for the answer, to see whether the merits of the case will be varied.

Injunction granted.

SHERRY v. PERKINS et al.

(17 N. E. 307, 147 Mass. 212.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Essex. June 19, 1888.

Report from supreme judicial court, Essex county; C. Allen, Judge.

Bill in equity, by Patrick P. Sherry against Charles E. Perkins and Charles H. Leach, for an injunction to restrain the defendants, respectively president and secretary of the Lasters' Protective Union, from causing to be carried in front of the plaintiff's shoe factory a banner on which was the following inscription: "Lasters are requested to keep away from P. P. Sherry's. Per order L. P. U.;" and also a banner on which was the following: "Lasters on a strike; all lasters are requested to keep away from P. P. Sherry's until the present trouble is settled. Per order L. P. U." The court, at the trial, found as facts that members of the Lasters' Protective Union entered into a scheme, by threats and intimidation, to prevent persons in the employment of the plaintiff, as lasters, from continuing in such employment, and in like manner to prevent other persons from entering into such employment as lasters; that the defendants participated in the scheme; that the use of the banner was a part of the scheme, and its use an injury to the plaintiff in his business and property. The court, after finding the facts, reported the case to the full court.

H. F. Hurlburt, R. Lund, and T. M. Osborne, for plaintiff.

The principal question in this case is whether this court, as a court of equity, has jurisdiction to enjoin the acts complained of, upon the findings of facts reported by the justice who heard the case. The carrying of a banner or placard before a person's place of business, which injures such person in his business and property, is a private nuisance. An authority directly in point is Gilbert v. Mickle, 4 Sandf. Ch. 357, in which it was held that a placard paraded or posted in a public street, before the door of an auctioneer, cautioning strangers to beware of mock auctions, constituted a private nuisance remediable by injunction. The injunction in that case was refused upon grounds not affecting the jurisdiction of the court. If the highway is obstructed by crowds of people in consequence of the banner's being carried as described in the bill, such carrying of the banner is a public nuisance. Rex v. Cross, 3 Camp. 224; Rex v. Carlile, 6 Car. & P. 636; Reg. v. Grey, 4 Fost. & F. 73. But as the damage to the business and property of the plaintiffs, found in the report, is special to the plaintiffs, they are entitled to an injunction. Walker v. Brewster, L. R. 5 Eq. 25; Stetson v. Faxon, 19 Pick. 147; Soltau v. De Held, 2 Sim. (N. S.) 133. The entire scheme, "by threats and intimidation, to prevent persons in the employment of the plaintiffs, as lasters, from continuing in such employment, and in like manner to prevent other persons from entering into such employment as lasters," is a private nuisance to the plaintiffs. Wood, Nuis. § 141, and cases cited. Among the things which have been held to be private nuisances are a market illegally conducted within the limits of an established market. (Yard v. Ford, 2 Saund. 172;) a ferry carried on, without right, near a duly-licensed ferry, (Stark v. McGowen, 1 Nott. & McC. 387;) the use of a toll-bridge inside the limits of a lawfully established toll-bridge, (Bridge Co. v. Lewis, 63 Barb. 111.) See 1 Com. Dig. "Action on the Case for Nuisance," C. The scheme in which the defendants are found to have participated, has the same elements of injury as these cases of nuisance. It is illegal, injurious to property, and continuous in character. See Railroad Co. v. Church, 108 U. S. 317, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 719. This court has full power to restrain a private nuisance by injunction, both under the special provision of the statute, (Pub. St. c. 151, § 2, cl. 9,) and by virtue of its general equity powers conferred by the statute of 1877, c. 178, which is embodied in Pub. St. c. 151, § 4. The jurisdiction in equity now possessed by this court is not limited by any restriction contained in the last clause of Gen. St. c. 113, § 2, but is in all respects as full as that of the English court of chancery. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 311, 312. In respect to private nuisances, the English court of chancery has from early times exercised the right to restrain by injunction. This is not limited to cases in which there is no redress at law. Indeed, the ability to recover substantial damages at law has been declared to give the right to ask for an injunction against the continuance of the nuisance. Lord Romilly, M. R., in Crump v. Lambert, L. R. 3 Eq. 409, 412; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 925 et seq.; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 252; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1350; Emperor v. Day, 3 De Gex, F. & J. 240, 241, (Lord Campbell.) The scheme in which the defendants participated was plainly illegal and criminal, both under the statute and by common law. Pub. St. c. 74, § 2; Reg. v. Druitt, 10 Cox, Crim. Cas. 592; Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. 111; Com. v. Dyer, 128 Mass. 70. But the illegality of the nuisance, or its criminal character, does not prevent the court from enjoining it. Gilbert v. Mickle, 4 Sandf. Ch. 358, Lord Cairns in Assurance Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. 144. The jurisdiction of courts of chancery over private nuisances is concurrent with that of courts of law. Fisk v. Wilber, 7 Barb. 395. This court has repeatedly exercised its jurisdiction to restrain private nuisances. Cadigan v. Brown, 120 Mass. 493; Mills v. Mason, Id. 244; Woodward v. Worcester, 121 Mass. 245; Tucker v. Howard, 122 Mass. 529; Davis v. Sawyer, 133 Mass. 289. But, whatever the injury complained of may be called, there is abundant authority for the intervention of a court of equity to prevent injury to property by unlawful or forcible acts, when the injury is continuous. Macaulay v. Shackell, 1 Bligh, (N. S.) 96, 127; Lord Eldon in Gee v. Pritchard, 2 Swanst. 402, 413; Emperor v. Day, 3 De Gex, F. & J. 217, 240, 241, 253; Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551, 37 L. J. Ch. 889, and 19 Law T. (N. S.) 64. The various cases in which the unauthorized use of the plaintiff's name has been restrained, go upon the principle of the injury to property involved. Routh v. Webster, 10 Beav. 561; James v. James, L. R. 13 Eq. 421; Hookham v. Pottage, L. R. 8 Ch. 91; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1358. The case of Spinning Co. v. Riley, supra, is almost precisely parallel to the present case, except that in the present case the placards are paraded in a manner which makes them more distinctly a nuisance than if they were merely posted up. See, also, Dixon v. Holden, L. R. 7 Eq. 488; Assurance Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. 142; Mulkern v. Ward, L. R. 13 Eq. 619; Food Co. v. Massam, 6 Ch. Div. 582. In November, 1874, the judicature act went into effect, and in a decision under the act, in the case of Saxby v. Easterbrook, 3 C. P. Div. 339, it was held that, after the jury had found the fact of libel, an injunction would issue against the continuance of the libel. Thomas v. Williams, 14 Ch. Div. 864, (1880,) Fry, J.; Loog v. Bean, 26 Ch. Div. 306. In this court the case of Spinning Co. v. Riley, was referred to in the case of Diatite Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 114 Mass. 69, and the dissent there expressed to the views of Malins, V. C., must be understood as applicable only so far as the language of the former case applies to the question of libel, since the question of libel did not arise in that case. The same is true of the reference to the same case in Partridge v. Hood, 120 Mass. 403, 406. See 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1358. As to private nuisance, Bridge v. Bridge, 6 Pick. 376; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 925-928. As to the criminal character of the acts complained of: The fact that the nuisance is indictable as a nuisance does not prevent the court from enjoining its continuance. 1 High, Inj. §§ 745, 752, and cases cited; Attorney General v. Hunter, 1 Dev. Eq. 12; People v. St. Louis, 5 Gilman, 351. The English judicature act did not enlarge the jurisdiction of courts of equity. Day v. Brownrigg, 10 Ch. Div. 294; Gaskin v. Balls, 13 Ch. Div. 324. As to differences between this court, as a court of equity, and the English chancery court before 1874, see remarks of Wells, J., in Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 232, 255. The acts are not libelous, but calculated to injure trade by direct interference. See Bridge v. Bridge, 6 Pick. 398; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 15. As to the parties against whom the injunction should issue, inasmuch as the Lasters' Protective Union is a voluntary association, and all its members cannot be ascertained by the plaintiff, the same rule applies which makes it proper for a few individuals to sue in behalf of such an organization represented by and associated with the defendants named in the bill. See Birmingham v. Gallagher, 112 Mass. 190; Snow v. Wheeler,

The carrying of the banner named in the report, in the manner stated in the bill of complaint, is not a nuisance. If the words printed on the banner are libelous, the complainants have an adequate remedy at law. Equity will not restrain a libel. The manner of the publication of the words on the banner cannot be restrained. The case of Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551, is not a precedent that establishes the injunctive jurisdiction. That case has been expressly overruled by Assurance Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. 145, and unfavorably noticed in Diatite Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 114 Mass. 69. The prayer of the bill is so broad that no decree comporting with the terms thereof would be equitable.

ALLEN, J. The case finds that the defendants entered, with others, into a scheme, by threats and intimidation, to prevent persons in the employment of the plaintiff from continuing in such employment, and to prevent others from entering into such employment; that the banners, with their inscriptions, were used by the defendants as part of the scheme, and that the plaintiff was thereby injured in his business and property. The act of displaying banners with devices, as a means of threats and intimidation, to prevent persons from entering into or continuing in the employment of the plaintiff, was injurious to the plaintiff, and illegal at common law and by statute. Pub. St. c. 74, § 2; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555. We think that the plaintiff is not restricted to his remedy by action at law, but is entitled to relief by injunction. The acts and the injury were continuous. The banners were used more than three months before the filing of the plaintiff's bill, and continued to be used at the time of the hearing. The injury was to the plaintiff's business, and adequate remedy could not be given by damages in a suit at law. The wrong is not as argued by the defendants' counsel, a libel upon the plaintiff's business. It is not found that the inscriptions upon the banners were false, nor do they appear to have been in disparagement of the plaintiff's business. The scheme, in pursuance of which the banners were displayed and maintained, was to injure the plaintiff's business, not by defaming it to the public, but by intimidating workmen, so as to deter them from keeping or making engagements with the plaintiff. The banner was a standing menace to all who were or wished to be in the employment of the plaintiff, to deter them from entering the plaintiff's premises. Maintaining it was a continuous, unlawful act, injurious to the plaintiff's business and property, and was a nuisance, such as a court of equity will grant relief against. Gilbert v. Mickle, 4 Sandf. Ch. 357; Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551. Diatite Co. v. Manufacturing Co., 114 Mass. 69, was a case of defamation only. Some of the language in Spinning Co. v. Riley has been criticised, but the decision has not been overruled. See Diatite Co. v. Manufacturing Co., ubi supra; Assurance Co. v. Knott, L. R. 10 Ch. 142; Saxby v. Easterbrook, 3 C. P. Div. 339; Loog v. Bean, 26 Ch. Div. 306; Food Co. v. Massam, 14 Ch. Div. 763; Thomas v. Williams, Id. 864; Hill v. Davies, 21 Ch. Decree for plaintiff.

(44 N. E. 1077, 167 Mass. 92.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Suffolk. Oct. 27, 1896.

Report from supreme judicial court, Suffolk county; Oliver Wendell Holmes, Judge.

Bill by Frederick O. Vegelahn against George M. Guntner and others for an injunction. An injunction issued pendente lite restraining the respondents from interfering with the plaintiff's business by patrolling the sidewalk in front of or in the vicinity of the premises occupied by him, for the purpose of preventing any person in his employment, or desirous of entering the same, from entering it or continuing in it; or by obstructing or interfering with any persons in entering or leaving the plaintiff's said premises; or by intimidating any person in the employment of the plaintiff, or desirous of entering the same; or by any scheme or conspiracy for the purpose of annoying, hindering, interfering with, or preventing any person in the employment of the plaintiff, or desirous of entering the same, from entering it, or from continuing therein. This injunction was approved.

ALLEN, J. The principal question in this case is whether the defendants should be enjoined against maintaining the patrol. The report shows that, following upon a strike of the plaintiff's workmen, the defendants conspired to prevent him from getting workmen, and thereby to prevent him from carrying on his business, unless and until he should adopt a certain schedule of prices. The means adopted were persuasion and social pressure, threats of personal injury or unlawful harm conveyed to persons employed or seeking employment, and a patrol of two men in front of the plaintiff's factory, maintained from half past 6 in the morning till half past 5 in the afternoon, on one of the busiest streets of Boston. The number of men was greater at times, and at times showed some little disposition to stop the plaintiff's door. The patrol proper at times went further than simple advice, not obtruded beyond the point where the other person was willing to listen; and it was found that the patrol would probably be continued if not enjoined. There was also some evidence of persuasion to break existing contracts. The patrol was maintained as one of the means of carrying out the defendants' plan, and it was used in combination with social pressure, threats of personal injury or unlawful harm, and persuasion to break existing contracts. It was thus one means of intimidation, indirectly to the plaintiff, and directly to persons actually employed, or seeking to be employed, by the plaintiff, and of rendering such employment unpleasant or intolerable to such persons. Such an act is an unlawful interference with the rights both of employer and of employed. An employer has a right to engage all persons who are willing to work for him, at such prices as may be mutually agreed upon, and persons employed or seeking employment have a corresponding right to enter into or remain in the employment of any person or corporation willing to employ them. These rights are secured by the constitution itself. Conn. v. Perry, 155 Mass. 117, 28 N. E. 1126; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 3-9, 17 N. E. 343; Braceville Coal Co. v. People, 147 Ill. 71, 35 N. E. 62; Ritchie v. People, 155 Ill. 98, 40 N. E. 454; Low v. Printing Co. (Neb.) 59 N. W. 362. No one can lawfully interfere by force or intimidation to prevent employers or persons employed or wishing to be employed from the exercise of these rights. It is in Massachusetts, as in some other states, even made a criminal offense for one, by intimidation or force, to prevent, or seek to prevent, a person from entering into or continuing in the employment of a person or corporation. Pub. St. c. 74, § 2. Intimidation is not limited to threats of violence or of physical injury to person or property. It has a broader significance, and there also may be a moral intimidation which is illegal. Patrolling or picketing, under the circumstances stated in the report, has elements of intimidation like those which were found to exist in Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307. It was declared to be unlawful in Reg. v. Druitt, 10 Cox, Cr. Cas. 592; Reg. v. Hibbert, 13 Cox, Cr. Cas. 82; Reg. v. Bauld, Id. 282. It was assumed to be unlawful in Trollope v. Trader's Fed. (1875) 11 L. T. 228, though in that case the pickets were withdrawn before the bringing of the bill. The patrol was an unlawful interference both with the plaintiff and with the workmen, within the principle of many cases; and, when instituted for the purpose of interfering with his business, it became a private nuisance. See Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Barr v. Trades Council (N. J. Ch.) 30 Atl. 881; Murdock v. Walker, 152 Pa. St. 595, 25 Atl. 492; China Co. v. Brown, 164 Pa. St. 449, 30 Atl. 261; Coeur D'Alene Consol. & Min. Co. v. Miners' Union of Wardner, 51 Fed. 260; Temperton v. Russell [1893] 1 Q. B. 715; Floyd v. Jackson, [1895] 11 L. T. 276; Wright v. Hennessey, 52 Alb. Law J. 104 (a case before Baron Pollock); Judge v. Bennett, 36 Wkly. Rep. 103; Lyons v. Wilkins [1896] 1 Ch. 811.

The defendants contend that these acts were justifiable, because they were only seeking to secure better wages for themselves, by compelling the plaintiff to accept their schedule of wages. This motive or purpose does not justify maintaining a patrol in front of the plaintiff's premises, as a means of carrying out their conspiracy. A combination among persons merely to regulate their own conduct is within allowable competition, and is lawful, although others may be indirectly affected thereby. But a combination to do injurious acts expressly directed to another, by way of intimidation or constraint, either of himself or of persons employed or seeking to be employed by him, is outside of allowable competition, and is unlawful. Various decided cases fall within the former class; for example: Worthington v. Waring, 157 Mass. 421, 32 N. E. 744; Snow v. Wheeler, 113 Mass. 179; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111; Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225; Cote v. Murphy, 159 Pa. St. 420, 28 Atl. 190; Bohn Manuf'g Co. v. Hollis, 54 Minn. 223, 55 N. W. 1119; Steamship Co. v. McGregor [1892] App. Cas. 25; Curran v. Treleaven [1891] 2 Q. B. 545, 561. The present case falls within the latter class.

Nor does the fact that the defendants' acts might subject them to an indictment prevent a court of equity from issuing an injunction. It is true that, ordinarily, a court of equity will decline to issue an injunction to restrain the commission of a crime; but a continuing injury to property or business may be enjoined, although it may also be punishable as a nuisance or other crime. Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307; In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564, 593, 599, 15 Sup. Ct. 900; Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Fifth Baptist Church, 108 U. S. 317, 329, 2 Sup. Ct. 719; Cranford v. Tyrrell, 128 N. Y. 341, 344, 28 N. E. 514; Gilbert v. Mickle, 4 Sandf. Ch. 357; Port of Mobile v. Louisville & N. R. Co., 84 Ala. 115, 126, 4 South. 106; Arthur v. Oakes, 11 C. C. A. 209, 63 Fed. 310; Toledo, A., A. & N. M. Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. 730, 744; Emperor of Austria v. Day, 3 De Gex, F. & J. 217, 239, 240, 253; Hermann Loog v. Bean, 26 Ch. Div. 306, 314, 316, 317; Monson v. Tusaud [1894] 1 Q. B. 671, 689, 690, 698.

A question is also presented whether the court should enjoin such interference with persons in the employment of the plaintiff who are not bound by contract to remain with him, or with persons who are not under any existing contract, but who are seeking or intending to enter into his employment. A conspiracy to interfere with the plaintiff's business by means of threats and intimidation, and by maintaining a patrol in front of his premises, in order to prevent persons from entering his employment, or in order to prevent persons who are in his employment from continuing therein, is unlawful, even though such persons are not bound by contract to enter into or to continue in his employment; and the injunction should not be so limited as to relate only to persons who are bound by existing contracts. Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555, 565; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1; Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307; Temperton v. Russell [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, 728, 731; Flood v. Jackson [1895] 11 L. T. 276. We therefore think that the injunction should be in the form as originally issued. So ordered.

FIELD, C. J. (dissenting). The practice of issuing injunctions in cases of this kind is of very recent origin. One of the earliest authorities in the United States for enjoining, in equity, acts somewhat like those alleged against the defendants in the present case, is Sherry v. Perkins (decided in 1888) 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307. It was found as a fact in that case that the defendants entered into a scheme, by threats and intimidation, to prevent persons in the employment of the plaintiffs as lasters from continuing in such employment, and, in like manner, to prevent other persons from entering into such employment as lasters; that the use of the banners was a part of the scheme; that the first banner was carried from January 8, 1887, to March 22, 1887, and the second banner from March 22, 1887, to the time of the hearing; and that "the plaintiffs have been and are injured in their business and property thereby." The full court say: "The act of displaying banners with devices, as a means of threats and intimidation to prevent persons from entering into or continuing in the employment of the plaintiffs, was injurious to the plaintiffs, and illegal at common law and by statute. Pub. St. c. 74, § 2; Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555." "The banner was a standing menace to all who were or wished to be in the employment of the plaintiffs, to deter them from entering the plaintiffs' premises. Maintaining it was a continuous unlawful act, injurious to the plaintiffs' business and property, and was a nuisance such as a court of equity will grant relief against. Gilbert v. Mickle, 4 Sandf. Ch. 357; Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551." Gilbert v. Mickle, one of the authorities cited in Sherry v. Perkins, was a suit in equity by an auctioneer against the mayor of the city of New York to restrain him and those acting under him from parading, placing, or keeping before the plaintiff's auction rooms a placard as follows: "Strangers, beware of mock auctions." A temporary injunction was issued, but, on hearing, it was dissolved. Notwithstanding what is said in the opinion of the vice chancellor, his conclusion is as follows: "I am satisfied that it is my duty to leave the party to his remedy by an action at law." Spinning Co. v. Riley is a well-known decision of Vice Chancellor Malins. The bill prayed that the defendants might be "restrained from printing or publishing any placards or advertisements similar to those already set forth." The defendants had caused to be posted on the walls and other public places in the neighborhood of the plaintiff's works, and caused to be printed in certain newspapers, a notice as follows: "Wanted all well-wishers to the Operative Cotton Spinning, &c., Association not to trouble or cause any annoyance to the Springhead Spinning Company leas, by knocking at the door of their office, until the dispute between them and the self-actor minders is finally terminated. By special order. Carrodus, 32 Greaves Street, Oldham." The case was heard upon demurrers. The vice chancellor says: "For the reasons I have stated, I overruled these demurrers, because the bill states, and the demurrers admit, acts amounting to the destruction of property." Of this case, the court, in Sherry v. Perkins, say: "Some of the language in Spinning Co. v. Riley has been criticised, but the decision has not been overruled." The cases are there cited in which that decision has been doubted or criticised. Of that decision, this court, in Boston Diatite Co. v. Florence Manuf'g Co., 114 Mass. 69, say: "The opinions of Vice Chancellor Malins in Spinning Co. v. Riley, L. R. 6 Eq. 551, in Dixon v. Holden, L. R. 7 Eq. 488, and in Rollins v. Hinks, L. R. 13 Eq. 355, appear to us to be so inconsistent with these authorities [authorities which the court had cited], and with well-settled principles, that it would be superfluous to consider whether, upon the facts before him, his decisions can be supported." Much the same language was used by the justices in Assurance Co. v. Knott, 10 Ch. App. 142, a part of the headnote of which is: "Dixon v. Holden and Spinning Co. v. Riley overruled." In Temperton v. Russell [1893] 1 Q. B. 435, 438, Lindley, L. J., says of the case of Spinning Co. v. Riley that it was overruled by the court of appeal in Assurance Co. v. Knott. Since the judicature act, however, the courts of England have interfered to restrain, by injunction, the publication or continued publication of libelous statements, particularly those injuriously affecting the business or property of another, as well as injunctions similar to that in the present case. St. 36 & 37 Vict. c. 66, § 25, subds. 5, 8; Monson v. Tus-saud [1894] 1 Q. B. 671, 672; Lyons v. Wilkins [1896] 1 Ch. 811, 827. But, in the absence of any power given by statute, the jurisdiction of a court of equity, having only the powers of the English high court of chancery, does not, I think, extend to enjoining acts like those complained of in the case at bar, unless they amount to a destruction or threatened destruction of property, or an irreparable injury to it. In England the rights of employers and employed with reference to strikes, boycotts, and other similar movements have not, in general, been left to be worked out by the courts from common-law principles, but statutes, from time to time, have been passed defining what may and what may not be permitted. The administration of these statutes largely has been through the criminal courts.

As a means of prevention, the remedy given by Pub. St. c. 74, § 2, would seem to be adequate where the section is applicable, unless the destruction of, or an irreparable injury to, property is threatened; and there is the additional remedy of an indictment for a criminal conspiracy at common law, if the acts of the defendant amount to that. If the acts complained of do not amount to intimidation or force, it is not in all respects clear what are lawful and what are not lawful at common law. It seems to be established in this commonwealth that, intentionally and without justifiable cause, to entice, by persuasion, a workman to break an existing contract with his employer, and to leave his employment, is actionable, whether done with actual malice or not. Walker v. Cronin, 107

Mass. 555. What constitutes justifiable cause remains in some respects undetermined. Whether to persuade a person who is free to choose his employment not to enter into the employment of another person gives a cause of action to such other person, by some courts has been said to depend upon the question of actual malice; and, in considering this question of malice, it is said that it is important to determine whether the defendant has any lawful interest of his own in preventing the employment, such as that of competition in business. For myself, I have been unable to see how malice is necessarily decisive. To persuade one man not to enter into the employment of another, by telling the truth to him about such other person and his business, I am not convinced is actionable at common law, whatever the motive may be. Such persuasion, when accompanied by falsehood about such other person or his business, may be actionable, unless the occasion of making the statements is privileged; and then the question of actual malice may be important. This, I think, is the effect of the decision in Rice v. Albee, 164 Mass. 88, 41 N. E. 122. When one man orally advises another not to enter into a third person's employment, it would, I think, be a dangerous principle to leave his liability to be determined by a jury upon the question of his malice or want of malice, except in those cases where the words spoken were false. In the present case, if the establishment of a patrol is using intimidation or force, within the meaning of our statute, it is illegal and criminal. If it does not amount to intimidation or force, but is carried to such a degree as to interfere with the use by the plaintiff of his property, it may be illegal and actionable. But something more is necessary to justify issuing an injunction. If it is in violation of any ordinance of the city regulating the use of streets, there may be a prosecution for that, and the police can enforce the ordinance; but if it is merely a peaceful mode of finding out the persons who intend to enter the plaintiff's premises to apply for work, and of informing them of the actual facts of the case, in order to induce them not to enter the plaintiff's employment, in the absence of any statute relating to the subject, I doubt if it is illegal, and I see no ground for issuing an injunction against it.

As no objection is now made by the defendants to the equitable jurisdiction, I am of opinion on the facts reported, as I understand them, that the decree entered by Mr. Justice HOLMES should be affirmed, without modification.

HOLMES, J. (dissenting). In a case like the present, it seems to me that, whatever the true result may be, it will be of advantage to sound thinking to have the less popular view of the law stated, and therefore, although, when I have been unable to bring my brethren to share my convictions, my almost invariable practice is to defer to them in silence, I depart from that practice in this case, notwithstanding my unwillingness to do so, in support of an already rendered judgment of my own.

In the first place, a word or two should be said as to the meaning of the report. I assume that my brethren construe it as I meant it to be construed, and that, if they were not prepared to do so, they would give an opportunity to the defendants to have it amended in accordance with what I state my meaning to have been. There was no proof of any threat or danger of a patrol exceeding two men, and as, of course, an injunction is not granted except with reference to what there is reason to expect in its absence, the question on that point is whether a patrol of two men should be enjoined. Again, the defendants are enjoined by the final decree from intimidating by threats, express or implied, of physical harm to body or property, any person who may be desirous of entering into the employment of the plaintiff, so far as to prevent him from entering the same. In order to test the correctness of the refusal to go further, it must be assumed that the defendants obey the express prohibition of the decree. If they do not, they fall within the injunction as it now stands, and are liable to summary punishment. The important difference between the preliminary and the final injunction is that the former goes further, and forbids the defendants to interfere with the plaintiff's business "by any scheme * * * organized for the purpose of * * * preventing any person or persons who now are or may hereafter be * * * desirous of entering the [plaintiff's employment] from entering it." I quote only a part, and the part which seems to me most objectionable. This includes refusal of social intercourse, and even organized persuasion or argument, although free from any threat of violence, either express or implied. And this is with reference to persons who have a legal right to contract or not to contract with the plaintiff, as they may see fit. Interference with existing contracts is forbidden by the final decree. I wish to insist a little that the only point of difference which involves a difference of principle between the final decree and the preliminary injunction, which it is proposed to restore, is what I have mentioned, in order that it may be seen exactly what we are to discuss. It appears to me that the opinion of the majority turns in part on the assumption that the patrol necessarily carries with it a threat of bodily harm. That assumption I think unwarranted, for the reasons which I have given. Furthermore, it cannot be said, I think, that two men, walking together up and down a sidewalk, and speaking to those who enter a certain shop, do necessarily and always thereby convey a threat of force. I do not think it possible to discriminate, and to say that two workmen, or even two representatives of an organization of workmen, do; especially when they are, and are known to be, under the injunction of this court not to do so. See Stimson, Labor Law, § 60, especially pages 290, 298-300; Reg. v. Shepherd, 11 Cox, Cr. Cas. 325. I may add that I think the more intelligent workmen believe as fully as I do that they no more can be permitted to usurp the state's prerogative of force than can their opponents in their controversies. But, if I am wrong, then the decree as it stands reaches the patrol, since it applies to all threats of force. With this I pass to the real difference between the interlocutory and the final decree.

I agree, whatever may be the law in the case of a single defendant (Rice v. Albee, 164 Mass. 88, 41 N. E. 122), that when a plaintiff proves that several persons have combined and conspired to injure his business, and have done acts producing that effect, he shows temporal damage and a cause of action, unless the facts disclose or the defendants prove some ground of excuse or justification; and I take it to be settled, and rightly settled, that doing that damage by combined persuasion is actionable, as well as doing it by falsehood or by force. Walker v. Cronin, 107 Mass. 555; Morasse v. Brochu, 151 Mass. 567, 25 N. E. 74; Tasker v. Stanley, 153 Mass. 148, 26 N. E. 417.

Nevertheless, in numberless instances the law warrants the intentional infliction of temporal damage, because it regards it as justified. It is on the question of what shall amount to a justification, and more especially on the nature of the considerations which really determine or ought to determine the answer to that question, that judicial reasoning seems to me often to be inadequate. The true grounds of decision are considerations of policy and of social advantage, and it is vain to suppose that solutions can be attained merely by logic and general propositions of law which nobody disputes. Propositions as to public policy rarely are unanimously accepted, and still more rarely, if ever, are capable of unanswerable proof. They require a special training to enable any one even to form an intelligent opinion about them.

In the early stages of law, at least, they generally are acted on rather as inarticulate instincts than as definite ideas, for which a rational defense is ready.

To illustrate what I have said in the last paragraph: It has been the law for centuries that a man may set up a business in a small country town, too small to support more than one, although thereby he expects and intends to ruin some one already there, and succeeds in his intent. In such a case he is not held to act "unlawfully and without justifiable cause," as was alleged in Walker v. Cronin and Rice v. Albee. The reason, of course, is that the doctrine generally has been accepted that free competition is worth more to society than it costs, and that on this ground the infliction of the damage is privileged. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 134. Yet even this proposition nowadays is disputed by a considerable body of persons, including many whose intelligence is not to be denied, little as we may agree with them.

I have chosen this illustration partly with reference to what I have to say next. It shows without the need of further authority that the policy of allowing free competition justifies the intentional inflicting of temporal damage, including the damage of interference with a man's business by some means, when the damage is done, not for its own sake, but as an instrumentality in reaching the end of victory in the battle of trade. In such a case it cannot matter whether the plaintiff is the only rival of the defendant, and so is aimed at specially, or is one of a class all of whom are hit. The only debatable ground is the nature of the means by which such damage may be inflicted. We all agree that it cannot be done by force or threats of force. We all agree, I presume, that it may be done by persuasion to leave a rival's shop, and come to the defendant's. It may be done by the refusal or withdrawal of various pecuniary advantages, which, apart from this consequence, are within the defendant's lawful control. It may be done by the withdrawal of, or threat to withdraw, such advantages from third persons who have a right to deal or not to deal with the plaintiff, as a means of inducing them not to deal with him either as customers or servants. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 112, 133; Bowen v. Matheson, 14 Allen, 499; Heywood v. Tillson, 75 Me. 225; Steamship Co. v. McGregor [1892] App. Cas. 26. I have seen the suggestion made that the conflict between employers and employed was not competition. But I venture to assume that none of my brethren would rely on that suggestion. If the policy on which our law is founded is too narrowly expressed in the term "free competition," we may substitute "free struggle for life." Certainly, the policy is not limited to struggles between persons of the same class, competing for the same end. It applies to all conflicts of temporal interests.

I pause here to remark that the word "threats" often is used as if, when it appeared that threats had been made, it appeared that unlawful conduct had begun. But it depends on what you threaten. As a general rule, even if subject to some exceptions, what you may do in a certain event you may threaten to do—that is, give warning of your intention to do—in that event, and thus allow the other person the chance of avoiding the consequence. So, as to "compulsion," it depends on how you "compel." Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111, 133. So as to "annoyance" or "intimidation." Connor v. Kent, Curran v. Treleven, 17 Cox, Cr. Cas. 354, 367, 368, 370. In Sherry v. Perkins, 147 Mass. 212, 17 N. E. 307, it was found as a fact that the display of banners which was enjoined was part of a scheme to prevent workmen from entering or remaining in the plaintiff's employment, "by threats and intimidation." The context showed that the words as there used meant threats of personal violence and intimidation by causing fear of it.

So far, I suppose, we are agreed. But there is a notion, which latterly has been insisted on a good deal, that a combination of persons to do what any one of them lawfully might do by himself will make the otherwise lawful conduct unlawful. It would be rash to say that some as yet unformulated truth may not be hidden under this proposition. But, in the general form in which it has been presented and accepted by many courts, I think it plainly untrue, both on authority and principle. Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111; Randall v. Hazelton, 12 Allen, 412, 414. There was combination of the most flagrant and dominant kind in Bowen v. Matheson, and in the Steamship Co. Case, and combination was essential to the success achieved. But it is not necessary to cite cases. It is plain from the slightest consideration of practical affairs, or the most superficial reading of industrial history, that free competition means combination, and that the organization of the world, now going on so fast, means an ever-increasing might and scope of combination. It seems to me futile to set our faces against this tendency. Whether beneficial on the whole, as I think it, or detrimental, it is inevitable, unless the fundamental axioms of society, and even the fundamental conditions of life, are to be changed.

One of the eternal conflicts out of which life is made up is that between the effort of every man to get the most he can for his services, and that of society, disguised under the name of capital, to get his services for the least possible return. Combination on the one side is patent and powerful. Combination on the other is the necessary and desirable counterpart, if the battle is to be carried on in a fair and equal way. I am unable to reconcile Temperton v. Russell [1893] 1 Q. B. 715, and the cases which follow it, with the Steamship Co. Case. But Temperton v. Russell is not a binding authority here, and therefore I do not think it necessary to discuss it.

If it be true that workingmen may combine with a view, among other things, to getting as much as they can for their labor, just as capital may combine with a view to getting the greatest possible return, it must be true that, when combined, they have the same liberty that combined capital has, to support their interests by argument, persuasion, and the bestowal or refusal of those advantages which they otherwise lawfully control. I can remember when many people thought that, apart from violence or breach of contract, strikes were wicked, as organized refusals to work. I suppose that intelligent economists and legislators have given up that notion today. I feel pretty confident that they equally will abandon the idea that an organized refusal by workmen of social intercourse with a man who shall enter their antagonist's employ is unlawful, if it is dissociated from any threat of violence, and is made for the sole object of prevailing, if possible, in a contest with their employer about the rate of wages. The fact that the immediate object of the act by which the benefit to themselves is to be gained is to injure their antagonist does not necessarily make it unlawful, any more than when a great house lowers the price of goods for the purpose and with the effect of driving a smaller antagonist from the business. Indeed, the question seems to me to have been decided as long ago as 1842, by the good sense of Chief Justice Shaw, in Com. v. Hunt, 4 Metc. (Mass.) 111. I repeat at the end, as I said at the beginning, that this is the point of difference in principle, and the only one, between the interlocutory and final decree; and I only desire to add that the distinctions upon which the final decree was framed seem to me to have coincided very accurately with the results finally reached by legislation and judicial decision in England, apart from what I must regard as the anomalous decisions of Temperton v. Russell and the cases which have followed it. Reg. v. Shepherd, 11 Cox, Cr. Cas. 325; Connor v. Kent, Gibson v. Lawson, and Curran v. Treleaven, 17 Cox, Cr. Cas. 354.

The general question of the propriety of dealing with this kind of case by injunction I say nothing about, because I understand that the defendants have no objection to the final decree if it goes no further, and that both parties wish a decision upon the matters which I have discussed.

HAMILTON-BROWN SHOE CO. v.

(32 S. W. 1106, 131 Mo. 212.)

Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 26, 1895.

Appeal from St. Louis circuit court.

Bill by the Hamilton-Brown Shoe Company to enjoin A. J. Saxey and others from attempting, by threats and intimidation, to force complainant's employes to quit work. A demurrer to the bill was overruled, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John F. McDermott, for appellants. Silas B. Jones, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from the final judgment of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis on a demurrer to the plaintiff's petition, which is as follows: "Plaintiff states that it is a corporation duly organized under the laws of the state of Missouri, and is engaged in the manufacture of shoes in the city of St. Louis, Missouri, at Twenty-First and Locust streets in said city, at which place its factory for the purpose of its said manufacturing business is located. And plaintiff says that it has in its employ in said manufacturing business, in its factory as aforesaid, between eight and nine hundred persons; that all of these persons are at work as operatives in some department or other of said factory; that of these employes as aforesaid a large number, to wit, about two or three hundred, are women and girls, and a large number, to wit, about two or three hundred, are young persons, many of them not being of age, and the balance of said operatives are adult men; that all of these persons are engaged in earning a livelihood at the business of this plaintiff aforesaid, and, on the other hand, this plaintiff requires the services of these persons to successfully carry on its business of manufacturing shoes as aforesaid. Plaintiff further states that all of these employes now in the employ of this plaintiff are desirous of continuing in the service of the plaintiff in its said business as aforesaid. Plaintiff further states that ten or fifteen days ago some of its employes, including all the defendants herein, except the defendants Thomas Beaty and P. J. McGarry, went out of the employ of this plaintiff on what is commonly called a 'strike,' claiming to have some grievance against this plaintiff, and which this plaintiff says was without any reasonable ground to rest upon, and thereupon attempted to inaugurate among the employes of this plaintiff what is commonly called a 'strike'; that thereupon the said defendants, lately employes of this plaintiff, together with the defendants Beaty and McGarry and divers other persons, unlawfully and wrongfully combined and confederated together to terrorize, and thereby, by intimidation and threats, to prevent the other employes of this plaintiff from peaceably or otherwise prosecuting their work in plaintiff's factory; that thereupon all of the defendants hereto, together with their associates and confederates, whose names are at this moment unknown to this plaintiff, began and have constantly pursued in a course of threats of personal violence and intimidation and persuasion, for the purpose, by means of such intimidation and threats and fear, to prevent the other employes of this plaintiff from peaceably or otherwise prosecuting their work in plaintiff's factory; that all of the said defendants hereto, together with divers and sundry other persons, who are their associates and confederates, have constantly hung about the plaintiff's said factory at the place aforesaid, and upon the streets in close proximity, for the purpose of picketing the premises of this plaintiff, and, by putting the employes of this plaintiff in fear of bodily injury, to thereby keep them from continuing their employment with this plaintiff, and also for the purpose of preventing other persons from entering the employ of the plaintiff; and the said defendants and their associates and confederates, as a part of their policy of threats and intimidation, and for the purpose of carrying on their unlawful combination, have gone to the homes of divers of the employes of this plaintiff at nighttime, and then and there undertaken to induce, by persuasion and by intimidation and threats, the employes of this plaintiff from further prosecuting their work in plaintiff's said factory. And the plaintiff charges that the said defendants therein named, and their associates and confederates, for a number of days, by the use of threats and personal violence, intimidation, and other unlawful means, have been and are now, undertaking to prevent the employes of this plaintiff from prosecuting their ordinary work, and are endeavoring to induce them, by the unlawful means aforesaid, to quit the employment of this plaintiff. And plaintiff says that by reason of the fact that a great many of its employes are women and girls and young persons, that the defendants aforesaid and their associates and confederates have succeeded in exciting in the minds of the plaintiff's said employes, or many of them, fear for their bodily safety, to such an extent that they cannot happily, as they have a right to do, prosecute their ordinary work; and plaintiff says, by reason of the premises, it cannot peaceably and successfully prosecute its said business. And plaintiff says it is without remedy at law, and can only be fully protected and relieved in a court of equity. Plaintiff therefore prays that the defendants, their associates and confederates, be enjoined by a temporary order of injunction, to be made final upon the hearing of this cause, issued out of this court, from in any manner interfering with the employes of this plaintiff now in the employ of the plaintiff, and from in any manner interfering with any person who may desire to enter the employ of this plaintiff, by the use of threats, personal violence, intimidation, or other means calculated to terrorize or alarm the plaintiff's employés, in any manner or form whatever, and that said defendants and their associates and confederates aforesaid be restrained by the order of this court from undertaking, by the use of the means aforesaid, to induce or to cause any of the employés of this plaintiff to quit the employment of this plaintiff, and that the defendants aforesaid and their associates and confederates be enjoined from congregating or loitering about the premises of this plaintiff at the place aforesaid, and that they be required by the injunction of this court to go about their ordinary business, and to abstain from in any way interfering with the business of this plaintiff, and for such other and further and general relief as may to the court appear proper in the premises."

The case was tried before the Hon. L. B. Valliant, one of the judges of that court, who, on overruling the demurrer, delivered the following opinion:

"The amended petition states in substance that the plaintiff conducts a large shoe manufactory in this city, and has in its employ some eight or nine hundred persons, all of whom are earning their living in plaintiff's employment, and are desirous of so continuing; that the defendants, except two of them, were lately in plaintiff's employ, but have gone out of the same, on a strike, and are now, with the other two defendants, engaged in an attempt to force the other employés of plaintiff to quit their work and join in the strike, and that to accomplish this purpose they are intimidating them with threats of personal violence; that among the plaintiff's employés who are thus threatened are about 300 women and girls and two or three hundred other young persons; that the effect of all this on the plaintiff's business, if the defendants are allowed to proceed, would be to inflict incalculable damage. Upon filing this amended petition, and the plaintiff's giving bond as required by law, a temporary injunction issued, restraining the defendants from attempting to force the plaintiff's employés to leave their work by intimidation and threats of violence, or from assembling for that purpose in the vicinity of plaintiff's factory. The defendants have appeared by their counsel, and, by their demurrer filed, admit that all the statements of the amended petition are true; but they take the position that, even if they are doing the unlawful acts that they are charged with doing, still this court has no right to interfere with them, because they say that what they are doing is a crime, by the state law of this state, and that for the commission of a crime they can only be tried by a jury in a court having criminal jurisdiction. It will be observed that the defendants do not claim to have the right to do what the injunction forbids them doing. Their learned counsel even quotes the statute to show that it is a crime to do so. But he contends that the constitution of the United States and the constitution of the state of Missouri guaranty them the right to commit crime, with only this limitation, to wit, that they shall answer for the crime, when committed, in a criminal court, before a jury, and that to restrain them from committing crime is to rob them of their constitutional right of trial by jury. If that position be correct, then there can be no valid statute to prevent crime. But that position is contrary to all reason. The right of trial by jury does not arise until the party is accused of having already committed the crime. If you see a man advancing upon another with murderous demeanor and a deadly weapon, and you arrest him,—disarm him,—you have perhaps prevented an act which would have brought about a trial by jury, but can you be said to have deprived him of his constitutional right of trial by jury? The train of thought put in motion by the argument of the learned counsel for defendants on this point leads only to this end, to wit, that the constitution guaranties to every man the right to commit crime, so that he may enjoy the inestimable right of trial by jury.

"Passing now to the question relating to the particular jurisdiction of a court of equity, we are brought to face the proposition that a court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction, and will not interfere by injunction to prevent the commission of a crime. These two propositions are firmly established; and as to the first, that a court of equity has no criminal jurisdiction, there is no exception. As to the second, that a court of equity will not interfere by injunction to prevent the commission of a crime, that, too, is perhaps without exception, when properly interpreted, but it is sometimes misinterpreted. When we say that a court of equity will never interfere by injunction to prevent the commission of a crime, we mean that it will not do so simply for the purpose of preventing a violation of a criminal law. But when the act complained of threatens an irreparable injury to the property of an individual a court of equity will interfere to prevent that injury, notwithstanding the act may also be a violation of a criminal law. In such case the court does not interfere to prevent the commission of a crime, although that may incidentally result, but it exerts its force to protect the individual's property from destruction, and ignores entirely the criminal portion of the act. There can be no doubt of the jurisdiction of a court of equity in such a case. On this question counsel have cited cases in which courts of equity have been denied jurisdiction to enjoin the publication of a libel, and in those opinions are to be found the general statement of the proposition above mentioned. But the law of libel is peculiar, and those cases turn upon that peculiarity. The freedom of the press has been so jealously guarded both in England and in this country that our law of libel is like no other law on the books. Our constitution provides that a man may say, write, and publish 'whatever he will,' being answerable only for the 'abuse of liberty.' Libel is the only act injurious to the rights of another which a man cannot, under proper conditions, be restrained from committing; and that is so because the constitution says he shall be allowed to do it, and answer for it afterwards. Equity will not interfere when there is an adequate remedy at law. But what remedy does the law afford that would be adequate to the plaintiff's injury? How would their damages be estimated? How compensated? The defendants' learned counsel cites us to the criminal statute, but how will that remedy the plaintiff's injury? A criminal prosecution does not propose to remedy a private wrong. And, even if there was a statute giving a legal remedy to plaintiff, it would not oust the equity jurisdiction. The legal remedy that closes the door of a court of equity is a common-law remedy. Where equity had jurisdiction because the common law affords no adequate remedy, that jurisdiction is not affected by a statute providing a legal remedy. What a humiliating thought it would be if these defendants were really attempting to do what the amended petition charges, and what their demurrer confesses,—that is, to destroy the business of these plaintiffs, and to force the eight or nine hundred men, women, boys, and girls who are earning their livings in the plaintiff's employ to quit their work against their will,—and yet there is no law in the land to protect them. The injunction in this case does not hinder the defendants doing anything that they claim they have a right to do. They are free men, and have a right to quit the employ of plaintiffs whenever they see fit to do so, and no one can prevent them; and whether their act of quitting is wise or unwise, just or unjust, it is nobody's business but their own. And they have a right to use fair persuasion to induce others to join them in their quitting. But when fair persuasion is exhausted they have no right to resort to force or threats of violence. The law will protect their freedom and their rights, but it will not permit them to destroy its freedom and rights of others. The same law which guaranties the defendants in their right to quit the employment of the plaintiffs at their own will and pleasure also guaranties the other employes the right to remain at their will and pleasure. These defendants are their own masters, but they are not the masters of the other employes, and not only are they not the masters of the other employes, but they are not even their guardians. There is a maxim of our law to the effect that one may exercise his own right as he pleases, provided that he does not thereby prevent another exercising his right as he pleases. This maxim or rule of law comes nearer than any other rule in our law to the golden rule of Divine authority: 'That which you would have another do unto you, do you even so unto them.' Whilst the strict enforcement of the golden rule is beyond the mandate of a human tribunal, yet courts of equity, by injunction, do restrain men who are so disposed from so exercising their own rights as to destroy the rights of others. The demurrer to the amended petition is overruled."

The law applicable to the case is so clearly stated in this opinion of the learned judge that to add anything to it would be a work of supererogation. We adopt it as the opinion of this court, and affirm the judgment. All concur.

CRAWFORD et al. v. TYRRELL

Court of Appeals of New York. Oct. 6, 1891.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, Second department.

Action by John P. Crawford and others against Martin B. Tyrrell, to restrain defendant from keeping a house of ill fame, and to recover damages for injury sustained. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. & Thos. H. Troy, for appellant. Alfred E. Mudge, for respondents.

GRAY, J. In this action, which was brought to restrain the defendant from keeping a house of ill fame and from using his premises as an assignation house, and to recover damages for injuries sustained, the trial court found as facts that the house, as maintained by defendant, was a resort for prostitutes and licentious men, and that the persons occupying rooms acted in a boisterous and noisy manner, and indecently exposed their persons at the windows, "whereby the use and occupation of the plaintiffs' premises have been interfered with and rendered uncomfortable, and whereby the occupants of the plaintiffs' premises have been annoyed and seriously disturbed." Such a finding was amply justified by the evidence, and, indeed, it is not discussed by the appellant; but he argues that the plaintiffs could not maintain a civil action of this nature, inasmuch as the damage they suffered was a damage common to the whole community, and not special to them. If that position had been sustained by the facts, I do not doubt but that it would have been the duty of the trial judge to have denied the relief prayed for. The rule of law requires of him who complains of his neighbor's use of his property, and seeks for redress and to restrain him from such use, that he should show that a substantive injury to property is committed. The mere fact of a business being carried on which may be shown to be immoral, and, therefore, prejudicial to the character of the neighborhood, furnishes of itself no ground for equitable interference at the suit of a private person; and, though the use of property may be unlawful or unreasonable, unless special damage can be shown, a neighboring property owner cannot base thereupon any private right of action. It is for the public authorities, acting in the common interest, to interfere for the suppression of the common nuisance. See Francis v. Schoellkopf, 53 N. Y. 152. If the business complained of is a lawful one, the legal question presented in a civil action for private damage is whether the business is reasonably conducted, and whether, as conducted, it is one which is obnoxious and hurtful to adjoining property. If the business is unlawful, the complainant in a private action must show special damage, by which the legitimate use of his adjoining property has been interfered with, or its occupation rendered unfit or uncomfortable. That the perpetrator of the nuisance is amenable to the provisions and penalties of the criminal law is not an answer to an action against him by a private person to recover for injury sustained, and for an injunction against the continued use of his premises in a similar manner. The principle has been long settled that the objection that the nuisance was a common one is not available if it be shown that special damage was suffered. Rose v. Miles, 4 Maule & S. 101; Rose v. Groves, 5 Man. & G. 613; Francis v. Schoellkopf, supra; Lansing v. Smith, 4 Wend. 9. One who uses his property lawfully and reasonably, in a general legal sense, can do injury to nobody. In the full enjoyment of his legal rights in and to his property the law will not suffer a man to be restrained, but his use of the property must be always such as in no manner to invade the legal rights of his neighbor. The rights of each to the enjoyment and use of their several properties should, in legal contemplation, always be equal. If the balance is destroyed by the act of one, the law gives a remedy in damages, or equity will restrain. If the use of a property is one which renders a neighbor's occupation and enjoyment physically uncomfortable, or which may be hurtful to the health, as where trades are conducted which are offensive by reason of odors, noises, or other injurious or annoying features, a private nuisance is deemed to be established, against which the protection of a court of equity power may be invoked. In the present case the indecent conduct of the occupants of the defendant's house, and the noise therefrom, inasmuch as they rendered the plaintiffs' house unfit for comfortable or respectable occupation, and unfit for the purposes it was intended for, were facts which constituted a nuisance, and were sufficient grounds for the maintenance of the action.

If it was a nuisance which affected the general neighborhood, and was the subject of an indictment for its unlawful and immoral features, the plaintiffs were none the less entitled to their action for any injury sustained, and to their equitable right to have its continuance restrained. The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs. All concur, except FINCH, J., absent.

WEINSTOCK, LUBIN & CO. v. MARKS.
(No. 18,375.)

Supreme Court of California. Oct. 12, 1895.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; Matt. F. Johnson, Judge.

Action by Weinstock, Lubin & Co., a corporation, against H. Marks. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in part.

GAROUTTE, J. Plaintiff is a corporation carrying on a large clothing and dry-goods business in the city of Sacramento. Defendant is also a dealer in clothing of the same general character, and is carrying on business in a building adjoining plaintiff's place of business. The present action is one of injunction, and by its decree, among other things, the court ordered defendant to refrain from further use of the name "Mechanical Store" as the designation of his place of business, and further decreed that defendant maintain and place in a conspicuous part of his store, and also in a conspicuous place on the outside or front thereof, a sign showing the proprietorship of his said store, in letters sufficiently large to be plainly observable by passers-by and customers entering therein. Defendant appeals from the foregoing portions of the judgment.

The judgment is based upon certain findings of fact made by the trial court upon the evidence offered at the trial, and no complaint is now heard that this evidence does not fully support these findings. It therefore follows that the merit of this appeal presents itself upon a consideration of those findings and the decree based thereon. These findings of fact are full and in detail, and, for present purposes, we deem it sufficient to state the general tenor and effect of some of them. (1) The court finds that on or about the 8th day of October, 1874, H. Weinstock and D. Lubin entered into a copartnership under the firm name and style of Weinstock & Lubin, of the city of Sacramento, and, as such partners, engaged in the business of dealing in wearing apparel for men, women, and children, and that said Weinstock & Lubin selected as the name of their place of business "Mechanics' Store," and designated the same by that appellation, by which name their said store thenceforth was continually known; that, in the management and conduct of their business, they fixed a price upon each and every article carried by them in the stock of said store, and marked the said prices in figures upon each article, and sold such articles at the prices so marked, and never deviated therefrom; and they advertised the said method of doing business extensively throughout the entire Pacific coast by means of newspapers, etc., by means whereof their said method of doing business became widely known to the trade and public throughout the entire Pacific coast, and by reason whereof it became and was well known to the trade and public in California and the other states and territories of the Pacific coast that at the store of said Weinstock & Lubin only one price was charged for goods sold therein, and that no deviation from said price was permitted. (2) That, by care, attention, skill, and strict adherence to business and the rules as aforesaid, this plaintiff has materially increased the volume and importance and value of said business, and enhanced the good will thereof, and the said plaintiff has established for the said store and business throughout the said states and territories a wide and honorable reputation, and thereby said business has become extensive and valuable and profitable, and the public have become accustomed to plaintiff's said method of doing business, and have been induced to rely, and do rely, upon the good faith of the plaintiff in managing and conducting its business in the manner aforesaid, and by reason thereof have been induced to bestow and do bestow upon the plaintiff their custom, trade, patronage, and business. (3) That on or about 1885 the defendant, who had previously been engaged in business elsewhere, and was without any established reputation of his own, and whose business was unknown to the trade and general public, removed his business from the place he then occupied to the premises on the east of and near the premises of this plaintiff; and the defendant then and there engaged in a similar line of trade as this plaintiff, and ever since then he has maintained and conducted, and still maintains and conducts, the said store at said place, and carries on the said business therein; and he named his store in the year 1887 or thereabouts the "Mechanical Store." (4) That the defendant, well knowing the foregoing facts, and contriving, intending, and designing fraudulently to injure this plaintiff, and to obtain undue advantage of plaintiff, and to deprive the plaintiff of its business, and fraudulently and unlawfully to increase his own business, and to pirate and make use of and appropriate to himself the good will of the plaintiff's business, and the said reputation and honorable esteem and confidence that the plaintiff enjoyed in the minds of the people of the Pacific coast, and in order to create confusion in the public mind, and to take advantage of the standing that the plaintiff by its aforesaid acts had acquired in said territory, and fraudulently designing to deceive the public and people intending to trade with the plaintiff, and to divert the custom of the plaintiff to himself, and to deprive the plaintiff of its customers and of the trade, and to induce the people to trade with the defendant under the belief that they were trading with the plaintiff, and for the purpose of deceiving plaintiff's customers and persons intending to trade with plaintiff into believing that the defendant's store was that of the plaintiff, and thereby inducing them to enter said store of defendant to trade with said defendant, to his profit, and in order to carry out his fraudulent and corrupt designs as aforesaid,—the defendant has persistently carried out a system of deceit and misrepresentations concerning his store and its ownership, in connection with plaintiff's store and business, as follows: That in 1891 plaintiff, at its place of business, erected a store, the front of which is of peculiar architecture, containing arches and alcoves, of which there was none other similar in the city of Sacramento; that afterwards the defendant, at his said place of business, and adjoining plaintiff's store, erected a building which, so far as the first or lower story is concerned, was and is similar in architecture in every respect to the store of plaintiff, so much so that passers-by were liable to go into the store of defendant thinking that they were entering the store of plaintiff, and that customers of plaintiff in many instances did so enter the store of defendant thinking they were in the store of plaintiff; that defendant had no sign inside of his store or on the outside of his store by which customers could for themselves ascertain the true proprietorship thereof; that the erection of the defendant's building exactly the same as plaintiff's building in every particular, and the adoption of the use of the words "Mechanical Store," and the absence of any name or sign upon or in defendant's store designating the true proprietorship of defendant's store, were all done by the defendant for the purpose of deceiving the public, and more especially plaintiff's customers, and enticing and pirating and securing the patronage of said customers from plaintiff to defendant. (5) That, by the aforesaid means the defendant has diverted from the plaintiff a large part of plaintiff's trade and custom; has induced many persons to trade with the defendant who otherwise would have traded with the plaintiff; has sold large quantities of goods in his said store to persons who, but for said acts of defendant, would have purchased said goods of the plaintiff; has deprived the plaintiff of a large share of its legitimate profits; has injured the business and reputation of the plaintiff; has impaired the confidence of the public in the plaintiff and its method of doing business; and has deprived the plaintiff of a large number of its customers and patrons.

The foregoing chapter of facts makes interesting reading, and we first turn our attention to that portion of the judgment restraining defendant from the further use of the words "Mechanical Store" as a designation of his place of business. We see but little difficulty in arriving at a conclusion upon this branch of the case. Defendant assails the judgment in this particular with but a single weapon. He insists that the words "Mechanics' Store" are not the subject of trade-mark, and that, therefore, plaintiff can have no exclusive right to them.

As we view the picture presented by the findings of fact, the question as to what may or may not be the subject of trade-mark is not the problem to be solved. That these words are of a kind that may be used as a trade-name we have no doubt, and, having established that fact, we are required to pursue the investigation no further. That certain names and designations which may not become technical or specific trade-marks may become the names of articles or of places of business, and thereby the use thereof receive the protection of the law, cannot be doubted, for the cases everywhere recognize that fact. The learned judge said in Lee v. Haley, 5 Ch. App. 155: "I quite agree that they [the plaintiffs] have no property right in the name, but the principle upon which the cases on this subject proceed is not that there is property in the word, but that it is a fraud on a person who has established a trade, and carried it on under a given name, that some other person should assume the same name, or the same name with a slight alteration, in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the person who has given a reputation to the name." A similar doctrine is declared in Manufacturing Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, and also in the late case of Coats v. Thread Co., 149 U. S. 562, 13 Sup. Ct. 966. This court said in Pierce v. Guittard, 68 Cal. 71, 8 Pac. 645: "We are of opinion that it is not necessary to decide whether the plaintiff's label, with the accompanying words and devices, constituted a trade-mark, and, as such, the exclusive property of the plaintiff, for the reason that it is a fraud on a person who has established a business for his goods, and carries it on under a given name or with a particular mark, for some other person to assume the same name or mark, or the same with a slight alteration, in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with a person who has given a reputation to that name or mark." The same general principle is also recognized and approved in Schmidt v. Brieg, 100 Cal. 672, 35 Pac. 623. While in these two cases the fact appears that the defendants were selling an inferior article, and thereby deceiving and defrauding the public, it is not apparent that such fact was a necessary element in pointing the judgment. Neither do we consider it so upon principle; and in cases without number, restraining defendants from trespassing upon the good will of plaintiff's business, such fact was an element foreign to the litigation. It may be said that the adjudged cases for relief are based solely upon the ground of loss and damage to the tradesman's business, by unlawful competition. In Levy v. Walker, Cox, Man. Trade-Mark Cas. No. 639, the learned judge declared: "The court interferes solely for the purpose of protecting the owner of a trade or business from a fraudulent invasion of that business by somebody else. It does not interfere to prevent the world outside from being misled into anything."

While our statutes attempt to deal with trade-marks, and provide for the filing thereof with the secretary of state, with accompanying affidavits, etc., yet trade-names are equally protected upon analogous principles of law. And that the words "Mechanics' Store" may be made a trade-name, and the user thereof become entitled under the law to protection from pirates preying upon the sea of commercial trade, we have no doubt. We think the defendant should be restrained from the use of the words "Mechanical Store." The court has declared the fact to be, and it is not challenged by defendant, that these words were used as a designation of his store for the purpose of deceiving the public, and especially plaintiff's customers, and thereby securing the advantages and benefits of the good will of plaintiff's business. To say that such conduct upon the part of defendant is unfair business competition is to state the fact in the mildest terms. In Celluloid Manuf'g Co. v. Cello-nite Manuf'g Co., 32 Fed. 97, Justice Bradley, of the supreme court of the United States, in speaking to the question of similarity in name, said: "It was not identical with the plaintiff's name. That would be too gross an invasion of the complainant's rights. Similarity, not identity, is the usual recourse when one party seeks to benefit himself by the good name of another. What similarity is sufficient to effect the object has to be determined in each case by its circumstances. We may say, generally, that a similarity which would be likely to deceive or mislead an ordinary unsuspecting customer, is obnoxious to the law." In this case the trial court determined that there was a sufficient similarity in the names to deceive the public; that the defendant adopted the name for the purpose of deceiving the public and securing plaintiff's business; and that such results had followed. These things being true, the decree must go against him.

The remaining branch of the case presents a novel and original proposition of law. In its facts we apprehend no case like it can be found, either in this country or England. The decree orders the defendant to place, both upon the outside and inside of his store, a sign, plainly legible to customers and passers-by, indicating his proprietorship; and, while the power of the court to issue mandatory injunctions in many cases must be conceded, yet cases where such power has been exercised have generally involved matters of nuisance, or at least cases where courts have ordered the subject-matter of the litigation to be placed in its original condition; as, for instance, the removing of obstructions to ancient lights. But let us for a moment turn our attention to the facts of this case. The store of plaintiff was known as the "Mechanics' Store." By various kinds of advertising, and attention, honesty, and skill in the conduct of the business, it increased the volume thereof and enhanced its good will, and throughout the Pacific coast established for it a wide and honorable reputation as a fair and reliable house with which to deal. Plaintiff erected a store building of peculiar architecture, there being none like it in the city of Sacramento; and defendant thereupon erected a store building, immediately adjoining that of plaintiff's, in every respect of similar architecture. It further appears that defendant erected this particular kind of building for the purpose of deceiving the public, and securing the patronage of plaintiff's customers; and for the same purpose he refrained from placing any sign in or upon the building indicating the proprietorship of the business, or designating it in any way so that it might be distinguished from the store of plaintiff. And, by reason of these acts of defendant, many of plaintiff's customers were deceived into purchasing goods in defendant's store, believing that they were trading in plaintiff's store; and defendant thus diverted from the plaintiff a large part of its trade and custom, and thereby injured its business and curtailed the value of its good will. Upon this bald statement of facts, it cannot be gainsaid that defendant has done the plaintiff wrong; and it is said that for every wrong there is a remedy. These facts certainly indicate a case of unlawful business competition, and courts of equity have ever been ready to declare such things odious. It is strange if plaintiff may be deprived of the fruits of a long course of honest and fair dealing in business by such wicked contrivances, and, upon appeal to the courts for relief, should be told there was no relief. This cannot be so, for the whole law of trade-marks, trade-names, etc., is recognized, approved, and enforced for the very purpose of protecting the honest tradesman from a like loss and damage to that which threatens this plaintiff; and the fact that the question comes to us in an entirely new guise, and that the schemer has concocted a kind of deception heretofore unheard of in legal jurisprudence, is no reason why equity is either unable or unwilling to deal with him. It has been said by some judge or law writer that "no fixed rules can be established upon which to deal with fraud, for, were courts of equity to once declare rules prescribing the limitations of their power in dealing with it, the jurisdiction would be perpetually cramped and eluded by new schemes which the fertility of man's invention would contrive." By device, defendant is defrauding plaintiff of its business. He is stealing its good will,—a most valuable property,—only secured after years of honest dealing and large expenditures of money; and equity would be impotent, indeed, if it could contrive no remedy for such a wrong.

The fundamental principle underlying this entire branch of the law is that no man has the right to sell his goods as the goods of a rival trader. Mr. Browne, in his work upon Trade-Marks, declares the wrong to be, "not in imitating a symbol, device, or fancy name, for any such act may not involve the slightest turpitude; the wrong consists in unfair means to obtain from a person the fruits of his own ingenuity or industry,—an injustice that is in direct transgression of the decalogue, 'Thou shalt not covet * * * anything that is thy neighbor's.' The most detestable kind of fraud underlies the filching of another's good name, in connection with trafficking." We think the principle may be broadly stated that when one tradesman resorts to the use of any artifice or contrivance for the purpose of representing his goods or his business as the goods or business of a rival tradesman, thereby deceiving the people by causing them to trade with him when they intended to and would have otherwise traded with his rival, a fraud is committed,—a fraud which a court of equity will not allow to thrive. In Howard v. Henriques, 3 Sanf. 725, the court, in speaking of the competitor in business, said: "He must not by any deceitful or other practice impose on the public, and he must not by dressing himself in another man's garments, and by assuming another man's name, endeavor to deprive that man of his own individuality and of the gains to which by his industry and skill he is fairly entitled." It may well be said that the defendant, by duplicating plaintiff's building, with its peculiar architecture and immediately adjoining, entering into the same line of business, with no mark of identification upon his store, has dressed himself in plaintiff's garments; and, having so dressed himself with a fraudulent intent, equity will exert itself to reach the fraud in some way. In the leading case of Lee v. Haley, supra, the whole question is condensed by the final conclusion of the court into the principle of law "that it is a fraud on the part of a defendant to set up a business under such a designation as is calculated to lead and does lead other people to suppose that his business is the business of another person." If the same evil results are accomplished by the acts practiced by this defendant which would be accomplished by an adoption of plaintiff's name, why should equity smile upon the one practice and frown upon the other? Upon what principle of law can a court of equity say, "If you cheat and defraud your competitor in business by taking his name, the court will give relief against you, but, if you cheat and defraud him by assuming a disguise of a different character, your acts are beyond the law?" Equity will not concern itself about the means by which fraud is done. It is the results arising from the means—it is the fraud itself—with which it deals.

The foregoing principles of law do not apply alone to the protection of parties having trade-marks and trade-names. They reach away beyond that, and apply to all cases where fraud is practiced by one in securing the trade of a rival dealer; and these ways are as many and as various as the ingenuity of the dishonest schemer can invent. In Glenny v. Smith, reported in the Jurist of 1865 (page 965), the court held: "Where a tradesman, in addition to his own name upon his shop front, placed upon his sunblind and upon his brass plate the words 'From Thresher & Glenny' (in whose employment he had been), the court, being of opinion that this was done in such a way as to be likely to mislead, and there being evidence that persons had been actually misled, granted an injunction to restrain such a use of the name of the firm Thresher & Glenny." In Knott v. Morgan, 2 Keen, 213, the "London Conveyance Company" had its omnibuses painted green, and its servants clothed in the same colors. Another adopted the same name, and likewise its vehicles were so painted and its servants so clothed. It was conceded that plaintiff could have no exclusive property right in any of these things, but the court issued its injunction, declaring that plaintiff had "a right to call upon this court to restrain the defendant from fraudulently using precisely the same words and devices which they have taken for the purpose of distinguishing their property, and thereby depriving them of the fair profits of their business by attracting custom on the false representation that carriages really the defendant's belong to and are under the management of the plaintiffs." The author, by a note, approves the doctrine here declared, saying: "There was an obvious attempt to trade upon the plaintiff's reputation,—a constructive fraud,—coupled with pecuniary loss, which was made the ground for the issuance of a broad injunction." The same principle is reiterated by the same learned judge in Croft v. Day, 7 Beav. 84, in the following words: "It has been very correctly said that the principle of these cases is this: That no man has a right to sell his own goods as the goods of another. You may express the same principle in a different form, and say that no man has a right to dress himself in colors, or adopt and bear symbols to which he has no peculiar or exclusive right, and thereby personate another person, for the purpose of inducing the public to suppose either that he is that other person or that he is connected with and selling the manufacture of such other person while he is really selling his own. It is perfectly manifest that to do these things is to commit a fraud, and a very gross fraud." In the very recent case of Coats v. Thread Co., 149 U. S. 566, 13 Sup. Ct. 966, the court said: "There can be no question of the soundness of the plaintiff's proposition that, irrespective of the technical question of trade-mark, the defendants have no right to dress their goods up in such manner as to deceive an intending purchaser, and induce him to believe he is buying those of the plaintiffs. * * * They have no right by imitative devices to beguile the public into buying their wares under the impression they are buying those of their rivals." To the same point, see System Co. v. Le Boutilier (Super. Ct.) 24 N. Y. Supp. 890; Appolinaris Co. v. Scherer, 27 Fed. 18; Burgess v. Burgess, 3 De Gex, M. & G. 896; Von Mumm v. Frash, 56 Fed. 830.

Having decided that defendant's acts constitute a fraud upon plaintiff, and that a court of equity will administer relief, the question then presents itself, what shall be the form of the decree? How may the court reach the wrong? The defendant had the right to erect his building, and erect it in any style of architecture his fancy might dictate. He had the right to erect it in the particular locality where it was erected. He had the right there to conduct a business similar to that of plaintiff. He had a right to do all these things, for, of themselves, they did not offend against equity; but when they were done with a fraudulent intent, when they were done for the purpose of tolling away the customers of plaintiff by a deception, a fraud is practiced, and equity will do what it can to right the wrong. The decision of the trial court in effect ordered defendant to place signs both inside and outside his building, showing to the world the proprietorship thereof. We think this decree holds defendant to a rule too strict, in that it requires the proprietorship of the store to be shown. In this particular we think the decree should be modified so as to require that the defendant, in the conduct of this business, shall distinguish his place of business from that in which the plaintiff is carrying on its business, in some mode or form that shall be a sufficient indication to the public that it is a different place of business from that of the plaintiff. For the foregoing reason, the judgment in this respect only is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to modify the same, as heretofore suggested; and thereupon it is ordered that said judgment stand affirmed. Appellant is to pay the costs of this appeal.

PURVINES et al. v. HARRISON.

Supreme Court of Illinois. June 16, 1894.

Error to circuit court, Sangamon county.

Bill by Frances A. Harrison against Frances Purvines and others. Complainant obtained a decree. Defendants bring error. Affirmed.

Conkling & Grout, for plaintiffs in error. Wm. J. Butler and Connolly & Mather, for defendant in error.

MAGRUDER, J. This is a bill filed on July 18, 1890, by the defendant in error, Frances A. Harrison, the mother of Peyton Asbury Purvines, deceased, by a former husband, against Frances Purvines, the minor daughter and only child of said Peyton Asbury Purvines, deceased; Samuel H. Claspill, the guardian of said minor; Alfred B. Purvines, the administrator of said deceased; and Edward Wyatt, a tenant occupying the premises hereinafter referred to under a lease from the complainant in the bill. The bill is filed for the purpose of reforming a deed of about 60 acres of land, executed by the defendant in error to her son, said Peyton A. Purvines, in his lifetime. The deed sought to be reformed bears date January 31, 1889, was acknowledged August 30, 1889, and recorded on September 2, 1889. It is a warranty deed, and conveys about 60 acres of land in Sangamon county to the grantee. The bill alleges that it was the intention of the complainant and her deceased son to insert words in the deed reserving to her a life estate in the land, so that she could have the use of it, and the rents from it, as long as she lived; but that, by the mutual mistake of the parties to the deed, and by an oversight on the part of the scrivener who drew it, such reservation was unintentionally omitted from the deed. The prayer of the bill is that the deed be reformed by inserting therein a reservation of the life estate to the grantor. A guardian ad litem was appointed for the minor, who answered; and answers denying the allegations of the bill were filed by said guardian and tenant, to which replications were filed. After proofs taken and hearings had, the circuit court rendered a decree finding the allegations of the bill to be true, and directing that the deed be reformed in the respect mentioned, and that such reformation take effect as of the date of the deed, and that the rents and profits of the land after that date should belong to the complainant.

Evidence was introduced showing that an inquisition as to the insanity of the complainant was had in the county court of said county, and a verdict of the jury was returned therein on January 25, 1892, finding her to be an insane person; and thereafter her insanity was suggested in the present suit, and one B. F. Irwin was appointed to prosecute the same as next friend. Application had been previously made to the court, in March, 1890, for the appointment of a conservator for defendant in error as a distracted person, but upon the trial of the issue whether she was a distracted person verdict had been returned in her favor. Some evidence was introduced tending to show that when she made the deed her mind had begun to fail, and she showed signs of absent-mindedness not theretofore noticeable in her. Her son, Peyton A. Purvines, had been divorced from his wife before he died, and his habits up to the time of his death were those of a very intemperate man. There is no evidence, however, that he practiced any fraud upon his mother in order to obtain the deed. He lived with her at that time upon a farm of 80 acres, owned by her, and the consideration as expressed in the deed is "one dollar, and natural love and affection." He died unmarried and intestate on February 22, 1890, leaving, as his only child and heir at law, the minor plaintiff in error, Frances Purvines. After a careful examination of the evidence, we think that both parties executed the deed under a common or mutual mistake, and did what neither of them intended to do. Warrick v. Smith, 137 Ill. 504, 27 N. E. 709. To justify the reformation of a written instrument upon the ground of mistake, it is necessary—First, that the mistake should be one of fact, and not of law (Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106); second, that the mistake should be proved by clear and convincing evidence (2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 862); third, that the mistake should be mutual and common to both parties to the instrument (Sutherland v. Sutherland, 69 Ill. 481). A mistake of law is an erroneous conclusion as to the legal effect of known facts. Hurd v. Hall, 12 Wis. 113. The construction of words is a matter of law. Sibert v. McAvoy, supra. Where parties instructed an officer to prepare a quitclaim deed for their execution, but he drew a deed containing language which amounted in law to a covenant of title in fee, and they signed the deed knowing that such language was in it, they were held to have been mistaken in the law,—that is to say, in the legal effect of the language used,—and in the legal consequences of retaining such language in the deed. Gordere v. Downing, 18 Ill. 492. Mistake of fact has been defined to be a mistake, not caused by the neglect of a legal duty on the part of the person making the mistake, and consisting in an unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a fact, past or present, material to the contract, or belief in the present existence of a thing material to the contract which does not exist, or in the past existence of a thing which has not existed. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 839. It is manifest that the mistake in the present case was one of fact, and not one of law, because it had reference to the accidental omission from the deed of words which were intended to be inserted therein; that is to say, words reserving to the grantor a life interest. In Sibert v. McAvoy, supra, we said: "It is where parties intended to insert words in a contract which were by accident omitted that equity can reform the contract by inserting them. * * * The insertion of words is a matter of fact. It is for mistakes of fact alone that contracts may be reformed." Nor can it be said in this case that the mistake occurred on account of any want of reasonable diligence to ascertain the facts, or on account of any neglect, amounting to a violation of legal duty. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 856. Where the relation of the parties is one of confidence, such as that which existed here between mother and son, and where a party executing the contract has a failing or weak mind arising from suffering or old age, the same degree of vigilance and care is not expected or required as is expected or required in the ordinary dealings of men with one another. Day v. Day, 84 N. C. 408. In Day v. Day, supra, a deaf and aged father made a deed to his son, in whom he reposed confidence, conveying a tract of land in fee, but omitting, either by mistake or contrivance of the son, under whose direction the deed was drawn, to reserve a life estate to the grantor; and it was held that an equity arose in favor of the father to have such instrument reformed in accordance with the original intention of the parties. Counsel for plaintiffs in error claim that the evidence does not show want of mental capacity in the defendant in error, or want of capacity on her part to understand the ordinary affairs of life. This may be true. The proof shows merely a weakening of the mental powers, growing out of domestic trouble, and grief for the recent death of her aged parents.

This proof was not introduced for the purpose of showing such insanity as would avoid the deed; but in a proceeding to reform the deed it tended, in connection with the relations of the parties and other attending circumstances, to excuse any apparent want of care in examining the phraseology of the deed. We think that the proof of a mutual mistake was clear and convincing. The burden of proof was upon the complainant, but the defendants offered no testimony whatever to contradict her witness. Some time after the deed was executed the deceased applied for a loan of money to be secured by mortgage upon his interest in the land. He then discovered for the first time that his mother's life estate had not been reserved in the deed. There is abundant evidence, given by quite a number of witnesses, that he admitted the mistake, and stated that it was the intention and agreement to retain a life estate for her in the deed, and that he intended to correct the mistake. He died, however, without doing so. These declarations, made many times, and challenged by no opposing evidence, were admissions against his own interest. It is well settled that parol proof may be received to show a mistake in a written instrument. McLennan v. Johnston, 60 Ill. 306. For the reasons here stated, and deeming it unnecessary to enter into a detailed discussion of the evidence, we think that the decree of the circuit court was correct, and it is accordingly affirmed. Affirmed.

PHILLIPS, J., having heard this case in the circuit court, took no part here.

WELLES v. YATES.

Commission of Appeals of New York. May, 1871.

Appeal from an order of the general term of the supreme court in the Sixth district, affirming a judgment of the special term in favor of the plaintiff.

The action was brought for the reformation of a deed executed by the plaintiff, he claiming that a reservation of certain timber had been omitted, through mistake on his part; and also for an accounting by the defendant for timber taken from the premises conveyed.

An account was ordered to ascertain the value of the lumber taken since March 10, 1851. The referee found the value at $2,041.72.

Upon the coming in of the referee's report, judgment was entered for the plaintiff that the deed be reformed and corrected, and that he have judgment for the value of the timber removed by the defendant. This judgment was affirmed by the general term in the Sixth district, and the defendant appeals to the court of appeals. The facts appear from the opinion of the court.

E. H. Benn, for appellant. Geo. Sidney Camp, for respondent.

HUNT, C. It will not be necessary to consider in detail the fifteen points presented by the appellant, and so ably argued by his counsel. The discussion of a few of them will settle principles that may serve to decide the case.

The complaint, in substance, alleged that on the 28th of May, 1846, the plaintiff was the owner of one hundred and ten acres of land, being lot No. 4; that on that day he sold the same by executory contract, with the timber thereon, to T. & T. Trevor, for $17 per acre.

That on the 7th day of December, 1846, he was the owner of lot No. 5, containing one hundred and forty-one acres, and then entered into an agreement with the same parties, by which they undertook to cut the timber standing thereon, manufacture the same into boards and planks, and to give the plaintiff one-half of the lumber thus manufactured. Certain other details were provided, which it is not necessary to specify. At the same time, the plaintiff entered into an executory contract with the same persons, for the sale of the one hundred and forty-one acres, at $4 per acre.

That these two pieces of land were of the same value; that the timber growing on the latter piece was of the value of $5,000, and that such timber, in the understanding of the parties, was reserved to the plaintiff by the manufacturing contract mentioned, and that the price of $4 per acre was for the land simply, the timber reserved to the plaintiff. That, after proceeding for some time in the manufacture of the lumber, the purchasers became embarrassed, and the defendant took their place in the contract, and without new or further negotiations, a calculation was made of their payments, the balance found due paid by the defendant, and an absolute deed of the two pieces of land, without reservation of the timber, made by the plaintiff to the defendant.

That the defendant well knew all of the facts in the complaint recited. The plaintiff then avers "that through and by mistake he failed to insert in the said last-mentioned deed (of the one hundred and forty-one acres) any reservation of the timber mentioned and embraced in the contract secondly above mentioned;" and also avers demand and refusal to amend. The prayer is that the deed may be corrected, so as to be made to contain a reservation of the timber, and that the plaintiff may have an accounting as to the timber taken and removed by the defendant.

The judge found that there was an error and mistake on the part of the plaintiff, as averred by him. He found also that there was no mistake on the part of the defendant, but that he well understood the plaintiff's error. He knew that the timber was not reserved, and he knew that the plaintiff supposed and understood that it was reserved. He received the deed, failing to correct the plaintiff's error, but intending to reap the profits of it. He knew that he received of the plaintiff's estate $4,000 or $5,000 more than the plaintiff intended to give him, or than he supposed he had given him. The mistake was unilateral; on the part of the plaintiff only. On the part of the defendant, there was no mistake, but something worse. It was a fraud, as palpable as if he had made affirmative representations to induce the error; as gross as if he had put his hands in the plaintiff's pocket and feloniously abstracted his money. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 187, 137, 140, 147, 152, 153, 167, 168, 191, 214-217; Waldron v. Stevens, 12 Wend. 100; Wiswall v. Hall, 3 Paige, 313; Hill v. Gray, 1 Starkie, 434; 2 E. C. L. 167.

The point here arises, can there be a judgment to reform the contract, there not being a mutual error, but error on one part and fraud on the other?

It is laid down in many authorities reported and elementary works, that there must be a mutual error, to authorize this interposition of a court of equity. See Story, Eq. Jur. § 155; Story v. Conger, 36 N. Y. 673; Nevius v. Dunlap, 33 N. Y. 676; Lyman v. United States Ins. Co., 17 Johns. 376. The cases where this general statement is made are very numerous, and it is well said that to exercise this power, where one party only has been in error and the other has correctly understood it, would be making a new contract for the parties, and would be doing injustice to the party who made no mistake. On this point two distinctions may be noticed. 1st. Those cases will be found to have in them the element of the honesty on the part of the one correctly understanding the contract. Where two parties enter into a contract, and an error is claimed by one party to exist on an important point, which is claimed to be correct by the other party, it cannot be amended, as against the party correctly understanding it, he acting in good faith, and supposing the other to have understood the contract as he did. This rule does not apply where there is fraud. Either fraud or mutual mistake will authorize the reformation. See authorities supra; De Peyster v. Hasbrouck, 11 N. Y. 582; and Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585; Barlow v. Scott, 24 N. Y. 40; Rider v. Powell, 28 N. Y. 310. In his supplementary points the appellant expressly concedes this proposition.

2. This is the consummation of an existing contract, about the terms of which there was no dispute. This contract it was attempted to perform. There has been a failure to perform it, by the misunderstanding, on the part of the plaintiff, of the effect of the instrument by which performance was attempted. A reformation is permitted in such case, although the mistake be not mutual. See the cases before cited, and Coles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 534.

The result of the cases justifies a reformation of a contract, when there is either a mutual mistake, that is, a mistake common to both parties, or when there is fraud. In his complaint, the plaintiff has simply stated the facts on which he claims relief. After setting forth the facts, he adds, that by mistake, he failed to insert in the deed a reservation of the timber. He does not charge that it was a mistake common to both parties. Nor does he charge it to have been a fraud. He gives no name to the conduct of the defendant. The facts, as found by the referee, and the judgment rendered by him, are in conformity to the allegations of the complaint. They establish, not a mutual or common error, but an error on the part of the plaintiff and fraud on the part of the defendant.

The defendant, by the judgment of the court upon the facts, occupied the place of the original contractors and undertook to perform their contract. This was the finding of the judge, and the evidence, with the circumstances, justified this finding. The fraud was in the deceitful performance. If the judgment of the court below is carried out, he will not be made a party to a new contract, which he would never have assumed. He did assume the original contract. He therefore became bound by it. When the court now compel him to abandon his fraudulent contract, he is remitted to the original agreement. He has no ground therefore to say that by being convicted of a fraud, he is compelled to enter into a new contract. Nor is he to be relieved by the rule that a party seeking to be relieved from fraud, must be ready, prompt and eager in his demand for redress. When a party seeks to rescind a contract, on the ground of fraud, he must undoubtedly be prompt and ready in his disaffirmance. He has the election to affirm or disaffirm. If he elects the latter he must do it at once. He is not permitted to hesitate and balance advantages. Masson v. Bovet, 1 Denio, 69; Beers v. Hen- drickson, 6 Rob. (N. Y.) 54; Tomlinson v. Miller, *42 N. Y. 517.

In the present case the party does not ask to have the contract rescinded. He does not seek to have it declared void. On the contrary he insists that it is valid. He asks that it may read exactly as the parties originally agreed, and that all its parts may be completely performed. In such case the rule is that the party must show himself ready and eager for its performance. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 776. The plaintiff has given sufficient evidence of his readiness and eagerness to perform. If there has been an unreasonable delay in seeking relief, the court will refuse it. Id., and 1 Fonbl. Eq. bk. 1, c. 6, § 2, note e. It is a question of discretion in the court whether under all the circumstances of time, repeated applications and refusals, the condition, knowledge, expectations and hopes of the parties, the relief should be granted. There is no positive or rigid rule, like that existing in the case of an attempted rescission. I am satisfied with the decision on this point of the court below, and the judge trying the cause. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 529; Bidwell v. Insurance Co., 16 N. Y. 263.

The court having jurisdiction of the cause to amend the contract, thereby acquired the right incidentally to give relief in damages, or in such mode as justice required. Rathbone v. Warren, 10 Johns. 587; Kempshall v. Stone, 5 Johns. Ch. 193; Woodcock v. Bennett, 1 Cow. 711; Bidwell v. Insurance Co., 16 N. Y. 263; Story, Eq. § 794; Rundle v. Allison, 34 N. Y. 180.

The defendant contends further, that no damages can be recovered by the plaintiff for timber that was cut more than six years before the commencement of the action. The argument of the defendant's counsel is that the reformation of the deed is merely a means by which the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for the timber taken, and that its correction is simply a part of the evidence to authorize him thus to recover; that his claim is therefore a legal one and cannot extend back beyond six years. The authorities cited by the defendant do not sustain this position. The most plausible is that of Borst v. Corey, 15 N. Y. 505, which was an action to enforce in equity a lien for the unpaid purchase-money of land. The court held that the action could not be sustained, for the reason that the debt sought to be enforced was barred by the statute of limitations. The debt they held to be the principal, the lien the incident, and the principal being ended the incident could not be enforced. At the same time the court conceded that where a mortgage was given to secure the payment of a simple contract debt, the lapse of six years was no bar to an action to foreclose the mortgage. The authority of Mayor v. Colgate, 12 N. Y. 140, was conceded, where an assessment was attempted to be enforced more than six years after the assessment had become due and payable. In the present case the question is not what action can be sustained after the deed is reformed,

But what action could have been sustained before its reformation? The reformation had not occurred when the suit was commenced, and the right of the parties was determined by the unreformed deed. That deed conveyed to the defendant without reservation, the one hundred and forty-one acres in question. It carried with it complete title to the trees. The plaintiff could not have sustained an action for their conversion. He would have been told that defendant had a legal title. The reformation of the deed in the present case is the principal and not the incident. Damages are the incident, not the principal. It is the title which the judgment of reformation gives that warrants the claim for damages; not the claim for damages that creates the legal title. Complete justice and nothing more is done by the judgment in this respect as it stands.

The defendant also insists that in the view that the recovery against the defendant is sustained upon the ground of fraud and not of mutual mistake, the cause of action is barred in six years from the discovery of the fraud. He further says that the judge has expressly found as a fact that the cause of action has not accrued within six years from the commencement of the suit. I have looked through the testimony carefully, and I do not find any evidence that the plaintiff discovered the fraud perpetrated upon him as early as six years before the commencement of the suit. He did undoubtedly discover his own error soon after its occurrence, and applied to the defendant's agents for its correction. He says that "he had confidence in them and expected all would have gone on as though it had been reserved." In other words, he had discovered his own mistake and believed it to be a mutual mistake, which the defendant would willingly rectify. He says further of the defendant's agent: "He seemed willing to do something. They proposed leaving it out. They never told me I could not have the timber. They always gave me to understand that they would settle it in some way. They always gave me to understand that they would do something about it. Neither of them ever told me I should not have so given the deed, if I did not mean to part with the timber." This evidence does not show a knowledge of the fraud. It does not show the plaintiff's knowledge that the defendant knew, when he took it, that the deed conveyed the absolute ownership of the trees, and that the plaintiff was ignorant of that fact, but supposed the trees were reserved, and that the defendant failed to correct his error. It does not even show that he supposed the defendant meant to insist upon retaining the benefits of the error. It shows rather that the plaintiff was constantly deluded with the idea that the mistake would be corrected. The judge has not found that the plaintiff discovered the fraud within more than six years before suit brought, and there was no evidence on which he could have been justified in so finding.

When the cause of action accrued in this case is a question of law. It was either when the transaction occurred or when the fraud was discovered.

The judge has found that the cause of action did not accrue within six years before suit brought. He states, in his opinion, that the action being to reform the contract, and the accounting being incidental, the action falls under the ninety-seventh section of the Code, which requires it to be brought within ten years after action accrued. He fixes the occurrence of the transaction as the time from which by law the statute begins to run. The defendant now asks us to hold this as a conclusive finding of fact, that the fraud was discovered more than six years before suit brought. This we cannot do. Upon the theory that the running of the statute begins with the date of the occurrence more than six years had elapsed, and such was the theory of the judge trying the cause. On the theory that it runs from the discovery of the fraud, there is no such finding, nor is there evidence to prove it. All presumptions are in favor of the judgment, and the contrary must be taken to be the fact.

I have thus considered the most important of the questions raised by the appellant. There are several other objections stated in the points, which I have also examined. They furnish no valid ground for asking a reversal of the judgment.

A majority of the court concur in the opinion that the plaintiff is entitled to relief. A majority of the court do not concur with me on the question of damages, and are of the opinion that the recovery of damages for a period exceeding six years prior to the commencement of the suit was erroneous. The judgment of the court will therefore be, that the judgment of the general term be affirmed, without costs of the court of appeals to either party, provided that the plaintiff shall, within thirty days after the entry of this order, serve on the defendant's attorney a stipulation, deducting from the judgment of April 6, 1863, the sum of $2,407.45 as of that date. If such stipulation be not served, then the judgment shall be reversed and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event. In case the attorneys do not agree as to the details of the judgment, the same can be settled before one of the commissioners.

EARL, C. (dissenting). As I cannot concur with my brethren in this case, I will briefly give the reasons for my dissent.

No mistake is alleged in the contracts, and no reformation of them is claimed. And under no allegations or proof could the contracts be reformed, as a cause of action, for such purpose, would be barred by the statute of limitations.

If, as claimed by the plaintiff in his complaint, and by his counsel on the argument before us, the deed was given in pursuance and in fulfillment of the contracts, then there can be no reformation of the deed, as it is in precise conformity to the contracts. If the two contracts of December 7, 1846, are construed together, they must be read as if embodied in one; and the timber is not reserved, and the contract does not provide for any reservation in the deed. The vendees were to get out certain lumber upon shares, and were to pay $4 per acre besides. The contract in reference to the lumber was a binding contract and, if performed as the parties contemplated, it would be fully performed before the deed was required to be given; and such was manifestly the intention of the parties, and hence no provision was made for any reservation in the deed. The deed was given without any mention of the lumber, and hence the only claim the vendor could thereafter have, upon the lumber contract, was to sue for damages on account of its non-performance.

The only contract the defendant ever made or intended to make, as found by the referee, is that which is embodied in the deed. He never intended or was willing to take a deed with any reservation in it. What right then has a court of equity to reform the deed, so as to give him such a deed as he was never bound to take? There was never a time when, by action for specific performance, he could have been compelled to take a deed with a reservation, and the court has no right to compel him to take such a deed by the reformation of the one he did take.

If by fraud or mistake on his part, the plaintiff was induced to give this deed, the only relief he could have was to set aside the deed; and to obtain this relief, it was his duty, on the discovery of the fraud or mistake, to proceed promptly and not ratify the deed by taking the money on the note given for the purchase-price, after he discovered the mistake or fraud.

As I understand the opinion in which my brethren have concurred, it sustains the relief granted to the plaintiff, upon the ground of fraud, and yet the complaint does not in any way intimate even that the defendant was guilty of any fraud, nor does it allege that the defendant used any artifices to procure the deed to be drawn with the reservation omitted, or that he knew it was omitted. The charge of fraud should have been distinctly made in the complaint, so that the defendant could have taken issue upon it.

And it does not appear that any claim was made, at the trial, that the defendant was guilty of fraud, and the case was manifestly not tried upon any such theory. The judge at special term did not put his decision upon the ground of fraud. If he had, he would certainly have decided against the plaintiff, under his finding as to the statute of limitations, as follows: "That within a month after the execution of said deed, the plaintiff discovered said mistake, and shortly thereafter applied to the defendant to correct the same, which he neglected and refused to do; but proceeded to cut large quantities of said timber and appropriate the same to his own use; that the cause of action for which this suit is brought has not accrued to the plaintiff within six years before the commencement of this suit."

The learned judge evidently proceeded and granted relief upon the ground that the scrivener made a mistake in drawing the deed, and this was the ground upon which the general term placed its decision of affirmance. The cause of action for the mistake was not barred by the statute of limitations, because the action was commenced within ten years from the time the alleged mistake occurred.

A cause of action, for such a fraud as is now alleged in this case, is deemed to accrue, when the aggrieved party discovers the facts constituting the fraud, and it is barred in six years from that time. Code, § 91. All the fraud, if any, that was perpetrated in this case was in procuring and taking the deed without the reservation, and this was discovered, according to the finding of the judge, more than nine years before the suit was commenced, and hence I cannot be mistaken in saying that relief was granted at Special Term upon the ground of mistake alone, and not of fraud.

And still further, the counsel for respondent in his argument before us, did not claim to sustain the judgment below upon the ground of fraud, but upon the ground of mistake alone.

Hence under all the circumstances I cannot consent to uphold this judgment, or any part of it, upon the ground of fraud, against the decisions of both courts below, the claims of plaintiff's counsel, and the explicit finding of the judge at special term, that the cause of action for fraud was barred by the statute of limitations. It was the duty of the plaintiff to show that he discovered the fraud within six years before the commencement of the suit, and there can be no pretense that he gave any evidence to show this.

I concur with my brethren in holding that in any view of the case the plaintiff could recover only for timber cut within six years before the suit was commenced.

For affirmance, as modified: LOTT, C. C., and HUNT and LEONARD, CC.

For reversal: EARL and GRAY, CC., not voting.

Judgment affirmed without costs to either party in the court of appeals, provided the plaintiff within thirty days after the entry of this order, serves on the defendant's attorney a stipulation reducing the judgment $2,407.45 and interest from the date of the judgment, April 6, 1863. If such stipulation be not served, then the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered, costs to abide the event.

Judgment affirmed.

TOWN OF VENICE v. WOODRUFF.

(62 N. Y. 462.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1875.

Appeal from supreme court, general term.

This was an action to secure the cancellation of certain bonds issued by the supervisor and railroad commissioners of the plaintiff town, and to restrain the defendants, who were the holders of those bonds, from transferring them. There was a finding of fact by a referee, the material part of which appears in the opinion.

RAPALLO, J. The referee has found that all of the bonds, which the plaintiff seeks by this action to have delivered up and canceled, were made and issued without the requisite consent of two-thirds of the tax payers of the town. That fact, according to the decisions of this court, rendered the bonds void, even in the hands of bona fide holders. Starin v. Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 439; People v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 114, 36 N. Y. 224.

It was further held in these cases that the burden of proving the requisite consent of the tax payers rested upon the party seeking to enforce payment of the bonds, and that the affidavit directed by the act under which the bonds purported to be issued, to be filed with the consent, was not evidence of the requisite consent. It is therefore settled by the adjudications of this court that no recovery can be had in an action upon these bonds, without affirmative extrinsic proof of the requisite consent. The fact being found that such consent was not given, it is clear that a perfect defense to the bonds exists, should an action be brought upon them in any court of this state, either by the present holders of the bonds, or by any person to whom they may be transferred.

Upon this state of facts the question arises, whether an equitable action can be maintained by the town to restrain the holders of the bonds from suing upon or transferring them, and to compel the surrender and cancellation of the instruments.

The cases in which a court of equity exercises its jurisdiction to decree the surrender and cancellation of written instruments are, in general, where the instrument has been obtained by fraud, where a defense exists which would be cognizable only in a court of equity, where the instrument is negotiable, and by a transfer the transferee may acquire rights which the present holder does not possess, and where the instrument is a cloud upon the title of the plaintiff to real estate. Under the chancery system, where a bill of discovery was necessary to establish a defense, the court having acquired jurisdiction of the case for the purpose of discovery, might proceed and award relief, but this ground of jurisdiction no longer exists. It is true that the jurisdiction of the court of chancery has been asserted to decree the surrender of every instrument which ought not to be enforced, whether void at law or not, and whether void from matter appearing on its face, or from matter which must be established by extrinsic proof. Hamilton v. Cummings, 1 Johns. Ch. 520-522, 523. But Chancellor Kent in the case cited, in asserting this jurisdiction recognizes the necessity of showing strong grounds for the exercise of the power, and endeavors to reconcile the apparently conflicting English authorities by adverting to the general principle that the exercise of the power is to be regulated by sound discretion, as the circumstances of the individual case may dictate, and that a resort to equity, to be sustained, must be expedient either because the instrument is liable to abuse from its negotiable nature; or because the defense not arising on its face may be difficult or uncertain at law; or from some other special circumstances peculiar to the case, and rendering a resort to equity highly proper. And it is now well established that equity will not interpose to decree the cancellation of an instrument, the invalidity of which appears upon its face. Story, Eq. Jur., § 700, a.

There must exist some circumstance establishing the necessity of a resort to equity, to prevent an injury which might be irreparable, and which equity alone is competent to avert. If the mere fact that a defense exists to a written instrument were sufficient to authorize an application to a court of equity to decree its surrender and cancellation, it is obvious that every controversy in which the claim of either party was evidenced by a writing could be drawn to the equity side of the court, and tried in the mode provided for the trial of equitable actions, instead of being disposed of in the ordinary manner by a jury.

Whether therefore the question be regarded as one of jurisdiction or of practice, it is established by the later decisions that some special ground for equitable relief must be shown, and that the mere fact that the instrument ought not to be enforced is insufficient, standing alone, to justify a resort to an equitable action. Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 374; Minturn v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 3 N. Y. 498; Perrine v. Striker, 7 Paige, 598; Morse v. Hovey, 9 Paige, 197; Field v. Holbrook, 6 Duer, 597; Allerton v. Belden, 49 N. Y. 373; Reed v. Bank of Newburgh, 1 Paige, 215, 218.

In the present case in so far as the invalidity of the bonds results from the want of consent of the tax payers, there is no ground whatever shown for resorting to an equitable action. Not only is the want of the consent a perfect defense at law, but the onus of proving the consent is upon the party seeking to enforce the bond; and the court cannot assume that he will be able to establish a fact that does not exist, and of which there is no documentary evidence. If it be said that the town may by delay lose evidence now existing, which would be available to meet and rebut false testimony, one decisive answer is that the statutes now provide a summary mode of perpetuating testimony in all cases, and an action is not necessary for that purpose. The case is analogous to those of Field v. Holbrook, 6 Duer, 597, and Allerton v. Belden, 49 N. Y. 373.

It is urged that the action should be sustained for the purpose of preventing a transfer of the bonds to a bona fide holder. This court has held that such a transfer could not prejudice the plaintiff, as the defense would be available even against a bona fide holder. Starin v. Town of Genoa, 23 N. Y. 439. But it is said that although such is the rule in this state, a different rule has been adopted in the courts of the United States, and the bonds might be transferred to a bona fide holder, who might sue in those courts. There would be force in this argument provided it were established in the case that the present holders of the bonds were not bona fide holders. In that case it might be proper for a court of equity to prevent their subjecting the town to liability by a transfer of the bonds. But if they are themselves bona fide holders, there is no justification for interfering with the right of transfer. In contemplation of law the transferees would acquire no greater rights than are possessed by the present holders.

The real purpose of the litigation seems to be to prevent a resort to the courts of the United States for the collection of these bonds; and the question is, whether it is the province of a court of equity in a state to interfere for the purpose of preventing a resort to the federal courts for the enforcement of obligations on the ground that they may be held in those courts to be valid, while according to the decisions of the state courts the same obligations are held to be void. I apprehend that the power of a court of equity to decree the surrender and cancellation of instruments has never before been appealed to or exercised for such a purpose. Equity will interfere to control the action of parties and restrain them from transferring negotiable obligations, on the ground that it is against conscience to allow them to create in their transferee a right or equity which they themselves do not possess. But where the effect of a transfer is not to change in any respect the rights or equities of the parties, I am not prepared to hold that the allegation that the transferee might resort to a tribunal in which a rule of decision prevails, or may prevail, differing from that of the court which is asked to enjoin the transfer, is sufficient to justify the interference asked. The wrong sought to be prevented by such a proceeding is not any wrongful act of any party, but a decision of another court. The facts of the case and the abstract rights of the parties are not changed by the transfer. The greatest effect it can have is to enable a transferee to sue in a court to which the present holder could not resort. This, in general, would not be regarded as any wrong which a court of equity would restrain. If it is a wrong in this case it must be on the assumption that the federal court will render a decision at variance with the decision of this court. I am of opinion that such an apprehension is not a legitimate ground for the action of a court of equity in restraining a transfer or directing the cancellation of the instrument. There is no finding that the present holders are not bona fide holders of the bonds. As the judgment entered upon the report of the referee was in favor of the defendants it could not be disturbed unless facts were found showing that the conclusions of law were erroneous. We have held over and over again that the facts showing error in the legal conclusions must be found, and that the appellate court will not search for them in the evidence. In this case the findings are in favor of the bona fides of the defendants. As to five of the bonds it is found that they were sold and delivered by the supervisor and railroad commissioner to Hutchinson & Murdock, who paid for them par in cash. This finding is not weakened by the further finding that the money was in the first instance advanced on a pledge of the bonds which was subsequently converted into a sale. As to the twenty bonds which were issued direct to the railroad company, the referee finds that the holders purchased them without being informed that they had been delivered directly to the company. No fact is found impeaching the bona fides of the holders of any of the bonds, and therefore it does not appear that any transfer of them can be made which will confer upon the transferees any greater equities than are possessed by the present holders.

The fact that twenty of the bonds were delivered directly to the railroad company instead of being sold by the railroad commissioners, is relied upon as a ground for granting relief as to those bonds. In the case of People v. Mead, 24 N. Y. 124, 125, it seems to be considered that this fact would not constitute a defense, even in the state court, as against a bona fide holder of the bonds. But to entitle the town to affirmative equitable relief on that ground, it should have been made to appear that the defendants were not bona fide holders; which, as has already been shown, the plaintiff has failed to do.

Another ground urged in support of the claim to equitable relief is, that it is necessary for the purpose of avoiding a multiplicity of suits; and the case of New York & N. H. R. Co. v. Schuyler, 17 N. Y. 592, and 34 N. Y. 30, is referred to as an authority in point. But that case was essentially different from the present. There the defendants all claimed shares in the same corporation, which had authority to issue only a limited number; shares had been issued in excess of that limit, and some of them must be rejected. The spurious shares were held to be a cloud upon the title of the holders of the genuine shares, and the corporation was held to be the proper representative of the genuine stockholders to seek the interposition of the court to remove that cloud. Here was a solid ground upon which the plaintiff could found its application for relief. The plaintiff having this standing in court, it was held that all the alleged spurious shareholders were properly joined as defendants. But jurisdiction was not entertained on the sole ground that the holders of spurious shares were numerous. In the present case there is no question of any cloud upon the title. The plaintiff seeks to have canceled certain written instruments purporting to be obligations for the payment of money, which are held by various independent owners. If it fails to make out a case which would sustain an action for that purpose against any one of them alone, the mere fact that there are several such holders is not of itself sufficient ground for entertaining the suit. If the facts were such as would have sustained the action against one person had he been the holder of all the bonds, then the case of the New Haven Railroad Company would be an authority in favor of the position, that if there were several holders all might be joined as defendants. But it does not support the position, that the mere fact that numerous independent parties hold separate instruments upon which they might bring separate suits is sufficient to justify a court of equity in entertaining an action by the debtor to compel them to litigate their claims in an action in the form which he selects.

Under any circumstances, I am inclined to concur with Judge Talcott, in the opinion that a court of equity would not interfere affirmatively to relieve the plaintiff against these bonds, except upon condition that it surrendered what it had received for them. The relief sought is discretionary with the court; and the plaintiff is not entitled to it as matter of absolute right. Actions of this class are in that respect governed by the same rules which apply to actions for specific performance; and relief will never be granted except upon equitable terms, where the case is such as to call for the imposition of terms. Story, Eq. Jur., §§ 692, 693, 696, and cases cited section 742. But the reasons before given I deem sufficient to sustain the conclusion of the referee dismissing the complaint.

There is great doubt whether the defense of the statute of limitations is available in this case. In respect to the limitation of time it is analogous in principle to an action to remove a cloud upon the title to land; and in such cases I do not understand the rule to be that the statute runs from the time the cloud was first created. See Miner v. Beekman, 50 N. Y. 338; Hubbell v. Medbury, 53 N. Y. 99; Arnold v. Hudson R. R. Co., 55 N. Y. 661.

On the ground that the facts of the case are insufficient to justify the interposition of a court of equity to decree the surrender and cancellation of the bonds, or to restrain their transfer, so much of the judgment as is appealed from should be affirmed, with costs.

Judgment affirmed.

BOOTH v. CLARK.

(17 How. 322.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Dec.
Term, 1854.

The case is stated in the opinion of the court.

Mr. Bradley, for appellant. Lawrence & May, contra.

WAYNE, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

We learn from the record of this case that Juan de la Camara recovered a judgment in the supreme court of New York, against Ferdinand Clark, for $4,688.49, with interest at seven per cent.; that a fieri facias was issued upon the judgment, and that there was a return upon it of "no goods, chattels, or real estate of the defendant to be levied upon." Upon this return, Camara filed a creditor's bill, before the chancellor of the First circuit in the state of New York, setting out his judgment and the return upon the fieri facias, in which he seeks, under the laws of that state, to subject the equitable assets and choses in action of Clark to his judgment; and he asks for a discovery of them from Clark, for an injunction, and the appointment of a receiver. Notice of this proceeding, and of the action upon it were served upon the solicitor of Clark, and the bill of complaint was taken as confessed, upon the defendant's default in not answering. Booth, the present complainant, was appointed receiver on the 3d August, 1842. Clark had been previously enjoined under the proceeding from making any disposition of any part of his estate, legal or equitable. Thus matters stood from the time of the receiver's appointment, in 1842, until June, 1851. Then Booth, as receiver, reports that no effects of Clark had come to his knowledge, except a claim upon Mexico, which had been adjudged to Clark by the United States commissioners, under the treaty with Mexico; and that, as receiver, he was contesting it; and he asks from the court authority to proceed for that purpose, which was granted. Such is an outline of the case in New York, containing every substantial part of it.

We will now state the proceedings of this suit at the instance of the receiver, in the circuit court of the United States for the District of Columbia, from the decision of which, dismissing the receiver's bill, it has been brought to this court for revision.

On the 29th May, 1851, Booth, the receiver, filed his bill in the circuit court for the District of Columbia, reciting so much of the proceedings of the New York courts as was deemed necessary to support his suit. He declares that Clark, when the original suit was instituted against him by Camara, and from that time until after he had been appointed receiver, had resided in New York.

That his effects consisted principally, if not wholly, of the claim upon Mexico, and that he claimed that fund as receiver for the purposes of that appointment. Clark answered the bill. He denies that the proceedings against him in the courts of the state of New York created any lien in behalf of Camara, or the receiver, upon the fund in controversy. He admits that no part of his property ever came into receiver's hands, under those proceedings, and that he had the claim upon Mexico whilst the suits were pending against him, and when the receiver was appointed under Camara's creditor's bill; but that all the evidences and papers in support of his Mexican claim were then in the public archives at Washington. He also states, that the board of commissioners under the act of congress of March, 3, 1849 (9 Stat. 393, 992), entitled "An act to carry into effect certain stipulations of the treaty between the United States and the republic of Mexico, of the 2d February, 1848," had made an award in his favor for the sum of $86,786.29, which sum was then in the hands of the secretary of the treasury of the United States. He then alleges that, being a resident of the state of New Hampshire, he filed in the clerk's office of that district, on the 28th January, 1843, his petition to be declared a bankrupt. That he had been declared a bankrupt on the 22d March following, pursuant to the "Act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States," passed August 19, 1841 (5 Stat. 440). He then recites that there had been attached to his petition in the bankrupt's court, a schedule of his property, rights, and credits of every kind and description, in which his Mexican claim had been stated; and that it was upon that claim the commissioners had awarded to him the sum before mentioned. He declares that, under the decree of the court in bankruptcy, one John Palmer had been appointed assignee; and that, having given his bond in compliance with the order of the court, he was vested, as assignee, in virtue of the operation of the bankrupt law, of all the defendant's property, for the benefit of his creditors, including the Mexican claim. It is also stated in his answer, that notice of all the proceedings in his matter of bankruptcy had been published in the leading newspapers of New Hampshire, and that the name of Juan de la Camara, and his residence, was placed among the list of his creditors attached to his petition to be declared a bankrupt. And he avers that all of his creditors had had notice of the proceedings in bankruptcy. That neither Camara nor any other creditor had filed or made any objections to those proceedings, or to the action of the assignee, until after the award had been made upon the Mexican claim.

It is not necessary, for the purposes of this opinion, to state the defendant's recital of the sale of his effects by Palmer, the assignee; his purchase of them, including the Mexican claim, or the rights claimed by the defendant under his purchase, all relating to the same having been fully acted upon by this court at this term, in the case of Ferdinand Clark v. Benjamin C. Clark and W. H. Y. Hackett. We state, however, that Palmer, the original assignee in Clark's bankruptcy, having died, he had been succeeded by the appointment of Hackett as assignee. This suit, then, is substantially between Hackett, as the assignee of Clark in bankruptcy, and Booth, the receiver under Camara's creditor's bill; that it may be determined by this court, which of them has the official right to the Mexican fund, for the distribution of it between the creditors of Clark, or whether Booth, as receiver, shall have from that fund a sufficient sum to pay Camara's entire debt, leaving the residue of it for distribution between Clark's other creditors.

It appears also from the record that Booth, the receiver, took no steps to execute his official trust, from the time of his appointment in 1842, until 1851, after the award of the Mexican claim had been made in Clark's favor. And, also, that the court of chancery, acting upon the creditor's bill brought by Camara, had not been applied to, either by Camara or by the receiver, for any order upon Clark in personam, to coerce his compliance with its injunction and decree.

Upon this statement of the case, we will now consider it. There is no dispute concerning the regularity or binding operation of the judgment obtained by Camara against Clark. None in respect to the proceedings under the creditor's bill. The leading point in the case is the effect of the proceedings under the last, to give a right to the receiver, in virtue of a lien which he claims upon the property of the debtor, to sue for and to recover any part of it, legal or equitable, without the jurisdiction of the state of New York. In other words, as an officer of a court of chancery, for a particular purpose, will he be recognized as such by a foreign judicial tribunal, and be allowed to take from the latter a fund belonging to a debtor, for its application to the payment of a particular creditor within the jurisdiction of the receiver's appointment, there being other creditors in the jurisdiction in which he now sues, contesting his right to do so. Or can he as receiver claim, in virtue of a decree upon a creditor's bill given in one jurisdiction, a right to have the judgment upon which the creditor's bill was brought, paid out of a fund of a bankrupt debtor in a foreign jurisdiction; because his appointment preceded the bankrupt's petition.

It is urged that the receiver in this case, by the decree of the court in New York, was entitled officially to the entire property of Clark, real, personal, or equitable, both within and without the state of New York. That he could, as receiver, maintain any action for the property and rights of property of the debtor which the latter could have done. That the fund now in controversy was a chose in action, belonging to the debtor when the receiver was appointed, and, though not within the state of New York, that it followed the person of the owner and passed to the receiver, because the owner was domiciled in New York. And it was also said that, having such official rights or liens upon the property of the debtor, the comity of nations would aid him in the assertion of them in a foreign tribunal. The counsel for the receiver cited from the reports of the state of New York several cases in support of the foregoing propositions. We have perused all of them carefully, without having been able to view them altogether as the learned counsel does. Whatever may be the operation of the decree in respect to the receiver's powers over the property of the debtor within the state of New York, and his right to sue for them there, we do not find any thing in the cases in the New York reports showing the receiver's right to represent the creditor or creditors of the debtor in a foreign jurisdiction. It is true that the receiver in this case is appointed under a statute of the state of New York, but that only makes him an officer of the court for that state. He is a representative of the court, and may, by its direction, take into his possession every kind of property which may be taken in execution, and also that which is equitable, if of a nature to be reduced into possession. But it is not considered in every case that the right to the possession is transferred by his appointment; for, where the property is real, and there are tenants, the court is virtually the landlord, though the tenants may be compelled to attorn to the receiver. Jeremy, Eq. Jur. 249. When appointed, very little discretion is allowed to him, for he must apply to the court for liberty to bring or defend actions, to let the estate, and in most cases to lay out money on repairs, and he may without leave distrain only for rent in arrear short of a year. 6 Ves. 802; 15 Ves. 26; 3 Brown, Ch. Cas. 88; 9 Ves. 335; 1 Jac. & W. 178; Morris v. Elme, 1 Ves. Jr. 139; Id. 165; Blunt v. Clithero, 6 Ves. 799; Hughes v. Hughes, 3 Brown, Ch. Cas. 87; 5 Madd. 473.

A receiver is an indifferent person between parties, appointed by the court to receive the rents, issues, or profits of land, or other thing in question in this court, pending the suit, where it does not seem reasonable to the court that either party should do it. Wyatt's Prac. Reg. 355. He is an officer of the court; his appointment is provisional. He is appointed in behalf of all parties, and not of the complainant or of the defendant only. He is appointed for the benefit of all parties who may establish rights in the cause. The money in his hands is in custodia legis for whoever can make out a title to it. Delany v. Mansfield, 1 Hogan, 234.

It is the court itself which has the care of the property in dispute. The receiver is but the creature of the court; he has no powers except such as are conferred upon him by the order of his appointment and the course and practice of the court. Verplanck v. Insurance Co., 2 Paige, Ch. 452. Unless where he is appointed under the statute of New York, directing proceedings against corporations (2 Rev. St. 438), and then he is a standing assignee, vested with nearly all the powers and authority of the assignee of an insolvent debtor. Attorney General v. Life & Fire Ins. Co., 4 Paige, Ch. 224. In the case just cited, Chancellor Walworth says, that the receiver has "no powers except such as are conferred upon him by the order of his appointment and the course and practice of the court." In the statement which has been made of the restraints upon a receiver, we are aware that they have been measurably qualified by rules, and by the practice of the courts in the state of New York, as may be seen in Hoffman's Practice; but none of them alter his official relation to the court, and, so far as we have investigated the subject, we have not found another instance of an order in the courts of the state of New York, or in the courts of any other state, empowering a receiver to sue in his own name officially in another jurisdiction for the property or choses in action of a judgment debtor. Indeed, whatever may be the receiver's rights under a creditor's bill, to the possession of the property of the debtor in the state of New York, or the permissions which may be given to him to sue for such property, we understand the decisions of that state as confining his action to the state of New York.

Such an inference may be made from several decisions. It may be inferred from what was said by Chancellor Walworth, in Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, Ch. 615. Speaking of the property which might be put into the possession of a receiver, and of the power of a court of chancery to reach property out of the state, he declares the manner in which it may be done, thus: "The original and primary jurisdiction of that court was in personam merely. The writ of assistance to deliver possession, and even the sequestration of property to compel the performance of a decree, are comparatively of recent origin. The jurisdiction of the court was exercised for several centuries by the simple proceeding of attachment against the bodies of the parties to compel obedience to its orders and decrees. Although the property of a defendant is beyond the reach of the court, so that it can neither be sequestered nor taken in execution, the court does not lose its jurisdiction in relation to that property, provided the person of the defendant is within the jurisdiction. By the ordinary course of proceeding, the defendant may be compelled either to bring the property in dispute, or to which the defendant claims an equitable title, within the jurisdiction of the court, or to execute such a conveyance or transfer thereof as will be sufficient to vest the legal title, as well as the possession of the property, according to the lex loci rei sitæ." It is very obvious, from the foregoing extract, that up to the time when Mitchell v. Bunch was decided, in the year 1831, it had not been thought that a court of chancery in the state of New York could act upon the property of a judgment debtor in a creditor's bill which was not within the state of New York, but by the coercion of his person when he was within the jurisdiction of the state; and that it had not been contemplated then to add to the means used by chancery to enforce its sentences, in respect to property out of the state of New York, the power to a receiver to sue in a foreign jurisdiction for the same. It is true that the jurisdiction of a court of chancery in England and the United States, to enforce equitable rights, is not confined to cases where the property is claimed in either country, but the primary movement in the chancery courts of both countries to enforce an injunction, is the attachment of the person of the debtor, where he is amenable to the jurisdiction of the court.

We find in the second volume of Spence on the Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in England (pages 6, 7), this language: "When, therefore, a case is made out against a person resident within the jurisdiction of the court, in respect to property out of it, but within the empire, or its dependencies, which would call for the interference of the court of chancery if the property were situate in the country, the court, as it had the power, has assumed the jurisdiction, when such an interference is necessary to the ends of justice, of enforcing the equitable rights of the parties to or over property out of its jurisdiction, by the coercion of the person and sequestration of his property here, in the same manner as it would have done had the property been situate in this country." And Sir John Leach said: "When parties defendants are resident in England, and are brought upon subpœna here, the court has full authority to act upon them personally, with respect to the subject of the suit, as the ends of justice require, and with that view to order them to take or to omit to take any steps or proceedings in any other court of justice, whether in this or in a foreign country. This court does not pretend to any interference with the other courts." It acts upon the defendant by punishment for his contempt, for his disobedience of the court. The court of chancery has no power directly to affect property out of the bounds of its jurisdiction. Roberdeau v. Rous, 1 Atk. 544; 2 Spence. We believe such to be the proper course, in chancery, in cases of injunction, and that its jurisdiction, by injunction, rests entirely on the coercion of the person. Such, however, was not the course pursued in this case, though the debtor was then a resident of the state of New York, and amenable to the jurisdiction of the court. No motion was made to force Clark to comply with the injunction which Camara had obtained under the creditor's bill. The matter was allowed to rest for seven years, Camara being aware that Clark had a pecuniary claim upon the republic of Mexico, at least as early as in the year 1843. The receiver during all that time took no action. His first movement is an application to be permitted to sue for the fund in the hands of the government, which had been awarded to Clark by the commissioners under the treaty with Mexico. Permission was given to sue. He has brought his bill accordingly, and it directly raises the question, whether he can, as an officer of the court of chancery in New York, and in his relation of receiver to Camara, be permitted to sue in another political jurisdiction.

We have already cited Chancellor Walworth's opinion as to the course which is to be pursued in New York upon an injunction in a creditor's bill. Mr. Edwards, in his excellent work on Receivers in Chancery, after citing the language used in Mitchell v. Bunch, says: "Still, the difficulty remains as to a recognition of the powers or officers of the court, by persons holding a lease upon the property, especially realty, out of the jurisdiction. Then in Malcolm v. Montgomery, 1 Hogan, 93, the master of the rolls observed, that a receiver could not be effectually appointed over estates in Ireland, by the English court of chancery, in any direct proceeding for the purpose; and that attempts had often been made to do so by serving orders made by the English court of chancery, but that they had failed, because the English court of chancery has no direct means of enforcing payment of rent to its receiver, by tenants who reside in Ireland. The attorney-general and another counsellor also said, that to their knowledge such attempts had been frequently made, but had been uniformly given up as impracticable. A conflict might also arise between the receiver out of the jurisdiction and creditors, and also other persons out of the jurisdiction. The comity of nations and different tribunals would hardly help a receiver."

We also infer, from the case of Storm v. Waddell, 2 Sandf. 494, that the receiver's right to the possession of the property of a debtor in the state of New York, and his right to sue for property there, is limited to that jurisdiction. The chancellor, in the last case mentioned, after having given an epitome of the cause of proceeding in a creditor's bill, and speaking of equitable interests and things in action belonging to the debtor, without regard to the injunction, says: "The property of the defendant is subjected to the suit, wherever it may be, if the receiver can lay hold of it, or the complainant can reach it by the decree. The injunction, when served, prevents the debtor from putting it away or squandering it." This language indicates the receiver's locality of action. Taken in connection with that of Chancellor Walworth, in Mitchell v. Bunch, it shows that the receiver's right to the possession of the debtor's property is limited to the jurisdiction of his appointment, and that he has no lien upon the property of the debtor, except for that which he may get the possession of without suit, or for that which, after having been permitted to sue for, he may reduce into possession in that way. Our industry has been tasked unsuccessfully to find a case in which a receiver has been permitted to sue in a foreign jurisdiction for the property of the debtor. So far as we can find, it has not been allowed in an English tribunal; orders have been given in the English chancery for receivers to proceed to execute their functions in another jurisdiction, but we are not aware of its ever having been permitted by the tribunals of the last.

We think that a receiver has never been recognized by a foreign tribunal as an actor in a suit. He is not within that comity which nations have permitted, after the manner of such nations as practise it, in respect to the judgments and decrees of foreign tribunals, for all of them do not permit it in the same manner and to the same extent, to make such comity international or a part of the laws of nations. But it was said that receivers in New York are statutory officers, as assignees in bankruptcy are. That being so, he had, as assignees in bankruptcy have upon the property of the bankrupt, a lien upon the property of a judgment debtor, under an appointment in a creditor's bill. But that cannot be so. An assignee in bankruptcy in England, and in this country when it had a bankrupt law, is an officer made by the statute of bankruptcy, with powers, privileges, and duties prescribed by the statute, for the collection of the bankrupt's estate for an equal distribution of it among all of his creditors.

In England, the property of the bankrupt is vested in the assignees in bankruptcy by legislative enactment. Where commissioners have been appointed, it is imperative upon them to convey to the assignees the property of the bankrupt, wherever it may be or whatever it may be, and it is done by deed of bargain and sale, which is afterwards enrolled. It vests the assignees with the title to the property from the date of the conveyance, it having been previously vested in the commissioners for conveyance by them to the assignees. As to the bankrupt's personal estate, the statute looks beyond the debts and effects of a trader within the kingdom, and vests them in the commissioners in every part of the world. The last is done in England, upon the principle that personal property has no locality, and is subject to the law which governs the person of the owner. As by that law the property of a bankrupt becomes vested in the assignee, for the purposes of the assignment, his title to such property out of England is as good as that which the owner had, except where some positive law of the country, in which the personal property is, forbids it. Cullen, 244.

In claiming such a recognition of assignees in bankruptcy from foreign courts, England does no more than is permitted in her courts, for they give effect to foreign assignments made under laws analogous to the English bankrupt laws. Solomons v. Ross, 1 H. Bl. 131, note; Jollet v. Deponthieu, Id. 132, note. But such comity between nations has not become international or universal. It was not admitted in England until the middle of the last century in favor of assignees in bankruptcy. Lord Raymond decreed it in 1811, in the case of a commission of bankruptcy from Holland. Sir Joseph Jekyll, in 1715, said, the law of England takes no notice of a commission in Holland, and therefore a creditor here may attach the effects in the city of London, and proceed to condemnation. 3 Burge, 907. Lord Mansfield, in Warring v. Knight, (sittings in Guildhall, after Hilary term, Geo. III.) Cooke, Bankr. Law, 200, 3 Burge, 907, ruled, that where an English creditor proceeded subsequent to an act of bankruptcy, by attachment in a foreign country, and obtained judgment there and satisfaction by the sale of the debtor's personal property, the assignees in an action in England could not recover from such creditor the amount of the debt which had been remitted to him. Again, his lordship ruled, that the statutes of bankrupts do not extend to the colonies or any of the king's dominions out of England, but the assignments under such commissions are, in the courts abroad, considered as voluntary, and as such take place between the assignee and the bankrupt, but do not affect the rights of any other creditors.

So the law stood in England until the case of Folliott v. Ogden, 1 H. Bl. 123, when Chancellor Northington stimulated it into a larger comity, by giving effect to a claim to the creditors of a bankrupt in Amsterdam over an attaching creditor in England, who had proceeded after the bankrupt had been declared to be so, by the proper tribunal in Amsterdam. England had just then become the great creditor nation of Europe, and of her provinces in North America. Her interest prompted a change of the rule, and her courts have ever since led the way in extending a comity which had before been denied by them. The judicial history of the change, until the comity in favor of assignees became in England what it now is, is given in 3 Burge, c. 22; Bankr. Laws, 886, 906-912, inclusive, and from 912-929. It may now be said to be the rule of comity between the nations of Europe; but it has never been sanctioned in the courts of the United States, nor in the judicial tribunals of the states of our nation, so far as we know, and we know that it has been repeatedly refused in the latter. Our courts, when the states were colonies, had been schooled, before the Revolution, in the earlier doctrines of the English courts upon the subject. The change in England took place but a few years before the separation of the two countries.

That comity has not yet reached our courts. We do not know why it should do so, so long as we have no national bankrupt laws. The rule which prevailed whilst these states were colonies still continues to be the rule in the courts of the United States, and it is not otherwise between the courts of the states. It was the rule in Maryland, before the Revolution. It is the rule still, as may be seen in Birch v. McLean, 1 Har. & McH. 286; Wallace v. Patterson, 2 Har. & McH. 463. An assignment abroad, by act of law, has no legal operation in Pennsylvania. We find from McNeil v. Colquhoun, 2 Hayw. (N. C.) 24, that it has been the rule in North Carolina for sixty years. South Carolina has no other. 1 Const. (S. C.) 283; 4 McCord, 519; Taylor v. Geary, Kirby, 313. In Massachusetts, the courts will not permit an assignment in one of the states, whether it be voluntary or under an insolvent law, to control an attachment in that state of the property of an insolvent which was laid after the assignment, and before payment to the assignees. The point occurred recently in the circuit court of the United States for that district, in the case of Betton v. Valentine, 1 Curt. 168; and it was ruled that the assignee of an insolvent debtor, appointed under the law of Massachusetts, does not so far represent creditors in the state of Rhode Island as to be able to avoid a conveyance of personal property in the latter state, good as against the insolvent, but invalid as against creditors, by the law of Rhode Island.

In New York, the "ubiquity of the operation of the bankrupt law, as respects personal property," was denied in Abraham v. Ples-toro, 3 Wend. 538. Chancellor Kent considers it to be a settled part of the jurisprudence of the United States, that a prior assignment under a foreign law will not be permitted to prevail against a subsequent attachment of the bankrupt's effects found in the United States. The courts of the United States will not subject their citizens to the inconvenience of seeking their dividends abroad, when they have the means to satisfy them under their own control. We think that it would prejudice the rights of the citizens of the states to admit a contrary rule. The rule, as it is with us, affords an admitted exception to the universality of the rule that personal property has no locality, and follows the domicile of the owner. This court, in Ogden v. Saunders, 12 Wheat. 213, disclaimed the English doctrine upon this subject; and in Harrison v. Sterry, 5 Cranch, 289, 302, this court declared that the bankrupt law of a foreign country is incapable of operating a legal transfer of property in the United States.

Such being the rule in the American courts, in respect to foreign assignments in bankruptcy, and in respect to such assignments as may be made under the insolvent laws of the states of the United States, there can be no good reason for giving to a receiver, appointed in one of the states under a creditor's bill, a larger comity in the courts of the United States, or in those of the states or territories. On the contrary, strong reasons may be urged against it. A receiver is appointed under a creditor's bill for one or more creditors, as the case may be, for their benefit, to the exclusion of all other creditors of the debtor, if there be any such, as there are in this case. Whether appointed as this receiver was, under the statute of New York, or under the rules and practice of chancery as they may be, his official relations to the court are the same. A statute appointment neither enlarges nor diminishes the limitation upon his action. His responsibilities are unaltered. Under either kind of appointment, he has at most only a passive capacity in the most important part of what it may be necessary for him to do, until it has been called by the direction of the court into ability to act. He has no extra-territorial power of official action; none which the court appointing him can confer, with authority to enable him to go into a foreign jurisdiction to take possession of the debtor's property; none which can give him, upon the principle of comity, a privilege to sue in a foreign court or another jurisdiction, as the judgment creditor himself might have done, where his debtor may be amenable to the tribunal which the creditor may seek.

In those countries of Europe in which foreign judgments are regarded as a foundation for an action, whether it be allowed by treaty stipulations or by comity, it has not as yet been extended to a receiver in chancery. In the United States, where the same rule prevails between the states as to judgments and decrees, aided as it is by the first section of the fourth article of the constitution, and by the act of congress of 26th May, 1790 (1 Stat. 122), by which full faith and credit are to be given in all of the courts of the United States, to the judicial sentences of the different states, a receiver under a creditor's bill has not as yet been an actor as such in a suit out of the state in which he was appointed. This court considered the effect of that section of the constitution, and of the act just mentioned, in McElmoyle v. Cohen, 13 Pet. 324-327. But apart from the absence of any such case, we think that a receiver could not be admitted to the comity extended to judgment creditors, without an entire departure from chancery proceedings, as to the manner of his appointment, the securities which are taken from him for the performance of his duties, and the direction which the court has over him in the collection of the estate of the debtor, and the application and distribution of them. If he seeks to be recognized in another jurisdiction, it is to take the fund there out of it, without such court having any control of his subsequent action in respect to it, and without his having even official power to give security to the court, the aid of which he seeks, for his faithful conduct and official accountability. All that could be done upon such an application from a receiver, according to chancery practice, would be to transfer him from the locality of his appointment to that where he asks to be recognized, for the execution of his trust in the last, under the coercive ability of that court; and that it would be difficult to do, where it may be asked to be done, without the court exercising its province to determine whether the suitor, or another person within its jurisdiction, was the proper person to act as receiver.

Besides, there is much less reason for allowing the complainant in this case to be recognized as receiver for the fund out of the state of New York, and in this jurisdiction, even if the practice in chancery in respect to receivers was different from what we have said it was. The remedies which the judgment creditor in New York had under his creditor's bill against his debtor, were not applied as they might have been in that state, according to the practice in chancery in such cases. When Clark had been enjoined under the creditor's bill, and the receiver had been appointed, both judgment creditor and receiver knew at the time,—certainly, as the record shows, in a short time afterwards,—that Clark had a pecuniary claim upon the republic of Mexico. No attempt was made, according to chancery practice, to coerce Clark by the attachment of his person under the injunction, to make an assignment of that claim for the payment of Camara's judgment. It cannot be said that Clark had not property to assign, and that it was therefore unnecessary to attach him. That would make no difference; for whether with or without property, he might have been compelled to make a formal assignment, even though he had sworn that he had none. It was so ruled in Chipman v. Sabaton, 7 Paige, 47, and in Fitzburgh v. Everingham, 6 Paige, 29.

There was a want of vigilance in this matter, which does not make any equity which he may have in New York upon Clark's property, superior to that of Clark's creditors, who are pursuing the funds in this district. Nor, according to the rule prescribed in the United States, that personal property has no locality on account of the domicile of the owner, to transfer it under a foreign assignment, can the receiver have in this case anything in the nature of a lien to bind the property of Clark not within the state of

New York. When we take into consideration also the origin of the fund in controversy, the manner of its ultimate recovery from Mexico, the congressional action upon it, in every particular, to secure it, after the awards were made, to those who might be entitled to receive it; the jurisdiction given to the circuit court of this district, with an appeal from its decision to this court, upon the principles which govern courts of equity to adjudge disputes concerning it, and that such cases were to be conducted and governed in all respects as in other cases in equity, we must conclude that the complainant in this case, as receiver, cannot be brought under the rule prescribed for our decision. We concur with the court below in the dismissal of the bill.

DAVIS v. GRAY.

Appeal from the circuit court for the Western district of Texas, the case being thus:

The state of Texas had at the times hereinafter named, certain public lands. A general land office was established at the capital of the state for the registration of titles and surveys, and the lands were divided when surveyed into sections of six hundred and forty acres each. One Kuechler was the chief of this office, under the title of the "commissioner of the general land office." All certificates for the public lands were issued by this commissioner; and all patents were issued under the seals of the state and the general land office, and were required to be signed by the governor and countersigned by the said commissioner. These certificates were evidences of obligation on the part of the state to grant and give a patent to the holder for a certain amount therein mentioned of the vacant and unreserved public lands of the state; when the certificates are located and surveyed, and the surveys returned to the commissioner and approved by him, a patent, conveying the fee, is executed as above mentioned.

In and about the year 1856, and for many years thereafter the state of Texas, though of great extent, was, as it still is, sparsely inhabited, while its public domain was far from markets, and without connection with the more settled parts of the country; and it was greatly to the interest of the state to attract immigration and capital. To produce this result it became the settled policy of the state to make grants and reservations of public lands to corporations, conditioned upon the construction of certain amounts of railroad within certain times. In pursuance of this policy the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, was incorporated February 4th, 1856, by the state of Texas, to build a railroad across the state from the eastern boundary to El Paso, with a land grant of 16 sections to the mile; certificates for 8 sections per mile to be issued on the grading of successive lengths of road, and 8 more per mile upon the complete construction of the same; and a reservation was granted of the alternate or odd sections of land for eight miles on each side of the road, within which the company should have an exclusive right to locate its certificates, while it also had the privilege to locate said certificates on any other unappropriated public lands.

This reservation, of course, was of the greatest value, as it enabled the company to reap the advantage of the enhancement of price which the construction of the road by them would cause in the lands along the line.

In the same year of 1856 the company was organized in reliance on the grants, and especially on the reservation, and duly accepted the same.

There were certain conditions precedent to the vesting of the charter, land grant, and reservation; but they were all complied with, and at a cost to the company for surveys of over $100,000. These and subsequent surveys resulted, for the company, in the official designation of the road line and the center line of the reservation for some 800 miles, and the "sectionizing" and numbering of the odd sections of land in said reservation in a belt of country some 250 miles in length and 16 in width; and for the state in the surveying and mapping of the same belt of country and the "sectionizing" and numbering of the alternate or even sections for the benefit of the state. The company also graded some 65 miles of road westerly from Moore's Landing, in Bowie county, and was interrupted in the work of construction by the rebellion and so-called "secession" of Texas; but resumed work after the war, and graded between 20 and 30 miles further, from Jefferson in Marion county, in the direction of Moore's Landing.

There were certain conditions subsequent annexed to the charter, viz.: That if the company should not have completely graded not less than 50 miles of their road by the 1st of March, 1861, and at least 50 miles additional thereto within two years thereafter, then the charter of said company should be null and void. The first 50 miles were graded within the required time; the second 50 miles have never been graded. Within two years after the performance of the first condition, however, the legislature of Texas, by act "for the relief of railroad companies," approved February 11th, 1862, enacted, that the failure of any chartered railroad company to complete any section, or fraction or a section, of its road as required by existing laws, should not operate as a forfeiture of its charter, or of the lands to which the said company would be entitled under the provisions of an act entitled "An act to encourage the construction of railroads in Texas by donation of land," approved January 30th, 1854; provided that the said company should complete such section, or fraction of a section, as would entitle it to donations of land, under existing laws, within two years after the close of the war between the Confederate States and the United States of America. Within the two years after the close of the war, the provisional legislature, by act of November 13th, 1866, enacted, "that the grant of 16 sections of land to the mile to railroad companies heretofore or hereafter constructing railroads in Texas shall be extended, under the same restrictions and limitations heretofore provided by law, for 10 years after the passage of this act;" and by article 12, section 33, of the present constitution of Texas, while declaring that the legislatures which sat from March 18th, 1861, to August 6th, 1866, were without constitutional authority, yet enacted that such declaration should not affect, prejudicially, private rights which had grown up under such acts, and that though the legislature of 1866 was only provisional, its acts were to be respected, so far as they were not in violation of the constitution and laws of the United States.

By act of July 27th, 1870, the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company was incorporated, and it was enacted, in terms, that it might "purchase the rights, franchises, and property of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, heretofore incorporated by the state."

The land grant was limited to fifteen years from the 4th of February, 1856, but this time had not yet expired, and by an act of November 13th, 1866, for the benefit of railroad companies, it was enacted, that this grant of 16 sections of land to the mile to railroads theretofore or thereafter constructing railroads in Texas, should be extended under the same restrictions and limitations theretofore provided by law, for ten years after the passage of this act.

The land reservation was conditioned upon certain surveys: (1) It was to be surveyed from the eastern boundary of Texas, as far as the Brazos river, within four years from March 1st, 1856. (2) The centre line of the reserve was to be run and plainly designated from the Brazos to the Colorado within fifteen months from February 10th, 1858. (3) The whole reservation was to be surveyed within ten years from February 10th, 1858. (4) The company was to have a connection with some road leading to the Mississippi river or the Gulf of Mexico, within ten years from February 10th, 1858. The first and second of these conditions were fulfilled within the times limited. The legislature, by act approved January 11th, 1862, enacted that "the time of the continuance of the present war between the Confederate States and the United States of America shall not be computed against any internal improvement company in reckoning the period allowed them in their charters, by any law, general or special, for the completion of any work contracted by them to do."

This act the company considered extended the time for the performance of the third and fourth conditions till the 10th of June, 1873.

In the years 1867 and 1868 the company executed two series of bonds, known as land grant bonds, amounting in the aggregate to the par value of $10,000,000 in gold, and also executed and delivered to one Forbes and others, trustees as aforesaid, two mortgages to secure said bonds, by one of which they mortgaged all lands actually acquired or thereafter to be acquired by said company by grading, constructing, and equipping the first 150 miles of the road of said company, from Jefferson in Marion county to Paris in Lamar county, and by the other of which they mortgaged the like property for the second 150 miles, from Paris to Palo Pinto in Palo Pinto county. These bonds were put on the bourse in Paris, France, and sold for value to the extent of $5,343,700 of their par value, mostly in small lots, and to persons of limited means. The grants, guarantees, and assurances by the state of Texas to said company of the said franchises, and especially of said land grant and land reservation, were recited in said mortgages, and were also announced and repeated to the purchasers personally, and by advertisement and prospectus, and the purchasers took the bonds relying on said grants, and upon the exclusive right of the company to locate certificates within the territory so reserved.

The bonds not being paid the circuit court for the Western district of Texas, on motion of Forbes, trustee under the mortgage, on the 6th of July, 1870, enjoined the railroad company from disposing of any of its effects, and put the road into the hands of one John A. C. Gray, as receiver: "To take possession of the moneys and assets, real and personal; roadbed, road, and all property, whatsoever, of the said Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, wheresoever the same may be found, with power under the special order of the court, from time to time to be made, to manage, control, and exercise all the franchises, whatsoever, of said company, and, if need be, under the direction of the court, to sell, transfer, and convey the road, roadbed, and other property of said company, as an entire thing," &c.

On the 20th of January, 1871, it was further ordered by the court: "That the said John A. C. Gray, receiver, as aforesaid, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to defend and continue all suits brought by or against the said Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, whether before or after the appointment of said receiver, and whether in the name of said company or otherwise; defend all suits brought against him as such receiver or affecting his receivership, and to bring such suits in the name of said company, or in the name of said receiver, as he may be advised by counsel to be necessary and proper in the discharge of the duties of his office, and for acquiring, securing, and protecting the assets, franchises, and rights of the said company and of the said receiver, and for securing and protecting the land grant and land reservation of the said company."

In November, 1869, the present constitution of Texas was adopted, and was approved by congress. The fifth and sixth [seventh] sections of this constitution are as follows:

"Sec. 5. All public lands heretofore reserved for the benefit of railroads or railway companies shall hereafter be subject to location and survey by any genuine land certificates."

of their charter respectively and the laws of the state under which the grants were made, are hereby declared forfeited to the state for the benefit of the school fund."

The constitutional convention which framed this constitution passed an ordinance to the effect that all heads of families actually settled on vacant lands lying within the Memphis & El Paso Railroad reserve, shall be entitled to and receive from the state of Texas 80 acres of land, including the place occupied, on payment of all expenses of survey and patent; and that all vacant lands lying within said reserve are declared open and subject to sale to heads of families actually settled on or who may actually settle on said reserve, at the price of one dollar per acre; and that said vacant lands within said reserve shall be open to pre-emption settlers, and subject to the location of all genuine land certificates.

There were in 1869, and were on the 20th of January, 1871, when Gray was ordered by the court to bring such suits in the name of the company as he might be advised by counsel were necessary and proper in the discharge of the duties of his office, a great number of land certificates outstanding and unlocated in Texas. Since the passing of the said ordinance, and the adoption of the said constitution, many hundreds of the holders of certificates other than those issued to the company had located their certificates on the sections reserved to the company, had returned their surveys and locations to the commissioner of the general land office, and had applied for patents on the same. Before the 19th day of September, 1870, Commissioner Kuechler and Governor Davis, professing to act under the said constitutional provisions, issued 2 of such patents. On the 19th of September, 1870, the receiver filed a protest with the commissioner against issuing any further patents for lands reserved to the company, but the commissioner and governor disregarded the protest and issued 32 additional patents within the reserve; the whole of the land thus patented amounting to nearly 20,000 acres.

Hereupon on the same 20th of January, 1871, Gray, who was a citizen of New York, filed a bill in the court below against one Davis, governor of the state of Texas, and Kuechler, already mentioned as commissioner of the land office of the state. The bill—averring that "the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company" is "a corporation created by and existing under certain statutes of Texas," already referred to, and that it had done "all acts and things necessary to the full and complete vesting, securing, and preserving of the franchises, rights, and privileges granted thereby"—set forth a history much as above given. It averred that the company was insolvent, and could not continue the construction of the road, and that the holders of said bonds would necessarily be remitted to the security of the mortgages; that the said security was worthless unless the receiver, under order of court, should be able to sell the franchises and property of said company to some party or parties who, by constructing the road, should acquire the lands referred to in the mortgages, and hold the same subject to the lien of them. It set forth that the general laws of Texas authorized to the fullest extent the conveyance of the franchises of a railway company by sale under execution or foreclosure; and that by act of July 27th, 1870, the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company was created, and, as before mentioned, was expressly authorized by its charter to "purchase the rights, franchises, and property of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, heretofore incorporated by the state;" that the Southern Transcontinental Company stood ready to do this, and to devote the lands to be acquired by the exercise of said Memphis & El Paso franchises to the settlement of the land grant mortgage debt, provided the receiver could convey the charter, the land grant, and the grant of the land reservation unimpaired and in full force.

It set forth further, that the receiver, on negotiating for a transfer of the franchises of the company, found that the market for them was peculiar, in the following respects: It was limited, as the franchises are only of use or value to those who desired and were able to construct the road; it depended in great measure upon the reputation of and confidence in the enterprise, and a belief among capitalists, outside of the state of Texas, that the state could and would have to abide by the grants contained in the charter; that it depended peculiarly and essentially upon the preservation of the land grant and land reservation, inasmuch as the country through which the road was to be built was sparsely inhabited, without cities or towns to furnish local traffic; that Texas lands at a distance from railroads were of but nominal value compared with lands along the line of the roads, and that the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, to whom the receiver chiefly looked as a purchaser, already had the right of way across the state and parallel with the route of the Memphis & El Paso charter, following "as near as might be practicable the old survey of the Memphis & El Paso road;" making the mere right of way of the latter of comparatively little value without the lands and the reservation.

It asserted that the acts of the governor and commissioner of the land office, in executing and causing to issue patents for the reserve, were, and their continuance would be, irretrievable destruction of that portion of the franchise of the company which consisted of the right to have the odd sections of the reservation devoted exclusively to the location and patenting of the company's certificates, would destroy all confidence in the other grants of the company, as well as in the grant of the reservation, and render the franchise of the company valueless in the hands of the receiver, doing irreparable injury to the interests committed to his charge.

It set forth further that the Southern Transcontinental Company asserted and insisted to the receiver, that unless the said acts were judicially declared unlawful, and perpetually restrained, the said franchises would be valueless to them, and that they would not carry out the purchase of the same.

[It was an admitted fact in the case, that the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company had never sectionized or numbered the land reservation of the same west of Brazos river, or any portion of said reservation west of said river; and that no work had been done on the road of the said company before or since the year 1861, either by grading or otherwise, except those as already affirmatively stated and set forth.]

The bill further asserted that the charter of the company was a contract between the state and the company, which contract was now in the hands of the complainant as receiver, and under direction of a court of equity, to be used for the benefit of the creditors of the company; that the said provisions of the constitution of Texas and the said ordinance of convention impaired the obligation and value of the said contract, and also of the said contracts of mortgage, and were in so far contrary to article 1, § 10, of the constitution of the United States, which declares that "no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts," and were in so far null and void; and that the acts of the governor of the state and commissioner of the land office, in issuing such patents, were without authority of law, and illegal, and that any repetition of the same should be perpetually restrained. The bill prayed an injunction accordingly.

As a reason for confining the bill to the two defendants named, an amendment to the bill alleged that the complainant had applied at the general land office of Texas, to have the number and names of the parties who had located land certificates other than those issued to the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, on lands within and forming a part of the land reservation of the said company, and to obtain a list of the same; that he had been informed, on making such application, and by the defendant, Kuechler, the commissioner of the general land office, that the number of the same was very great, to wit, many hundreds, and that a list could not be furnished without great time and labor. The amendment further alleged that parties were constantly making locations and surveys of land certificates as aforesaid on the lands of said reservation; and that parties who had made such locations and surveys had — months allowed them by law, after making the same, before they were required to make returns thereof to the commissioner of the general land office, and that the complainant was consequently unable, and never would be able, to obtain a correct list of such parties.

To this bill the defendants demurred:

(1) Because it did not appear from it that the defendants, or either of them, had any direct or personal interest in the lands which were the subject-matters of this suit; but on the contrary that they were sued in their official capacities only; and that the lands were a part of the public domain of the state of Texas, which was not and could not be made a party to this suit.

(2) Because it did not appear that while under the amendment 11 to the constitution of the United States [which declares that "the judicial power of the United States shall not be construed to extend to any suit in law or equity commenced or prosecuted against one of the United States by citizens of another state, or by citizens or subjects of a foreign state"], the court could have no jurisdiction as between the complainant and the state of Texas, jurisdiction existed in a suit against two of the officers of said state in their official capacity alone, to decree portions of the constitution of the state, which had been accepted by the congress of the United States, and which the defendants were sworn to obey, void.

(3) Because it did not appear that the bill was founded on fraud, accident, mistake, trust, specific performance, or any ground of equity jurisdiction; or that the same set out any equity against the defendants whatever; on the contrary, it appeared that the bill was brought to have sections 5 and 7 of article ten of the constitution of the state of Texas decreed void.

(4) Because it did not appear that the complainant, being an officer of the court, had a right to sue the defendants therein, nor that the court could have jurisdiction as between the complainant, though a citizen of the state of New York, and the defendants, as citizens of the state of Texas, in either their respective official or individual capacities.

(5) Because the "act incorporating the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company," and the other acts referred to in the bill, did not amount to a contract between the state of Texas and the company.

(6) Because it did not appear that any designated third person or persons was or were about to have a patent granted him or them by the defendants, and that such third person or persons was or were sought to be made a party or parties, nor that said bill was not too vague and indefinite.

(7) Because it did not appear that the creditors not specified of the company were made parties thereto, nor that the persons not specified applying for patents on locations of certificates, within the limits of the lands that were reserved, were made parties thereto; all of whom, according to the bill, had equities that ought to be determined in this suit, and hence were necessary and proper parties to this suit.

(8) Because it did not appear that the complainant had any equities that he was not bound to have litigated against such third persons not specified, and also against those not specified who had located certificates within the limits of the lands that were reserved, before he would have a right (which was not conceded) to invoke any action by means of a bill in a court of equity, in case such a court might have jurisdiction.

The demurrer was overruled, and, no answer being filed, a decree pro confesso was taken for the complainant, and on the 16th of February, 1871, a final decree was granted in accordance with the prayer of the bill, to the following effect: "That in July, 1870, and at the time of the appointment of Gray as receiver, and at the date of the decree, the company was duly possessed of the franchise and right of and to the land grant and land reservation of the company; that the said right and the franchise of the company were unimpaired, and in full force and virtue; that the provisions of the constitution of Texas, and of said ordinance of convention, so far as they impaired, or purported to impair the said charter, land grant, or land reservation, were contrary to the provisions of article 1, section 10, of the constitution of the United States, and were in so far, null and void; and that the defendants should be perpetually enjoined from issuing, or causing or permitting to issue, any patent of the lands of the odd sections of said reservation, except on the certificates granted to the company, or its assigns."

From this decree appeal was taken by the defendants to this court.

T. J. Durant and G. F. Moore, for appellants.
B. R. Curtis, J. A. Davenport, and C. Parker, for appellees.

SWAYNE, Justice. This is an appeal in equity from the decree of the circuit court of the United States for the Western district of Texas. The appellee was the complainant in the court below. The defendants demurred to the bill. The demurrer was overruled. The defendants stood by it. A decree as prayed for was thereupon rendered pro confesso for the complainant. The defendants removed the case to this court by appeal, and it is now before us, as it was before the court below, upon the demurrer to the bill. This brings the whole case as made by the bill under review. The facts averred, so far as they are material, are to be taken as admitted and true. We shall refer to them accordingly. The question presented for our determination is, whether the circuit court erred in overruling the demurrer. The appellants having elected not to answer, the decree for the complainant followed as of course.

At the outset of our examination of the case, we are met by jurisdictional objections as to the parties—both complainant and defendants—which, before proceeding further, must be disposed of. We will consider first, those which relate to the complainant, and then, those with respect to the defendants.

The complainant was appointed to his office of receiver, in the suit in equity of Forbes and others against the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by the state of Texas. The suit was in the same court whence this appeal was taken. In that case, on the 6th of July, 1870, it was, among other things, ordered and decreed, that the corporation should be enjoined from disposing of any of its effects, and that John A. C. Gray, the complainant in this suit, should be, and he was thereby "appointed receiver; to take possession of the moneys and assets, real and personal; roadbed, road, and all property whatsoever, of the said Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, wheresoever the same may be found, with power under the special order of the court, from time to time to be made, to manage, control, and exercise all the franchises, whatsoever, of said company, and, if need be, under the direction of the court, to sell, transfer, and convey the road, roadbed, and other property of said company, as an entire thing," &c.

On the 20th of January, 1871, it was further ordered by the court "that the said John A. C. Gray, receiver as aforesaid, be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to defend and continue all suits brought by or against the said Memphis, El Paso, and Pacific Railroad Company, whether before or after the appointment of said receiver, and whether in the name of said company or otherwise; defend all suits brought against him as such receiver or affecting his receivership, and to bring such suits in the name of said company, or in the name of said receiver, as he may be advised by counsel to be necessary and proper in the discharge of the duties of his office, and for acquiring, securing, and protecting the assets, franchises, and rights of the said company and of the said receiver, and for securing and protecting the land grant and land reservation of the said company."

It is to be presumed the receiver filed this bill, as it is framed in accordance with the advice of counsel. Bank v. Dandridge, 12 Wheat. 70.

The authority given by the decree is ample. Still the question arises whether it was competent for him to proceed in his own name instead of the name of the company whose rights he seeks by this bill to assert. A receiver is appointed upon a principle of justice for the benefit of all concerned. Every kind of property of such a nature that, if legal, it might be taken in execution, may, if equitable, be put into his possession. Hence the appointment has been said to be an equitable execution. He is virtually a representative of the court, and of all the parties in interest in the litigation wherein he is appointed. Jeremy, Eq. 249; Davis v. Duke of Marlborough, 2 Swanst. 125; Shakel v. Duke of Marlborough, 4 Madd. 463. He is required to take possession of property as directed, because it is deemed more for the interests of justice that he should do so than that the property should be in the possession of either of the parties in the litigation. Wyatt, Prac. Reg. 355. He is not appointed for the benefit of either of the parties, but of all concerned. Money or property in his hands is in custodia legis. In re Colvin, 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 278; Delany v. Mansfield, 1 Hogan, 234. He has only such power and authority as are given him by the court, and must not exceed the prescribed limits. Bank v. White, 6 Barb. 589; Verplanck v. Insurance Co., 2 Paige, 452. The court will not allow him to be sued touching the property in his charge, nor for any malfeasance as to the parties, or others, without its consent; nor will it permit his possession to be disturbed by force, nor violence to be offered to his person while in the discharge of his official duties. In such cases the court will vindicate its authority, and, if need be, will punish the offender by fine and imprisonment for contempt. De Groot v. Jay, 30 Barb. 483; Angel v. Smith, 9 Ves. 335; Russell v. Railroad Co., 3 Macn. & G. 104; Parker v. Browning, 8 Paige, 388; Noe v. Gibson, 7 Paige, 513; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 833, A. & B. The same rules are applied to the possession of a sequestrator. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1433. Where property in the hands of the receiver is claimed by another, the right may be tried by proper issues at law, by a reference to a master, or otherwise, as the court in its discretion may see fit to direct. Empringham v. Short, 3 Hare, 470. Where property, in the possession of a third person, is claimed by the receiver, the complainant must make such person a party by amending the bill, or the receiver must proceed against him by suit in the ordinary way. 8 Paige, 388; Noe v. Gibson, 7 Paige, 513; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. supra; 2 Jac. & W. 176; 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1433. After tenants have attorned to the receiver, he may distrain for rent in arrear in his own name. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1437. In a suit between partners he may be required to carry on the business, in order to preserve the goodwill of the establishment, until a sale can be effected. Marten v. Van Schaick, 4 Paige, 479.

Here the property in question is not in the possession of the defendants. The possession of the receiver has not been invaded. He has not been in possession, is not seeking possession; and there is no question in the case relating to that subject. But the order of the court expressly requires the receiver to secure and protect "the assets, franchises, and rights," and "the land grant and reservation of said company." He is seeking to perform that duty by enjoining the appellants from doing illegal acts, which the bill alleges, if done, would render the rights and title of the company to the immense property last mentioned, of greatly diminished value, if not wholly worthless.

We think it is competent for him to perform this function in the mode he has adopted. The decree, in the case wherein he was appointed, expressly authorizes him to sue for that purpose in his own name. The order was made by a court of adequate authority in the regular exercise of its jurisdiction. No appeal has been taken, and the order stands unreversed.

This bill is auxiliary to the original suit. Freeman v. Howe, 24 How. 451; Jones v. Andrews, 10 Wall. 327. It is analogous to a petition by a receiver to the court to protect his possession from disturbance, or the property in his charge from threatened injury or destruction. No title in the receiver is necessary to warrant such an application, or the administration by the court of the proper remedy. There can be no valid objection to the receiver here, in analogy to that proceeding, maintaining this suit. In the progress and growth of equity jurisdiction it has become usual to clothe such officers with much larger powers than were formerly conferred. In some of the states they are by statutes charged with the duty of settling the affairs of certain corporations when insolvent, and are authorized expressly to sue in their own names. It is not unusual for courts of equity to put them in charge of the railroads of companies which have fallen into financial embarrassment, and to require them to operate such roads, until the difficulties are removed, or such arrangements are made that the roads can be sold with the least sacrifice of the interests of those concerned. In all such cases the receiver is the right arm of the jurisdiction invoked. As regards the statutes, we see no reason why a court of equity, in the exercise of its undoubted authority, may not accomplish all the best results intended to be secured by such legislation, without its aid.

A few remarks will be sufficient to dispose of the jurisdictional objections as to the appellants.

In Osborn v. Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, three things, among others, were decided:

(1) A circuit court of the United States, in a proper case in equity, may enjoin a state officer from executing a state law in conflict with the constitution or a statute of the United States, when such execution will violate the rights of the complainant.

(2) Where the state is concerned, the state should be made a party, if it could be done. That it cannot be done is a sufficient reason for the omission to do it, and the court may proceed to decree against the officers of the state in all respects as if the state were a party to the record.

(3) In deciding who are parties to the suit the court will not look beyond the record. Making a state officer a party does not make the state a party, although her law may have prompted his action, and the state may stand behind him as the real party in interest. A state can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put in that relation to the case. Dodge v. Woolsey, 18 How. 331; Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369; Bank v. Skelly, 1 Black, 436; Trust Co. v. Debolt, 16 How. 432; and Bank v. Debolt, 13 How. 380,—proceeded upon the same principles, and were controlled by that authority, with respect to the jurisdictional question arising in each of those cases as to the defendant.

In Woodruff v. Trapnall, 10 How. 190, a writ of mandamus was issued to the proper representative of the state of Arkansas to compel him to receive the paper of the Bank of the State of Arkansas in payment of a judgment which the state had recovered against the relator. The bank was wholly owned by the state, and the claim was made under a clause in the charter which had been repealed. Judgment was given against the respondent. The question of jurisdiction does not appear to have been raised. In Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How. 304, it appeared that the bank had become insolvent. A creditor's bill was filed to reach its assets. The objection was taken that the state could not be sued. This court answered that the objection involved a question of local law, and that as the state permitted herself to be sued in her own tribunals, that was conclusive upon the subject. According to the jurisprudence of Texas, suits like this can be maintained against the public officers who appropriately represent her touching the interests involved in the controversy. Ward v. Townsend, 2 Tex. 581; Cohen v. Smith, 3 Tex. 51; Commissioner General Land Office v. Smith, 5 Tex. 471; McLeland v. Shaw, 15 Tex. 319; Stewart v. Crosby, Id. 547. In the application of this principle there is no difference between the governor of a state and officers of a state of lower grades. In this respect they are upon a footing of equality. Whitman v. The Governor, 5 Ohio St. 528; Houston & G. N. R. Co. v. Kuechler, Sup. Ct. Tex., not yet reported. [36 Tex. 382].

A party by going into a national court does not lose any right or appropriate remedy of which he might have availed himself in the state courts of the same locality. The wise policy of the constitution gives him a choice of tribunals. In the former he may hope to escape the local influences which sometimes disturb the even flow of justice. And in the regular course of procedure, if the amount involved be large enough, he may have access to this tribunal as the final arbiter of his rights. Ex parte McNiel, 13 Wall. 236. Upon the grounds of the jurisprudence of both the United States and of Texas we hold this bill well brought as regards the defendants.

It is insisted that the corporation, on behalf of which this suit was instituted, has ceased to exist.

The bill avers that "the Memphis, El Paso

& Pacific Railroad Company" * * * is "a corporation created by and existing under certain statutes of the state of Texas herein-after set forth," and that within the times limited by the charter and extended by other acts the company "did all acts and things necessary to the full and complete vesting, securing, and preserving of the franchises, rights, and privileges granted thereby." The demurrer admits the truth of these averments unless they are inconsistent with the statutes which bear upon the subject. The corporation was created by an act of the legislature of Texas, approved February 4th, 1856. By the first section certain parties are named and created a body politic and corporate, and the general powers inherent in all such bodies are formally given. The second gives the right to construct a railway, commencing on the eastern boundary of the state, between Sulphur Fork and Red River, at the western terminus of the Mississippi, Ouachita & Red River Railroad, or of the Cairo & Fulton Railroad, and running thence westerly to the Rio Grande, opposite to or near the town of El Paso. The twentieth section declares that no rights shall vest under the charter until a certain amount of stock therein named shall have been subscribed, and the percentage prescribed shall have been paid upon it. This requirement is covered by the averment in the bill that the company had done everything necessary to secure the vesting of all the franchises given to it. We do not understand that there is any controversy on this subject. All the other conditions prescribed, involving the existence of the corporation, are clearly subsequent. They are found in the fourteenth section of the charter, in the first section of the act of February 5th, 1856, and in the third section of the act of February 10th, 1858. To any argument drawn from these provisions there are two conclusive answers:

(1) There has been no judgment of ouster and dissolution. Without this they are inoperative. To make them effectual they must be grasped and wielded by the proper judicial action. See Ang. & A. Corp. § 777, and the authorities there cited.

(2) The offences and punishment denounced have been condoned and waived by the subsequent action of the legislature. The act of March 20th, 1861: the act for the relief of railroad companies, approved January 11th, 1862; the act for the relief of companies incorporated for purposes of internal improvement, approved February 18th, 1862; and the third section of the "Act to incorporate the Transcontinental Railroad Company," of the 27th July, 1870, each and all have that effect. The section last mentioned authorizes the company therein named to "purchase the rights, franchises, and property of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, heretofore incorporated by this state." This is a clear affirmation, by implication, of the existence of the corporation, and of the possession of the rights, franchises, and property conferred by its charter. What is implied is as effectual as what is expressed. U. S. v. Babbitt, 1 Black, 57. These considerations are so clearly conclusive, that it is needless to advert more particularly in this connection to the legislation in question, or to pursue the subject further. There is no warrant for the proposition that the corporation had ceased to exist.

The heart of this litigation lies in the immense land grant which is in controversy between the parties. The objections we have considered are only outworks thrown up to prevent the conflict from reaching that point. It is insisted that the rights of the company touching the entire reservation have become forfeited.

The fifteenth section of the charter provides as follows: "All the vacant lands within eight miles on each side of the extension line of said road, shall be exempt from location or entry, from and after the time when such line shall be designated by survey, recognition, or otherwise. The lands hereby reserved shall be surveyed by said company at their expense, and the alternate or even sections reserved for the use of the state. And it shall be the duty of said company to furnish the district surveyor of each district through which said roadway runs, with a map of the track of said road, together with such field-notes as may be necessary to the proper understanding and designation of the same."

There are other provisions prescribing various details not necessary to be particularly stated or considered.

A proviso in the seventeenth section declares that no title shall be permanently vested in the company or their assigns for land granted for the grading as contemplated by the act, until twenty-five miles of the road shall have been completed and put in running order. The proviso in the twentieth section of the charter, that no rights shall vest under it until the condition therein prescribed is complied with, has already been considered. Conditions of forfeiture of the lands granted are prescribed in this and subsequent acts. They are found in the fourteenth section of this act; in the first and fourth sections of the supplemental act of the same date; and in the third and fourth sections of the act of February 10th, 1858. These conditions will be considered hereafter.

The act for the relief of internal improvement companies of February 18th, 1862, declared that the time of the continuance of the war between the Confederate States and the United States should not be computed against any internal improvement company in reckoning the period allowed them for the completion of any work they had contracted to do.

The act of January 11th, 1862, for the relief of railroad companies enacted that the failure of any chartered railroad company of the state to complete any part of its road, as required by existing laws, should not operate as a forfeiture of its charter or of the lands to which the company would be entitled, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to encourage the construction of railroads in Texas by donations of land," approved January 30th, 1854, and the several acts supplementary thereto, provided the company should complete such portion of its road as would entitle it to donations of land under existing laws within two years from the close of the war.

The act for the benefit of railroad companies of November 13th, 1866, declared that the grant of sixteen sections of land to the mile to railroad companies theretofore, or thereafter, constructing railroads in Texas, should be extended under the same restrictions and limitations theretofore provided by law, for ten years after the passage of the act. These several acts are valid. See the 33d section of the constitution of Texas of 1869, and Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700.

By an act approved July 27th, 1870, the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company was incorporated.

It was declared that the object of the company thus created was to construct and establish a railway line and telegraphic communication from the eastern boundary of the state of Texas, "and thence as near as practicable to the route of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, to, or near, the town of El Paso." It was enacted that "the main line of said road shall follow, as near as may be practicable, the old survey of the Memphis & El Paso road." It was further enacted that "the said company, hereby incorporated, may purchase the rights, franchises, and property of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company, heretofore incorporated by this state," as before mentioned.

The first section of the ordinance of 1869 declared that all heads of families settled on vacant lands lying within the Memphis & El Paso railroad reserve, should be entitled to receive from the state of Texas eighty acres of land, including the place occupied, upon payment of the expenses of survey and patent.

By the second section it was declared that all the vacant land within the reserve was open to sale to settlers and pre-emption settlers, and subject to the location of land certificates. The third section declared that the company had forfeited its right to the land, and that certain certificates having been issued to the company and patents issued thereon, it was made the duty of the attorney-general to institute legal proceedings to have such certificates and patents cancelled.

In November, 1869, the present constitution of Texas was adopted. It was subsequently approved by congress.

Sections 5 and 7 of this constitution are as follows:

"Sec. 5. All public lands heretofore reserved for the benefit of railroads or railway companies shall hereafter be subject to location and survey by any genuine land certificates."

"Sec. 7. All lands granted to railway companies which have not been alienated by said companies in conformity with the terms of their charter respectively, and the laws of the state under which the grants were made, are hereby declared forfeited to the state for the benefit of the school fund."

This summary gives a view of the statutory and constitutional provisions necessary to be considered in disposing of the question before us.

On the 20th of June, 1857, the company filed in the land office at Austin surveys showing the line of the road from the eastern boundary of the state to El Paso, which line was officially recognized by the commissioner of the general land office of Texas. By the 1st of March, 1860, the company had surveyed, sectionized, and numbered all the sections and fractional sections of the vacant lands within the reservation, from the eastern boundary of the state to the crossing of the Brazos, of which due returns were made to the commissioner, and by him accepted. By the 10th of May, 1859, the company had marked and designated the central line of the road from the Brazos to the Colorado, and made proper returns to the office of the commissioner, by whom they were accepted. The lands granted to the company thereby became defined and officially recognized as such along the whole extent of their line.

In doing this work the company surveyed, numbered, and mapped each alternate or even section of public lands for two hundred and fifty miles in length, and sixteen miles in width, in behalf of the state of Texas. It was of great benefit to her, and is reported to the receiver to have cost the company more than $100,000.

By consent of parties the bill was amended nunc pro tunc in three particulars. The complainant admitted that no land within the reserve had been surveyed, sectionized, or numbered west of the Brazos river, and that no work had been done on the road before or since 1861, except as averred in the bill. He averred that he applied to the general land office for the number and names of those who had located certificates other than such as were issued to the company upon lands within the reservation, and that Kuechler, the defendant, answered that the number was very great, amounting to hundreds, and that a list could not be furnished without great time and labor. He averred further that parties were constantly locating certificates and making surveys within the reservation, and that they were allowed a specified time to make their returns, so that it was impossible for him to obtain a full list of such parties.

The company commenced work within one year from the 1st of March, 1856, and before the 1st of March, 1861, had completely graded more than fifty miles of its roadway, beginning at the eastern boundary line of the state and extending west in the direction of El Paso. See section 3 of the act of February 10th, 1858.

We do not understand that up to that time there was a breach of any condition touching the existence of the corporation or its right to the lands within the reservation. Before that time the tracts east of the Brazos covered by the grant were definitely fixed by the surveys which the company had made. The title of the company to those west of the Brazos, though the sections were not designated, was equally valid. The good will of a lease which the landlord is in the habit of renewing is property, and rights growing out of it, whether by contract or otherwise, will be protected and enforced by a court of equity. Phyfe v. Wardell, 5 Paige, 268. See, also, Amour v. Alexander, 10 Paige, 571.

The rights of the company west of the Brazos were of a much more substantial character than those which were the subjects of judicial action in the cases cited.

The real estate of a corporation is a distinct thing from its franchises. But the right to acquire and sell real estate is a franchise, and the right to acquire the particular real estate designated in the charter of this company, and here in question, is within that category. It might, therefore, well be doubted whether this right could be taken from the company without an appropriate proceeding instituted for that purpose, and prosecuted to judgment by the state. But the view which we take of the case renders it unnecessary to pursue the subject.

We will recur to the conditions of forfeiture touching the land grant, and consider them irrespective of that point. The provisions to that effect, in the fourteenth section of the charter, are expressly superseded by those in the first section of the supplemental act of February 5th, 1856. The fourth section of that act prescribes a further condition. These provisions again are superseded by the third and fourth sections of the amendatory act of February 10th, 1858. The conditions prescribed by the last-named act are:

(1) To survey the reserve as far as the Brazos river, within four years from the 1st of March, 1856.

(2) To run and designate the centre line of the reservation from the Brazos to the Colorado, within fifteen months from the 10th of February, 1858.

(3) To survey the whole reserve within ten years from February 10th, 1858.

(4) To have a connection with some road leading to the Mississippi or Gulf of Mexico within ten years from February 10th, 1858.

(5) That the company shall have finished and in running order at least twenty-five miles of their road within one year after it is connected with certain other roads mentioned in the act, and at least fifty miles every two years thereafter until the road is completed.

(6) That the right to acquire lands from the state by donation shall cease at the expiration of fifteen years from February 10th, 1858.

The two first conditions were performed within the time prescribed. These points are covered by the averments of the bill. The time limited for the performance of the third and fourth is extended from February 10th, 1868, to June 10th, 1873, by adding the time of the continuance of the war, according to the act of February 18th, 1862, before referred to. When the bill was filed there were no such roads as those mentioned in the fifth condition with which a connection could be formed. The fifteen years limited by the sixth condition expired February 10th, 1873. The period that elapsed during the war is to be added. That extends the time so much further.

The title of the company is therefore unaffected by the breach of any condition annexed to the grant.

But suppose there had been such breaches, as is insisted by the counsel for the appellants, the result must still be the same.

Except as to a small portion of the land in question the legal title is yet in the state. Whatever may be the right of the company it is wholly equitable in its character. With a few exceptions, which have no applicability in this case, the same rules apply in equity to equitable estates as are applied at law to legal estates. They are alike descendible, devisable, alienable, and barrable. Jickling, Estates, 17; Croxall v. Shererd, 5 Wall. 281.

There is wide distinction between a condition precedent, where no title has vested and none is to vest until the condition is performed, and a condition subsequent, operating by way of defeasance. In the former case equity can give no relief. The failure to perform is an inevitable bar. No right can ever vest. The result is very different where the condition is subsequent. There equity will interpose and relieve against the forfeiture upon the principle of compensation, where that principle can be applied, giving damages, if damages should be given, and the proper amount can be ascertained. Wells v. Smith, 2 Edw. Ch. 78; see, also, as to the principle of compensation, Beaty v. Harkey, 2 Smedes & M. 563. By the common law a freehold estate could not be created without livery of seizin, and it could not be determined without some act in pais of equal notoriety. Conditions subsequent are not favored in the law (4 Kent, Comm. 129), and when they are sought to be enforced in an action at law, there must have been a re-entry, or something equivalent to it, or the suit must fail. The right to sue at law for the breach is not alienable. The action must be brought by the grantor or some one in priv-ity of blood with him. Nicoll v. Railroad Co., 12 N. Y. 121; Ludlow v. Railroad Co., 12 Barb. 440; Webster v. Cooper, 14 How. 488. In Dumpor's Case, 4 Reports, 119, it was decided that a condition not to alien without license is finally determined by the first license given.

Here the controlling consideration is, that the performance of all the conditions not performed was prevented by the state herself. By plunging into the war, and prosecuting it, she confessedly rendered it impossible for the company to fulfil during its continuance. This is alleged in the bill, and admitted by the demurrer.

The rule at law is, that if a condition subsequent be possible at the time of making it, and becomes afterwards impossible to be complied with, by the act of God, or the law, or the grantor, the estate having once vested, is not thereby divested, but becomes absolute. Co. Litt. 206a, 208b; 2 Bl. Comm. 156; 4 Kent, Comm. *130. The analogy of that rule applied here would blot out these conditions. But this would be harsh and work injustice. Equity will, therefore, not apply the principle to that extent. It will regard the conditions as if no particular time for performance were specified. In such cases the rule is that the performance must be within a reasonable time. Hayden v. Stoughton, 5 Pick. 528; 4 Kent, Comm. *125, 126; Com. Dig. tit. "Condition G, 5." We are clear in our conviction that, under the circumstances, a reasonable time for performance had not elapsed when this bill was filed. As the state, by the act of July 27th, 1870, created the Southern Transcontinental Railroad Company, and authorized that company to "purchase the rights, franchises, and property of the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company," it will be but right to allow a reasonable time for that purchase to be made, if such an arrangement can be effected, and for the vendee thereafter to perform all that was incumbent upon the Memphis, El Paso & Pacific Railroad Company by its charter and the supplementary and amendatory acts. If that arrangement cannot be made, the latter company will have the right to provide otherwise for the fulfilment of its obligations to the state within such time, and thus consummate its inchoate title to the lands within the reservation. Either will be in accordance with the principles of reason and justice, and within the spirit of well-considered adjudications. Walker v. Wheeler, 2 Conn. 299; Beaty v. Harkey, 2 Smedes & M. 563; Moss v. Matthews, 3 Ves. Jr. 279; 2 Vern. 366; 1 Vern. 83; 3 Brown, Ch. 256; Taylor v. Popham, 1 Brown, Ch. 168; 1 Bac. Abr. 642; 1 Madd. Ch. Prac. 41, 42; Bank v. Smith, 3 Gill & J. 265.

Both parties will thus be put in the same situation, as near as may be, as if the breaches had not occurred. Neither will be subjected to any serious hardship. The state, by her own acts, has lost the benefits of an earlier completion of the work. The company has lost the income which it might have enjoyed, and has doubtless been thrown into embarrassments it would have escaped. The circumstances do not call for a severe application of the rules of law upon either side.

Breaches of such conditions may be waived by the grantor expressly or in pais. Dumpor's Case, 1 Smith, Lead. Cas. Eq. 85, Am. note. Such waiver is expressed in the statutes relating to the subject, to which we have referred, except the act creating the Transcontinental Company, and there it exists by the clearest implication.

That the act of incorporation and the land grant here in question, were contracts, is too well settled in this court to require discussion. Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 137; New Jersey v. Wilson, 7 Cranch, 166; Dartmouth College v. Woodward, 4 Wheat. 518; Bank v. Knoop, 16 How. 369. As such, they were within the protection of that clause of the constitution of the United States which declares that no state shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts. The ordinance of 1869, and the constitution adopted in that year, in so far as they concern the question under consideration, are nullities, and may be laid out of view. Von Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wall. 535. When a state becomes a party to a contract, as in the case before us, the same rules of law are applied to her as to private persons under like circumstances. When she or her representatives are properly brought into the forum of litigation, neither she nor they can assert any right or immunity as incident to her political sovereignty. Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How. 308.

A case more imperatively demanding the exercise of jurisdiction in equity could hardly be imagined than that presented in this bill. Should the interposition invoked be refused, doubtless the reservation would speedily be thatched over with adverse claims. A cloud would not only be thrown upon the title of the company, but the time, litigation, labor, and expense involved in the vindication of its rights, would very greatly lessen the value of the grant and materially delay the progress of the work it was intended to aid. The injury would be irreparable. It is the peculiar function of a court of equity in a case like this to avert such results.

It has been insisted that those holding adverse claims should have been brought into the case as parties. They are too numerous for that to be done. An application was made to one of the defendants for a list of their names, and it was not given. The important questions which have arisen between the appellants and the company can all be properly determined without the presence of other parties than those before us.

The parties referred to are sufficiently represented for the purposes of this litigation by the governor and the commissioner of the general land office. We feel no difficulty in disposing of the case as it is presented in the record.

There are other points, ably maintained by the learned counsel for the appellants, to which we have not adverted. They are sufficiently answered by what has been said. It would extend this opinion unnecessarily, and could serve no useful purpose, specifically to consider them.

The circuit court decided correctly. The decree appealed from is affirmed.

Mr. Justice HUNT did not hear the argument in this case and did not participate in its decision.

Mr. Justice DAVIS, with whom concurred the CHIEF JUSTICE, dissenting, said: I am constrained to enter my dissent to the opinion and judgment of the court in this case, for the reason that this suit, although in form otherwise, is in effect against the state of Texas. The object which it seeks to obtain shows this to be so, which is to deprive the state of the power to dispose, in its own way, of its public lands, and this object, by the decision just rendered, is accomplished. In my judgment the bill should have been dismissed, because the state is exempt from suit at the instance of private persons, and on the face of the bill it is apparent that the state is arraigned as a defendant.

In re FLOWERS et al.

(1 Q. B. Div. 14.)

Court of Appeal. Oct. 30, 1896.

Appeal from an order of a registrar in bankruptcy dismissing a petition for a receiving order presented against the debtors.

The debtors were a firm consisting of five members, some of whom, being desirous of dissolving partnership, commenced an action in the chancery division, and in that action a receiver and manager was appointed. The members of the firm thereupon ceased to attend at the place of business, and the business was carried on by the manager. The petitioning creditors, who had previously brought an action against the firm, obtained judgment and issued a bankruptcy notice, which was served on four out of the five partners. The fifth partner could not be found, and the notice was thereupon served on the receiver and manager at the place of business. On objection that no proper service of the notice had been effected, the registrar dismissed the petition.

The petitioning creditors appealed.

F. Cooper Willis, for petitioning creditors.
Muir Mackenzie, for debtors.

LORD ESHER, M. R. I am of opinion that this appeal should be dismissed, and I come to that conclusion upon what I consider to be the true construction of rule 260. As to the position of the receiver appointed by the court, he is the officer and servant of the court, and not of the partners. As I pointed out in the case of Burt v. Bull (1895) 1 Q. B. 276, only the court can dismiss him, or give him directions as to the mode of carrying on the business, or interfere with him if he is not carrying on the business properly, and he is in no sense the servant of the partnership. On the true construction of rule 260, I think there is a necessary implication that the person described in the rule as having the control or management of the business must be a person having authority from the partners, and acting as their agent, and that consequently the rule does not apply to a receiver and manager appointed by the court, and deriving his authority from that appointment, and not from the partners. The service was therefore ineffectual, and the registrar was right in dismissing the petition.

LOPES, L. J. I am of the same opinion. The material words of rule 260 of the Bankruptcy Rules, 1890, are, "any person having at the time of service the control or management of the partnership business there." I agree with the master of the rolls that these words imply a person having the control or management of the business for and on account of the partners, and indicate some one in the position of an agent or servant. Having regard to the fact that the person served in this case did not stand in any such relationship to the partners, but was a receiver appointed by and responsible to the court, I think the decision of the registrar was right.

RIGBY, L. J. A receiver and manager appointed by the court is certainly not the agent of the parties; but, admitting that to the fullest extent, I do not know that, if I had to decide this case sitting alone, I should have arrived at the same conclusion as the other members of the court, from which, however, I do not dissent.

Appeal dismissed.

SEMPLE v. FLYNN et al.
(10 Atl. 177.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. June 30, 1887.

Bill for relief.

On December 5, 1885, Semple and James D. Flynn entered into an agreement for the purpose of carrying on the saloon and restaurant business at Mount Holly, New Jersey. Semple was to furnish the money to buy the necessary fixtures and chattels with which to run the business, while Flynn was to take charge of and conduct the business; it being run in his (Flynn's) name. Out of the proceeds arising from the earnings an equal division was to be made between the two. Semple bought the fixtures for $1,200, paying $850 in cash, and giving a chattel mortgage of $350 for the balance. Flynn agreed to pay $250 to Semple, and take up the $350 mortgage in the spring of 1886. Flynn paid Semple the $250, and took up the $350 mortgage, giving a $300 one in place of it, and, according to the charge of the complainant, has refused to cancel or pay off the $300 mortgage. In November last, Flynn refused to further divide the profits. The complainant also charges that the defendant fraudulently, and without any consideration, in February, 1887, gave a second chattel mortgage on the fixtures to his brother John J. Flynn for the alleged securing of the payment of $500. The bill asks for an accounting since last November, the appointment of a receiver to continue the business until the complainant is paid the money he advanced, and the restraining of the selling or transferring of the second mortgage. The defendant denies part of the agreement respecting the payment of the chattel mortgage, and also claims that the $850 advanced by Semple was loaned to him, and that he has since paid Semple the amount in full; that the mortgage was given to his brother to secure moneys advanced by the said brother. The cause was heard on bill, answer, and proofs, on motion for receiver and preliminary injunction.

Alfred Hugg, for complainant. C. E. Hendrickson, for defendant.

BIRD, V. C. In this case I am asked to appoint a receiver to take possession of goods and of a business which the complainant claims are held and used in partnership. I cannot advise such appointment.

1. It is not at all established by the proofs, by way of affidavits, that there is or ever was a copartnership. There are many circumstances tending to show that a partnership was never intended.

2. If there ever was a copartnership, the presumption, from several circumstances, is that it was broken and abandoned according to its original terms, and such settlement had as to preclude the complainant from any further claim on the goods or interest in the business as a partner.

3. These things being so, no sufficient cause appears to justify the court in taking the goods, and the business, too, out of the hands of the defendant, to whom it was originally committed, when so to do would totally destroy the business, and that necessarily, because such business is carried on under a license, which, of course, is personal to the defendant, and cannot be delegated nor assigned nor committed to the care of a receiver by any court. Before the court will take a step which will work such results, it must be reasonably certain that the allegations upon which relief depends are true.

4. But I will advise an injunction restraining the defendant from selling, assigning, or incumbering any of the goods, chattels, or fixtures now in use in said business, or the said business itself, or the good will thereof, —not, however, to restrain him from managing and carrying on said business in the ordinary way in which he has heretofore been carrying it on during the continuance of the alleged copartnership. I feel justified, under the proofs, in going thus far in the interests of the complainant, but no further. This will preserve the present status until final hearing. Costs to abide final decree.

SIMMONS HARDWARE CO. v. WAIBEL

(47 N. W. 814, 1 S. D. 488.)

Supreme Court of South Dakota. Jan. 30, 1891.

Appeal from district court, Beadle county.

Mouser & Vollrath, for appellant. A. B. Melville and E. H. Aplin, for respondents.

CORSON, P. J. On March 1, 1889, the plaintiff filed its verified complaint in the district court, in which it is alleged, in substance, that it is engaged in the wholesale and retail hardware business in the city of St. Louis; that it has a large amount of capital invested in its said business, several hundred clerks, and about 90 traveling salesmen engaged in selling its wares and merchandise in nearly all the states and territories; that it has prepared and published, at great expense, an illustrated and printed catalogue containing about 1,500 pages, for distribution among its customers; that it has invented and prepared, at a cost of many thousand dollars, a secret code or system, represented by letters, figures, and characters, showing the cost and selling price of its many articles of merchandise, which is marked in such of its catalogues as are intended for use in its said business by its traveling salesmen, and which said secret code or system is not marked in the catalogues distributed to its customers; that in January, 1887, it employed one Frank Meech as one of its traveling salesmen, and intrusted to him, as such, one of its catalogues containing its said secret code or system of letters, figures, and characters marked therein, with the key thereto; that in his business as such traveling salesman said Meech frequently visited the city of Huron, in Dakota, and made sales of goods to the defendants, who were customers of plaintiff, and engaged in the hardware business; that during the year 1888 the defendants, in collusion with said Meech, who still continued in the employment of plaintiff as such traveling salesman, wrongfully and fraudulently obtained from said Meech the said privately marked catalogue, containing its secret code or system of letters, figures, and characters, showing the cost and selling price of its said wares and merchandise, with the key thereto, and copied the same therefrom into one of plaintiff's catalogues that had been furnished to defendants as customers of plaintiff, and that defendants thereby wrongfully and fraudulently became possessed of a knowledge of plaintiff's said secret code or system, and a copy of the same; that plaintiff, upon ascertaining said fact, demanded of defendants the said copy of its secret catalogue so wrongfully and fraudulently made by them, and that on or about February 19, 1889, defendants returned to plaintiff said marked copy, but before doing so they fraudulently and wrongfully copied said secret code or system into one of plaintiff's said catalogues it had furnished to Shefler Bros., also customers of plaintiff, from whom defendants had obtained it, and that said defendants now retain said last-mentioned or Shefler copy, refuse to return same to plaintiff, and threaten to make known said secret code or system, with the key thereto, to customers of plaintiff, to the great damage and injury of plaintiff; that to invent and prepare a new code or system will cost the plaintiff several thousand dollars, and require at least six months' time, and that during such change of system plaintiff will be greatly embarrassed in the transaction of its business. An injunction, receiver, etc., are prayed for.

On filing the complaint, and two supporting affidavits, the court granted ex parte a temporary injunction, and appointed a receiver, to whom defendants were required to deliver said (Shefler) copy of the catalogue alleged to have been copied by them from the former copy returned to plaintiff. On April 18th the defendants moved the court, upon the affidavit of defendant Donaldson, pleadings, proceedings, etc., in the case, to vacate said order made March 1st. The court on the hearing refused to vacate said order, but made an order modifying it by directing that receiver to return said (Shefler) copy of catalogue to defendants. From so much of said order of April 18th as required the receiver to return said copy of catalogue to defendants, plaintiff appeals to this court, and assigns such modification of the original order as error.

The appointing or refusing a receiver is within the sound judicial discretion of the court to which application is made, and this court will not interfere with the exercise of this discretion by the lower court when the evidence is conflicting, unless this court is satisfied such lower court has abused its discretion. Mays v. Rose, Freem. Ch. 703; Chicago & A. O. & M. Co. v. United States P. Co., 57 Pa. 83; Whelpley v. Railroad Co., 6 Blatchf. 271; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 831, 832; High, Rec. §§ 7-25; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1331. Was there, then, a substantial conflict in the evidence upon the material facts in this case? and, if there was such conflict, was there an abuse of discretion by the court? The respondents contend that the affidavit of Donaldson denies all the equities of the bill relating to the Shefler catalogue, and invoke the rule of courts of equity applicable to injunctions, that, when the equities of the bill are denied by the answer, the injunction will be denied. Anderson v. Reed, 11 Iowa, 177; Stevens v. Myers, Id. 184. But that rule does not apply to this case, for the reason that the receiver was appointed, not upon the complaint alone, but upon the complaint and supporting affidavits, and upon the hearing additional affidavits were read on the part of the plaintiff; and the rule itself is subject to many qualifications and exceptions not necessary now to be noticed. This affidavit will therefore be considered as the other affidavits in the case.

The only evidence introduced on the part of the defendants on the hearing was the affi-

avit of defendant Donaldson, before referred to. This affidavit, while it denies each and every allegation in the complaint in general terms, does not deny the various allegations of the complaint and supporting affidavits in that clear and specific manner that entitles it to much weight in a court of equity. It is evasive and unsatisfactory, and leaves upon the mind the impression that, while there is an attempt to deny the allegations of the complaint and supporting affidavits, there is a want of good faith on the part of Donaldson, and an effort on his part to conceal the real facts in the case. All the material facts stated in the complaint were fully sustained by affidavits introduced and read in evidence on the part of the plaintiff. That defendant Donaldson did, in collusion with Meech, plaintiff's traveling salesman, wrongfully and fraudulently obtain from said Meech the secret catalogue intrusted to him by the plaintiff, and make a copy of the same, and that he did in the same manner obtain the key to the same, and did thereby become possessed of a knowledge of plaintiff's secret code or system to which he was not entitled, is proved by too clear and satisfactory evidence to admit of any doubt. That he did return to plaintiff the first copy so made is admitted. The only question remaining is, did Donaldson, before returning the said marked copy, make a second copy therefrom in the Sheffer catalogue now in controversy? After a careful examination of the evidence, we think there cannot be much doubt upon this question. It may be true that there were some slight changes made in the letters, figures, and characters used by plaintiff to represent the cost and selling prices of plaintiff in the Sheffer copy, but we think it is equally true that in the changes made, if any, defendant Donaldson had so arranged them that he preserved, in substance, the plaintiff's system. H. P. Huckins says in his affidavit that he is one of the traveling salesmen of plaintiff, and is fully acquainted with the private and secret code of plaintiff, represented by letters, figures, and characters showing the cost and selling prices of plaintiff's goods, and the key thereto, and that he had examined the Sheffer catalogue in the hands of the receiver, and that the basis of the prices marked therein is throughout the said cost price to plaintiff, and that it would have been impossible for any one to have marked the said Sheffer catalogue with the prices marked, and the explanatory remarks therein contained, unless the person who so marked the same had access to and copied from one of plaintiff's private catalogues. In connection with this testimony are to be considered the efforts made by Donaldson to obtain one of plaintiff's catalogues from some one of plaintiff's customers before he returned to it his own marked copy. After efforts by himself and through his confederate, Meech, he obtained one from George C. Sheffer, who says, in his affidavit, that he first loaned to Donaldson his catalogue on February 15, 1889, and that when, soon after, he requested Donaldson to return it, he replied: "I have marked the price of my goods in the catalogue, but am expecting a catalogue from the Simmons Hardware Company every day, and as quick as it comes I will express it to you." It is true he couples the admission that he had marked the Sheffer catalogue with the qualification that he had marked the price of his own goods in it, but this is not inconsistent with the fact that he had marked the prices contained in plaintiff's secret catalogue, as he was a customer of plaintiff, and was then in possession of a copy made from one of plaintiff's catalogues intrusted to Meech; and he subsequently took great pains to obtain a bill of sale of this catalogue from Sheffer. Why these efforts and this haste to get another catalogue before he returned the first copy marked by him, if he did not require it in which to make another copy? We are of the opinion that there is no substantial conflict in the evidence, and that upon the facts the court below should have retained the catalogue in question in the hands of the receiver.

It is contended on the part of respondents that the catalogue in controversy was the absolute property of defendants, and that the court, under the established rules of equity, was not authorized to take it from them, and place it in the hands of a receiver. It may be conceded, as claimed, that the Sheffer catalogue in its original condition was the absolute property of defendants; but the catalogue in controversy had been changed from its original condition by the defendants by incorporating therein the private code or system invented and prepared at great expense by the plaintiff. The original catalogue was of itself of but trifling value, but with the private code or system of plaintiff marked therein it was of great value. That such a code or system as was invented and used by plaintiff in its business, and described in its complaint, was its property, is well settled, both at common law and under our own Code. Section 2676, Comp. Laws. It was the product of the skill and labors of the plaintiff, and as such is property, and is entitled to the protection of the law; and when the injury threatened would be irreparable, and the remedy at law is inadequate, a court of equity will interfere to prevent a party who has wrongfully obtained possession of the secret from using it or disclosing it to others. And when, as in this case, a party has not only obtained knowledge of the secret code or system, but has wrongfully made a copy of the secret system, a court of equity will, in furtherance of justice and to prevent the party from fraudulently making a disclosure of the secret, not only enjoin him, but will, we apprehend, take into its possession, by means of a receiver, who is an officer of the court, such copy, so wrongfully made, to prevent fraud; and if on the trial the facts alleged are established the court will be authorized to place such copy in the hands of the plaintiff, or at least see that plaintiff's secret marks therein shall be erased or canceled. This accords with the spirit, if not with the letter, of our Code. See sections 3213-3221, Comp. Laws. These sections embody the rules of the civil law upon the doctrine of accessions to personal property, except perhaps section 3219, which is a rule of the common law. Silbury v. McCoon, 3 N. Y. 379. That courts do not hesitate to grant injunctions in such cases, is well settled by the adjudged cases. In Yovatt v. Winyard, 1 Jac. & W. 394, the court granted an injunction against one who had obtained a knowledge of a secret by a breach of trust. In Morison v. Moat, 9 Hare, 241, the court restrained the defendants from using a secret in compounding a medicine, surreptitiously obtained. In Peabody v. Norfolk, 98 Mass. 452, the court held that an injunction to restrain a party from communicating a secret imparted to him in the court, of his business, was proper. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 952. The court was therefore clearly right in granting and continuing the temporary injunction, and, this being so, we are unable to see any legal reason why the court should not have retained in the hands of the receiver the marked catalogue in controversy in this action. The powers of courts of equity over property, the title to which is involved in litigation, is broad and comprehensive, and its power to take into its possession, through its receiver, any property that is the subject of litigation, is ample and unquestioned.

The contention of defendants that, as they were the owners of the catalogue of trifling value, into which they have copied plaintiff's valuable secret code or system, it cannot be taken into its possession by a court of equity through its receiver, and held pendente lite, we cannot assent to. One of the grounds upon which a receiver will be appointed is that there is no other adequate remedy. In this case the remedy by injunction is not adequate to accomplish the ends of justice. The plaintiff, by its complaint and affidavits, shows that its business extends over a large number of states and territories, in which it has many customers. Enjoining a party, therefore, from using or communicating the plaintiff's secret code or system, while effective so long as the defendants are within the jurisdiction of the court, would yet be of little efficacy in case defendants should go beyond the jurisdiction of the court, and take with them the copy, where they might use this secret by communicating it to plaintiff's customers, to the irreparable injury of the plaintiff. The flexible nature of the equitable jurisdiction of courts of equity enables that court to so mould and administer its remedies as to prevent such fraudulent and wrongful use of the catalogue in question, by at once placing it within the control of the court, and thus placing it beyond the power of the defendants to make any improper disposition of it pending the suit, by taking it beyond the jurisdiction of the court. We are clearly of the opinion that under the established jurisdiction of courts of equity the power exists in that court to take into its possession this catalogue, and we think under the evidence it was clearly the duty of the court to do so, and that its modification of its order of March 1st was an abuse of its judicial discretion.

The modified order, so far as it directed the return of the catalogue to defendants, is reversed. All the judges concurring.

Court of Appeals of New York. Nov. 29, 1892.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, Third department.

Proceeding for the dissolution of the Schuyler's Steam Towboat Company. From an order of the general term (19 N. Y. Supp. 565) affirming an order granting an injunction restraining the further prosecution of suits brought in the United States district court, Michael J. Moran and others appeal. Affirmed.

Carpenter & Mosher (Joseph F. Mosher, of counsel), for appellants. James W. Eaton, for respondent.

PECKHAM, J. A receiver of the property and effects of the above-named corporation was duly appointed by a special term of the supreme court of the state sitting at Albany on the 31st of July, 1891, and the order appointing him was filed and entered in the proper clerk's office August 1, 1891, at 11 a. m. The receiver executed his bond, and it was duly approved August 3, and filed in the clerk's office August 4, 1891. The proceeding was one for the voluntary dissolution of a corporation, and the distribution of its property and assets among those entitled to receive the same. Intermediate the time when the receiver was appointed and the execution and filing of his bond, and in the afternoon of August 1st, a Mr. Moran, in his own behalf and in behalf of other creditors of the corporation, libeled several vessels which were the property of the corporation, by filing libels in the United States district court for the Eastern district of New York, and upon process issued from that court the marshal took possession of such vessels. When Moran instituted his proceedings he says he had been informed that application had already been made for the appointment of a receiver, but he was not informed, and did not know, that one had been appointed. Finding the marshal in possession of the vessels, and as he refused to give up such possession, the receiver instituted these proceedings to restrain the libelants from further steps in the United States district court. The courts below have granted the order restraining further proceedings, and the other parties have appealed here. The courts below have held that by the proper presentation of a petition to a state court, praying for the dissolution of the corporation, and by the appointment of a receiver upon due notice of the application to the attorney general, the court acquired jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the proceeding, and took the property of the corporation into the custody of the law for the purpose of due administration; and that, having thus acquired jurisdiction of such subject-matter and taken the property into the custody of the law, although the receiver had not actually and physically seized and taken it into his manual possession, the state court acquired the exclusive jurisdiction and right to take such possession and make a final decree; and that the libelants acquired no rights under their process, and should not be permitted to further proceed in the district court. The libelants, on the other hand, contend that this is a question of jurisdiction over the particular property, and that court obtains it which through its process and officer first actually seizes and takes possession of the property itself; and that, although the receiver may have had a prior right to take possession, it was not exercised before actual possession was taken under the process from the United States court, and hence the first manual possession must determine the question of jurisdiction. We think the contention of the libelants ought not to prevail. The question of the effect of the appointment of a receiver upon the title to the property of the person or corporation for which he was appointed is not a new one. In Mann v. Pentz, 2 Sandf. Ch. 257, it was said that when the appointment of a receiver was completed the title to all property and effects which were subject to the order vested in him. To the same effect are Porter v. Williams, 9 N. Y. 142-148, and Van Alstyne v. Cook, 25 N. Y. 489-496. The appointment of receiver is completed at the furthest by the filing and entering of the order appointing him, although before he proceeds to the discharge of his duties he may be directed to execute and file a proper bond. When that is done, he can take actual, manual possession of the property, and his title relates back to the time of his appointment. In re Christian Jensen Co., 128 N. Y. 550, 28 N. E. 665, and cases cited by Earl, J. In Storm v. Waddell, 2 Sandf. Ch. 494, it was said that property that was liable to levy under execution at law could not be levied upon subsequent to an order appointing a receiver, as such order was equivalent to an actual levy upon the property. I think the proposition involved in this case has been held adversely to the claim of the libelants by the decision in Re Christian Jensen Co., supra. The receiver was there appointed March 10th, his bond filed March 11th, and on March 12th he took possession of some of the property of the corporation. On the 11th of March, intermediate the appointment and qualification of the receiver, certain parties commenced an action against the corporation, and sued out process in replevin in a New York district court, and under it took possession of certain property, which was then in the possession of the corporation. On the same day an action against the corporation was commenced in the New York common pleas to recover a money judgment, and a warrant of attachment was issued, and the sheriff on the same day attached some of the property of the corporation. The receiver then asked for an order restraining the further prosecution of these actions, and, after hearing, the order was granted permanently restraining such proceedings. At the same time the court directed the sheriff, who had seized under his process in replevin certain property in the possession of the corporation, to surrender the same to the receiver. Some question was made as to the right of the corporation to the possession of the property taken in replevin, but upon the facts it was held the receiver was entitled to possession, and, if any question arose as to whether the property seized under the replevin writ actually belonged to the corporation at the time of the appointment of the receiver, that question might be inquired of by some action or proceeding against the receiver, commenced or taken with leave of the court. What was intended to be asserted was that the appointment of the receiver vested the property of the corporation in him, although he was to thereafter qualify by giving a bond; and that, the title being in him, and the property in the custody of the law, no other court could obtain jurisdiction over the property after such appointment, even under process upon which possession was taken prior to the qualifying of the receiver.

A different rule does not prevail because one court is a state and the other a United States court. It is a question of jurisdiction in each case, and the same principles apply in both. The same rule obtains whether one court is of common-law or equitable jurisdiction and the other is a court of admiralty, although the nature of the jurisdiction of these courts is so different. Mr. Chief Justice Taney, in his dissenting opinion in Taylor v. Carryl, 20 How. 583-600, endeavored to establish that such a difference in the nature of the jurisdiction of common-law and admiralty courts over the vessel which was attached and libeled ought to make a difference in the decision to be made. The jurisdiction of the district court of the United States in that case was invoked for the purpose of collecting seamen's wages by the enforcement of the maritime lien upon the vessel given for that class of services, and it was said that such lien is by well-established authorities prior and paramount to all other claims on the vessel, and must be first paid, and that by the constitution and laws of the United States the district courts, acting as courts of admiralty, were the only courts which had jurisdiction over such lien or that were authorized to enforce it, and that it was the duty of that court to do it. The chief justice then argued that, as the attachment of the vessel under the state laws and by process from the state court only bound the interest of the owner, while the maritime lien upon the vessel bound the res itself, the court which had jurisdiction only of a subordinate and inferior interest should not be able, by virtue of such an attachment, to close all proceedings to enforce the paramount lien for wages for 12 months, as by the laws of the state that period or more might elapse between the seizure of the vessel under the attachment and its sale or release from the process. The case was decided upon what a majority of the court held was no new principle, and it was solved by the application of what was said to be a principle that was comprehensive, and just, and equal, and opposing no hindrance to the efficient administration of judicial power. The jurisdiction of the state court was upheld, notwithstanding its limited character, and that of the admiralty court was denied, although it was the sole court where the lien of the seaman for his wages could be originally enforced against the vessel itself. The case shows that the fact that the different courts in the Christian Jansen Co. Case, supra, were courts of the same state, and of concurrent jurisdiction, is immaterial, and the same rule would hold if one court were a state and the other a United States tribunal.

The cases cited by the counsel for these appellants do not involve the question as to the effect of the appointment of a receiver in an action or proceeding where the court has obtained jurisdiction by the proper service of papers. This court has held that the effect is, in a case of this kind, to take the property of the corporation into the custody of the law, and that the court has power to preserve and protect it. As was said in Heidritter v. Oil Cloth Co., 112 U. S. 305, 5 Sup. Ct. Rep. 135: "When the object of the action requires the control and dominion of the property involved in the litigation, that court which first acquires possession, or that dominion which is equivalent, draws to itself the exclusive right to dispose of it." That dominion was acquired by the order appointing the receiver in this proceeding. The same principle was declared in Union Trust Co. v. Rockford, R. I. & St. L. R. Co., 6 Biss. 197; Steele v. Sturges, 5 Abb. Pr. 442; Railroad Co. v. Lewis, 81 Tex. 1, 16 S. W. 647. Different considerations apply upon a motion to punish as for a contempt an alleged interference of a third person with property in regard to which a receiver may have been appointed, but which he has not yet taken actual possession of. In the case of Bank v. Schermerhorn, 9 Paige, 372, the chancellor reversed the decree of the vice chancellor adjudging the appellants to be in contempt, because the facts were not sufficient to enable the chancellor to judge whether the parties were or were not in contempt. The question was one of procedure,—whether it was proper to proceed as for a contempt for the purpose of enforcing the actual delivery of property to the receiver. The court held such proceeding was improper where the receiver had never had actual possession, although his right to possession flowed from the order appointing him. The question now before the court was neither involved, discussed, nor decided in the case cited. A party might not be guilty of contempt in taking control of property not actually seized by the receiver, and while such party was in ignorance that a receiver had been appointed; and yet the property thus interfered with may notwithstanding have been in the custody of the law, and jurisdiction over it may unquestionably have existed in the court which appointed the receiver. Our decision here does not affect the legal rights of the libelants in the vessels in question. The receiver will be obliged in this proceeding to distribute the proceeds arising from a sale of the property among the creditors of the corporation, as their priority of rights may appear and be held valid.

We think the order was right, and it must be affirmed, with costs. All concur.

ST. LOUIS, K. & S. R. CO. et al. v. WEAR, Judge.

(36 S. W. 357, 135 Mo. 230.)

Supreme Court of Missouri. June 15, 1896.

In banc. Application by the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railway Company and others for a writ of prohibition against Judge Wear, judge of the circuit court. Writ granted.

The proceeding before Judge Wear was upon a petition in which Mr. Kerfoot was named as plaintiff, and the "St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, a corporation, and Louis Houck, E. F. Blomeyer, L. B. Houck, Theophilus Besel, and E. S. McCarty, as directors in said railroad company, and the Pemiscot Railroad Company, a corporation, and Robert G. Ranney, Leo Doyle, Robert T. Giboney, and John R. Jeannin, directors in said railroad company, and Louis Houck," defendants. The substance of that petition (according to the statement of the counsel for defendants in the supreme court, which statement is regarded as sufficiently full for the purposes of the prohibition case) is as follows:

"On the 17th of March, 1890, there was organized under the laws of this state the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, with a capital of \$180,000, divided into 1,800 shares of the par value of \$100 each, designed to be constructed and operated from Campbell to Kennett, Dunklin county, Missouri,—a distance of 19 miles. Of this stock, A. J. Kerfoot held, and still holds, 108 shares, and E. S. McCarty, Harry H. Ferguson, Melvin L. Gray, and George Denison, respectively, held 108 shares. Prior to the — day of July, 1891, all the shares of the other stockholders in said company were purchased by said A. J. Kerfoot and E. S. McCarty. On July 8, 1891, said Kerfoot and McCarty entered into a contract with relator Louis Houck, by the terms of which said Houck agreed to transfer to said Kerfoot and McCarty ten interest-bearing extension bonds of the Cape Girardeau Southwestern Railway Company, each for \$1,000, which were represented to be worth $\frac{81}{100}$ of their face value, and also to organize a construction company for the purpose of making a connection between the said railroads at the town of Campbell, said connection being of the approximated length of 30 miles. Of the stock of said construction company, said Kerfoot and McCarty were to receive 49 per cent., and on the construction of said connection, said Kerfoot and McCarty were to be superintendent and general manager, respectively, at salaries of not less than \$175 per month. By the terms of this contract, one-half of the real estate belonging to said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railway Company at Kennett was to be transferred to said Kerfoot and McCarty. In consideration of the foregoing, said Kerfoot and McCarty were to transfer to said

Houck 300 shares of their stock in said railroad company, on the completion of the contract aforesaid. After the above terms of said contract had been agreed on and set forth therein, additional stipulations were inserted by said Houck in said contract, without the knowledge and consent of said Kerfoot and McCarty, to the effect that in no event was said Houck to be personally responsible for the fulfillment of said contract, and that, if said contract should not be kept on his part, such failure should not affect in any wise the said contract, and that 1,360 additional full-paid shares of stock in said company should be issued to said Houck, and that the 240 shares of said Kerfoot and McCarty should be considered full paid. While the bonds above referred to were by said Houck transferred to said Kerfoot and McCarty, not only were they not of the value represented by said Houck, but of no value whatsoever; and while said construction company was organized, and certain certificates of its stock transferred to said Kerfoot and McCarty, the purpose of its organization—the construction of a connection between the aforesaid railroads—was not only never accomplished, but never attempted to be carried out, and said certificates are consequently of absolutely no value. Shortly after the transfer of the 300 shares of the stock of the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company by said Kerfoot and McCarty to said Houck on the faith of the performance of the terms of said contract by said Houck, said Houck held a meeting of the pretended shareholders holding shares in excess of those held by said Kerfoot and McCarty,—to whom no notice of said pretended meeting was ever given, or attempted to be given, and of which they had no knowledge or information,—whereat said pretended shareholders did attempt and pretend to issue to said Houck 1,360 additional shares of stock of said railroad company. This action of said pretended shareholders, respondent, Kerfoot, claims to be fraudulent, illegal, and void, against which he has protested, and now protests, and in affirmance of which he has done and will do nothing. By reason of the aforesaid facts, it is claimed that the consideration for the transfer of said stock to Houck has failed, and was only brought about by the false and fraudulent representations of said Houck, with the intent to cheat and defraud said Kerfoot and McCarty.

"It is also charged in said petition: That, having thus fraudulently obtained control of said railroad, said Houck and the other relators have mismanaged, and been guilty of gross negligence and misconduct in their trust capacity as directors, officers, etc., and fraudulently combined to cheat and defraud respondent, Kerfoot, and to render his shares of stock valueless, etc., together with those of other of the stockholders. That the other relators, as directors of said company, are under the influence and control of said relator

Houck, and conform their actions to accomplish his fraudulent and illegal purposes, and to carry out his unlawful designs. That said Louis Houck is the principal shareholder in a company organized to construct a railroad through the counties of St. Genevieve and Perry, in the state of Missouri, which said road is located many miles from the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern, and that, being entirely without credit, said Houck has used in the construction of said road divers funds belonging to said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, without any authority so to do from the stockholders and directors of said company, although with the pretended authority of said board of directors. That said Houck is also the principal stockholder in a certain railroad in process of construction through Scott county, Missouri, and in the construction of this road said Houck has illegally and fraudulently, in like manner and to like ends, appropriated the funds of said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company. That on or about February 15, 1892, the Pemiscot Railroad Company was organized,—and constructed during the year 1894,—of which said Houck was the real and substantial owner. That in the construction of this road said Houck wrongfully and fraudulently appropriated certain of the funds of said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, in the manner and with the purposes as aforesaid. That on the 22d day of April, 1895, said Houck, in furtherance of his said designs to destroy the value of said Kerfoot's stock, and of the property of said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, caused the said pretended stockholders of said company to adopt a contract attempted to be entered into between the directors of said last-named companies, whereby the two said railroads should be consolidated into one road. Of none of these proceedings was said Kerfoot notified, and of none of which did he have any knowledge or information, nor did he in any manner participate therein. Under this pretended contract of consolidation, the stock of the two companies was to be called in, and new stock in the consolidated company issued in lieu thereof. That said contract was submitted to a pretended meeting of said shareholders of the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, and the minutes of said meeting purport to show that said contract was adopted by a majority of its stockholders, all of which is false. That a copy of said minutes, and also the minutes of a similar meeting of the shareholders of said Pemiscot Railroad Company, showing a like pretended ratification of the same contract, have been filed in the office of the secretary of state of the state of Missouri. The said attempted consolidation was fraudulent and void, in that it was not effected in conformity with the laws of the state of Missouri, and with a fraudulent intent and purpose, and because no notice of said meeting was given said Kerfoot, who was not present thereat, although in the copy of the minutes of said meeting on file with the secretary of state he is falsely represented as voting in favor of said consolidation. That the terms of said contract of consolidation were not carried out by said Houck, or the other relators. That the earnings of said company are not sufficient to discharge its accruing obligations, and that the salaries and wages of its employes have not been paid for the last six months, and that it is now in debt to its said employes to the extent of many thousand dollars. That by reason of the acts aforesaid said company is unable to secure supplies needed in the operation of the road. That the rolling stock and other properties are in need of repair and replenishing, which the relators have failed and refused to have done. That no provision has been or is now being made for the extinguishment of the outstanding debts and bonds hereafter to accrue. That said Houck on the 2d day of December, 1895, did remove respondent, Kerfoot, from his position as superintendent of said road, and did appropriate his salary to himself, through one of the relators, his kinsman Louis B. Houck. That the said Pemiscot Railroad Company is, and was at the time of the attempted consolidation aforesaid, hopelessly insolvent. That its debts have not been paid, except such as were paid out of the earnings of the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company as aforesaid, and that said attempted consolidation was but a part of the plan of said Houck to secure and absorb both properties. That by reason of all of which the said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company has become greatly embarrassed financially, and that a continuation of such acts of mismanagement will bring about the insolvency and bankruptcy of said corporation.

"The prayer of the bill is that relators, as officers of said company, be restrained from diverting further amounts of money from the treasury of said company; that they be suspended from office as directors, etc., and that a new election be ordered to be held to supply the vacancy thus to be created; that an accounting be had with respect of the funds diverted as aforesaid; that a decree be rendered annulling said pretended consolidation, and restoring the funds so diverted from the treasury of the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company; that said 300 shares of stock, or their proportionate interest therein, transferred by said Kerfoot and McCarty, be restored to them, and that said contract under which the transfer was made be annulled, for reasons aforesaid; that said issuance of the 1,360 shares of stock be annulled and canceled, for the reasons before mentioned; and that said Houck be required to account for the benefits that have accrued to him by reason of the transfer of said 300 shares of stock, and the issuance of said 1,360 shares; and that he be ordered to pay one-half of the same to said Kerfoot. An offer is made to return to said Houck one-half of the shares of stock in the construction company before mentioned, and like offer with respect of said extension bonds. The petition then asks for the appointment of a receiver pending the determination of the issues tendered, in order to prevent the misappropriation, and to insure the preservation of the properties involved."

The order of Judge Wear, appointing the receiver, is as follows:

"State of Missouri, County of Dunklin—ss.: In the Circuit Court, July term, 1896. A. J. Kerfoot, Plaintiff, v. The St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, a Corporation, and Louis Houck, E. F. Blomeyer, L. B. Houck, Theophilus Besel, and E. S. McCarty, as Directors in said Railroad Company, and the Pemiscot Railroad Company, a Corporation, and Robert G. Ranney, Leo Doyle, Robt. T. Giboney, Louis Houck, and John R. Jeannin, Directors in Said Railroad Company, and Louis Houck, Defendants. In Vacation. Order of Appointment of Receiver. Now, on this 11th day of April, 1896, comes A. J. Kerfoot, and presents to me, John G. Wear, judge of the circuit court of Dunklin county, Missouri, in vacation, at chambers, in the city of Poplar Bluff, in the county of Butler, in the state of Missouri, a certified copy of his petition filed in the office of the clerk of the said circuit court of said Dunklin county, in a certain cause entitled above; and with it he presents his motion, verified by his affidavit, by which he asks the appointment of a receiver of the real and personal property of the said defendant corporations named above, which said motion is hereto attached. And the said John G. Wear, judge as aforesaid, having heard said motion, and having duly considered the same, together with the facts offered in connection therewith, does hereby order that Samuel W. Fordyce, of the city of St. Louis, Missouri, be, and he is hereby, appointed as receiver of all and singular the real and personal property, wherever situate, of the said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, and of the said Pemiscot Railroad Company, and that he shall immediately qualify as such, by giving bond for the faithful performance of his duties as such receiver, in the sum of twenty-five thousand dollars, and that after his qualification as such receiver, having duly taken the oath prescribed, he shall proceed to the county of Dunklin, and to the county of Pemiscot, in the state of Missouri, and shall take charge of the said property of the said railroad companies, including the rolling stock, the depots, books, and papers of the said companies, and that he shall then take an inventory of all of the said property so taken charge of by him; that he shall manage the said railroad properties carefully and discreetly; that he shall continue to fulfill and perform all of the existing contracts of the said railroad companies until the further order of the court in the premises; that he shall discharge all of the current expenses of the management as such receiver out of the earnings of the said roads while they are in his hands or custody; that he shall keep an accurate and exact account of the expenses and of the income of the two said railroads, the one extending from Campbell, Missouri, to Kennett, Missouri, and the other extending from Kennett, Missouri, to Caruthersville, Missouri, preserving the said expenses and income separate in all of the transactions of himself as such receiver, and that he shall keep and maintain the said properties in good condition until the further order of the said circuit court of Dunklin county, or the judge thereof in vacation; and that he make a full report of his acts as such receiver to the next term of said court, unless ordered to do so before that date. It is further ordered that each and every agent and employé of the said defendant railroad companies named above, whether regarded as the employés of the said companies as one corporation, or as two separate corporations, shall, upon the demand of said Samuel W. Fordyce, after his qualification as such receiver, immediately yield to said receiver the possession and control of all the property, books, and accounts of the said defendant railroad companies or company, and the said Louis Houck and the other defendants named as the officers and directors of said defendant companies are hereby ordered to turn over and deliver to the said receiver all of the books and papers of the said company or companies which pertain in any wise to the management and business of the said company or companies. It is further ordered that in the event that any such employé of said company or companies shall fail or refuse to so deliver to said receiver the property in his said care and custody, or should said defendants fail or refuse to so deliver to said receiver the books, papers, or other property of the said defendant company or companies, the said receiver shall at once report the person so failing or refusing to the undersigned judge for his further orders in that behalf. The said defendants and their employés are hereby enjoined and forbidden from in any manner interfering with the said possession of the said receiver after he shall have obtained the possession of the said property hereby ordered into his hands, until the further orders of the said court, or of the judge thereof in vacation. It is further ordered that this order be filed in the office of the clerk of said court of said Dunklin county, and that a certified copy thereof be furnished the said Samuel W. Fordyce, as such receiver, and that a duly-certified copy thereof be served upon the defendants named above. It is further ordered that the said defendants be notified to appear before me, the undersigned judge of the circuit court, at the next term of the circuit court, in the county of Dunklin, in the state of Missouri, then and there to show cause, if any they can, why the appointment hereby made should not be continued, and the property kept by the said receiver, pending a hearing upon the merits of this controversy, and until the said defendants may be heard upon the merits thereof. And the service of a duly-certified copy hereof shall be deemed sufficient service of the said notice. Done at chambers in the city of Poplar Bluff, in the county of Butler and state of Missouri, this 11th day of April, 1896. John G. Wear, Judge."

The writ issued by Judge Wear for the seizure and delivery of the property of the railroad company is as follows:

"State of Missouri, County of Dunklin—ss.: In the Circuit Court, to July Term, 1896. A. J. Kerfoot, Plaintiff, v. The St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, a Corporation, and Louis Houck, E. F. Blomeyer, L. B. Houck, Theophilus Besel, and E. S. McCarty, as Directors in said Railroad Company, and the Pemiscot Railroad Company, a Corporation, and Robert G. Ranney, Leo Doyle, Robt. T. Giboney, Louis Houck, and John R. Jeannin, Directors in said Railroad Company, and Louis Houck, Defendants. To W. G. Petty, Sheriff of Dunklin County, Missouri: Whereas, it appears to me, John G. Wear, judge of the circuit court of said Dunklin county, Missouri, sitting in chambers, in vacation, by the report of S. W. Fordyce, whom I did on the 11th day of April, 1896, appoint as receiver of all of the property of the said St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, and of the said Pemiscot Railroad Company, which report is duly verified, that the said Samuel W. Fordyce did on said 13th day of April, 1896, proceed to the town of Kennett, in said Dunklin county, Missouri, and did then and there cause to be served upon one Louis B. Houck, whom he found in the charge and management of the said property of the said railroad companies or company named above, a duly-certified copy of my order made in the above-entitled cause, appointing him, the said S. W. Fordyce, as such receiver, and that he did then and there demand of the said Louis B. Houck the possession and custody of the property of the said railroad companies or company, and did demand that the said Louis B. Houck relinquish the possession and control thereof to him, the said receiver, and that said Louis B. Houck did then and there fail and refuse so to turn over and deliver to said receiver the possession and control of the said railroad or railroads, and of the said property of the said railroad company or companies, and did then and there fail and refuse to relinquish the said possession and control thereof; and that the said Louis B. Houck did willfully violate the commands of my said order of appointment of the said Samuel W. Fordyce as such receiver: This is, therefore, to command you that you do forthwith summon the power of the said county of Dunklin, if necessary, and that you proceed to the property of the said railroad company or companies named above, and to its railroad office or offices, wherever situate or found in your county, and that you put and place the said Samuel W. Fordyce, as such receiver, in charge, custody, and possession thereof, and that you dispossess therefrom, and from every portion or part thereof, the said Louis B. Houck, or any other official or employé or agent of the said Louis B. Houck or of the said railroad companies named above, or of any defendants named herein above; that you take and deliver to the said receiver all of the engines and cars and other equipments of the said railroad or railroads, all of its books and papers, its tickets and other movable property, its depots and ticket offices, and every other property of every description. You are further commanded that you immediately take into your custody the body of the said Louis B. Houck, and him safely keep, so that you have him, the said Louis B. Houck, before me, at chambers, in the city of Poplar Bluff, in the county of Butler and state of Missouri, on Thursday, April 16, 1896, then and there to show cause, if any he can, why he should not be committed to the common jail of said Dunklin county for his disobedience of my said order of appointment of said receiver. And you are further commanded that if any other person shall attempt to obstruct the full and free execution of the above order, or to aid or assist in the attempt to remove any of the said property from the said county of Dunklin, except by orders of the said receiver, you shall, by virtue hereof, arrest each and every such person, and have him or them before me at the time and place designated above, then and there to be further dealt with according to law. In testimony whereof, I have hereunto set my hand, at chambers, in the town of Bloomfield, in the county of Stoddard and state of Missouri, this 14th day of April, 1896. John G. Wear, Judge of the Circuit Court of Dunklin County, Missouri."

"Executed the within writ in the county of Dunklin and state of Missouri on the 14th day of April, 1896, by placing S. W. Fordyce, as receiver, in charge of the depot and all of the property of the above-named company or companies which were at that time at the town of Kennett and in said county, including one engine and two passenger coaches, which were afterwards taken away by L. B. Houck, and carried eastward into Pemiscot county, Missouri. I did further on the 15th day of April, 1896, put the said receiver in charge of all the remainder of the property of the said companies or company in my said county. Said Louis B. Houck was not arrested as ordered above, because he left the said county of Dunklin. W. G. Petty, Sheriff of Dunklin County, Mo."

Other necessary facts appear in the opinion of the court.

M. R. Smith, for plaintiffs.

BARCLAY, J. (after stating the facts). This action is original in the supreme court. The plaintiffs are the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, Louis Houck, and a number of other shareholders in said company. The defendants are the learned circuit judge of the Twenty-Second circuit, and Messrs. Kerfoot and Fordyce, plaintiff and receiver in the proceeding before the judge. The object of the action is to obtain a writ of prohibition against the enforcement of certain orders entered by the judge in vacation of the court. Copies of those orders will be printed in the official report. The claim of plaintiffs here is that the orders are void, because made without jurisdiction, or, at least, that they are in excess of any jurisdiction which the circuit judge might properly exercise in the proceeding as it then stood. In response to a preliminary rule in prohibition, defendants made separate returns, and plaintiffs replied thereto. It will not be necessary to state the terms of those pleadings at any great length. The facts on which the result of the action in this court depends are few, and need not be obscured by elaboration of the minor features of the controversy. Those facts are also admitted by the pleadings. The old St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company (which we shall call the "Old Kennett Road" for a short name) was incorporated in 1890 to operate a railroad, about 19 miles long, between Campbell and Kennett, in Dunklin county. A new company of the same title was formed in 1895 by an alleged consolidation of the old Kennett road and the Pemiscot Railroad Company, which had been organized in 1892 to extend the railroad from Kennett to Caruthersville. The latter place is in Pemiscot county, on the Mississippi river. The validity of that consolidation is attacked in the petition filed in the case on the circuit. The ostensible public evidence of the consolidation is the certificate issued by the secretary of state of Missouri, proclaiming a compliance with the statutory requirements in regard to the union of such corporations. Rev. St. 1889, § 2567. The property formerly owned by the two old companies was in custody of the new Kennett road, which operated a line, about 44 miles in length, from Campbell to Caruthersville (via Kennett), when Kerfoot's petition was filed. For the purpose of the hearing in this court, the version which that petition gives of the dealings between Kerfoot, Houck, and the companies will be accepted as reliable, in determining the propriety of the proceedings which followed. The statements of that petition need not be repeated. They will be referred to as occasion requires. An ex parte application for the appointment of a receiver was made to the circuit judge, in vacation, on representations additional to the petition. The substance of those representations is that if such appointment were not made the property of said railway companies would "be wasted pending the determination of the said litigation," and the rights of the plaintiff "suffer irretrievable injury," etc. The application excused the want of notice thereof to defendants on the ground "that the giving of the said notice would tend to defeat the object sought to be obtained by the said appointment, in this, to wit: that the said Louis Houck is in exclusive charge of all of the books showing the condition of the affairs of the said companies, and has persons in charge of the various offices and property of the road, who are entirely under his control; that the said Louis Houck would so handle and dispose of the books and property of the said companies that the order of appointment of a receiver, if made upon notice, would not avail, and would not be obeyed; the books and movable property of the said companies would be removed from the said counties in which said property is situate, and would be removed from the state, so that the said processes of the said court would not be effectual to compel the delivery thereof to the receiver which might be appointed"; "that by the removal of the said books of the said companies the object of the appointment of such receiver would be frustrated, and his performance of his said duties would be made difficult, if not impossible; that all of the said defendants, directors in the said corporations, are under the control of the said defendant Louis Houck"; and "that, if the said defendants should have notice of this application for a receiver, they would resort to various tricks and devices to delay this proceeding, and in the meanwhile to further wreck said property; that the said defendants now are plotting to deprive this plaintiff of his property interest in the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, by means of a fictitious and fraudulent assessment upon his said stock; and that the giving of the said notice would have the effect to destroy the benefits sought in the appointment of the said receiver." The circuit judge granted the application, without notice to defendants, and made a vacation order, at Poplar Bluff, in Butler county, the terms of which are set forth at large in the statement accompanying this opinion. The main features of the order are that Mr. Fordyce was appointed receiver of all the real and personal property of defendant companies. He was directed to immediately qualify, by giving bond, etc., and then to take charge of all the real and personal property of said companies, "including the rolling stock, the depots, books and papers, of the said companies"; to "manage the said railroad properties carefully," and "continue to fulfill and perform all of the existing contracts of the said railroad companies until the further order of the court in the premises"; to keep accounts, make reports, etc. The order further directed defendants to deliver all said property to said receiver, and enjoined them from interfering with the possession of the latter. The defendants were further ordered to appear before the judge "at the next term of the circuit court in the county of Dunklin," then and there to show cause why the receivership should not be continued "pending a hearing upon the merits." This order was dated April 11, 1896. The next term of the Dunklin circuit court, as appointed by law, will begin on the second Monday (the 13th) of July, 1896. Sess. Laws 1892, p. 13, § 50. An ordinary summons to defendants to appear and answer the petition in the cause at the opening of the July term of the circuit court of Dunklin county was issued on the 10th of April, 1896. Mr. Fordyce, at the time of his appointment as receiver, was president of the St. Louis Southwestern Railroad Company, popularly known as the "Cotton Belt" route. It is alleged in the petition for prohibition in this court that the latter is "a competitive railroad company, whose policy has ever been hostile to relator railroad company, for the reason that it occupies the same territory for business," and that the connection of the Kennett road with the Mississippi river secures to the people of Dunklin and Pemiscot counties advantages of competition between that road and the Cotton Belt. There is no denial of these allegations in the return of any of the defendants to the preliminary rule in this court, and like statements as to the roads being in competition appear in the replies to the returns. The above recital shows the substance of the charges on that point. When Mr. Fordyce, in obedience to the order for his appointment, demanded possession of the Kennett road, the officers in charge of the property refused to deliver it. That demand was the first actual notification given to them of the receivership. After the refusal to turn over the property, an application was made to the circuit judge for further action, whereupon he issued the writ or warrant of date April 14, 1896, to the sheriff of Dunklin county, directing him to summon the power of his county to put the receiver in possession of the property of the two railroad companies, and to dispossess any official of said companies. The warrant is recited in full in the statement accompanying the opinion. But it may be properly noted here that the warrant was issued in Stoddard county. It directed the arrest of Louis B. Houck, and that he be produced before the circuit judge, at chambers, in the city of Poplar Bluff, Butler county, April 16, 1896; to show cause why he should not be committed to jail for disobedience of the order appointing the receiver. Under the last-described writ, the sheriff put Mr. Fordyce, as receiver, into possession of the property of the Kennett railroad in Dunklin county, and otherwise returned the order unexecuted, for the reasons appearing in his return. At that stage of the case the application for a prohibition was presented to the supreme court, and a preliminary rule issued.

1. It is urged by defendants that prohibition is not applicable to the situation existing on the circuit in the receivership case, and that no review can occur at this time as to the propriety of the disputed orders. But, if those orders were beyond the legitimate authority of the judge, the enforcement of them may be prohibited. Morris v. Lenox (1843) 8 Mo. 252. The fact that the suit in the circuit court invokes the equity powers thereof does not preclude the use of a prohibitory writ to keep the judicial action within the limits marked by law. A court of equity, no less than a court of law, may be called back within the boundaries of its rightful jurisdiction by the process of prohibition. Where a court or judge assumes to exercise a judicial power not granted by law, it matters not, so far as concerns the right to a prohibition, whether the exhibition of power occurs in a case which the court is not authorized to entertain at all, or is merely an excessive and unauthorized application of judicial force in a cause otherwise properly cognizable by the court or judge in question. State v. Walls (1892) 113 Mo. 42, 20 S. W. 883; In re Holmes (1895) 1 Q. B. 174. Prohibition, however, will not ordinarily be granted where the usual modes of review by appeal or writ of error furnish an adequate and efficient remedy for the correction of an injury resulting from the unauthorized exercise of judicial power. But where those remedies are inadequate to the exigency of the situation, in a particular case, a supervising court may properly interfere by the remedy now asked. If the orders in the Kerfoot suit were in excess of the jurisdiction of the learned judge who entered them, and if they have resulted in the seizure of a large part of a railroad line, and its detention from those entitled to—and whose duty requires them to—operate it for the convenience of the public, the case is one which would permit, if not demand, the application of a writ of prohibition to correct the wrong complained of. The remedy of prohibition affords opportunity for a direct attack upon proceedings questioned upon the point of jurisdiction. If the facts shown by a record reveal an unwarranted application of judicial power, causing an immediate and wrongful invasion of rights of property, the writ of prohibition may go to check the execution of any unfinished part of the extrajudicial programme that may have been outlined. Sometimes the writ may be so shaped as to undo the steps that have been taken in such a programme. To justify the use of the writ, it is not essential that the proceedings in dispute should be so entirely void as to warrant a declaration of nullity upon a collateral inquiry. The statute governing proceedings in prohibition makes no change in the ancient law on these points. Laws 1895, p. 95.

2. The plaintiffs in this court contend that the learned judge had no jurisdiction to appoint a receiver for the railroad company upon the showing made by the petition of Kerfoot, and that the order of appointment is therefore a nullity. It is true that there are precedents declaring that, in the absence of statutory authority for so doing, the property of a solvent and going corporation cannot rightfully be taken from the control of its officers at the suit of a mere creditor at large, and be placed in the hands of a receiver, on account of mismanagement merely, or to secure the performance of some engagement of the company, even in regard to its shares. Some decisions have gone so far as to correct, and even to prohibit, such proceedings, as entirely beyond the general jurisdiction of courts of equity. Port Huron & G. R. Co. v. Judge of St. Clair Circuit (1875) 31 Mich. 456; Iron Co. v. Wilder (1892) 88 Va. 942, 14 S. E. 806; Mason v. Supreme Court of Baltimore City (1893) 77 Md. 483, 27 Atl. 171; In re Binghamton General El. Co. (1894) 143 N. Y. 261, 38 N. E. 297; People v. Weigley (1895) 155 Ill. 491, 40 N. E. 300; State v. Superior Court of Pierce County (1895) 12 Wash. 677, 42 Pac. 123; Fischer v. Superior Court of San Francisco (1895) 110 Cal. 129, 42 Pac. 561. But in view of the other serious and sufficiently difficult question involved in the case at bar, and the desirability of prompt announcement of the conclusion that has been reached, we shall not now stop to investigate the soundness of plaintiffs' contention above stated.

3. A power to appoint receivers is expressly conferred upon judges of trial courts in vacation by section 2193, Rev. St. 1889, which greatly broadened the terms of the old law (Gen. St. 1865, p. 678, § 52) under which State v. Gambs (1878) 68 Mo. 289, was decided. We shall not be obliged to consider whether the judge might not appoint a receiver in vacation by virtue of inherent power in the circuit court to make such an order, for in the instance under review the order was made in another county than that in which the petition for a receiver had been filed. The inherent as well as the express powers of a court must be exercised within the territorial jurisdiction of that court, unless positive law enlarges the field of their use. But, where a judicial power is given by statute to a judge in vacation, he may exert that power (at least within his circuit) out of as well as in the county where the cause is pending, unless there is something in the statutory authority to forbid such action. It may be conceded for the present, without examining the proposition closely, that the power given to the judge to appoint a receiver carries with it, as a necessary incident, a power in his court, if not in the judge personally, to enforce obedience to orders made within the ambit of that power, and in accordance with established principles of law governing the exertion of such a power. (As to the mode of applying that power we shall have more to say in the next section of this opinion.) But the judicial authority to deal with property by means of a receivership is not unlimited or absolute. Harris v. Beauchamp [1894] 1 Q. B. 801. By a very late statute of Missouri an appeal may be taken from any order "refusing to revoke, modify or change an interlocutory order appointing a receiver or receivers." The same statute further provides for a very summary determination of such appeals, and for that reason directs that they shall, on motion, be advanced on the appellate docket. Laws 1895, p. 91, amending Rev. St. 1889, § 2246. The purpose of this enactment is to moderate the hardships resulting from the long continuance of receiverships granted on insufficient grounds, when no review of interlocutory appointments was permissible. The reports of court proceedings in the United States prior to the passage of that act afforded illustrations of the injuries possible from erroneous judicial action in the matter of receiverships, —injuries for which the law seemed to afford no adequate redress. The right to a summary review of an interlocutory order maintaining a receivership is clearly given by the statute cited. It is a valuable and substantial right. The administration of the law must conform to the intent of the legislature in regard to it. Andrews v. National Foundry & Pipe Works (1894) 18 U. S. App. 458, 10 C. C. A. 60, 61 Fed. 782. It is noticeable that a prompt review is allowed by the act of 1895 only where the order continues, not where it dissolves, the receivership. Thus the statute is plainly aimed at the possible abuse of maintaining a receivership (without just grounds) beyond a period required for an investigation of its correctness. If the purpose of the new law is kept in view and effectuated, the procedure in such cases must be shaped so as to permit a speedy review of interlocutory orders appointing receivers in vacation as well as in term. Otherwise such orders, in many parts of Missouri, might stand for nearly half a year without the possibility of even a first review, under the existing law in regard to terms of court. Laws 1892, p. 10, § 30 and following. In other states where statutes allow appeals from interlocutory injunction orders, appointments of receivers, etc., it has been held that the appeals may be taken in vacation as well as in term. Griffin v. Bank (1846) 9 Ala. 201; Montana, etc., Co.

v. Helena, etc., Co. (1887) 6 Mont. 416, 12 Pac. 916; Railroad Co. v. Dykeman (1892) 133 Ind. 56, 32 N. E. 823. Such rulings appear necessary to conform to the plain design of the legislation on that subject. The new provisions in this state most clearly import that persons whose possession is to be invaded by a receivership shall have at least a prompt and full opportunity for a hearing (both preliminary and by appeal) as to the justice and equity of such a drastic remedy. Keeping the purpose of the new statute in mind, how must we regard the orders of the learned circuit judge in the Kerfoot suit? The appointment of the receiver was made without notice to, or any hearing of, the defendants. They had no opportunity to offer the facts which they assert, tending to prove that the demand for any sort of receivership was without foundation. The learned judge's order fixed a time, three months distant, at which they might show cause why the receivership "should not be continued, and the property kept by the said receiver, pending a hearing upon the merits." The details of the order plainly contemplate that meanwhile the railroad was to be operated and managed by the receiver; at least, until the next term of court, then three months off. The receiver was directed, for instance, to perform existing contracts "until the further order of the court." The whole framework of the order suggests that the receivership was established for at least a three-months term. The facts which justify the appointment of a receiver, without notice to the party whose possession is disturbed, are exceptional, at best. Nothing but the plainest showing of an imperative necessity for such an order, to prevent a failure of justice, should move a court to grant a motion to that end, though there is no hard and fast rule, that we can give, prescribing when the discretionary power to make such an order may or may not be used. But of this proposition we feel sure: that under our existing law no temporary receivership can rightly be set up, to last three months, without affording first a hearing to the party whose possession of property is determined by such an order. If the court had been in session, so as to permit immediate application to modify the order, the relief then possible might affect the applicability of a prohibitory writ. But the facts here are different. In vacation, at least, a party should not be obliged to hunt up the judge for a correction of an order made in excess of his power in the premises. The right to appoint a temporary receiver in vacation is limited by the necessity from which alone the right to make such appointment springs. Larsen v. Winder (1896; Wash.) 44 Pac. 123. No court in Missouri may, without notice, declare a receivership, pending suit, for a longer time than is fairly and reasonably requisite to allow the defendant, whose possession is invaded, to show cause against a further continuance of the receivership. What is such reasonable time will depend on the circumstances of each case. But we have no doubt that three months is beyond (and very far beyond) any reasonable day for the showing of cause. The statute allowing appeals from interlocutory receivership orders must be given due force. It contemplates that an early opportunity shall be allowed to combat, and, if desired, to review, the appointment. The courts must yield to that obvious purpose, and permit no receivership to stand without a summary opportunity to review the equity of it. When a judge in vacation deems the exigency sufficiently great to warrant an ex parte order for a receivership of property, such as that in question here, he should by the same order appoint a very early day for the showing of cause against the order by defendants, so that the latter may then have opportunity for the motion to vacate which the statute permits. Our law confers, indeed, power to appoint a receiver in vacation, but it also allows an appeal from an order refusing to vacate an interlocutory appointment. A reasonable construction of the latter act would appear to permit in vacation a motion to revoke the appointment in vacation; otherwise one of the chief remedial objects of the appeal statute on this subject would be frustrated. It has been held by some courts that a power to do a certain judicial act out of term implies a power to undo that act, if justice appears to require that move. Railroad Co. v. Sloan (1877) 31 Ohio St. 1; Walters v. Trust Co. (1892) 50 Fed. 316. We hold that the learned judge's order in the case on the circuit was in excess of the limitations on the power of appointment without notice, which we think the law imposes by the clearest implication.

4. But another patent infirmity is noticeable in the proceedings in question. Had the first order fixed a reasonable date to show cause against it, the question of the jurisdictional validity of the second order (the order to the sheriff) would demand serious attention. That order was made after the refusal of the superintendent of the new Kennett road to surrender possession to the receiver. The petition itself gave notice that the property over which the receivership was sought to be established was in possession of the new company by virtue of the alleged consolidation. The old Kennett Company and its directors were parties defendant in the petition. The new company was not a party to it, for the list of directors shows that only the old company was pointed out as defendant. The receivership asked of and granted by the court reached for the property of the old Kennett Company, and of the Pemiscot Railroad Company. The directions to the receiver exhibit that meaning of the order quite clearly. Then it was evidently beyond the power of the learned judge to order a seizure of property in the possession of the new company without at least giving the latter an opportunity to show cause against the proposed order. By that order the learned judge virtually decided that the transfer to the new company was invalid, and the union of the two old companies merely nominal. That ruling was made without any but an ex parte hearing, as against a stranger to the case in court. The order to the sheriff was in the nature of a writ of assistance, as known to the chancery practice. Such a writ could not rightly be issued, even on a final decree (and, for stronger reason, not upon an ex parte interlocutory order), as against one not a party to the suit, without a chance to the latter to show cause against the order therefor. People v. Rogers (1830) 2 Paige, 103; Howard v. Railroad Co. (1879) 101 U. S. 848; State v. Ball (1892) 5 Wash. 387, 31 Pac. 975. The summary writ, issued from another county, to seize the property and deliver it to the receiver, was beyond the jurisdiction of the learned judge, so far as it concerned or affected the rights of the new Kennett Company; and, as to the latter company, the effect of the writ should be checked by the prohibition now invoked.

5. The fact that no objection was made on the circuit to the want of jurisdiction is no barrier to a prohibition, where the order complained of was entered in vacation, ex parte, and the defect of jurisdiction appears on the face of the papers. Nor can the want of an exception to the objectionable order have any weight where no opportunity to except was had by reason of the ex parte nature of the order.

6. Assuming that the learned judge was without jurisdiction to require the immediate delivery of the property of the new Kennett Company to the receiver without a hearing, then the disobedience of the order by Mr. Houck, as superintendent of that company, involves no contempt. It is always permissible to show, upon process for contempt, that the order disobeyed was beyond the jurisdiction of the authority from which it emanated. If that showing is successfully made, no punishable contempt has been committed. In re Sawyer (1888) 124 U. S. 200, 8 Sup. Ct. 482; Smith v. People (1892) 2 Colo. App. 99, 29 Pac. 924; Schwartz v. Barry (1892) 90 Mich. 267, 51 N. W. 279; State v. Winder (1896; Wash.) 44 Pac. 125.

7. It is insisted by the plaintiffs in this court that the action of the learned circuit judge was void because the appointee named as custodian of the property could not lawfully be appointed receiver of their railway line. The constitution declares that: "No railroad or other corporation, or the lessees, purchasers or managers of any railroad corporation, shall * * * in any way control, any railroad corporation owning or having under its control a parallel or competing line; nor shall any officer of such railroad corporation act as an officer of any other railroad corporation owning or having the control of a parallel or competing line. The question whether railroads are parallel or competing lines shall, when demanded, be decided by a jury, as in other civil issues." Const. 1875, art. 12, § 17. Two sections of the statute law, in furtherance of the purpose of the organic law quoted, are as follows: "It shall be unlawful for any railroad company, corporation or individual owning, operating or managing any railroad in the state of Missouri, to enter into any contract, combination or association, * * * or in any way whatever to any degree exercise control over, any railroad company, corporation or individual owning or having under his or their control or management a parallel or competing line in this state, but each and every such railroad, whether owned, operated or managed by a company, corporation or individual, shall be run, operated and managed separately by its own officers and agents, and be dependent for its support on its own earnings from its local and through business in connection with other roads, and the facilities and accommodations it shall afford the public for travel and transportation under fair and open competition." Rev. St. 1889, § 2569. "It shall be unlawful for any officer of any railroad company or corporation, or any individual owning, operating or managing any railroad in this state as a common carrier, to act as an officer of any other railroad company or corporation owning, operating or managing, or having the control of a parallel or competing line, and the question whether railroads are parallel or competing lines shall be decided by a jury, when so demanded." Id. § 2570. At various points in the state statutes concerning railroads, receivers are mentioned among other managing operators of such lines. Rev. St. 1889, §§ 2631, 2644, 2645. So that it is obvious that the president of a parallel or competing railroad, however high his business qualifications, is not eligible to appointment as receiver of the competing railway line, in Missouri. The fact is alleged in this court that Mr. Fordyce is the president of the Cotton Belt Route, and that it is a railway in competition with the new Kennett road. The fact stands admitted by the pleadings here, in their present form. But, to make it available as the groundwork of a prohibition, the fact should appear in some way in the proceedings on the circuit. It does not appear in the record of those proceedings. Nor does it appear that the learned circuit judge was aware of the fact when the appointment was made. Hence we are not called upon to say whether or not the fact would furnish of itself a cause to prohibit the execution of the order of appointment.

8. The summary order for the seizure of the property in possession of the new Kennett road was, we think, in excess of the rightful power of the learned circuit judge in vacation. We hence consider that the rule in prohibition should be made absolute, and direct that judgment for a peremptory writ be entered, prohibiting the circuit judge from enforcing any order heretofore made in the Kerfoot case, under which said receiver has taken possession, or is attempting to take possession, of some part of the railway or other property of the St. Louis, Kennett & Southern Railroad Company, or of the Pemiscot Railroad Company, and prohibiting him from making any order (upon the pending petition of said Kerfoot in said cause) directing or permitting any receiver to take possession of any property of said companies without first allowing the present St. Louis, Kennett &

Southern Railroad Company an opportunity to be duly heard; and by the writ the said receiver will be prohibited from attempting to take or hold possession of any property of said railroad companies by virtue of said order, and the receiver will further be ordered to restore forthwith any and all property of the new Kennett road that may be in his possession by reason of his said receivership.

CHILDERS et al. v. NEELY.

(34 S. E. 828, 47 W. Va. 70.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Nov. 28, 1899.

Appeal from circuit court, Tyler county; R. H. Freer, Judge.

Bill by J. M. Childers and another against S. H. Neely. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. L. Blackmarr, for appellant. Robert McEldowney and G. M. McCoy, for appellees.

BRANNON, J. Childers and Ramey filed a bill in equity in the circuit court of Tyler against Neely, praying that a partnership between them be dissolved, an account taken "of all its accounts, dealings, and transactions whatever," and that a manager be appointed to take charge of the property. The business was oil production. Neely admitted the joint enterprise, but denied the partnership; and he joined in request for account, and did not resist a dissolution, if a partnership. The decrees made a partial account, decreed its balance against Neely, and denied him further participation in the partnership, and he appealed.

This case raises an interesting and important subject in this mining state; that is, whether, and when, joint tenants or tenants in common, jointly operating for oil, are partners, or merely co-owners. The bill asserts a partnership, while Neely denies it; asserting that it is a case, not of partnership, but co-ownership.

In two leases of town lots for oil and gas purposes, Childers owned a one-fourth interest; Ramey, a three-eighths interest; Neely, a three-eighths interest. They were so far joint tenants. They agreed to develop the lots for oil, but made no written articles of partnership,—in fact, no oral express formation of a partnership. They simply, by an indefinite understanding, agreed to develop their common property, each giving his skill, paying his share of outlay proportionate to his ownership, and getting his share of the product proportioned to such ownership. I use the word "product," instead of "profits," because there was no contract explicit on this point to distinguish product from profit. "Partnership must be distinguished from joint management of property owned in common. Where two partners own a chattel, and make a profit by the use of it, they are not partners, without some special agreement which makes them so." T. Pars. Partn. § 76. Two heirs or other co-owners of a farm, jointly farming it for profit, are not partners. There is a peculiar partnership, called a "mining partnership," partaking partly of the nature of an ordinary trading or general partnership, on the one hand, and partly of a tenancy in common, on the other. It is an important question to those engaged in the oil and other mining business whether each one is jointly and severally liable for all the doings of every or any other of the associates in the venture, as in ordinary trading partnerships. What is a mining partnership? 15 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 609, says: "When tenants in common of a mine unite and co-operate in working it, they constitute a mining partnership." Many authorities there cited thus define it. See the California case of Skillman v. Lachman, 83 Am. Dec. 96, and note discussing it fully; Lamar's Ex'r v. Hale, 79 Va. 147. Mere co-working makes them partners, without special contract. Barring. & A. Mines & M. Courts of equity take jurisdiction of them as if general partnerships. 2 Colly. Partn. c. 35. Of course, owners of mines, oil leases, or farms can by agreement make an ordinary partnership therein; but "where tenants in common of mines or oil leases or lands actually engage in working the same, and share, according to the interest of each, the profit and loss, the partnership relation subsists between them, though there is no express agreement between them to be partners or to share profits and loss." Duryea v. Burt, 28 Cal. 569. The presumption in such case would be that of a mining partnership, rather than an ordinary one, in absence of an express agreement forming an ordinary general partnership. Perhaps the case of Bank v. Osborne, 159 Pa. St. 10, 28 Atl. 163, and other cases in that state cited in Bryan, Petroleum & Natural Gas, 283, would justify the inference that the parties operated as tenants in common; but the current of authority elsewhere recognizes the inference of mining partnerships. That state does not recognize such a partnership. Justice Field said in Kahn v. Smelting Co., 102 U. S. 645, 26 L. Ed. 266; "Mining partnerships, as distinct associations, with different rights and liabilities attaching to their members from those attaching to members of ordinary partnerships, exist in all mining communities. Indeed, without them successful mining would be attended with difficulties and embarrassments much greater than at present." One leading distinction between the mining partnership and the general one is that the general one has, as a material element of its membership, the delectus personæ (choice of person), while the other has not. Those forming an ordinary partnership select the persons to form it, always from fitness, worthiness of personal confidence; but we know such is not always or often the case in oil ventures. It is because of this delectus personæ that the law gives such wide authority of one member to bind another by contracts, by notes, and otherwise. One is the chosen agent of the other. Hence, when one member dies or is bankrupt, or sells his interest to a stranger, even to an associate, the partnership is closed, one chosen member is gone, the union broken, because he may have been the chief dependence for success, and the newcomer may be an unacceptable person, who would entail failure upon the firm. In the mining partnership those occurrences make no dissolution, but the others go on; and, in case a stranger has bought the interest of a member, the stranger takes the place of him who sold his interest, and cannot be excluded. If death, insolvency, or sale were to close up vast mining enterprises, in which many persons and large interests participate, it would entail disastrous consequences. From the absence of this delectus personæ in mining companies flows another result, distinguishing them from the common partnership, and that is a more limited authority in the individual member to bind the others to pecuniary liability. He cannot borrow money or execute notes or accept bills of exchange binding the partnership or its members, unless it is shown that he had authority; nor can a general superintendent or manager. They can only bind the partnership for such things as are necessary in the transaction of the particular business, and are usual in such business. Charles v. Eshleman, 5 Colo. 107; Skillman v. Lachman, 83 Am. Dec. 96, and note; McConnell v. Denver, 35 Cal. 365; Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 181; Manville v. Parks, 7 Colo. 128, 2 Pac. 212; Congdon v. Olds, 18 Mont. 487, 46 Pac. 261; Judge v. Braswell, 13 Bush, 67; Waldron v. Hughes, 44 W. Va. 126, 29 S. E. 505. In fact, it is a rule that a nontrading partnership, as distinguished from a trading commercial firm, does not confer the same authority by implication on its members to bind the firm; as, e. g. a partnership to run a theater or other single enterprise only. Pease v. Cole, 53 Conn. 53, 22 Atl. 681; Deardorf's Adm'r v. Thacher, 78 Mo. 128; Smith, Merc. Law, 82; T. Pars. Partn. § 85; Pooley v. Whitmore, 27 Am. Rep. 733. A mining partnership is a nontrading partnership, and its members are limited to expenditures necessary and usual in the particular business. Bates, Partn. § 329. Members of a mining partnership, holding the major portion of property, have power to do what may be necessary and proper for carrying on the business, and control the work, in case all cannot agree, provided the exercise of such power is necessary and proper for carrying on the enterprise for the benefit of all concerned. Dougherty v. Creary, 89 Am. Dec. 116.

These principles settle much of this case. The demurrer was properly overruled, because there was a partnership, and equity only has jurisdiction to settle partnership accounts. 5 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 74; 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1273.

Neely excepted to the commissioner's report of settlement because of the allowance to Ramey of an expenditure advanced by Ramey of $369.75, as excessive, and because for repairs on two boilers without his consent. If the parties were mere joint tenants, consent would be necessary. Ward v. Ward's Heirs, 40 W. Va. 611, 21 S. E. 746, 29 L. R. A. 449. But, being partners, as above stated, a partner has power to order necessary repairs. Besides, Ramey owned a majority interest. The boilers were burnt badly, and it seems that this outlay, though large, is proven, and was necessary and usual in such a business, and, if unattended with other circumstances, would be clearly allowable under principles above stated. The commissioner reports that the injury to the boilers came from neglect of the pumpers; but much evidence tends to show that Ramey, without consent of Neely, removed the boilers off the ground owned by the firm, upon a lease of Ramey and Childers, in which Neely had no interest, and used them with another boiler in boring and operating wells thereon in connection with these wells of the firm, in Neely's absence, and put too much work upon them, with inadequate supply of water, which, likely, by heavy firing, caused the burning of the boilers. If this is so, how can Ramey expect pay for this outlay? Would so serious an injury have occurred to the boilers had this improper use of them not been made? We cannot say so with certainty, but it seems not likely. Ramey has no just claim to be repaid expenditure for repairs caused by himself,—the diversion of the firm property to his own work, from the work of the firm. Losses from neglect of duty or bad faith of a partner, or breach of duty, or breach of a partnership agreement, or improper diversion of its property to purposes foreign to its business, will be charged to him, in accounting. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1217; 1 Colly. Partn. § 312; Story, Partn. § 169; T. Pars. Partn. § 151. Ramey does not deny such use.

The exception for the $239.75 allowed Ramey for three-eighths of expense seems not well taken, and was properly overruled. The commissioner reports that Neely should be allowed nothing for such use of the boilers for business of Childers and Ramey outside the legitimate firm business, yet allows him $100 therefor. We are unable to say that such sum is not correct in amount, and will have to sustain the commissioner as to it.

Neely excepted because the commissioner reported that he was not entitled to any allowance on the claim made by Neely, that by reason of the use of the firm's boilers in boring and operating wells of Childers and Ramey on adjoining leases owned by them, in which Neely was not interested, the two wells of the firm, which had been bored before the others were, and were paying wells, were often shut down and unproductive, while those other wells were going on, and that by reason of want of water and steam, and the inadequacy of the engines to run all the wells, five or six in number, the production of the firm's wells was diminished. The commissioner says that Neely suffered no appreciable injury thereby. If injured at all, it was appreciable, and to be estimated. Ramey states, in short, that Neely was not entitled to a cent on this score. Neely's evidence is distinct that he was there numerous times, and found these two wells still. He swears to a large loss from this cause. He furnishes considerable evidence to sustain him in some loss from this score, and it seems that equity should make some compensation for it. There is evidence that Ramey, when asked why the wells were shut down, said that he had a larger interest in the other wells. Ramey (having bought out Childers' interest, and Neely being absent almost all the time of operation) had sole charge. The commissioner bases his opinion of no injury to Neely from pipe-line reports, which are not before us; but it does seem from the evidence that the firm business was neglected, and loss to it accrued therefrom to an appreciable extent, for which some compensation should be made. It is difficult to say what should be allowed on this account, it being a thing of only approximate estimate; and still it seems an allowance should be made, as Ramey is claiming for outlay, and himself controlled the business.

When this suit was brought, Childers and Ramey obtained in it an injunction enjoining the pipe-line companies transporting the firm's oil from paying Neely for his share of the oil to which he was entitled under his division orders, and enjoining Neely from any further participation in the partnership, and from selling his share of the oil; thus taking from him the wells and their proceeds, and leaving Ramey in sole charge of them. Neely complains that the court refused to dissolve this injunction. His counsel says there was no right to it, as the bill charged no insolvency. The bill, however, did charge that Neely had failed to contribute his part of the expense of the business, and that Ramey and Childers had made large outlays therefor, and that Neely had refused to make settlement, and was largely indebted to his associates from the transactions of the partnership. This justifies the injunction, if the oil of Neely were social assets, as partners, in advancing for expenditures for the partnership, have a lien on partnership property for advances. Skillman v. Lachman, 83 Am. Dec. 109; Duryea v. Burt, 28 Cal. 570; T. Pars. Partn. § 402, note. But this lien is only on partnership property, while distinctly such; for it is the law that if there is a separation or division of the property, or part of it, there is no lien. If two partners consign goods for sale, and direct the consignee to carry the proceeds to the account of each, and it is done, neither partner has any lien on the share of the other in those proceeds, though it would have been otherwise if they had remained part of the common property. 2 Lindl. Partn. § 683; 1 Colly. Partn. § 108, note. Now, these partners agreed to have division orders when they began business (that is, the pipe lines to give each a certificate of his share of the oil committed to them, which was a product of the wells); and this effected a separation of that product, making each one's share his several property, and severing it from the social property, if it was such at any moment. There being no lien, there was no justification for the injunction. It perhaps disabled Neely from paying as the bill demanded of him.

There is another error in the proceeding. The bill demanded a dissolution. It showed abundant cause, and the evidence shows abundant cause, of dissolution. The bill charges that the plaintiffs and Neely made a settlement to a certain date, but that they had been unable to get Neely to make a settlement since then; that he was violent and abusive, had threatened them with violence, and declared he would have nothing more to do with them; that he would not contribute to expenses; that bills remained unpaid; and that because of the unsatisfactory condition of the business, and the "disagreements, dissensions, and disaffections between the partners, the property and business were suffering." The evidence shows these disagreements and dissensions. Thus, it was plain that the business was hopeless of success and prosperity, and the interests of all parties demanded absolute dissolution at the hands of the law. Reconciliation, harmony, and success were utterly beyond hope. 17 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 1104. Therefore the court should have decreed dissolution absolute, and directed an account of the partnership, and wound it up. But it decreed no dissolution, but, on the contrary, suffered the partnership still to subsist, and, indeed, go on in the sole hands and management of Ramey, excluding Neely therefrom, and decreed that the settlement by the commissioner should only apply to its date, leaving it open to future account. The decree perpetuated the injunction, forever prohibiting Neely from participation in the business, and provided that when he should pay $487.15 found due from him, and costs, the injunction should cease. That excellent, very late work, containing the leading late decisions in equity in America and England, the American and English Decisions in Equity, with elaborate notes collecting decisions (volume 5, p. 52), lays down the rule that equity can only entertain jurisdiction for an account when it can make a final decree in the suit: citing Randolph's Adm'x v. Kinney, 3 Rand. 394. That work (page 109) says, "As a general rule, a bill for accounting between partners which does not also seek a dissolution of the partnership will not be maintained;" citing cases,—among them, Coville v. Gilman, 13 W. Va. 314, in which Judge Green fully sustains this position. T. Pars. Partn. § 206; 2 Lindl. Partn. 948. If ever there were cases which, by bill and proof, called for dissolution and final account, not partial, this is one. And, besides the showing of bill and proof, a petition for rehearing alleged that Ramey had sold the boilers. The evidence so shows. This would charge Ramey to credit of Neely. There was partnership property in Ramey's hands. There could only one adequate relief be given,—dissolution, sale of the property entire, and full account. But no provision was made for dissolution, sale, or full account,—only a partial settlement and decree against Neely for the sum found by it. The bill alleged that the property could not be divided in kind. If the injunction applied to property belonging to the firm, on which a lien rested for the other partners, it would be proper to continue it until final account and decree. Robrecht v. Robrecht (this term) 34 S. E. 801. But Neely's share of the oil was his separate property. And I do not see why he should, without cause, be excluded from participation, letting Ramey have sole control. A receiver, impartial between them, was proper, under the circumstances. "If no dissolution is sought, a receiver and manager will not be appointed; but, with a view to a dissolution or winding up, a receiver and manager will be appointed, if there are any such grounds for appointment as are proper in other cases, or if the partners cannot agree to working the mines until sold." Colly. Partn. § 381. Therefore we dissolve the injunction, reverse the decree, overrule the demurrer to the bill, and remand for further proceedings as herein indicated, and further according to principles governing courts of equity in such cases.

FECHHEIMER et al. v. BAUM et al.

Circuit Court, S. D. Georgia, W. D. January
3, 1889.

In equity. Motion for an injunction and appointment of a receiver.

The bill before the chancellor was filed by the plaintiffs, residents and citizens of Ohio, against Baum & Bro., a firm doing business at Toomsboro, Irwinton, and Dublin, in this district, to assert the right to an injunction and the appointment of a receiver given by the law of Georgia. Code, § 3149a. This section provides: "In case any corporation, not municipal, or any trader or firm of traders, shall fail to pay at maturity any one or more matured debts, payment of which has been properly demanded of such debtor and by him refused, and shall be insolvent, it shall be in the power of a court of equity, under a creditors' bill, to which one or more of the creditors who have matured debts unpaid shall be necessary parties, to proceed to collect the assets, real and personal, including choses in action and money, and appropriate the same to the creditors of such traders, firm of traders, or corporation."

The averments of the bill made and sworn to conform to the requirements of the statute in all respects; and so far as they indicate the existence of matured debts due by the defendants to the plaintiffs, the demand for payment, its refusal, and the insolvency of the defendants, the averments are not denied. In addition, the bill alleges other facts not less important to the jurisdiction in equity. They are that on May 21, 1888, the defendants, Baum & Bro., made a statement to Bradstreet's Mercantile Agency, which showed a condition of prosperous solvency upon their part, which statement is appended as an exhibit to the bill; that plaintiffs, in the usual course of business, had knowledge of that statement, believed it to be true, and knew this before their merchandise was sold to the defendants; that the defendants owe $160,000; have made many fraudulent assignments and preferences; that some of these are given to favored creditors, upon the goods of the plaintiffs not yet paid for; that the plaintiffs' debts were created for a large stock of clothing, part of which is yet in possession of the defendants; that the purchase was made by the defendants with the deliberate intention not to pay therefor, and with no reasonable expectation that the defendants would be able to pay; that the sales are void, and that the title did not pass; that the statement made to the Bradstreet's Mercantile Agency as to the standing and condition of the firm was made with intent to deceive the public, and especially the plaintiffs, and was a part of a scheme to defraud creditors who would extend credit; that the fraudulent preferences amount to $70,000,

The prayer is for an injunction and receiver, and that goods purchased by defendants from plaintiffs be kept separate for the benefit of plaintiffs, and for a general judgment, and for general relief. The temporary injunction was granted upon consideration of plaintiffs' bill, and thereupon plaintiffs filed an amendment thereto. This prayed that H. M. Comer & Co., a firm of cotton factors of this district, be made parties; that the preferences to Comer & Co. are void, (they consist of certain mortgages to secure an alleged indebtedness of $35,000, given upon stock worth $43,000;) that in addition to these mortgages the defendants have transferred and assigned to H. M. Comer & Co. notes and accounts in a sum largely in excess of Comer's demand; that on August 22d these accounts were worth $50,000, and plaintiffs charge on information and belief that these transferred choses in action have been increased by other transfers to $75,000; that since the mortgage and preferences were given, the defendants, Baum & Bro., have paid to Comer & Co. $18,000, which reduces their demand to $17,000, and yet Comer & Co. hold as collateral and otherwise in mortgages on real and personal property the full sum of $100,000 to secure this debt. This was stated on the hearing, without objection, to be $24,600, and the chancellor, for the present, assumes that to be correct.

The bill alleges that the transactions between Comer & Co. and the defendants were the result of a fraudulent confederacy to hinder and delay creditors, and to compel them to accept a small pittance in full satisfaction of large debts; that the demands of Comer & Co. should not be paid by the proceeds arising from the sale of the merchandise of plaintiffs and other creditors, not yet paid for; that Comer & Co. had actual notice of the defendants' insolvent condition at the time of certain payments made to them from such proceeds. The amendment further alleges that, prior to the insolvency of the defendants, or at some other time, Comer & Co. obtained from the defendants an agreement in writing that when the defendants should become weak or insolvent that they would execute and make to Comer & Co. a mortgage covering their entire property, and should assign to them all of their notes, accounts, and choses in action; that said mortgages and preferences were given in pursuance of said agreement; that Comer & Co. permitted the defendants to retain possession of the notes and accounts and choses in action transferred to him; that the large amount of assets in the hands of Comer & Co., over and above their lawful demand, will be sacrificed to the injury of plaintiffs; that the defendants bought a large stock of goods on credit, with the intention not to pay for them, and to defraud creditors. The prayer is that Comer & Co. be required to produce the said agreement on the hearing, and that they be enjoined from proceeding to foreclose the mortgage or mortgages, and that they be enjoined from collecting the notes and accounts, or from any way interfering with the assets of the defendants, and that a receiver be appointed to take charge of all such assets for the benefit of the creditors. The bill expressly waives discovery.

In reply to the motion for injunction, etc., the defendants Baum & Bro. deny, in their answers, that plaintiffs' debt was contracted after the financial statement was made; that they gave the statement of the 21st of May, yielding to the solicitation of the Bradstreet Company; that there were no mortgages or liens at the time the statement was made; that the statement appended to the bill itself is erroneous; that their dealings have been honorable and successful up to the time of this failure; that their failure is a thoroughly honest failure; that they have not made any preference upon which suspicion or doubt can be cast as to its entire good faith; that their creditors have given uniform evidence of their entire and unabated confidence in the defendants' integrity; that they have paid large amounts to their creditors, and have drawn out nothing from their business except for the necessary support of their families; that the mortgages were given to secure bona fide debts; and that, if a receiver is appointed, the loss in winding up the business will be so great that the creditors will get nothing.

H. M. Comer makes answer by affidavit. He states that on the 10th day of March, 1888, he took the agreement to the court shown, which was referred to in the bill. This had been done every year previously. It was taken in entire good faith, to protect the advances that deponent made. He gave the creditors knowledge of it on the 3d of December, and never attempted to conceal it. He denies utterly fraud and confederacy. That in his preferences defendants reserved no right or benefit to themselves. He never had any reason to suspect fraud on the part of the defendants. That in the spring and summer of 1888, before he knew defendants were embarrassed, they sent to him notes and accounts of the face value of $43,263.45, as collateral for about $27,000 then due. These notes and accounts he sent to the defendants to collect for him. This collateral was more valuable than that obtained in November. Then the debt was increased, and Comer & Co. took by transfer the notes and accounts referred to. Another affidavit was presented by H. M. Comer. It recites that his firm are cotton factors and commission merchants in the city of Savannah; that they have been the factors of Baum & Bro. and Baum & Co., the defendants, for five years; that they would make advancements in the spring and summer with the understanding that they were to be paid off in the fall and winter; that the business has been large, and the statement taken from his books is attached. It shows an indebtedness of $43,078.23, subject to credits from Baum & Bro.; also amounts due by the concerns at Dublin and Irwinton, all subject to a credit of 521 bales of cotton, which, estimated at $38 per bale, leaves Baum & Bro. indebted to H. M. Comer & Co. $24,661.07. This indebtedness is secured by a mortgage on real and personal property, dated November 13, 1888, by a mortgage on the personalty, dated November 17, 1888, by certain notes and accounts transferred by the Baums to deponent's firm. This security was given for the sole purpose of securing the debt. He denies that the charges of the bill were true.

Upon the hearing, several creditors were made parties plaintiff by intervention, among them, H. P. Clafin & Co., New York, whose debt is $11,986.16; A. Gibian, about $1,600; S. Wixelbaum; Culver, Moore & Culver and others. On the hearing plaintiffs put in evidence this statement of Baum & Bro. to their creditors, made December 3d, which is as follows:

"States: Began business in 1875 in a small way, and have been quite successful. As per inventory taken January 15, 1888, our status is as follows: Stock of merchandise, nineteen thousand dols.; bonds and stocks, par value, twenty-one thousand dollars; market value, twelve thousand dollars; notes and accounts, thirty-five thousand dollars; real estate, town property and lands, ten thousand dollars; making total assets of the firm, seventy-six thousand dollars. Liabilities: Borrowed money for the year 1888, twenty-four thousand dollars; mercantile and other indebtedness, twelve thousand dollars; total liabilities, thirty-six thousand dollars. Net: Forty thousand dollars. We have a branch store at Irwinton, Ga. The business there is run under the style of 'Baum & Co.' Stock on hand there, two thousand dollars; notes and accounts, four thousand dollars; cash, five hundred dollars; total, six thousand five hundred dollars; and owe three thousand dollars. After allowing for shrinkages, bad debts, etc., consider ourselves worth fully thirty thousand dollars, over liabilities. There are no mortgages or liens on any of our property, either real or personal. Our stock is insured for thirteen thousand dollars; fixtures, two thousand dollars. When we borrow money from banks we deposit our bonds and stocks as security. From our cotton factors we borrow on farmers' notes as collateral, give no other security. Do an annual business of seventy-five to eighty-five thousand dollars. In addition to the above we sell 5 or 6 hundred tons of fertilizers per annum, which we buy outright. Give notes for the same, payable in fall. To only one company do we give farmers' notes as collateral. At this point we cleared ten thousand dollars on guano alone.

"The Mercantile News Agency states: We learn they carry an average stock of about fifteen thousand dollars, and do a large business, sell largely on credit, and consequently have considerable due them. Said to borrow considerable money to use in their business, and generally put up planters' notes as collateral. They are reputed to own real estate worth five to eight thousand dols. Would be difficult to give correct estimate of their net worth, but it is the general belief that the firm is estimated worth fully twenty thousand dollars, or more. They are of good character, and steady habits, and of fine business ability. Appear to do nearly all the business that is done at this point, and are generally prompt in meeting their obligations, and are quoted in good credit.

R. W. Patterson, one of the solicitors for the plaintiffs, testifies that he was present at the meeting of defendants' creditors on December 3, 1888. Baum offered to unsecured creditors 12½ per cent. of their claims in 30 days' time, and 12½ per cent. additional in 12 months, neither secured. Subsequently inquiry was made by Mr. H. M. Comer if the offer would be accepted if he (Comer) would guaranty the first 12½ per cent. Some of the creditors, and among them the plaintiffs, declined to accept. C. H. Cohen, attorney for H. P. Clafin, testified that on November 23d he called on the defendants at Toombsboro; that N. B. Baum told him that he had been under contract to Mr. Comer for some time to give the Comers a mortgage whenever they demanded it, and he felt compelled to, do as he had previously agreed, which deponent understood was to give the mortgage upon all his assets, including the goods that deponent's clients had but recently sold him. This witness proves the account of H. P. Claflin & Co. in the sum of $11,986.16.

R. W. Patterson, J. W. Lindsay, and C. H. Cohen testify that they heard H. M. Comer state before the meeting of creditors that he had an agreement with N. B. Baum, of the defendants, to the effect that Baum would execute a mortgage to him upon whatever assets he had, and that on this agreement Comer had made him advances, and that the agreement had been in force for as much as a year prior to that time. Deponents further say that they heard N. B. Baum, at the creditors' meeting, state that he was insolvent at the time he made his statement to Bradstreet's agency, in May of the present year, although he did not know it at the time.

C. A. Turner testified by affidavit that, after the deputy-marshal had closed the store of the defendants at Toombsboro, he heard N. B. Baum say in a conversation with deponent that he had in his possession the notes, accounts, and assets of Baum & Bro. and Baum & Co., which had prior to that time been turned over to H. M. Comer & Co., of Savannah. The bills for most of the plaintiffs' goods sold to Baum were dated on August 6th, August 10th, August 13th, and a renewal note was taken on October 9, 1888. It was shown by the evidence that this was the manner in which the goods were sold: The traveling agent of the plaintiff took the order in July, subject to ratification by the house, on inquiry as to solvency. This inquiry was made to Bradstreet. The goods were not shipped unless the reply was satisfactory. The sales were not completed until the goods were sent.

For the defendants the following evidence was submitted: The agreement entered into between N. B. Baum & Bro. and Baum & Co. and H. M. Comer & Co., dated March 10, 1888. It recites that for and in consideration of certain advances to the amount of $18,000, as evidenced by five promissory notes for $3,200 each, signed by N. B. Baum & Bro., and indorsed by Baum & Co., and payable at the office of Comer & Co., as follows, respectively, on September 15th, October 1st, November 1st, and November 10th; and one note for $2,000, signed by Baum & Co., and indorsed by Baum & Bro., due October 20th next. "Now, in order to secure these and any other sum that may hereafter be due them, we agree to deposit with them as collateral security, notes and mortgages of good planters and others to whom we sell goods, in amount equal to at least two dollars for every one dollar due by us to the said Comer & Co. We also agree to transfer to them as additional security our insurance policies on our buildings and stocks of goods; and we further obligate and bind ourselves to give said H. M. Comer & Co. a first lien or mortgage upon all our stocks of goods and real estate, in case we shall at any time become financially embarrassed while indebted in any way to them, or in case our said notes above described are not paid promptly at maturity. It is also understood and agreed that all drafts drawn, or money advanced upon account or otherwise, over and above the eighteen thousand dollars herein named, shall be paid out of the proceeds of cotton shipments first and before said proceeds are to be applied to said notes; in other words, only credit balances as may appear from open account are to be paid on said notes unless by consent of said H. M. Comer & Co. in writing. It is understood and agreed that 8 per cent. per annum will be charged on all advances, etc. [Signed] N. B. Baum & Bro., and N. B. Baum & Co."

The mortgage dated the 17th day of November, to secure the payment of $38,000, including the five notes before mentioned and three other notes for $5,000 each, dated October 12, 1888, and due at various dates until December 10, 1888, and one note for $5,000, due January 12, 1889, and one note dated March 10, 1888, for $2,000, signed by Baum & Co., indorsed by Baum & Bro., payable October 20, 1888, upon 150 half rolls of bagging, 100 bundles cotton ties, 100 sacks salt, all in the planters' warehouse at Dublin; and also all goods, merchandise, dry goods, groceries, etc., stored in the store of L. C. Perry & Co., at Dublin, Ga.; also, a mortgage made 13th of November, 1888, to secure $30,000, being apparently the same notes just mentioned, and given upon certain lots of land situated in Toombsboro, and upon which is erected store-houses; and also certain stocks of general merchandise in said store, describing them particularly; and also all such articles and things as may be hereafter placed in such stock; also the stock in the store at Dublin, more particularly describing it, with the same provision as to future acquisitions; also a lot of land, one-half acre in Irwinton, with store-house thereon, and also the stock of goods therein contained. The mortgages comprehend all the safes, show-cases, and fixtures of every kind in said three stores. Numerous affidavits were presented as to the policy or impolicy of granting the prayer of the bill for the appointment of a receiver, and an affidavit to sustain the good character of H. M. Comer.—in the opinion of the court a deposition altogether superfluous. Other portions of the testimony are not material or necessary to the proper determination of the cause. After a full hearing and exhaustive argument on Friday last the court took time to consider, and has reached the following conclusions:

SPEER, J. (after stating the facts as above). Baum & Bro. and Baum & Co., two firms composed of the same individuals, are traders, in the meaning of the statute of this state quoted above. That they are insolvent it is conceded. The plaintiffs are creditors, whose demands, as the court is at present advised, are within the class provided for in the statute above quoted, (Code Ga. § 3149a,) giving, in certain cases, the equitable right to the extraordinary remedies applied for. This right of the creditor to put the debtor's assets, when the latter is an insolvent trader, in the hands of a receiver, is peculiar to the law of this state. It has no existence in the general jurisprudence of equity which obtain in these courts. It is now settled, however, that the courts of the United States may administer an equitable right granted by the law of the state in suits of which, from other reasons, they have jurisdiction. It was urged in argument for the defendant that the creditors, without a judgment at law, have no right to apply in equity for the appointment of a receiver. That this is a general rule in undeniable, but there are exceptions to it, and one of these exceptions of apparently clear distinctness is where the law-making power has enacted in terms that the debt need only be mature, with payment demanded and refused, as is the law in Georgia. It is true, also,—as held in this circuit, in Jaffrey v. Brown (C. C.) 29 Fed. 477,—that a party not intending to pay, by inducing one to sell him goods on credit through the fraudulent concealment of his insolvency and of his intent not to pay for them, is guilty of a fraud, which entitles the vendor, if no innocent third party has acquired an interest in them, to disaffirm the contract, and recover the goods. See also, Crittenden v. Coleman, 70 Ga. 295; Donaldson v. Farwell, 93 U. S. 633; note to Jaffrey v. Brown (C. C.) 29 Fed. 485. and authorities cited. The remedy at law must be quite as complete as that in equity to defeat the power of equity to proceed. Id.

The demurrer filed to the bill, while not finally overruled, is not deemed sufficient, as the court is at present advised, to defeat the relief sought by the bill, should that relief be granted. The chancellor has given very anxious thought and careful inquiry to the ascertainment of his duty in the premises. It is true that the prayers of the bill seek to obtain perhaps the most vigorous and far-reaching action in the power of the court—action which should not be taken in cases of this character, except in the presence of plain fraud or irreparable injury. On the other hand, the statements of the defendants themselves show the most utter insolvency, and a failure to comply with their duty to their creditors, which evinces either negligence of the most flagrant character, or fraud scarcely less marked and decided. Upon the 21st of May, whatever may have been the motive which led to the publication, it is undeniable that the defendants gave to the mercantile community, by means of a usual and widely known commercial news agency, a statement which shows remarkable solvency, and indeed prosperity, for their section of the country. "Our total assets," they said, "are seventy-six thousand dollars; our liabilities, thirty-six thousand dollars, net. After allowing for shrinkages, bad debts, and so forth, we consider ourselves worth fully thirty thousand dollars over liabilities, etc. There are no mortgages or liens on our property, either real or personal. Our stock is insured for thirteen thousand dollars. When we borrow money from bank we deposit our bonds and stocks as security. When we borrow money from our factors we give farmers' notes as collateral; give no other security." In a little more than six months we find this firm in debt $150,903.44, with total assets of $83,926.19, leaving debts to the amount $66,976.25, altogether hopeless. In other words, in a half year there had been a change for the worse in their condition of nearly $100,000,—if their respective statements to Bradstreet's and to their creditors is reliable. For this startling transformation of their condition they offer neither explanation nor excuse. There had been no disaster from flood or fire, no epidemic, none of those extraordinary circumstances which at times cause the stoutest business houses to tremble. In May there is an indebtedness of thirty-six thousand, in December a debt of one hundred and fifty thousand. In May there are neither liens nor mortgages, in December they approximate seventy thousand dollars. In the spring creditors were assured of prompt payment, in the fall they are met by hopeless insolvency; and yet the court is asked to consider this an innocent and unavoidable failure, and this, too, in the absence of a syllable of proof to account for it. What makes it more remarkable is that the business was conducted in quiet villages, and among a rural population, where all legitimate trade was marked by careful purchases and conservative transactions; where every purchaser is personally known to the merchant,—his solvency and disposition or ability to pay debts as familiar as household words. But this is not all. In the proclamation of Baum & Bro. to the business community of the country, they say "there are no mortgages or liens upon our property." At that moment it was all incumbered with a secret obligation which a court of equity in a proper case would declare to have all the effect of a mortgage. In less than six months every cent's worth of their stock or other assets, whether paid for or not, is shingled with mortgages, made in pursuance of that covert stipulation. In the presence of such facts as these it would seem futile to urge upon the court the considerations of business capacity and business integrity and mercantile popularity, which form so large a part of the defendants' showing. "We give to our factors no security save farmers' notes." As that public pledge was being made their contract was in existence, not only to give two dollars for one, in notes and choses in action, for every dollar obtained from their factors, but to give mortgages which are undeniably other and very different security. "Our stock is insured for $13,000," said they to Bradstreet's,—they did not say the policies had been pledged to H. M. Comer & Co., and out of the reach of other creditors.

It would seem superfluous to analyze the widely variant statements of the defendants, and it requires no elaborate inquiry to ascertain the law controlling the rights of the parties with such facts before the court. The statutes of the state are sufficiently explicit. Suppression of a fact material to be known, and which the party is under an obligation to communicate, constitutes fraud. The obligation to communicate may arise from the confidential relations of the parties, or the peculiar circumstances of the case. Code Ga. § 3175. Can it be doubted that the fact that the defendants were under a written obligation to execute mortgages upon their entire stock and all their other property, was "material to be known" by those giving them credit? Can it be doubted that when the Baums undertook to give to Bradstreet's, for the information of the business world, a statement of their assets, liabilities, and methods of borrowing money, that the obligation was upon them to communicate the truth? Will the most credulous believe for a moment that Fechheimer & Co. would have given them credit for $4,000; that Clafin & Co. would have given them credit for $11,000,—had they known the existence and the nature of their obligation to Comer? We think not. The statements of such mercantile agencies as Bradstreet's are intended to influence the action of merchants and others who give credit. It is well understood that the mercantile community relies largely upon such statements, and the persons giving them are under the weightiest obligation, which will be enforced in foro conscientia, to speak the truth. If there has been deliberate suppression of a vital fact in a statement of this character, which does mislead, it is a fraud upon the person misled, which a court of equity will redress, if possible. Again, "misrepresentation of a material fact, made willfully to deceive, or recklessly without knowledge, and acted on by the opposite party, or, if made by mistake, and innocently, and acted on by the opposite party, constitutes legal fraud." Code Ga. § 3174. See, also, section 2634.

Now, it appears from the evidence of Messrs. Patterson, Lindsay, and Cohen that N. B. Baum admitted in their presence and hearing that he was insolvent at the time the statement to Bradstreet was made, although he there asserted a net worth, above all liabilities and doubtful assets, of fully $30,000, but that he did not then know his insolvent condition.

Conceding, therefore, that this statement was honest, it is none the less fraudulent in contemplation of these provisions of the Code. It follows that, even in the absence of the insolvent traders' act, before quoted, the plaintiffs would be entitled to the relief they seek if it can be made to appear that there is a prospect of redressing their wrongs thereby. Much more, then, are they so entitled under the provisions of that act. It is said, however, for the defendants, that the liens created by Baum & Bro. to Comer and others will exhaust the assets, and that the unsecured creditors can get nothing through the action of a receiver, however vigilant he may be. But the defendants themselves admit that the assets amount to about $86,000 more than the preferences he has given. It is true that he states that $72,310.54 of notes and accounts are worthless and doubtful, but the court is not inclined to accept this statement as final. It would be very remarkable if his doubtful debts in December should be as much as his total assets in May. A diligent receiver will collect many of those claims, or the court will know the reason why. Besides, by the same statement there is a balance of $14,300.39 to be divided among the unsecured creditors. This is itself no mere bagatelle. We have known original suits to be brought for less. But perhaps more important than either of these is the fact that Comer & Co., who only claim $24,671.07 as the sum of their demands against the Baums, have now in their possession $50,000 worth of good notes and accounts, and mortgages on $49,000 worth of property consisting of merchandise and other personalty and certain realty. However valid may be the demand of Comer & Co., when it is paid they will not be permitted to retain a dollar in excess of their proven claims. It is true that by the law of Georgia, section 1953, "a debtor may prefer one creditor to another, and to that end he may bona fide give a lien by mortgage or other legal means, or he may sell in payment of the debt, or he may transfer negotiable papers as collateral security, the surplus in such cases not to be reserved for his own benefit or that of any other favored creditor, to the exclusion of other creditors." The large surplus conveyed to Comer & Co. to secure their debt they hold as trustees for the creditors of the defendants, the Baums. Besides, the balance which Comer & Co. present is ascertained by estimating more than 500 bales of cotton shipped to them at $38 a bale. They have turned over notes and accounts of the insolvent firm to one of its members for collection. This will not be permitted. The insolvent debtor who has failed under such circumstances is not the best custodian for convertible assets of this character.

This investigation has satisfied the court that this is a suit where it is manifestly the duty of the chancellor to make the orders prayed for. A receiver will be appointed, and an injunction granted. Comer & Co., who are now formally made parties defendant to the bill, will be required to make proof of their account, and if found just and true and a valid lien, as it now appears to be, it will be paid in full if the funds are sufficient. This is true of other debts of superior dignity, and the remainder of the fund in the hands of Comer & Co. and elsewhere within the reach of the court will be apportioned to the creditors. The court will appoint receivers of undoubted qualifications, who will at once take possession of the assets of the insolvent firm, and as fast as collected pay the funds into the registry of the court, and the cause will proceed with the utmost expedition.

OGDEN CITY v. BEAR LAKE & RIVER
WATERWORKS & IRRIGA-TION CO. et al.

(55 Pac. 385, 18 Utah, 279.)

Supreme Court of Utah. Dec. 5, 1898.

Appeal from district court, Salt Lake county; Ogden Hiles, Judge.

Action by Ogden City against the Bear Lake & River Waterworks & Irrigation Company, Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company appeals. Modified.

Bennett, Harkness, Howat, Bradley & Richards and Rogers & Johnson, for appellant. E. M. Allison, Jr., C. C. Richards, and J. H. Macmillan, for respondents.

ZANE, C. J. This is an appeal by the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company, a defendant, from the order of the court below approving the report of Thomas D. Dee, receiver, and allowing the various items thereof, and ordering them to be paid out of funds in his hands. As to the motion of plaintiff to dismiss this appeal for the reason, as alleged, the order appealed from was not a final judgment, we are of the opinion the order requiring the compensation to the receiver and I. N. Pierce, and the payment to Griffin and the Ogden Standard, out of funds in the receiver's hands, was final, and therefore appealable, and we therefore overrule it.

It appears from the record that Mr. Dee was appointed receiver pendente lite of the waterworks system in Ogden City on January 17, 1898, on the application of plaintiff, Ogden City; that he immediately qualified and took possession and charge of the system and its buildings, and managed and operated it until April 20, 1898; that the order appointing him receiver was reversed by this court, with directions to the lower court to order a return of the property to the appellant, which was done; that on April 27, 1898, Dee filed his report as such receiver, showing a collection of water rents to the amount of $11,247.07, and that he had disbursed $1,266.45 for labor, $148.53 for material, and $90.50 for general expenses, and, in addition, he asked the court to allow him $750 out of the funds as compensation as receiver; and to I. N. Pierce, as inspector, $219.30; and S. G. Griffin, for a stamp, $3.25; and the Ogden Standard, for advertising, $14.00. To the allowance of these last four items the appellant objected, and it assigns the order of the court allowing them and ordering their payment out of the fund as error.

That the compensation to the receiver and to Griffin were customary and reasonable for their time and services, and that the charges for the stamp and publication were reasonable, no question is made. The sole question is, was it error to order their payment out of the fund? It appears the receiver was appointed on the application of the plaintiff, and over the objections of the appellant, and that it would not have been necessary to incur the items of compensation to the receiver, or to Mr. Pierce, or for the stamp or publication, had the property remained in appellant's hands and the business under its control. The appellant was wrongfully deprived of the possession of its property, and of the control of its business without its consent, upon the petition of the plaintiff. It would be inequitable to require the appellant to pay the extra expense of conducting its business caused by the erroneous order obtained by the plaintiff. We understand the rule supported by the weight of authority is that when a receiver is appointed on the application of one of the parties, and takes possession, and the appointment is afterwards set aside because erroneous, and the property is returned, all expenses incurred in consequence of the appointment, additional to those that would have been necessary had the property remained with such opposite party, ought not to be paid out of the fund, but by the party at whose instance the appointment was made. The expenses incurred by the receiver that would have been necessary for the appellant to incur had it remained in the possession of its property, and in the control of its business, were properly paid out of the fund, but such as it would not have been necessary for it to incur should be charged to the party procuring the order. Such expenses should be regarded as incurred in consequence of an error at his instance. Weston v. Watts, 45 Hun, 219; City of St. Louis v. St. Louis Gaslight Co., 11 Mo. App. 237; Bank v. Bayne, 140 N. Y. 321, 35 N. E. 630; Moyers v. Coiner, 22 Fla. 422; French v. Gifford, 31 Iowa, 428.

We hold that so much of the order appealed from was erroneous as authorized compensation to the receiver and to I. N. Pierce, and the items for a stamp and for the publication of notice, out of the fund. Such expenses should have been taxed against the plaintiff. The remainder of the order is affirmed. The cause is remanded to the court below, with directions to tax the expenses in accordance with this opinion, and to so order them paid; costs of appeal to be taxed against plaintiff.

(two cases).

SAME v. BANK OF GREENVILLE et al.
(15 South. 33, 71 Miss. 1009.)

Supreme Court of Mississippi. April 9, 1894.

Appeal from chancery court, Washington county; W. R. Trigg, Chancellor.

Proceedings between George Q. Whitney and the Hanover National Bank and others relative to the funds of the Bank of Greenville. From three adverse decrees, Whitney appeals. Affirmed.

Nugent & McWillie and S. H. King, for appellant. Yerger & Percy, for appellees.

CAMPBELL, C. J. These three cases were argued and submitted together, and will be so considered. Their history is this: The Bank of Greenville was found to be insolvent, and came to a stop, on the 22d day of December, 1891, when the directors, headed by the president, applied, by petition to the chancellor, to take charge of the assets of the bank, by appointing a receiver to collect and manage its affairs. The chancellor appointed the president of the bank receiver, and, on his application, enjoined all persons from proceeding by suit against it. The receiver appointed entered upon his duties as designated, and continued until he resigned, on the 6th of July, 1892. On the 11th July, 1892, the Hanover National Bank and other creditors of the Bank of Greenville exhibited their bill, in the chancery court in which the receiver had been appointed, against the Bank of Greenville, and averred the foregoing facts, and that since the 22d December, 1891, the officers and directors of the bank had ceased to manage it, and that its affairs had been managed wholly by Pollock, as receiver, who had collected a large sum of money due said bank, and that the appointment of another receiver was necessary for the preservation of the assets of the bank and the protection of the rights of its creditors; with other specific allegations, designed to show the necessity for the immediate appointment of a receiver. Upon due notice to the defendant a receiver was appointed in this proceeding on the 18th July, 1892, and the former receiver was directed to deliver to him all the assets of the bank in his hands. On July 23, 1892, George Q. Whitney and others, creditors of the Bank of Greenville, united in a bill against the bank and G. D. Thomas, who had qualified and was acting as receiver by virtue of his appointment on July 18th, and against other defendants, in said chancery court. This bill set forth the suspension of the bank on the 22d December, 1891, and the appointment by the chancellor of Pollock as receiver on the application of the president and directors of the bank, and that Pollock took exclusive control of all the assets of the bank, and acted as receiver, but that defendant Thomas, at the time of exhibiting said bill, claimed to be receiver of said bank by virtue of an appointment by the chancellor of said court; that the application to the chancellor on December 22, 1891, and all the proceedings had, including the procurement of the appointment of Thomas as receiver, were devices to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors, and "invalid and void." Discovery was sought by the bill as to all the assets of the bank, of whatever kind, and a lien upon them prayed to be established from the date of filing the bill, and their appropriation to the demands of the complainants. The Bank of Greenville interposed a plea to this bill of the proceeding by the Hanover National Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, and the appointment in that case of Thomas as receiver, and that he had qualified as such, and was in possession of the assets of the bank under that appointment, and relied on this plea as a bar to the bill filed 23d July, 1892. The plea was set down for hearing upon its sufficiency, and was sustained, and the bill dismissed. From that decree an appeal was taken, and case No. 7,460 on the docket of this court is that appeal.

On October 4, 1892, George Q. Whitney petitioned the chancery court of Washington county, in which these cases were pending, and which had been consolidated, setting forth that he was a creditor to a large amount of the Bank of Greenville, and had recovered judgment for a large sum against it in the court of the United States at Vicksburg, Miss., July 28, 1892, which had been duly enrolled, and, he claimed, was a paramount lien on all the assets of said bank, notwithstanding all the various proceedings in the said chancery court, which are set forth with detailed particularity, and denounced as void, and no obstacle in law to the application of the assets of the bank to the claim of the petitioner, who prayed to be allowed to be made a party defendant to said cause. At the same time he presented a petition and bond for removal of said cause, in which he prayed to be made a defendant, to the United States court at Vicksburg. The complainants in the cause in which Whitney sought to intervene as a defendant opposed his application, and it was denied by the court, and from this he appealed, and that appeal is contained in No. 7,459 on the docket of this court.

Defeated in his effort to be made a defendant as stated, Whitney made an abortive effort to have the United States court at Vicksburg take charge of his suit, and enforce his claim to be paid out of the assets of the Bank of Greenville in preference to other creditors; but with that we have no concern, and state the fact historically only, being in the record before us. On February 6, 1893, Whitney, who had been baffled in all his efforts to obtain payment as a creditor entitled to precedence out of the assets of the Bank of Greenville, exhibited an original bill in the chancery court of Washington county against the complainants in the bill of the Hanover National Bank and others against the Bank of Greenville, exhibited July 11, 1892, and the Bank of Greenville and W. A. Pollock, receiver, and G. D. Thomas, receiver. In this bill is narrated with detail the history of the dealing by and with the bank from the time of its suspension and taking refuge from creditors in the chancery court to the filing of this bill, which also relates the persistent, but ineffectual, efforts of the complainant, in state and federal courts, to secure recognition of his right, as claimed, to be first paid out of the assets of the Bank of Greenville. It assails the action of the chancery court of Washington county as void for want of jurisdiction over the subject-matter dealt with, and seeks to vacate all orders that stand in his way, and the payment of his as a preferred claim out of the effects of the bank. The bill seeks injunction, which was obtained. This bill was answered, and most of its allegations admitted, but the claim made by it to the right of the complainant to priority of payment out of the assets of the bank was denied. A motion was made to dissolve the injunction, and some affidavits were taken, and some facts were agreed on for the hearing of the motion to dissolve, and it was agreed that the case should be heard on the motion to dissolve, and for final decree on such hearing. The respondents gave notice of a claim for damages to be allowed on dissolution of the injunction to amount of $2,500 for attorney's fees in defense of the suit. The case was heard in accordance with the agreement, and a decree was made dissolving the injunction, dismissing the bill, and awarding damages against the complainant in the sum of $2,000 as attorney's fees, the decree reciting that the court had heard testimony in open court as to the attorney's fees, and taxed the costs against the complainant, who appealed, and this is No. 7,749 of the docket of this court.

From this complete but succinct history of this litigation, as disclosed in voluminous form in the three cases before us, it is apparent that the only question presented for decision by the appeal in No. 7,459 is as to the propriety of the action of the court in refusing to permit Whitney to intervene as a defendant in the case of Hanover National Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, against the objection of the complainants, who protested earnestly against it. The court did right in this refusal. "No such practice is known in equity as making a person a defendant to a suit upon his own application over the objection of the complainant." 1 Daniell, Ch. Pl. & Pr. 287, note 2, and cases cited; Stretch v. Stretch, 2 Tenn. Ch. 140,—where the subject is fully treated, and the action of the court in the case before us is fully vindicated on principle and authority.

The question presented by cases 7,460 and 7,749 is whether the chancery court of Washington county was so wanting in jurisdiction of the case of Hanover National Bank and others exhibited against the Bank of Greenville, July 11, 1892, as to render its action in the case void, and liable to be assailed collaterally, and treated as a nullity, whenever and however called in question; for, if it be conceded that the action of the court was erroneous, unless it was void, the fact that it had assumed jurisdiction, and taken control of the assets of the Bank of Greenville, and appointed a receiver in the case, was an answer to the original bill exhibited by Whitney and others on the 23d July, 1892, and likewise to Whitney's bill of February 6, 1893. We regard the action of the chancellor on the 22d December, 1891, appointing a receiver on the ex parte application of the directors of the bank, and his subsequent action in pursuance of that appointment, as utterly void, and of no legal effect. It could be assailed collaterally, and disregarded with impunity, by anybody. The proposition that an insolvent debtor can take refuge in a chancellor's decree on his or its own application, and obtain protection against pursuing creditors, who may be enjoined from pursuing their ordinary remedies, is without foundation. We cannot account for the mistake fallen into in the proceeding of December 22, 1891, and all that was done under it, except by supposing that what is provided for by statute in other states was considered admissible in the absence of statute in this state. The suit of Hanover Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, instituted July 11, 1892, is evidence of the fact that it was considered necessary to strengthen the grasp of the chancery court on the assets of the bank, and that it was a timely proceeding for the purpose of the complainants in that suit, for it results from what we have said that all that went before was of no legal validity; and, but for that suit, there would have been no barrier to his proper proceeding by any creditor, the injunction issued to the contrary notwithstanding. But, if the court was not wholly without jurisdiction in that suit, it was inadmissible to inject into it other suits, as sought to be done by the bill of July 23, 1892, and that of February 6, 1893.

The question, then, is as to the case of Hanover Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, begun by original bill July 11, 1892. Was the action of the court as to that case void? It is to be observed that the bill in that case is not one to secure any priority or advantage to the complainant in it, to the injury of other creditors, but it is for all creditors of the Bank of Greenville, as shown by its prayer for the appointment of a receiver to preserve and collect the assets, and distribute the money among all the creditors, according to their rights as ascertained. There was no time when Whitney could not join in this suit as a complainant, or assert his right of priority as claimed, if he had chosen to do so; but his persistent effort was to obtain priority over other creditors and secure full payment, if the assets were sufficient; and he was unwilling to make common cause with all creditors, but, asserting the voidness of all the proceedings in the chancery court as to these matters, he sought, as he had a right to do, to obtain precedence as a creditor by getting judgment against the bank, and enforcing it. He got judgment, and, if that entitled him to be paid out of the bank's assets in the hands of the receiver, he might have propounded his claim of priority in the chancery court, and demanded its recognition and payment by an order therefor, but he maintained his attitude of asserting the nullity of all the proceedings in this matter of the chancery court, and attacked them as void; and the maintenance of his bill of February 6, 1893, depends on maintaining the legal proposition on which it rests. His learned counsel has been not only persistent, but consistent, in the many methods employed to obtain for his client an advantage over other creditors. It remains to be stated whether or not he shall succeed in securing the reward of his industry in behalf of his client. By his bill of February 6, 1893, he has pursued the proper course to obtain an adjudication of the question on which the claim made by his client depends. This bill attacks the validity of the proceedings in the chancery court in the case of Hanover Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville, on the ground that it is not the province of a court of chancery to dissolve a corporation, or interfere with the exercise of its franchise, or displace its officers, or appoint a receiver, or otherwise exercise jurisdiction over it, at the instance of creditors who have no judgment against it. In this case there was no interference by the court with the bank or its franchise, and the performance of the ordinary functions of its officers. There was no attempt to dissolve or restrain the corporation. Its directors had voluntarily surrendered its assets to the keeping of the chancellor, and ceased to perform their duties as to them. The chancellor had accepted the trust, and designated a receiver to take charge of these assets, and care for them, and had enjoined all creditors of the bank from suing it, and had proceeded in the administration of the trust he had accepted, as if there had been a creditors' bill; and, although this fell little short of being a mere farce, saved from it only by the seriousness of the performance with judicial gravity, in good faith, it was, nevertheless, the condition in which the complaining creditors found the affairs of their debtor on the 11th July, 1892, when they instituted their suit representing the deplorable conditions existing, and prayed the interference of the chancery court to take charge of the assets of their debtor, the bank, thus abandoned by it, and surrendered to the chancellor, who, though without authority to receive them, had yet taken control of them as if he did have the right to receive them, and had been dealing with them accordingly. The bill urged the necessity for the immediate appointment of a receiver for the preservation of the assets of the bank, which had suspended, and ceased to care for them since December 22, 1891. It is true that none of the complainants was a judgment creditor of the bank, and none had a specific lien on the assets of the bank. Yet these assets constituted a trust fund, in a general sense, for the payment of the creditors of the bank, and, having been abandoned by the managers of that corporation, and transferred to the chancellor, who was dealing with them as of right, when he had no more legal authority over them than a private individual, who might have found them, if it may be said that, under these circumstances, it was erroneous for the chancellor to entertain the suit of general creditors of the bank, and appoint a receiver, it certainly cannot be maintained that this proceeding was wholly unauthorized and void, so as to be subject to collateral attack for want of jurisdiction to entertain the suit. Vanfleet, Collat. Attack, § 100; Brown v. Iron Co., 134 U. S. 530, 10 Sup. Ct. 604; Mollen v. Iron Works, 131 U. S. 352, 9 Sup. Ct. 781; Graham v. Railroad Co., 102 U. S. 148; Goodman v. Winter, 64 Ala. 410; Barbour v. Bank, 45 Ohio St. 133, 12 N. E. 5; Rouse v. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 493, 22 N. E. 293.

Many other books might be referred to in support of the proposition asserted, but, if the doctrine announced did not prevail elsewhere, there can be no doubt as to the law here since the constitution of 1890. By section 160 of that instrument, "in all cases where said court [chancery] heretofore exercised jurisdiction, auxiliary to courts of common law, it may exercise such jurisdiction to grant the relief sought, although the legal remedy may not have been exhausted, or the legal title established by a suit at law." This is in harmony with the scheme of the constitution reversing the former relations of the courts, in which the circuit court possessed general jurisdiction, and was the repository of the power to administer legal remedies, and the chancery court had jurisdiction of certain designated matters, and where there was not a full, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Now the circuit court has original jurisdiction "in all matters, civil and criminal, in this state, not vested by this constitution in some other court." Section 156. A residuary grant is thus made to the circuit court. This manifests the policy of enlarging the domain of chancery, and limiting that of the court of law. What may be the effect of the provisions mentioned in widening the scope of the courts of chancery cannot be determined now, and is not necessary to be decided; but that they will be influential in considering the class of cases in which chancery courts may entertain jurisdiction is undeniable. When we look to section 147 of the constitution, all doubt as to the proper resolution of the question presented by this case vanishes. Because of that section, error is not predicable of "any error or mistake as to whether the cause in which it was rendered was of equity or common law jurisdiction." "No judgment or decree in any chancery or circuit court, rendered in a civil cause, shall be reversed or annulled on the ground of want of jurisdiction to render said judgment or decree, from any error or mistake as to whether the cause in which it was rendered was of equity or common law jurisdiction," is the mandate of the fundamental law, and sweeps away all distinction between equity and common-law jurisdiction, after it has been entertained, in a civil cause in the chancery or circuit courts. It may be an action of crim. con., or for libel or slander, or trespass, or any other civil cause in the chancery court, or an equity matter in a court of law; if entertained there, error is not predicable, and the decree or judgment shall not be annulled for want of jurisdiction. The chancellor or circuit judge conclusively and finally settles the question of jurisdiction, as between equity or common-law jurisdiction, of the particular case; for it would be the height of absurdity to hold that, while error may not be affirmed of it, such judgment or decree is void. The reason we do not apply the provisions of the constitution mentioned to the matter of December 22, 1891, and uphold it, and what followed, is that it was not a cause. There was no suit or action, and no parties plaintiff and defendant, but a mere ex parte surrender by the bank to the chancellor of its affairs, for which there is no authority in law; and therefore the constitution does not apply, but relates to a civil cause, as properly understood, and not to all that a chancellor or judge may do. The case of Hanover National Bank et al. v. Bank of Greenville is a suit regularly begun by bill against a defendant, and regularly proceeded with to a final decree; and, while we will not be understood to hold that there was even error in the action of the chancellor,—which question is not before us for decision,—we are sure his action cannot be held void or annulled, and that disposes of cases Nos. 7,749 and 7,460.

The decree allowing $2,000 for damages in the way of attorney's fees is complained of, but, as the evidence on which the chancellor decided this sum to be reasonable was not put in the record, and is not before us, we cannot disturb the decree for this. The result is that the decree in each of the three cases hereinbefore mentioned must be affirmed.

STATE ex rel. INDEPENDENT DIST. TEL. CO. et al. v. SECOND JUDICIAL DISTRICT COURT OF SILVER BOW COUNTY et al.

(39 Pac. 316, 15 Mont. 324.)

Supreme Court of Montana. Feb. 18, 1895.

Certiorari by the state of Montana ex rel. the Independent District Telegraph Company, the Citizens' District Messenger & Burglar-Alarm Telegraph Company, and G. A. Lauzier against the Second judicial district court of the state of Montana in and for the county of Silver Bow, and the judges presiding, to review the action of such court in appointing a receiver for the two corporations. Dismissed.

This is a writ of certiorari directed to the district court to review its action in appointing a receiver of the properties of two of the relators, viz. the Independent District Telegraph Company and the Citizens' District Messenger & Burglar-Alarm Telegraph Company, it being claimed by the relators that the district court acted in that matter without jurisdiction. The receiver was appointed in an action entitled as follows: "H. L. Haupt and E. A. Nichols, trustee, Plaintiffs, v. Independent District Telegraph Company, Citizens' District Messenger & Burglar-Alarm Telegraph Company, Fred B. Puddington, H. Sommers, John O'Rourke, Thomas D. Butterfield, G. A. Lauzier, Alex. Johnston, and John Doe (whose true name is unknown), Defendants." The appointment was made upon the complaint in that case and upon affidavits filed. The following facts appear from the complaint:

Each of the companies defendant in the case in the district court (and who are relators here) is a corporation organized under the laws of this state. The plaintiff Haupt is owner of 76 shares of the stock of the Independent Company. The plaintiff Nichols, as trustee, is also owner of 76 shares of said company. The Independent Company is the owner of a franchise from the city of Butte permitting it to carry on the district messenger business, and granting to the company the use of the streets and alleys of the city for the purpose of said business. The Citizens' Company owns a similar franchise. On May 1, 1892, the said two companies entered into an agreement by which they should put their respective stocks, franchises, and property into a common business, to be carried on by officers and agents to be appointed by the two corporations jointly. This agreement was to run for 20 years. All moneys earned should go into a general fund, and be in the hands of a general treasurer. After paying expenses, a reserve fund of $500 was to accumulate in the hands of the treasurer. After paying expenses and the accumulation of this reserve, the profits were to be paid by the general treasurer to the respective corporation treasurers in the proportion of five-ninths to the Independent Company, and four-ninths to the Citizens' Company, to be distributed by the said respective companies as dividends on their stock. Thereupon the general manager and general treasurer were elected to carry on this joint business. The reserve fund of $500 was accumulated. The business was carried on until June 1, 1893. At that date the stockholders Sommers, Lauzier, Butterfield, and O'Rourke united together and obtained a majority of the stock of each company. After obtaining this stock, those stockholders united and conspired together to manage and conduct the combined corporations for their individual benefit, and to exclude from the management, profits, and benefits the plaintiffs Haupt and Nichols. Since that time said plaintiffs Haupt and Nichols have been entirely excluded from the profits, management, and benefits of said corporations and the combination of the corporations. From the time said association of the two corporations was formed until said Sommers, Lauzier, Butterfield, and O'Rourke obtained control of the said combined business, there was paid to the treasurers of the said corporations $500 a month, to be distributed by them as dividends on the stock of the corporations. That, when said Sommers and others obtained control of the said associated corporations, there was in the hands of the general treasurer said reserve fund of $500, and also cash in the sum of $1,000, and also interest on the reserve fund of $25. That this total sum of $1,525 was turned over to Lauzier, the general treasurer elected by his friends Sommers, Butterfield, and O'Rourke. That the current expenses which then remained unpaid did not exceed $300, and that there was therefore $1,225 available as a dividend to be paid to the stockholders. That, ever since said Sommers and others obtained control as aforesaid, they have refused to give the plaintiffs any account of the profits of the association, and have refused to pay any dividends on the stock. Plaintiffs allege, on information and belief, that, since the Sommers control obtained,—that is, since June 1, 1893,—the net profits of the associated corporations have been $500 per month, and that said Sommers, O'Rourke, Butterfield, and Lauzier, instead of paying those profits as dividends, have converted the same to their own use. On February 9, 1894, the officers elected under the Sommers management executed to Fred B. Puddington three promissory notes, payable each in nine months, for the sums, respectively, of $5,000, $2,000, and $2,000, bearing interest at the rate of 1¼ per cent. per month. That said Sommers management, also as security for said notes, executed to said Puddington a chattel mortgage upon the franchises and all the property of said corporations. That said notes purported to be given for the purchase price of a certain franchise granted by the city of Butte to said Puddington,—a franchise to erect and maintain a district messenger and burglar-alarm telegraph system in the city of Butte. That said franchise was granted by the city subject to certain conditions precedent. The complaint then sets out those conditions, and then alleges that none of those conditions were fulfilled. The complaint alleges that said Puddington's franchise is forfeited and void, and was forfeited and void at the time of the pretended sale of the same to the two said companies and the execution of said notes and mortgage. The complaint further states that said Sommers and others, at the time of said pretended sale, well knew that the Puddington franchise was forfeited and void and was of no value whatever. It is further alleged that said Sommers, Lauzier, Butterfield, and O'Rourke conspired together to defraud the plaintiffs, and to obtain possession of the plaintiffs' stock, and all interest in the Independent Company, and of the said combination of the two companies; and that in fact they executed said mortgage and notes without any consideration, and for the purpose of bringing about the sale of said property and franchises of the said companies, and of foreclosing all interest of the plaintiffs therein. The complaint further alleges that unless the negotiation of the said notes is restrained, and the notes and mortgage declared fraudulent and void, all the property of the Independent Company will be sold under the mortgage, and plaintiffs will be deprived of their interests in the said corporation. The complaint prays for several items of relief, among them that said Fred B. Puddington, and all persons claiming under him, may be enjoined from negotiating said notes or mortgage, or from collecting or foreclosing the same, or from interfering in any manner with the properties or franchises of the said companies, and that said mortgage and notes be adjudged null and void.

In addition to the allegations made in the complaint, a number of affidavits were filed and used on the hearing. One Le Clare deposes that he heard John O'Rourke and G. A. Lauzier, two of the defendants in the district court, conversing about the business of the said district messenger companies, and that O'Rourke said "that if they [meaning himself, Butterfield, Lauzier, and Sommers] would stand together, they would do that Dutch outfit up [referring to the Shultzes and the other stockholders]." H. A. Neidenhofer deposes that from December, 1890, to February, 1892, he was manager of the Independent Company, and that all that time monthly dividends were paid to its stockholders amounting to $750 per month, excepting during the time when there was an opposition company, and that those dividends were net profits. This affiant also states that after the combination was made between the two companies they paid dividends of $500 a month. Seth B. Smith, another affiant, stated that, prior to the time when Sommers and his party obtained control of the combined corporations, he (affiant) was treasurer of the combination. He testifies in his affidavit rather fully about the formation of the combination between the two companies. He testified that the reserve fund above mentioned, of $500, accumulated in the hands of the treasurer; that finally Sommers and his party bought the affiant's stock, and he retired from the management; that he turned over to the new management all the funds in three different checks of $911.80, $107.94, and $14.25; that at that time there were expenses outstanding and unpaid of only $400; that when he retired he was just preparing and ready to declare a dividend of $500, but he was instructed by the Sommers party not to pay said dividend; that while affiant was treasurer of the company he paid dividends to the stockholders of about $500 a month. Carl Shultz and his wife, Mary Shultz, each made an affidavit in which they testify as to Lauzier's and Butterfield's negotiations for the purchase of affiants' stock, and threats that if they did not sell that they (Lauzier and Butterfield) would freeze out said affiants. Haupt, one of the plaintiffs, also makes an affidavit that for more than a year after the combination of the two companies he received monthly dividends on his stock of 50 cents per share. This affiant also alleges, on information and belief, that the combined corporations keep two sets of books, one of which sets of books shows the actual receipts and disbursements and the net profits of the association, and the other set of books does not show the correct accounts of the said corporations, but is kept for the purpose of deceiving and misleading stockholders who have been excluded from the management and participation in the management of said business; that, since the Sommers party obtained control of the business, affiant has received no dividends on his stock, although there have been large profits. This affiant then sets forth the execution of the Puddington notes and mortgage. He also sets forth the facts showing that the Puddington franchise which he (Puddington) purported to sell to the companies for $9,000 was absolutely void and worthless. One of the employés of the combined corporations testifies to hearing Butterfield say that the business was good and paying as well as any business in town.

An answer was filed by the defendants, and also some affidavits. It is not necessary to recite the contents of these papers, for on the writ of certiorari in this court the question of the discretion of the lower court in appointing a receiver is not under review. After hearing argument in the district court as recited in its order, the court found that the plaintiffs were entitled to the appointment of a receiver pendente lite. It was therefore ordered that A. H. Barrett be appointed receiver pendente lite of the franchises, plants, business, books, and accounts, and of all other property belonging to the said two corporations, for the purpose of managing and conducting said business; and he was by the order authorized and directed to take possession of the said premises, franchises, plants, and all property, books, and accounts, of any nature whatsoever, belonging to the said corporations, and to manage and control the same during the pendency of this action, and for that purpose to take care of and manage and control the said property and business, and to pay all debts and obligations, and collect all moneys due to the said corporations. It was ordered that the receiver give a bond, with sureties, in the sum of $10,000. Upon the appointment of the receiver, the said G. A. Lauzier made an application to this court upon behalf of himself, and purporting to be also on behalf of the two district telegraph companies, asking for a writ of certiorari to review the action of the district court in appointing a receiver. The application, of course, is made upon the ground that the district court had no jurisdiction to make the appointment. That is the point discussed and decided in the opinion below.

Robinson & Wapleton and John W. Cotter, for relators. Geo. Haldorn and Oliver M. Hall, for respondents.

DE WITT, J. (after stating the facts). The question in this case is simply whether under the facts, as recited in the statement above, the district court had jurisdiction to appoint a receiver. State v. Judge of Second Judicial Dist. Ct., 10 Mont. 401, 25 Pac. 1053. See, also, French Bank Case, 53 Cal., at page 550. There is here no question of the court's discretion under consideration. The relators in this application rely very largely upon the decision in the French Bank Case, but we think that the case at bar is distinguishable from that case in many respects, and, in order to make the distinction apparent, we quote as follows from the California case: "Irrespective of the effect of the fifth subdivision of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which will be presently considered, there is no jurisdiction vested in courts of equity to appoint a receiver of the property of a corporation in a suit prosecuted by a private party. This is only to say that there is no jurisdiction vested in these courts in such a case to dissolve a corporation; for the power of a receiver, when put in motion, of necessity supersedes the corporate power. It necessarily displaces the corporate management, and substitutes its own, and assumes, in the language of the order under review, 'to do all and everything necessary (in the judgment of the receiver, under the advice of the court) to protect the rights of the creditors and depositors of said corporation.' This precise question was brought directly under consideration here in the case of Neall v. Hill, 16 Cal. 145, where, in a suit brought by a stockholder, a receiver had been appointed by the district court to take possession of the property of the Gold Hill & Bear River Water Company, a corporation existing under the laws of this state. The opinion in that case, rendered by Mr. Justice Cope, and concurred in by the whole court, after referring to the adjudicated cases in England and in this country, uses this language: 'This decree, if permitted to stand, must necessarily result in the dissolution of the corporation; and in that event the court will have accomplished, in an indirect mode, that which, in this proceeding, it had no authority to do directly. It is well settled that a court of equity, as such, has no jurisdiction over corporate bodies for the purpose of restraining their operations or winding up their concerns. We do not find that any such power has ever been exercised in the absence of a statute conferring the jurisdiction.' Of course, it is not to be doubted that the trustees of a corporation, the persons who constitute its direction, and from time to time exercise the corporate authority in the management of its affairs, are subject to the control of courts of equity; or, as observed by Chancellor Kent, 'that the persons who from time to time exercise the corporate powers may, in their character of trustees, be accountable to this court [the court of chancery] for a fraudulent breach of trust; and,' he adds, 'to this plain and ordinary head of equity the jurisdiction of this court over corporations ought to be confined.' Attorney General v. Utica Ins. Co., 2 Johns. Ch. 388. And in exercise of these admitted equity powers of the court, referable to the well-known grounds upon which its jurisdiction ordinarily proceeds, embracing the cognizance of fraud, accident, trust, and the like, the rights of natural persons, injured or put at hazard through corporate proceedings unauthorized by law, will find ample protection and redress. But, even in such a proceeding as that, the trustees must, of course, be made parties defendant; and it will be observed, upon looking at the complaint of Gallagher in this view, that it is not substantially sufficient in its scope to put the equity powers of the court in motion for any purpose. The corporation itself being the sole party defendant, the trustees—those persons upon whom the management of its affairs is devolved—are not parties, nor is any relief sought against them personally. That there is no inherent power in the district courts, as being courts of equity, to appoint a receiver in such a case as that presented by the complaint of Gallagher, is therefore apparent, both upon principle and authority."

In the California case an important element in the decision, as it appears, was that the appointment of the receiver acted as a dissolution of the corporation. In the case at bar no such result is intended by the order appointing the receiver, or is accomplished by that order. It is true that the complaint in the case in the district court asks for a dissolution of the corporation, but whether such relief may be granted in that action is not now before us for review. The complaint also asks another relief, as set forth in the statement, namely, that the negotiation of the notes described be restrained, that the foreclosure of the mortgage be prohibited, and that the notes and mortgage be declared null and void. While the determination of these matters is pending in the action, the receiver is to act. His appointment is pendente lite only, and he is authorized to do only those acts which are peculiarly pendente lite. Again, in the French Bank Case, one ground of the decision was that the action was against the corporation only (see page 546 of the decision), and not against the malfeasing trustees; that is, the "persons upon whom the management of its affairs is devolved" (at page 551). But in the case at bar the managing officers of the corporation are joined as defendants, and their unlawful acts are sought to be set aside, and their future wrongful conduct enjoined. The receiver is not to wind up the corporation under his appointment. He is simply to manage the affairs of the same while charges of the most outrageous frauds by the managers and controllers of the corporation are being investigated in the trial of the action. We are fully aware of the reluctance of courts of equity to interfere by receivership in the management of corporations, or to take that management from trustees elected by the shareholders. It is said in Morawetz on Private Corporations (section 281) as follows: "A court of equity will grant all relief to a shareholder which the nature of his case may require. But it has always been a settled principle that no interference with the management of a corporation can be justified, unless such interference is absolutely necessary to the attainment of justice. The reason of this rule is obvious. The officers of a corporation are generally elected by a vote of the shareholders. Every shareholder has a voice in their appointment, and may insist that they shall represent the corporation when duly appointed. If an officer is guilty of a breach of duty, he may in many cases be removed by act of the corporation; but no minority of the shareholders have any authority to restrain his action, or remove him and appoint another officer in his place. Nor can a court of chancery interfere at the suit of a portion of the shareholders, and remove an offending officer, or even enjoin him generally from acting for the corporation, unless this be essential to the protection of the corporate rights; as, for example, where the directors have conspired to defraud the corporation, or have otherwise shown themselves to be totally unfit to be intrusted any longer with the management of the company's affairs. The court must ordinarily confine its remedy to the redress of the specific wrongs which have been charged."

But the case before us is not an ordinary one, and perhaps it may be doubted that many such histories of fraud will be found in the conduct of human affairs. It is difficult to imagine a case more thoroughly saturated with fraud than this which was presented to the district court on the application for the appointment of a receiver. Four shareholders of two small corporations, which were paying handsome dividends, obtained control of the majority of the stock, and elected their own officers. These four conspirators, instead of paying $500 a month dividends which the corporations were earning, proceeded to put that money into their own pockets. They kept false books to deceive the shareholders. They pretended to buy for the corporations an absolutely worthless franchise, when they already owned two good and valid franchises, which were more than ample for the same purpose. They gave the corporations' notes for this worthless franchise, and mortgaged all of the property of the corporations for the purpose of having the mortgage foreclosed, and the property of the corporations wiped out. It is needless to enlarge upon these facts. They are all set forth in the statement preceding this opinion. This is a story of wrecking and robbing that would make a pirate of the Spanish main exclaim, in the language of Lord Clive, "I am surprised at my own moderation." Is not interference here absolutely necessary, as Morawetz says, to the attainment of justice? Again Morawetz remarks, as quoted above, the court of chancery will not interfere at the suit of the shareholders unless this be essential to the protection of the corporate rights. We can scarcely conceive of a case where it would be more essential than it is here, for the protection of the corporate rights, for, if the interference is not had, the corporate property will be swept away from the corporations into the grasp of the conspirators; and, while the investigation into the acts of the Sommers-O'Rourke party is being made by the court, should the court allow this same band of marauders to remain in possession of the corporations and their property, and continue to convert the assets to their own use, and exercise their own pleasure as to the trusts imposed upon them? To allow such a proceeding, it seems to us, would shock the conscience of the most indifferent court. Our statute provides that "a receiver may be appointed by the court in which an action is pending, or by the judge thereof: * * * Sixth. In all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity." Code Civ. Proc. § 229. We are of opinion that the decisions of the courts sustain the doctrine of the powers and the usages of courts of equity in such a case as that which was made in the showing before the district court. We note the following language from a very recent decision (January, 1894) of the Kansas supreme court. While the Kansas statute is broader than ours, and the case of In re Lewis, 52 Kan. 660, 35 Pac. 287, is decided largely upon the statute of that state, still the following remarks of the Kansas court are valuable, as is also the collection of authorities appended to the decision. We extract from the opinion as follows: "By the averments of the petition, it would appear that all the officers of the corporation have conspired together to divert its business to another company, and to absorb its earnings and assets, and appropriate the same to their own uses. Under those circumstances, it would be useless to apply to the officers to bring an action against themselves, and in such cases the law permits the appointment of a receiver at the instance of a stockholder. In most cases of this character no other adequate remedy exists. The appointment of a receiver is not necessarily a proceeding to dissolve a corporation, nor will it necessarily result in its extinction. The property and assets of the corporation, which are being dissipated and fraudulently absorbed, will be preserved and rightfully appuea under the supervision of the court, and may be restored to the officers of the corporation when there has been a change of officers, or when it is deemed prudent and safe to restore the property and affairs of the corporations to its duly-constituted officers. See First Nat. Bank v. United States Tile Co., 105 Ind. 227, 4 N. E. 846; Pike Co. v. Hammons, 129 Ind. 368, 27 N. E. 487; Order of Iron Hall v. Baker (Ind. Sup.) 33 N. E. 1128; Haywood v. Lumber Co., 64 Wis. 639, 26 N. W. 184; Consolidated Tank-Line Co. v. Kansas City Varnish Co., 43 Fed. 204; Mor. Priv. Corp. § 281; Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1334; High, Rec. § 313; Spel. Priv. Corp. § 1001; 20 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 272." We also find it stated in High on Receivers as follows: "It has already been shown that in most of the states of this country the general jurisdiction of courts of equity over corporations has been enlarged to the extent of authorizing the appointment of receivers in behalf of creditors and shareholders." Section 313.

The supreme court of Michigan (October, 1892), in Miner v. Ice Co., 93 Mich. 97, 53 N. W. 218, after reviewing the history of a fraud which perhaps is worthy to be ranked with that of the case at bar, says: "The present case furnishes an instance of gross abuse of trust. Must the cestui que trust be committed to the domination of a trustee who has for seven years continued to violate the trust? The law requires of the majority the utmost good faith in the control and management of the corporation as to the minority. It is of the essence of this trust that it shall be so managed as to produce for each stockholder the best possible return for his investment. The trustee has so far absorbed all returns. What is the outlook for the future? This court, in view of the past, can give no assurances. It can make no order that can prevent some other method of bleeding this corporation, if it is allowed to continue. If Lorman be removed, who shall take his place? He has the absolute power to determine. Once deposed, he may elect a dummy to fill his place. There are practically but three persons concerned, Miner, Lorman, and Lorissa Carpenter, and she has for seven years, in fraud of complainant's rights, been paid a dividend to secure her acquiescence. Who has any right to complain if ample and complete justice is awarded to Miner? Who shall be permitted to stand between him and an adequate remedy? This corporation has utterly failed of its purpose, not because of matters beyond its control, but because of fraudulent mismanagement and misappropriation of its funds. Complainant has a right to insist that it shall not continue as a cloak for a fraud upon him, and shall not longer retain his capital, to be used for the sole advantage of the owner of the majority of the stock, and a court of equity will not so far tolerate such a manifest violation of the rules of natural justice as to deny him the relief to which his situation entitles him. I think a court of equity, under the circumstances of this case, in the exercise of its general equity jurisdiction, has the power to grant to this complainant ample relief, even to the dissolution of the trust relations. Complainant is therefore entitled to the relief prayed. A receiver will be appointed, and the affairs of this corporation wound up." In the Michigan case the decision went to the winding up of the corporation, but in the case before us the receiver is only to hold until the charges of fraud are investigated. The Michigan decision is an able discussion of the powers of the court of equity in this respect, and a valuable review of decisions. It may be said here, as was said in the Michigan case, that the corporations have utterly failed of their purpose, not because of matters beyond their control, but because of the fraudulent mismanagement and misappropriation of their funds. An equal if not greater mismanagement and misappropriation has been done by the officers of the corporations who are here made defendants, and whose acts are sought to be restrained and set aside and declared null and void. We also find the same general subject mentioned in the following language in Waterman on the Law of Corporations (volume 2, § 356): "The power to appoint a receiver is necessarily inherent in a court which possesses equitable jurisdiction. It is exercised when an estate or fund is in existence, and there is no competent person entitled to hold it; or the person so entitled is in the nature of a trustee, and is misusing or misapplying the trust; or the property is about to be removed beyond the reach of the court; and, generally, when it is necessary to secure rights and prevent a failure of justice. The property is thus placed in the hands of an officer of the law in order that it may be under the protecting care and control of the court, and be delivered unimpaired to the persons to whom it is legally ascertained to belong." See, also, Ranger v. Cotton-Press Co., 52 Fed. 611; Mor. Priv. Corp. § 642.

Upon questions of equity jurisdiction, aid is always found in the records of the courts of chancery of New Jersey, and from a decision rendered in May, 1894, by that learned court, we quote as follows: "The power of this court to appoint a receiver of a corporation, either because it has no properly constituted governing body, or because there are such dissensions in its governing body as to make it impossible for the corporation to carry on its business with advantage to its stockholders, I think must be regarded as settled; but I think it is equally well settled that this power is subject to certain limitations, namely, it must always be exercised with great caution, and only for such time and to such an extent as may be necessary to preserve the property of the corporation, and protect the rights and interests of its stockholders. As soon as a lawfully constituted and competent governing body comes into existence, whether it is brought into existence by an adjustment of the dissensions or by the election of a new body, and such body is ready to take possession of the property of the corporation, and proceed in the proper discharge of its duties, the court must lift its hand and retire. This is the doctrine, as I understand it, which was laid down by Vice Chancellor Malins in Featherstone v. Cooke, L. R. 16 Eq. 298, and Auxiliary Co. v. Vickers, Id. 303, and which was approved by Chancellor Runyon in Einstein v. Rosenfeld, 38 N. J. Eq. 309, and by Chancellor McGill in Archer v. Waterworks Co., 50 N. J. Eq. 33, 24 Atl. 508." Edison v.

Phonograph Co., 29 Atl. 197. It is true, of course, that the power must be exercised with great caution, but we are of the opinion that the most scrupulous caution would not cause a court to hesitate in the matter which was before the district court. Furthermore, the district court did not go any further in the appointment than was necessary to preserve the property of the corporations, and protect the rights and interests of its stockholders, as was stated in the New Jersey case. It does not seem necessary to go further in this discussion. The facts of this case will not afford a precedent in the future for any imprudent or unauthorized appointment of a receiver for corporations, or the unwise withdrawal of the business of a corporation from the management of its duly-elected and lawfully acting trustees. The case is a precedent only as to its own facts. Here the objects of the existence, and, indeed, the practical existence itself, of the corporations, are being totally destroyed by the unlawful (not to use a stronger term) acts of its managers; and one object, at least, of the action in the district court, is to set aside and prevent such unlawful acts of such managers, and the action itself is against such unlawfully acting persons. If they are allowed to go on in their course which they are pursuing, the corporations are to be totally wrecked, their funds are to be embezzled, and their property is to be taken from them by a fraudulent conspiracy of the managers, whose position is one of trust towards the plaintiffs in the action in the district court. Under such a vigorous showing of facts, we believe that the decisions of the courts of equity uphold the powers and usages of those courts to interfere by a receivership. See the cases cited in this opinion and the cases referred to in those citations. We are therefore of the opinion that the writ of certiorari must be dismissed, and it is so ordered. Dismissed.

MERCHANTS' & MANUFACTURERS' NAT.
BANK OF DETROIT v. KENT
CIRCUIT JUDGE.

(5 N. W. 627, 43 Mich. 292.)

Supreme Court of Michigan. April 14, 1880.

Mandamus.

Morris & Uhl, for the writ. Jacob Ferris and Blair, Kingsley & Kleinhaus, against.

COOLEY, J. The application for a mandamus in this case brings under review questions of the validity and propriety of the order appointing a receiver. The bill was filed to foreclose a chattel mortgage. The mortgage was by Hebbard & Graff, merchant millers of Grand Rapids, to Philip M. Graff, and bore date March 17, 1880. The purpose was to secure the mortgagee for having become accommodation indorser for the mortgagors on a large amount of commercial paper. The mortgage covered "all the flour, wheat, corn, oats, bran and feed owned by the parties of the first part, and situated in the city of Grand Rapids, Michigan, whether on the track, or in the mills or warehouses, or in the elevator at Berlin, Ottawa county, Michigan; all the barrels, sacks, bags, tools and office furniture and fixtures, including safes, situated in and about and used in connection with their two mills, being three large teams and larries, two pairs of large sleighs and one light delivery wagon, and the blankets used with said teams. Also the engine and boiler used in the Valley City Mills, and put in by Hebbard & Graff since their lease of the same, and the shafting and pulleys used by them in connecting the engine with the mill and machinery. Also all the wheat, corn and oats which may be purchased by the parties of the first part and delivered to them in the city of Grand Rapids, either on the track, in store or in their mills, and all flour, feed and bran manufactured by them while any portion of the debts secured by this mortgage remains unpaid."

The mortgage reserved to the mortgagor the privilege of making sales in the ordinary course of their business, and provided that "in case of the non-payment of the said notes, or any of them, at maturity, by the party of the first part, or if the party of the second part shall at any time deem himself insecure, he, * * * whether the party of the second part shall have paid anything on said notes or not, is hereby authorized to enter upon the premises of said party of the first part, or any place or places where the said goods and chattels, or any part or portion thereof, may be, and take possession thereof, and sell and dispose of the same at private sale or public auction, * * * whether any of such notes have matured or not, and apply the proceeds thereof to the payment of said notes as fast as they mature."

A bill to foreclose this mortgage was filed the day after its date. It was alleged therein that one of the notes, the payment of which was secured by the mortgage, was long past due, and that another became due March 17, 1880, and another March 18, the day the bill was filed, and both remain unpaid, and that by reason thereof the whole sum secured by the mortgage, amounting to $38,800, has become due and payable immediately; that by reason of disastrous speculations the mortgagors have become insolvent, and have transferred to complainant the mill property whereon they conducted their business; that the wheat and other unground grain described in the mortgage cannot be profitably sold and converted into money except after being ground; that to manufacture said grain into flour, and other proper products, will yield larger returns, and be more for the interest of all parties concerned, than to sell or dispose of the same in an unmanufactured state; that the total value of all the mortgaged property will not exceed $40,000, and if disposed of at forced or auction sale will not yield more than $30,000, or thereabouts. The bill prays for the appointment of a receiver, and nominates the law partner of the solicitor for complainant as a suitable person to be appointed.

No persons were made parties defendant to this bill except the mortgagors. Late in the evening of March 18th, and before the bill had been filed, it was presented to the circuit judge, at his dwelling-house, and an application made for the appointment of a receiver as prayed. The mortgagors appeared at the same time, by a solicitor of the court, and consented to the appointment. The circuit judge, apparently looking upon the case as an amicable proceeding, in which all parties concerned were working in harmony to preserve and dispose of the property for the benefit of all, made the appointment prayed for. The appointment purports to be one made in open court, but the court was not in session at the time, and the bill not being then filed, there was no cause pending. The order of appointment directed the receiver to proceed to manufacture the grain mortgaged into flour and other proper products, and to sell in the usual course of trade and on credit.

It soon appeared that the proceeding was far from being an amicable one, except so far as the mortgagors and mortgagee were concerned. At the very time the mortgagee was having his bill for foreclosure prepared and obtaining his order for a receiver, other parties were suing out writs of replevin for some portions of the property. One of these parties was William B. Ledyard, by virtue of whose writ the wheat in the Crescent Mills, previously operated by the mortgagors, was seized an hour or so before the order appointing a receiver was made. Another was by Euphrasia Aldrich, who replevied a quantity of wheat at or about the time when the order was made. Another was by the Merchants' & Manufacturers' Bank of Detroit. The circuit court appears to have come to the conclusion that the writ of this plaintiff was not served until the receiver had become possessed of the property in dispute, which could not have been earlier than about 10 o'clock on the night of March 18th, that being the hour when his bond as receiver was filed.

On March 19, 1880, the receiver petitioned the circuit court in chancery for an order restraining the several plaintiffs in the replevin suits from proceeding further therein. A hearing was had on this petition, and its prayer was granted so far as the suit by the bank was concerned, and denied as to the other suits. The bank, however, was granted leave to bring an action of trover to recover the value of the property described in its writs. The receiver was, by the same order, required to deposit in bank the net proceeds of sales of the property made by him. Both the receiver and the bank appealed from this order.

1. The appeal of the receiver was from those parts of the order which refused an injunction against the Ledyard & Aldrich suits. The order in that regard was not a "final order," and was therefore not appealable under the statute. Wing v. Warner, 2 Doug. 288; Caswell v. Comstock, 6 Mich. 391; Boing v. Coats, 17 Mich. 411; Spencer v. Stearns, 28 Mich. 463. These appeals must therefore be dismissed.

2. The order, in so far as it enjoined the bank from interfering by suit with the possession of property to which the bank claimed title, inasmuch as it finally took from the bank a legal right, was in the nature of a final order, and was appealable. Lewis v. Campau, 14 Mich. 458; Barry v. Briggs, 22 Mich. 201.

3. The order appointing a receiver was void, for the reason that it was made when there was no suit pending. It is perhaps fortunate for all parties interested that such was the fact, inasmuch as, if it had been legally valid, the appointment, though of a person eminently fit for the position, but for the relations to the litigation through his law partner, must necessarily at some time have been set aside, and the longer it should stand the greater must have been the probability of confusion in the rights of the parties growing out of his proceedings, and of unnecessary costs and expenses to be borne by some one or more of the claimants to the property. In Ex parte Pinche, 2 Meriv. 452, the lord chancellor refused to appoint the solicitor to the commission as receiver of a lunatic's estate, though it was stated that no one else would accept the office. The ground of the refusal was that it might become the duty of the solicitor himself to call the receiver to account. So in Stone v. Wishart, 2 Madd. 63, where the parties united in a request that the next friend of infant complainants be appointed receiver, the vice chancellor said: "I cannot accede to this motion, although it is consented to. It is the duty of the next friend to these infants to watch the accounts and conduct of the receiver; to be control over him. The two characters cannot be united, they are inconsistent."

We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the law partner of the solicitor is presumptively as much interested in the proceedings as the solicitor himself, and it would be peculiarly objectionable that he should act in a position requiring impartiality in a case like this, where the parties to the suit are manifestly acting in concert, and adversely to the interests of other persons, who cannot watch their proceedings. The practical result would be that the receiver would supervise his own accounts. Garland v. Garland, 2 Ves. 137. The practice in equity does not even permit the receiver to employ a solicitor in the case as his own counsel, lest it might disarm his vigilance in watching the receiver's proceedings. Ryckman v. Parkins, 5 Paige, 543; Adams v. Woods, 8 Cal. 306. This rule may, no doubt, be departed from by consent of all parties concerned, but this must mean by consent of all parties concerned in the results of the receivership, and one not a party to the suit may be as much concerned in these as the persons who are parties. The present suit is an illustration.

4. The order appealed from by the bank was improper, in that it forbade a person not a party to the suit from testing, in the customary common law method, the title which is asserted to specific property, and in so doing stretched unnecessarily, improperly and oppressively the power of the court of equity in abridgment of the jurisdiction of the court of law. There may be cases in which it would be proper for a court of equity, by means of a receivership, to draw to itself the jurisdiction to try disputed titles to property; but the jurisdiction to do so is exceptional, and must be supported by circumstances which render the common law remedies inadequate, or for some reason unfit and unsuitable in the particular case. No such circumstances appear or are suggested here. It was proper and just that the bank be allowed to go on with the suit in replevin, if that seemed most for its interest, and improper and unjust that it should be restricted to a suit in trover, which would be, in effect, for net proceeds only, after the costs of a receivership, which the bank did not desire or assent to, had been deducted. If the property belonged to the bank the injustice of requiring the owner to submit to such management, manufacture and sale of it as another person might think expedient, and to recover the net proceeds only after the costs of a receivership in a suit between other parties had been wholly or in part deducted, would be too manifest to require more than mere mention.

5. It cannot escape attention that the whole scheme of giving a chattel mortgage which would be immediately due, filing a bill in equity upon it at once, and obtaining the appointment of a receiver, who should take possession of the property to the exclusion of other creditors, and go on with the business as the mortgagors themselves might have done, and as the order in this case contemplated, was an attempt, by means of the machinery of the law, to accomplish indirectly what, without calling in the aid of the court, could not be legally done at all.

We do not enlarge upon this aspect of the case, as it is not necessary here; but it must be manifest that the parties were creating a trust, by means of the mortgage and of a consent order, which could not stand the test of the law, if made by an assignment. It resembles very closely an attempt, by circuitous methods, to avoid a legal principle.

The order which is appealed from by the bank must be reversed, with costs against the complainant in the suit. What has been said will render unnecessary any award of the writ of mandamus. The other justices concurred.

MERCANTILE TRUST CO. OF NEW YORK
v. MISSOURI, K. & T. RY. CO. et al.

(36 Fed. 221.)

Circuit Court, D. Kansas. Oct. 8, 1888.

In equity. Bill for foreclosure and appointment of a receiver.

Bill by the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, trustee for certain bondholders secured by a mortgage on the property of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, against said company and the Missouri Pacific Railway Company, to foreclose the mortgage, and appoint a receiver.

Alexander & Green, Thos. H. Hubbard, John J. McCook, and William N. Cromwell, for complainant. Simon Sterne, Charles F. Beach, Jr., James O. Broadhead, and L. B. Wheat, for defendants.

BREWER, J. (orally). In this case, I have had no opportunity to write out the conclusions to which I have come, nor, for that matter, to arrange my thoughts in any very orderly and systematic manner. I should have preferred to take a little further time to put in better shape what I have to say; yet, aware of the fact that many of you gentlemen are from a distance, and are anxious to return home, I concluded to waive the matter of form and order, and state, in a crude way, my conclusions. Nor are these conclusions reached simply from information developed in these few days. This bill was presented to me more than three months ago. I have had a copy of it in my possession since, and have taken frequent occasions to examine the stipulations of this mortgage. Further than that, the newspapers have been full of many of the features of this controversy; and the property itself, being a property starting in my own state, and growing up there, is, neither in itself nor its history, a stranger. So that many of the facts which have been presented and discussed are facts which were not new.

This bill was filed a few days after default in the payment of interest, June last. And the first question—a vital question—is whether this suit was prematurely brought; for, being a suit to foreclose, and not one for the preservation of the property, if prematurely brought, it would finally have to be dismissed, and a receiver ought not to be appointed ad interim. The ground upon which the claim rests is the fact that this mortgage or deed of trust requires a six-months delay after the default before certain proceedings—and foreclosure, it is claimed, is one—are permissible. The second article provides for entry by the trustee, but by its terms such entry cannot be till six months after default and demand of payment. The third article likewise authorizes sale by advertisement, and that is equally limited. At the close of that article follows this paragraph: "This provision is cumulative to the ordinary remedies by foreclosure in the courts; and the trustee herein, or its successor or successors in this trust, upon default being made as aforesaid, may, at its discretion, and upon the written request of the bondholders of a majority in value of said bonds then unpaid, shall," etc.

Now, the contention is that those words, "upon default being made as aforesaid," being in the last part of this article, by fair construction refer back to the entire provision in the first part in respect to default, and include both the happening and continuance of the default. The argument rests merely on the force of the last two words, "as aforesaid," and is forcibly put by counsel. That is the real question in the case, for, if this last paragraph in article 3 were omitted, the decision of the supreme court in the case of Railroad Co. v. Fosdick, 106 U. S. 47, 1 Sup. Ct. 10, would leave no question. In that case, as appears from the statement, there were in the mortgage stipulations providing for entry and sale by advertisement six months after default. The validity of those provisions was recognized by the supreme court; but it held that, notwithstanding this, if by other stipulations in the mortgage it was a security for the payment of interest as it semi-annually accrued, as well as of the principal, the trustee, or, on his failure to act, any bondholder, might, on the non-payment of interest, bring suit and foreclose. Turning to this mortgage, I find the same provision. It is given as security for the payment of the interest as well as of the principal. By article 2 possession is secured to the railroad company,—the mortgagor,—until default be made in the payment of principal or interest. Unquestionably the right of action at law on the coupon exists. Unquestionably, if articles 3 and 4 were omitted, the mere fact that this property was by the mortgage pledged as security for the payment of coupons would permit the coupon-holder to come into a court of equity and enforce that pledge.

It is insisted that these articles, not excluding the jurisdiction of courts of law, not debarring a party from his right of action upon the coupons, deprive him of a present right of action upon the mortgage by a suit in equity to enforce that pledge. Language requiring such construction should be clear. If the parties—and it is to be assumed that they who drafted this mortgage or deed of trust were competent for that business—contemplated not merely that no entry should be made, no sale under the power until the lapse of six months after default, but also that the coupon-holder, having his right of action at law on the coupons, should not have a right of action in equity, such purpose, it seems to me, would naturally have been expressed in clear and unmistakable language, and not in that of doubtful interpretation. In every other place that I have been able to find in this mortgage, where a right rests upon the continuance of the default, and that appears in articles prior and subsequent to this paragraph, the language is express: "In case default shall be made in payment of interest, and shall continue for six months." Now, if it was intended to limit the jurisdiction of a court of equity until after the lapse of six months from the time of the happening of the default, it seems to me that the draughtsman would have placed the stipulation therefor in a separate article, and would have made its meaning so plain that there would be no question. We all know in the preparation of instruments how common the expressions "said" or "as aforesaid" are used without any clear or definite intent. They are words which we use, not thoughtlessly, but carelessly; and although they are used here, yet as it is also found that the continuance of the default is not mentioned, it seems to me it is giving to those words an enlarged and unnecessary force to hold that they broaden the expression "making default" into "making and continuing default," as expressed in the first part of the article. Nor is this a mere resting upon the language of the paragraph. It opens with the distinct announcement that these special provisions in respect to entry and sale under a power are cumulative to the ordinary remedies by foreclosure; contemplating, in its opening words, a proceeding in a court of equity in any case of default. Nor is it strange that there should be special limitations upon the two matters provided in articles 2 and 3, and none about proceedings in a court of equity. An entry is a speedy remedy; it runs to the corpus of the property; it takes instant hold of it, and takes it away from the mortgagor. The parties may well have contemplated that, if there was a temporary default, there should be no such speedy interference and summary seizure by the mortgagee. So a sale by advertisement—in this case an advertisement of eight weeks—is speedy and summary; and if, upon the happening of a temporary default, the trustee at the instance of a single coupon-holder should thus advertise and sell the property, it is obvious that great wrong might be done; and six months' delay is a very natural provision. But proceedings in a court of equity are not thus hasty. They are not within the control of any coupon-holder or any trustee. They stand advanced or delayed, as in the judgment of the chancellor the best interests of the property require. If it appears in any case that a coupon-holder, from improper motives, or from a simple greed for his money, is willing to wreck a large property, and comes into a court of equity upon the happening of a temporary default, it goes without saying that the chancellor holds his hands until it becomes apparent that the property as a whole cannot be saved to its owners. Inasmuch as these proceedings stand upon the discretion of a court of equity, it is not strange that the parties were willing to leave to the bondholders and coupon-holders an open door into such a court. They left an open door into a court at law, and there is at least equal chance, if not greater, that the freer motions of a court of equity will afford as full protection to the mortgagor. These considerations, perhaps not very clearly expressed, are the reasons which have led me to hold that this case is within the rule laid down in 106 U. S. 47, 1 Sup. Ct. 10, supra, and that this suit is not prematurely brought.

That only passes from one trouble to another. The right to foreclose does not carry with it the right to a receiver. There are many considerations that bear upon that question. Every case, of course, stands on its own merits. It is difficult to formulate any rule which, briefly stated, will control in all cases. It should appear that there is some danger to the property; that its protection, its preservation, the interests of the various holders, require possession by the court before a receiver should be appointed. It does not go as a matter of course; and yet it is not a matter that a court can refuse simply because it is an annoyance. If, looking at the situation of the litigating parties, and of the property, with the prospects of the future, it should appear to a court that they would be benefited, that their interests would be subserved by the appointment of a receiver, why, no court—although a matter resting, as it is said, in its discretion—could refuse to make the appointment.

I shall not go over all the matters that have been discussed. I want to suggest some things that have impressed me. Of course, so far as the adequacy of this security, so far as the solvency of the corporation, is concerned, so far as the question whether this is a temporary embarrassment or permanent, these facts stand out confessed, indisputable at least. It has ceased to pay interest on its mortgages; one, two, three, and four have defaulted. The amount of that interest runs considerably over a million; and the payment of interest on the large mortgage comes due in two months. The business of this year from the 1st of June to the 1st of September, as shown by the statistics, is decreasing; from the 1st of September to the 14th there was a slight increase. The road is not along the main highway of travel eastward and westward. It is one running north and south, along which business to-day is, as we all in the west know, comparatively in its inception. It crosses for two or three hundred miles a territory which is occupied by Indians, and furnishes little business. It has been for years the only road that traversed that territory. Within the last year or two, two more roads have crossed, and a third is seeking to cross. Competition between these roads traversing that territory, and bringing Texas and its commerce into relations with Kansas, Missouri, and the north, as a matter of necessity, it seems to me, must tend against the increase of earnings.

The report of the committee—a committee appointed by the company—tends to show that the payment of interest which has been made prior to this year, has been largely at the expense of the proper repairs and improvement of the road. I do not mean to say that all this is absolutely conclusive on the question, but these are matters which have forced themselves upon my mind. While it is true that—the road paying no interest since the 1st of June—the revenues have diminished by four or five hundred thousand, the amount which is due as claimed to the Missouri Pacific for advancements, yet the earnings must increase largely before these back interests can be met, to say nothing of future interests speedily maturing. That a road thus situated, some 1,600 miles in length, is burdened with a mortgage of $28,000 a mile, carries with it, to my mind, very strong evidence that there is no reasonable probability of its ever being kept in proper condition when paying the interest on such a debt. The only way in which any mortgagee can get possession of the rents and profits is through a receiver. The law of Kansas forbids any other remedy upon a mortgage than a foreclosure in the court. No possession could be had under article 2. No sale could be made under the power attempted to be given in article 3. The sole remedy is by foreclosure. Unless a receiver is appointed, the rents and profits pass into the possession of the mortgagor, to be expended by it according to its best judgment. That is affirmed by the three cases of Railroad Co. v. Cowdrey, 11 Wall. 463; Gilman v. Telegraph Co., 91 U. S. 603; and Dow v. Railway Co., 124 U. S. 652, 8 Sup. Ct. 673. Not merely that; suppose this foreclosure proceeding should pass to a decree, and the defendant appeal, its bond on appeal would be no protection to the mortgagee in respect to the rents and profits. That is settled in the case of Kountze v. Hotel Co., 107 U. S. 378, 2 Sup. Ct. 911. So that this litigation might proceed and continue for a long time in this and in the supreme court, without ever giving the mortgagee a hold upon the profits, unless a receiver is appointed. This mortgage is a second mortgage on a large part of the road. As such mortgagee it has, more than any other party, an interest in reaching after and securing those rents and profits. The first mortgagee, having a limited amount upon the part of the road upon which its mortgage rests, may feel safe; for his principal and interest must be paid before the second mortgagee can come in. So that the complainant has a special interest in reaching for, and as soon as possible obtaining possession of, the surplus earnings. More than that, it is perfectly obvious that the real owners of this property are not in harmony. The stock controls the road, but with $45,000,000 of bonded indebtedness—$28,000 a mile—on the road, the real owners are the bondholders, and that they are not agreed in respect to what shall be done with this property is, I think, confessed. For years the property was in the management of a certain interest. That interest was removed last spring from the control. It was not removed so long as the road was apparently prosperous, and paying its coupons. When adversity threatened it, as was natural, those who held interests in the road were not satisfied with the management, and sought control. If these gentlemen now in control could make it a promptly paying road within a reasonable time, why, it might be expected, according to the laws of human nature, that they would remain in control; but we all know how, when one fails and continues to fail, all who are interested are prone to lay the responsibility upon him, and to seek a change. And there is no certainty that another year different interests might not combine, and so the road be subject to different control. At any rate, it is very evident that there is no harmony—no unity of purpose—between those who are the real owners. Now, if it were a partnership, and it was apparent to a court that the partners had got into a quarrel, the very fact of their quarrel would be a strong reason why it should take possession of the property. Of course that consideration has not so much force in respect to a corporation, but it strengthens other considerations. Those are the principal reasons that have operated on my mind,—the default in interest, the fact that the rents and profits can only be appropriated in this way, the decreasing revenues, the recent construction of parallel roads, the fact that it passes through such a portion of territory so unprofitable, the condition of the road as developed by this report of the committee, and the conflict between various parties having real and substantial interests. Much as I should be glad to be free from the annoyance of a receivership,—and I know something about it,—it seems to me I should be delinquent if I refused this application. There are some minor matters that I might refer to, yet, perhaps, they would not strengthen anything I have said.

There is one matter, however, I must notice,—the suggestion of the Missouri Pacific that it could defeat this application, and that it was here in the attitude of a party to consent upon the condition that the balance due it was properly protected, and that no order should be made in reference to the possession by the receiver of the International & Great Northern Railroad or its stock. If I understood the situation to be that this application depended on the consent of the lessee, the Missouri Pacific, and its consent was tendered upon any such condition as that, there would be no receiver appointed. The rights of the lessee, as I look upon these two instruments, are subordinate to the rights of the mortgagee, and it is the mortgagee whose application is sustained, and all parties having claims of any kind must depend upon the inherent equity of their claims. So far as the stock in the International & Great Northern is concerned, as well as some other assets, they are, as stated, now under pledge, and in the possession of this complainant; perhaps, also, attached by certain garnishment proceedings. I think the interests of the mortgagor require that there should go an order upon the complainant not to part with that possession, except in obedience, of course, to the process of the courts in New York, until the ultimate rights of the parties are determined. As to the possession of the International & Great Northern, I doubt whether it is within the province of this court to determine that question. It is a separate road, whose stock, I believe, in part has become the property of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas corporation; but it is wholly situated in another circuit, and certainly at present I am not prepared to say that this court would have a right to determine whether a receiver of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas should take possession of that separate road. It may be that is a question which will have to be determined by the judge of that circuit. At any rate, I should not at present, without further consideration, perhaps consultation with Judge Pardee, feel like making any order in respect to it. It is a matter in which I shall be glad to hear counsel hereafter upon, and perhaps try and arrange with Judge Pardee jointly to hear them as soon as practical. That, I think, is about all I have to say in reference to this matter, except as to the receiver. If parties agree upon a receiver, of course I shall appoint whoever you agree upon. If not, I will hear any suggestions from any of the parties in interest, and reasons for or against any person to be named by one side or the other.

BELDING et al. v. MELOCHE et al.

Supreme Court of Michigan. May 28, 1897.

Appeal from circuit court, Ionia county, in chancery; Frank D. M. Davis, Judge.

Suit by Alvah N. Belding and another against Albert F. Meloche and others. From a decree for complainants, defendants Meloche appeal. Affirmed.

R. A. Hawley, for appellants. McGarry & Nichols, for appellees.

HOOKER, J. On May 2, 1892, the complainants sold to the Meloches (two of the defendants), upon contract, a business block in the village of Belding, at an agreed price of $36,000, to be paid in 120 monthly installments of $300, without interest. The contract does not expressly state that the vendees shall be entitled to possession, but does provide that, in case of default, the vendors may "elect to consider themselves released and discharged of and from any and all liability in any of the covenants specified to be done and performed by them, and all improvements made by the said parties of the second part shall be deemed forfeited as stipulated damages for the non-fulfillment of this contract; and said parties of the first part, or their authorized agent, may, without notice to quit or demand of possession, re-enter into and repossess the said premises, and the said parties of the second part, and each and every occupant hired by, through, or under them, to remove and put out; it being expressly understood that such failure of said second parties shall forfeit all claim, either in law or in equity, which might otherwise exist on the provisions of this contract in favor of the said parties of the second part." The vendees made default in the payments, and this bill of complaint was filed to foreclose their rights under the contract. At this time portions of the building were rented, and the bill prayed the appointment of a receiver, to receive the rents and profits of said premises, and such receiver was appointed, and has received said rents. A decree of foreclosure and sale was made, and, after the sale occurred, an order of confirmation was entered. No appeal was taken from any of the proceedings thus far. Subsequently, the complainants filed their petition, alleging that on March 9, 1896, a decree was entered for the complainants for the sum of $6,172.44 and costs, making a total of $6,648.30; that, at a sale of the interest of the Meloches in said premises, the complainants purchased the same for $3,000, and that there was a deficiency of $3,648.30; that the final account of the receiver, duly filed, shows a balance in his hands at the date of the report of $2,349.36, which, after the allowance of compensation to and disbursements by the receiver, would leave $1,856.98, which the petition prays may be applied upon the deficiency, and that it be declared that the remaining deficiency constitute a personal judgment, upon which execution may issue against the Meloches. A decree was made in accordance with the prayer of the petition, and the defendants Meloche appealed.

It is claimed—First, that the court had no authority to appoint a receiver to take the rents during the foreclosure, and that the moneys collected should not be turned over to the complainants; second, that there should be no decree for a deficiency against the appellants, because, upon the trial of the case, counsel for complainant stated that they did not care to ask a personal decree.

Counsel base their first contention upon a class of cases which hold that, under How. Ann. St. § 7847, the mortgagee is not entitled to the profits of land during foreclosure. See Wagar v. Stone, 36 Mich. 366. In that case the court said: "The mortgagor is entitled to the possession during the proceedings taken to foreclose the mortgage, and until a sale has been made and the title of the purchaser has become absolute; and, until the title has become absolute upon a foreclosure of the mortgage, an action of ejectment cannot be maintained by the mortgagee, his assigns or representatives, to recover possession of the mortgaged premises. 2 Comp. Laws, § 6263. Since the passage of this act, which prevents the mortgagee from obtaining possession until he has acquired an absolute title to the mortgaged premises, the mortgage binds only the lands. The rents and profits of the land do not enter into or form any part of the security. At the time of giving the security, both parties understand that the mortgagor will, and that the mortgagee will not, be entitled to the rents, issues, or profits of the mortgaged premises until the title shall have become absolute upon a foreclosure of the mortgage. Until the happening of this event, the mortgagor has a clear right to the possession and to the income which he may derive therefrom; and the legislature, by the passage of this statute, contemplated that he should have such possession and income to aid him in paying the debt. It would be a novel doctrine to hold that the mortgagee had a right to the profits incident to ownership, and yet that he had neither a legal title, nor right to possession. The legislature, in depriving him of the means of enforcing possession, intended thereby also to cut off and deprive him of all rights which he could have acquired in case he obtained possession before acquiring an absolute title. To deprive him of this particular remedy, and yet allow him in some other proceedings to, in effect, arrive at the same result, would be but a meaningless proceeding, and would not be securing to the mortgagor those substantial rights which it was the evident intent he should have. We do not overlook the fact that a contrary doctrine has been held elsewhere under a similar statute. We cannot avoid thinking, however, that for us to so hold would be but a mere evasion of our statute." In Michigan Trust Co. v. Lansing Lumber Co., 103

Mich. 393, 402, 61 N. W. 668, we recognized the validity of a contract whereby possession by the mortgagee may precede foreclosure; and the case of Wagar v. Stone shows that in other states possession may be given to receivers pending foreclosure of mortgages, and the decision in that case is made to rest upon the statute. The statute does not in terms apply to equitable mortgages if we should hold this to be one. In the Wagar Case the court said that the object of the legislature was that the mortgagor "should have possession to aid him in paying the debt"; but in this case the vendee seeks to avoid the payment of the debt, and to appropriate the fund in the hands of the receiver, to the exclusion of the complainants' just claim.

Again, it is contended that the complainants are not entitled to a personal decree for the deficiency. This claim seems to rest upon an alleged waiver or estoppel, by what occurred upon the hearing of the original case. It does not appear to have been set up in the answer to the petition, and is said not to have been claimed in the circuit court upon the hearing. We do not discover that this statement is disputed. Under these circumstances, we think the order of the circuit court in chancery should be affirmed, with costs; and it is so ordered. The other justices concurred.

MARSHALL & ILLSLEY BANK v. CADY
et al.

(77 N. W. 831, 75 Minn. 241.)

Supreme Court of Minnesota. Jan. 9, 1899.

Appeal from district court, Ramsey county; Charles E. Otis, Judge.

Action by the Marshall & Illsley Bank against Frank M. Cady and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant Cady appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. J. Berryhill, for appellant. William G. White, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Assuming, without deciding, that an order appointing a receiver in foreclosure during the pendency of the action can be reviewed on appeal from the final judgment or decree, we are of opinion that, while the plaintiff did not present a very strong case, yet we could not hold that the court abused its discretion in appointing a temporary receiver. The affidavits presented would have justified the court in finding that the mortgaged premises were inadequate security; that the mortgagor was insolvent; that four years' taxes were unpaid and delinquent, for three of which the premises had been sold, and unredeemed; that portions of the building on the premises were somewhat out of repair, and that repairs were necessary for the full preservation of the property; and that the mortgagor was receiving rent for part of the premises, which he was not applying to the payment of taxes or the making of repairs. There was some evidence that the mortgagor was using a part of the building as his sleeping apartments, and, hence, that the premises were his homestead. While a court should ordinarily require a somewhat stronger showing for the appointment of a receiver of the mortgagor's homestead than in the case of other property, yet, when a debtor mortgages his homestead, he subjects the property to all the ordinary legal and equitable rights of a mortgagee, among which is the right to have a receiver appointed when necessary to prevent waste or to preserve the property. The same facts which would justify the court in appointing a receiver during the pendency of the action would justify it in providing in the final judgment that the receivership should be continued. As there is neither a "case" nor bill of exceptions, the question whether the evidence justified the findings is not presented. The findings are presumed to have been based upon the evidence introduced on the trial, and not upon the affidavits presented on the motion for the appointment of a receiver during the pendency of the action. The judgment is silent as to the duration of the receivership. No point is made on this by the defendant; but we mention the fact in order that it may not be inferred that we impliedly hold that a receivership could be continued after a foreclosure sale, or that the rents and profits of the property could be applied towards paying the mortgage debt, or used for any other purpose than to prevent waste and preserve the property. The judgment should be affirmed. So ordered.

BUCK, J. I dissent. I think that the evidence quite conclusively shows that the premises are Cady's homestead, and this is one of the material facts that lead me to think that the receiver should not, upon the evidence adduced, have been appointed. When the trial court appointed the receiver, it was done by the court upon affidavits submitted by the respective parties. The application therefor was made in the month of July, 1897, but not granted until October 29, 1897. All of the affidavits upon which the receiver was appointed appear in the record, and the sufficiency of the plaintiff's affidavits are assailed and contradicted by the defendants' counter affidavit. Not only was a receiver appointed by order of the court, and therein directed to collect, all and singular, the rents, profits, and income of the premises, but by a subsequent order of the court the defendant Cady was ordered, within five days after the service upon him of the order, to quit, surrender, and deliver up to the receiver said premises, and vacate the same. It is true that the judgment appealed from is dated November 12, 1897, and the last order directing the defendant Cady was not made until November 20, 1897, and not appealed from. But, as I regard this case, this is immaterial. The gist of the controversy is over the right to appoint a receiver at all. Probably, if there existed a sufficient cause to appoint a receiver in the first instance, and the case appeared to be one where ordinarily the right of a receiver to act at all was presented, the appointment would carry with it the right to the possession of the property. It is the right to invoke the aid of the court in the first instance, upon the case being presented, which in my opinion is one of more than serious doubt. Such a proceeding is an extraordinary remedy, sometimes, and perhaps I might say frequently, operating harshly, and the circumstances of peril which invoke the remedy should be established with reasonable certainty. Such appointment is not a matter of right, and should not be used where its exercise will produce injustice, and the fact should be clearly proved. Beach, Rec. 65-68. And this rule is strictly applied in mortgage cases, where it must clearly and fairly appear that the security is inadequate, or there is imminent danger of waste, removal, or destruction of the property. Id. 574. Mere default in the payment of the debt would not be sufficient ground for the appointment of a receiver. It is true that power to make the appointment of a receiver is generally discretionary, yet "the judicial authority to deal with property by means of a receiver is not unlimited or absolute." Id. 2. "It must be exercised in conformity to the general principles of equity jurisprudence. The petition should, therefore, state clearly the facts upon which the application is made, and also give proof of the same. If this is not done, the relief will be denied, and the burden of proof is always upon the petitioner." Id. 567.

As I differ from my associates, it is proper that I should fully examine the evidence which formed the basis for such appointment. The only evidence presented was by affidavits. The plaintiff presented three which showed that the property was worth $3,500, and one that the house alone was worth $1,500. The defendants presented five affidavits which showed that the value of the property ranged from $5,800 to $4,400, averaging $5,220, and the affidavit of another person states the value of the house to be $2,500 alone. The total average value of the property was $4,360. This is more than $500 over the entire judgment in foreclosure, including interest and costs up to the time of the judgment. This was all the evidence introduced upon the question of the value of the premises, and I think that the plaintiff's evidence in this respect was clearly refuted by that of the defendants. The only evidence of waste or act of omission of duty in this respect on the part of Cady was that of one witness for plaintiff, who gave details tending to show that the dwelling house needed repairs to the amount of $400; but no other one of plaintiff's witnesses testified to any such fact, and this testimony is squarely refuted by five of defendants' witnesses. I am not willing to take his testimony alone as outweighing that of all of the others. It certainly does not, in my mind, justify the appointment of a receiver, where the rule is, in such case, that the injury or impairment of the security must be imminent. Union Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Union Mills Plaster Co., 37 Fed. 286.

I now come to the consideration of the question that the premises were the homestead of the defendant, and which he was occupying as such, and whether a stricter rule should not be applied in the appointment of a receiver to take possession of such property, and apply the income, rents, and profits thereof towards the payment of the mortgage debt. This question is one of great importance, and, if a receiver can thus be appointed, it will greatly disturb, if not substantially destroy, the homesteads of thousands of people, especially in our cities and villages, where the use of homesteads, and rental therefrom, often constitute part of the income, and frequently the only income, for the support of the family itself. As I have stated, the appointment of a receiver is a drastic measure, and to permit it to be used to oust a man and his family from their home, and sequester the income, rental, and profits thereof, is to deprive them of all the benefits of a homestead in a most summary manner. It certainly is a most extraordinary proceeding which authorizes such a step. Waples, in his work on Homestead (page 720), says: "It is questionable whether it is ever proper to take possession of a mortgagor's homestead while proceedings to foreclose are pending. Certainly it is not proper practice as a general rule. An application for such appointment should always be refused when the amount of the mortgage debt is a subject of contention in the case." Of course, I do not overlook the doctrine laid down in this court in the case of Lowell v. Doe, 44 Minn. 144, 46 N. W. 297, where it was held that the homestead rights of the mortgagors are subject to the ordinary legal and equitable rights of the mortgagees in respect to the mortgaged premises, which may be enforced by the appropriate remedies; citing Gen. St. 1878, c. 68, § 2 (Gen. St. 1894, § 5522), which provides that the homestead exemption shall not extend to any mortgage thereon lawfully obtained. But the homestead law looks with favor upon homesteads, for the good of society and for the protection of family life in all classes, and seeks to save them from the rapacity of creditors, and from destruction, so far as it can without injustice to others. The reasons for this are many and cogent. To this end, I think that all steps to deprive the owner of a homestead of the right of himself and family to occupy and receive the benefits of it during foreclosure of a mortgage upon it should not be permitted, or should be resorted to only in extreme cases, and where justice would be defeated by withholding it, and only in cases reasonably clear and free from doubt. This is not such a case. It is a notorious fact that in many instances the receiver, in the performance of what he claims to be his duty, incurs large expenses, greatly lessening the assets which should go to the payment of the debt itself, and this operates to the detriment of both parties to the action. In other words, the benefit to the owner of the homestead and his family, as a home and support, might be appropriated to the support of the receiver, by way of fees and expenses, with loss to both parties to the action. Our statute provides that "a mortgage of real estate is not to be deemed a conveyance so as to enable the owner of the mortgage to recover possession of the real estate without a foreclosure." Gen. St. 1894, § 5861. This is an express statutory enactment, so far as possession is concerned, and the owner of the mortgage is prohibited from taking possession of the property without foreclosure. Of course, this means that no right of possession arises until the period of redemption expires, viz. one year after foreclosure. If possession of land is wrongfully withheld after foreclosure, and after final decree, the court may then compel delivery of possession to the party entitled thereto, by order directing the sheriff to effect such delivery. Id. § 6073. Thus, by clear and express statutory provisions, means are provided for obtaining possession of lands upon which mortgages are foreclosed. But until such time the mortgagee has no title, and no right of possession. It is true that, notwithstanding the law expressly exempts a homestead, Gen. St. 1894, § 5522, provides that "such exemption shall not extend to any mortgage thereon lawfully obtained"; but this provision does not operate to deprive the owner of the right to the possession of the homestead during the period of redemption from foreclosure sale. Now, the appointment of a receiver is one purely of an equitable origin; and whether it can, in the case of a homestead, supersede the express statutory enactment which forbids possession by the owner of the mortgage during foreclosure, may well admit of serious doubt. Equity is not intended to operate harshly, but a doctrine which permits a receiver, upon the commencement of a foreclosure action, to take immediate possession of the homestead, oust the family, and receive the rents and income of the property, seems unjust and a harsh measure. Such a right is denied in Investment Co. v. Farrar (Iowa) 54 N. W. 361, upon the ground that it is a violation of the statutory rights of the mortgagor, even in a case not involving homestead rights. See, also, cases cited in 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1522. But even if the power exists to appoint a receiver to oust the owner of a homestead and his family, and take possession of the property, and deprive them of the use and benefits thereof, and thus cut short the statutory right of redemption, I think the facts in this case fall far short of making this an extraordinary case which justifies such an extraordinary remedy, and that the receiver ought not to have been appointed. I think that the judgment should be reversed.

(31 Atl. 211.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Feb. 26, 1895

Bill by Frank W. Wiedemann against Annie Sann and others to foreclose a mortgage, and for an injunction, and for appointment of a receiver. Receiver appointed.

Gilbert & Atkinson, for complainant. H. Budd, for defendants.

BIRD, V. C. The bill in this case is filed to foreclose a mortgage of chattels given by Annie Sann, asking for an injunction against an attaching creditor, whose attachment issued against Charles Sann, and also asking for a receiver. The chattel mortgage bears date January 11, 1895, and was duly recorded on the same day. It was given to secure the payment of $550, money loaned to the mortgagor. The whole of the said loan, together with interest, is claimed to be due to the complainant. The bill states that on the 9th day of January, being two days before the execution and delivery of the chattel mortgage aforesaid, one Sarah M. Hall procured to be issued a writ of attachment out of the circuit court of the county of Burlington against one Charles Sann on the demand for $650, under which writ of attachment an auditor has been appointed, and that the said auditor has been ordered by the said circuit court to sell all of the said goods and chattels as perishable property, and that the said auditor has advertised all of the said goods and chattels for sale, in his advertisement or notice of sale giving assurance to bidders that he will sell the said goods and chattels free from all liens or incumbrances. The complainant, having obtained an injunction restraining the auditor from selling, now asks for the appointment of a receiver with authority to sell the said personal property. This is resisted by the plaintiff in the attachment. It will be perceived that the complainant claims that these goods and chattels were the goods and chattels of Annie Sann, and that the plaintiff in the attachment claims them as the goods and chattels of Charles Sann. Charles Sann is the husband of Annie Sann. The complainant rests his case upon the rule laid down by Chancellor Green in Smithurst v. Edmunds, 14 N. J. Eq. 408. The case in hand is not like that. In that case the property which execution creditors offered for sale was not claimed by such creditors as the property of another person than the mortgagor of the same goods. As to that there was no dispute. Hence the question now before me is, can this court appoint a receiver in a foreclosure case to take charge of and sell personal property for the purpose of preserving it, covered by the mortgage sought to be foreclosed, when that same property has been attached by the creditor of another person, as the property of that other person, and has been advertised to be offered for sale by an auditor appointed in said attachment proceedings? In Moore v. Diamant, 41 N. J. Eq. 612, 7 Atl. 509, in the court of errors and appeals, a question somewhat like the present was before the court. In that case Hammell confessed judgment to his creditors, who levied upon certain goods and chattels. Moore filed a bill in this court, alleging that he had been in partnership with Hammell, and that Hammell became indebted to him as partner, and that, to satisfy such indebtedness, Hammell had made to him a bill of sale of all his interest in these goods and chattels, and asked for and obtained an injunction restraining the execution creditors of Hammell from proceeding to a sale. A receiver was appointed in that case, and, upon Moore's offering to give a bond to take care of the property, and to return it or to pay the value thereof, except in case of unavoidable accident, such bond was accepted. From this brief statement it will appear that execution creditors claimed a lien upon the property as the property of one man,—Hammell, their debtor,—while Moore claimed it as his own individual property absolutely, by virtue of a bill of sale made to him by Hammell, and that a receiver was appointed. The question involved in that case was one of title to personal property; Moore, the complainant, claiming the title was in himself, while the creditors of Hammell claimed that the title was in Hammell, and that they, as his creditors, by virtue of their judgments and executions, had a right to sell the same. It is claimed in this case that the question involved is purely a question of title to personal property, strictly legal in its nature, and can be determined by an action of replevin, and that consequently a court of equity has no jurisdiction. The case cited seems to present the same characteristics. Moore filed his bill, and claimed the property levied upon by virtue of a bill of sale, praying an injunction against such sale under the executions at law. Clearly, in such case, the principal question to be decided was whether the title was in Moore or Hammell. In the case now under consideration the question to be determined is whether the title to the property named in the chattel mortgage was in Annie Sann or in her husband, Charles Sann. If that were all, it might well be said that in neither case would this court be justified in assuming jurisdiction. But in the case cited, if the property which Moore claimed were to be sold by the execution creditors, with the conflicting claims of title thereto, he might, in a variety of ways, suffer great loss; which view is, in every sense, applicable to the case before me. In that case it was distinctly held in the court of errors and appeals that this court had the right to proceed to settle the rights of the parties by virtue of the bond given, notwithstanding a decree dismissing the bill of complaint. In this case the complainant claims a lien upon the goods and chattels by virtue of her mortgage. She undoubtedly has a right to file her bill to foreclose such mortgage, which beyond question gives the court jurisdiction.

But still the further question arises, can this court, because it is the only tribunal authorized to foreclose a mortgage upon goods and chattels, appoint a receiver to take charge of and sell such goods and chattels, when they are claimed by and under attachment by the creditors of another person than the mortgagor, and offered for sale by an auditor appointed in such attachment proceedings? There is a well-settled rule that courts of equity have the right and power to take possession of property about which are conflicting claims, for the purpose of preserving it until the rights of the respective parties thereto have been settled. May this rule be applied to the present case? It is evident, if the auditor makes sale of the goods and chattels because they are perishable, they will be likely to sell for a nominal price only, and will also be likely to go into the possession of many different persons. The fact that the complainant makes claim in the manner in which he does will cast such a shadow upon the title as to deter prudent men from bidding. The fact that they will in all probability go into the hands of many different persons would make it obligatory upon the complainant, if it should turn out that the title thereto be in him, to bring as many actions at law as there are purchasers. High, Rec. § 192. "A court of equity, appointing a receiver to take possession of property pending a litigation concerning the rights of the parties thereto, is vested with the power to sell the property in the receiver's hands, whenever such course becomes necessary to preserve the interest of all the parties." Id.; Crane v. Ford, Hopk. Ch. 114. When a court of equity properly acquires jurisdiction of the parties and of the subject-matter in a cause, and appoints a receiver therein, and orders him to sell the property in controversy, such order, although irregular and improvident, cannot be assailed or questioned in a collateral action, and such action will not lie to set aside the order of sale and proceedings thereunder. High, Rec. § 196; Libby v. Rosekrans, 55 Barb. 219; Brande v. Bond, 63 Wis. 140, 23 N. W. 101. It being evident that the auditor cannot make sale of these goods except under great disadvantage, and that, if it should ultimately appear that the title is in the chattel mortgagor, and it also appearing that since the mortgagee was justified in filing his bill in this court, thereby acquiring jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the court unquestionably having the authority to appoint a receiver, and it being the constant practice, when a receiver is appointed, to take possession of the perishable goods and chattels which are the subject of litigation, to make sale thereof for the purpose of preserving the value of them for the parties who may ultimately appear to be entitled thereto, I conclude that it is my duty to advise the appointment of a receiver in this case, with authority to make sale of the goods and chattels in question. The defendant, the attaching creditor, offered to give bonds for the value of the goods. A bond was offered and accepted in the case of Moore v. Diamant, supra, but in that case the person who gave the bond did not propose to sell them, as in this case the auditor proposes to do. I will advise accordingly.

STETSON v. NORTHERN INV. CO. et al.
(70 N. W. 595, 101 Iowa, 435.)

Supreme Court of Iowa. April 7, 1897.

Appeal from district court, Woodbury county; George W. Wakefield, Judge.

This appeal is by the plaintiff from an order and decree entered upon a motion to discharge the garnishees. The issues and facts appear in the opinion. Affirmed.

Shull & Farnsworth, for appellant. Joy, Call & Joy and William Milchrist, for appellees.

GIVEN, J. 1. Appellees moved to strike the appellant's abstract, which motion was overruled, and therefore we are to take the facts to be as shown in the abstract, the material parts of which are as follows: On April 11, 1895, this plaintiff commenced three separate actions to foreclose three mortgages executed by the defendant company to him to secure certain debts. These mortgages covered all of lots 4, 5, and 6, block 26, Middle Sioux City. Attachments were sued out in each case, and A. C. Baker and 16 others were served as garnishees. The answers of these garnishees showed that they are tenants of the defendant company, occupying premises other than that covered by plaintiff's mortgages, and that some of them occupied under verbal leases, and some under written leases, extending to different periods of the future. Their answers also showed that some of them were indebted for rents due, and that all would become indebted in the future under said leases. Plaintiff's three actions were consolidated, and formed the present action. On the 9th day of May, 1895, T. A. Black, though not a party to this action, filed his motion herein, supported by his affidavit, for the discharge of all of said garnishees except W. Chaffee, and showing as grounds therefor, in substance, as follows: That on the 11th day of April, 1895, in the case of Charles C. Harrison v. The Northern Investment Co. et al., then pending in said court for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon the real estate occupied by said garnishees, he was appointed and qualified as receiver of all the property of said company involved in said action; also, that he was appointed and qualified prior to the time said garnishees were served with notice of garnishment. Charles C. Harrison, though not a party to this action, did on the 18th day of May, 1895, file his motion joining with said Black in asking the discharge of said garnishees. By the record in the Case of Harrison, as it appears in the abstract, it was alleged in the petition that the Northern Investment Company was insolvent; that the property covered was insufficient to pay the mortgages and taxes thereon. It was asked, for these and other reasons stated, that a receiver be appointed; and Mr. Baker was appointed and qualified as receiver for all the property of the company described in the mortgage to Mr. Harrison, and ordered to collect all rentals, income, and profits therefrom. It does not appear that any objections were made to the right of these persons to make such motions in this action. The motions having been submitted, the court says in the order complained of that "the court is of opinion, and doth adjudge, order, and decree, that as to all rentals payable or accruing on or before the 11th day of April, 1895, the said motion be, and is hereby, overruled, and as to all rentals accruing and payable after the 11th day of April, 1895, the said motion of T. A. Black, receiver, and C. C. Harrison is sustained." Following this, it was ordered that the amounts found to be due from the several garnishees up to April 11, 1895, be paid to the clerk of the court, and that upon payment the garnishees be discharged. It was further ordered as follows: "And upon the motion of T. A. Black, receiver as aforesaid, time is given him until the 20th day of August, 1895, to file his petition of intervention, claiming the funds so ordered to be paid to the clerk aforesaid."

2. Appellant presents in argument three contentions, namely, that the court had no authority to appoint a receiver under the allegations of Harrison's petition; that Harrison and Black could not give the court jurisdiction to discharge garnishees by simply filing motions in this cause; they not being parties thereto and not filing petitions of intervention; that the garnishment of the tenants made them liable to appellant, in case he is successful in this case against the company, for all rent accrued and to accrue. That part of Harrison's petition asking a receiver states numerous grounds, and at such length as that we should not take space to set them out. It is sufficient to say that the petition shows that the rents of the mortgaged premises are pledged for the payment of the debt, that they are not being applied, that the company is a foreign corporation; that it is insolvent, that the property is insufficient to pay the mortgages and overdue taxes, and other facts showing that the rents were in danger of being lost to the mortgagees. Conceding that the sufficiency of that petition in this respect may be questioned in this case, we think it was sufficient to warrant the appointment of a receiver.

3. Appellant does not question the right of Mr. Black, as receiver, if duly appointed, to intervene in this action to claim said rents, but denies his right to do so by motion. The record fails to disclose, except inferentially, that any such objection was made in the lower court. The abstract was prepared by other than the counsel now appearing, and with the view, no doubt, of not incumbering the abstract with more than was actually necessary to an understanding of the questions to be presented. Questionable as the record is as to this contention, we will consider it. It will be observed that the order of the court is not final, as between these parties, as to the rents due up to April 11, 1895. The court, having full jurisdiction over that fund, ordered it to be paid into court, to be held until the rights of these parties thereto are determined. There has been no final order or judgment against appellant as to that fund, and he has nothing of which to complain. The question as to which of these parties is entitled to that money is not before us, and we express no opinion thereon.

4. If nothing further appeared than the pendency of this action and the service and answers of the garnishees, it might be said that they are liable to appellant, in case he is successful in this action against the company, for rents accrued and to accrue under their leases. The mortgage from the Northern Investment Company to Charles C. Harrison contains the following: "And it is further agreed that if default shall be made in any of the conditions of this mortgage, or in the bond which it is made and given to secure, that the right of possession of the mortgaged premises, with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging, shall immediately vest in the party of the second part, his heirs or assigns, and he may immediately take possession of the same, and collect all rents, profits, and incomes therefrom, or, at his option, may proceed by foreclosure, and shall then be entitled to have a receiver appointed immediately, and in vacation, for all of the property herein described and embraced, to take charge of the said property, and collect rents, incomes, and profits of the same, to be applied upon the said mortgage debt." It seems to us entirely clear that under this provision the rents accruing from said mortgaged property after the appointment of the receiver are assets in his hands, and not subject to garnishment by other creditors. We do not think the court erred in either of the respects claimed, and the order and judgment are therefore affirmed.

FIRST NAT. BANK OF JOLIET v.
ILLINOIS STEEL CO.

Supreme Court of Illinois. June 18, 1898.

Appeal from appellate court, Second district.

Creditors' bill by the First National Bank of Joliet against the Ashley Wire Company and others for the appointment of a receiver, with which was consolidated a petition by the Illinois Steel Company, also for the appointment of a receiver. From a decree of the appellate court (72 Ill. App. 640) affirming a decree in favor of the Illinois Steel Company, the First National Bank of Joliet appeals. Affirmed.

This was a bill in the nature of a creditors' bill, filed December 26, 1893, by the First National Bank of Joliet, the appellant, against the Ashley Wire Company, a corporation in Joliet, Will county, Ill., which for many years had been engaged in the manufacture of barbed fence wire, wire nails, etc. The bill alleged the recovery of a judgment by said First National Bank of Joliet on the 14th day of December, 1893, for $12,657.77, against said Ashley Wire Company; that execution was issued and delivered to the sheriff the same day, which execution was returned, after demand made, "No property found." Alleged the recovery of a judgment on the 8th day of December, 1893, by John Y. Brooks against said Ashley Wire Company for $11,090, upon which execution had been issued and levied upon all the tangible personal property of said Ashley Wire Company, and that the value of such property so levied upon would not exceed $5,000; that the sheriff had not sold said property so levied upon, and it was not sufficient to satisfy the said Brooks execution. Alleged the execution by said Ashley Wire Company on the 19th day of July, 1893, to the Illinois Steel Company, of a note for $67,246.24, payable on or before two years after date, with interest at 5½ per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and secured by a mortgage on its manufacturing plant; that said Ashley Wire Company is insolvent, and for many months has suspended its business, and its plant has remained idle; that it has not been able for the last year to meet its trade obligations, and has been seriously embarrassed in its financial affairs; that said wire corporation is and remains in the possession of its real estate and manufacturing plant, and, while it is not worth said mortgage indebtedness, is a valuable property, and ought not to be allowed to deteriorate in value or be greatly hazarded by neglect or want of care; that watchmen should be in charge, insurance should be kept up, and taxes paid; that all this should be done in the interest of said corporation, its stockholders and creditors generally; that said corporation is without means to protect and preserve said property, and keep up its insurance or taxes; that the tangible property levied upon is of a kind and character so peculiar in its nature that it could not be sold at ordinary execution sale, except at a grievous sacrifice. Avers that the interests of defendant and all its creditors demand that a receiver should be appointed of its assets, both equitable and tangible; that said receiver should be directed to take possession of said manufacturing plant, its books of account, and its equitable assets and property. The Ashley Wire Company, John Y. Brooks, and Thomas Hennebry, as sheriff, were made parties defendant. Although the bill showed that the Illinois Steel Company, of Chicago, held a first mortgage on the Ashley Wire Company plant, machinery, etc., and was the principal creditor, yet it was not made a defendant to the bill. The appearance of the defendants was entered, and on the 26th day of December, 1893, the defendants not objecting, the court appointed George W. Bush receiver. The order invests him with all the authority and power usually granted receivers of courts of chancery, and directs that he at once take possession of the real estate and manufacturing plant of said Ashley Wire Company, together with all the machinery, tools, implements, and appliances connected therewith, and constituting real estate, as part and parcel of said plant; that he care for all such property, that it may not be wasted or deteriorate for want of proper care; that he keep the buildings insured in responsible insurance companies in a reasonable amount; and that he pay all taxes legally levied upon such real estate. It was further ordered that the said sheriff turn over to the receiver all the personal property levied upon by him under the execution in favor of John Y. Brooks, such sheriff to retain the execution, and the lien of such execution is preserved upon all such property levied upon, and the proceeds thereof levied upon by said sheriff, and turned over to said receiver. The receiver presented a petition on February 19, 1894, as to the payment of taxes, which states that there was duly assessed against and levied upon the personal property of the Ashley Wire Company for the year 1893 $799.10 taxes, and that he has no money with which to pay said taxes, or the real estate taxes then due, and prays that an order be entered authorizing him to pay such taxes, and that he may be permitted to borrow money therefor. On the 26th of February, 1894, an order was entered authorizing the receiver to pay the taxes assessed upon the real estate, and authorizing the receiver to borrow money for that purpose at such legal rate of interest as he may be able, and to issue therefor his receiver's certificate, which was by the order of the court declared to be a first and prior lien upon the real estate of said Ashley Wire Company. The court denied the prayer of the petition as to the payment of the personal property tax. On March 5, 1894, the Illinois Steel Company asked leave of the court to make George W. Bush, receiver, a party defendant to a chancery proceeding, which the court granted; and on the 7th day of March, 1894, the steel company filed a bill to foreclose its mortgage against the Ashley Wire Company plant, making said Ashley Wire Company, the First National Bank of Joliet, John Y. Brooks, and George W. Bush, the receiver, defendants. On the 12th day of July, 1894, after the commencement of the foreclosure proceedings, the receiver borrowed of the Illinois Steel Company $2,037.82, in pursuance of the court's order, for the purpose of paying taxes, and issued a receiver's certificate therefor. The mortgage upon which the foreclosure proceedings were based, against the Ashley Wire Company, was to secure the note for $67,246.24, payable on or before two years after date, with interest at 5½ per cent. per annum; and the mortgagor expressly covenanted to keep the buildings insured for $50,000, for the benefit of the Illinois Steel Company, mortgagee. It also contained a clause authorizing the appointment of a receiver, with power to collect the rents, issues, and profits during the period of redemption, in case of a foreclosure of the mortgage, and that such rents and profits should be applied towards the payment of the indebtedness. Answers were filed by the Ashley Wire Company and the First National Bank, defendants. A final decree of foreclosure was awarded the Illinois Steel Company January 14, 1895, and the property was sold to the said steel company for $70,000. The master reported an unpaid balance, and a deficiency decree or judgment under the statute was entered for the deficit of $5,316.50, with interest from March, 1895, and execution was awarded thereon. On the 10th of April, 1895, the Illinois Steel Company filed its petition in the foreclosure case, setting up the decree of foreclosure and the sale, the deficiency decree for $5,316.50, and the foregoing provision in regard to the appointment of a receiver by the court to collect rents until the time of redemption, and asking for the appointment of a receiver. A hearing was had June 20, 1895, and the court refused to appoint a new receiver, but extended the receivership of George M. Bush existing over the property of the Ashley Wire Company by virtue of an order in the case of the First National Bank of Joliet, so that said receiver should stand as a receiver appointed in the case of the Illinois Steel Company against the Ashley Wire Company, and that the receivership be extended to include the property and effects of the Ashley Wire Company; and the receiver was directed to receive the rents, and hold the same for all persons who should be found entitled thereto. The receiver had previously, under the order of the court, leased the Ashley wire plant for one year from December 1, 1894, for $6,000, with the privilege of another year, at the option of the lessee, on the same terms. The receiver collected in all for rents $12,000, and after paying the taxes and expenses there was left in his hands $4,373.48. On March 3, 1897, the petition of the Illinois Steel Company was, by agreement of parties, consolidated with the cause of the First National Bank of Joliet against the Ashley Wire Co. et al., and was to be heard and disposed of as one case by decree to be entered in the case of the First National Bank of Joliet against Ashley Wire Co. et al. The principal contention is over the distribution of the balance of $4,373.48; the trial court decreeing this amount to be paid the Illinois Steel Company out of the moneys in the receiver's hands derived from rents, to be indorsed on the deficiency decree. From this decree of the circuit appellant appealed to the appellate court for the Second district, which affirmed the decree of the circuit court; and from the judgment of the appellate court appellant has appealed to this court, and asks for the reversal of the judgment of the appellate court.

CRAIG, J. (after stating the facts). It is first contended by appellant that the Illinois Steel Company, the mortgagee, having obtained its decree of foreclosure and sale, and applied the proceeds, the mortgage has accomplished its purpose, and is functus officio; that no further rights or equities can be enforced by the Illinois Steel Company. The claim of appellee is that the provision in the mortgage authorized the appointment of a receiver by the court to collect the rents and profits during the period of redemption, and, as the sale under the foreclosure decree did not pay the debt, to apply them in payment of the deficiency. The agreement in the mortgage is as follows: "Upon the filing of any bill to foreclose this mortgage, in any court having jurisdiction thereof, such court may appoint A. F. Knox, or any proper person, receiver, with power to collect the rents, issues, and profits arising out of said premises during the pendency of such foreclosure suit, and until the time to redeem the same from any sale that may be made under any decree foreclosing this mortgage shall expire; and such rents, issues, and profits, when collected, may be applied towards the payment of the indebtedness and costs herein mentioned and described." Under this clause in the mortgage a lien is given, by express words, upon the rents and profits, and such an equitable lien a court of equity will enforce. Rents and profits are the subject of mortgage. Jones, in his work on Mortgages (volume 1, § 140), says: "A mortgage may be made of rents under a lease, and, although a right of entry be given the mortgagee, the mortgage is a mere security, like any other mortgage of real estate, and the mortgagor remains the real owner until foreclosure and sale." In section 771 he says: "A mortgagee has no specific lien upon the rents and profits of the mortgaged land, unless he has, in his mortgage, stipulated for a specific pledge of them as part of his security." This was expressly stipulated in this mortgage given by the Ashley Wire Company to appellee. Had there been no deficiency after the foreclosure sale of the Ashley Wire Company property and plant, the rents would have belonged to the owner of the equity of redemption. Under the express agreement in the mortgage, there being a deficiency of $5,316.50 after the sale, the Illinois Steel Company had an equitable right to have the rents and profits applied towards the payment of the deficiency decree, from the time of the foreclosure sale until the expiration of the time of redemption, and this right might properly be enforced on an application to the court to appoint a receiver. The contention by appellant in this case that the enforcement of this provision rests entirely in the sound discretion of the chancellor is not tenable. The chancellor was authorized to act under this clause in the mortgage, and appoint a receiver for the collection of the rents and profits during the period of redemption, to be applied on the deficiency decree. In the case of Oakford v. Robinson, 48 Ill. App. 270, which is similar to the one at bar, the mortgage contained a clause authorizing the appointment of a receiver, with power to take possession of the premises and collect the rents due and to become due thereon during the period allowed for redemption, and to apply the same in payment of any deficit, should the premises prove insufficient to pay the amount secured by the mortgage. In the decision of the case the court said: "The rents and profits of the land, as well as the land, were pledged by the mortgage for the security and payment of the amount due the appellee. This authorized the appointment of a receiver, in the discretion of the court, without regard to the solvency of the mortgagor. 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1516; 8 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 234. And such appointment was lawfully made, though by a decree subsequent to the original decree. Id., p. 239. By the appointment of the receiver the appellants obtained an equitable lien on the rents and profits of the land during the statutory period allowed for redemption, if necessary for the full payment of any deficiency in the security. In support of this view, see 1 Jones, Mortg. §§ 773-775; 2 Jones, Mortg. § 1536; High, Rec. §§ 643, 644; Beach, Rec. § 532." That a court of equity has power to appoint a receiver and grant equitable relief where there are no express words in the mortgage giving a lien upon rents and profits derived from the property is conceded. In such a case, whether relief will be granted is dependent upon the facts and circumstances at the time the application is made. This court said in Haas v. Society, 89 Ill. 498, at page 502: "We find the decided weight of American authority to be in favor of the proposition that the court may, even when the mortgage does not by express words give a lien upon the income derived from such property, appoint a receiver to take charge of it and collect the rents, issues, and profits arising therefrom. Such action will not be taken, however, unless it be made to appear the mortgaged premises are an insufficient security for the debt, and the person liable personally for the debt is insolvent, or at least of very questionable responsibility. A combination of these two things seems to be required in all the cases we have examined, and in one or more of the states it is held necessary still other elements should be conjoined to these before such procedure is justified." Tested even by this requirement, if the mortgage did not give a lien by express words, or authorize the appointment of a receiver, the facts in the case at bar show that the court committed no error. The deficiency decree itself evidences the fact that the Ashley Wire Company's property was insufficient security for the mortgage debt, and the facts established the allegation in the petition that the Ashley Wire Company, the mortgagor, was insolvent. Undoubtedly, a court of equity exercises a certain discretion, even where express words are used for the purpose of giving a lien on the income of the mortgaged property. The court must determine whether the language used in the mortgage is sufficient to give a lien on the income. In the one case the authority arises from the contract, the express words giving a lien on the rents and profits; in the other, the court exercises its equitable powers under the facts and circumstances presented at the time the application to appoint a receiver is made.

Appellant also contends that the final decree foreclosing the mortgage ought to have provided for a receiver to take possession of the rents and profits of the Ashley Wire Company pending the redemption; that a decree of foreclosure and sale, as to all questions that might have been adjudicated between the parties, is final. It could not be ascertained until after the sale whether there would be a deficit requiring the appointment of a receiver to collect the rents and profits during the time of redemption. Under the decree of foreclosure the property described in the mortgage was sold. The rents and profits to accrue during the period of redemption were not sold, and no order could be entered until it was ascertained at the foreclosure sale that the mortgaged premises were insufficient to pay the indebtedness evidenced by the mortgage. In Haas v. Society, supra, it was said (page 506): "The necessity for the appropriation of the rents to the payment of the mortgage debt may frequently not appear until after both decree and sale. The amount due is often matter of dispute, and can only be determined by the decree, and what the property will sell for can only be ascertained with certainty from the result of the judicial sale.

If an appropriation of the rents on the indebtedness is justified by the surrounding facts before sale, we see no good reason why the same and more weighty facts existing after sale may not warrant a similar procedure. The security, plainly, is not exhausted by the sale, for there is a fund included in it which is secondarily liable. It is true, the mortgagee has elected to foreclose and sell; but then he has pursued that remedy to the end, and without getting satisfaction of his debt, and he may avail himself of any just and equitable means of collecting the residue,—not that he may have such extraordinary remedy in all cases of a deficit in the proceeds, but only where it is indispensably necessary for his protection, and just and equitable. We hold, then, both upon the principles of equity that lie at the foundation of the chancery court, and upon authority, a receiver may sometimes be allowed after decree and sale, and that a mortgagee does not in all cases exhaust his security by a foreclosure and sale. It is, however, a power that the chancellor will be slow to exercise, except in an extreme case, and to prevent palpable wrong and injustice." The cases of Seligman v. Laubheimer, 58 Ill. 124, Ogle v. Koerner, 140 Ill. 170, 29 N. E. 563, and Davis v. Dale, 150 Ill. 239, 37 N. E. 215, cited by appellant in support of its contention that a decree of foreclosure and sale extinguishes the mortgage and renders the mortgage functus officio, are decided on a state of facts entirely different from the facts in this case. In Seligman v. Laubheimer, after a sale for less than the debt a junior mortgagee redeemed, and a petition was filed to order a resale to pay the balance due the first mortgagee. It was held that as to the property sold the mortgage was not operative, and a resale could not be had. No question of a mortgage of rents accruing during the statutory period of redemption was involved. In Ogle v. Koerner the facts were the same as to the mortgage, the sale, and redemption by an assignee of a second mortgage, who was a party, as in the Seligman Case. The tenor of the case, as to its application here, may be seen by the following quotation from the court's opinion (page 179, 140 Ill., and page 565, 29 N. E.): "A mortgage, or, as in this case, a deed of trust in the nature of a mortgage, vests in the party secured a lien upon the mortgaged premises. By virtue of that lien the mortgagee is entitled to have the mortgaged property sold under a decree of foreclosure, and the proceeds of the sale applied to the payment of the debt secured. This is the mode provided by law for the enforcement of the lien, and when the lien has been once enforced by the sale of the property it has, as to such property, expended its force and accomplished its purpose, and the property is no longer subject to it." In Davis v. Dale a mortgage was foreclosed. Pending foreclosure a receiver was appointed. The property was sold for the full amount of the debt, interest, and costs; but the receiver was continued, as appears, unnecessarily. The court said (page 243, 150 Ill., and page 216, 37 N. E.): "The only purpose of appointing a receiver at the instance of the mortgagee or cestui que trust under or trustee in the trust deed is to preserve the security of the mortgage or trust deed, and apply the rents, issues, and profits, when necessary, in discharge of the indebtedness; and it follows, necessarily, that where the property is bid off at the foreclosure sale for the full amount of the decree, interest, and costs, as was here done, the necessity for continuing the receiver ceases, and he should be discharged, and the possession restored to the owner of the equity of redemption. In any event, the possession of the receiver, and his receipt of the rents and profits arising from the property, would be for the benefit of the person entitled to the same, so that the parties acquired no additional right because the fund is in the hands of the receiver." The question involved in this case, to wit, where the property sold does not pay the mortgage debt, and where the mortgage has a provision that the rents and profits may be applied towards the payment of the indebtedness and costs, was not before the court in either of the cases cited by appellant. Here the receiver was properly appointed after the foreclosure decree and sale, as the security of the steel company was not exhausted by the sale. Moreover, the necessity for the appointment of a receiver, and the collection of the rents and profits, and their application to the payment of the deficiency, did not appear until after the foreclosure decree and sale.

Appellant also contends that the court erred in directing the receiver, in its several orders, to pay the taxes on the property of the Ashley Wire Company out of the funds in his hands derived from rents of the real estate. Appellant filed its bill to have the equitable assets of the Ashley Wire Company applied to the satisfaction of its judgment, and also to have these taxes paid by the receiver out of moneys collected by him. The bill alleges that said corporation defendant is and remains in the possession of its real estate and manufacturing plant, and, while not worth the said mortgage indebtedness, is a valuable property, and ought not to be allowed to deteriorate in value or be greatly hazarded by neglect or want of care; that watchmen should be in charge, insurance should be kept up, and taxes paid; that all this should be done in the interest of said corporation, its stockholders and creditors generally; that said corporation is without means to protect and preserve said property, keep up its insurance, or pay the taxes, and is without means to preserve, care for, and collect its equitable assets. The receiver was appointed on appellant's motion, and its own solicitor's name is recited in the order of the court December 26, 1893, inter alia: "That upon obtaining possession he properly care for all such property, to the end that it may not be wasted or deteriorate for want of proper care, that he keep the buildings and all improvements insured in responsible insurance companies in a reasonable amount, and that he pay all taxes and assessments legally levied upon such real estate." This order of the court has never been rescinded, so far as the record shows. The order of March 11, 1895, authorizing the receiver to pay the taxes of 1894, recites: "It is therefore ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the said George W. Bush, as receiver, out of the moneys in his hands pay to the said township collector the personal property taxes assessed against the said Ashley Wire Company for the year 1894, being the sum of $669.12, taking proper receipt therefor, and that said receiver in the making of said payment, all parties in interest in open court consenting thereto," etc. On June 20, 1895, the receiver, by appellant's counsel, presented his petition, and in the order of the court directing him to pay the taxes on the real estate the same order of consent appears. In Armstrong v. Cooper, 11 Ill. 540, this court said: "A decree made by consent cannot be appealed from, nor can error properly be assigned upon it. Even a rehearing cannot be allowed in the suit, nor can the decree be set aside by a bill of review. 1 Barb. Ch. Prac. 373." Smith v. Kimball, 128 Ill. 583, 21 N. E. 503; Roby v. Trust Co., 166 Ill. 336, 46 N. E. 1110. These orders being made at the request of appellant, and by consent, it cannot question their validity.

Objection is also made to the order of court directing the payment of the real and personal taxes for the year 1895 by the receiver. The amount paid was $1,874.41. The order extending the receiver on the petition of the Illinois Steel Company was made June 20, 1895, authorizing him to receive the rents and profits, to be held by him subject to the order of court. The redemption from the sale under the mortgage foreclosure of the Illinois Steel Company against the Ashley Wire Company expired June 9, 1896. This money derived from rents belonged to the Illinois Steel Company by virtue of the specific lien in the mortgage, and, the receiver having paid these taxes from funds belonging to appellee, appellant cannot complain. Finding no reversible error in the record, and the decree of the court appearing to be equitable, the judgment of the appellate court is affirmed. Judgment affirmed.

CENTRAL TRUST CO. v. NEW YORK CITY & N. R. CO. (ATTORNEY GENERAL, Intervener).
(18 N. E. 92, 110 N. Y. 250.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Oct. 2, 1888.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, First department.

On the petition of the attorney general the supreme court, at special term, in New York county, made an order directing Joel B. Erhardt, the receiver appointed in the action of the Central Trust Company against the New York City & Northern Railroad Company, to make provision for the payment of the taxes levied on the corporate franchise of the railroad company. From this order the receiver appealed, and the general term (Daniels, J., delivering the opinion, Van Brunt, P. J., and Brady, J., concurring) reversed the order. From the order of reversal the attorney general takes this appeal.

Charles F. Tabor, Atty. Gen., for appellant. Artemas H. Holmes, for respondents.

PECKHAM, J. The railroad company above named was incorporated under the laws of this state, and had its principal business office in the city of New York. In May, 1882, a receiver thereof was appointed in proceedings taken to sequester its property by a judgment creditor whose execution had been returned unsatisfied. Such receiver operated the road from the time of his appointment to February 3, 1885, when another receiver was appointed in the action above entitled, which is brought to foreclose certain mortgages executed by the company upon its property. The first receiver turned over the property and the possession of the road to the receiver appointed in the foreclosure proceedings, and from the time of the appointment of the latter up to a time subsequent to the year ending June 30, 1886, he has operated the road by virtue of such appointment. Taxes became due and payable under the corporation tax act of 1880, as amended by chapter 361 of the Laws of 1881, which amounted at the time of the filing of his petition by the attorney general, in February, 1887, to about the sum of $8,000; being for taxes on the gross earnings of the road as thus operated for the years ending June 30, 1883, 1884, 1885, and 1886, respectively. No question is made as to the amount of the tax in each year, or that there is a sum in the hands of the receiver which may be applicable to their payment; but the counsel for the receiver insists that the corporation is alone answerable for the taxes, and that recourse must be had to it for the payment of the same, or to such funds as may remain in the receiver's hands after the claims of the mortgagees have been satisfied; which in this case is but another manner of stating that there is no way of collecting these taxes, for, if their payment is to be postponed to the payment of the whole amount of the mortgage debt of the company, all of its property will have been wholly exhausted long before payment in full of its mortgage indebtedness could be made. Various other objections were taken to the granting of the petition of the attorney general.

The taxes in question, having been levied by virtue of the above-mentioned corporation tax law, were taxes upon the franchise, as distinguished from the property, of the corporation. People v. Insurance Co., 92 N. Y. 328. Upon this assumption the counsel for the receiver claims that the taxes are not made a lien upon property by the act creating them, and cannot, therefore, be held to be a prior or paramount charge upon the funds in the receiver's hands, on the ground that they are debts due to the state, or on the ground of public policy. The manner of proceeding to collect these taxes has been designated in the act which imposes them, and is to be found in sections 7 and 9 of such act. By section 7 the tax "shall be collected for the use of the state as other taxes are recoverable by law from such corporation," etc.; and by section 9 the taxes "may be sued for in the name of the people of the state, and recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction in an action to be brought by the attorney general at the instance of the comptroller." Under section 7, the proceedings to collect the taxes being the same as other taxes are recovered by law, (not relating to those imposed on real estate,) those proceedings would be regulated by the Revised Statutes, as amended by chapter 456 of the Laws of 1857. It is argued that, as proceedings to enforce the collection of taxes thus imposed are provided for in the very act which imposes them, such proceedings must in all cases be taken, and that all other remedies are absolutely excluded. It is upon this ground that the learned judge who wrote the opinion at the general term proceeded, the result of which was to reverse these proceedings, because not undertaken pursuant to the provision of the statute in question. Generally speaking, the rule as thus laid down is to be followed, and the remedy is confined in the manner stated. But in such a case as this we think the rule is not to be applied. When the property of a corporation is already sequestered, and a receiver appointed, and where in addition thereto foreclosure proceedings are pending against it to foreclose mortgages to an amount in excess of all its property, and a receiver has also been appointed under such proceedings, and where the corporation is largely and hopelessly insolvent, and all of its property in the hands of the receiver appointed by the court, and where the money to pay the taxes has arisen from the gross earnings, and an amount sufficient to pay them is in the hands of the receiver, we are of opinion that the proceedings to obtain payment of those taxes thus in the receiver's hands are not confined to those provided for by the act cited, but that a direct application for an order on the receiver for their payment may be made to the court by petition, as in this case, having made the corporation and the receiver a party thereto. If there are any disputed questions of fact to be determined, the court may direct an action to be brought, or may determine it in some other and more summary way.

We feel more certain in regard to this question by looking at the proceedings which are provided to be taken under the general laws. They are to be instituted by petition upon which the court may sequester such part of the property of the company as shall be necessary for the purpose of satisfying the taxes in arrear with the costs, etc.; and in its discretion the court may proceed further, and enjoin the company and its officers from any further proceedings under the charter, in order to enforce the payment of the taxes. But, in a case where the whole of the property has already been sequestered under other proceedings, the sequestration provided for would not be very efficient. Neither would an injunction which simply enjoined the company and its officers from further proceedings under the charter be in and of itself very efficient as against a receiver who was operating the railroad under the order of the court. In such case, if the injunction were granted, it would only become effective because the court would then order its officer, the receiver, to pay the tax, and go on with the operation of the road. But it would be a farce for the court to first issue the injunction against the receiver, restraining him from operating the road until he paid the tax, and then ordering him to pay it for the purpose of continuing its proper operation. The result would be that the receiver in the end would pay the tax, because he was ordered to do so by the court. The order might just as well be issued in the first instance, without this circuitous method. The privilege granted by the other section of the act of 1881, to sue for the taxes in the name of the people, in an action brought by the attorney general at the instance of the comptroller, would also result in the court ordering the receiver to pay the tax, for in no other way could the judgment for the recovery of the tax become effectual. In all cases, therefore, the payment by the receiver would be made by order of the court, and in all cases the order might just as well be made in the first instance.

We do not think that these provisions of the statute should, under such circumstances, be held to restrict the general power of the court to direct its officer to pay those claims which exist in favor of the state for taxes imposed upon the corporation, where the claim of the state for the payment of such taxes is, as we think, a paramount one. An insolvent corporation in the hands of and operated by a receiver was not in the minds of the framers of the statute when providing for the enforcement of payment of taxes from what may be termed a "going corporation."

It may be admitted that in a strict and technical sense these taxes, when first imposed, are not a lien upon any specific property of the corporation. But we are of the opinion that the railroad, when in the receiver's hands and operated by him, is operated under and by virtue of the franchise which has been conferred upon the corporation by the state; and that when he receives the gross earnings arising from its operation, and has in his hands money enough to pay these taxes, the state has a paramount right to collect them before the moneys applicable to such payment shall be paid away by the receiver. Having such paramount right, the court may in its discretion listen to the petition of the state through its attorney general, and direct its officer to make the payment asked for.

It is claimed, however, that when a receiver is appointed by the court, if he operates the railroad under its order, he does so by virtue of the equity powers of the court conferred by the constitution; and hence that the receiver is not bound to pay the taxes, although he receives all the earnings of the company. But what does the receiver operate? Under this order of the court he takes possession of all the property of the corporation, and proceeds to operate, that is, to run, its trains, and to do all that was formerly done under the direction of the board of directors. In this way he uses the franchise which has been conferred by the state upon the company, and he uses it as an officer of the court which is administering the affairs of the company, and through the court he acts as the company to the same extent, pro hac vice, as if the board of directors were operating the railroad. It is the franchise which is being used in both cases, only in one case it is used for the company, and substantially by it, by means of its board of directors; while in the other case the same franchise is being used, and the road is operated under it, by an officer of the court, until, by virtue of the legal proceedings connected with the receivership, the receiver is discharged, and the road returned to its former possessors, or other proceedings taken under a reorganization, as provided by law.

The learned counsel for the receiver has cited the case of Com. v. Bank, 123 Mass. 493, as authority for the proposition that after a corporation is placed in the hands of a receiver no tax of this nature can be levied upon or collected from it. But the case is not in the least analogous to the one under discussion. In the case in Massachusetts the tax was laid upon the amount of the average of deposits in the bank for the preceding six months, which was held to be a tax on the value of the franchise thus ascertained; and it was further held that if on the day when the tax was to be laid the bank was in the hands of a receiver it was not liable to pay any part of the tax, although it transacted business during a part of the preceding six months. It will be seen, however, that the receiver was appointed under a decree of the court perpetually enjoining the bank from doing any further business, and the receiver was appointed to wind up its affairs, and the bank was at once and forever deprived of the exercise or use of its franchise. The court held that as the tax was upon the franchise, the value of which was to be ascertained on the day the tax was imposed, by reference to the amount of the average of deposits for the past six months, if on that day the franchise had ceased to exist, no tax could for that reason be imposed; and it was wholly immaterial that for a portion of the preceding six months the franchise had been in existence and was actually used. It thus appears that the appointment of the receiver was one of the steps to wind up a corporation which was, on the day set for the imposition of the tax, to all intents and purposes dissolved, and was no longer in existence, and hence the decision of the court was entirely unassailable. No such fact exists in the case before us. The corporation was not dissolved in form nor in substance, so far as this question is concerned. The franchise was in existence and was actually used, and no decree of dissolution had ever been pronounced. The agent who used the franchise was an officer of the court, acting under its authority, instead of the board of directors; but it was the franchise of the company which was in use at all times. In Trust Co. v. Railroad Co., 117 U. S. 434, 6 Sup. Ct. 809, the supreme court of the United States, while declining to give preference to receiver's certificates over mortgage bondholders under the facts in that case, did grant preference to the claims of the state for taxes. The taxes were, it is true, upon property; but the case is not authority for the proposition that if the tax is not a technical lien on specific property when imposed, then no preference can be granted in a case like this. We reiterate the statement of Porter, J., in Re Columbian Ins. Co., 3 Abb. Dec. 239, that there is great force in the claim that "the state has succeeded to all the prerogatives of the British crown, so far as they are essential to the efficient exercise of powers inherent in the nature of civil government, and that there is the same priority of right here, in respect to the payment of taxes, which existed at common law in favor of the public treasury."

We certainly have no doubt that, in a case like this, the court can make the order, (slightly modified as mentioned below,) which was made herein at special term, and that the statutory remedies for the collection of taxes of the nature herein specified are not controlling in the case of an insolvent corporation and upon such facts as are herein proved. The parties hereto both agree that, as there is a fund applicable to the payment of these taxes, there is no necessity for the insertion in the special term order of the provision for issuing certificates by the receiver to raise money to pay the taxes. Without discussing or deciding the question, therefore, whether, in case the receiver had not the money on hand with which to pay these taxes, the court would order him to issue and sell receiver's certificates, and with the proceeds pay them, we shall modify the special term order by striking out such a provision. As thus modified, we think that order was correct.

For these reasons the order of the general term of the supreme court should be reversed, and that of the special term be modified, as already stated, and as modified affirmed, without costs. All concur.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST CO. v. GRAPE CREEK COAL CO.

Circuit Court, S. D. Illinois. May 7, 1892.

In Equity. Bill by the Farmers' Loan & Trust Company against the Grape Creek Coal Company to foreclose a mortgage. A receiver was appointed, and he now asks leave to issue receiver's certificates.

Runnells & Burry, for Farmers' Loan & Trust Co.

W. J. Calhoun, for J. G. English, receiver.

Hess & Johnson, for Travellers' Ins. Co. and other objecting bondholders.

GRESHAM, Circuit Judge. The defendant, a private corporation, whose chief business is mining and selling coal, conveyed to the complainant, in trust, lands and two coal mines in Vermilion county, Ill., to secure an issue of bonds amounting to $500,000. An installment of interest was allowed to remain due for more than six months, and this bill was filed to foreclose the trust deed. Joseph G. English, who was appointed receiver, asks for an order authorizing him to issue receiver's certificates not exceeding in all $24,000, which shall be a first lien upon the trust property, to enable him to pay taxes now due, amounting to $3,428.64, take up outstanding certificates amounting to $6,400, which were issued under an order of the Vermilion circuit court, in a suit to foreclose the same trust deed, and to continue the operation of the mines. The receiver represents that, with additional working capital, he could operate the mines profitably, and better protect them. The holders of 75 per cent. of the bonds and the corporation join in the receiver's request. The holders of the remaining 25 per cent. resist the application. The corporation is insolvent. It is not claimed that the receiver is without means to pay taxes, and it is chiefly to enable him to continue the operation of the mines for anticipated profits that he desires authority to issue certificates.

When it becomes necessary for a court of chancery to take possession of property which is the subject of litigation, by placing it in the hands of a receiver, all expenses incident to its safe-keeping and preservation are properly chargeable against it; and, if there be no income, such expenses will be paid out of the proceeds of the corpus before distribution to lien or other creditors. It does not follow, however, that because property of a private corporation or a natural person may be thus protected and preserved before sale, that, in order to raise money to operate it for profit, a court may place a charge upon it in advance of existing liens. Pending a suit to foreclose a mortgage executed by a railroad corporation, the road may be operated by a receiver, and debts contracted for labor, supplies, and other necessary purposes before as well as after the appointment of a receiver, may be made a first lien upon income, and, if that is not adequate, upon the corpus of the property. In the exercise of this exceptional and extraordinary jurisdiction, which is of comparatively recent origin, courts have entered orders making receiver's certificates first liens on the mortgaged property. This has been done, however, on grounds not applicable to mortgages executed by private corporations. A railroad corporation is a quasi public institution, charged with the duty of operating its road as a public highway. If the company becomes embarrassed and unable to perform that duty, the courts pending proceedings for the sale of the road will operate it by a receiver, and make the expense incident thereto a first lien. This is done on account of the peculiar character of the property. It is generally mortgaged to secure bonds, and persons who invest in such securities know that the mortgage rests upon property previously impressed with a public duty. Private corporations owe no duty to the public, and their continued operation is not a matter of public concern. It is only against railroad mortgages that the supreme court of the United States has sustained orders giving priority to receiver's certificates representing particular indebtedness, and, as already stated, then only on principles having no application to a mortgage executed by a private corporation owing no duty to the public. Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235; Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126; Miltenberger v. Railroad Co., 106 U. S. 286, 1 Sup. Ct. 140; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois M. R. Co., 117 U. S. 434, 6 Sup. Ct. 809; Wood v. Trust Co., 128 U. S. 421, 9 Sup. Ct. 131; Kneeland v. Trust Co., 136 U. S. 89, 10 Sup. Ct. 950; Morgan's L. & T. R. & S. S. Co. v. Texas Cent. Ry. Co., 137 U. S. 171, 11 Sup. Ct. 61.

In Wood v. Trust Co. the court said: "The doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall has never yet been applied in any case except that of a railroad. The case lays great emphasis on the consideration that a railroad is a peculiar property, of a public nature, and discharging a great public work. There is a broad distinction between such a case and that of a purely private concern. We do not undertake to decide the question here, but only point it out."

In Kneeland v. Trust Co., supra, in discussing the jurisdiction of the chancellor to displace the lien of a railroad mortgage, the court said: "Upon these facts we remark, first, that the appointment of a receiver vests in the court no absolute control over the property, and no general authority to displace vested contract liens. Because, in a few specified and limited cases, this court has declared that unsecured claims were entitled to priority over mortgage debts, an idea seems to have obtained that a court appointing a receiver acquires power to give such preference to any general and unsecured claims. It has been assumed that a court appointing a receiver could rightfully burden the mortgaged property for the payment of any unsecured indebtedness. Indeed, we are advised that some courts have made the appointment of a receiver conditional upon the payment of all unsecured indebtedness in preference to the mortgage liens sought to be enforced. Can anything be conceived which more thoroughly destroys the sacredness of contract obligations? One holding a mortgage debt upon a railroad has the same right to demand and expect of the court respect for his vested and contracted priority as the holder of a mortgage on a farm or lot. So, when a court appoints a receiver of railroad property, it has no right to make that receivership conditional on the payment of other than those few unsecured claims which, by the rulings of this court, have been declared to have an equitable priority. No one is bound to sell to a railroad company, or to work for it; and whoever has dealings with a company whose property is mortgaged must be assumed to have dealt with it on the faith of its personal responsibility, and not in expectation of subsequently displacing the priority of the mortgage liens. It is the exception, and not the rule, that such priority of liens can be displaced. We emphasize this fact of the sacredness of contract liens for the reason that there seems to be growing an idea that the chancellor, in the exercise of his equitable powers, has unlimited discretion in this matter of the displacement of vested liens." And further on in the same opinion the court said: "If, at the instance of any party rightfully entitled thereto, a court should appoint a receiver of property, the same being railroad property, and therefore under an obligation to the public of continued operation, it, in the administration of such receivership, might rightfully contract debts necessary for the operation of the road, either for labor, supplies, or rentals, and make such expenses a prior lien on the property itself."

In the language above quoted, there is a plain implication that the limited power which courts may exercise in displacing the liens of railroad mortgages should not and cannot be extended to mortgages executed by private corporations. The court is not asked to subvert the lien of the mortgage on the ground that the trustee or bondholders have got possession of anything which, in equity, belongs to general creditors. It is to enable him to operate the mines for the benefit of bondholders, against the wish of part of them, that the receiver desires to be invested with authority to issue certificates which shall be a prior lien upon the property embraced in the trust deed. Extensive as are the powers of courts of equity, they do not authorize a chancellor to thus impair the force of solemn obligations and destroy vested rights. Instead of displacing mortgages and other liens upon the property of private corporations and natural persons, it is the duty of courts to uphold and enforce them against all subsequent incumbrances. It would be dangerous to extend the power which has been recently exercised over railroad mortgages, (sometimes with unwarranted freedom,) on account of their peculiar nature, to all mortgages. The power does not exist, and the application is denied.

HANNA et al. v. STATE TRUST CO. et al.
(70 Fed. 2, 16 C. C. A. 586.)

Circuit Court of Appeals, Eighth Circuit.
Sept. 23, 1895.

No. 593.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Colorado.

On the 1st day of November, 1889, the Denver-Arapahoe Land Company, a Colorado corporation, executed to the appellant John R. Hanna its trust deed on 11,320 acres of land in Arapahoe and Douglas counties, Colo., to secure to the appellant Rufus Clark the payment of its promissory notes aggregating the sum of $97,000. On the same day the same corporation executed to the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, as trustee, a deed of trust on 4,480 acres of land in Arapahoe county, Colo., to secure an issue of its first mortgage bonds amounting to $140,000. On the 1st day of March, 1890, the Denver Water-Storage Company, a Colorado corporation, executed to the State Trust Company of New York, as trustee, a deed of trust on about 1,100 acres of land in Douglas county, Colo., together with the Castlewood dam and reservoir, irrigating canals, ditches, etc., to secure the payment of its first mortgage bonds amounting to the sum of $300,000. Each of these deeds of trust covers different properties, and is the first and valid lien upon the property covered by it. On or about the 1st day of May, 1891, the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company was organized, pursuant to the laws of Colorado, by the consolidation of the Denver-Arapahoe Land Company and the Denver Water-Storage Company, and by virtue of such consolidation acquired, subject to the deeds of trust above described, all of the property covered by or embraced therein. Immediately after its organization the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company executed a deed of trust upon the entire property acquired by the consolidation mentioned, subject to the several deeds of trust executed by the constituent companies, and above set forth, to the State Trust Company of New York, as trustee, to secure an issue of its general or consolidated mortgage bonds to the amount of $800,000. On the 4th day of June, 1894, the State Trust Company of New York, as trustee in the consolidated mortgage last above mentioned, filed its bill of complaint in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Colorado against the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, alleging that it had made default, and failed to pay the taxes on its lands or interest upon its bonds, and that it was insolvent, and prayed for the foreclosure of its mortgage and the appointment of a receiver. This bill admitted the priority of the underlying deeds of trust executed by the constituent companies, and that any relief granted in the suit, by foreclosure or otherwise, must be subject to the rights and equities existing under the prior mortgages.

On the day the bill was filed the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company appeared and answered; admitting its insolvency, and confessing all the allegations to the bill. The court thereupon appointed a receiver. On the 24th of July, 1894, the State Trust Company filed its amended and supplemental bill of complaint, to which the Mercantile Trust Company of New York, and the appellants, John R. Hanna and Rufus Clark, were made defendants. This amended bill prayed relief as follows: That the said Mercantile Trust Company, John R. Hanna, and Rufus Clark might be brought in as defendants in the action, and required to set up their respective rights upon the real estate covered by the deeds of trust executed by the Denver-Arapahoe Land Company; that the respective rights of the trustees under the several mortgages or deeds of trust might be judicially ascertained and determined by the court; that the properties covered by the respective deeds of trust might be marshaled, and judicially ascertained and adjusted; that the amounts due upon the notes and bonds issued under the several deeds of trust might be adjudicated and determined; that the said deeds of trust might be foreclosed; that the receiver theretofore appointed in the action might be continued as receiver of all the property covered by each and all of said deeds of trust; that the said John R. Hanna, Rufus Clark, and the Mercantile Trust Company, and the holders of any of the notes, bonds, or securities issued under said deeds of trust, might be enjoined and restrained from commencing any action or proceeding in the circuit court of the United States for Colorado, or any other court, for the foreclosure of the said deeds of trust, and from enforcing their said notes and bonds, or for the collection thereof, against the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, or its property and effects, except in this action.

On the 16th day of August, 1894, a special master appointed in the cause made a report, from which it appears that the company was endeavoring to carry on a colonization business, and was engaged in selling small tracts of land, for fruit raising and garden purposes, to settlers, or those who proposed to become settlers, or colonists; that in many cases the company sold these tracts of land (usually 10 acres), under executory contracts, for small amounts of cash down, and deferred payments extending over a period of five years, when the various purchasers were to receive the deeds. The company agreed to plant these tracts with fruit trees, and cultivate and care for them during the five years. On the 16th of August the receiver filed his petition, stating, substantially, that the property of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company consists of 17,000 acres of land in the counties of Arapahoe and Douglas, Colo., and an extensive dam or reservoir, known as the "Castlewood Dam," and a system of canals and irrigating ditches connected therewith, and a large number of land-purchase contracts and land-purchase notes, referred to in the report of the special master; that the original plan of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company contemplated the colonization of these lands; the amount of the land-purchase contracts and notes, as shown by the report of the special master; the agreements made by the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company to plant and cultivate the lands, already referred to, and that in consideration thereof the various purchasers have made large payments, and have a right, in justice and equity, to demand performance of the contracts of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, and that otherwise the fruit trees upon the tracts sold under the planting and cultivation contracts will die, and the payments made by the purchasers will be absolutely lost; and that, moreover, it is of vital importance to the company that it should collect the balance due upon the land-sale notes and contracts mentioned, which collection is entirely dependent upon the keeping up of the tracts of land, and the performance by the company of the contracts with the purchasers aforesaid. The petition then presents a number of reasons and arguments why, in the judgment of the receiver, certificates should be issued, and calls attention to the default in taxes upon the company's lands, alleged to amount to about $4,000. The particulars of the three underlying mortgages and the consolidated mortgage are then given, and the receiver calls the court's attention to the opportunity which presents itself for engaging in the colonization of the company's barren lands, if he is authorized to issue certificates of indebtedness to raise funds with which to properly present the merits and advantages of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company's property. On the 15th day of September, 1894, the court made an order, upon the receiver's petition, which authorized the issue of receiver's certificates to pay taxes due upon the lands, and to redeem the same from tax sales, and making such certificates a first and paramount lien upon the property upon which the taxes were paid. The order also contained this provision: "(5) It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that in addition to the amounts which may be necessary to pay the taxes now in arrears upon the property set forth and described in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4 of this order, the receiver shall have, and is hereby granted, authority to borrow such additional sum of money as shall, together with said amounts for taxes, amount in the aggregate to a sum not exceeding $10,000, and to issue therefor his certificates of indebtedness, which said certificates of indebtedness shall be first and paramount liens upon all the property, rights, and franchises now owned or controlled by the said the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company, defendant herein, wheresoever situated, and subject, to the jurisdiction of this court. And said additional sums of money shall be used and applied by said receiver for the purpose of preserving the property of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company in his possession and custody, and carrying out and maintaining the contracts of the company now in existence, under and by which the company has heretofore sold tracts of land to various parties, which said contracts are referred to in the report of said receiver, and for such other purposes as are set out in said petition, with reference to the maintenance, preservation, and protection of the property of the company, or as the court may from time to time direct." From this order, John R. Hanna, trustee in the deed of trust dated November 1, 1889, and Rufus Clark, the beneficiary named therein, and the holder of a large amount of the bonds secured by the mortgage to the Mercantile Trust Company, appealed to this court.

John S. Macbeth (Enos Miles, on the brief), for appellants.

A. C. Campbell (A. E. Pattison and Henry W. Hobson, on the brief), for appellees.

Before CALDWELL, SANBORN, and THAYER, Circuit Judges.

CALDWELL, Circuit Judge, after stating the case as above, delivered the opinion of the court.

The precise question in this case is whether a court of chancery which has appointed a receiver for an insolvent private corporation in a foreclosure suit brought by a second mortgagee may, against the objection of the first mortgagee, authorize its receiver to issue receiver's certificates to raise money to carry on the business of the insolvent corporation and to improve its lands, and make such certificates a first and paramount lien upon the lands covered by the first mortgage. So far as we are advised, the power to do this has been denied in every case in which the question has arisen. One of the first cases in which the question arose was Raht v. Attrill, 106 N. Y. 423, 13 N. E. 282. In that case a hotel company mortgaged its property to raise funds to build a hotel. Before the completion of the hotel the corporation became insolvent, and upon the application of its principal stockholder a receiver was appointed; and upon an application and showing that the wages of the men who worked on the hotel building were unpaid, and that they threatened, unless paid, to burn the building, the court made an order authorizing the receiver to issue certificates, which were declared to be a lien prior to the trust mortgage, to raise funds to pay the wages due the laborers. A referee reported that, if the money had not been raised to pay the wages due the men, the hotel and other property of the corporation "would, in all probability, have been destroyed or seriously injured."

In the progress of the case the mortgagee denied that the court had authority or power to set aside the prior lien of the mortgage and make the receiver's certificates, issued under the circumstances mentioned, a first and prior lien upon the property. The court delivered an exhaustive opinion, covering every aspect of the question. We quote some of its utterances. The court said: "The lien of the mortgage attaches, not only to the land in the condition in which it was at the time of the execution of the mortgage, but as changed or improved by accretions or by labor expended upon it while the mortgage is in existence. Creditors having debts created for money, labor, or materials used in improving the mortgaged property acquire on that account no legal or equitable claim to displace or subordinate the lien of the mortgage, for their protection. * * * The act of the court in taking charge of property through a receiver is attended with certain necessary expenses of its care and custody; and it has become the settled rule that expenses of realization, and also certain expenses which are called 'expenses of preservation,' may be incurred, under the order of the court, on the credit of the property; and it follows, from necessity, in order to the effectual administration of the trust assumed by the court, that these expenses should be paid out of the income, or, when necessary, out of the corpus, of the property, before distribution, or before the court passes over the property to those adjudged to be entitled. * * * It would be difficult to define, by a rule applicable in every case, what are expenses of preservation which may be incurred by a receiver by authority of the court. It was said by James, L. J., in Re Regent's Canal Iron-Works Co., 3 Ch. Div. 411, 427, that 'the only costs for the preservation of the property would be such things as the repairing of the property, paying rates and taxes which would be necessary to prevent any forfeiture, or putting a person in to take care of the property.' Wherever the true limit is, we think it does not include the expenditure authorized by the order of August 17th, and that such an expenditure is, and ought to be, excluded from the definition. There must be something approaching a demonstrable necessity, to justify such an infringement of the rights of the mortgagees as was attempted in this case." After referring to the cases in which the receivers of insolvent railroad corporations have been authorized to issue certificates which were declared to be a first lien on the property of the corporations, the court said: "It cannot be successfully denied that the decisions in these cases vest in the courts a very broad and comprehensive jurisdiction over insolvent railroad corporations and their property. It will be found, on examining these cases, that the jurisdiction asserted by the court therein is largely based upon the public character of railroad corporations, the public interest in their continued and successful operation, the peculiar character and terms of railroad mortgages, and upon other special grounds, not applicable to ordinary private corporations. * * * These cases furnish, we think, no authority for upholding the order of August 17th, or for subverting the priority of lien which, according to the general rules of law, the bondholders acquired through the trust mortgage on the property of the company. It would be unwise, we think, to extend the power of the court in dealing with property in the hands of receivers to the practical subversion or destruction of vested interests, as would be the case in this instance if the order of August 17th should be sustained. It is best for all that the integrity of contracts should be strictly guarded and maintained, and that a rigid, rather than a liberal, construction of the power of the court to subject property in the hands of receivers to charges, to the prejudice of creditors, should be adopted."

We concur in the doctrine expressed in this case. See, to the same effect, Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Grape Creek Coal Co. (C. C.) 50 Fed. 481; Laughlin v. Rolling-Stock Co. (C. C.) 64 Fed. 25; Fidelity Insurance Trust & Safe-Deposit Co. v. Roanoke Iron Co. (C. C.) 68 Fed. 623; Snively v. Coal Co. (C. C.) 69 Fed. 204; and Hooper v. Trust Co. (Md.) 32 Atl. 505, 513.

The contention of the appellees is that the order made by the circuit court finds sanction in the cases of Wallace v. Loomis, 97 U. S. 146; Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235; Barton v. Barbour, 104 U. S. 126; Miltenberger v. Railroad Co., 106 U. S. 286, 1 Sup. Ct. 140; Trust Co. v. Souther, 107 U. S. 591, 2 Sup. Ct. 295,—and other later cases of like character, in which receivers of insolvent railroad corporations were authorized to issue receivers' certificates for various purposes, which were made a first and paramount lien on the property of the insolvent railroad company. But the doctrine of these cases has no application to this case. They rest on the peculiar character of railroad property and of a railroad corporation. The distinction between railroad corporations, which are of a quasi public character, and purely private corporations, has been often pointed out, and need not be repeated here. It is enough to say that the supreme court itself has said that the doctrine of the cases cited has only been applied in railroad cases. In Wood v. Safe-Deposit Co., 128 U. S. 416, 9 Sup. Ct. 131, the court said: "The doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall has never yet been applied in any case except that of a railroad. The case lays great emphasis upon the consideration that a railroad is a peculiar property, of a public nature, and discharging a great public work. There is a broad distinction between such a case and that of a purely private concern. We do not undertake to decide the question here, but only point it out."

The bill in this case is one to foreclose a second mortgage. To such a bill the prior mortgagees are not even necessary parties. Jerome v. McCarter, 94 U. S. 734. The validity and priority of the liens of the mortgages under which the appellants claimed is distinctly admitted in the original and amended bills. The purpose of filing the amended bill making the prior mortgagees defendants seems to have been to enjoin them from foreclosing their mortgages, and subject the lands covered by their mortgages to a prior lien for money borrowed to carry on the business of the corporation and improve its lands. It prays that the receiver may be empowered to manage and operate the property of the insolvent corporation, which consists in irrigating, improving, and colonizing, or settling, arid lands; and, to the end that the receiver may not be interfered with in the conduct of the business, it prays that the holders of all mortgages prior to the complainants' may be enjoined from foreclosing the same. The amended bill would seem to be founded on the theory that a private corporation conducting any kind of business may, when it becomes insolvent, obtain immunity from the compulsory payment of its debts by procuring a junior mortgagee, or some other creditor, to file a bill alleging the insolvency of the corporation, and praying for the appointment of a receiver with authority to manage and conduct its business. Upon the filing of such a bill, it is supposed to be competent for the court, in addition to appointing a receiver to carry on the business of the corporation, to enjoin its creditors, including the holders of the prior liens on its property, from collecting their debts by due course of law, and to continue such injunction in force so long as the court, in its discretion, sees fit to carry on the business of the insolvent corporation. When a receiver is appointed under such a bill, he usually makes haste, as the receiver did in this case, to assure the court that, if he only had some capital to start on, he could greatly benefit the estate by carrying on the business that bankrupted the corporation. In this case, the company being insolvent, and its property mortgaged for more than it was worth, there was no way of raising money to set the receiver up in business, except by the court giving its obligations, in the form of receiver's certificates, and making them a paramount lien on all the property of the corporation, by displacing the appellants' prior liens thereon. As commonly happens in cases of this character, the receiver, the insolvent corporation, and the junior mortgagee united in urging the court to arm its receiver with the desired powers. They ran no risk in so doing. The corporation was insolvent, and a foreclosure of the prior mortgage would leave the junior mortgagee without any security; so that it had nothing to lose, and everything to gain, in experiments to enhance the value of the mortgaged property, so long as the cost of those experiments was made a prior lien thereon. The effect of the proceeding was to burden the prior mortgagee with the whole cost of the expenditures and experiments made for the betterment of the property on the petition, and for the benefit of the insolvent corporation and the junior mortgagee. The representation is always made, in such cases, that the receiver can carry on the business much more successfully than was done by the insolvent corporation. This commonly proves to be an error. Raht v. Attrill, 106 N. Y. 430, 13 N. E. 282. But, if it were true, it would afford no ground of equitable jurisdiction, for it is not a function of a court of equity to carry on the business of private corporations, whether solvent or insolvent. It is obvious that if the holders of the first mortgages and the other creditors of the insolvent corporation were allowed to proceed, in the customary and lawful mode, to collect their debts, it would put an end to the business of the receiver, and they are therefore enjoined from foreclosing their mortgages or collecting their debts. The chancery court thus assumes, in effect, all the powers and jurisdiction of a court of bankruptcy or insolvency, but without any bankrupt or insolvent law to guide or direct it in the administration of the estate. Its only guide is that varying and unknown quantity called "judicial discretion." The powers claimed for a court of equity in such cases are, indeed, much greater than a court of bankruptcy can exercise. There never was a bankrupt court, under any bankrupt act, authorized, at its discretion, to displace or nullify valid liens on the bankrupt's property, or itself to create liens paramount thereto. The rights of the citizen, lawfully acquired by contract, are under the protection of the constitution of the United States, and, like the absolute rights of the citizen, are not dependent for their existence or continuance upon the discretion of any court whatever. Constitutional rights and obligations are no more dependent on the discretion of the chancellor than they are on the discretion of the legislature. "Rights," says the supreme court of the United States, "under our system of law and procedure, do not rest in the discretionary authority of any officer, judicial or otherwise." In re Parker, 131 U. S. 221, 9 Sup. Ct. 708. If junior lien creditors of an insolvent private corporation could do what has been attempted in this case, every private corporation operating a sawmill, gristmill, mine, factory, hotel, elevator, irrigating ditches, or carrying on any other business pursuit, would speedily seek the protection of a chancery court, and those courts would soon be conducting the business of all the insolvent private corporations in the country. If it were once settled that a chancery court, through a receiver appointed on the petition of a junior mortgagee, could carry on the business of such insolvent corporations at the risk and expense of those holding the first or prior liens on the property of the corporation, such liens would have little or no value. It is no part of the duty of a court of equity to conduct the business of insolvent private corporations, any more than it is to carry on the business of insolvent natural persons. If it may take under its control the property of an insolvent private corporation, and authorize a receiver to carry on its business, and make the debts incurred by the receiver in so doing paramount liens on all the property of the corporation, and enjoin its creditors in the meantime from collecting their debts, it is not perceived why it may not proceed in the same way with the estate of an insolvent natural person.

Without pursuing the subject further, we refer to what is said, and to the cases cited, in Scott v. Trust Co., 16 C. C. A. 358, 69 Fed. 17. The order appealed from is void, whether the suit in which it was made is treated as one to foreclose a second mortgage, or as a bill in equity to administer the estate of an insolvent corporation. It was open to the complainant to take and execute a decree foreclosing its second mortgage, and it is good practice in such cases to require this to be done, on pain of dismissing the bill. And if the complainant desired that money be spent, beyond the income of the property, in carrying on the business of the corporation or improving the mortgaged property, it was at liberty to furnish the means for that purpose; but it had no equity to ask that the expense and the hazards of doing so should be saddled on the first mortgagee, and the court had no jurisdiction or power to place it there.

Taxes are the first and paramount lien on all property, and must be paid. When taxes are due on property in the hands of a receiver, and he has no funds to pay them, the court will authorize him to borrow money for that purpose, and make the obligation given for the money so borrowed a prior lien on the property on which the taxes were due. This is not fixing a new or additional lien on the property, or displacing any prior lien. It is simply changing the form of the lien from one for taxes to one for money borrowed to pay the taxes.

The order and decree of the circuit court appealed from, which authorizes the receiver to borrow money to "be used and applied by said receiver for the purpose of preserving the property of the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company in his possession and custody, and carrying out and maintaining the contracts of the company, now in existence, under and by which the company has heretofore sold tracts of land to various parties, which said contracts are referred to in the report of said receiver, and for such other purposes as are set out in said petition with reference to the maintenance, preservation, and protection of the property of the company," and which authorizes the receiver to issue his certificates of indebtedness for the money borrowed for these purposes, and makes such certificates of indebtedness the first and paramount lien "upon all the property, rights, and franchises now owned or controlled by the said the Denver Land & Water-Storage Company," is void, in so far as it makes the certificates issued by the receiver a first and paramount lien on the lands embraced in the mortgages of the appellants, and is therefore reversed.

HOWARTH v. ELLWANGER. SAME v.
KENT. SAME v. WOODWORTH.

(86 Fed. 54.)

Circuit Court, N. D. New York. March 31, 1898.

Nos. 3,211-3,213.

At Law. Tried by the court.

These actions are brought against the defendants who were stockholders of the Traders' Bank of Tacoma, Wash., to enforce a liability created by the law of that state making them individually responsible equally and ratably to the extent of their stock for all debts of the bank while they remained stockholders. The plaintiff is a citizen of Washington residing at Tacoma. The defendants are citizens of New York residing at Rochester. On the 19th day of May, 1894, the plaintiff was appointed receiver of the Traders' Bank by an order of the superior court of Washington made in an action commenced against said bank by Henry Hewett, Jr., and George Browne in which it was adjudged that the bank had suspended business and was insolvent. The plaintiff duly qualified as receiver and has since acted as such. On the 12th of September, 1894, the court made an order in said action permitting certain stockholders to intervene for the benefit of themselves and all other stockholders of the bank. On the 20th of October all the defendants, except Chauncey B. Woodworth, were by order of the court upon their own petition made parties to the said action. After applying all the property of the bank to the payment of its debts there remained a deficiency, which, on March 17, 1897, was adjusted and adjudged by the court to be the sum of $131,670. The plaintiff was thereupon directed by the court to levy upon the stockholders an assessment of 26.34 per cent. and bring suit against those stockholders who, after demand, refused to pay. The amounts assessed against the defendants respectively were duly demanded and payment thereof refused.

P. M. French, for plaintiff.

Charles M. Williams, for defendant Ellwanger.

M. H. McMath, for defendant Kent.

William F. Cogswell, for defendant Woodworth.

COXE, District Judge. It is not disputed that the defendants were stockholders of the Traders' Bank, that the bank became insolvent, that the plaintiff was appointed receiver, that a large deficiency was ascertained, that an assessment was levied by the receiver upon the defendants and that all this was done under and pursuant to the constitution and laws of Washington and in conformity to the orders and decrees of the superior court of that state.

The first proposition argued by the defendants is that the plaintiff, as receiver, is not entitled to maintain the action. The constitution and statutes of Washington (Const. art. 12, § 11) provide: "That each stockholder of any banking * * * association shall be individually and personally liable, equally and ratably, and not one for another, for all the contracts, debts and engagements of such corporation or association accruing while they remain stockholders to the extent of the amount of their stock therein, at the par value thereof, in addition to the amount invested in such shares."

The courts of Washington have decided that this liability can only be enforced by a receiver under the direction of the court. Cole v. Railroad Co., 9 Wash. 487, 37 Pac. 700; Wilson v. Book, 13 Wash. 676, 43 Pac. 939; Hardin v. Sweeney, 14 Wash. 129, 44 Pac. 138; Watterson v. Masterson, 15 Wash. 511, 46 Pac. 1041. The practical effect of a ruling that a receiver cannot maintain the suit would be to render the law nugatory as to all but resident stockholders. The Washington courts having ruled that a receiver only can bring the suit, it is manifest, should the federal courts and other state courts hold that he cannot maintain the action, that the defendants not only but all stockholders beyond the jurisdiction of the Washington courts will escape a liability intended to be uniform and for the benefit of all the creditors. The precise question was involved in Sheafe v. Larimer (C. C.) 79 Fed. 921, and was answered adversely to the defendants' contention. The case arose under the same law, and, upon the facts, was almost identical with the case in hand. See, also, Schultz v. Insurance Co. (C. C.) 77 Fed. 375, 387; Avery v. Trust Co. (C. C.) 72 Fed. 700; Failey v. Talbee (C. C.) 55 Fed. 892.

Again it is argued that the orders and decrees of the Washington court were not binding upon the defendants, and in support of this view various alleged defects in the proceedings are pointed out. The defendants Kent and Ellwanger were parties to the Washington action and are therefore in no position to attack the judgment of the court in a collateral proceeding. The defendant Woodworth was not a party. But whether parties or not the law seems clear that the stockholders are bound by the order making the assessment. Hawkins v. Glenn, 131 U. S. 319, 9 Sup. Ct. 739. In Sheafe v. Larimer, supra, the court says: "In this case it must be held that it is not open to the defendant to question the validity of the assessment order, on the ground that the stockholders were not personally notified of the application for the order, or for the reason that the stockholders should not have been assessed until the other assets of the corporation had been wholly exhausted."

The actions are not barred by the statute of limitations for the reason that the cause of action did not accrue to the receiver prior to the assessment and that was not made until March 17, 1897. The actions were commenced two months thereafter.

It follows that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment as demanded in the complaints, respectively, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from May 18, 1897, and costs.

WYMAN v. EATON et al.

(77 N. W. 865, 107 Iowa, 214.)

Supreme Court of Iowa. Jan. 20, 1899.

Appeal from district court, Pottawattamie county; Walter I. Smith, Judge.

As a statement of facts, we have taken the following substantially from those made by counsel: This was an action brought by Albert U. Wyman, the receiver of the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, to enforce against the several defendants their constitutional liability under the Nebraska statute for their unpaid subscriptions to the capital stock of the company. This company was incorporated on March 13, 1883, in conformity with the laws of the state of Nebraska, under the name of the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company, its name being subsequently, on February 28, 1890, changed to the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, under which name it transacted business until its insolvency, in 1891, when an application for its dissolution by W. G. Madden, one of its stockholders, resulted in the appointment of the plaintiff, first, as temporary, and then as permanent, receiver of the corporation, and a decree adjudging the dissolution thereof. The testimony shows that one J. T. Hart, of Council Bluffs, was largely instrumental in the organization of the company; that the subscribers to its stock and the original stockholders were citizens prominent in Omaha and in Council Bluffs; and that when this company, the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company, was organized, there was organized at the same time, mainly through the instrumentality of Mr. Hart, another insurance company, called the Iowa & Nebraska Insurance Company, and having its principal place of business at Council Bluffs, Iowa. The original intention of the organizers, as gathered from the testimony of Mr. Hart, and the contract of subscription, was to consolidate the two companies after their organization. This, however, was never done, the two corporations being operated separately in each state, although the stockholders were at first the same. The Iowa corporation did business until about May 29, 1885, when it was merged into a company known as the Western Home of Sioux City, and went into the hands of a receiver. The capital of each company was $100,000, and the certificates of stock contemplated subscriptions to both companies, and were signed, as appears, by officers of each company. The stock was originally issued in this duplicate or combined form. These combined certificates were subsequently canceled, and were separately rewritten and issued. The contract of subscriptions of the several defendants to the stock of the two companies, and upon which it is claimed that the defendants herein are answerable for the unpaid 50 per cent. thereof, is as follows: "We, the undersigned subscribers hereto, in consideration of each other's subscription to the capital stock for an insurance company in the state of Iowa and the state of Nebraska, to be organized in both states separately, and after the organization to be consolidated, to be known as the Iowa and Nebraska State Insurance Company, for the purpose of carrying fire and lightning, windstorm and tornado, insurance, business to be done under the laws of both states, do hereby subscribe and agree to pay and secure as provided by the laws of said states the several sums set opposite our respective names, if such an insurance organization is perfected, and on demand, to the secretary thereof, on or before the 12th day of March, 1883." Under this subscription, shares of stock of $100 each were issued to the subscribing stockholders, one-half of such shares being issued to them in the Iowa company, and one-half in the Nebraska company. The defendants paid 50 per cent. of their several subscriptions upon the stock of the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company at the time of its organization, as required by the laws of the state of Nebraska. Nothing more was ever paid upon the stock except in the manner indicated hereafter. The defendants in this action, who had been subscribers to the capital stock of the consolidated company, and to whom had been issued the joint certificates of stock in the Iowa and Nebraska companies, had surrendered their stock, and new stock had been issued to the parties purchasing from them. These purchasers, as the record shows, were in large part the original promoters of the company. Upon the organization of the company, one-half of the capital stock subscribed being paid in cash, the promissory notes of the subscribers, payable on demand and secured, were given in payment of the other one-half of the stock of the corporation. Prior to 1887, these defendants had transferred the stock issued to them, by a surrender of their stock, and reissuance of other certificates to the purchasers; the company accepting the surrender, and recognizing the transfer, returning the stock notes of the defendants, and accepting the stock notes of the transferee in lieu thereof. This was done, as shown by the record, at a time when the corporation was solvent, and the transfers were made and new stock issued to solvent purchasers; all being done in good faith on the part of the corporation, the transferor, and the transferees. Practically, the entire stock passed into the hands of a syndicate composed in large part of original promoters of the consolidated corporation, but not including any of these defendants. From the date of these transfers, these defendants ceased to have any connection with or control over the corporation. The district court entered judgment for the defendants, and the plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

GRANGER, J. It will be well to repeat that this action is by a receiver appointed to wind up the affairs of the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, on the application of one of its stockholders, to recover from the defendants on their subscriptions to the original enterprise, wherein was contemplated the organization of two companies,—one in Nebraska, to be known as the Nebraska & Iowa Insurance Company, and one in Iowa, to be known as the Iowa & Nebraska Insurance Company; the two companies to be thereafter consolidated. The first-named company was organized under the laws of Nebraska, and located at the city of Omaha, in that state; and the latter under the laws of Iowa, and located at the city of Council Bluffs, in Iowa. The consolidation was never made, and the latter company was changed to that of the Western Home of Sioux City, and its place of business changed to Sioux City, Iowa, about May, 1885. The Nebraska & Iowa Company was changed to the Nebraska Fire Insurance Company, and continued to operate until 1891, when the insurance department of Nebraska withdrew its certificates authorizing the company to do business, and, on the application of one of its stockholders, its insolvency was decreed; and the plaintiff is now engaged in winding up its affairs, and this action is in aid of that purpose.

The action has for a legal basis a provision of the constitution of Nebraska, as follows (section 4, art. 11): "Liabilities of Subscribers to Stock. In all cases of claims against corporations and joint-stock associations, the exact amount due shall be first ascertained, and after the corporate property shall have been exhausted, the original subscribers thereof shall be individually liable to the extent of their unpaid subscriptions, and the liability for unpaid subscriptions shall follow the stock." Dismissing for the moment the effect of an arbitrary legal liability, which must be respected and enforced when known, there is not, in view of the entire record in this case, an equitable consideration favorable to a recovery against these defendants. The present liabilities of the Nebraska corporation cannot truthfully be said to have accrued in consequence of, or with reliance upon, the former connection of these defendants with the enterprise from which sprang the present company. These facts are important as aiding in the solution of a legal proposition, urged by appellees, to the effect that this action cannot be maintained in Iowa, because it is brought by a receiver of a Nebraska corporation to enforce a provision of the law of that state; the claim being that such a proceeding can only be had as a result of comity between the states, and that the basis of such an exercise is that the citizens of the state granting it shall not be thereby prejudiced or injured. Admitting, for the sake of argument, the rule that comity controls as to the authority of plaintiff to sue in this state, and, as we have in effect said, the record leaves us without doubt that its exercise should be denied, because it would be in contravention of the rights of our citizens, and operate to their injury.

Upon the question of the absolute right of plaintiff to sue in this state, we are not without precedent in our own decisions; and while, in announcing a rule, we have recognized the fact of a conflict of authority, we are not persuaded by the argument in this case that a change should be made, or the rule modified. Stress is given in argument to the fact that the order of appointment in Nebraska gives to the receiver authority to bring suits in other states. That authority is valuable as an aid to secure the right to do so in the state where the privilege is sought, and is judiciously granted; but it is without efficiency to create such a right independent of sanction within the state. The case of Booth v. Clark, 17 How. 321, contains a somewhat exhaustive consideration of the question of the right of a receiver appointed in one state to bring a suit for the possession of property in another state, and it is there said: "He has no extra-territorial power of official action; none which the court appointing him can confer, with authority to enable him to go into a foreign jurisdiction to take possession of the debtor's property; none which can give, upon the principle of comity, a privilege to sue in a foreign court or another jurisdiction, as the judgment creditor himself might have done, where his debtor may be amenable to the tribunal which the creditor may seek." An underlying thought of the rule seems to be that, within the jurisdiction of one's appointment as receiver, he is amenable in his official capacity to the courts, and he may exercise his authority under the law of the jurisdiction; while, in a foreign jurisdiction, the law does no more than to make the person entering it amenable to its laws, and in no way recognizes the official capacity. As a citizen in a jurisdiction foreign to his residence, he has a legal status, and is amenable to, and may invoke the protection of, the law. As an officer of a court from a foreign jurisdiction, he has, and is entitled to, no legal recognition, except as the courts may, in their discretion, grant it, because he is without the official obligation that he assumed in his own jurisdiction, and which is essential to a proper and safe exercise of such power. In Ayres v. Siebel, 82 Iowa, 347, 47 N. W. 989, we denied the right of a trustee, appointed by the court in Indiana, to sue and recover on a contract in this state; and in Parker v. Lamb & Sons, 99 Iowa, 265, 68 N. W. 686, we denied such a right to a receiver, and cited the Ayres-Siebel Case. In Parker v. Lamb & Sons, we quoted approvingly from High, Rec. § 289, as follows: "Upon the question of the territorial extent of a receiver's jurisdiction and power for the purpose of instituting actions connected with his receivership, the prevailing doctrine established by the supreme court of the United States, and sustained by the weight of authority in various states, is that the receiver has no extraterritorial jurisdiction or power of official action, and cannot go into a foreign state or jurisdiction, and there institute a suit for the recovery of demands due the person or estate subject to his receivership. His functions and powers, for the purpose of litigation, are held to be limited to the courts of the state in which he was appointed; and the principles of comity between states and nations which recognize the judicial decisions of one tribunal as conclusive on another do not apply to such a case, and will not warrant a receiver in bringing an action in a foreign court or jurisdiction." These authorities are broad and conclusive, and, unless we are to set them aside, are conclusive of this case. Counsel have shown great zeal and tact in presenting authorities more or less in point, and we acknowledge somewhat of a conflict, as we have done in other cases; but the weight of authority we regard as in line with our holdings, and we are not disposed to disturb them. Beach on Receivers (section 680) states the same rule, and cites Booth v. Clark, supra, from which we have quoted, and then says: "The rule thus laid down by the supreme court of the United States has been followed by other courts with essential unanimity, and can hardly be said to be seriously questioned." In Fitzgerald v. Construction Co. (Neb.) 59 N. W. 838, these authorities are approvingly cited and applied. It remains for us to state as a conclusion that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in the courts of Iowa, and the judgment of the district court will be affirmed.

AMERICAN BISCUIT & MFG. CO. v.
KLOTZ et al.
(44 Fed. 721.)

Circuit Court, E. D. Louisiana. January 8, 1891.

In Equity.

T. J. Semmes and Bayne, Denegre &
Bayne, for complainant.

W. S. Benedict and Rouse & Grant, for defendants.

Before PARDEE, Circuit Judge, and BIL-LINGS, District Judge.

PER CURIAM. This cause is submitted upon an application for a receiver. Some time in May last, the defendant Klotz, and Fitzpatrick, his partner, composing the firm of B. Klotz & Co., sold to the complainant their biscuit and confectionery manufactory for the price of $259,000, and an assumption of the debts of B. Klotz & Co., amounting to $42,000, which it was understood and agreed should be paid out of the income from the future business. The visible property was estimated to be of the value of $101,000, and the good-will of the business to be of the value of $200,000. The price was paid in stock of the complainant's corporation, estimated to be of value at par; that is, to be worth 100 cents on the face value. The purchase was completed, price paid, property delivered, the factory and good-will transferred by Klotz & Co. to the complainant. Klotz leased his bakery premises to complainant for the term of years, and contracted in writing to become, and did become, the agent of the complainant, at a salary of $— per year. Klotz continued to carry on the business as agent for the complainant down to some time in November, when he repudiated the sale and the lease, erased the name of complainant from the bakery, as agent, transferred the policies of insurance from the complainant to himself, as an individual, then to B. Klotz & Co., and, for and in the name of the late firm, resumed the possession of all the property he had sold to the complainant, and the conduct of the business of the bakery and the confectionery establishment. He did this without resort to any legal proceedings. He thereafter held possession adversely to the complainant, and excluded it from the bakery. In this state of things, the complainant filed its bill for an injunction, and for an account and for a receiver, against Klotz and W. A. Schall, who was alleged to be co-operating with him in the possession adverse to the complainant. Klotz has filed an answer, and he, together with his former partner, Fitzpatrick, who intervened by petition pro interesse suo, have filed a cross-bill asking a rescission of the entire transaction, i. e., the sale and the lease, and tendering the stock which had been received by them as the consideration of the sale. Numerous exhibits and affidavits have been adduced by each party upon this hearing. The recital thus given shows that, in an order inverted from what would be expected, we have before us a cause in which a party who has sold and delivered a business to another, and become his agent, and, as such agent, was in possession of the property sold, sets up a possession adverse to his principal, asks for a cancellation of the sale, and the purchaser and principal asks that the agent shall account, shall be enjoined from asserting any claim hostile to his principal,—in a word, for a confirmation of its rights under the purchase.

The immediate question before us is, what disposition shall be made of the res, the business of the bakery and manufactory, pending this contest? The vendor and agent asks that he be allowed to remain in adverse possession. The purchaser and principal asks for a receiver. It is clear that, as to this provisional disposition of the res, the defendant Klotz cannot be allowed to gain anything by his ouster of his vendee and principal. He must stand with those equities, and none other, which existed before the ouster. The case as to the appointment of a receiver must be reviewed and determined as if he (Klotz) had filed his bill averring possession as agent, which he asked to have changed by a decree into a possession as owner, through the cancellation of the sale and the lease; that is, he must aver a legal title in the American Biscuit & Manufacturing Company, which he seeks to have avoided and annulled. If, as in this case, he seeks to do all this by reason of fraud, and he establishes the fraud, a court of equity will not refuse to hear him. He would not be estopped, for fraud vitiates and sets aside even estoppels. Herm. Estop. par. 22, p. 244; Pendleton v. Richey, 32 Pa. 58, 63. But, while he is not estopped from proceeding to set aside the sale and the lease by reason of his agency and his obligations as trustee, he comes into court assailing and seeking to cancel a legal title; for until that is done his possession is that of the complainant. Under these circumstances, until the hearing, the practice in the courts of chancery is not to disturb the possession under the legal title prior to the final decree, unless a case of monstrous wrong is established. Stilwell v. Wilkins, Jac. 280, reported in full in Edwards on Receivers, p. 28, Lord Eldon, when a similar question was presented, observed: "The point that struck me was whether, on a bill to impeach a sale for fraud, the court interposes so strongly before the hearing as to take away the possession from persons holding it under the effect of deeds not yet set aside by decree,"—and he holds that "it was not the general habit of the court." There the case was so monstrous, and the proof was so strong, that "it was hardly possible that the transaction could stand," and the legal title was interfered with.

This is a leading case, and gives what we find is the rule. The possession under the title is not disturbed unless the proof of fraud is so strong as to lead the court to the clear conviction that it will, on the final hearing, be established. The fraud set up and relied upon by the defendant and intervenor is false and fraudulent representations by the agents of the complainant in this: that they represented that the stock was fully paid-up stock, whereas, in truth and fact, it was none of it paid up in money, and only paid up in part, and, to the extent of that part, by transfer of plants or bakeries and manufactories at an estimated value as capital. The stock delivered to the defendant and intervenor was not paid up until it was issued to them, and was paid for by a transfer of the bakery and good-will; and then it became paid up, and they were discharged from all liability to be made to contribute as shareholders therefor. The testimony as to what was represented by complainant's agents about the stock being paid up is conflicting; but, when viewed in connection with the circumstances under which the stock was received, fails to satisfy us, upon this preliminary hearing, that any false representations are proved to have been made. The case of the defendant and intervenor, set up in their cross-bill, whereby they oppose the appointment of a receiver, is that of parties who seek to rescind a deed on the ground of fraud, which upon this hearing they fail to establish.

So far we have considered the question of appointing a receiver of the property in controversy inter partes, and mainly from the stand-point presented by the defendant's showing, and thereon such appointment seems proper, and we should accord it, but for an aspect of the case originally suggested by the defendant, when the case was pending in the state court, apparently abandoned here, but sufficiently brought to our notice by the exhibits of both parties. We are not satisfied that the complainant's business is legitimate. While the nominal purpose of the complainant's corporation, as stated in its charter, is the manufacture and sale of biscuit and confectionery, its real scope and purpose seems to be to combine and pool the large competing bakeries throughout the country into practically what is known and called a "trust," the effect of which is to partially, if not wholly, prevent competition, and enhance prices of necessary articles of food, and secure, if not a monopoly, a large control, of the supply and prices in leading articles of bread-stuffs. The case shows that an insignificant number of shares of complainant's stock was unconditionally subscribed for, apparently enough to qualify directors; but the great mass was taken and held by irresponsible parties, to be used in parceling out as full-paid stock to such leading and successful bakeries throughout the country as could be induced to come in on an agreed value of the property and a large estimate of good-will.

Each bakery when secured to be carried on by its former managers, subject, however, as to control of funds, territory, prices, and competition, to the central management; all profits pooled, and of course division thereof to be made on the basis of the stock assigned to each bakery. Under this arrangement complainant has already secured the control, and pooled the business, of 35 of the leading bakeries in 12 different states of the West and South, and is evidently seeking more constituents. The act of congress approved July 2, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies," expressly prohibits, under severe penalties, "every contract, combination, in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy, in restraint of trade or commerce among the several states," and declares punishable "every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the common trade or commerce among the several states." The enforcement of this act is, by the statute, devolved upon the circuit courts of the United States. The first and third sections of an act of the legislature of Louisiana, approved July 5, 1890, entitled "An act to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and to provide penalties for the violation of this act," declare:

"Section 1. That every contract, combination in the form of trust, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce, or to fix or limit the amount or quantity of any article, commodity, or merchandise to be manufactured, mined, produced, or sold in this state, is hereby declared illegal."

"Sec. 3. That every person who shall monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, or combine or conspire with any other person or persons to monopolize, any part of the trade or commerce within the limits of this state, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor; and, on conviction thereof, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding one year, or by both said punishments, in the discretion of the court."

In construing the federal and state statutes, we exclude from consideration all monopolies which exist by legislative grant; for we think the word "monopolize" cannot be intended to be used with reference to the acquisition of exclusive rights under government concession, but that the law-maker has used the word to mean "to aggregate" or "concentrate" in the hands of few, practically, and, as a matter of fact, and according to the known results of human action, to the exclusion of others; to accomplish this end by what, in popular language, is expressed in the word "pooling," which may be defined to be an aggregation of property or capital belonging to different persons, with a view to common liabilities and profits. The expression in each law "combination in the form of trust" would seem to point to just what, in popular language, is meant by pooling.

Now it is to be observed that these statutes outline an offense, but require for its complete commission no ulterior motive, such as to defraud, etc.; and, further, that the language is altogether silent as to what means must be used to constitute the offense. The offense is defined to "combine in the form of trust, or otherwise, in restraint of trade or commerce," and "to monopolize, or attempt to monopolize, any of the trade or commerce." To compass either of these things, with no other motive than to compass them, and by any means, constitutes the offense. One just and decisive test of the meaning of the expression "to monopolize" is obtained by getting at the evil which the law-maker has endeavored to abolish and restrict. The statutes show that the evil was the hindrance and oppression in trade and commerce wrought by its absorption in the hands of the few, so that the prices would be in danger of being arbitrarily and exorbitantly fixed, because all competition would be swallowed up, so that the man of small means would find himself excluded from the restrained or monopolized trade or commerce as absolutely as if kept out by law or force. If this is the meaning of the defining words, does not this corporation, thus glutted with the 35 industries of 12 states, disclose an "attempt to monopolize?" So far, therefore, as the complainant's business is a combination in restraint of trade, or is an "attempt to monopolize, or combine, in the form of a trust, or otherwise, any part of trade or commerce," as these words are properly defined, the law stamps it as unlawful, and the courts should not encourage it. Aside from this, the complainant's business, even if lawful, being of the kind shown above, is not of that meritorious kind that it should be encouraged by a court of equity. The appointment of a receiver by a court of equity is not a matter of strict right, but of judicial discretion. Fosdick v. Schall, 99 U. S. 235. It falls within that class of interlocutory remedies which courts must grant or withhold, according to a discretion conscientiously exercised, upon a consideration of all the facts which a cause presents, involving the rights of the parties and the interests of the public. The attempt to accumulate in the hands of a single organization the business of supplying bread itself to so large a portion of the poor, as well as the rich, people of the United States should not be favored by a court of equity. It carries with it too much of danger of excluding healthy competition, thereby increasing the difficulty to the general public of participating in a most useful business, as well as adding to the possibility of multitudes of citizens being temporarily, at least, compelled to pay an arbitrary and high price for daily food.

Whatever we may feel compelled to do, on the final hearing of this cause, towards recognizing the complainant's legal rights, and compelling a faithless trustee to account, we are clear that at this preliminary stage, with our present impressions of the character and general scope of complainant's business, the court ought not, by the appointment of a receiver, to aid complainant to perfect, and perhaps to enlarge, his combination or trust; and the refusal to appoint a receiver can result in no serious and lasting injury to complainant, because the shares of stock of complainant company, forming the entire consideration of complainant's purchase, have been tendered in court, and may be impounded, to be held as security for any damages susceptible of proof resulting from defendant's mismanagement of the property pending the suit. The motion for a receiver is denied.

HAYWOOD et al. v. LINCOLN LUMBER CO. et al.

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Dec. 23, 1885.

Appeal from circuit court, Lincoln county.

Pullings, Hoyt & Holway and D. S. Ordway, for appellants Murray Haywood and another. Silverthorn, Hurley & Ryan, for respondents Lincoln Lumber Co. and others.

ORTON, J. This is an action brought by the appellants to foreclose a mortgage given by the defendant lumber company, by its president and secretary, to the said appellants and the defendant T. P. Matthews and one George C. Smith, on the fourth day of February, 1884, on all of the real property of said corporation, to secure a bond in the penal sum of $100,000, given at the same time by said company, to said mortgagees, conditioned to pay them certain indebtedness of the company past due them, respectively, in the aggregate of over $50,000. The interest in said mortgage of said George C. Smith was assigned to said plaintiffs. The defendant Robert C. Parcher was appointed receiver in April, 1884, in a suit of one J. C. Clark against said company; and said Parcher, as such receiver, in June, 1884, loaned of the defendant the First National Bank of the City of Wausau the sum of $10,000, to be used in the management of the business and property of said lumber company; and, by the order and leave of the court, executed, as such receiver, a mortgage upon the real property of said company to said bank to secure the same. The said defendant Parcher and the defendant the Lincoln Lumber Company answered the complaint, alleging, substantially, that the said mortgage sought to be foreclosed was executed by the president and secretary of said company, without authority; and that, at the time, said corporation was insolvent, to the knowledge of said mortgagees, and owed large indebtedness to others; and that said mortgage was given by said officers, and authorized, if at all, by the directors of said company to be given to themselves, to secure their own claims against the company, as an unlawful and fraudulent preference of themselves as the creditors of the company, in fraud and with intent to defraud the other creditors and the company, and that said bond and mortgage were therefore void. The said defendant the National Bank answered, setting up its mortgage by the receiver, and alleging its priority to the mortgage in suit by the agreement of the mortgagees in said mortgage, and prays a foreclosure thereof. The circuit court substantially held that said mortgage was given without authority, because the majority of the quorum of the directors voting that said bond and mortgage be given were interested in the same, and that said company was then insolvent; and that the directors held the property in trust for the creditors, and the execution of said mortgage by the officers and by the authority of the directors to themselves to secure their antecedent claims against the company was an unlawful preference, and was fraudulent and void; and that the said mortgage to the bank has priority, and was lawfully executed by said receiver. The special findings are numerous, and the case voluminous; but the above are believed to be substantially the findings, and upon the substantial issues in the case.

The principles involved in this suit are really very simple, and almost elementary, and not at all complicated; and we cannot but think they have been greatly magnified and more earnestly contested on account of the amount in controversy. The plaintiffs contest the power of the receiver, Parcher, to give the mortgage to the bank on the ground of the want of jurisdiction of the court to appoint him or any one receiver in the case of Clark against the company. These plaintiffs were directors of the company, and one of them the secretary, and both mortgagees, when the said Parcher was appointed such receiver, and as directors and as mortgagees counseled and advised his appointment, and consented thereto, and the directors over and over again recognized and confirmed it by dealing with him as such, and placing the property of the company in his hands; and, after his appointment, the plaintiffs, together with the defendant Matthews, as said mortgagees, by writing under seal, authorized the said receiver to borrow not exceeding $15,000, and give a mortgage on the property of the company in his hands to secure it, for the purpose of carrying on the business in running the mills and sawing up the logs, and released their said mortgage so far as it would have preference of the mortgage so given by the receiver, and so as to give the same priority to their said mortgage. There is abundant evidence of the plaintiffs' estoppel to dispute the authority of said receiver, both in pais and by deed. But accepting the allegations of the complaint in that case as true, the court not only had the power, but it was its duty, to appoint a receiver. The directors and officers had given the mortgage in suit alleged to be in fraud of the creditors of the company, nearly or quite insolvent at the time, and threatened afterwards to sell out in gross all the property of the company without notice, and to bid the same off in their own names and for their own benefit, in fraud of many other creditors of the company, and in this way to close up the business of the company. These are some of the substantial allegations of the complaint of Clark, the plaintiff, who was himself one of the stockholders of the company. Within the general powers of a court of chancery, which are preserved in the fifth subdivision of section 2787, Rev. St., this was a proper case for an injunction and receiver both. The property of the company was being mismanaged, and was in danger of being lost to the stockholders and creditors through the collusion and fraud of its officers and directors. The only place of safety for the business and property of the company was in the "hand" of the court through a receiver pendente lite. A stronger case for a receiver could scarcely be made, and the numerous authorities cited in the able brief of the learned counsel of the respondents, and the facts stated in the complaint, abundantly authorize and justify his appointment in that case. We think the circuit court properly held that the court had jurisdiction to appoint Parcher a receiver; and, upon the evidence, properly found that the mortgage to the bank was not only valid, but has priority over the mortgage in suit. Under repeated decisions of this court, the exceptions of the respondent cannot be considered, except to support the judgment rendered, unless the respondent also appeal. Therefore this court cannot go further than the circuit court in ordering a foreclosure of the bank mortgage in this action.

But the matter of this bank mortgage is of only incidental importance in this case. The main question is of the validity of the mortgage in suit. There was abundant evidence to justify the finding of the circuit court that at the time it was given the company was insolvent. In such case, the authorities seem to be uniform that the directors and officers of the corporation are trustees of the creditors, and must manage its property and assets with strict regard to their interests; and, if they are themselves creditors while the insolvent corporation is under their management, they cannot secure to themselves any preference or advantage over other creditors. The directors are, then, trustees of all the property of the corporation, for all of its creditors, and an equal distribution must be made, and no preference to any one of the creditors, and much less to the directors or trustees, as such. I have carefully examined all the authorities cited on both sides touching this principle, and find it recognized in every case. Many of the authorities cited by the learned counsel of the appellants as holding a contrary doctrine state this doctrine as fully established, and cite many of the authorities in its favor cited here by the learned counsel of the respondents, and cases are made an exception only because, in their facts, this principle has no application. It is reiterated in the text of elementary works, and numerous cases are cited to sustain it. Mor. Priv. Corp. 579-581. A few only of the cases holding this principle will be cited here, but many others may be found in the brief of counsel and elsewhere too numerous for citation. Marr v. Bank, 4 Cold. 471, 484; Koehler v. Iron Co., 2 Black, 715; Curran v. Arkansas, 15 How. 306; Richards v. Insurance Co., 43 N. H. 263; Bradley v. Farwell, Holmes, 433; Drury v. Cross, 7 Wall. 299; Paine v. Railroad Co., 31 Ind. 353; Gas-light Co. v. Terrell, L. R. 10 Eq. 168. I have been unable to find a single case, which in its facts is like this, in which this doctrine is even questioned and was not strictly applied.

But there is another principle equally unquestionable which renders the mortgage in suit void. The directors and officers made the mortgage, or directly caused it to be made, to themselves. They occupied a fiduciary relation to the corporation, its stockholders, and its creditors, and they had no right to use such relation and their official position for their own benefit, to the injury of others in equal right. This principle was applied to the taking of a mortgage by the directors on the property of the corporation to secure their liability as sureties, upon a note of the corporation, in Corbett v. Woodward, 5 Sawy. 403, Fed. Cas. No. 3,223, which is a strong case, and very similar is the case of Koehler v. Iron Co., supra. See, also, Mor. Priv. Corp. 243; Hoyle v. Railroad Co., 54 N. Y. 314; Railway Co. v. Poor, 59 Me. 277; Butts v. Wood, 38 Barb. 188; Railway Co. v. Huxon, 19 Eng. Law & Eq. 365; Scott v. Depeyster, 1 Edw. Ch. 513; and Verplanck v. Insurance Co., Id. 85; Railway Co. v. Magnay, 25 Beav. 586; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 194, and cases cited. But it is really unnecessary to cite cases from abroad when the same principles have been established in our own cases, as in Cook v. Berlin Woolen Mills, 43 Wis. 434, and Pickett v. School-district, 25 Wis. 553.

Directors, officers, and agents, and other like trustees, cannot mortgage or convey to themselves any more than one can contract with himself. The idea that the same persons constitute different identities of themselves by being called directors or officers of a corporation, so that, as directors or officers, they can convey or mortgage to or contract with themselves as private persons, is in violation of common sense. In re Taylor Orphan Asylum, 36 Wis. 552, and cases above cited. See 1 Perry, Trusts, § 207, and Mor. Priv. Corp. § 245; Walworth County Bank v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 16 Wis. 629; Coal Co. v. Sherman, 30 Barb. 553.

It is unnecessary to decide the question whether there was a quorum of disinterested directors that directed the mortgage to be given. The mortgage is an entirety, and it makes no difference how many persons are severally interested in it as mortgagees. If such mortgagees, as directors, authorized it, they authorized an act in which they were all jointly interested. They may not have been joint creditors, but they are joint mortgagees, because the mortgage as a security is an entirety. Whether, in this view, the mortgage was never authorized to be given by the president and secretary of the company, by the company through its directors, it may not be necessary to decide; but it seems to me rather illogical to say that, because there is a quorum of directors who are creditors severally, a majority of them may authorize their claims to be secured by one mortgage, and do not act on their own claims, but each one acts in respect to the claims of the other. If A., B., and C. are several creditors and a quorum of directors, and A. and B. vote to give C. an interest in the mortgage to secure his claim, A. and C. so vote as to the claim of B., and B. and C. as to the claim of A.,—do they not vote for themselves in respect to one mortgage? This would be an ingenious and convenient collusion to vote to themselves all the property of the corporation at almost any time, on the ground that the majority so voting is disinterested and impartial.

But it is very clear to us that the mortgage is void in view of the above principles, and that disposes of the action of foreclosure. Beyond that, the findings of the court are not very important as to the rights of the defendants.

The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

BANK OF FLORENCE et al. v. UNITED STATES SAVINGS & LOAN CO.

(16 South. 110, 104 Ala. 297.)

Supreme Court of Alabama. Aug. 9, 1894.

Appeal from district court, Lauderdale county; W. P. Chitwood, Judge.

Suit by the United States Savings & Loan Company against the Bank of Florence and others. From a decree appointing a receiver, defendants appeal. Reversed.

In addition to the allegations of the bill, which are stated in the opinion, and upon which is predicated the right to have the receiver appointed, the bill also averred that the officers of the bank had, wrongfully and without authority of its stockholders, turned over the assets of the bank to one S. S. Broadus, who had assumed complete control of the same, and that he was pursuing reckless methods in disposing of the assets of said bank.

Roulhac & Nathan and Emmet O'Neal, for appellants. Paul Hodges, for appellee.

BRICKELL, C. J. The material allegations of the original bill, on which is predicated the right to the appointment of a receiver, and the right to the ultimate equitable relief which is prayed, are capable of being reduced to a narrow compass. The complainant is a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the state of Minnesota, having a place of business in the city of Florence, in this state. The Bank of Florence was engaged in a general banking business at Florence, and became the agent of complainant for the collection of moneys there due and owing, and which were to become due, and was charged with the duty of remitting such moneys to the complainant as collected. Neglecting the duty of remittance of these moneys, the bank suffered the sum of $538.80 to accumulate in its hands, and suspended payments. Though insolvent, the bank made no transfer or assignment of its property and assets, but proceeded in winding up its affairs, with the acquiescence of its creditors. Judgments were being rendered against it, and it was making preferences in payment of its creditors. These are the material allegations of the bill, upon which is founded the right to the appointment of a receiver; and the specific relief prayed is that, for the payment of the sum due, the complainant be decreed a lien on all the assets of the bank, in priority of all general liens, by which we suppose is intended in priority of all creditors not having a specific lien. When an application is made for the appointment of a receiver, the primary inquiry is whether there is shown a reasonable probability that the plaintiff asking the appointment will ultimately succeed in obtaining the general relief sought by the suit. If ultimate success is a matter of grave doubt, or if, as in the present case, it be clear that the general relief sought cannot be obtained, the appointment ought not to be made. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. (2d Ed.) § 1331; High, Rec. (2d Ed.) § 8; Randle v. Carter, 62 Ala. 95. It is true, as a general rule, that, in making or refusing the appointment of a receiver, the court will not forestall or anticipate the decision which may be made on final hearing. This is true when a case is presented upon which there is a reasonable probability the plaintiff may ultimately obtain relief. In such cases the pleadings may not be drawn with technical accuracy. The bill may be subject to demurrer for the want of proper parties, or because of defects of form or the absence of substantial allegations,—insufficiencies curable by amendment. These insufficiencies, of themselves, do not form an impediment to the appointment of a receiver, if a case be made by a party having interests to be protected and preserved entitling him to the general relief which is prayed. Ex parte Walker, 25 Ala. 81.

The relation between the complainant and the Bank of Florence was that of principal and agent, created by their agreement,—a legal relation strictly, though, to attain the ends of justice, and preserve the confidence it involves, courts of equity, under some circumstances, deal with it as a fiduciary relation. The debt created by the breach of duty of the agent is a mere simple contract debt, for the recovery of which legal remedies are adequate. Crothers v. Lee, 29 Ala. 337; Knotts v. Tarver, 8 Ala. 743. The demand being a simple contract debt, purely of a legal character, the complainant, in the absence of some peculiar equity, is not entitled to the intervention of a court of equity to enforce its payment. Reese v. Bradford, 13 Ala. 838; Sanders v. Watson, 14 Ala. 198. These well-recognized principles are not controverted. The insistence is that as the agent converted to his own use the money of the principal, commingling it with his own money, or in some form with his other assets, so that it cannot be identified or the specific uses to which it was applied traced, it is sufficient to trace it into the general assets of the agent to impress them with a trust for the payment of the money,—a trust which is peculiarly of equitable cognizance. It is true that a trustee or an agent or other person standing in a fiduciary relation cannot derive benefit from commingling with his own the moneys of his cestui que trust or principal; and it is equally true that, if he makes an investment of such moneys, a court of equity, so long as the moneys may be distinctly traced, will follow them, and impress upon the investment the trust to which the moneys were subject. The conversion of the trust moneys, as distinguished from other moneys of the trustee or agent, must be clearly shown. It is not sufficient to show that there has been a conversion of trust funds, and the acquisition or possession by the trustee or agent of property or assets, which may be supposed a substitute for such funds. As is said by the supreme court of Massachusetts: "The court will go as far as it can in tracing and following trust money; but when, as a matter of fact, it cannot be traced, the equitable right of the cestui que trust to follow it fails. Under such circumstances, if the trustee has become bankrupt, the court cannot say that the trust money is to be found somewhere in the general estate of the trustee that still remained. He may have lost it with property of his own, and in such case the cestui que trust can only come in and share with the general creditors." Little v. Chadwick, 151 Mass. 109, 23 N. E. 1005. There is no question of tracing or identifying the moneys of the principal. The naked averment of the bill is that, in violation of duty, the agent converted to his own use the moneys of the principal, creating a mere simple contract debt. There is no averment that the assets upon which it is sought to fasten the trust had not been acquired by the agent before the conversion; no averment that in any form the moneys of the principal entered into their acquisition. All that can be said is that which may be said of any delinquent trustee or agent,—that he had converted the moneys of his cestui que trust or principal; and from the business in which the agent was engaged it may be presumed that, in the course of the business, they were commingled and used with the moneys of the agent. If a trust were raised to charge the assets of the agent, a like trust would arise and be fastened on the general assets of every delinquent agent or trustee,—a trust which would prevail against all others than bona fide purchasers. The moneys of the principal are incapable of being identified and traced into any of the assets of the bank, and, this being true, the principal, we repeat, is a mere simple contract creditor of the agent, not entitled to any preference or priority of payment over other creditors. Ellison v. Moses, 95 Ala. 223, 11 South. 347; Association v. Austin (Ala.) 13 South. 908. It is quite an error to suppose that the two cases chiefly relied on by counsel for the appellee (National Bank v. Insurance Co., 104

U. S. 54; In re Hallett's Estate, 13 Ch. Div. 696) support a contrary doctrine. It is apparent the original bill is without equity, the complainant is not entitled to the general relief sought, and the appointment of the receiver was erroneous.

If the case was of equitable cognizance, entitling the complainant to relief, a fatal objection to the regularity of the order appointing the receiver is that it was made without notice to the defendants. A receiver may be appointed without notice to the defendant who is to be dispossessed of his property or assets, but the cases in which notice may be dispensed with are exceptional. There must be shown a strong case of pressing emergency, rendering immediate interference necessary before there is time to give notice; or it must be shown that notice would jeopardize the delivery of the property over which the receivership is to be extended. Moritz v. Miller, 87 Ala. 331, 6 South. 269; Dollins v. Lindsey, 89 Ala. 217, 7 South. 234. The averment of the bill on which the court below proceeded to the appointment without notice is expressed in these words: "And complainant alleges the necessity exists for the appointment of a receiver, to prevent the further unauthorized and illegal action by the said Broadus, and to prevent irreparable injury and total destruction of the assets of the said bank." It is not on such vague and indefinite allegations, the opinions or conclusions of the pleader, not accompanied by a statement of the facts on which they are founded, that notice of a judicial proceeding can be dispensed with, and parties deprived of the possession or control of property. The particular facts and circumstances supposed to create the necessity for the immediate appointment should have been stated, submitting to the judgment of the court whether they created the necessity—the pressing emergency—for judicial interference. Verplank v. Insurance Co., 2 Paige, 438. Upon the bill alone, without affidavits or other evidence, the appointment was made. The order appointing the receiver must be vacated and annulled, and the cause remanded. Reversed, rendered, and remanded.

COLTON et al. v. DOVER PERPETUAL BUILDING & LOAN ASS'N OF BALTIMORE.

(45 Atl. 23, 90 Md. 85.)

Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 24, 1899.

Appeal from circuit court of Baltimore city; Henry Stockbridge, Judge.

Exceptions by the Dover Perpetual Building & Loan Association of Baltimore to the auditor's account distributing the assets of the South Baltimore Bank, refusing to allow said building association to set off a deposit against a note executed by it, and held by the bank. From an order sustaining the exceptions, William Colton and Simon P. Schott, receivers of the bank, appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and PAGE, PEARCE, FOWLER, BOYD, and SCHMUCKER, JJ.

Wm. S. Bryan, Jr., and Martin Lehmayr, for appellants. L. P. Henninghausen and P. C. Henninghausen, for appellee.

BOYD, J. A bill was filed in the court below against the South Baltimore Bank, a corporation of this state, on the 24th day of February, 1898, asking for the appointment of a receiver, and that the bank be declared insolvent. An answer was filed the same day, admitting that the bank was insolvent, and consenting to the appointment of a receiver. One of the appellants was appointed on that day, and afterwards the other was appointed co-receiver. On the 1st day of June, 1898, a decree was passed adjudicating the bank insolvent, and determining it was so when this bill was filed. The receivers proceeded with the discharge of their duties, and in due course the case was referred to the auditor to state an account distributing the assets of the bank. When the bill was filed, the bank held a promissory note of the appellee for $1,000, which became due on March 2, 1898, and the appellee had a deposit with the bank of $357.25. At the maturity of the note the appellee tendered the receiver then in office the sum of $642.75 in payment of said note, claiming the amount of the deposit as a set-off, and demanded the note, but the receiver refused to accept that amount. Subsequently that sum was accepted, under an agreement that it should be credited on the note, without prejudice to the receiver's claim for the balance, and that no suit should be instituted until it was determined whether the appellee was entitled to set off the deposit against the balance due on the note. The auditor refused to allow the set-off, but distributed to the appellee its proportion dividend as a creditor. Exceptions were filed to the audit, which were sustained, and a decretal order was passed directing the receivers to allow the association the deposit as a set-off against the balance due on the note. From that order this appeal was taken by the receivers, with the permission of the court; it being represented that there were a number of other claims that would be affected by the decision. The question, therefore, to be determined by us, is whether the appellee is entitled to set off the amount of its deposit with the bank at the time of its failure against the balance due on the note, under the circumstances we have stated. Several reasons have been assigned by the appellants in support of the position that the appellee is only entitled to receive a distribution on the amount of the deposit, as other creditors are.

1. One ground relied on at the argument was that a depositor in a bank cannot maintain a suit for his deposit unless he has previously made a demand for it, and that no demand was made in this case. "It is now perfectly well settled that the relation between banker and customer, who pays money into the bank, or to whose credit money is received there on deposit, is the ordinary relation of debtor and creditor." Hardy v. Bank, 51 Md. 585. And it is equally well settled that a depositor cannot, as a general rule, maintain an action to recover his deposit until he has first made a demand for its payment. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 838. But, while that is true, there may be circumstances under which no demand is necessary prior to bringing suit; and, on page 839 of the volume of the Encyclopedia of Law above referred to, it is said that "where the bank has suspended, or where for any other reason it would be manifestly futile to make demand, none need be made." In the case of Planters' Bank v. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank, 8 Gill. & J. 449, it was held that the necessity for a demand would be dispensed with by the suspension of specie payments and discontinuance of banking operations by the bank, provided those acts were known to the plaintiff, and from the time of such knowledge the statute of limitations would begin to run. It would have been "manifestly futile to make demand" on the bank or the receiver for the amount of deposit; and, if the appellee had sued, the fact that a demand was not previously made would not have defeated the action. If the bank had not failed, and had sued the appellee for the amount of the note, it would not have been necessary for the latter to have proven a demand for the deposit prior to the time suit was instituted by the bank. A defendant can set off against a plaintiff's demand a note of the plaintiff which matured after the commencement of the action. Clarke v. Magruder, 2 Har. & J. 77. As early as Whittington v. Bank, 5 Har. & J. 489, our predecessors held that the defendant in an action by a bank on a promissory note against him may set off against the claim of the bank any money he has in bank, and it is not intimated that a previous demand was necessary in order to enable him to do so. The bank being a debtor to the depositor, the right to set off such deposit is within the very terms of our statute; and hence in a suit by the bank the claim for the deposit can be set off, although no previous demand for it has been made. That being so, it would seem to be clear that no demand would be necessary in order to enable the defendant to set off the amount of the deposit against a claim made by the receiver of the bank, if there be no other reason for not allowing it. In Morse, Banks, § 338, it is said: "Where the bank itself stops payment and becomes insolvent, the customer may avail himself, in set-off against his indebtedness to the bank, of any indebtedness of the bank to himself,—as, for example, the balance due him on his deposit account. So, also, even though the debt to him has not matured at the time of the insolvency." This may be done whether a demand had or had not been previously made. Fort v. McCully, 59 Barb. 87; Seymour v. Dunham, 24 Hun, 93.

2. We come then to the main question in the case. It is argued that to allow the set-off would be, in effect, to give the appellee a preference over the other creditors of the bank, and that it is the duty of the receivers to distribute the assets pro rata, and not to pay in full any one creditor. If the appellee was merely a creditor, that argument might prevail, but that was not the relation that existed between the two. The appellee was not only a creditor to the amount of its deposit, but it was a debtor to the amount of the note held by the bank. Its debit was larger than its credit, and, if the bank had not failed, it could only have recovered the difference between the two. Do the receivers occupy any better position? The general rule undoubtedly is that a receiver takes subject to set-offs which the defendant might have set up against the original owner. See 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 308, and Merrill v. Granite Co. (Mass.) 36 N. E. 797, 23 L. R. A. 313, note, where many authorities are collected. There are some exceptions to the rule, one of which may be mentioned, although not directly involved in the case, as some of the authorities cited by the appellants are to that point; and that is that a claim obtained after the commencement of the proceedings which resulted in the appointment of a receiver should not be allowed as a set-off unless there be some statute authorizing it to be done. In this case, however, the debt was due by the bank to the appellee before the proceedings under which the appellants were appointed were instituted. As we have seen, the relation of debtor and creditor existed; and the question discussed above, as to whether demand must be made before suit can be brought, does not in any wise reflect upon the question of indebtedness, but only on the right to sue for the indebtedness before demand is made. But it is said on behalf of the appellants that, inasmuch as the note fell due after the appointment of the first receiver, he took it free from all equities, just as a bona fide purchaser for value would have done, and that a claim in favor of the bank which did not mature until in the hands of the receiver is not subject to a set-off by a claim which existed against the bank before the receiver's rights accrued; in short, that in one case the debt is due by the bank to the customer, and in the other by the customer to the receiver. If that were strictly correct, there would be some ground for the contention; for if, for example, the appellee had purchased some property from the receiver, it would not be permitted to set off its claim against such indebtedness to the receiver, for it would thereby not only obtain an unwarranted preference over other creditors, but it would prevent a proper settlement of the insolvent estate, and, moreover, they would not be mutual claims. But when the receiver was appointed he took the assets of the bank, and among those assets was this note. It was a debt already incurred by the appellee, and payable to the bank when due. By reason of the fact that it was payable to and held by the bank, it was an asset that became vested in the receiver, and he took it subject to the equities existing between the appellee and the bank. Although there are some authorities to the contrary, the great weight of authority is to the effect that the fact that the claim thus held by the receiver does not mature until after his appointment does not prevent a defendant from using his claim as a set-off. Among other decisions are Berry v. Brett, 6 Bosw. 627; Scott v. Armstrong, 146 U. S. 499, 13 Sup. Ct. 148, 36 L. Ed. 1059; Platt v. Bentley, 11 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 171; In re Hatch, 155 N. Y. 401, 50 N. E. 49, 40 L. R. A. 664; Bank v. Balliet, 8 Watts & S. 311; Aldrich v. Campbell, 4 Gray, 284; Smith v. Spengler, 83 Mo. 408; McCagg v. Woodman, 28 Ill. 84; Armstrong v. Warner, 49 Ohio St. 376, 31 N. E. 877, 17 L. R. A. 466; Yardley v. Clothier, 2 C. C. A. 349, 51 Fed. 506, 17 L. R. A. 462; Skiles v. Houston, 110 Pa. St. 254, 2 Atl. 30. See, also, Fera v. Wickham (N. Y. App.) 31 N. E. 1028, 17 L. R. A. 456, note. Some of these cases make a distinction between a technical set-off in suits at law, and cross demands allowed by courts of equity; but, as we are now considering a distribution in a court of equity, all of the cases can properly be referred to here.

3. But it is contended by the appellants that if it be conceded that the general rule is as we have stated, about the rights of the receivers, they occupy a different position, by reason of our statute. Section 264a of article 23, c. 349, Acts 1896, provides that when a corporation has been determined or proven to be insolvent and dissolved, in accordance with section 264, "all of its property and assets of every description shall be distributed to the creditors of said corporation in the same manner that the property and assets of an insolvent debtor are distributed under the provisions of article 47 of the Code. * * * And the date of the filing of the bill against such corporation, upon which it may be dissolved, shall be taken and treated for the purpose of determining the validity of preferences and for all other purposes as the date of the filing of the petition in insolvency by or against a natural person." In short, receivers of corporations that are dissolved under that statute are placed on the same basis as trustees in insolvency of natural persons, and the date of filing the bill is the time fixed to determine the status of the parties affected by it. But section 11 of article 47 of the Code provides that "the estates of the insolvent shall be distributed under the order of the court according to the principles of equity." While set-off in equity is generally governed by the same principles as at law, courts of equity sometimes allow a set-off where for some technical reason it could not be allowed at law. The insolvency of the party against whom it is claimed frequently affords equitable ground for allowing it. A technical set-off is wholly of statutory origin, but courts of equity exercise an original jurisdiction over the subject, and will, when reason and justice require it, enforce a counterclaim, though not within the letter of the statute. Smith v. Donnell, 9 Gill, 84, and Manning v. Thruston, 59 Md. 218, are instances of such equitable relief. It would sometimes work great injustice to customers of banks if they should be required to pay in full their indebtedness to the bank, and only receive a dividend on their deposits. A customer might from time to time make deposits in bank with a view to meet his note held by it, and it would manifestly be a great hardship, if, under those circumstances, he could not apply his deposit towards the payment of the note, because the bank had failed and a receiver had been appointed. A court of equity would certainly not permit such unjust results in the distribution of funds before it, if such facts were proven; and, although in this case there is no evidence that the deposit was made with special reference to the maturity of the note, yet, as it became due a few days after the receiver was appointed, it might well be inferred that the appellee had that fact in view in making the deposits. If the bank had not failed, it could have applied the deposit of the appellee towards the payment of the note. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 828, 835; Miller v. Bank, 30 Md. 392. And it would be unreasonable to permit a receiver of an insolvent bank to collect the note in full, without allowing the set-off, particularly as the bank had a lien on the deposits. "The bank holds a lien upon the deposits in its hands to secure the repayment of the depositor's indebtedness, and may enforce that lien as the debts mature, by applying the debtor's deposits upon them, thus setting the two off against each other." 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law (2d Ed.) 835; Miller v. Bank, supra. If the appellee was not financially responsible, and had attempted to assign its claim for deposits against the bank to a third person, could there have been any question about the right of the receiver to insist upon the application of the deposit to the payment of the note? Clearly not, as the assignee of the claim would have taken it subject to equities existing between the appellee and the bank, and a court of equity would have protected the bank or its representatives, the receivers. Marshall v. Cooper, 43 Md. 46. It would seem clear, then, that at least in equity the deposit should be allowed as a counterclaim or set-off. But even at law it should be allowed against the receivers. It is true that a trustee appointed under our insolvent laws does not occupy precisely the same position that an ordinary trustee under a conventional deed of trust does, as he has greater powers, and represents the creditors. He can, for example, have a deed made by the insolvent in fraud of his creditors set aside, which an assignee under a voluntary deed of trust cannot do, because the latter can only do what his assignor could. But the insolvent law does not vest him with such powers as would enable him to collect more than is actually due the insolvent, and there was only actually due the balance between the two accounts. "All the property of every description, rights and claims of the insolvent," vest in the trustee; and, if the insolvent has disposed of any of his property in violation of the insolvent law, it is void, and the trustee can recover it. It could not be successfully contended that the creditors of an insolvent could deprive one who owes the insolvent of the right of set-off, and how can the trustee who represents them do so? Nor can he avoid the right of set-off on the theory that he occupies the position of a bona fide purchaser for value. Haxtun v. Bishop, 3 Wend. 13, referred to by the appellants, tends to sustain that position, but that case has not met with approval. See (N. Y. App.) 31 N. E. 1028, 17 L. R. A. 458, note. In Dowler v. Cushwa, 27 Md. 354, this court quoted with approval from Van Wagoner v. Gaslight Co., 23 N. J. Law, 291, that: "The rule pervades both bankrupt and insolvent laws, founded on general principles of equity, that all cross demands, whether connected or independent, provided they be mutual, as between the bankrupt or the insolvent and the creditor, shall be set off, and the balance only shall be deemed the indebtedness on one side or the other. The assignees take a bankrupt's property in the same condition, and subject to the same burthens, as the bankrupt himself held it, on the principle that they are not purchasers for a valuable consideration, but as voluntary assignees and personal representatives, and are therefore distinguished from particular assignees." Although fully recognizing the distinction between the trustee of an insolvent and one appointed by the debtor in a deed of trust, as made by this court in previous cases, we cannot adopt the view urged upon us, that the former is to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser for value of the assets that come into his hands, and thereby permit him to deprive a debtor of such a right as that to set off a debt due by the insolvent prior to the institution of the insolvent proceedings; and we find nothing in our statute, or in the authorities we feel called upon to follow, to cause us to reach a conclusion that in our opinion would work such manifest injustice. It is not claimed that a receiver appointed under the statute referred to can occupy any better position than an insolvent trustee, and, for the reasons we have given, we will affirm the order of the court appealed from. Order affirmed; the costs to be paid out of the insolvent estate.

BAILEY v. PITTSBURGH COAL R. CO.

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 6, 1891.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Allegheny county.

Bill in equity for the appointment of a receiver to collect unpaid stock subscriptions from the stockholders of a company, for the payment of a judgment creditor of said company. J. N. McCreery, an employé of the Pittsburgh Coal Railroad Company, obtained a judgment against it. The plaintiff, his assignee, filed a bill against said company and seven of the stockholders, for the appointment of a receiver to collect sufficient unpaid stock subscriptions to pay him his claim. The said stockholders joined with said company as defendants, and filed demurrers to the bill, which were all overruled. Defendants were ordered to plead in 15 days. Said stockholders then filed a plea and answer, but the company filed no plea or answer at any time, and no decree was ever taken against it. A general replication was filed, and a master was appointed. Subsequently, pending the hearing before him, Keams, Risher, and McClure, other creditors of said company, presented petitions for leave to intervene, and were allowed to become plaintiffs. On the same day R. B. Brown, one of the seven stockholders, on behalf of himself and his co-defendants, presented a petition, setting forth the names of the other stockholders than those made defendants originally, and the amount of stock held by each, and prayed that the petitions of Keams, Risher, and McClure be granted only upon condition that the said stockholders named by him be made defendants. Keams, Risher, and McClure were joined as plaintiffs, and the stockholders named by Brown were made defendants. The pleadings remained as they were at the appointment of the master, who proceeded to hear the case. He recommended a decree in favor of plaintiffs, in accordance with the prayer in the bill. The report was referred back to him, for a supplemental report of the several sums due the respective plaintiffs, the amount of the subscriptions of each of said defendants, and in pro rata share which each should be decreed to pay said plaintiffs, respectively. Pending the hearing upon this second reference to the master William Vankirk, one of the original defendants, petitioned the court to grant leave to said defendants to pay Bailey's claim, and the costs of the proceeding, and to vacate the appointment of the master, alleging the want of an issue as to the creditors who had been permitted to become plaintiffs with Bailey. This was refused. The master, under the court's order, filed his supplemental report recommending a decree against 14 of the 22 defendants, which was made in accordance with the recommendation, whereupon 4 of them, to-wit, William Vankirk, R. B. Brown, John F. Dravo, and W. H. Aldred, appealed, assigning for error (1) the decree of the court; (2) the appointment of the master, and the confirmation of his report, "where said case was not at issue as against the Pittsburgh Coal Railroad Company, defendant;" (3) the confirmation of the report, and the making of the decree as to the claims of Keams, Risher, and McClure, when "no issue was ever made up as between them or any of them, and the said defendants, or any of them."

PER CURIAM. This appeal is entitled as though it had been taken by the Pittsburgh Coal Railroad Company. Such is not the fact, however. The appeal was entered by William Vankirk, R. B. Brown, John F. Dravo, and W. H. Aldred, four of the defendants below. Lane's Appeal, 105 Pa. 49, and Bell's Appeal, 115 Pa. 88, 8 Atl. 177, are authority that such a bill can be maintained. The record is voluminous, and consists principally of questions of fact. We must assume that the learned master has decided these correctly, inasmuch as he is sustained by the court below, and no clear error has been pointed out. The matters referred to in the second and third assignments are purely technical, and do not affect the merits. We find nothing in the record to justify us in reversing the decree. Decree affirmed, and the appeal dismissed, at the costs of the appellants.
