

University of Michigan Law School

University of Michigan Law School Scholarship Repository

Books

Faculty Scholarship

1902

Illustrative Cases on Equity Jurisprudence

Harry B. Hutchins

University of Michigan Law School

Robert E. Bunker

University of Michigan Law School

Available at: <https://repository.law.umich.edu/books/78>

Follow this and additional works at: <https://repository.law.umich.edu/books>

Part of the Civil Law Commons, Civil Procedure Commons, and the Legal Education Commons

Recommended Citation

Hutchins, Harry B., and Bunker, Robert E. Illustrative Cases on Equity Jurisprudence. St. Paul: West Publishing Co., 1902.

This Book is brought to you for free and open access by the Faculty Scholarship at University of Michigan Law School Scholarship Repository. It has been accepted for inclusion in Books by an authorized administrator of University of Michigan Law School Scholarship Repository. For more information, please contact mlaw.repository@umich.edu.

Illustrative cases on equity jurisprudence, selected by Harry B. Hutchins and Robert E. Bunker.

Hutchins, Harry B. (Harry Burns), 1847-1930.

St. Paul, West publishing co., 1902.

<https://hdl.handle.net/2027/coo1.ark:/13960/t7wm1v98m>

HathiTrust

www.hathitrust.org

Public Domain

http://www.hathitrust.org/access_use#pd

We have determined this work to be in the public domain, meaning that it is not subject to copyright. Users are free to copy, use, and redistribute the work in part or in whole. It is possible that current copyright holders, heirs or the estate of the authors of individual portions of the work, such as illustrations or photographs, assert copyrights over these portions. Depending on the nature of subsequent use that is made, additional rights may need to be obtained independently of anything we can address.

Cornell Law School Library

Cornell University Library

The original of this book is in the Cornell University Library.

There are no known copyright restrictions in the United States on the use of the text.

<http://www.archive.org/details/cu31924052878125>

Digitized by
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from
CORNELL UNIVERSITY

ILLUSTRATIVE CASES

ON

EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE

SELECTED BY
HARRY B. HUTCHINS
Dean of the Department of Law of the University of Michigan

AND
ROBERT E. BUNKER
Professor of Law in the University of Michigan

ST. PAUL
WEST PUBLISHING CO.

1902

COPYRIGHT, 1902,
BY WEST PUBLISHING COMPANY.

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

| MAXIMS OF EQUITY. | | Page |
|--|----------|-------------|
| 1. Southern California R. Co. v. Rutherford | 3 | |
| 2. Rees v. City of Watertown | 5 | |
| 3. Dibrell v. Carlisle | 9 | |
| 4. Speidel v. Henrici | 15 | |
| 5. Hawker v. Moore | 17 | |
| 6. Economy Sav. Bank v. Gordon | 19 | |
| 7. Rice v. Rice | 23 | |
| 8. Comstock v. Johnson | 26 | |
| 9. Brown, Bonnell & Co. v. Lake Superior Iron Co. | 27 | |
| 10. Bleakley's Appeal | 30 | |
| 11. Kahu v. Walton | 31 | |
| 12. Craig v. Leslie | 38 | |
| 13. Wyman v. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank of Chicago | 43 | |
| 14. Stinchfield v. Milliken | 46 | |
| 15. McLarren v. Brewer | 48 | |
| 16. Clements v. Tillman | 50 | |
| 17. Hart v. Sansom | 52 | |
| 18. Adams v. Messenger | 54 | |
| PENALTIES AND FORFEITURES. | | |
| 1. Ewing v. Litchfield | 56 | |
| 2. Craig v. Hukill | 59 | |
| 3. Kunkle v. Wherry | 60 | |
| 4. Jaquith v. Hudson | 61 | |
| 5. Keeble v. Keeble | 67 | |
| PRIORITIES AND NOTICE. | | |
| 1. Heyder v. Excelsior Building & Loan Ass'n | 69 | |
| 2. Phillips v. Phillips | 71 | |
| 3. Kuapp v. Bailey | 74 | |
| 4. Kirsch v. Tozier | 76 | |
| 5. Knobloch v. Mueller | 79 | |
| 6. Mayor, etc., of City of Baltimore v. Whittington | 83 | |
| 7. Williamson v. Brown | 85 | |
| 8. Thomas v. Burnett | 89 | |
| 9. Pringle v. Dunn | 91 | |
| 10. Deason v. Taylor | 96 | |
| LIS PENDENS. | | |
| 1. Houston v. Timmerman | 97 | |
| EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL. | | |
| 1. Horn v. Cole | 100 | |
| 2. Dickerson v. Colgrove | 107 | |
| 3. Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank of Commonwealth | 110 | |
| 4. Galbraith v. Lunsford | 114 | |
| 5. Starry v. Korab | 119 | |
| ELECTION. | | |
| 1. Penn v. Guggenheimer | 120 | |
| 2. Fitzhugh v. Hubbard | 125 | |
| 3. Wilbanks v. Wilbanks | 126 | |
| 4. Rogers v. Jones | 128 | |
| 5. Konvalinka v. Schlegel | 129 | |
| 6. Reed v. Dickerman | 131 | |
| SATISFACTION. | | |
| 1. Strong v. Williams | 133 | |
| 2. Deichman v. Arndt | 135 | |
| 3. De Witt v. Yates | 137 | |
| HUTCH. & RUNK. EQ. | | (iii) |
| 4. Edwards v. Rainier's Ex'rs | 139 | |
| 5. Roquet v. Eldridge | 143 | |
| 6. Rogers v. French | 145 | |
| 7. Clark v. Jetton | 148 | |
| CONVERSION AND RECONVERSION. | | |
| 1. Craig v. Leslie | 38 | |
| 2. Keep v. Miller | 150 | |
| 3. Wheless v. Wheless | 153 | |
| 4. Prentice v. Janssen | 156 | |
| ACCIDENT. | | |
| 1. Kopper v. Dyer | 159 | |
| 2. Patton v. Campbell | 164 | |
| 3. Brewer v. Herbert | 166 | |
| MISTAKE OF LAW. | | |
| 1. Hunt v. Rousmanier's Adm'rs | 170, 175 | |
| 2. Jordan v. Stevens | 181 | |
| 3. Stafford v. Fetters | 184 | |
| 4. Green v. Morris & E. R. Co. | 186 | |
| 5. Griswold v. Hazard | 190 | |
| 6. Marshall v. Westrope | 201 | |
| 7. Renard v. Clink | 205 | |
| 8. Titus v. Rochester German Ins. Co. | 206 | |
| 9. Erkens v. Nicolin | 209 | |
| MISTAKE OF FACT. | | |
| 1. Grymes v. Sanders | 210 | |
| 2. Riegel v. American Life Ins. Co. | 214 | |
| 3. Newton v. Tolles | 218 | |
| 4. Dambmann v. Schulting | 220 | |
| 5. Conner v. Welch | 223 | |
| 6. Park Bros. & Co. v. Blodgett & Clapp Co. | 227 | |
| MISTAKE—PAROL EVIDENCE TO CORRECT. | | |
| 1. Walden v. Skinner | 231 | |
| 2. Metropolitan Lumber Co. v. Lake Superior Ship Canal, Railway & Iron Co. | 237 | |
| 3. Hitchins v. Pettingill | 239 | |
| 4. Hunter v. Bilyeu | 241 | |
| 5. Glass v. Hulbert | 247 | |
| 6. Davis v. Ely | 255 | |
| FRAUD—JURISDICTION OF EQUITY. | | |
| 1. Miller v. Scammon | 258 | |
| 2. Buzard v. Houston | 261 | |
| 3. Teft v. Stewart | 264 | |
| ACTUAL FRAUD. | | |
| 1. Hicks v. Stevens | 266 | |
| 2. Stimson v. Helps | 270 | |
| 3. Mitchell v. McDougall | 272 | |
| 4. Southern Development Co. of Nevada v. Silva | 275 | |
| 5. Prewett v. Trimble | 280 | |
| 6. Hadcock v. Osmer | 282 | |
| 7. Borders v. Kattleman | 285 | |
| 8. Dambmann v. Schulting | 220 | |
| 9. Neill v. Shamburg | 287 | |
| 10. Porter v. Woodruff | 289 | |
| 11. Virginia Land Co. v. Haupt | 295 | |
| 12. Zahn v. McMillin | 297 | |

CONSTRUCTIVE FRAUD.

| | Page |
|---|------|
| 1. Phillips v. Pullen..... | 301 |
| 2. Rakestraw v. Lanier..... | 303 |
| 3. Cowee v. Cornell..... | 309 |
| 4. Allore v. Jewell..... | 313 |
| 5. Greene v. Roworth..... | 316 |
| 6. Brown v. Pierce..... | 319 |
| 7. Francis v. Wilkinson..... | 324 |
| 8. Ross v. Conway..... | 328 |
| 9. Tate v. Williamson..... | 330 |
| 10. Price v. Thompson..... | 333 |
| 11. Elmore v. Johnson..... | 336 |
| 12. Solinger v. Earle..... | 344 |
| 13. Hanover Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Blake..... | 346 |
| 14. Chandler v. Hollingsworth..... | 350 |

EXPRESS TRUSTS.

| | |
|---------------------------------|-----|
| 1. Hutchins v. Van Vechten..... | 357 |
| 2. Urann v. Coates..... | 359 |
| 3. Bates v. Hurd..... | 361 |
| 4. McVay v. McVay..... | 363 |
| 5. Dauser v. Warwick..... | 365 |
| 6. Tobias v. Ketchum..... | 367 |

EXPRESS TRUSTS—PRECATORY WORDS.

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| 1. Warner v. Bates..... | 370 |
| 2. Hess v. Singler..... | 373 |
| 3. Clay v. Wood..... | 375 |

EXPRESS TRUSTS—VOLUNTARY TRUSTS.

| | |
|------------------------------------|-----|
| 1. Richards v. Delbridge..... | 378 |
| 2. Young v. Young..... | 380 |
| 3. Webb's Estate, In re..... | 385 |
| 4. Martin v. Funk..... | 386 |
| 5. Beaver v. Beaver..... | 389 |
| 6. Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn..... | 393 |

TRUSTS—ACTIVE AND PASSIVE.

| | |
|-------------------------|-----|
| 1. Kirkland v. Cox..... | 397 |
|-------------------------|-----|

POWERS IN TRUST.

| | |
|------------------------------|-----|
| 1. Delaney v. McCormack..... | 399 |
|------------------------------|-----|

TRUSTS—PUBLIC OR CHARITABLE.

| | |
|-----------------------------|-----|
| 1. Jackson v. Phillips..... | 402 |
| 2. Allen v. Stevens..... | 423 |
| 3. Hunt v. Fowler..... | 430 |

RESULTING TRUSTS.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 1. Skellenger's Ex'rs v. Skellenger's Ex'r.. | 434 |
| 2. Bond v. Moore..... | 436 |
| 3. Gould v. Lynde..... | 438 |
| 4. Botsford v. Burr..... | 439 |
| 5. Dyer v. Dyer..... | 444 |
| 6. Cook v. Patrick..... | 447 |
| 7. Hagan v. Powers..... | 451 |

CONSTRUCTIVE TRUSTS.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 1. Ferris v. Van Vechten..... | 453 |
| 2. Little v. Chadwick..... | 457 |
| 3. Slater v. Oriental Mills..... | 458 |
| 4. Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Flanders..... | 460 |
| 5. American Sugar Refining Co. v. Fancher..... | 463 |
| 6. Cavin v. Gleason..... | 467 |
| 7. Newton v. Porter..... | 469 |
| 8. Mitchell v. Read..... | 472 |
| 9. Ryan v. Dox..... | 480 |
| 10. Edwards v. Culbertson..... | 485 |
| 11. O'Hara, In re..... | 487 |
| 12. Curdy v. Berton..... | 493 |

DUTIES AND LIABILITIES OF TRUSTEES.

| | Page |
|---|------|
| 1. Weall, In re..... | 496 |
| 2. Hun v. Cary..... | 499 |
| 3. King v. Talbot..... | 503 |
| 4. Lamar v. Micou..... | 507 |
| 5. Simmons v. Oliver..... | 516 |
| 6. Harvard College v. Amory..... | 518 |
| 7. Bentley v. Craven..... | 522 |
| 8. Munson v. Syracuse, G. & C. R. Co..... | 523 |
| 9. Rich v. Black..... | 527 |
| 10. Bent v. Priest..... | 529 |
| 11. Cook v. Gilmore..... | 534 |
| 12. Schell, In re..... | 535 |
| 13. Van Alen v. American Nat. Bank..... | 537 |
| 14. Waterman v. Alden..... | 541 |
| 15. Barker's Trusts, In re..... | 546 |

MORTGAGES.

| | |
|-------------------------------------|-----|
| 1. Chick v. Willetts..... | 547 |
| 2. Barrett v. Hinckley..... | 549 |
| 3. Ladue v. Detroit & M. R. Co..... | 554 |

SUBROGATION.

| | |
|---|-----|
| 1. Aetna Life Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Town of Middleport..... | 560 |
|---|-----|

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE OF CONTRACTS.

| | |
|--|-----|
| 1. Pusey v. Pusey..... | 565 |
| 2. Molineux's Case..... | 566 |
| 3. Hall v. Warren..... | 567 |
| 4. Rindge v. Baker..... | 570 |
| 5. Adderly v. Dixon..... | 576 |
| 6. Hodges v. Kowing..... | 577 |
| 7. Porter v. Frenchman's Bay & Mt. D. Land & Water Co..... | 579 |
| 8. Bumgardner v. Leavitt..... | 580 |
| 9. Welty v. Jacobs..... | 584 |
| 10. Jones v. Newhall..... | 587 |
| 11. Pothergill v. Rowland..... | 590 |
| 12. Danforth v. Philadelphia & C. M. S. L. R. Co..... | 593 |
| 13. Southern Exp. Co. v. Western North Carolina R. Co..... | 595 |
| 14. McCaull v. Braham..... | 598 |
| 15. Clarke v. Price..... | 603 |
| 16. Lumley v. Wagner..... | 605 |
| 17. Montague v. Flockton..... | 613 |
| 18. Donnell v. Bennett..... | 618 |
| 19. Wm. Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers..... | 620 |
| 20. Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ewing.. | 622 |
| 21. Allegheny Base Ball Club v. Bennett.. | 626 |
| 22. McGowin v. Remington..... | 628 |
| 23. Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co..... | 632 |
| 24. Willard v. Tayloe..... | 635 |
| 25. Fish v. Leser..... | 641 |
| 26. Stone v. Pratt..... | 643 |
| 27. Thompson v. Winter..... | 645 |
| 28. Falcke v. Gray..... | 646 |
| 29. Brewer v. Herbert..... | 166 |
| 30. Paine v. Meller..... | 650 |
| 31. Gould v. Murch..... | 652 |
| 32. Marks v. Tichenor..... | 653 |
| 33. Bostwick v. Beach..... | 654 |
| 34. Lewis v. Hawkins..... | 656 |
| 35. Bissell v. Heyward..... | 658 |
| 36. Wetzler v. Duffy..... | 660 |
| 37. Phinizy v. Guernsey..... | 662 |
| 38. Leonard v. Crane..... | 666 |
| 39. Graybill v. Braugh..... | 668 |
| 40. Hall v. Hall..... | 670 |
| 41. Kelsey v. Crowther..... | 672 |
| 42. Combs v. Scott..... | 673 |
| 43. Frame v. Frame..... | 677 |
| 44. Cheney v. Libby..... | 686 |
| 45. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Durant | 692 |
| 46. Haffey v. Lynch..... | 694 |
| 47. Gotthelf v. Stranahan..... | 697 |
| 48. Corbin v. Tracy..... | 700 |
| 49. Hicks v. Turck..... | 702 |

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

v

| | Page | | Page |
|--|------|--|------|
| 50. Gage v. Fisher..... | 704 | CANCELLATION. | |
| 51. New England Trust Co. v. Abbott.... | 711 | 1. Town of Venice v. Woodruff..... | 785 |
| 52. Conger v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co..... | 714 | | |
| 53. Ross v. Parks..... | 715 | RECEIVERS. | |
| 54. Johnston v. Trippe..... | 717 | 1. Booth v. Clark..... | 788 |
| 55. O'Connor v. Tyrrell..... | 721 | 2. Davis v. Gray..... | 795 |
| 56. Grubb v. Starkey..... | 723 | 3. Flowers, In re..... | 806 |
| | | 4. Semple v. Flynn..... | 807 |
| INJUNCTIONS. | | 5. Simmons Hardware Co. v. Waibel.... | 808 |
| 1. Rogers Locomotive & Machine Works v. Erie R. Co..... | 725 | 6. Schuyler's Steam Towboat Co., In re.. | 811 |
| 2. Whitecar v. Michenor..... | 729 | 7. St. Louis, K. & S. R. Co. v. Wear.... | 814 |
| 3. Watson v. Sutherland..... | 732 | 8. Childers v. Neely..... | 824 |
| 4. McHenry v. Jewett..... | 734 | 9. Fechheimer v. Baum..... | 828 |
| 5. Steinau v. Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Co..... | 735 | 10. Ogden City v. Bear Lake & River Wa- terworks & Irrigation Co..... | 835 |
| 6. Manhattan Manufacturing & Fertiliz- ing Co. v. New Jersey Stock-Yard & Market Co..... | 738 | 11. Whitney v. Hanover Nat. Bank..... | 836 |
| 7. Godfrey v. Black..... | 740 | 12. State of Montana v. Second Judicial District Court of Silver Bow County | 840 |
| 8. McClurg, Appeal of..... | 742 | 13. Merchants' & Manufacturers' Nat. Bank of Detroit v. Kent Circuit Judge | 846 |
| 9. William Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers.. | 620 | 14. Mercantile Trust Co. of New York v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co..... | 849 |
| 10. Lumley v. Wagner..... | 605 | 15. Belding v. Meloche..... | 853 |
| 11. Grand Rapids School Furniture Co. v. Haney School Furniture Co..... | 744 | 16. Marshall & Ilesley Bank v. Cady..... | 855 |
| 12. O. & W. Thum Co. v. Tloczynski.... | 746 | 17. Wiedemann v. Saun..... | 858 |
| 13. Duncombe v. Felt..... | 751 | 18. Stetson v. Northern Inv. Co..... | 860 |
| 14. Griffith v. Hilliard..... | 753 | 19. First Nat. Bank v. Illinois Steel Co.. | 862 |
| 15. Wheelock v. Noonan..... | 755 | 20. Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. R. Co..... | 867 |
| 16. Wilson v. City of Mineral Point..... | 757 | 21. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Grape Creek Coal Co..... | 870 |
| 17. Gardner v. Trustees of Village of New- burgh | 758 | 22. Hanna v. State Trust Co..... | 872 |
| 18. Sherry v. Perkins..... | 761 | 23. Howarth v. Ellwanger..... | 877 |
| 19. Vegelah v. Guntner..... | 764 | 24. Wyman v. Eaton..... | 879 |
| 20. Hamilton Brown Shoe Co. v. Saxey... | 770 | 25. American Biscuit & Mfg. Co. v. Klotz | 882 |
| 21. Crawford v. Tyrrell..... | 773 | 26. Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co..... | 885 |
| 22. Weinstock, Lubin & Co. v. Marks.... | 774 | 27. Bank of Florence v. United States Sav- ings & Loan Co..... | 888 |
| | | 28. Colton v. Drovers' Perpetual Building & Loan Ass'n..... | 890 |
| REFORMATION. | | 29. Bailey v. Pittsburg Coal R. Co..... | 894 |
| 1. Purvines v. Harrison..... | 779 | | |
| 2. Welles v. Yates..... | 781 | | |

CASES REPORTED.

| | Page | | Page |
|--|------|--|------|
| Adams v. Messenger (17 N. E. 491, 147 Mass. 185)..... | 54 | Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Union Depot St. R. & T. Co. (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 |
| Adderley v. Dixon (1 Sim. & S. 607)..... | 576 | Chick v. Willetts (2 Kan. 384)..... | 547 |
| Ætna Life Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Town of Belmont (8 Sup. Ct. 625, 124 U. S. 534)..... | 560 | Childers v. Neely (34 S. E. 828, 47 W. Va. 70)..... | 824 |
| Ætna Life Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Town of Middleport (8 Sup. Ct. 625, 124 U. S. 534)..... | 560 | City of Baltimore v. Whittington (27 Atl. 984, 78 Md. 231)..... | 83 |
| Ætna Life Ins. Co. of Hartford v. Town of Milford (8 Sup. Ct. 625, 124 U. S. 534)..... | 560 | Clark v. Jetton (5 Sneed, 229)..... | 148 |
| Allegheny Base-Ball Club v. Bennett (14 Fed. 257)..... | 626 | Clarke v. Price (2 Wils. Ch. 157)..... | 603 |
| Allen v. Stevens (55 N. E. 568, 161 N. Y. 122)..... | 423 | Clay v. Wood (47 N. E. 274, 153 N. Y. 134)..... | 375 |
| Allore v. Jewell (94 U. S. 506)..... | 313 | Clements v. Tillman (5 S. E. 194, 79 Ga. 451)..... | 50 |
| American Biscuit & Mfg. Co. v. Klotz (44 Fed. 721)..... | 882 | Colton v. Dover Perpetual Building & Loan Ass'n of Baltimore (45 Atl. 23, 90 Md. 85)..... | 890 |
| American Sugar-Refining Co. v. Fancher (40 N. E. 206, 145 N. Y. 552)..... | 463 | Combs v. Scott (45 N. W. 532, 76 Wis. 662)..... | 673 |
| Andrews v. Weall (42 Ch. Div. 674)..... | 496 | Comstock v. Johnson (46 N. Y. 615)..... | 26 |
| Bailey v. Pittsburgh Coal R. Co. (21 Atl. 72, 139 Pa. 213)..... | 894 | Conger v. New York, W. S. & B. R. Co. (23 N. E. 983, 120 N. Y. 29)..... | 714 |
| Bank of Florence v. United States Savings & Loan Co. (16 South. 110, 104 Ala. 297)..... | 888 | Conner v. Welch (8 N. W. 260, 51 Wis. 431)..... | 223 |
| Barker's Trusts, In re (1 Ch. Div. 43)..... | 546 | Continental Nat. Bank v. National Bank of Commonwealth (50 N. Y. 575)..... | 110 |
| Barrett v. Hinckley (14 N. E. 863, 124 Ill. 32)..... | 549 | Cook v. Gilmore (24 N. E. 524, 133 Ill. 139)..... | 534 |
| Bates v. Hurd (65 Me. 180)..... | 361 | Cook v. Patrick (26 N. E. 658, 135 Ill. 499)..... | 447 |
| Bath Sav. Inst. v. Hathorn (33 Atl. 836, 88 Me. 122)..... | 393 | Corbin v. Tracy (34 Conn. 325)..... | 700 |
| Beaver v. Beaver (22 N. E. 940, 117 N. Y. 421)..... | 389 | Cowee v. Cornell (75 N. Y. 91)..... | 309 |
| Belding v. Meloche (71 N. W. 592, 113 Mich. 223)..... | 853 | Craig v. Hukill (16 S. E. 363, 37 W. Va. 520)..... | 59 |
| Bent v. Priest (86 Mo. 475)..... | 529 | Craig v. Leslie (3 Wheat. 563-576)..... | 38 |
| Bentley v. Craven (18 Beav. 75)..... | 522 | Crawford v. Tyrrell (28 N. E. 514, 128 N. Y. 341)..... | 773 |
| Bissell v. Heyward (96 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 678)..... | 658 | Curdy v. Berton (21 Pac. 858, 79 Cal. 420)..... | 493 |
| Bleakley's Appeal (66 Pa. 187)..... | 30 | Dambmann v. Schulting (75 N. Y. 55)..... | 220 |
| Bond v. Moore (90 N. C. 239)..... | 436 | Danforth v. Philadelphia & C. M. S. L. R. Co. (30 N. J. Eq. 12)..... | 593 |
| Booth v. Clark (17 How. 322, 15 L. Ed. 164)..... | 788 | Danser v. Warwick (33 N. J. Eq. 133)..... | 365 |
| Borders v. Kattleman (31 N. E. 19, 142 Ill. 96)..... | 285 | Davis v. Ely (10 S. E. 138, 104 N. C. 16)..... | 255 |
| Bostwick v. Beach (12 N. E. 32, 105 N. Y. 661)..... | 654 | Davis v. Gray (16 Wall. 203)..... | 795 |
| Botsford v. Burr (2 Johns. Ch. 405)..... | 439 | Deason v. Taylor (53 Miss. 697)..... | 96 |
| Brewer v. Herbert (30 Md. 301, 96 Am. Dec. 582)..... | 166 | Deichman v. Arndt (22 Atl. 799, 49 N. J. Eq. 106)..... | 135 |
| Brown v. Pierce (7 Wall. 205)..... | 319 | Delaney v. McCormack (88 N. Y. 174)..... | 399 |
| Brown, Bonnell & Co. v. Lake Superior Iron Co. (10 Sup. Ct. 604, 134 U. S. 530)..... | 27 | De Witt v. Yates (10 Johns. 156)..... | 137 |
| Bumgardner v. Leavitt (13 S. E. 67, 35 W. Va. 194)..... | 580 | Dibrell v. Carlisle (48 Miss. 691)..... | 9 |
| Buzard v. Houston (7 Sup. Ct. 249, 119 U. S. 347)..... | 261 | Dickerson v. Colgrove (100 U. S. 578)..... | 107 |
| Cavin v. Gleason (11 N. E. 504, 105 N. Y. 256)..... | 467 | Donnell v. Bennett (22 Ch. Div. 835)..... | 618 |
| Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. R. Co. (18 N. E. 92, 110 N. Y. 250)..... | 867 | Duncombe v. Felt (45 N. W. 1004, 81 Mich. 332)..... | 751 |
| Chandler v. Hollingsworth (3 Del. Ch. 99)..... | 350 | Dyer v. Dyer (2 Cox, Ch. 92)..... | 444 |
| Cheney v. Libby (10 Sup. Ct. 498, 134 U. S. 68, 33 L. Ed. 818)..... | 686 | Dyer v. Kopper (9 Atl. 4, 59 Vt. 477)..... | 159 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Durant (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Economy Sav. Bank v. Gordon (45 Atl. 176, 90 Md. 486)..... | 19 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Hospes (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Edwards v. Culbertson (16 S. E. 233, 111 N. C. 342)..... | 485 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Staples (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Edwards v. Rainier's Ex'rs (17 Ohio St. 597)..... | 139 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Union Depot St. R. & T. Co. (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Elmore v. Johnson (32 N. E. 413, 143 Ill. 513)..... | 336 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Union Depot St. R. & T. Co. (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Erkens v. Nicolin (40 N. W. 567, 39 Minn. 461)..... | 209 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Union Depot St. R. & T. Co. (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Ewing v. Litchfield (22 S. E. 362, 91 Va. 575)..... | 56 |
| Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Union Depot St. R. & T. Co. (46 N. W. 676, 44 Minn. 361)..... | 692 | Falcke v. Gray (4 Drew. 651)..... | 646 |

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.

(vi)

| | Page | | Page |
|---|------|--|------|
| Farmers' Loan & Trust Co. v. Grape Creek Coal Co. (50 Fed. 481)..... | 870 | Hunt v. Rousmanier's Adm'rs (8 Wheat. 174) | 170 |
| Fechheimer v. Baum (37 Fed. 167)..... | 828 | Hunter v. Bilyeu (30 Ill. 228)..... | 241 |
| Ferris v. Van Vechten (73 N. Y. 113).... | 453 | Hutchins v. Van Vechten (35 N. E. 446, 140 N. Y. 115)..... | 357 |
| First Nat. Bank of Joliet v. Illinois Steel Co. (51 N. E. 200, 174 Ill. 140)..... | 862 | Jackson v. Phillips (14 Allen, 539)..... | 402 |
| Fish v. Leser (69 Ill. 394)..... | 641 | Jaquith v. Hudson (5 Mich. 123)..... | 61 |
| Fitzhugh v. Hubbard (41 Ark. 64)..... | 125 | Johnston v. Trippe (33 Fed. 530)..... | 717 |
| Flowers, In re (1 Q. B. Div. 14)..... | 806 | Jones v. Newhall (115 Mass. 244)..... | 587 |
| Fothergill v. Rowland (L. R. 17 Eq. 132) | 590 | Jordan v. Stevens (51 Me. 78)..... | 181 |
| Frame v. Frame (9 S. E. 901, 32 W. Va. 463) | 677 | Kahn v. Walton (20 N. E. 203, 46 Ohio St. 195)..... | 31 |
| Francis v. Wilkinson (35 N. E. 150, 147 Ill. 370)..... | 324 | Keeble v. Keeble (5 South. 149, 85 Ala. 552) | 67 |
| Gage v. Fisher (65 N. W. 809, 5 N. D. 297) | 704 | Keep v. Miller (6 Atl. 495, 42 N. J. Eq. 100) | 150 |
| Galbraith v. Lunsford (9 S. W. 365, 87 Tenn. 89)..... | 114 | Kelsey v. Crowther (27 Pac. 695, 7 Utah, 519) | 672 |
| Gardner v. Trustees of Village of Newburgh (2 Johns. Ch. 162)..... | 758 | King v. Talbot (40 N. Y. 76)..... | 503 |
| Glass v. Hulbert (102 Mass. 24)..... | 247 | Kirkland v. Cox (94 Ill. 400)..... | 397 |
| Godfrey v. Black (17 Pac. 849, 39 Kan. 193) | 740 | Kirsch v. Tozier (38 N. E. 375, 143 N. Y. 390) | 76 |
| Gotthelf v. Stranahan (34 N. E. 286, 138 N. Y. 345)..... | 697 | Knapp v. Bailey (9 Atl. 122, 79 Me. 195) | 74 |
| Gould v. Lynde (114 Mass. 366)..... | 438 | Knobloch v. Mueler (17 N. E. 696, 123 Ill. 554) | 79 |
| Gould v. Murch (70 Me. 288)..... | 652 | Konvalinka v. Schlegel (9 N. E. 868, 104 N. Y. 125)..... | 129 |
| Grand Rapids School Furniture Co. v. Haney School Furniture Co. (52 N. W. 1009, 92 Mich. 558)..... | 744 | Kopper v. Dyer (9 Atl. 4, 59 Vt. 477).... | 159 |
| Graybill v. Braugh (17 S. E. 558, 89 Va. 895) | 668 | Kunkle v. Wherry (42 Atl. 112, 189 Pa. 198) | 60 |
| Green v. Morris & E. R. Co. (12 N. J. Eq. 165) | 186 | Ladue v. Detroit & M. R. Co. (13 Mich. 380) | 554 |
| Greene v. Roworth (21 N. E. 165, 113 N. Y. 462)..... | 316 | Lamar v. Micou (5 Sup. Ct. 221, 112 U. S. 452) | 507 |
| Griffith v. Hilliard (25 Atl. 427, 64 Vt. 643) | 753 | Leonard v. Crane (35 N. E. 474, 147 Ill. 52) | 666 |
| Griswold v. Hazard (11 Sup. Ct. 972, 141 U. S. 260)..... | 190 | Lewis v. Hawkins (23 Wall. 119, 23 L. Ed. 113)..... | 656 |
| Grubb v. Sharkey (20 S. E. 784, 90 Va. 831) | 723 | Little v. Chadwick (23 N. E. 1005, 151 Mass. 109)..... | 457 |
| Grymes v. Sanders (93 U. S. 55)..... | 210 | Lumley v. Wagner (1 De Gex, M. & G. 604) | 605 |
| Hadcock v. Osmer (47 N. E. 923, 153 N. Y. 604)..... | 282 | McCaull v. Braham (16 Fed. 37)..... | 598 |
| Haffey v. Lynch (38 N. E. 298, 143 N. Y. 241) | 694 | McClurg, Appeal of (58 Pa. 51)..... | 742 |
| Hagan v. Powers (72 N. W. 771, 103 Iowa, 593)..... | 451 | McGowin v. Remington (12 Pa. 56)..... | 628 |
| Hall v. Hall (16 N. E. 896, 125 Ill. 95).... | 670 | McHenry v. Jewett (90 N. Y. 58)..... | 734 |
| Hall v. Warren (9 Ves. 605)..... | 567 | McLarren v. Brewer (51 Me. 402)..... | 48 |
| Hamilton-Brown Shoe Co. v. Saxey (32 S. W. 1106, 131 Mo. 212)..... | 770 | McVay v. McVay (10 Atl. 178, 43 N. J. Eq. 47)..... | 363 |
| Hanna v. State Trust Co. (16 C. C. A. 586, 70 Fed. 2)..... | 872 | Manhattan Manufacturing & Fertilizing Co. v. New Jersey Stock-Yard & Market Co. (23 N. J. Eq. 161)..... | 738 |
| Hanover Nat. Bank of City of New York v. Blake (37 N. E. 519, 142 N. Y. 404)... | 346 | Marks v. Tichenor (4 S. W. 225, 85 Ky. 536) | 653 |
| Hart v. Sansom (3 Sup. Ct. 586, 110 U. S. 151)..... | 52 | Marshall v. Westrope (67 N. W. 257, 98 Iowa, 324)..... | 201 |
| Harvard College v. Amory (9 Pick. 446)... | 518 | Marshall & Illsley Bank v. Cady (77 N. W. 831, 75 Minn. 241)..... | 855 |
| Hawker v. Moore (20 S. E. 848, 40 W. Va. 49)..... | 17 | Martin v. Funk (75 N. Y. 134)..... | 386 |
| Haywood v. Lincoln Lumber Co. (26 N. W. 184, 64 Wis. 639)..... | 885 | Mercantile Trust Co. of New York v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (36 Fed. 221).... | 849 |
| Hess v. Singler (114 Mass. 56)..... | 373 | Merchants' & Manufacturers' Nat. Bank of Detroit v. Kent Circuit Judge (5 N. W. 627, 43 Mich. 292)..... | 846 |
| Heyder v. Excelsior Building Loan Ass'n No. 2 of City of Newark (8 Atl. 310, 42 N. J. Eq. 403)..... | 69 | Metropolitan Exhibition Co. v. Ewing (42 Fed. 198)..... | 622 |
| Hicks v. Stevens (11 N. E. 241, 121 Ill. 186) | 266 | Metropolitan Lumber Co. v. Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railway & Iron Co. (60 N. W. 278, 101 Mich. 577)..... | 237 |
| Hicks v. Turck (40 N. W. 339, 72 Mich. 311) | 702 | Miller v. Scammon (52 N. H. 609)..... | 258 |
| Hitchins v. Pettingill (58 N. H. 386).... | 239 | Mitchell v. McDougall (62 Ill. 498)..... | 272 |
| Hodges v. Kowing (18 Atl. 979, 58 Conn. 12) | 577 | Mitchell v. Read (61 N. Y. 123)..... | 472 |
| Horn v. Cole (51 N. H. 287)..... | 100 | Mollineux's Case (Latch, 172)..... | 566 |
| Houston v. Timmerman (21 Pac. 1037, 17 Or. 499)..... | 97 | Montague v. Flockton (L. R. 16 Eq. 189) | 613 |
| Howarth v. Ellwanger (86 Fed. 54)..... | 877 | Munson v. Syracuse, G. & C. R. Co. (8 N. E. 355, 103 N. Y. 58)..... | 523 |
| Howarth v. Kent (86 Fed. 54)..... | 877 | Neill v. Shamburg (27 Atl. 992, 158 Pa. 263) | 287 |
| Howarth v. Woodworth (86 Fed. 54)..... | 877 | New England Trust Co. v. Abbott (38 N. E. 432, 162 Mass. 148)..... | 711 |
| Hun v. Cary (82 N. Y. 65)..... | 499 | Newton v. Porter (69 N. Y. 133)..... | 469 |
| Hunt v. Fowler (12 N. E. 331, 17 N. E. 491, 121 Ill. 269)..... | 430 | | |
| Hunt v. Rousmaniere's Adm'rs (1 Peters, 1) | 175 | | |

| | Page | | Page |
|--|------|---|------|
| Newton v. Tolles (19 Atl. 1092, 66 N. H. 136) | 218 | Southern Development Co. of Nevada v. Silva (8 Sup. Ct. 881, 125 U. S. 247).... | 275 |
| Nonotuck Silk Co. v. Flanders (58 N. W. 383, 87 Wis. 237)..... | 460 | Southern Exp. Co. v. Western North Carolina R. Co. (99 U. S. 191)..... | 595 |
| O'Connor v. Tyrrell (30 Atl. 1061, 53 N. J. Eq. 15)..... | 721 | Speidel v. Henrici (7 Sup. Ct. 610, 120 U. S. 377)..... | 15 |
| Ogden City v. Bear Lake & River Waterworks & Irrigation Co. (55 Pac. 385, 18 Utah, 279)..... | 835 | Stafford v. Fetters (8 N. W. 322, 55 Iowa, 484) | 184 |
| O'Hara, In re (95 N. Y. 403)..... | 487 | Starry v. Korab (21 N. W. 600, 65 Iowa, 267) | 119 |
| O. & W. Thum Co. v. Tloczynski (72 N. W. 140, 114 Mich. 149)..... | 746 | State v. Second Judicial District Court of Silver Bow County (39 Pac. 316, 15 Mont. 324)..... | 840 |
| Paine v. Meller (6 Ves. 349)..... | 650 | Steinau v. Cincinnati Gas-Light & Coke Co. (27 N. E. 545, 48 Ohio St. 324)..... | 735 |
| Park Bros. & Co. v. Blodgett & Clapp Co. (29 Atl. 133, 64 Conn. 28)..... | 227 | Stetson v. Northern Inv. Co. (70 N. W. 595, 101 Iowa, 435)..... | 860 |
| Patton v. Campbell (70 Ill. 72)..... | 164 | Stimson v. Helps (10 Pac. 290, 9 Colo. 33) | 270 |
| Penn v. Guggenheimer (76 Va. 839)..... | 120 | Stinchfield v. Milliken (71 Me. 567)..... | 46 |
| Phillips v. Phillips (4 De Gex, F. & J. 208) | 71 | Stone v. Pratt (25 Ill. 16)..... | 643 |
| Phillips v. Pullen (16 Atl. 9, 45 N. J. Eq. 5) | 301 | Strong v. Williams (12 Mass. 391)..... | 133 |
| Phinizy v. Guernsey (36 S. E. 796, 111 Ga. 346) | 662 | Tate v. Williamson (2 Ch. App. 55)..... | 330 |
| Porter v. Frenchman's Bay & Mt. D. Land & Water Co. (24 Atl. 814, 84 Me. 195)..... | 579 | Teft v. Stewart (31 Mich. 367)..... | 264 |
| Porter v. Woodruff (36 N. J. Eq. 174)..... | 289 | Thomas v. Burnett (21 N. E. 352, 128 Ill. 37) | 89 |
| Prentice v. Janssen (79 N. Y. 478)..... | 156 | Thompson v. Winter (43 N. W. 796, 42 Minn. 121)..... | 645 |
| Prewett v. Trimble (17 S. W. 356, 92 Ky. 176) | 280 | Thum Co. v. Tloczynski (72 N. W. 140, 114 Mich. 149)..... | 746 |
| Price v. Thompson (1 S. W. 408, 84 Ky. 219) | 333 | Titus v. Rochester German Ins. Co. (31 S. W. 127, 97 Ky. 567)..... | 206 |
| Pringle v. Dunn (37 Wis. 449)..... | 91 | Tobias v. Ketchum (32 N. Y. 319)..... | 367 |
| Prospect Park & C. I. R. Co. v. Coney Island & B. R. Co. (39 N. E. 17, 144 N. Y. 152)..... | 632 | Tolles v. Newton (19 Atl. 1092, 66 N. H. 136) | 218 |
| Purvines v. Harrison (37 N. E. 705, 151 Ill. 219)..... | 779 | Town of Venice v. Woodruff (62 N. Y. 462) | 785 |
| Pusey v. Pusey (1 Vern. 273, White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1109)..... | 565 | Urann v. Coates (109 Mass. 581)..... | 359 |
| Rakestraw v. Lanier (30 S. E. 735, 104 Ga. 188)..... | 303 | Van Alen v. American Nat. Bank (52 N. Y. 1)..... | 537 |
| Reed v. Dickerman (29 Pick. 146)..... | 131 | Vegelahn v. Guntner (44 N. E. 1077, 167 Mass. 92)..... | 764 |
| Rees v. City of Watertown (19 Wall. 107) | 5 | Virginia Land Co. v. Haupt (19 S. E. 168, 90 Va. 533)..... | 295 |
| Renard v. Clink (51 N. W. 692, 91 Mich. 1) | 205 | Walden v. Skinner (101 U. S. 577)..... | 231 |
| Rice v. Rice (2 Drew. 73)..... | 23 | Warner v. Bates (98 Mass. 274)..... | 370 |
| Rich v. Black (33 Atl. 880, 173 Pa. 92)..... | 527 | Waterman v. Alden (32 N. E. 972, 144 Ill. 90) | 541 |
| Richards v. Delbridge (L. R. 18 Eq. 11)..... | 378 | Watson v. Sutherland (5 Wall. 74)..... | 732 |
| Riegel v. American Life Ins. Co. (25 Atl. 1070, 153 Pa. 134)..... | 214 | Weall, In re (42 Ch. Div. 674)..... | 496 |
| Rindge v. Baker (57 N. Y. 209, 15 Am. Rep. 475)..... | 570 | Webb's Estate, In re (49 Cal. 541)..... | 385 |
| Rogers v. French (19 Ga. 316)..... | 145 | Weinstock, Lubin & Co. v. Marks (42 Pac. 142, 109 Cal. 529)..... | 774 |
| Rogers v. Jones (3 Ch. Div. 688)..... | 128 | Welles v. Yates (44 N. Y. 525)..... | 781 |
| Rogers Locomotive & Machine Works v. Erie R. Co. (20 N. J. Eq. 379)..... | 725 | Welty v. Jacobs (49 N. E. 723, 171 Ill. 624) | 584 |
| Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers (20 Atl. 467, 58 Conn. 356)..... | 620 | Wetzler v. Duffy (47 N. W. 184, 78 Wis. 170)..... | 660 |
| Roquet v. Eldridge (20 N. E. 733, 118 Ind. 147)..... | 143 | Wheelock v. Noonan (15 N. E. 67, 108 N. Y. 179)..... | 755 |
| Ross v. Conway (28 Pac. 785, 92 Cal. 632) | 328 | Wheless v. Wheless (21 S. W. 595, 92 Tenn. 293)..... | 153 |
| Ross v. Parks (8 South. 368, 93 Ala. 153) | 715 | Whitecar v. Michenor (37 N. J. Eq. 6)..... | 729 |
| Ryan v. Dox (34 N. Y. 307)..... | 480 | Whitney v. Bank of Greenville (15 South. 33, 71 Miss. 1009)..... | 836 |
| St. Louis, K. & S. R. Co. v. Wear (36 S. W. 357, 135 Mo. 230)..... | 814 | Whitney v. Hanover Nat. Bank, two cases (15 South. 33, 71 Miss. 1009)..... | 836 |
| Schell, In re (53 N. Y. 263)..... | 535 | Wiedemann v. Sann (31 Atl. 211)..... | 858 |
| Schuyler's Steam Towboat Co., In re (32 N. E. 623, 136 N. Y. 169)..... | 811 | Wilbanks v. Wilbanks (18 Ill. 17)..... | 126 |
| Semple v. Flynn (10 Atl. 177)..... | 807 | Willard v. Tayloe (8 Wall. 557)..... | 635 |
| Sherry v. Perkins (17 N. E. 307, 147 Mass. 212) | 761 | Wm. Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers (20 Atl. 467, 58 Conn. 356)..... | 620 |
| Simmons v. Oliver (43 N. W. 561, 74 Wis. 633) | 516 | Williamson v. Brown (15 N. Y. 354)..... | 85 |
| Simmons Hardware Co. v. Waibel (47 N. W. 814, 1 S. D. 488)..... | 808 | Wilson v. City of Mineral Point (39 Wis. 160) | 757 |
| Skellenger's Ex'rs v. Skellenger's Ex'r (32 N. J. Eq. 659)..... | 434 | Wyman v. Eaton (77 N. W. 865, 107 Iowa, 214) | 879 |
| Slater v. Oriental Mills (27 Atl. 443, 18 R. I. 352)..... | 458 | Wyman v. Ft. Dearborn Nat. Bank (54 N. E. 946, 181 Ill. 279)..... | 43 |
| Solinger v. Earle (82 N. Y. 393)..... | 344 | Young v. Young (80 N. Y. 422)..... | 380 |
| Southern California R. Co. v. Rutherford (62 Fed. 796)..... | 3 | Zahn v. McMillin (36 Atl. 188, 179 Pa. 146) | 297 |

ILLUSTRATIVE CASES

ON

EQUITY JURISPRUDENCE

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.

(1)*

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RY. CO. v.
RUTHERFORD et al.

(62 Fed. 796.)

Circuit Court, S. D. California. June 30, 1894.

Suit by the Southern California Railway Company, a corporation of the state of California, against C. C. Rutherford and others for injunction.

W. J. Hunsaker, for complainant.

ROSS, District Judge. Time does not admit of an extended statement of the facts of the case or of the reasons for awarding the injunction applied for. The bill shows, among other things, that the complainant railway company is one link in a through line of road extending from National City, San Diego county, Cal., to the city of Chicago, in the state of Illinois, engaged in the transportation, among other things, of interstate commerce and the mails of the United States; its connecting roads being the Atlantic & Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Companies. That there is a valid existing contract between the complainant company and its connecting companies and the Pullman Palace Car Company by which all regular passenger trains running over the said through line of road, including that of the complainant, carrying the mail and passengers, shall carry Pullman cars. That the defendants are in the employ of the complainant company, and were employed by it to, among other things, handle and operate its trains so engaged in carrying the United States mail and passengers and freight between National City, Cal., and Chicago, Ill., and to and from intermediate points, and from the time of their employment up to the time of the commission of the acts complained of by the complainant were duly accustomed to handle and operate such trains, including Pullman cars. That subsequently the defendants, although remaining in the employment of the complainant company, refused, and still refuse, to handle or operate any train of cars of the complainant company to which a Pullman car is attached; and because of the discharge by the receivers in possession and control of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fé Railroad Company of certain employes of theirs for refusing to handle or operate any train of that road to which a Pullman car is attached, the defendants to the present bill, while remaining in the employment of the complainant company, refused, and still refuse, to handle or operate any of the trains of the complainant company engaged in carrying the mail of the United States and in the aforesaid interstate commerce, which their regular and accustomed duties as such employes required, and still require, them to operate and handle. Undoubtedly, in the absence of a valid existing contract obligating the defendants to remain in the employment of the complainant company, they would ordinarily have the legal right to quit the employment and cease work at any time. But the bill alleges that the defendants continue in the employment of the complainant company, and yet refuse to perform their regular and accustomed duties as such employes; and it further shows that such refusal subjects and will continue to subject the complainant to a multiplicity of suits and to great and irreparable damage, in that there is an existing valid contract requiring complainant to attach a Pullman car or cars on all of its through trains for the carriage of passengers and the mail, and also retards and interrupts the complainant in the transmission of the United States mail and the interstate commerce aforesaid.

It is manifest that for this state of affairs the law—neither civil or criminal—affords an adequate remedy. But the proud boast of equity is, "Ubi jus, ibi remedium." It is the maxim which forms the root of all equitable decisions. Why should not men who remain in the employment of another perform the duties they contract and engage to perform? It is certainly just and right that they should do so, or else quit the employment. And where the direct result of such refusal works irreparable damage to the employer, and at the same time interferes with the transmission of the mail and with commerce between the states, equity, I think, will compel them to perform the duties pertaining to the employment so long as they continue in it. If I unlawfully obstruct by a dam a stream of flowing water, equity, at the suit of the party injured, will compel me by injunction, mandatory in character, to remove the dam, and, prohibitory in character, from further interfering with the flow of the stream; and if I unlawfully erect a wall shutting out the light from another, equity will compel me to tear it down, and to refrain from further interference with the other's rights. It is true that such cases are not precisely like the present one, yet the principle upon which the court proceeds in such cases is not substantially different. And if it be said that there is no exact precedent for the awarding of an injunction in the present case, I respond, in the language of the court in the case of Toledo, etc., Ry. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co., 54 Fed. 751: "Every just order or rule known to equity courts was born of some emergency, to meet some new conditions, and was therefore, in its time, without precedent. If based on sound principles, and beneficent results follow their enforcement, affording necessary relief to the one party without imposing illegal burdens on the other, new remedies and unprecedented orders are not unwelcome aids to the chancellor to meet the constant and varying demands for equitable relief."

Moreover, the rights of the public in a case of this sort should be considered. "Railroads," said the supreme court in the case of Joy v. St. Louis, 138 U. S. 50, 11 Sup. Ct. 243, "are common carriers, and owe duties to the public. The rights of the public in respect to these great highways of communication should be fostered by the courts; and it is one of the most useful functions of a court of equity that its methods of procedure are capable of being made such as to accommodate themselves to the development of the interests of the public, in the progress of trade and traffic, by new methods of intercourse and transportation."

For the reasons thus hastily and briefly stated, I shall award an injunction requiring the defendants to perform all of their regular and accustomed duties so long as they remain in the employment of the complainant company, which injunction, it may be as well to state, will be strictly and rigidly enforced.

REES v. CITY OF WATERTOWN.

(19 Wall. 107.)

Supreme Court of the United States. 1873.

Mr. Justice HUNT delivered the opinion of the court.

This case is free from the objections usually made to a recovery upon municipal bonds. It is beyond doubt that the bonds were issued by the authority of an act of the legislature of the State of Wisconsin, and in the manner prescribed by the statute. It is not denied that the railroad, in aid of the construction of which they were issued, has been built, and was put in operation.

Upon a class of the defences interposed in the answer and in the argument it is not necessary to spend much time. The theories upon which they proceed are vicious. They are based upon the idea that a refusal to pay an honest debt is justifiable because it would distress the debtor to pay it. A voluntary refusal to pay an honest debt is a high offence in a commercial community and is just cause of war between nations. So far as the defence rests upon these principles we find no difficulty in overruling it.

There is, however, a grave question of the power of the court to grant the relief asked for.

We are of the opinion that this court has not the power to direct a tax to be levied for the payment of these judgments. This power to impose burdens and raise money is the highest attribute of sovereignty, and is exercised, first, to raise money for public purposes only; and, second, by the power of legislative authority only. It is a power that has not been extended to the judiciary. Especially is it beyond the power of the Federal judiciary to assume the place of a State in the exercise of this authority at once so delicate and so important. The question is not entirely new in this court.

In the case of Supervisors v. Rogers,* an order was made by this court appointing the marshal a commissioner, with power to levy a tax upon the taxable property of the county, to pay the principal and interest of certain bonds issued by the county, the payment of which had been refused. That case was like the present, except that it occurred in the State of Iowa, and the proceeding was taken by the express authority of a statute of that State. The court say: "The next question is as to the appointment of the marshal as a commissioner to levy the tax in satisfaction of the judgment. This depends upon a provision of the code of the State of Iowa. This proceeding is found in a chapter regulating proceedings in the writ of mandamus, and the power is given to the court to appoint a person to discharge the duty enjoined by the peremptory writ which the defendant had refused to perform, and for which refusal he was liable to an attachment, and is express and unqualified. The duty of levying the tax upon the taxable property of the county to pay the principal and interest of these bonds was specially enjoined upon the board of supervisors by the act of the legislature that authorized their issue, and the appointment of the marshal as a commissioner in pursuance of the above section is to provide for the performance of this duty where the board has disobeyed or evaded the law of the State and the peremptory mandate of the court."

The State of Wisconsin, of which the city of Watertown is a municipal corporation, has passed no such act. The case of Supervisors v. Rogers is, therefore, of no authority in the case before us. The appropriate remedy of the plaintiff was and is a writ of mandamus.† This may be repeated as often as the occasion requires. It is a judicial writ, a part of a recognized course of legal proceedings. In the present case it has been thus far unavailing, and the prospect of its future success is, perhaps, not flattering. However this may be, we are aware of no authority in this court to appoint its own officer to execute the duty thus neglected by the city in a case like the present.

In Welch v. St. Genevieve,* at a Circuit Court for the district of Missouri, a tax was ordered to be levied by the marshal under similar circumstances. We are not able to recognize the authority of the case. No counsel appeared for the city (Mr. Reynolds as amicus curiæ only); no authorities are cited which sustain the position taken by the court; the power of the court to make the order is disposed of in a single paragraph, and the execution of the order suspended for three months to give the corporation an opportunity to select officers and itself to levy and collect the tax, with the reservation of a longer suspension if it should appear advisable. The judge, in delivering the opinion of the court, states that the case is without precedent, and cites in support of its decision no other cases than that of Riggs v. Johnson County, and Lansing v. Treasurer.‡ The first case cited does not touch the present point. The question in that case was whether a mandamus having been issued by a United States court in the regular course of proceedings, its operation could be stayed by an injunction from the State court, and it was held that it could not be. It is probable that the case of Supervisors v. Rogers§ was the one intended to be cited. This case has already been considered.

The case of Lansing v. Treasurer (also cited), arose within the State of Iowa. It fell within the case of Supervisors v. Rogers, †Riggs v. Johnson County, 6 Wallace, 193.

*10 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 512, Fed. Cas. No. 17,372.

6 Wallace, 166.

‡9 Am. Law Reg. (N. S.) 415, Fed. Cas. No. 16,593.

§7 Wallace, 175.

*7 Wallace, 175.

and was rightly decided because authorized by the express statute of the State of Iowa. It offered no precedent for the decision of a case arising in a State where such a statute does not exist.

These are the only authorities upon the power of this court to direct the levy of a tax under the circumstances existing in this case to which our attention has been called.

The plaintiff insists that the court may accomplish the same result under a different name, that it has jurisdiction of the persons and of the property, and may subject the property of the citizens to the payment of the plaintiff's debt without the intervention of State taxing officers, and without regard to tax laws. His theory is that the court should make a decree subjecting the individual property of the citizens of Watertown to the payment of the plaintiff's judgment; direct the marshal to make a list thereof from the assessment rolls or from such other sources of information as he may obtain; report the same to the court, where any objections should be heard; that the amount of the debt should be apportioned upon the several pieces of property owned by individual citizens; that the marshal should be directed to collect such apportioned amount from such persons, or in default thereof to sell the property.

As a part of this theory, the plaintiff argues that the court has authority to direct the amount of the judgment to be wholly made from the property belonging to any inhabitant of the city, leaving the citizens to settle the equities between themselves.

This theory has many difficulties to encounter. In seeking to obtain for the plaintiff his just rights we must be careful not to invade the rights of others. If an inhabitant of the city of Watertown should own a block of buildings of the value of $20,000, upon no principle of law could the whole of the plaintiff's debt be collected from that property. Upon the assumption that individual property is liable for the payment of the corporate debts of the municipality, it is only so liable for its proportionate amount. The inhabitants are not joint and several debtors with the corporation, nor does their property stand in that relation to the corporation or to the creditor. This is not the theory of law, even in regard to taxation. The block of buildings we have supposed is liable to taxation only upon its value in proportion to the value of the entire property, to be ascertained by assessment, and when the proportion is ascertained and paid, it is no longer or further liable. It is discharged. The residue of the tax is to be obtained from other sources. There may be repeated taxes and assessments to make up delinquencies, but the principle and the general rule of law are as we have stated.

In relation to the corporation before us, this objection to the liability of individual property for the payment of a corporate debt is presented in a specific form. It is of a statutory character.

The remedies for the collection of a debt are essential parts of the contract of indebtedness, and those in existence at the time it is incurred must be substantially preserved to the creditor. Thus a statute prohibiting the exercise of its taxing power by the city to raise money for the payment of these bonds would be void.* But it is otherwise of statutes which are in existence at the time the debt is contracted. Of these the creditor must take notice, and if all the remedies are preserved to him which were in existence when his debt was contracted he has no cause of complaint.†

By section nine of the defendant's charter it is enacted as follows: "Nor shall any real or personal property of any inhabitant of said city, or any individual or corporation, be levied upon or sold by virtue of any execution issued to satisfy or collect any debt, obligation, or contract of said city."

If the power of taxation is conceded not to be applicable, and the power of the court is invoked to collect the money as upon an execution to satisfy a contract or obligation of the city, this section is directly applicable and forbids the proceeding. The process or order asked for is in the nature of an execution; the property proposed to be sold is that of an inhabitant of the city; the purpose to which it is to be applied is the satisfaction of a debt of the city. The proposed remedy is in direct violation of a statute in existence when the debt was incurred, and made known to the creditor with the same solemnity as the statute which gave power to contract the debt. All laws in existence when the contract is made are necessarily referred to in it and form a part of the measure of the obligation of the one party, and of the right acquired by the other.‡

But independently of this statute, upon the general principles of law and of equity jurisprudence, we are of opinion that we cannot grant the relief asked for. The plaintiff invokes the aid of the principle that all legal remedies having failed, the court of chancery must give him a remedy; that there is a wrong which cannot be righted elsewhere, and hence the right must be sustained in chancery. The difficulty arises from too broad an application of a general principle. The great advantage possessed by the court of chancery is not so much in its enlarged jurisdiction as in the extent and adaptability of its remedial powers. Generally its jurisdiction is as well defined and limited as is that of a court of law. It cannot exercise jurisdiction when there is an adequate and complete remedy at law. It cannot assume control over that large class of obligations called imperfect obligations, resting upon conscience and moral duty only, unconnected with legal obligations. Judge Story says,† "There are cases of fraud, of accident, and of trust which neither courts of law nor of equity presume to relieve or to mitigate," of which he cites many instances. Lord Talbot says:‡ "There are cases, indeed, in which a court of equity gives remedy where the law gives none, but where a particular remedy is given by law, and that remedy bounded and circumscribed by particular rules, it would be very improper for this court to take it up where the law leaves it, and extend it further than the law allows."

*Van Hoffman v. City of Quincy, 4 Wallace, 535.

†Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 235, 237.

‡Cooley, Constitutional Limitations, 285.

Generally its jurisdiction depends upon legal obligations, and its decrees can only enforce remedies to the extent and in the mode by law established. With the subjects of fraud, trust, or accident, when properly before it, it can deal more completely than can a court of law. These subjects, however, may arise in courts of law, and there be well disposed of.*

A court of equity cannot, by avowing that there is a right but no remedy known to the law, create a remedy in violation of law, or even without the authority of law. It acts upon established principles not only, but through established channels. Thus, assume that the plaintiff is entitled to the payment of his judgment, and that the defendant neglects its duty in refusing to raise the amount by taxation, it does not follow that this court may order the amount to be made from the private estate of one of its citizens. This summary proceeding would involve a violation of the rights of the latter. He has never been heard in court. He has had no opportunity to establish a defence to the debt itself, or if the judgment is valid, to show that his property is not liable to its payment. It is well settled that legislative exemptions from taxation are valid, that such exemptions may be perpetual in their duration, and that they are in some cases beyond legislative interference. The proceeding supposed would violate that fundamental principle contained in chapter twenty-ninth of Magna Charta, and embodied in the Constitution of the United States, that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law—that is, he must be served with notice of the proceeding, and have a day in court to make his defence.

"Due process of law (it is said) undoubtedly means in the due course of legal proceedings, according to those rules and forms which have been established for the protection of private rights."‡ In the New England States it is held that a judgment obtained against a town may be levied upon and made out of the property of any inhabitant of the town. The suit in those States is brought in form against the inhabitants of the town, naming it; the individual inhabitants, it is said, may and do appear and defend the suit, and hence it is held that the individual inhabitants have their day in court, are each bound by the judgment, and that it may be collected from the property of any one of them.* This is local law peculiar to New England. It is not the law of this country generally, or of England.‖ It has never been held to be the law in New York, in New Jersey, in Pennsylvania, nor, as stated by Mr. Cooley, in any of the Western States.¶ So far as it rests upon the rule that these municipalities have no common fund, and that no other mode exists by which demands against them can be enforced, he says that it cannot be considered as applicable to those States where provision is made for compulsory taxation to satisfy judgments against a town or city.§

The general principle of law to which we have adverted is not disturbed by these references. It is applicable to the case before us. Whether, in fact, the individual has a defence to the debt, or by way of exemption, or is without defence, is not important. To assume that he has none, and therefore, that he is entitled to no day in court, is to assume against him the very point he may wish to contest.

Again, in the case of Emeric v. Gilman, before cited, it is said: "The inhabitants of a county are constantly changing; those who contributed to the debt may be non-residents upon the recovery of the judgment or the levy of the execution. Those who opposed the creation of the liability may be subjected to its payment, while those, by whose fault the burden has been imposed, may be entirely relieved of responsibility. . . . To enforce this right against the inhabitants of a county would lead to such a multiplicity of suits as to render the right valueless." We do not perceive, if the doctrine contended for is correct, why the money might not be entirely made from property owned by the creditor himself, if he should happen to own property within the limits of the corporation, of sufficient value for that purpose.

The difficulty and the embarrassment arising from an apportionment or contribution among those bound to make the payment we do not regard as a serious objection. Contribution and apportionment are recognized heads of equity jurisdiction, and if it be assumed that process could issue directly against the citizens to collect the debt of the city, a court of equity could make the apportionment more conveniently than could a court of law.†

*See the cases collected in Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 240-245.

‖Russell v. Men of Devon, 2 Term R. 667.

¶See Emeric v. Gilman, 10 California, 408, where all the cases are collected.

§Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 246.

†1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 470 and onwards.

†1 Equity Jurisprudence, § 61.

‡Heard v. Stanford, Cases Tempore Talbot, 174.

*1 Story's Equity Jurisprudence, § 60.

Westervelt v. Gregg, 12 New York, 209.

‖Ib.

We apprehend, also, that there is some confusion in the plaintiff's proposition, upon which the present jurisdiction is claimed. It is conceded, and the authorities are too abundant to admit a question, that there is no chancery jurisdiction where there is an adequate remedy at law. The writ of mandamus is, no doubt, the regular remedy in a case like the present, and ordinarily it is adequate and its results are satisfactory. The plaintiff alleges, however, in the present case, that he has issued such a writ on three different occasions; that, by means of the aid afforded by the legislature and by the devices and contrivances set forth in the bill, the writs have been fruitless; that, in fact, they afford him no remedy. The remedy is in law and in theory adequate and perfect. The difficulty is in its execution only. The want of a remedy and the inability to obtain the fruits of a remedy are quite distinct, and yet they are confounded in the present proceeding. To illustrate: the writ of habere facias possessionem is the established remedy to obtain the fruits of a judgment for the plaintiff in ejectment. It is a full, adequate, and complete remedy. Not many years since there existed in Central New York combinations of settlers and tenants disguised as Indians, and calling themselves such, who resisted the execution of this process in their counties, and so effectually that for some years no landlord could gain possession of his land. There was a perfect remedy at law, but through fraud, violence, or crime its execution was prevented. It will hardly be argued that this state of things gave authority to invoke the extraordinary aid of a court of chancery. The enforcement of the legal remedies was temporarily suspended by means of illegal violence, but the remedies remained as before. It was the case of a miniature revolution. The courts of law lost no power, the court of chancery gained none. The present case stands upon the same principle. The legal remedy is adequate and complete, and time and the law must perfect its execution.

Entertaining the opinion that the plaintiff has been unreasonably obstructed in the pursuit of his legal remedies, we should be quite willing to give him the aid requested if the law permitted it. We cannot, however, find authority for so doing, and we acquiesce in the conclusion of the court below that the bill must be dismissed.

JUDGMENT AFFIRMED.

DIBRELL v. CARLISLE et al.

(48 Miss. 691.)

Supreme Court of Mississippi. 1873.

Appeal from chancery court, Chickasaw county; Bradford, Chancellor.

The complainant in the court below, Charles C. Dibrell, filed his bill to the April term, 1868, alleging that on the 4th December, 1866, William F. Walker, then largely indebted in a sum exceeding $60,000 to his wife, Eliza R. Walker, on account of her separate estate, executed and delivered a deed of conveyance to one Thomas J. Denton, a citizen of said county, and his successors in office, as trustee for said Eliza, and the heirs of her body, by which he granted, bargained, and sold to said trustee certain real and personal property particularly described in the bill, and states its value at $29,942, and that it was intended to be, and was received by the parties as, a payment to that extent on the indebtedness of Walker to his wife. The deed is filed as an exhibit to the bill.

It is further stated in the bill that Denton, the trustee, accepted the trust, entered immediately upon the discharge of his duties, residing within a few miles of the property transferred to him, ready at all times to do and perform all acts contemplated in the deed, until the 4th March, 1868; that on the 6th of March, 1868, under the provisions of said deed, the complainant was duly and legally appointed as successor to said Denton by the probate judge of said county; that on the 20th March, 1867, the said William F. Walker, confederating with Henry G. Humphries and E. K. Carlisle, commission merchants and citizens of Mobile, Ala., to divest the said Eliza of her equitable interest in said lands, induced her to execute jointly, with her husband, a mortgage on said lands, to secure the payment of an asserted debt of $7,337.64, which the said William F. had contracted with said Humphries & Carlisle, maturing on the 19th December, 1867; that said deed of mortgage authorized Carlisle & Humphries, in default of payment of said debt, upon giving 30 days' notice, to sell said lands at auction and divest the title from the trustee and the said Eliza, and forever bar her equity of redemption. The mortgage is filed as an exhibit to the bill.

It is further charged that said Humphries & Carlisle were fully apprised of the true condition of the title to the land when they affected the negotiation; that they were expressly notified of the deed of trust first mentioned, and knew that the property they were seeking to incumber was trust property, settled upon the said Eliza and the heirs of her body; that she was ignorant of the legal effect to be given to the deed of mortgage by the draftsman; that but a small portion of the debt claimed was for her family supplies and necessities, wearing apparel of herself or children, or their education, or household furniture, or carriages and horses, buildings on her land and premises, or repairs thereof, or materials, work, and labor for the benefit and improvement of her separate estate.

The bill "protests against another clause of the said deed of mortgage, as being not only manifestly against his rights, but in direct violation of the deed from said Walker to complainant's predecessor"; alleges that the land in the deed is estimated at $20,750; that indebtedness in the mortgage is $7,337.64, far less than the value of the land; charges that, since the execution of the mortgage, said William F. has paid $1,800 or $2,000 to Carlisle & Humphries, which should have been credited on said indebtedness, and that the mortgage provides that the surplus from the land sale shall be paid to Walker and wife, and not to the trustee, the complainant.

The bill further states that said Humphries & Carlisle, by their agent and attorney, J. N. Carlisle, Esq., have advertised the lands for sale under the mortgage, and also about 6,000 bushels of corn, on the second Monday in March, 1868. A copy of the advertisement is filed as an exhibit.

H. G. Humphries, E. K. Carlisle, J. N. Carlisle, and William F. Walker are made defendants, and injunction, etc., prayed for to restrain the sale. There is also a prayer for discovery, by Humphries & Carlisle, of the amount due them, and that on final hearing the injunction be made perpetual, that the mortgage be canceled.

On the 6th March, 1868, the chancellor indorsed on the bill his fiat for injunction, upon the complainant entering into bond with sureties in the sum of $2,000. The bond was given, and writs of injunction and subpoena issued.

Exhibit No. 1, referred to in the bill, is as follows:

"The State of Mississippi, Chickasaw County. This indenture, made and entered into this 4th day of December, 1866, between William F. Walker, of the first part, Eliza R. Walker, his wife, of the second part, each of the county and state aforesaid, and Thomas J. Denton, of the same county and state, of the third part, witnesseth: That the said party of the second part, having been the owner in her own right at the time of her marriage, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and fifty-three, with the said party of the first part, of a large personal estate, which was received by, controlled, possessed, used, and enjoyed by him, as hereinafter set forth, that is to say, thirty-three negro slaves, which went into his possession on the first day of January, 1854, and were worked and controlled in raising cotton, etc., and whose hire was worth as stated," etc. The deed then proceeds to give the names and value of the hire of each negro for eleven years, the aggregate hire valued at $31,250, and continues: "And the said party of the second part having received large sums of money from the separate estate of the said Eliza, as follows: The sum of fifteen thousand dollars on the first day of January, 1854; seven thousand dollars on the 1st July, 1855, and six thousand dollars on the 1st July, 1866, amounting to twenty-eight thousand dollars; and the said William F. having assumed the entire management and control of the separate estate of the said Eliza, and with the funds realized from the proceeds raised by her negro slaves as aforesaid, and with the cash received by him as above set forth, he purchased real and personal property as hereinafter described and valued, that is to say," etc. The deed here describes the tract of land in controversy, and a number of mules, horses, wagons, carriage and harness, farming utensils, carpenters' and blacksmiths' tools, household and kitchen furniture, jewelry, plate, stock hogs, etc., valued at $8,192, and proceeds: "And the said William F. being anxious to secure, so far as he has the ability to do so, the payment of this debt he owes to his wife, amounting to the sum of sixty-two thousand two hundred and fifty dollars, taking the hire of the negro property as the basis of his liability for their use and employment. Now, in consideration of the premises, and for and in consideration of the sum of ten dollars, paid by the said party of the third part, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, the said party of the first part hath granted, bargained, and sold, and by these presents doth grant, bargain, and sell, unto the said party of the third part, all the real and personal property above described, to wit" (giving description of land and personal property before referred to): "In trust, nevertheless, for the use, benefit and behoof of the said party of the second part and the heirs of her body forever, who are to retain the possession, management, direction, and control of the property conveyed. The said trustee or his successor, to be designated by the judge of the probate court of the county and state aforesaid, in term time or in vacation, to take such possession or direction as may then be necessary for faithfully carrying out this trust according to its true intent and meaning, such as bringing and defending suits, executing bonds, signing papers, or appointing an attorney in fact to do and perform whatever may be necessary and proper to be done in protecting and defending the said estate to the party of the second part and the heirs of her body." The deed then states that the property conveyed, valued at $29,942, "is intended to be to that extent in part payment of the sum of $62,250, the amount admitted to be due," etc., and concludes with warranty of title, etc.

Exhibit No. 2 of the bill is in the words and figures following:

"The State of Mississippi, Chickasaw County. This deed of mortgage, made the this 20th day of March, 1867, between W. F. Walker, with E. R. Walker, his wife, both of the county of Chickasaw and state of Mississippi, of the first part, and E. K. Carlisle, with H. G. Humphries, commission merchants, of Mobile and state of Alabama, of the other, witnesseth: That whereas the said W. F. Walker, with E. R. Walker, his wife, are indebted to the said E. K. Carlisle and H. G. Humphries in the sum of seventy-three hundred and thirty-seven dollars and sixty-four cents, said sum of money being advanced to said W. F. Walker and E. R. Walker on their crop of cotton, to be raised in and during the year, Anno Domini, 1867, on the plantation under the superintendence of W. F. Walker, Jno. D. Poyner, and Thos. McCarthy. Said sum of money is further secured by their certain promissory notes, bearing date the nineteenth day of January, A. D. 1867, for the said sum of seventy-three hundred and thirty-seven dollars and sixty-four cents, subscribed with their hands and delivered to the said E. K. Carlisle and H. G. Humphries, whereby the said W. F. Walker and E. R. Walker promised to pay the said Carlisle & Humphries, or order, seventy-three hundred and thirty-seven dollars and sixty-four cents, on or before the nineteenth day of December, 1867, for value received. And whereas, the said W. F. Walker and E. R. Walker, his wife, are willing to give this deed for satisfaction of what may be due and unpaid to the said Carlisle & Humphries on the nineteenth day of December, 1867, next: Therefore the said W. F. Walker and E. R. Walker bargain, sell, alien, and convey to the said Carlisle & Humphries all those tracts or parcels of land situated and lying in the county of Chickasaw and state of Mississippi, known and described as the west half of section twelve, in township thirteen, range five east, and the west half of section thirteen, township thirteen, range five east, containing six hundred and seventy acres, more or less; also convey all the cotton crop that is raised on said lands or plantation under the direction or superintendence of W. F. Walker, John D. Poyner, and Thomas McCarthy, which said cotton is to be shipped to said Carlisle & Humphries aforesaid as soon as is practicable after ginning and baling the same; to have and to hold the same with all the rights and appurtenances to the said Carlisle & Humphries, their heirs, executors, and administrators. But this conveyance is upon condition, if the said W. F. Walker and E. R. Walker shall, on or before the nineteenth day of December, 1867, well and fully pay the said sum of money, then this deed is to cease and to be void; but if after that day said sum, with any part thereof, be unpaid, then it shall be lawful for the said Carlisle & Humphries, or their legal representative, after giving thirty days' notice by advertisement in some newspaper in Chickasaw county of the cause, day, and place of sale, to proceed to sell at public auction at Okolona the mortgaged property, or a sufficiency thereof, for cash to the highest and best bidder, and out of the proceeds, after defraying the cost of advertisement and sale, they may retain the full amount of mortgage money due, and if there be a surplus they are presently to pay it to W. F. Walker and E. R. Walker, or their legal representatives, and to make to the vendee or vendees a deed of conveyance, transmitting the quit of purchase of all right, title, or interest of the parties and their heirs, or of all claiming under them, and thereupon all the right and title of the W. F. Walker, with E. R. Walker, his wife, to redeem, shall be as effectually barred and foreclosed as if upon a decree in equity; and the said W. F. Walker, with E. R. Walker, his wife, hereto put their names and seals, the day and date aforewritten.

"[Signed] W. F. Walker. [Seal.]
"E. R. Walker. [Seal.]"

Carlisle & Humphries filed their answer, averring that they knew nothing of the existence of the debt alleged to be due Eliza R. Walker by W. F. Walker, her husband, except what they learn from the said exhibit No. 1 in the bill, and that they believe the debt fictitious; that there was no valid consideration in law or equity passing from said Eliza to said W. F. Walker for the conveyance; that said conveyance is fraudulent and made with the intent to defraud the creditors of said W. F.; that the appointment of T. J. Denton as trustee was merely nominal, and for the better serving to cloak and conceal the said property and more effectually defrauding the creditors of the said W. F.; that said Denton, under a provision in the deed of trust, appointed the said W. F. his attorney in fact, clothing him with full power to act in all things pertaining to said trusteeship, as if he, the said W. F., had been trustee; that the said W. F. executed the said mortgage in the bill mentioned as such attorney in fact; that the complainant, C. C. Dibrell, ignoring the action of his predecessor, Denton, filed his bill with the intent to deprive respondents of their rights and powers vested in them as mortgagees; that said T. J. Denton, being aware of the execution of said attorneyship to W. F. Walker, refused to join in said bill of complaint, but, actuated by the dictates of honor and honesty, declined entering into such fraudulent interference with respondents' rights; denies all confederating by Carlisle & Humphries to defeat Mrs. Walker's interest in said lands; denies inducing her to join her husband in executing the mortgage; alleges that the mortgage was made by W. F. Walker, as attorney in fact for the trustee and by Mrs. Walker, freely and voluntarily, without any persuasion, and by her so acknowledged in a private examination by an officer authorized to take such acknowledgment; denies all knowledge of the trust under which Mrs. Walker held the lands, and supposed W. F. Walker fully empowered to convey or incumber them.

Respondents assert that the $7,337.64 was money actually advanced to the said W. F. Walker and his wife during the year 1867, for the necessary supplies of the plantation of said Walker and wife, and believe that it was used for them and their children; denies that the property mortgaged is and was worth $20,750, but insists that its value at the date of the mortgage and now does not exceed respondents' debt; denies that the execution of the mortgage was against the rights of the trustee, Dibrell; alleges that W. F. Walker was notoriously acting as the agent of his wife, and with the knowledge and consent of Denton, trustee; that, if the allegations in complainant's bill be true, said Walker, under false and fraudulent pretenses, obtained respondents' money; that said Walker and wife have never paid but $873.20, and this amount was duly credited on the debt. Respondents say that they are led to believe that Dibrell, complainant, through the solicitation and procurement of W. F. Walker, accepted the appointment of trustee, and, without a knowledge of what his predecessor had done, has filed this bill and made the representations and allegations therein from false representations of W. F. Walker; that Dibrell's action is in direct contravention of the action of his predecessor, Denton; that W. F. Walker's interest is not with respondents as defendants in this suit, but identified with the complainant; and that he cunningly devised his joinder with respondents as defendant for fraudulent purposes.

Respondents insist that the advances made by them were solely on the credit of Mrs. Walker and her children, the beneficiaries of the pretended deed of trust, and for their benefit and use, and not on the credit of W. F. Walker; that he was insolvent and unable to obtain credit at the time; that the writ of injunction was illegally issued because of the want of good sureties on the bond; that said bond has no date and bears no evidence of having been duly executed as the law directs; that the fiat only requires a bond for $2,000, whilst the amount of indebtedness enjoined is $6,464.36, and the bond is not in double the sum so enjoined.

The mortgage referred to in the bill as Exhibit No. 2 is made an exhibit in the answer also. Another exhibit to the answer consists of an account of the debts due by W. F. and Eliza Walker to Carlisle & Humphries, showing balance of $7,337.64. Exhibit C is as follows:

"The State of Mississippi, Chickasaw County. To whom these presents may come, greeting: Know ye that I, Thos. J. Denton, reposing entire confidence in the probity and integrity of W. F. Walker, a citizen of the county of Chickasaw and state of Mississippi, do by these presents constitute him my true and lawful attorney in fact for me as trustee, appointed under a deed executed by the said Walker in favor of Eliza R. Walker and the heirs of her body as cestui que trust, on the 4th day of December, 1866, conveying real and personal property valued at $29,942, and in my name to sign all papers, bonds, affidavits, contracts, and to make, do, and perform all and every act necessary or proper to be made, done, or performed for the protection of said trust estate, or for carrying out the true intent and meaning of said trust deed, and to every act in the premises which I could do if personally present, and I hereby ratify and confirm whatever he may lawfully do in the premises. Given under my hand and seal this the 4th day of December, 1866.

"[Signed] T. J. Denton. [Seal.]"

This power of attorney was acknowledged and recorded in Chickasaw county.

J. A. Orr and Harris & Withers, for appellant. Gholson & Hooper, James T. Harrison, and George L. Potter, for appellees.

PEYTON, J. This was an injunction bill brought by the appellant in the chancery court of Chickasaw county to restrain the appellees, E. K. Carlisle and H. G. Humphries, from executing a power of sale contained in a mortgage given to them by William F. Walker and Eliza R. Walker, his wife.

The material facts of the case are these: William F. Walker, being indebted to his wife, Eliza R., in a large amount of money, on the 4th day of December, 1866, conveyed to one Thomas J. Denton certain real and personal estate situated in the said county of Chickasaw, in this state, in trust for the use of the said Eliza R. Walker and the heirs of her body forever, which deed of conveyance was duly acknowledged and recorded.

That on the 20th day of March, A. D. 1867, the said William F. Walker and Eliza R., his wife, made and executed their deed of mortgage of six hundred and seventy acres of the land, covered by the said deed of trust, to said Carlisle & Humphries, to secure the payment of a promissory note for $7,337.64, made by said Walker and wife, dated the 19th day of January, 1867, and payable to said Carlisle & Humphries on the 19th day of December, 1867. The said mortgage deed, which was duly acknowledged and recorded, gives to the mortgagees a power of sale of the mortgaged property in default of payment of the note at maturity.

The note not having been paid, the mortgagees were proceeding to sell the property, when they were enjoined from so doing by the appellee, who was appointed trustee, under a power in the deed creating the trust estate, to succeed the original trustee, who had resigned the trust.

The appellees, Carlisle & Humphries, in their answer, admit the conveyance in trust as set forth in the bill of complaint, but deny that there was any valid consideration therefor, and insist that it was made to hinder, delay, and defraud creditors. They admit the execution of the mortgage stated in the bill, and insist that they had a right to sell the mortgaged property to pay the amount due on the debt therein specified. They aver that the amount specified in the said note and mortgage was actually advanced by them to the said W. F. and E. R. Walker for the necessary supplies of the plantation of the said Walker and wife, and that they believe that the said money was used by the said Walker and wife for the use and benefit of the said E. R. Walker and her children, and that the advances were made solely on the credit of Mrs. E. R. Walker, and not on that of her husband, who was insolvent and unable to obtain credit at the time the advances were made.

The appellees, Carlisle & Humphries, moved the court below to dissolve the injunction on bill, answer, exhibits, and proofs. The motion was sustained and the injunction dissolved. And from this decree the cause is brought to this court by appeal on the part of the appellee.

This record presents three important questions for our consideration:

(1) What interest does Mrs. Walker take under the conveyance to a trustee for the use of herself and the heirs of her body forever?

(2) Where the wife has joined with her husband in a mortgage of her separate estate to pay the debt of her husband, can the corpus of that estate, under the existing laws, be subjected in a court of equity to the payment of such debt?

(3) Is the separate estate of Mrs. Walker liable in equity to the payment of the debt specified in the mortgage or any part thereof?

The first question involves the construction of the limitations in the deed creating the trust estate. It is a common maxim that equity follows the law: Equitas sequitur legem. Where a rule of the common or statute law is direct and governs the case with all its circumstances or the particular point, a court of equity is as much bound by it as a court of law, and can as little justify a departure from it. A court of equity cannot disregard the canons of descent. In general, in courts of equity, the same construction and effect are given to perfect trust estates as are given by courts of law to legal estates. The incidents, properties, and consequences of the estates are the same. The same restrictions are applied as to creating estates and bounding perpetuities and giving absolute dominion over property. The same modes of construing the language and limitations of the trusts are adopted. 1 Story, Eq. (Redf. Ed.) pp. 53-55, § 64.

The words "heirs of the body," in the conveyance of a legal estate, are words of limitation of the estate to the donee, and not words of purchase for the heirs of the body.

Warren v. Haley, Smedes & M. Ch. 647. These words create an estate in fee tail, which, by our statute, is converted into an estate in fee simple. Rev. Code, p. 307, art. 3. And, if it be true that the same modes of construing the language and limitations of trust estates are adopted as apply to legal estates, we cannot resist the conclusion that Mrs. Walker takes, under the terms of the deed, the entire trust estate absolutely.

With regard to the second question it may be remarked that it is a familiar rule of equity jurisprudence that general debts or general personal engagements of a married woman, contracted during coverture, are not chargeable upon her separate estate; and, unless a feme covert who contracts a debt or enters into an engagement designs that such engagement or debt shall constitute a charge upon her separate estate, a court of equity will not entertain jurisdiction to enforce payment thereof out of such separate estate.

When real property is conveyed absolutely to the separate use of a married woman, she can dispose of the trust estate only in the mode and manner prescribed by the instrument creating the trust estate, and, if none be prescribed and limited therein, then in accordance with the provisions of the statute.

Prior to the adoption of our present Code, in 1857, it has been repeatedly decided by this court that the wife may bind the corpus of her separate estate, by deed in trust or mortgage, as a security for the debts of her husband. James v. Fisk, 9 Smedes & M. 144; Sessions v. Bacon, 23 Miss. 272; Armstrong v. Stovall, 26 Miss. 280; Russ v. Wingate, 30 Miss. 445; Stone v. Montgomery, 35 Miss. 83-105; Prewett v. Land, 36 Miss. 495.

Since the adoption of the Code, a married woman has no power to incumber the corpus of her separate estate by deed of trust, mortgage, or otherwise, for the debt of her husband, but only the income thereof. The statute expressly provides that no conveyance or incumbrance for the separate debts of the husband shall be binding on the wife beyond the amount of her income. Rev. Code, p. 336, art. 23. This is a wise provision intended to secure to the wife the enjoyment of her separate estate against any possible contingency of loss through the fraud, force, or undue influence of her husband.

The solution of the third question depends upon the facts of the case as they may be developed and established by the evidence. With a view to the more beneficial enjoyment and productiveness of the separate estate of a married woman, the law has provided that all contracts made by the husband and wife, or by either of them, for supplies for the plantation of the wife, or for the employment of an agent to superintend the planting operations, may be enforced, and satisfaction had out of her separate estate. And all contracts made by the wife, or by the husband with her consent, for family supplies or necessities, wearing apparel of herself and children, or for their education, or for household furniture, or for carriage and horses, or for buildings on her land or premises, and the materials therefor, or for work and labor done for the use, benefit, or improvement of her separate estate, shall be binding on her, and satisfaction may be had out of her separate property. Rev. Code, p. 336, art. 25. And it has been decided that a married woman is liable on a promissory note given by her for a horse purchased by her for the supply and use of her plantation. Robertson v. Ward, 12 Smedes & M. 490. This adjudication was made under the act of 1846, which made the income only of her separate estate liable to the payment of the debt. And, under the act of 1857, this court has decided that the wife is liable out of the corpus of her separate estate to the payment of a note given by herself and husband for money advanced for the purpose of purchasing supplies for her plantation, and which was actually applied to that purpose. Bowman v. Thomas E. Helm. These cases are regarded as coming within the equity of the respective statutes under which the debts were contracted.

It results, therefore, from this view of the law, that Mrs. Walker is liable to payment out of her separate estate for the amount of supplies furnished by Carlisle & Humphries for her plantation, and for the amount of the money advanced by them to Walker, or Walker and wife, for the purchase of supplies for her plantation, or the improvement of her separate estate, and which were actually applied to that use and purpose. And for that portion of the debt secured by the mortgage, which was not applied to these purposes, she is liable to payment out of the income only of her separate estate. The record contains no evidence as to what portion of the debt secured by the mortgage was for supplies actually furnished by Carlisle & Humphries for the plantation of Mrs. Walker, or which was applied to the purchase of such supplies. Nor is there any proof as to what amount of the money advanced by Carlisle & Humphries was applied by Walker to his own use.

The most appropriate remedy of Carlisle & Humphries will be found in a court of equity, in which an account can be taken of what portion of the note secured by the mortgage was for supplies for Mrs. Walker's plantation, and what part of the money was advanced by them for the purchase of such supplies, and which was actually so applied, and what part of the same was used by Walker for his own purposes. When these facts are ascertained, the court will make a decree in accordance with the principles above laid down, subjecting the separate estate of Mrs. Walker to sale to pay for the supplies for her plantation, and decreeing that the trustee of the estate and Mrs. Walker pay to Carlisle & Humphries the amount of the debt, secured by the mortgage, found due them by William F. Walker, out of the income of her separate estate.

It is insisted by some of the counsel of the appellees that the mortgage was void because the trustee did not join in the mortgage deed. This was not necessary. In a case free from fraud or undue influence, a married woman can bind her separate property without the trustees, unless their assent be made necessary by the instrument which gave that property. And in the case at bar the charge made upon the separate estate by the wife is totally unrestrained by the deed creating the trust estate, and is valid and binding, and a court of equity is bound to enforce it, so far as to subject the separate estate to the payment for supplies for carrying on the wife's plantation, and so far as she was surety for her husband, and had mortgaged her property to pay his debt, to subject the rents, issues, and profits of her separate estate to the payment of that debt.

With respect to the duty of trustees in relation to real property, it is still held, in conformity to the old law of uses, that pernanacy of the profits, execution of estates, and defense of the land, are the three great properties of the trust. Therefore a court of chancery will compel trustees (1) to permit the cestui que trust to receive the rents and profits of the land; (2) to execute such conveyances as the cestui que trust shall direct; (3) to defend the title of the land in any court of law or equity. Tiff. & B. Trusts, 815.

A cestui que trust may lawfully dispose of his trust estate, notwithstanding his title is contested by the trustee, for the latter can never disseize the former of the trust estate; but, so long as it continues, the possession of the trustee is treated, at least in a court of equity, as the possession of the cestui que trust. Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sumn. 475, Fed. Cas. No. 787.

It is insisted that the power of sale contained in a mortgage deprives the mortgagor of his equity of redemption, and therefore cannot rightfully be exercised. The principle seems to be now well established, though after great doubt and discussion, that a clause may legally be inserted in the mortgage deed empowering the mortgagee, upon breach of condition, to make sale of the mortgaged premises, to pay his debt from the proceeds, and account with the mortgagor for the balance. The power of sale is to apply solely to the remedy, and not to impair any right of the mortgagor. The power of sale does not bar the mortgagee's right to foreclose by judicial proceedings. The remedy is cumulative merely, and in no respects affects the jurisdiction or proceedings of a court of chancery. 1 Hil. Mortg. 128, 129. And such sale, made after the law day or breach of condition, and in pursuance of the terms of the mortgage, vests in the purchaser all the title conveyed by the mortgage, free from the right of redemption.

There is nothing in the record tending in any way to impeach the validity of the mortgage. There is no evidence of any undue influence or improper conduct or control on the part of the husband to obtain the wife's assent and signature to the mortgage deed. And the debt in question was not incurred for the husband alone, or for unworthy purposes. It was for money advanced and articles supplied, partly for the family, partly for the use of Mrs. Walker, and partly for the benefit of the trust estate. We can, therefore, perceive no good reason why the mortgage should not be enforced against the separate estate or its income, according to the nature, extent, and character of the liability, when ascertained by proof.

It is objected that the mortgagees had no right to sell the corn advertised, under the power of sale contained in the mortgage deed, for the reason that there was no corn mortgaged. This objection is well taken, for it is very clear that the mortgagees can sell under the power only the property covered by the mortgage.

For the reasons set forth in this opinion, we think the court below erred in dissolving the injunction.

The decree must therefore be reversed and cause remanded.

SPEIDEL et al. v. HENRICI.

(7 Sup. Ct. 610, 120 U. S. 377.)

Supreme Court of the United States. March 7, 1887.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania.

Wm. Reinecke, Geo. Hoadly, E. M. Johnson, and Edwd. Colston, for appellants. George Shiras, Jr., for appellees.

GRAY, J. This bill was filed against the trustees of the Harmony Society, an unincorporated association of persons living together as a community, by a former member of the society, claiming a share in property in the hands of the trustees. The bill is sought to be maintained on the ground that the trust was not a charity, in the legal sense, and the members of the society were equitable tenants in common of the property held in trust. The learned counsel for the appellants differ in their views of the trust; the one insisting that it was unlawful, because founded in fraud and against public policy, and should therefore be dissolved; and the other contending that it was a lawful and continuing trust. We have not found it necessary to consider which of these is the sound view, because we are of opinion that the plaintiff did not show himself to be entitled to invoke the interposition of a court of equity.

As a general rule, doubtless, length of time is no bar to a trust clearly established, and express trusts are not within the statute of limitations, because the possession of the trustee is presumed to be the possession of his cestui que trust. Prevost v. Gratz, 6 Wheat. 481, 497; Lewis v. Hawkins, 23 Wall. 119, 126; Railroad Co. v. Durant, 95 U. S. 576. But this rule is, in accordance with the reason on which it is founded, and as has been clearly pointed out by Chancellor Kent and Mr. Justice Story, subject to this qualification: that time begins to run against a trust as soon as it is openly disavowed by the trustee insisting upon an adverse right and interest which is clearly and unequivocally made known to the cestui que trust; as when, for instance, such transactions take place between the trustee and the cestui que trust as would, in case of tenants in common, amount to an ouster of one of them by the other. Kane v. Bloodgood, 7 Johns. Ch. 90, 124; Robinson v. Hook, 4 Mason, 139, 152, Fed. Cas. No. 11,956; Baker v. Whiting, 3 Sum. 475, 486; Oliver v. Piatt, 3 How. 333, 411. This qualification has been often recognized in the opinions of this court, and distinctly affirmed by its latest judgment upon the subject. Willison v. Watkins, 3 Pet. 43, 52; Boone v. Chiles, 10 Pet. 177, 223; Seymour v. Freer, 8 Wall. 202, 218; Bacon v. Rives, 106 U. S. 99, 107, 1 Sup. Ct. 3; Philippi v. Philippe, 115 U. S. 151, 5 Sup. Ct. 1181. In the case of an implied or constructive trust, unless there has been a fraudulent concealment of the cause of action, lapse of time is as complete a bar in equity as at law. Hovenden v. Aunesley, 2 Schoales & L. 607, 634; Beckford v. Wade, 17 Ves. 87. In such a case, Chief Justice Marshall repeated and approved the statement of Sir Thomas Plumer, M. R., in a most important case in which his decision was affirmed by the house of lords, that, "both on principle and authority, the laches and non-claim of the rightful owner of an equitable estate, for a period of 20 years, (supposing it the case of one who must within that period have made his claim in a court of law, had it been a legal estate,) under no disability, and where there has been no fraud, will constitute a bar to equitable relief, by analogy to the statute of limitations, if, during all that period, the possession has been under a claim unequivocally adverse, and without anything having been done or said, directly or indirectly, to recognize the title of such rightful owner by the adverse possessor." Elmendorf v. Taylor, 10 Wheat. 152, 174; Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Jac. & W. 1, 175, and 4 Bligh, 1. Independently of any statute of limitations, courts of equity uniformly decline to assist a person who has slept upon his rights, and shows no excuse for his laches in asserting them. "A court of equity," said Lord Camden, "has always refused its aid to stale demands, where the party slept upon his rights, and acquiesced for a great length of time. Nothing can call forth this court into activity but conscience, good faith, and reasonable diligence; where these are wanting, the court is passive, and does nothing. Laches and neglect are always discountenanced, and therefore, from the beginning of this jurisdiction, there was always a limitation to suits in this court." Smith v. Clay, 2 Amb. 645, 3 Brown, Ch. 640, note. This doctrine has been repeatedly recognized and acted on here. Piatt v. Vattier, 9 Pet. 405; McKnight v. Taylor, 1 How. 161; Bowman v. Wathen, 1 How. 189; Wagner v. Baird, 7 How. 234; Badger v. Badger, 2 Wall. 87; Hume v. Beale, 17 Wall. 336; Marsh v. Whitmore, 21 Wall. 178; Sullivan v. Railroad, 94 U. S. 806; Godden v. Kimmell, 99 U. S. 201. In Hume v. Beale, the court, in dismissing, because of unexplained delay in suing, a bill by cestuis que trust against a trustee under a deed, observed that it was not important to determine whether he was the trustee of a mere dry legal estate, or whether his duties and responsibilities extended further. 17 Wall. 348. See, also, Bright v. Legerton, 29 Beav. 60, and 2 De Gex, F. & J. 606. When the bill shows upon its face that the plaintiff, by reason of lapse of time and of his own laches, is not entitled to relief, the objection may be taken by demurrer. Maxwell v. Kennedy, 8 How. 210; National Bank v. Carpenter, 101 U. S. 567; Lansdale v. Smith, 106 U. S. 391, 1 Sup. Ct. 350.

The allegations of this bill, so far as they are material to the defense of laches, are in substance as follows: The Harmony Society is a voluntary association, formed in 1805 by the plaintiff's parents and other heads of families, who had emigrated from Germany under the leadership of one Rapp, and become subject to his control in both spiritual and temporal affairs. In that year, Rapp, for the purpose of acquiring absolute dominion over their means and mode of living, falsely and fraudulently represented to them that they could not be saved from eternal damnation except by renouncing the plan of a separate home for each family, yielding up all their possessions, as had been done by the early Christians, and laying them at the feet of Rapp as their apostle, to be put into a common fund of the society, and thenceforth living as a community under his control, receiving in return only the necessities of life; and they, induced by and relying on his false and fraudulent representations, immediately yielded up all their possessions to the common fund of the society, and placed the fund in his keeping as their trustee, and thenceforth lived as a community or common household, submitted themselves and their families to do for the community such work as he directed, allowed the avails thereof to form part of the common fund, and relinquished to him and his successors in the leadership of the community the management of the trust fund and the control of their own persons and those of their wives and children, and received only the necessities of life in return. Rapp received and accepted the trust fund, and all the accretions to it by the work of the inhabitants of the community or otherwise, not as his own, but in trust for the members of those families and the contributors to the fund, and for their common benefit; and always, up to his death in 1847, recognized and acknowledged said trust, and disclaimed any greater interest in the fund than that of any other contributor, and any other right to its management and control than by virtue of his leadership of the community. In 1807 Rapp obliged his followers to abjure matrimony, and thenceforth did not permit them to marry in the community, and compelled any one about to marry to leave it. The plaintiff was born in the community in 1807, and was reared in and as a part of it, under Rapp's teachings and control, and faithfully worked for it from the age of 12 to the age of 24 years, and allowed the avails of his work to become part of the common fund, and received in return nothing but the necessities of life, which were of far less value than the avails of his work; and in 1831, being about to marry, had to leave and did leave the community. The trust fund so received and accepted by Rapp, with its profits, interest, and accretions, now amounts to $8,000,000, and yields an annual income of $200,000, and is held by the defendants on the same trust on which Rapp held it in his life-time; and neither Rapp nor the defendants ever rendered any account to the plaintiff or to the beneficiaries of the fund, although the plaintiff, before bringing this suit in May, 1882, demanded of the defendants an account and a settlement of his share. The trust on which Rapp, and the defendants as his successors, held the common fund of the Harmony Society, is described in one place in the bill as "for the members of said families and the contributors of said fund, and for their common benefit;" that is to say, as is clearly explained by what goes before, in trust for their common benefit as a community, living together in the community, working for the community, subject to the regulations of the community, and supported by the community. This was the "said trust," which, as the bill afterwards alleges, Rapp, up to his death, and his successors, until the bringing of this suit, "always recognized and acknowledged." The constant avowal of the trustees that they held the trust fund upon such a trust is wholly inconsistent with and adverse to the claim of the plaintiff that they held the fund in trust for the benefit of the same persons as individuals, though withdrawn from the community, living by themselves, and taking no part in its work. The plaintiff, upon his own showing, withdrew from the community in 1831, and never returned to it, and, for more than 50 years, took no step to demand an account of the trustees, or to follow up the rights which he claimed in this bill. If he ever had any rights, he could not assert them after such a delay,—not on the ground of an express and lawful trust, because the express trust stated in the bill, and constantly avowed by the trustees during this long period, was wholly inconsistent with any trust which would sustain his claim; not on the ground that the express trust stated in the bill was unlawful and void, and therefore the trustees held the trust fund for the benefit of all the contributors in proportion to the amounts of their contributions, because that would be an implied or resulting trust, and barred by lapse of time. In any aspect of the case, therefore, if it was not strictly within the statute of limitations, yet the plaintiff showed so little vigilance and so great laches, that the circuit court rightly held that he was not entitled to relief in equity.

It is proper to add that this decision does not rest in any degree upon the judgments of the supreme court of Pennsylvania and of this court, in the cases cited at the bar, in favor of the trustees of the Harmony Society in suits brought against them by other members, because each of those cases differed in its facts, and especially in showing that the society had written articles of association, which are not disclosed by this bill. Scriber v. Rapp, 5 Watts, 351; Baker v. Nachtrieb, 19 How. 126.

Decree affirmed.

HAWKER v. MOORE et al.

(20 S. E. 848, 40 W. Va. 49.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 8, 1894.

Appeal from circuit court, Harrison county.

Bill by Owen Hawker against Wilson Moore and others. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant Moore appeals. Affirmed.

J. Philip Clifford, for appellant. John Bassel, for appellee.

HOLT, J. In this case the circuit court of Harrison county, by decree entered on the 27th day of January, 1893, set aside as fraudulent the deed made by appellant, Wilson Moore, on the 1st day of September, 1880, to Elam F. Piggatt, for the 25 acres of land mentioned, and decreed the sale thereof to pay plaintiff's judgment, from which defendant Moore obtained this appeal.

The facts are as follows: On the 15th day of October, 1880, the Merchants' National Bank of West Virginia, at Clarksburg, was the holder of a promissory note given to the bank by James Hawker, the principal therein, and the defendant Wilson Moore, and plaintiff, Owen Hawker, as his sureties, and the bank on that day obtained a judgment thereon against the three parties named. James Hawker, the principal, was insolvent, and plaintiff, Owen Hawker, was compelled to satisfy and pay the judgment. Therefore plaintiff was entitled to contribution from his cosurety, defendant Moore, of one-half the amount of the judgment thus paid, and to that extent to be substituted to the judgment lien of the bank against his real estate. Where one has been compelled to pay the debt of another, equity, as far as it can be done without just ground of complaint on the part of others, substitutes him to all the rights and remedies of the creditor against such debtor. This doctrine of subrogation has been applied freely in this state, and to its full extent, upon the general principles of equity, without the aid of any statute; and, having taken this correct view in the beginning, there has so far never been any need of any statute to correct any misstep in improper restraint of its application upon the supposition that a debt once paid must thereafter be treated as nonexistent under all circumstances, and to all intents and for all purposes. The doctrine, as it has been expounded and applied in our courts, has nothing of form, nothing of technicality, about it; and he who, in administering it, would stick in the letter, forgets the end of its creation, and perverts the spirit which gave it birth. It is the creature of equity, and real essential justice is its object. Enders v. Brune (1826) 4 Rand. (Va.) 438, 447; McNiel v. Miller (1887) 29 W. Va. 480, 2 S. E. 335; Robinson v. Sherman (1845) 2 Grat. 178; 2 Bart. Suit in Eq. 1051. The doctrine is eminently calculated to do exact justice between persons who are bound for the performance of the same duty or obligation, and is one, therefore, which is much encouraged and protected. "Equality is equity" is on this branch its maxim. It springs naturally out of the two equities of contribution and exoneration, and is in fact one of the means by which those equities are enforced. Bisp. Pr. Eq. (4th Ed.) § 335; Dering v. Earl of Winchelsea, 1 Cox, 318; Pendlebury v. Walker, 4 Younge & C. Exch. 441; Steel v. Dixon, 17 Ch. Div. 825; Brett, Lead. Cas. in Mod. Eq. (2d Ed.) 285, notes. See Ferguson v. Gibson, L. R. 14 Eq. 379; Forbes v. Jackson, 19 Ch. Div. 615, under the mercantile law amendment, Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, § 5; 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 809. Here the plaintiff has paid off the judgment, and asks the court to give him the benefit of the creditor's lien. Who can object to this? Who is injured by it? Not the bank, for they have received their debt from the plaintiff, and justice binds them to give the plaintiff their vantage ground. Not the principal debtor, for he is insolvent, and has no interest in the matter. Not the cosurety, for it is by his fault that plaintiff had to bear, in the first instance, the whole burden. If he had paid his half, and equality is equity, there would have been no occasion to ask the court to compel him to pay; and it does not lie with him to say that plaintiff shall not occupy a vantage ground that enables him, by process of law, to enforce the performance of this duty. The other creditors cannot complain, for the debt has in truth not been paid, because not paid by the one ultimately bound, but by others, who became his unwilling creditors in due course of law. But if there should be any one who, by any rule of strict law, or in equity and good conscience, stands on higher ground, or for any reason has a better right, he will not be displaced, or his right disturbed; for that is the essence of the doctrine. See Pott v. Nathans (1841) 1 Watts & S. 155; Eddy v. Traver (1837) 6 Paige, 521; Gross v. Davis, 87 Tenn. 226, 11 S. W. 92, and 10 Am. St. R. 635, notes; Sheld. Subr. (2d Ed.) § 137; Id., p. 209, § 140; 24 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 189; Thomas v. Stewart (1888) 117 Ind. 50, 18 N. E. 505; Crumlish's Adm'r v. Improvement Co., 38 W. Va. 390, 18 S. E. 456, and 23 L. R. A. 120, note 7; Dugger v. Wright (1888) 51 Ark. 232, 11 S. W. 213.

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.—2

It would answer no useful purpose to take up the testimony and show that it justifies the decree complained of. The fair conclusion to be drawn is that the deed of September 1, 1880, from defendant Moore to E. F. Piggatt, conveying the tract of land of 25 acres in the bill and proceedings mentioned, was made by Moore to hinder and delay his creditors; and that Piggatt took it, was holding it for him, on some sort of secret trust, the full terms of which do not appear. But Moore continued to occupy and use the land as his own, as he had always done, without the payment of any rent; and after E. F. Piggatt's death this tract of 25 acres was, by reason thereof, treated as not belonging to his estate, and was omitted when partition came to be made of his lands among his heirs. Therefore the decree complained of is affirmed.

ECONOMY SAV. BANK v. GORDON et al.

(45 Atl. 176, 90 Md. 486.)

Court of Appeals of Maryland. Jan. 10, 1900.

Appeal from circuit court of Baltimore city; Henry Stockbridge, Judge.

Suit by Douglas H. Gordon and others against the Economy Savings Bank and others. Decree for complainants. Defendant bank appeals. Reversed.

Argued before McSHERRY, C. J., and PAGE, FOWLER, BOYD, SCHMUCKER, and BRISCOE, JJ.

Daniel L. Brinton, for appellant. Arch. H. Taylor, E. P. Keech, Jr., and Foster & Foster, for appellees.

SCHMUCKER, J. On July 30, 1897, Cecil R. Atkinson executed a mortgage upon a warehouse owned by him, on South Howard street, in Baltimore city, to Alonzo J. Steers, which recited that he was indebted to Steers "in the full sum of fifteen thousand dollars, payable February 10th, 1898," and that it was executed to secure the payment of this debt, with interest thereon. The mortgage was in due form, was regularly acknowledged, and had attached to it a proper affidavit as to the bona fides of the consideration therein stated, and it was recorded on the day after its date. No note accompanied the mortgage, but it contained a covenant to pay the mortgage debt and interest. About the same time Steers, the mortgagee, applied to the American National Bank to lend him $6,000, offering to assign the mortgage as security for the loan. Schott, the cashier of the bank, explained to him that a national bank could not lend money upon real-estate security, but informed him that the appellant savings bank, of which he (Schott) was treasurer, had some money on hand, and would lend him $5,000 upon the mortgage, if the security proved to be ample, but the matter must first be referred by the appellant to a committee, who would investigate and report upon the security. Steers assented to the terms suggested by Schott, and a committee from the appellant went upon the mortgaged premises and examined them, and reported favorably upon the loan, provided there were no incumbrances upon the property prior to the mortgage. The matter was then referred by the appellant to its attorney to examine the title, Steers placing the mortgage in its hands for that purpose. The attorney examined the title, and reported favorably upon it, whereupon the appellant, on August 6, 1897, lent the $5,000 to Steers, and at the same time took from him an assignment of the mortgage as security for the loan. The $5,000 so loaned was given to Steers in the check of the appellant to his order upon the American National Bank, in which the appellant had on deposit at that time more than the amount of the check. Steers indorsed the check to the Eastern Electric Company, which at once deposited it to its own credit in the bank upon which it was drawn, and the $5,000 was passed to the credit of the electric company, and charged to the appellant upon the books of the bank. The money was then used by the electric company, to the extent of $2,000, in the payment of a loan which had been made by one Myerdick upon a previous unrecorded assignment of the Atkinson mortgage, and the remaining $3,000 was almost entirely paid to the American National Bank in satisfaction of obligations due to it by the Eastern Electric Company or by George H. Atkinson, a brother of Cecil R. Atkinson, the mortgagor. Steers subsequently assigned his equity in the $15,000 mortgage to one C. S. Hinchman as collateral security for a loan of $2,000. It appears from the record that Cecil R. Atkinson, the mortgagor, and his four brothers, William J., George H., Harry, and Richard F., were promoters by profession, and together operated and controlled the Eastern Electric Company and other kindred corporations, all of which proved to be speculative enterprises, and soon became insolvent and passed into the hands of receivers. Steers, who was put upon the stand by the appellees, testified that the consideration for the $15,000 mortgage from Atkinson to him consisted of $10,000 of Best Telephone Company bonds and $5,000 of Best Telephone Company stock, which he had let Atkinson have prior to the execution of the mortgage; but his testimony was so inconsistent and contradictory in its different portions that it cannot be accepted as reliable. The whole testimony touching the consideration for the mortgage leads to the conclusion that there was no substantial consideration for it, but that it was executed to provide a means of raising money to assist the Atkinson brothers in staving off the impending insolvency of the Eastern Electric and Best Telephone Companies, and the other enterprises which they were then attempting to keep afloat. On December 29, 1897, nearly five months after the loan of the $5,000 to Steers by the appellant, and the assignment to the latter of the mortgage, Douglas H. Gordon, one of the appellees, obtained a judgment for $5,442.30 against the mortgagor, Cecil R. Atkinson, and his brother William J. Atkinson, on a note given by them to him on November 13, 1896, for a loan which he then made to them upon Best Telephone Company bonds and stock as collateral. Gordon testified that at the time he made this loan William J. Atkinson stated that his brother Cecil R. owned the Howard street warehouse, and he (Gordon) suggested that he be given a mortgage on the warehouse as security for the loan about to be made by him. W. J. Atkinson declined to procure the mortgage, saying that it would injure his brother's credit, but stated that Gordon would have the benefit of the property by having its owner, Cecil R. Atkinson, upon the note. Gordon testified that he relied on this statement of William J. Atkinson in making the loan. Harry W. Boureau, the other appellee, obtained a judgment for $503.80 against William J. Atkinson and Cecil R. Atkinson on September 29, 1897. On December 18, 1897, after Boureau had obtained his judgment, and after Gordon had sued the Atkinsons, but before he had gotten his judgment, the appellees instituted the present case, which is a creditors' suit in equity against the appellant, Cecil R. Atkinson, Steers, and Hinchman. The bill of complaint alleged that the mortgage from Atkinson to Steers, and the successive assignments of it by him to the appellant and Hinchman, were all without consideration and fraudulent, and prayed to have them declared void. The appellant answered the bill, denying its material allegations, and setting up its title to the mortgage to the extent of the $5,000 loaned on it, and interest, as a bona fide purchaser for value, without notice of any infirmity in it. Neither Hinchman nor Steers answered, and a decree pro confesso was entered against them. The case against the appellant came regularly to a hearing, and the court below at first filed an opinion sustaining the appellant's claim; but upon a rehearing of the case the learned judge changed his views of the case, and filed another opinion, of a contrary tenor, and signed the decree appealed from, denying the appellant's claim to a lien on the property, and directed it to be sold for the benefit of the creditors of the mortgagor. In his second opinion the learned judge held, upon the authority of the Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. Case, 42 Md. 598, that the appellant, although he found it to be a bona fide purchaser for value of the mortgage, without notice, was not entitled to a lien for its loan to Steers, and interest, made upon the faith of the mortgage, because the latter, not being accompanied by a negotiable obligation, was a mere chose in action, which the appellant must be treated as having taken subject to all equities that might have been urged against it in the hands of Steers, the mortgagee.

Under the facts of the case, the appellant must be regarded as a bona fide purchaser for value of the mortgage, without notice. It advanced its $5,000 upon the mortgage in the ordinary course of business, after a careful inquiry into the value of the property, and an investigation of the title upon the public records. It was not concerned in the disposition made by Steers of the borrowed money, not one dollar of which went back into its hands, or was expended for its benefit. It was not put upon inquiry as to the bona fides of the mortgage by the fact that Schott, its treasurer, was also cashier of the American National Bank, where Steers and the Eastern Electric Company and one or more of the Atkinson brothers kept their accounts, and that he might have seen by an examination of the books of the bank what disposition was made of the borrowed money. There was in fact nothing in the use made of the money to suggest any infirmity in the mortgage.

The next question to be determined is, what are the rights of the appellant, as such bona fide purchaser, against the claims of the appellees? As there was no attempt by Steers to assign the mortgage debt to one person, and the mortgage to another, we are not called upon to consider the relative equities of one who claims as assignee of the debt, and another who claims as assignee of the mortgage, as the court were in the cases of Clark v. Levering, 1 Md. Ch. 178, and Byles v. Tome, 39 Md. 461, which were in part relied on by the appellees. What we have to consider is the attitude of the appellant, as the bona fide purchaser of both debt and mortgage, towards the creditors of the mortgagor, who were such at the time the mortgage was made. The mortgage was not given to secure an actual indebtedness of $15,000, as it professes on its face to have been. Its execution was evidently a means adopted by the parties to it to clothe Steers, the mortgagee, with the appearance of a good title to a large debt secured by a valid mortgage, in order to enable him to raise money upon it. It was not fraudulent, in the sense that its execution had been procured by fraud, misrepresentation, or constraint practiced on the owner of the land who executed it, as was the case in Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 305, and Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. v. Parish, 42 Md. 598, in each of which the defrauded mortgagor was protected in equity against the assignee of the fraudulent mortgage. In the present case the execution of the mortgage was the voluntary and deliberate act of the mortgagor, from which he had no equity to be relieved, even as against the mortgagee. Snyder v. Snyder, 51 Md. 77; Cushwa v. Cushwa's Lessee, 5 Md. 44. We have therefore no question before us of subjecting the rights of the appellant, as assignee of the mortgage, to any equities to which the assignor would have been liable in favor of the mortgagor; for here it is plain that there were no such equities. The present mortgage is to be regarded as fraudulent only in the sense that, having been made to secure a simulated, and not a real, indebtedness, it operated to hinder, delay, or defraud the creditors of the mortgagor, and was therefore obnoxious to the provisions of the statute of 13 Eliz. c. 5. The real question in the case is thus narrowed down to a comparison of the relative strength of the claims on the mortgaged property of the appellant, as assignee of the specific lien of the mortgage, and the appellees, as subsisting general creditors of the mortgagor, having reduced their debts to judgments after the assignment of the mortgage had been made. If the conveyance under consideration had been a fraudulent deed, instead of a mortgage, the right of the appellant, as a bona fide purchaser, to a lien on the property for the $5,000 advanced, and interest, could not seriously be questioned.

Cone v. Cross, 72 Md. 102, 19 Atl. 391; Hull v. William Deering & Co., 80 Md. 432, 31 Atl. 416; Hinkle v. Wilson, 53 Md. 293; Worthington v. Bullitt, 6 Md. 198. The broader and more general proposition that a bona fide purchaser, without notice, under a deed from a fraudulent grantee, takes a good title, which is not impaired by the fact that judgments were obtained against the fraudulent grantor prior to the conveyance by the fraudulent grantee, is well sustained by authority. 4 Kent, Comm. 464; Sleeper v. Chapman, 121 Mass. 404; Phelps v. Morrison, 24 N. J. Eq. 195; Totten v. Brady, 54 Md. 170; Swan v. Dent, 2 Md. Ch. 111 (note 9, Brantly's Ed.); Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 369. In the case of Bank v. Brooke, 40 Md. 257, the title of a bona fide purchaser of a mortgage note to the lien of the mortgage securing it was upheld against the suit of the creditors of the mortgagor, although it was admitted that the note and mortgage had been given in prejudice of the rights of his creditors, and would have been void as against them in the hands of the mortgagee. The fact that the mortgage in that case was accompanied by a promissory note distinguishes it from the case at bar, but the circumstance of the negotiability of the mortgage debt was not expressly mentioned or dwelt upon in the court's opinion. See, also, Danbury v. Robinson, 14 N. J. Eq. 218, 219.

A bona fide mortgagee from a fraudulent grantee has in a number of cases been held to be entitled to protection, to the extent of the debt due him, against the creditors of the fraudulent grantor, upon the ground that a mortgagee is to be treated as a purchaser, to the extent of his interest, within the meaning of the term "purchaser" as used in statutes such as that of 13 Eliz. c. 5; and this where the mortgage was not accompanied by a negotiable instrument. Ledyard v. Butler, 9 Paige, 136, 137; Murphy v. Briggs, 89 N. Y. 451; Shorten v. Drake, 38 Ohio St. 76; Moore v. Bank, 55 N. Y. 41. If the mortgage in the present case had been made directly from Cecil R. Atkinson to the appellant, no question could be made by Atkinson's creditors as to the appellant's lien upon the mortgaged property to the extent of the money advanced bona fide upon the faith of the property at the time the mortgage was made. When, therefore, Atkinson clothed Steers with the appearance of a good mortgage title of record to the property, for the purpose of enabling him to raise money upon the mortgage, and the appellant, relying upon this appearance of good title in Steers, after a careful examination of the public records, and a failure to find any prior incumbrances upon the property, parted with its money in good faith, it is entitled to the favor of a court of equity in the consideration of the relative equities of the parties to the controversy. This court, in Seldner v. McCreery, 75 Md. 296, 23 Atl. 643, said, "Where title is perfect on its face, and no known circumstances exist to impeach it or put a purchaser on inquiry, one who buys bona fide and for value occupies one of the most highly favored positions in the law." The appellant did not trust to the personal responsibility of the mortgagor, but lent its money upon the faith of the particular property covered by the mortgage, and required an assignment of the mortgage at the time of so doing. On the contrary, the appellees trusted to the mortgagor, or to such other collaterals as he lodged with them; and the appellee Gordon, although he knew when he lent his money that Cecil R. Atkinson owned the Howard street warehouse, did not insist upon having a lien on it for his loan, but deliberately relied, so far as the warehouse was concerned, upon his rights as an ordinary creditor of its owner. The equities of the appellant are at least equal to those of the appellees, and, having the legal title to the warehouse, it has the stronger claim thereon, under the familiar principle that where equities are equal the legal title must prevail. Pom. Eq. Jur. § 417; Wait, Fraud. Conv. § 370; Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 512, 3 Sup. Ct. 357, 27 L. Ed. 1012; Black v. Cord, 2 Har. & G. 103; Bassett v. Noteworthy, 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. (4th Am. Ed.) 1. In Dyson v. Simmons, 48 Md. 214, it was held, upon the authority of many cases there cited, that if a party makes, or affects to make, a mortgage which proves to be defective by reason of some informality or omission, even on the part of the mortgagee himself, the conscience of the mortgagor is bound, and equity will recognize and enforce the lien of the defective mortgage, and give it precedence over the subsisting creditors of the mortgagor, and also over judgments obtained against him after the date of the mortgage. General creditors have no lien on the property of the debtor, and a judgment is only a general lien, and is for that reason subordinate to the prior specific equitable lien of such a defective mortgage. The case at bar does not come directly within the principle asserted in the last-mentioned case, but it is certainly one in which, by reason of its peculiar facts, the conscience of the mortgagor was especially bound to the appellant; and we think that the same course of reasoning might well be applied, within proper limits, to the appellant's protection.

This court has frequently been called upon to assert and define the rights of the creditors of a grantor, as against a conveyance made by him which, by reason of inadequacy or want of consideration, or even by design, operated to hinder, delay, or defraud them. The court has not hesitated to strike down such conveyances at the suit of the creditor, holding that one cannot make a voluntary conveyance of his property, as against the rights of subsisting creditors, nor can he, as against such creditors, sell it for a consideration that bears no adequate relation to its real value. When, however, in such cases, the rights of parties, even if they were the immediate grantees under the conveyance, who had in good faith parted with value in reliance upon the conveyance, have had to be measured against those of the creditors, it has uniformly been held that, in order to do full justice to all the parties in such cases, a court of equity, in setting aside the deed, will allow it to stand as security for the consideration actually paid, and apply the balance to the payment of the vendor's debts. These propositions were distinctly upheld in the cases already cited of Cone v. Cross, Hull v. William Deering & Co., Hinkle v. Wilson, and Worthington v. Bullitt. We regard the principle of the last-mentioned cases, in none of which was the position of the party claiming under the conveyance strengthened by any element of negotiability in the subject-matter of the thing assigned to him, as properly applicable to the one at bar. The mortgaged property should be sold, and the proceeds of sale, after deducting proper expenses, applied first to the payment of the $5,000 lent by the appellant to Steers, with interest thereon, and then to the payment of the creditors of Cecil R. Atkinson, the mortgagor, who have come or may come into the case, according to their legal priorities.

We do not mean by this decision to disturb the authority of the Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. Case, upon which the learned judge below mainly relied in changing his opinion, nor that of the Copeland Case. In each of those cases the issue on trial was between the owner of property, who had been fraudulently induced to execute a mortgage upon it, and an assignee of the fraudulent mortgage, and they were both cases of flagrant fraud in fact. The rights of the creditors of the grantor were not in issue in either case. In the Cumberland Coal & Iron Co. Case the court asserted the proposition that the transfer of a mortgage is so far within the rule which applies to choses in action, that when the assignment is made without the concurrence of the mortgagor, as in that case, the assignee takes subject to the same equities and defenses to which the assignor was liable. We do not, however, understand the court, by what was said in that opinion, to intimate that, when the equities in behalf of the creditors of the mortgagor in such a case came to be asserted, their claims would be enforced, without regard to the proposition, so frequently upheld by this court in setting aside fraudulent conveyances at the suit of the creditors of the grantor, that, in order to do justice to all parties in such cases, the conveyances will be allowed to stand as security for the consideration actually paid on the faith of it by the party holding the legal title under it. Decree reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

RICE et al. v. RICE et al.

(2 Drew. 73.)

High Court of Chancery. Dec. 15, 16, 1853.

E. F. Smith, for plaintiffs. Mr. Elmsley and J. V. Prior, for defendants.

The VICE-CHANCELLOR took time to consider, and on the 12th January delivered the following judgment:

The question to be decided in this case is whether the equitable interest of the plaintiffs in respect of the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money is to be preferred to the equitable interest of the defendant Ede as equitable mortgagee.

What is the rule of a court of equity for determining the preference as between persons having adverse equitable interests? The rule is sometimes expressed in this form, "As between persons having only equitable interests, qui prior est tempore potior est jure." This is an incorrect statement of the rule, for that proposition is far from being universally true. In fact not only is it not universally true as between persons having only equitable interests, but it is not universally true even where their equitable interests are of precisely the same nature, and in that respect precisely equal, as in the common case of two successive assignments for valuable consideration of a reversionary interest in stock standing in the names of trustees, where the second assignee has given notice and the first has omitted it.

Another form of stating the rule is this, "As between persons having only equitable interests, if their equities are equal, qui prior est tempore potior est jure." This form of stating the rule is not so obviously incorrect as the former; and yet even this enunciation of the rule (when accurately considered) seems to me to involve a contradiction, for, when we talk of two persons having equal or unequal equities, in what sense do we use the term "equity?" For example, when we say that A. has a better equity than B., what is meant by that? It means only that, according to those principles of right and justice which a court of equity recognizes and acts upon, it will prefer A. to B., and will interfere to enforce the rights of A. as against B., and therefore it is impossible, (strictly speaking) that two persons should have equal equities, except in a case in which a court of equity would altogether refuse to lend its assistance to either party as against the other. If the Court will interfere to enforce the right of one against the other on any ground whatever,—say on the ground of priority of time,—how can it be said that the equities of the two are equal? i. e., in other words, how can it be said that the one has no better right to call for the interference of a court of equity than the other? To lay down the rule therefore with perfect accuracy, I think it should be stated in some such form as this, "As between persons having only equitable interests, if their equities are in all other respects equal, priority of time gives the better equity, or qui prior est tempore potior est jure."

I have made these observations, not of course for the purpose of a mere verbal criticism on the enunciation of a rule, but in order to ascertain and illustrate the real meaning of the rule itself, and I think the meaning is this, that, in a contest between persons having only equitable interests, priority of time is the ground of preference last resorted to, i. e., that a court of equity will not prefer the one to the other, on the mere ground of priority of time, until it finds upon an examination of their relative merits that there is no other sufficient ground of preference between them, or, in other words, that their equities are in all other respects equal, and that, if the one has on other grounds a better equity than the other, priority of time is immaterial.

In examining into the relative merits (or equities) of two parties having adverse equitable interests, the points to which the court must direct its attention are obviously these, the nature and condition of their respective equitable interests, the circumstances and manner of their acquisition, and the whole conduct of each party with respect thereto. And in examining into these points it must apply the test, not of any technical rule or any rule of partial application, but the same broad principles of right and justice which a court of equity applies universally in deciding upon contested rights.

Now in the present case each of the parties in controversy has nothing but an equitable interest; the plaintiffs' interest being a vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money, and the defendant Ede having an equitable mortgage. Looking at these two species of equitable interests abstractedly, and without reference to priority of time, or possession of the title deeds, or any other special circumstances, is there anything in their respective natures or qualities which would lead to the conclusion that in natural justice the one is better, or more worthy, or more entitled to protection than the other?

Each of the two equitable interests arises out of the forbearance by the party of money due to him. There is, however, this difference between them, that the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money is a right created by a rule of equity, without any special contract. The right of the equitable mortgagee is created by the special contract of the parties. I cannot say that in my opinion this constitutes any sufficient ground of preference, though, if it makes any difference at all, I should say it is rather in favor of the equitable mortgagee, inasmuch as there is no constat of the right of the vendor to his lien for unpaid purchase money until it has been declared by a decree of a court of equity, whereas there is a clear constat of the equitable mortgagee's title immediately on the contract being made; but I do not see in this any sufficient ground for holding that the equitable mortgagee has the better equity. So far, then, as relates to the nature and quality of the two equitable interests abstractedly considered, they seem to me to stand on an equal footing; and this I conceive to have been the ground of Lord Eldon's decision in Mackreth v. Symmons, 15 Ves. 329, where, in a contest between the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money and the right of a person who had subsequently obtained from the purchasers a mere contract for a mortgage, and nothing more, he decided in favour of the former, as being prior in point of time.

If, then, the vendor's lien for unpaid purchase money, and the right of an equitable mortgagee by mere contract for a mortgage, are equitable interests of equal worth in respect of their abstract nature and quality, is there anything in the special circumstances of the present case to give to the one a better equity than the other?

One special circumstance that occurs is this, that the equitable mortgagee has the possession of the title deeds. The question therefore arises, between two persons having equitable interests of equal worth, does the possession of the title deeds by one of them give him the better equity? In Foster v. Blackstone, 1 Myl. & K. 307. Sir John Leach, M. R., says, "A declaration of trust of an outstanding term, accompanied by a delivery of the deeds creating and continuing the term, gives a better equity than a mere declaration of trust to a prior incumbrancer." That is a case in which the two parties have equitable interests in the term of precisely the same nature, viz., a declaration of trust of the term without an actual assignment; and there the delivery of the deeds to the subsequent incumbrancer gives him the better equity. To the same effect is the decision in Stanhope v. Lord Verney, according to Lord St. Leonards' view of it, as reported in Butl. Co. Litt. p. 290, 1 Mylne & K. note 1, § 15 (which seems a more satisfactory report than that in 2 Eden, 81). Lord St. Leonards, 3 Sugd. Vend. 218, states it thus, "In Stanhope v. Earl Verney, Lord Northington held that a declaration of trust of a term in favour of a person was tantamount to an actual assignment, unless a subsequent incumbrancer, bona fide and without notice, procured an assignment, and that the custody of the deeds respecting the term, with the declaration of the trust of it in favour of a second incumbrancer, was equivalent to an actual assignment of it, and therefore gave him an advantage over the first incumbrancer, which equity could not take from him." The same doctrine appears to be recognized by Lord Eldon in Maundrell v. Maundrell, 10 Ves. 271, where he says, "It is clear, with regard to mortgagees and incumbrancers, that if they do not get in the satisfied term in some sense, either taking an assignment, making the trustee a party to the instrument, or taking possession of the deed creating the term, that term cannot be used to protect them against any person having mesne charges or incumbrances," implying that taking possession of the deed creating the term would confer on a subsequent incumbrancer such right of protection by means of the term. We have here, then, ample authority for the proposition, or rule of equity, that as between two persons whose equitable interests are of precisely the same nature and quality, and in that respect precisely equal, the possession of the deeds gives the better equity; and, applying this rule to the present case, it appears to me that, the equitable interests of the two parties being in their nature and quality of equal worth, the defendant having possession of the deeds has the better equity, and that there is, therefore, in this case, no room for the application of the maxim, "Qui prior est tempore potior est jure," which is only applicable where the equities of the two parties are in all other respects equal. I feel all the more confidence in arriving at this conclusion inasmuch as it is in accordance with the opinion expressed by Lord St. Leonards in his work on vendors and purchasers; and I have no doubt that in Mackreth v. Symmons, if the equitable mortgagee had, in addition to his contract for a mortgage, obtained the title deeds from his mortgagor, Lord Eldon would have decided in his favour.

I must, however, guard against the supposition that I mean to express an opinion that the possession of title deeds will in all cases and under all circumstances give the better equity. The deeds may be in the possession of a party in such a manner and under such circumstances as that such possession will confer no advantage whatever. For example, in Allen v. Knight, 5 Hare, 272 (affirmed by the Lord Chancellor and reported on appeal in 11 Jur. 527), the deeds had been delivered to the first equitable mortgagee, and by some unexplained means they had got back into the possession of the mortgagor who delivered them to a subsequent equitable mortgagee. It was insisted by the latter that it must be presumed that it was by the fault or neglect of the first mortgagee that the deeds had got out of his possession, or that at all events the court should direct an inquiry as to the circumstances. But the court held that the onus lay on the second mortgagee of proving such alleged fault or neglect of the first mortgagee; and, as he had failed to prove it, the court could not presume it, nor direct an inquiry on the subject, and decreed in favour of the first mortgagee. I think it may be clearly inferred from this case that if the first mortgagee had never had the deeds delivered to him, or if it had been proved that the deeds had got back to the mortgagor through his fault or neglect, the decision would have been in favour of the second mortgagee who had the deeds. So the deeds may have come into the hands of a subsequent equitable mortgagee by means of an act committed by another person which constituted a breach of an express trust as against the person having the prior equitable interest. In such a case it would be contrary to the principles of a court of equity to allow the subsequent mortgagee to avail himself of the injury which had been thus done to the party having the prior equitable estate or interest.

Indeed it appears to me that in all cases of contest between persons having equitable interests the conduct of the parties and all the circumstances must be taken into consideration, in order to determine which has the better equity; and, if we take that course in the present case, everything seems in favour of the defendant, the equitable mortgagee. The vendors, when they sold the estate, chose to leave part of the purchase money unpaid, and yet executed and delivered to the purchaser a conveyance, by which they declared in the most solemn and deliberate manner, both in the body and by a receipt indorsed, that the whole purchase money had been duly paid. They might still have required that the title deeds should remain in their custody, with a memorandum by way of equitable mortgage as a security for the unpaid purchase money, and, if they had done so, they would have been secure against any subsequent equitable incumbrance; but that they did not choose to do, and the deeds were delivered to the purchaser. Thus they voluntarily armed the purchaser with the means of dealing with the estate as the absolute legal and equitable owner, free from every shadow of incumbrance or adverse equity. In truth it cannot be said that the purchaser in mortgaging the estate by the deposit of the deeds has done the vendors any wrong, for he has only done that which the vendors authorized and enabled him to do. The defendant, who afterwards took a mortgage, was in effect invited and encouraged by the vendors to rely on the purchaser's title. They had, in effect, by their acts, assured the mortgagee that, as far as they (the vendors) were concerned, the mortgagor had an absolute indefeasible title both at law and in equity.

The mortgagee was guilty of no negligence. He was perfectly justified in trusting to the security of the equitable mortgage by deposit of the deeds, without the slightest obligation to go and inquire of the vendors whether they had received all their purchase money, when they had already given their solemn assurance in writing that they had received every shilling of it and had conveyed the estate and delivered over the deeds; and I do not think that the fact of the conveyance bearing date only the day before the mortgage imposed on him any such obligation. The defendant omitted nothing that was necessary to constitute a complete and effectual equitable mortgage; and although the mortgage was taken, not for money actually advanced at the time, but for an antecedent debt, the forbearance of that debt constitutes a full and sufficient valuable consideration.

Upon a comparison then of the conduct of the two parties, and a consideration of all the circumstances of the case, and especially the fact of the possession of the deeds, which the mortgagee acquired with perfect bona fides, and without any wrong done to the vendors, I am of opinion that the equity of the mortgagee is far better than that of the vendor, and ought to prevail.

I may, in conclusion, venture to make the suggestion that the point now under consideration is often put by text-writers in a form calculated to mislead, when it is propounded as a question whether the vendor, in respect of his lien for unpaid purchase money, or an equitable mortgagee, ought to be preferred, or when an opinion is expressed that the one or the other has the better equity. If I am right in my view of the matter, neither the one nor the other has necessarily and under all circumstances the better equity. Their equitable interests, abstractedly considered, are of equal value in respect of their nature and quality; but whether their equities are in other respects equal, or whether the one or the other has acquired the better equity, must depend upon all the circumstances of each particular case, and especially the conduct of the respective parties. And among the circumstances which may give to the one the better equity the possession of the title deeds is a very material one. But if, after a close examination of all these matters, there appears nothing to give to the one a better equity than the other, then, and then only, resort must be had to the maxim, "Qui prior est tempore potior est jure," and priority of time then gives the better equity.

COMSTOCK v. JOHNSON.

(46 N. Y. 615.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1871.

CHURCH, C. J. The principal question in this case, involving the construction of the grant of water, was correctly decided in the court below. It is well settled in this State that the terms used in this grant are to be taken as a measure of the quantity of water granted, and not a limitation of the use to the particular machinery specified. (Wakely v. Davidson, 26 N. Y., 387; Cromwell v. Selden, 3 id., 253.) It was found by the court that, at the time the defendant shut the water off, he asserted that the plaintiff had forfeited his right to the water, and claimed a right to shut it off. In this he was mistaken. In depriving the plaintiff of the use of the water under an assertion of forfeiture, he rendered himself amenable to the process of the court for the protection of the plaintiff's rights. The judgment enjoining the defendants from depriving the plaintiff of the quantity of water to which he was entitled under his deed, cannot be disturbed. The only serious question in the case relates to the use of the buzz saw in front of the mill. The plaintiff did not, by his deed, acquire the title to the land in front of the mill, because the description is limited to the land upon which the mill stands; but he did acquire an easement in such land for the purpose of ingress and egress, and also for the purpose of piling and sawing wood for the use of the mill, as it had been used and enjoyed for forty years. Everything necessary for the full and free enjoyment of the mill passed as an incident, appurtenant to the land conveyed. (2 Kent's Com., 467; Blaine's Lessee v. Chambers, 1 Serg. & Rawle, 174.) But this would not authorize the plaintiff to erect and use machinery upon this land not necessary to the use of the mill, as it had been used, and would not authorize the use of the buzz saw upon that land. The objection is not that the plaintiff propelled the buzz saw with the water from the dam, as he had the right to use the water for any machinery and in any place which he was entitled to occupy; but he could not occupy the space in front of the mill for that purpose. At the time the water was shut off by the defendants, it was being used only to propel this saw; and it is claimed that the defendants were justified in shutting off the water from that machinery; and for that reason the judgment should be reversed, or, at least, that it should be modified so as to restrain the plaintiff from using his buzz saw on the defendants' premises. As we have seen, the judgment against the defendants is fully warranted by the findings; and the question is, whether any modification should be made against the plaintiff. It is a rule of equity that he who asks equity must do equity. The plaintiff was in fault in using the buzz saw on the defendants' premises. It is said that this was an independent transaction, for which the defendants might have an action; and this was the view of the court below. The rule referred to will be applied when the adverse equity grows out of the very controversy before the court, or of such circumstances as the record shows to be a part of its history, or is so connected with the cause in litigation as to be presented in the pleadings and proofs, with full opportunity afforded to the party thus recriminated to explain or refute the charges. (Tripp v. Cook, 26 Wend., 143; McDonald v. Neilson, 2 Cow., 190; Casler v. Shipman, 35 N. Y., 533.)

All the facts connected with the right of the plaintiff to use the buzz saw were not only spread out upon the record, but were in fact litigated upon the trial, and, as to his strict legal rights, are undisputed; and we cannot say that, but for his use of the saw on the defendants' premises, the water would not have been shut off. Whether this was so or not, the controversy in relation to his right to use the saw was involved in the litigation, and was intimately connected with the wrongful act of the defendants; and, being so, it is proper to apply the equitable rule. It is not indispensable to the application of this rule that the fault of the plaintiff should be of such a character as to authorize an independent action for an injunction against him. The plaintiff, in strictness, was in the wrong in placing his buzz saw in front of the mill. The defendants were in the wrong in shutting off the water, and especially in asserting a forfeiture; and, as both parties are in court to insist upon their strict legal rights, we think substantial justice will be done by modifying the judgment so as to enjoin the plaintiff from using the buzz saw on the land in front of his mill, and, as modified, judgment affirmed, without costs to either party against the other in this court.

All concur.

Judgment accordingly.

BROWN, BONNELL & CO. v. LAKE SUPERIOR IRON CO. et al.

(10 Sup. Ct. 604, 134 U. S. 530.)

Supreme Court of the United States. April 7, 1890.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio.

Henry Crawford, for appellant. Francis Wing, C. C. Baldwin, S. Shellabarger, and J. M. Wilson, for appellees.

BREWER, J. On February 20, 1883, two of the appellees, the Lake Superior Iron Company and the Jackson Iron Company, together with the Negaunee Concentrating Company, filed their bill against the appellant, in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of Ohio. The appellant was a corporation, created under the laws of the state of Ohio, and each of the complainants was a creditor; two holding claims evidenced by notes not then due, and the other, the Negaunee Concentrating Company, holding a judgment. The prayer of the bill was for the appointment of a receiver to take charge of the property and assets of the defendant, and for such other and further relief as was proper. On the same day the defendant entered its appearance, and accepted service of notice of a motion for the appointment of a receiver; and Fayette Brown was thereupon immediately appointed receiver. On the next day subpoena was served on the defendant. On March 28th a supplemental bill was filed making other parties defendants, and on June 14th an order pro confesso was entered against all of the defendants in the original and supplemental bills. On April 23d an order was entered directing all creditors to file their claims by petition, and on October 20th nearly every creditor had appeared and filed his petition. On July 17th an order was entered appointing a special master to report on the claims of creditors, and marshal the liens thereof. Up to the 23d of November the appellant made no opposition to the proceeding, and apparently assented to the action which was being taken by the creditors, looking to the appropriation of its property to the payment of their claims. On that day a change took place in its attitude towards this suit. It went into the state courts, and confessed judgment in behalf of several of its creditors; and on the 24th deposited in the registry of the circuit court money enough to pay off the judgment in favor of the concentrating company, and filed two pleas,—one setting forth the fact of payment, and the other that the original and supplemental bills disclosed that the complainants had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law, and that therefore the court, sitting as a court of equity, had no jurisdiction; and praying a dismissal of the bills. Subsequently, on December 18th, it filed a motion to discharge the receiver. This motion was overruled, the pleas seem to have been ignored, the master reported upon the claims presented, and on February 23, 1886, the court entered a decree which, finding the indebtedness to be as stated by the master, also what property was in possession of the receiver, decreed that upon default in the payment of those debts the property be sold in satisfaction thereof. From this decree the defendant has brought this appeal, and its principal contention is that the circuit court had no jurisdiction whatever over the subject-matter of the suit, because it appeared upon the face of the bills, original and supplemental, that the complainants had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law.

As heretofore stated, the bill showed that two of the complainants held claims not yet due, and the third only a judgment, with no execution. The supplemental bill alleged that execution had, since the filing of the original bill, been issued on that judgment, and returned nulla bona. The original bill, besides disclosing the nature of complainants' claims, set forth that they were proceeding not alone in their own behalf, but in that of all other creditors, whose number was so great as to make it impossible to join them as parties. It then averred the insolvency of the defendant; that it was engaged in large and various business, manufacturing, and mining; that its plant and good-will was of great extent and value; and that it employed operatives to the number of at least 4,000; and then alleged as follows: "And your orators further say that vexatious litigation has been commenced against the said defendant, and many more such are threatened, and that such litigations are accompanied by attachments and seizures of property, and such threatened litigations will also be accompanied by attachments and seizures, and that such attachments and seizures will give to those creditors who are pursuing them undue and unfair advantage and priority over your complainants, whose claims are not yet due, and make them irreparable injury and damage; that if such litigations be further instituted and its property seized in attachment, as it already has been, there is great danger that the valuable property of the defendant will be irreparably injured, and to a great extent destroyed; and your orators say that such seizures and interference with the business and the property of the defendant would wholly destroy the value of the good-will of the company as an asset, and wholly break up its long-established business, and thereby cause detriment and irreparable injury to your orators and all other creditors. And your orators further say that, unless this court shall interfere and protect and preserve the property and assets of said defendant by putting it into the hands of a receiver, the said property will be in great danger of destruction and dissipation by the large number of operatives who would necessarily be discharged and left without work or means of obtaining it; and such operatives, by reason of the great distrust they already have, and on account of a fear that they will not in future receive remuneration, will abandon their employment, and thereby cause a stoppage of the extensive business of said defendant, to the extent that the creditors of said defendant would not be able to realize one-half of the amount upon the several claims that they would if the said business of the defendant were continued."

The appellees, while admitting the general rule to be that creditors must show that they have exhausted legal remedies before coming into a court of equity, insist that the bill disclosed a case in equity on two grounds: First, that upon the insolvency of a corporation its properties become a trust fund for the benefit of its creditors, which can be seized and disposed of by a receiver, and in equitable proceedings; and, second, that the vast interests and properties of this corporation, with their threatened disintegration through several attachment suits, justified the interference of a court of equity to preserve, for the benefit of creditors, that large value which resulted from the unity of the properties. In support of these propositions counsel cite, as especially applicable, Terry v. Anderson, 95 U. S. 628; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois M. Ry. Co., 117 U. S. 434, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809; Sage v. Railroad Co., 125 U. S. 361, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 887; Mellen v. Iron-Works, 131 U. S. 352, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 781; Barbour v. Bank, 45 Ohio St. 133, 12 N. E. Rep. 5; Rouse v. Bank, 46 Ohio St. 493, 22 N. E. Rep. 293.

But were it conceded that the bill was defective; that a demurrer must have been sustained; and that the appellant, if it had so chosen to act in the first instance, could have defended its possession, and defeated the action,—still the decree of the circuit court must be sustained. Whatever rights of objection and defense the appellant had, it lost by inaction and acquiescence. Obviously the proceedings had gone on with its consent. Immediately on filing the bill it entered its appearance; and the same day a receiver was appointed, without objection on its part. It suffered the bills to be taken pro confesso. It permitted the receiver to go on in the possession of these properties for nine months, transacting large business, entering into many contracts, and assuming large obligations, without any intimation of a lack of authority, or any objection to the proceedings. After a lapse of nine months, suddenly its policy changed; it contested where theretofore it had acquiesced. And this, not because of any restored solvency or purpose to resume business, but with the evident intent to prevent the equality among creditors which the existing equitable proceedings would secure, and to give preference to certain creditors; for clearly it was the thought of the president of the corporation, himself the owner of a large majority of its stock, whose management had wrought its financial ruin, that after the setting aside of the equitable proceedings the lien of the confessed judgments would attach, and thus those favored creditors would be preferred.

So the case stands in this attitude: The corporation was insolvent. Its extensive and scattered properties had been brought into single ownership, and so operated together that large benefit resulted in preserving the unity of ownership and operation. Disintegration was threatened through separate attacks, by different creditors, on scattered properties. The preservation of this unity, with its consequent value, and the appropriation of the properties for the benefit of all the creditors equally, were matters deserving large consideration in any proper suit. Certain creditors, acting for all, initiated proceedings looking towards this end. In such proceedings the corporation acquiesced. Substantially all of the creditors came into the proceedings. After months had passed, much business had been transacted and large responsibilities assumed, the corporation, for the benefit of a few creditors and to destroy the equality between all, comes in with the technical objection that the creditors initiating the proceedings should have taken one step more at law before coming into equity. But the maxim, "He who seeks equity must do equity," is as appropriate to the conduct of the defendant as to that of the complainant; and it would be strange if a debtor, to destroy equality and accomplish partiality, could ignore its long acquiescence, and plead an unsubstantial technicality to overthrow protracted, extensive, and costly proceedings carried on in reliance upon its consent. Surely no such imperfection attends the administration of a court of equity. Good faith and early assertion of rights are as essential on the part of the defendant as of the complainant. This matter has recently been before this court in Reynes v. Dumont, 130 U. S. 354, 395, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486, and was carefully considered, and the rule, with its limitations, thus stated: "The rule as stated in 1 Daniell's Chancery Practice, (4th Amer. Ed.) 555, is that if the objection of want of jurisdiction in equity is not taken in proper time, namely, before the defendant enters into his defense at large, the court, having the general jurisdiction, will exercise it; and, in a note on page 550, many cases are cited to establish that, 'if a defendant in a suit in equity answers and submits to the jurisdiction of the court, it is too late for him to object that the plaintiff has a plain and adequate remedy at law. This objection should be taken at the earliest opportunity. The above rule must be taken with the qualification that it is competent for the court to grant the relief sought, and that it has jurisdiction of the subject-matter.' * * * It was held in Lewis v. Cocks, 23 Wall. 466, that if the court, upon looking at the proofs, found none at all of the matters which would make a proper case for equity, it would be the duty of the court to recognize the fact, and give it effect, though not raised by the pleadings nor suggested by counsel. To the same effect is Oelrichs v. Spain, 15 Wall. 211. The doctrine of these and similar cases is that the court, for its own protection, may prevent matters purely cognizable at law from being drawn into chancery at the pleasure of the parties interested; but it by no means follows, where the subject-matter belongs to the class over which a court of equity has jurisdiction, and the objection that the complainant has an adequate remedy at law is not made until the hearing in the appellate tribunal, that the latter can exercise no discretion in the disposition of such objection. Under the circumstances of this case, it comes altogether too late, even though, if taken in limine, it might have been worthy of attention." See, also, Kilbourn v. Sunder- land, 130 U. S. 505, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 594; Union Trust Co. v. Illinois M. Ry. Co., 117 U. S. 434-468, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 809. Further comment is unnecessary. The ruling of the circuit court was correct, and its decree is therefore affirmed.

BLEAKLEY'S APPEAL.

(66 Pa. St. 187.)

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Oct. 27, 1870.

AGNEW, J. The facts of this case are few. Robert Lamberton was the owner of a judgment for $31,000, entered against Samuel P. Irvin on the 8th day of June, 1865. Irvin had purchased of F. D. Kinnear, Esq., lot No. 449 in Franklin at $2600, of which $820 only remained unpaid, and would fall due on the 6th of August, 1865, with a provision for forfeiture of the contract in case of non-payment for thirty days after it fell due. On the 19th of July, 1865, Irvin assigned his contract to James Bleakley, binding him to pay the $820 to save the forfeiture, and with the admitted understanding that Irvin should refund the $820 to Bleakley, settle his indebtedness to the bank, of which Bleakley was cashier, and that then Bleakley should reconvey to Irvin's wife. But the assignment was antedated to the 1st of May, 1865, thus overreaching Lamberton's judgment. The master finds that this was done to defraud the plaintiff. The finding is ably vindicated in the opinion of Judge Trunkley. The absolute character of the paper, though but a security, the agreement to reconvey to Irvin's wife instead of himself, and the attempt of Bleakley to use the paper to defeat the sheriff's sale of the property by Lamberton on his judgment, evince the true motive for antedating the paper.

Bleakley paid the $820 to Kinnear, and now claims a decree for this sum, before specific performance shall be decreed to Lamberton, who purchased Irvin's title at the sheriff's sale. Kinnear does not resist specific performance, but stands ready to convey to Lamberton, whenever the covinous assignment to Bleakley is put out of his way. It is Bleakley who resists the decree until he is refunded the $820, paid upon the footing of the fraudulent agreement with Irvin, to defeat Lamberton's judgment. Bleakley is made a party to the bill only for the purpose of putting aside the covinous assignment to enable Kinnear to convey to Lamberton. The question then is whether a chancellor would require Lamberton to refund the $820 to Bleakley, as a condition to setting aside the assignment and entitling Lamberton to specific performance of Kinnear.

But clearly Bleakley cannot demand repayment of Lamberton either at law or equity. And first he is not entitled to subrogation to Kinnear's rights. Subrogation is not a matter of contract but of pure equity and benevolence. Kyner v. Kyner, 6 Watts, 221; Wallace's Appeal, 5 Pa. St. 103. On what pretence, in foro conscientiae, can a party attempting to carry out a scheme of fraud against another, by a payment, claim compensation of the party he has attempted to defraud? Conscience and benevolence revolt at such an iniquity. Again Bleakley did not recognise Kinnear's title by the payment. He did not profess to bargain for it, and Kinnear did not profess to sell it to him. His act was simply a payment and no more, made by him because of Irvin's duty to pay, and accepted by Kinnear because of his right to receive from Irvin. Besides the payment was accepted by Kinnear in ignorance of the attempted fraud. There can be no legal intendment therefore of a bargain on Kinnear's part to vest his right to receive the money in Bleakley. As to Lamberton the payment by Bleakley was not only fraudulent and intended to displace his judgment, but it was also voluntary. It was not paid at Lamberton's request nor for his use and benefit; but on the contrary was intended to defeat his right, as a creditor by overlapping his judgment, by means of the covinous transfer. Bleakley is therefore neither a purchaser, nor a creditor of Lamberton, nor an object of benevolence, but is forced upon the record to compel him to put out of the way the fraudulent barrier to Kinnear's specific performance to Lamberton. He cannot, thus standing before a chancellor, ask him to make repayment to him a condition to a decree to remove the fraudulent obstruction he threw in the way. The payment is one of the very steps he took to consummate the fraud upon Lamberton. If he have a legal right of recovery he must resort to his action at law, and if he can have none, it is a test of his want of equity. And in addition to all this, it is a rule that a chancellor will not assist a party to obtain any benefit arising from a fraud. He must come into a court of equity with clean hands. It would be a singular exercise of equity, which would assist a party, who had paid money to enable him to perpetrate a fraud, to recover his money, just when the chancellor was engaged in thrusting out of the way of his doing equity to the injured party, the very instrument of the fraud. Who does iniquity shall not have equity. Hershey v. Weiting, 50 Pa. St. 244, 245.

We are therefore of opinion the court committed no error in refusing compensation, and the decree of the court below is confirmed.

KARN v. WALTON et al.

(20 N. E. 203, 46 Ohio St. 195.)

Supreme Court of Ohio. Jan. 8, 1889.

Error to circuit court, Greene county.

On the 15th day of February, 1882, Moses A. Walton commenced his action in the court of common pleas of Greene county against the plaintiff in error, Charles Kahn, Jr., and the Citizens' National Bank of Xenia, to enjoin the bank from paying two checks, one for $1,500 and the other for $500, drawn by him upon the bank in favor of Kahn. The petition alleges "that on the 14th day of February, A. D. 1882, the defendant, Charles Kahn, Jr., by fraud and misrepresentation, obtained from the plaintiff his two certain checks of that date for the sums of $1,500 and $500, respectively, drawn by him upon the Citizens' National Bank of Xenia, a corporation duly incorporated under the laws of the United States; that said checks were given and are wholly without consideration, and the plaintiff received no value therefor whatever; that defendant, Kahn, is about to present the same for collection, and the bank is about to, and will, unless restrained by the order of the court, pay the checks, which will be an irreparable injury to the plaintiff, and for which he has no adequate remedy at law; that Kahn is not a resident of said county, and has no property therein, and who is, as plaintiff is informed and believes, wholly insolvent." The petition prays "that the bank be restrained and enjoined from paying said checks, and that they may be ordered to be canceled and delivered up to the plaintiff; and for all other and further relief to which in equity he may be entitled."

At the commencement of the action, the plaintiff obtained a temporary injunction as prayed for, and on the 6th day of March amended his petition by adding to its averments the following: "That no consideration exists for said check in said petition mentioned other than certain gaming contracts entered into by said plaintiff on or about the — day of February, 1882, in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, with the said Kahn, a broker and commission merchant of said city, for the purpose of speculating in the price of wheat, pork, and lard, and which said contracts made by said Kahn were in violation of the statute of gaming, and against public policy, and were false and feigned, and by which he undertook in form to buy and sell wheat, pork, and lard for and with this plaintiff, without intending thereby either to receive or deliver said wheat, pork, or lard, but solely to wager in the market price thereof, and to pay or receive the difference between the price in the contracts and the market rates at any time during the month of March, 1882, at the option of said Kahn, whichever the same would be; that said contracts were made as a cover for gambling in the prices of wheat, pork, and lard; that no wheat, pork, or lard was actually to be delivered or received, but the difference in price only was to be paid on the one side or received on the other at any time during the said month of March, at the option of said Kahn; that in pursuance of the said gaming contracts, and in addition to the execution and delivery of said checks, this plaintiff delivered and paid to said Kahn the sum of $500; that no consideration for the payment of said sum of $500 passed to the plaintiff other than that set forth aforesaid; that the said Kahn received to the plaintiff's use said sum of $500 so lost and paid to said defendant, and said defendant, Charles Kahn, Jr., is indebted to plaintiff in the said sum of $500, with interest from the — day of February, 1882. Wherefore plaintiff prays as in his original petition, and for judgment against said defendant Kahn, for said sum of $500, with interest from February —, 1882." The temporary injunction was, on motion of the defendant, Kahn, dissolved, and the plaintiff appealed to the district court, where, on the 28th of April, 1882, the plaintiff, by leave of that court, filed another amendment to his petition, adding the following averments: "That at the time of the execution and delivery of the said checks the plaintiff had on deposit with said bank sufficient money to pay said checks; that prior to the presentation thereof said Kahn, who is insolvent, by his agent, made inquiry of said other defendant as to whether said checks were good and would be paid on presentation; to which inquiry said bank made answer that said checks were good, and would be paid, and said bank claims to have certified to said checks, and bound itself thereby to pay the same; that prior to the filing of the petition herein, and the allowance of said restraining order, this plaintiff requested and notified said bank not to pay said checks; but said bank refused said request, and threatened to, and will, unless restrained, pay said checks."

The defendant, Kahn, then answered, admitting "the corporate character of said bank; that said Kahn was about to present said checks for collection; his non-residence; that plaintiff had said money on deposit in said bank; said inquiries whether said checks would be honored, and the response of said bank that they would; that said bank claims to have certified the same, and bound itself to pay the same, and said notification to said bank not to pay the same, and the refusal of said bank; that a contract was made between said Kahn and plaintiff for the sale of property; that sales were made, and $500.00 cash and said checks were paid thereon. But said Kahn denies each and every other allegation of said petition."

The record shows that at the April term, 1884, of the district court the cause was by consent of the parties submitted to the court upon the pleadings and evidence, and the court found the equities of the case in favor of the plaintiff and against said defendant, Kahn, made the injunction perpetual, and adjudged the costs against Kahn. A motion for a new trial, filed by Kahn, was overruled, and a bill of exceptions was duly taken, containing all the testimony given on the trial of the cause. It also appears in the bill of exceptions that at the close of the testimony the defendant, Kahn, requested the court to find the facts, and state its conclusions of law and of fact separately, and also to find "the following conclusions of fact: (1) Whether there was any agreement between the plaintiff and Charles Kahn, Jr., that the property purchased should not be delivered; but that simply the difference, if any, between the price at which the property was purchased and the price at which it should rule in March, 1882, should be paid. (2) Whether Charles Kahn, Jr., N. B. Ream & Co., or the persons of whom the property was purchased in January, 1882, intended that it should not be delivered, and that simply the difference, if any, between the price at which it should rule in March, 1882, and the price at which it was purchased should be paid, and who so intended. (3) Whether the court finds that simply the difference was to be paid, and no property delivered, from the circumstances of the transaction, and, if so, what are the circumstances upon which said finding is predicated? (4) Whether the price of said property on the Chicago Board of Trade, in March, 1882, was more or less than the purchase price in January, 1882, and, if less, how much less. (5) Whether, by the terms of the contract between the plaintiff and Kahn, or by reason of notice to plaintiff, Kahn was justified in selling said property on March 1, 1882. (6) Whether the persons of whom the property was purchased in January, 1882, or their brokers, N. B. Ream & Co., had the property on hand ready to deliver on March 1, 1882, and whether they gave Kahn notice, and whether Kahn gave plaintiff notice of their readiness to deliver the property, and that it would be sold March 1, 1882, if plaintiff would not take it. (7) Upon whom the court finds the burden of proof rests to establish the character of the transaction; whether it was or was not a gambling transaction. (8) Whether Charles Kahn, Jr., was simply a broker, agent, and employé of plaintiff in causing the purchase and sale of said property on commission, without any interest in the profit or loss in the transaction." And it further appears from the bill of exceptions that the court, in response to the foregoing request, found as follows:

"Answer to Requests 1 and 2. We find that the transactions in which the parties were engaged were mere speculations or ventures on the future prices of the products named in the pleadings, without any intention on the part of Walton, Kahn, or Ream & Co. that the property would be either paid for or delivered, but that the intention was that settlements between buyer and seller would be made on the differences between the market prices at the date named for delivery and the prices named in the contracts; that this was understood by all parties interested in the deals; that the same were gambling transactions, and illegal.

"Answer to Request 3. We find the foregoing facts from all the circumstances in the case and surrounding the transactions, and particularly from the fact that if any inquiry had been made it would have developed the fact that Walton was wholly unable to pay one-fourth the amount of the price of the property ostensibly purchased, (being $43,000,) and that in fact said Walton was not worth over $3,000 or $4,000 at the time.

"Answer to Requests 4 and 5. We find that in March, 1882, the price of property embraced in the deals mentioned had declined to an extent that absorbed the margins put up, and that, under the rules of the Board of Trade of Chicago, Kahn was justified in selling whatever interest Walton had in any property under his (Kahn's) control; but we have not regarded this as an important fact in the case.

"Answer to Request 6. We find it probable that Ream & Co. had control of an amount of property equal in bulk and quality to that named in the several contracts, and could have delivered it on demand March 1, 1882; but we further find that in said deals they had no intention of so delivering it, nor had Kahn any intention of receiving it. Ream & Co. gave Kahn notice, and Kahn gave Walton notice, of their readiness to deliver the property, and that it would be sold March 1st if plaintiff did not take it; but this was done after the commencement of this suit, and with knowledge that it would not be so taken by plaintiff.

"Answer to Request 7. Upon the plaintiff.

"Answer to Request 8. Kahn was, as between plaintiff and defendant, a broker agent, interested only to the amount of his commissions.

"We further find that after the checks named in the pleadings were delivered to Kahn, a bank in Cincinnati telegraphed the Citizens' National Bank of Xenia as follows: 'Are M. A. Walton's checks for $2,000 good?' To which said Citizens' Bank sent an answer as follows: 'Yes, sir.' We find that this does not amount to 'certifying' the checks, and the Citizens' Bank did not thereby become bound to the holders of the checks for the amounts. We find that the contract was not executed by the giving of the checks, and that by enjoining the payment of the checks we simply stop the carrying out of a gambling contract, and thereby leave the parties where we find them."

Judgment having been rendered against

Kahn, as before stated, he prosecutes error to this court to reverse the same, upon the grounds that the conclusions of law are not supported by the facts found, and the evidence does not sustain the finding of facts.

Jordan & Jordan, for plaintiff in error.
John Little, for defendants in error.

WILLIAMS, J. The evidence tends to prove the facts found by the district court, and as this court is not required to determine the weight of the evidence, the facts so found will, in the disposition of the case, be regarded as established by the evidence. The case shown by these facts, and those admitted by the pleadings, is that Kahn was a commission broker in Cincinnati, doing business with and for Ream & Co., brokers and commission merchants in Chicago, and bought of or through them wheat and pork for future delivery, so called, on Walton's account. The transactions were mere speculations or ventures on the prices of the commodities named, without any intention on the part of the parties concerned that the property should either be delivered or paid for; but all the parties understood and intended that settlements should be made between them, on the differences between the market prices, at the dates fixed for delivery, and those named in the contracts. Kahn was to have a commission for his services, and he advanced margins on the deals. Walton was loser, and drew his two checks, amounting to $2,000, on the bank where he had funds, payable to Kahn, for moneys paid by him on the deals and losses. Walton also paid Kahn $500 in money on the same account. Kahn telegraphed to the bank, inquiring if Walton's checks for the amount of those drawn to him were good, and received an affirmative answer. Walton notified the bank not to pay the checks, and before their presentation brought his action to enjoin their payment.

1. Upon this state of the case, the first inquiry naturally is, were the speculative transactions in which the parties engaged in the nature of wagers, and, for that reason, illegal? In the determination of this question it is not deemed material whether they fall within the provisions of our statutes against gaming and wagering, or do not; for it is generally held in this country that wagering contracts, though not prohibited by statute, are illegal, and void as against public policy, and the great weight of authority is to the effect that contracts of the kind the district court found those involved in this case to be are void as wagering agreements. This has been held by the courts of last resort in every state where the question has been presented, and by the supreme court of the United States. The rule generally accepted is that contracts for the sale of personal property to be delivered in the future are valid if the parties really intend and agree that the property is to be delivered by the seller, and the price is to be paid by the purchaser, though the seller has not the goods, nor any other means of getting them, than to go into the market and buy them. But if the real intent be merely to speculate on the rise and fall of prices, and the goods are not to be delivered, but one party is to pay to the other the difference between the contract price and the market price of the goods at the date fixed for executing the contract, then the contract partakes of the nature of a wager, and is void. Irwin v. Williar, 110 U. S. 499, 4 Sup. Ct. 160; Higgins v. McCrear, 116 U. S. 671, 6 Sup. Ct. 557; Mann v. Bishop, 136 Mass. 495; Gregory v. Wendell, 40 Mich. 432; Cole v. Milmine, 88 Ill. 349; Kingsbury v. Kirwan, 77 N. Y. 612; Lowry v. Dillman, 59 Wis. 197, 18 N. W. 4.

2. The facts found by the district court plainly define Kahn's relation to the unlawful agreements. He was directly connected with them, and, with full knowledge of their character, performed services and expended money to promote and forward them. It was his intention, as well as the intention of the other parties, that the property should not be delivered or paid for, but that the differences in the prices should be adjusted in money. It is true, Kahn was the broker, and had no pecuniary interest in the business except his commissions, and the repayment of whatever sums he might advance for margins, and to pay losses as the business progressed. He, nevertheless, negotiated the wagering contracts, and was party to them. The legal effect of such relation to contracts of that nature was determined in the case of Irwin v. Williar, supra. The conclusion of the court is thus stated: "In Rountree v. Smith, 108 U. S. 269, 2 Sup. Ct. 630, it was said that brokers who had negotiated such contracts, suing, not on the contracts themselves, but for services performed, and money advanced for defendant, at his request, though they might, under some circumstances, be so connected with the immorality of the contract as to be affected by it, they are not in the same position as a party sued for the enforcement of the original agreement. It is certainly true that a broker might negotiate such a contract without being privy to the illegal intent of the principal parties to it, which renders it void; and in such case, being innocent of any violation of law, and not suing to enforce an unlawful contract, has a meritorious ground for the recovery of compensation for services and advances. But we are also of the opinion that when the broker is privy to the unlawful design of the parties, and brings them together for the very purpose of entering into an illegal agreement, he is particeps criminis, and cannot recover for services rendered or losses incurred by himself on behalf of either in forwarding the transaction." We accept this as a sound and wholesome rule, and under its operation the checks given by Walton to Kahn for services rendered and losses paid by him in the unlawful enterprise are tainted with the vice of their origin, and are subject to all the infirmities of securities given for illegal considerations.

3. It is contended that the drawing of the checks by Walton on the bank, where he had sufficient funds to pay them, and the bank's response to the inquiry of Kahn's agent that checks to their amount were good, was a specific appropriation of the funds, and amounted to payment of the debt for which they were drawn, whereby the contract became fully executed. A check, being simply a written order of a depositor to his banker to make a certain payment out of his funds, is executory, and, of course, revocable at any time before the bank has paid it or committed itself to its payment. It operates, it is true, as an assignment of the fund on which it is drawn pro tanto, and binds the bank to its payment out of the fund when presented, unless revoked; but it is not itself payment of the debt for which it is drawn, unless it be so agreed between the parties. Ordinarily it is only a means of payment, and the debt is not extinguished unless and until the check be paid, or the holder be guilty of laches, which may operate as a discharge of the drawer. The bank is the agent of the drawer. Its duty is to pay his money as he directs. It owes no duty to the holder except under the drawer's directions, until, by virtue of those directions, it assumes some obligation to the holder. Up to that time the latest order from the drawer governs. But after the bank has paid the check, or placed itself under an obligation to pay it, the drawer's power of revocation is ended. This obligation may be incurred by acceptance. It is sometimes said that the legal effect of the acceptance is to place the holder of the check in the position of a depositor. By the acceptance a new and specific engagement is entered into by the bank; which is to unconditionally pay the sum named to the legal holder of the check. The acceptance or certification is sometimes evidenced by writing the word "good" on the check by the authorized officer or agent of the bank; but no particular mode or form is necessary, and it is generally held that a verbal acceptance is sufficient. But whatever the word or form employed, there must be enough to indicate the acceptance of the particular check.

It is manifest there was no acceptance or certification of the checks in question in this case. The telegraphic correspondence between the bank and Kahn's agent amounted to no more than an assurance that valid checks to the amount stated, drawn by Walton, or that might be drawn by him, were then good. No particular checks were mentioned in the inquiry, nor any intimation given that the inquirer had received, or was about to receive, such checks; nor had the bank any means of identifying the checks to which the inquiry related. Its telegram, therefore, did not commit the bank to the payment of any particular check. At most it was information that Walton had, at its date, money on deposit to the amount stated, subject to check. Espy v. Bank, 18 Wall. 604. If, therefore, before the checks were presented for payment, and before they were certified or accepted by the bank, or it otherwise became committed to their payment, Walton revoked them, and notified the bank not to pay them, as he claims, and as the district court found he did, his defensive remedy at law would appear to be adequate.

4. But what standing has the plaintiff in a court of equity? The transactions upon which he founds his claim for relief were unlawful, and the remedy he seeks is protection against the consequences of his own participation in them. In such cases equity keeps its hands off, and leaves the parties where it finds them. It is a fundamental rule of equity that parties wanting its aid must come with clean hands. Courts of equity require honesty, good faith, and legality in transactions between men, and if a party would pursue his remedy therein, his demand must not rest on a violation of law for its foundation, or arise from his own illegal acts, or conduct contra bonos mores. 1 Wait, Act. & Def. 153; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 685. It was said by Lord Mansfield, in Holman v. Johnson, Cowp. 341, that "no court will lend its aid to a man who founds his cause of action upon an immoral or illegal act. If, from the plaintiff's own stating, or otherwise, the cause of action appears to arise ex turpi causa, or the transgression of a positive law of this country, there the court says he has no right to be assisted. It is upon that ground the court goes, not for the sake of the defendant, but because they will not lend their aid to such a plaintiff. So, if the plaintiff and defendant were to change sides, and the defendant was to bring his action against the plaintiff, the latter would then have the advantage of it; for where both are equally in fault, potior est conditio defendentis." In Atwood v. Fisk, 101 Mass. 363, which was a bill in equity to compel the surrender and cancellation of a note, and mortgage given to secure its payment, on the ground that the consideration for them was illegal, the court, in denying the relief sought by the bill, declares it to have long been settled "that the law will not aid either party to an illegal contract to enforce it against the other; neither will it relieve a party to such a contract who has actually fulfilled it, and who seeks to reclaim his money or whatever articles of property he may have applied to such a purpose. The meaning of the familiar maxim in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis is simply that the law leaves the parties exactly where they stand; not that it prefers the defendant to the plaintiff, but that it will not recognize a right of action founded on the illegal contract in favor of either party against the other. They must settle their own questions in such cases without the aid of the courts." The statement of the rule by Chancellor Walworth, in Harrington v. Bigelow, 11 Paige, 349, may be applied directly to this case. He says: "Where both parties have been engaged in an illegal transaction, the court will not lend its active aid to the one party to get rid of the securities taken upon the illegal transaction, nor will it aid the other party in retaining them, but will leave both to their strict technical rights."

In Weakley v. Watkins, 7 Humph. 356, it is held that "no court of chancery will entertain a bill to cancel an obligation, the consideration of which was a violation of chastity, compounding a felony, smuggling of goods, gaming, false swearing, or the commission of any crime, or a breach of good morals." This was a bill in chancery filed by Weakley against Watkins and Ferguson to obtain the cancellation of a note under seal executed upon a gaming consideration. A demurrer was filed to the bill, and the court in the opinion says: "It is true that a court of chancery, upon the principle of quia timet, will order said instruments to be delivered up and canceled. But this is when the complainant has been imposed upon, and executed an instrument void for fraud, accident, mistake, or other cause, which renders it iniquitous and unjust that it should be enforced against him, and when, in the execution of it, he has himself been guilty of no violation of law or good morals. But this principle has never been held applicable to instruments knowingly executed in violation of good morals or express prohibition, either by common or statute law. For instance, no court of chancery will entertain a bill to cancel an obligation, the consideration of which was a violation of chastity, compounding a felony, the smuggling of goods in violation of the revenue law, gaming, false swearing, etc.; and this for very obvious reasons. The complainant shall not be permitted to charge himself with crime, and obtain relief out of it; and because public policy requires that the execution of all such contracts shall be discouraged, which cannot be more effectually done than by repelling all actions upon them in courts of justice. In contracts of the kind now under consideration we have held that they are inoperative, and void, as contrary to good morals and positive enactment, and that, as such, they are not fit subjects for the action of a court. It is true that in the cases we have heretofore had the attempt has been to enforce them, but we can see no difference in the position of the winner and loser, so far as to their right in becoming active movers upon such contracts in the courts; the one seeking to enforce them by the judgment of a court of law, the other seeking by the aid of a court of chancery to have them delivered up and canceled. They are equally repelled upon reason and authority."

It was said by this court, in Roll v. Raguet, 4 Ohio, 400, that "whenever an agreement appears to be illegal, immoral, or against public policy, a court of justice leaves the parties as it finds them. If the agreement be executed, the court will not rescind it; if executory, the court will not aid in its execution." This was again held in Raguet v. Roll, 7 Ohio, pt. 1, p. 77. And see Raguet v. Roll, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 70. The doctrine of these cases has recently been approved and enforced by this court. McQuade v. Rosecrans, 36 Ohio St. 442; Williams v. Englebrecht, 37 Ohio St. 383. And in Thomas v. Cronise, 16 Ohio, 54, it is laid down as "a universal principle both in law and equity that where an agreement is founded upon a consideration illegal, immoral, or against public policy, a court will leave the parties where it finds them." In Hooker v. De Palos, 28 Ohio St. 251, the same doctrine is announced in the following language: "The maxim 'Ex turpi causa non oritur actio' is an old and familiar one, resting on the clearest principles of public policy, and never to be ignored. In accordance with this maxim nothing is better settled than that, in regard to contracts, which are entered into for fraudulent or illegal purposes, the law will aid neither party to enforce them while they remain executory, either in whole or in part, nor, when executed, will it aid either party to place himself in statu quo by a rescission, but will in both cases leave the parties where it finds them. It is true that particular statutes have been from time to time enacted in this state as well as in many of our sister states, which are to some extent in contravention of this common-law doctrine. The statutes of this state which allow money won by gaming or betting to be recovered back by the loser, furnish an example of this kind. But such statutes are a recognition of the established rule that no recovery could be had in such cases at common law. They are exceptional in their character, are in derogation of the common law, and therefore are to be construed strictly, and not extended by implication beyond the particular cases of illegality for which they provide." The statutes adverted to change the common law so far as to give the loser the right to recover back what he has lost, and provide a remedy therefor, but no further. In all other respects the common law governs. Whether the statutes have any application to contracts like those under discussion need not now be decided, for if it be granted that they have, yet, since they make no provision for equitable actions for injunctions, the right to such remedy must be determined by considerations independent of the statutory regulations. Veach v. Elliott, 1 Ohio St. 139; Thomas v. Cronise, 16 Ohio, 54.

The legislature, apparently recognizing the inapplicability of the statutes theretofore in force to such contracts and transactions, enacted that of May 4, 1885, (82 Ohio Laws, p. 254,) which declares all contracts for the sale of grain, provisions, and other specified articles, when there is no intention to deliver or pay for the articles sold, to be void, and makes them gambling and criminal acts. This statute, having been passed after the contracts between the parties were made, of course cannot affect the decision of the case, and, if it were otherwise, they do not confer upon the plaintiff the right to maintain the action prosecuted by him. Precisely what effect has been given the English statutes in the decisions of the courts of that country upon this subject is not very clear. It is, nevertheless, true that parties to gaming securities were expressly authorized by statute to go into chancery for discovery, which gave ground for the application of the familiar rule that courts of chancery, having jurisdiction for one purpose, will retain the case for final relief. In the case of Rawden v. Shadwell, 1 Amb. 268, which was a bill for discovery and cancellation, the report states: "Lord Hardwicke decreed with great clearness, and said that by St. 9 Anne all securities for money won at play are made void. Consequently the payment under any such security cannot be supported." And Baker v. Williams is referred to in the report as an authority for the decree. In the note to the case it is said that the statute of 9 Anne "gives leave to come into a court of chancery for discovery;" and Sir J. Jekyll, M. R., in the note, citing Baker v. Williams, said: "And if it [the note] was put in suit at law, no doubt but the party might make a defense against it under the act; but that is no objection against coming into this court, [chancery,] for the person giving the note is entitled to a discovery here. It could not be the intention of the legislature that, after the discovery, he should be sent to another court for relief. So it is that upon the discovery of assets the court grants relief without sending the party to law." And it may be noticed that in Woodson v. Barrett, 2 Hen. & M. 88, the supreme court of Virginia followed Rawden v. Shadwell, under a statute which was an exact copy of 9 Anne, except that the word "contract" was inserted in it, which was omitted in the statute of Anne. And the case is followed by the same court in Skipwith v. Strother, 3 Rand. (Va.) 216. In this respect the statute of Anne differs essentially from ours. The only actions provided for by our statute are the purely legal ones to recover back the money lost, and for the conversion of the goods won of the plaintiff. No suit in equity is authorized or contemplated. The provision of the statute that the plaintiff may annex to his petition in the legal actions it permits interrogatories for discovery at once removes the necessity and cause for recourse to equity, and the statute which created the right having especially prescribed the legal remedies mentioned, and none other, they must be deemed exclusive. It cannot be denied, however, the courts have differed in the application of these kindred maxims, "ex turpi causa non oritur actio," and "in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis;" especially to gaming securities, which, it has been held by some courts, are so far excepted from the operation of the maxims that equity will decree them to be surrendered and canceled. The reasons given for so holding are that "the circulation of gaming bonds is no less to be discountenanced than the giving of them, and no means are more likely to prevent the giving of them than to put an effectual stop to their circulation;" and that because the losers are permitted to defend against securities given by them, on the ground that they were given for a gaming consideration, courts of equity should entertain suits for their cancellation.

These appear to be arguments not so much in favor of the asserted exception as against the maxims themselves, for it is apparent that the same reasoning would, in the same measure, exclude from their operation every contract and security founded upon any other illegal consideration. The circulation of all bonds and securities given for any illegal or immoral consideration is quite as much to be discountenanced as the giving of them,—gaming bonds and securities, no more than others; and if putting a stop to the circulation of gaming bonds, by a resort to a court of equity to compel their surrender and cancellation, be the most effective means of preventing the giving of them, then the same means should be permitted and adopted, and for the same reason, to accomplish the same end, with regard to bonds and securities given for any other illegal consideration. And if because parties may defend against securities given by them, on the ground that they were given for a gaming consideration, is a valid reason why a court of equity should entertain a suit for the cancellation of such securities, it is an equally valid reason why that court should entertain suits for the cancellation of instruments founded upon any other illegal consideration; for such consideration may also be made a ground of defense to them. Such is the logical result of the argument in favor of the exception contended for; and some English cases have gone to that extent. In Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 Brown, Ch. 547, Lord Chancellor Thurlow is reported to have said "that in all cases where money was paid for an unlawful purpose, the party, though particeps criminis, might recover at law, and that the reason was that if courts of justice mean to prevent the perpetration of crimes it must be not by allowing a man who has got possession to remain in possession, but by putting the parties back to the state in which they were before." But Mr. Justice Story, referring to the words of the lord chancellor, says: "This is pushing the doctrine to an extravagant extent, and effectually subverting the maxim 'in pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis.' The ground of reasoning upon which his lordship proceeded is exceedingly questionable in itself, and the suppression of illegal contracts is far more likely in general to be accomplished by leaving the parties without remedy against each other, and by thus introducing a preventive check naturally connected with a want of confidence, and a sole reliance upon personal honor. And so, accordingly, the modern doctrine is established." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 298. The difference between the earlier cases and the current authorities on the subject is pointed out in the following note to this section: "I say at present, for there has been considerable fluctuation of opinion, both in courts of law and equity, on this subject. The old cases often gave relief, both at law and in equity, where the party would otherwise derive an advantage from his iniquity. But the modern doctrine has adopted a more severely just, and, probably, politic, moral rule, which is to leave the parties where it finds them, giving no relief and no countenance to claims of this sort." Mr. Bispham, in his Principles of Equity, (section 223,) says: "The rule, both at law and in equity, in regard to gambling transactions, now seems to be that the courts will not only refuse to lend their aid for the purpose of enforcing such contracts, but they will not assist the losing party in setting the contract aside, or recovering back the money paid. The maxim applicable to such cases is potior est conditio possidentis." The opinion of the supreme court of Massachusetts, in the case of Atwood v. Fisk, before cited, is to the same effect. It is there stated as the prevailing doctrine that "the suppression of illegal contracts is far more likely in general to be accomplished by leaving the parties without remedy against each other; and so the modern doctrine is established that relief is not granted where the parties are in pari delicto." A review of all the authorities would occupy much space and be of little practical value.

The test for determining when the objection that the parties are in pari delicto can be sustained is whether the plaintiff can make out his case otherwise than through the medium and by the aid of the illegal transaction to which he was himself a party, and, when applied to this case, is conclusive against the plaintiff. He asserts that he knowingly entered into an unlawful engagement; one contrary to good morals and against public policy. He entered into it with knowledge that either he or the other party must lose, and with the intention of reaping the fruits of his unlawful venture, if he should prove to be the winner. His expectations were disappointed. He lost, paid part of the loss, and, for the purpose of making further payment, drew his check on a bank in which he had sufficient funds on deposit to pay them. These checks he delivered to the winner, or his agent, and, having gone thus far, he appeals to a court of equity to interfere in his behalf, and interpose its extraordinary aid by injunction to stop their payment. After he lost, he might have refused further to act, and still be safe, and if, by giving the checks, the other party has acquired an advantage over him, it results from his voluntary act on the executor of his illegal enterprise. We fail to perceive how to relieve parties in cases like this from the consequences in which their own wrongful conduct has involved them would tend to discourage such adventures, promote good morals, increase respect for the law, or accord with a sound public policy.

In reaching this conclusion, we have not overlooked the rule that a party who advances money upon an undertaking or agreement to do an act that is illegal, immoral, or against public policy, may, at any time before the wrongful act is done, and while the agreement or undertaking remains wholly unexecuted, repent and retract. He may wholly rescind the contract, prevent the act from being done, and recover back. The law encourages such repentance and abandonment of the unlawful undertaking, and will aid the party, because it tends to prevent wrongdoing. But to be efficacious the repentance must be timely, and it comes too late after the unlawful act has been done, and the undertaking in whole or in part performed. Then the law will assist neither party in its further execution, nor to undo what has been done in its execution. Hooker v. De Palos, 28 Ohio St. 251.

Judgment reversed and petition dismissed.

MINSHALL and SPEAR, JJ., dissent.

CRAIG v. LESLIE.

(3 Wheat. 563-576.)

Supreme Court of the United States. 1818.

Robert Craig's will contained the following clause: "I give and bequeath to my brother, Thomas Craig, of Baith parish, Ayrshire, Scotland, all the proceeds of my estate, both real and personal, which I have herein directed to be sold, to be remitted to him, according as the payments are made." Thomas Craig being an alien, the question was, could he take the proceeds of this land, which had been devised to one Leslie, in trust, the proceeds from the sale of which were to be paid to him?

Mr. Justice WASHINGTON delivered the opinion of the court. The incapacity of an alien to take, and to hold beneficially, a legal or equitable estate in real property, is not disputed by the counsel for the plaintiff; and it is admitted by the counsel for the state of Virginia, that this incapacity does not extend to personal estate. The only inquiry, then, which this court has to make is, whether the above clause in the will of Robert Craig is to be construed, under all the circumstances of this case, as a bequest to Thomas Craig of personal property, or as a devise of the land itself.

Were this a new question, it would seem extremely difficult to raise a doubt respecting it. The common sense of mankind would determine, that a devise of money, the proceeds of land directed to be sold, is a devise of money, notwithstanding it is to arise out of land; and that a devise of land, which a testator by his will directs to be purchased, will pass an interest in the land itself, without regard to the character of the fund out of which the purchase is to be made.

¹ The settled doctrine of the courts of equity corresponds with this obvious construction of wills, as well as of other instruments, whereby land is directed to be turned into money, or money into land, for the benefit of those for whose use the conversion is intended to be made. In the case of Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Brown, Ch. 497, the master of the rolls says, that "nothing is better established than this principle, that money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and land directed to be sold and turned into money, are to be considered as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted, and this, in whatever manner the direction is given." He adds, "the owner of the fund, or the contracting parties, may make land money or money land. The cases establish this rule universally." This declaration is well warranted by the cases to which the master of the rolls refers, as well as by many others. See Doughty v. Bull, 2 P. Wms. 320; Yates v. Compton, Id. 308; Trelawney v. Booth, 2 Atk. 307.

¹ Equity considers land, directed to be sold and converted into money, as money; and money directed to be employed in the purchase of land as land.

The principle upon which the whole of this doctrine is founded is, that a court of equity, regarding the substance, and not the mere forms and circumstances of agreements and other instruments, considers things directed or agreed to be done, as having been actually performed, where nothing has intervened which ought to prevent a performance. This qualification of the more concise and general rule, that equity considers that to be done which is agreed to be done, will comprehend the cases which come under this head of equity.

² Thus, where the whole beneficial interest in the money in the one case, or in the land in the other, belongs to the person for whose use it is given, a court of equity will not compel the trustee to execute the trust against the wishes of the cestui que trust, but will permit him to take the money or the land, if he elect to do so before the conversion has actually been made; and this election he may make, as well by acts or declarations, clearly indicating a determination to that effect, as by application to a court of equity. It is this election, and not the mere right to make it, which changes the character of the estate so as to make it real or personal, at the will of the party entitled to the beneficial interest.

If this election be not made in time to stamp the property with a character different from that which the will or other instrument gives it, the latter accompanies it, with all its legal consequences, into the hands of those entitled to it in that character. ³ So that in case of the death of the cestui que trust, without having determined his election, the property will pass to his heirs or personal representatives, in the same manner as it would have done had the trust been executed, and the conversion actually made in his lifetime.

In the case of Kirkman v. Milles, 13 Ves. 338, which was a devise of real estate to trustees upon trust to sell, and the moneys arising as well as the rents and profits till the sale, to be equally divided between the testator's three daughters, A. B. and C. The estate was, upon the death of A. B. and C., considered and treated as personal property, notwithstanding the cestui que trusts, after the death of the testator, had entered upon,

² Where the whole beneficial interest in the land in one case, or in the money in the other, belongs to the person for whose use it is given, a court of equity will permit the cestui que trust to take the money or land at his election, if he elect before the conversion is made.

³ But if the cestui que trust die, without having determined his election, the property will pass to his heirs or personal representatives, in the same manner as it would have done if the conversion had been made, and the trust executed in his lifetime.

and occupied the land for about two years prior to their deaths; but no steps had been taken by them, or by the trustees, to sell, nor had any requisition to that effect been made by the former to the latter. The master of the rolls was of opinion, that the occupation of the land for two years was too short to presume an election. He adds: "The opinion of Lord Rosslyn, that property was to be taken as it happened to be at the death of the party from whom the representative claims, had been much doubted by Lord Eldon, who held that without some act, it must be considered as being in the state in which it ought to be; and that Lord Rosslyn's rule was new, and not according to the prior cases."

The same doctrine is laid down and maintained in the case of Edwards v. Countess of Warwick, 2 P. Wms. 171, which was a covenant on marriage to invest £10,000, part of the lady's fortune, in the purchase of land in fee, to be settled on the husband for life, remainder to his first and every other son in tail male, remainder to the husband in fee. The only son of this marriage having died without issue, and intestate, and the investment of the money not having been made during his life, the chancellor decided that the money passed to the heir at law; that it was in the election of the son to have made this money, or to have disposed of it as such, and that, therefore, even his parol disposition of it would have been regarded; but that something to determine the election must be done.

⁴ This doctrine, so well established by the cases which have been referred to, and by many others which it is unnecessary to mention, seems to be conclusive upon the question which this court is called upon to decide, and would render any farther investigation of it useless, were it not for the case of Roper v. Radcliffe, which was cited, and mainly relied upon, by the counsel for the state of Virginia.

The short statement of that case is as follows: John Roper conveyed all his lands to trustees and their heirs, in trust, to sell the same, and out of the proceeds, and of the rents and profits till sale, to pay certain debts, and the overplus or the money to be paid as he, the said John Roper, by his will or otherwise, should appoint, and for want of such appointment, for the benefit of the said John Roper, and his heirs. By his will reciting the said deed, and the power reserved to him in the surplus of the said real estate, he bequeathed several pecuniary legacies, and then gave the residue of his real and personal estate to William Constable and Thomas Radcliffe, and two others, and to their heirs. By a codicil to this will, he bequeathed other pecuniary legacies; and the remainder, whether in lands or personal estate, he gave to the said W. C. and T. R.

Upon a bill filed by W. C. and T. R. against the heir at law of John Roper, and the other trustees, praying to have the trust executed, and the residue of the money arising from the sale of the lands to be paid over to them; the heir at law opposed the execution of the trust, and claimed the land as a resulting trust, upon the ground of the incapacity of Constable and Radcliffe to take, they being papists. The decree of the court of chancery, which was in favour of the papists, was, upon appeal to the house of lords, reversed, and the title of the heir at law sustained; six judges against five, being in his favour.

Without stating at large the opinion upon which the reversal took place, this court will proceed, 1st. To examine the general principles laid down in that opinion; and then, 2d. The case itself, so far as it has been pressed upon us as an authority to rule the question before the court.

In performing the first part of this undertaking, it will not be necessary to question any one of the premises laid down in that opinion. They are, 1. That land devised to trustees, to sell for payment of debts and legacies, is to be deemed as money. This is the general doctrine established by all the cases referred to in the preceding part of this opinion. ⁵ 2. That the heir at law has a resulting trust in such land, so far as it is of value, after the debts and legacies are paid, and that he may come into equity and restrain the trustee from selling more than is necessary to pay the debt and legacies; or he may offer to pay them himself, and pray to have a conveyance of the part of the land not sold in the first case, and the whole in the latter, which property will, in either case, be land, and not money. This right to call for a conveyance is very correctly styled a privilege, and it is one which a court of equity will never refuse, unless there are strong reasons for refusing it. The whole of this doctrine proceeds upon a principle which is incontrovertible, that where the testator merely directs the real estate to be converted into money, for the purposes directed in his will, so much of the estate, or the money arising from it, as is not effectually disposed of by the will, (whether it arise from some omission or defect in the will itself, or from any subsequent accident, which prevents the devise from taking effect,) results to the heir at law, as the old

⁵ Land, devised to trustees, to sell for payment of debts and legacies, is to be deemed as money.

The heir at law has a resulting trust in such lands, after the debts and legacies are paid, and may come into equity and restrain the trustee from selling more than sufficient to pay them, or may offer to pay them himself, and pray a conveyance of the part of the land not sold in the first case, and the whole in the latter, which property in either case will be land, and not money.

⁴ The case of Roper v. Radcliffe, 9 Mod. 167, examined.

use not disposed of. Such was the case of Cruse v. Barley, 3 P. Wms. 20, where the testator having two sons, A. and B., and three daughters, devised his lands to be sold to pay his debts, &c., and as to the moneys arising by the sale, after debts paid, gave £200 to A. the eldest son, at the age of 21, and the residue to his four younger children. A. died before the age of 21, in consequence of which the bequest to him failed to take effect. The court decided that the £200 should be considered as land to descend to the heir at law of the testator, because it was in effect the same as if so much land as was of the value of £200 was not directed to be sold, but was suffered to descend. The case of Ackroyd v. Smithson, 1 Brown, Ch. 503, is one of the same kind, and establishes the same principle. So, likewise, a money provision under a marriage contract, to arise out of land, which did not take effect, on account of the death of the party for whose benefit it was intended, before the time prescribed, resulted as money to the grantor, so as to pass under a residuary clause in his will. Hewitt v. Wright, 1 Brown, Ch. Cas. 86.

⁶ But even in cases of resulting trusts, for the benefit of the heir at law, it is settled that if the intent of the testator appears to have been to stamp upon the proceeds of the land described to be sold, the quality of personalty, not only to subserve the particular purposes of the will, but to all intents, the claim of the heir at law to a resulting trust is defeated, and the estate is considered to be personal. This was decided in the case of Yates v. Compton, 2 P. Wms. 308, in which the chancellor says, that the intention of the will was to give away all from the heir, and to turn the land into personal estate, and that that was to be taken as it was at the testator's death, and ought not to be altered by any subsequent accident, and decreed the heir to join in the sale of the land, and the money arising therefrom to be paid over as personal estate to the representatives of the annuitant, and to those of the residuary legatee. In the case of Fletcher v. Ashburner, before referred to, the suit was brought by the heir at law of the testator, against the personal representatives and the trustees claiming the estate upon the ground of a resulting trust. But the court decreed the property, as money, to the personal representatives of him to whom the beneficial interest in the money was bequeathed, and the master of the rolls observes, that the case of Emblin v. Freeman, and Cruse v. Barley, are those where real estate being directed to be sold, some part of the disposition has failed, and the thing devised has not accrued to the representative, or devisee, by which something has resulted to the heir at law.

⁶ But if the intent of the testator appears to have been to stamp upon the proceeds of the land directed to be sold, the quality of personalty, not only for the particular purposes of the will, but to all intents, the claim of the heir at law to a resulting trust is defeated, and the estate is considered to be personal.

It is evident, therefore, from a view of the above cases, that the title of the heir to a resulting trust can never arise, except when something is left undisposed of, either by some defect in the will, or by some subsequent lapse, which prevents the devise from taking effect; and not even then, if it appears that the intention of the testator was to change the nature of the estate from land to money, absolutely and entirely, and not merely to serve the purposes of the will. But the ground upon which the title of the heir rests is, that whatever is not disposed remains to him, and partakes of the old use, as if it had not been directed to be sold.

The third proposition laid down in the case of Roper v. Radcliffe, 9 Mod. 167, is, that equity will extend the same privilege to the residuary legatee which is allowed to the heir, to pay the debts and legacies, and call for a conveyance of the real estate, or to restrain the trustees from selling more than is necessary to pay the debts and legacies.

⁷ This has, in effect, been admitted in the preceding part of this opinion; because, if the cestui que trust of the whole beneficial interest in the money to arise from the sale of the land, may claim this privilege, it follows, necessarily, that the residuary legatee may, because he is, in effect, the beneficial owner of the whole, charged with the debts and legacies, from which he will be permitted to discharge it, by paying the debts and legacies, or may claim so much of the real estate as may not be necessary for that purpose.

⁸ But the court cannot accede to the conclusion, which, in Roper v. Radcliffe, is deduced from the establishment of the above principles. That conclusion is, that in respect to the residuary legatee, such a devise shall be deemed as land in equity, though in respect to the creditors and specific legatees it is deemed as money. It is admitted, with this qualification, that if the residuary legatee thinks proper to avail himself of the privilege of taking it as land, by making an election in his life time, the property will then assume the character of land. But if he does not make this election, the property retains the character of personalty to every intent and purpose. The cases before cited seem to the court to be conclusive upon this point; and none were referred to, or have come under the view of the court, which sanction the conclusion made in the unqualified terms used in the case of Roper v. Radcliffe.

⁷ Equity will extend the same privilege to the residuary legatee which is allowed to the heir, to pay the debts and legacies, and call for a conveyance of the real estate, or to restrain the trustees from selling more than is necessary to pay the debts and legacies.

⁸ The conclusion—which, in Roper v. Radcliffe, is deduced from the above principles, that in respect to the residuary legatee such a devise shall be considered as land in equity, though in respect to the creditors and specific legatees, it is deemed as money—denied.

As to the idea that the character of the estate is affected by this right of election, whether the right be claimed or not, it appears to be as repugnant to reason, as we think it has been shown to be, to principle and authorities. Before any thing can be made of the proposition, it should be shown that this right of privilege of election is so indissolubly united with the devise, as to constitute a part of it, and that it may be exercised in all cases, and under all circumstances. This was, indeed, contended for with great ingenuity and abilities by the counsel for the state of Virginia, but it was not proved to the satisfaction of the court.

It certainly is not true, that equity will extend this privilege in all cases to the cestui que trust. It will be refused if he be an infant. In the case of Seeley v. Jago, 1 P. Wms. 389, where money was devised to be laid out in land in fee, to be settled on A. B. and C., and their heirs, equally to be divided: On the death A., his infant heir, together with B. and C., filed their bill, claiming to have the money, which was decreed accordingly as to B. and C.; but the share of the infant was ordered to be put out for his benefit, and the reason assigned was, that he was incapable of making an election, and that such election, if permitted, would, in case of his death, be prejudicial to his heir.

In the case of Foone v. Blount, Cowp. 467, Lord Mansfield, who is compelled to acknowledge the authority of Roper v. Radcliffe in parallel cases, combats the reasoning of Chief Justice Parker upon this doctrine of election, with irresistible force. He suggests, as the true answer to it, that though in a variety of cases this right exists, yet it was inapplicable to the case of a person who was disabled by law from taking land, and that therefore a court of equity would, in such a case, decree that he should take the property as money.

This case of Walker v. Denne, 2 Ves. Jr. 170, seems to apply with great force to this part of our subject. The testator directed money to be laid out in lands, tenements, and hereditaments, or on long terms, with limitations applicable to real estate. The money not having been laid out, the crown, on failure of heirs, claimed the money as land. It was decided that the crown had no equity against the next of kin to have the money laid out in real estate in order to claim it by escheat. It was added that the devisees, on becoming absolutely entitled, have the option given by the will; and a deed of appointment by one of the cestui que trusts, though a feme covert, was held a sufficient indication of her intention that it should continue personal against her heir claiming it as ineffectually disposed of for want of her examination. This case is peculiarly strong, from the circumstance, that the election is embodied in the devise itself; but this was not enough, because the crown had no equity to force an election to be made for the purpose of producing an escheat.

Equity would surely proceed contrary to its regular course, and the principles which universally govern it, to allow the right of election where it is desired, and can be lawfully made, and yet refuse to decree the money upon the application of the alien, upon no other reason, but because, by law, he is incapable to hold the land: In short, to consider him in the same situation as if he had made an election, which would have been refused had he asked for a conveyance. The more just and correct rule would seem to be, that where the cestui que trust is incapable to take or to hold the land beneficially, the right of election does not exist, and consequently, that the property is to be considered as being of that species into which it is directed to be converted.

Having made these observations upon the principles laid down in the case of Roper v. Radcliffe, and upon the arguments urged at the bar in support of them, very few words will suffice to show that, as an authority, it is inapplicable to this case.

⁹ The incapacities of a papist under the English statute of 11 & 12 Wm. III., c. 4, and of an alien at common law, are extremely dissimilar. The former is incapable to take by purchase, any lands, or profits out of lands; and all estates, terms, and any other interests or profits whatsoever out of lands, to be made, suffered, or done, to, or for the use of such person, or upon any trust for him, or to, or for the benefit, or relief of any such person, are declared by the statute to be utterly void.

Thus, it appears that he cannot even take. His incapacity is not confined to land, but to any profit, interest, benefit, or relief, in or out of it. He is not only disabled from taking or having the benefit of any such interest, but the will or deed itself, which attempts to pass it, is void. In Roper v. Radcliffe, it was strongly insisted, that the money given to the papist, which was to be the proceeds of the land, was a profit or interest out of the land. If this be so, (and it is not material in this case to affirm or deny that position,) then the will of John Roper in relation to the bequest to the two papists, was void under the statute; and if so, the right of the heir at law of the testator, to the residue, as a resulting trust, was incontestable. The cases above cited have fully established that principle. In that case, too, the rents and profits, till the sale, would have belonged to the papists, if they were capable of taking, which brought the case still more strongly within the statute; and this was much relied on, not only in reasoning upon the words, but the policy of the statute.

⁹ The case of Roper v. Radcliffe distinguished from the present case.

¹⁰ Now, what is the situation of an alien? He cannot only take an interest in land, but a freehold interest in the land itself, and may hold it against all the world but the king, and even against him until office found, and he is not accountable for the rents and profits previously received.¹¹ In this case the will being valid, and the alien capable of taking under it, there can be no resulting trust to the heir, and the claim of the state is founded solely upon a supposed equity, to have the land by escheat as if the alien had, or could upon the principles of a court of equity, have elected to take the land instead of the money. The points of difference between the two cases are so striking that it would be a waste of time to notice them in detail.

It may be further observed, that the case of Roper v. Radcliffe has never, in England, been applied to the case of aliens; that its authority has been submitted to with reluctance, and is strictly confined in its application to cases precisely parallel to it. Lord Mansfield in the case of Foone v. Blount, speaks of it with marked disapprobation; and we know, that had Lord Trevor ¹⁰ An alien may take, by purchase, a freehold, or other interest in land, and may hold it against all the world except the king; and even against him until office found; and is not accountable for the rents and profits previously received.

¹¹ Vide 3 Wheat. 12. Jackson ex dem. State of New York v. Clarke, note c.

been present, and declared the opinion he had before entertained, the judges would have been equally divided.

The case of the Attorney General and Lord Weymouth, Amb. 20, was also pressed upon the court, as strongly supporting that of Roper v. Radcliffe, and as bearing upon the present case.

The first of these propositions might be admitted; although it is certain that the mortmain act, upon which that case was decided, is even stronger in its expression than the statute against papists, and the chancellor so considers it; for he says, whether the surplus be considered as money or land, it is just the same thing, the statute making void all charges and encumbrances on land, for the benefit of a charity.

But if this case were, in all respects, the same as Roper v. Radcliffe, the observations which have been made upon the latter would all apply to it. It may be remarked, however, that in this case, the chancellor avoids expressing any opinion upon the question, whether the money to arise from the sale of the land, was to be taken as personalty or land; and, although he mentions the case of Roper v. Radcliffe, he adds, that he does not depend upon it, as it is immaterial whether the surplus was to be considered as land or money under the mortmain act.

Upon the whole we are unanimously of opinion, that the legacy given to Thomas Craig, in the will of Robert Craig, is to be considered as a bequest of personal estate, which he is capable of taking for his own benefit.

Certificate accordingly.

WYMAN v. FT. DEARBORN NAT. BANK et al.

(54 N. E. 946, 181 Ill. 279.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Oct. 16, 1899.

Appeal from appellate court, First district. Bill by Walter Wyman against the Ft. Dearborn National Bank and others. From a decree of the superior court of Cook county in favor of complainants, defendants sued out a writ of error to the appellate court, where the decree was reversed. 80 Ill. App. 150. Plaintiff appealed. Reversed.

On September 1, 1896, the First National Bank of Helena, Mont., drew its check upon the Ft. Dearborn National Bank of Chicago for $10,000, in favor of appellant. At the time this check was given, the Ft. Dearborn National Bank had in its possession, on deposit to the credit of the First National Bank of Helena, $20,523.67. The Ft. Dearborn National Bank at the same time held a certificate of deposit of date May 15, 1895, from the First National Bank of Helena, in the sum of $25,000, which latter was secured by collateral for the face amount of $30,000 of notes taken by the First National Bank of Helena and indorsed to the Ft. Dearborn National Bank. The Helena bank was indebted to the Ft. Dearborn National Bank, on account, $649.89. On the 4th day of September, 1896, the Helena bank was placed in the hands of a receiver, and on the same day the Ft. Dearborn National Bank transferred the account on deposit with it to the amount of $20,523.67 to itself, and credited its certificate of deposit with that amount, debiting the Helena bank with the same sum, and leaving a balance due the Ft. Dearborn National Bank of $2,321.39, with interest thereon. On the 5th day of September the check drawn in favor of appellant was presented for payment to the Ft. Dearborn National Bank, which was refused. On the 21st day of January, 1897, the appellant filed in the superior court of Cook county his bill, making the Ft. Dearborn National Bank and the receiver of the Helena bank defendants, and sought to marshal assets. To this bill of complaint a demurrer was interposed and overruled. Subsequently the defendants to the bill filed an answer, and the cause was submitted upon bill and answer, and a decree was entered in accordance with the prayer of the bill, to reverse which the defendants sued out a writ of error to the appellate court for the First district, where the decree was reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to dismiss the bill, whereupon the appellee in the appellate court prosecuted this appeal.

Peckham, Brown & Packard, for appellant. Gilbert & Fell, for appellees.

PHILLIPS, J. (after stating the facts). It is insisted by the appellant that by the execution and delivery of its check for $10,000 against the deposit account of the Ft. Dearborn National Bank the First National Bank of Helena assigned and transferred to the appellant, from that deposit account, an amount sufficient to pay the check on September 1, 1896, the time at which it was drawn; and as sustaining this contention appellant cites National Bank of America v. Indiana Banking Co., 114 Ill. 483, 2 N. E. 401; Abt v. Bank, 159 Ill. 467, 42 N. E. 856; and Gage Hotel Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, 171 Ill. 531, 49 N. E. 420. The principle is clearly established by the foregoing and other authorities in this state that the check of a depositor upon his banker, delivered to another for value, transfers to that other the title to so much of the deposit as the check calls for, and the banker becomes the holder of the money for the use of the holder of the check, and is bound to account to him for the amount thereof, provided the party drawing the check has funds to that amount on deposit, subject to his check, at the time the same is presented. Munn v. Burch, 25 Ill. 21. The check operates as an absolute assignment of the fund on which it is drawn from the time it is delivered, as between the drawer and the payee, and the bank is bound as soon as the check is presented, and whatever sum stands upon the books to the credit of the depositor at the time of such presentation is absolutely assigned to the holder of the check. Bickford v. Bank, 42 Ill. 238; Brown v. Leckie, 43 Ill. 497; Fourth Nat. Bank v. City Nat. Bank, 68 Ill. 398; Union Nat. Bank v. Oceana Co. Bank, 80 Ill. 212; Bank v. Jones, 137 Ill. 634, 27 N. E. 533; Niblack v. Bank, 169 Ill. 517, 48 N. E. 438. And the relation existing between the drawer, the check holder, and the banker becomes such, when there are sufficient funds on deposit to meet the check at the time of presentation, that, because such funds were appropriated at the time of the drawing of the check, the contract to be implied between the depositor, the banker, and the check holder is that the check holder, whoever he may be, may have his action, and recover against the bank the amount, pro tanto, of the check. Gage Hotel Co. v. Union Nat. Bank, supra. In the latter case it was said (page 536, 171 Ill., and page 422, 49 N. E.): "If the funds are in the bank when the check is drawn, the drawing is an appropriation, as between the drawer and the payee, of the sum of money named in the check, which is to lie in the bank until called for by a presentation of the check. It is true that in such a case there is no privity between the bank and the check holder until presentment, and that priority in drawing a check does not give priority of right to the fund as against the banker, but that such priority of right is determined by the order of presentation." It was held in Niblack v. Bank, supra (page 521, 169 Ill., and page 439, 48 N. E.): "It is also the law, where a bank holds a demand note, or a note past due, it has the right to charge such obligation up against the maker's deposit account; and, if it does so before a check drawn by the depositor is presented for payment, it will be entitled to hold the deposit against any check afterwards presented." In this case, on the 4th of September—at least one day before the presentment of the check for payment—the Chicago bank transferred the account, and by proper entries on its books credited the Helena bank with all the money held by it to the credit of the latter bank, which credit was made on a certificate of deposit, which was, in effect, a demand note. Hunt v. Divine, 37 Ill. 137; Tripp v. Curtenius, 36 Mich. 494. Appropriating the deposit fund in good faith, in pursuance of strict legal rights, for the purpose of protecting its own interests, and without notice of the appropriation of the money by drawing the check in favor of appellant, was not a wrongful act, but one authorized by law, and absolutely transferred the legal and equitable right to the fund so deposited to the Ft. Dearborn National Bank, the check not having been presented to it, nor it having any notice of the same, until the day after the transfer of the account. Under the recognized rule in this state there was between the Helena bank and the payee of the check an absolute assignment of $10,000, then on deposit with the Ft. Dearborn National Bank, and no right existed in the Helena bank to change that deposit in any way, or to so draw against it as to prevent the assignment pro tanto from being carried out. It is clear that the holder of the check had an interest in the fund so assigned, while it is equally clear that until the bank had notice it could pay subsequently drawn checks, or credit the amount of the deposit on any overdue paper of its own. The equitable interest of the check holder, however, remained the same.

It is a principle controlling the marshaling of securities that where one creditor can resort to two funds, and another to one of them only, the former must seek satisfaction out of that fund which the latter cannot touch. In Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1414, it is said: "If, therefore, the prior creditor resorts to the doubly-charged fund, the subsequent creditor will be substituted, as far as possible, to his rights. These rules must be taken with the modifications and exceptions that in their application the paramount incumbrancer shall not be delayed or inconvenienced in the collection of his debt, * * * that the rights of third parties shall not be prejudiced, and that the parties themselves are creditors of the same debtor." Numerous authorities are there cited as sustaining these propositions. The principle of marshaling securities has been frequently applied to cases where there is an equitable interest or lien on collateral securities. In Colebrooke on Collateral Securities it is said (section 98): "By this rule, a creditor having a lien upon two funds for the payment of his debt, and a subsequent creditor a lien upon one only of such funds, the former is required to exhaust his remedy against the fund which is especially for his security before resorting to that in which the subsequent creditor is interested. The rule, however, is never enforced in cases where it would cause an injury or damage to the creditor holding such liens upon separate funds, or would work injustice to other parties. The rule was applied where a merchant had forwarded his note to a broker for sale, and the proceeds, less commissions, remitted. The broker fraudulently pledged the note, with other collaterals, to a bank, to secure a loan to himself, of which the merchant received nothing. The merchant, learning of the misappropriation, gave notice to the bank, and claimed to be subrogated to any surplus arising from other securities held by it after the payment of the loan. Subsequently, and before the maturity of the loan, the note fell due, and was paid without suit. Upon realizing the other securities, the bank held a surplus in its hands. The merchant was entitled to be paid from such surplus, his voluntary payment not affecting his right of recovery." This principle is sustained by Farwell v. Bank, 90 N. Y. 483. In that case the merchant had an equitable interest in collaterals, which, with his note, were put up to secure the loan to the broker by reason of the broker's misappropriation of the note, and it is not, equitably, a stronger case for the marshaling of assets than where, as in this case, the bank had as security for its certificate of deposit and for its account due notes aggregating about $30,000, and a deposit of over $20,000. Here, $10,000 of the amount deposited having been equitably assigned to the complainant, by reason of its appropriation by the bank before receiving notice of the drawing of the check the complainant was deprived of all interest in the deposit, and the Helena bank, or its receiver (who could have no greater interest than the bank itself), received the benefit of the application of the deposit by the Ft. Dearborn National Bank on its certificate of deposit, and the complainant, as holder of the check, had such an interest in the sum deposited that he should be subrogated, as against the Helena bank or its receiver, to the notes held by the Ft. Dearborn National Bank after the payment of the residue due the latter bank; and this principle of subrogation is applicable because, by reason of the appropriation of the fund by the bank with which the deposit was made to the payment of a debt for which it held two distinct characters of securities, one of those securities is, to an extent sufficient to pay the complainant, released from liability so far as the Ft. Dearborn National Bank was concerned, and the latter bank had lawfully used $10,000 of a deposit theretofore assigned to the complainant by the Helena bank. 2 Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 784; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 635, 636.

It is a maxim of equity that "equity regards and treats that as done which in good conscience ought to be done," and in writing of this maxim Mr. Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (section 365), says: "The principle involves the notion of an equitable obligation existing from some cause; of a present relation of equitable right and duty subsisting between two parties; a right held by one party, from whatever cause arising, that the other should do some act, and the corresponding duty—the 'ought'—resting upon the latter to do such act. Equity does not regard and treat as done what might be done or what could be done, but only what ought to be done. Nor does the principle operate in favor of every person, no matter what may be his situation and relations, but only in favor of him who holds the equitable right to have the act performed, as against the one upon whom the duty of such performance has devolved." A court of equity, acting upon this fundamental principle, may go beneath the appearance of things, and deal with the real facts, where the interest is a purely equitable one, recognized by courts of equity alone. When, therefore, a prior incumbrancer of two funds, by his election of remedies, deprives a junior incumbrancer, who has a lien upon one of the funds only, from reaching the particular fund on which he has a lien, the junior incumbrancer, to the extent of his lien, should be substituted to the lien of the paramount incumbrancer upon the other fund bound, as against the debtor and all claiming under him by lien or title subsequent in time. Gibson v. Seagrim, 20 Beav. 614; James v. Hubbard, 1 Paige, 228; Clowes v. Dickenson, 5 Johns. Ch. 235. Under a bill for marshaling securities relief may be had in that character of case. The Ft. Dearborn National Bank had a right to apply the deposit in payment of the indebtedness pro tanto to the extent of the deposit, and deprive the check holder of any part of that deposit as a fund assigned to him; but he had such an equitable interest in that fund, by reason of its assignment by the check, that he is entitled to be subrogated to the extent of his check, with interest thereon from the time it was presented, to the fund to be derived from the collection or sale of the collateral securities held by the Ft. Dearborn National Bank as security on its certificate of deposit and bank account, after the residue is paid to it. The superior court erred in decreeing that the Ft. Dearborn National Bank should deliver to the receiver of the First National Bank of Helena the collateral notes, but did not err in decreeing that from the proceeds of the same there should first be paid to the Ft. Dearborn National Bank the amount, including interest, due it, and to pay to Wyman the amount due on said check and interest, and to retain the balance as part of the assets of the First National Bank of Helena. Nor was there error in the decree of the superior court in directing, if there was not enough to pay Wyman in full, the amount unpaid should be allowed as a claim against said First National Bank of Helena, to be paid in due course of administration of its assets, and that the receiver pay the costs. It was error in the appellate court for the First district to reverse the entire decree of the superior court, and remand the cause with directions to dismiss the bill. So far as the superior court decreed that the Ft. Dearborn National Bank deliver to the receiver of the First National Bank of Helena the collateral notes, its decree is reversed, but in all other respects the decree of said court is affirmed. For the error of the appellate court for the First district in reversing the entire case, and remanding with directions to dismiss the bill, its decree is reversed, and the cause is remanded. Reversed and remanded.

STINCHFIELD v. MILLIKEN.

(71 Me. 567.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. December, 1880.

PETERS, J. The following facts are deducible from the evidence in this case: The complainant purchased of the defendants, certain steam-mill machinery, for removal from Hallowell to Danforth, in this State. There was at the time a verbal agreement, that the complainant should build a mill, and put the machinery into it, on a lot of land in Danforth, bought by him of one Russell, who was to deed the lot directly to the defendants. The complainant was also to procure a deed of his home (another) lot to the defendants from the heirs of H. E. Prentiss, who held an absolute title thereof as security for the complainant's indebtedness to them, there being a small balance only unpaid, which the defendants were to pay for him. The defendants were to give an agreement, to convey to the complainant if he paid his indebtedness to them according to the tenor of certain notes to be given.

On June 15, 1875, the complainant gave to the defendants a mortgage on the machinery as personal property to secure the notes hereafter named, in order to protect a lien thereon until the machinery should be put into the mill to be built, and become a part of the real estate. And there was embodied in this mortgage, an agreement of the complainant to build the mill and put the machinery into it. On June 16, 1875, Russell conveyed the mill lot to the defendants. On August 2, 1875, Prentiss conveyed the home lot to them, they paying the balance of the Prentiss claim. On August 4, 1875, the defendants gave a writing to the complainant, agreeing to convey the property to him upon the condition that he would pay to them his notes on one, two, three, and five years, respectively, with interest. The notes were given for the amount payable for the machinery, the sum paid to Prentiss, and for other loans and advances. The complainant went on and erected and completed a mill on the Russell lot, and the steam-mill machinery became a part of it.

The complainant seeks to redeem the property, claiming the transaction to be a mortgage. The defendants contend that the transaction was not a mortgage, that it was a conditional sale.

It was not a legal mortgage: Because the defeasance has no seal. Warren v. Lovis, 53 Maine, 463. And because the papers were not between the same parties. At law, the conveyance must be made by the mortgager and the defeasance by the mortgagee. Shaw v. Erskine, 43 Maine, 371.

But the transaction was in equity a mortgage—an equitable mortgage. The criterion is the intention of the parties. In equity, this intention may be ascertained from all pertinent facts either within or without the written parts of the transaction. Where the intention is clear that an absolute conveyance is taken as a security for a debt, it is in equity a mortgage. No matter how much the real transaction may be covered up and disguised. The real intention governs. "If a transaction resolve itself into a security, whatever may be its form, and whatever name the parties may choose to give it, it is in equity a mortgage." Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 533, Fed. Cas. No. 4,847.

The existence of a debt is well nigh an infallible evidence of the intention. The intention here is transparent. The defendants have a debt and held the property as a security for its collection. A legal mortgage was avoided; an equitable mortgage was made.

Although different at law, in equity a mortgage is not prevented because the conveyance does not come from the equitable mortgager. It is sufficient that the debtor has an interest in the property conveyed, either legal or equitable. Having such an interest, if he procures a conveyance to one who advances money upon it for him, taking the property as security for the money advanced, he has a right to redeem. The grantee in such case, acquiring the title by his act, holds it as his mortgagee. Jones on Mort. 2d ed. § 331. Stoddard v. Whiting, 46 N. Y. 627; Carr v. Carr, 52 N. Y. 251.

It is denied that this court has the power to declare that an absolute deed shall be deemed to be a mortgage, allowing an equitable mortgager the right to redeem. At law, it has no such power. Nor, when the court had a limited jurisdiction in equity, was the doctrine admitted. It was always understood, however, that, in a case like the present, if, instead of a demurrer, an answer was filed admitting the facts alleged, the court had the power to apply the remedy. Thomaston Bank v. Stimpson, 21 Maine, 195; Whitney v. Bachelder, 32 Maine, 313; Howe v. Russell, 36 Maine, 115; Richardson v. Woodbury, 43 Maine, 206. But since the act of 1874 conferred general chancery powers upon the court, it has full and complete jurisdiction in such cases. Rowell v. Jewett, 69 Maine, 293-303; Jones, Mort. (2d ed.) § 282.

Courts of equity generally exercise such power. While the grounds upon which the doctrine is admitted vary with different courts, there is a great concurrence of opinion as far as the result is concerned. In our judgment, it is a sound policy as well as principle to declare that, to take an absolute conveyance as a mortgage without any defeasance, is in equity a fraud. Experience shows that endless frauds and oppressions would be perpetrated under such modes, if equity could not grant relief. It is taking an agreement, in one sense, exceeding and differing from the true agreement. Instead of setting it wholly aside, equity is worked out by adapting it to the purpose originally intended. Equity allows reparation to be made by admitting a verbal defeasance to be proved. The cases which support this view are too numerous to cite. The American cases are collected in Jones, Mort. 2d ed. § 241, et seq. See Campbell v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 130; and Hassam v. Barrett, 115 Mass. 256.

The complainant seeks to separate the articles originally mortgaged as personal property, and, being allowed the value of them, redeem the balance of the estate only. That would not be equitable. The personal became a part of the real as originally designed to be. It was affixed and solidly bolted thereto. The mortgage was evidently only to serve a temporary purpose. It was not just to either party that there should be two mortgages instead of one. It is urged that the defendants foreclosed the personal mortgage. It could not be done. The personal mortgage was extinguished when attempted to be done. That was but a ruse to get the possession which the defendants were entitled to. No severance was ever made or attempted to be made.

It is intimated that the mill has burned down, pendente lite, under an insurance obtained by the defendants, and a question may arise, before the master, whether the complainant should have a credit of the net proceeds. If the insurance was obtained on the mortgagees' own account only, they should not be allowed. Cushing v. Thompson, 34 Maine, 496; Pierce v. Faunce, 53 Maine, 351. The head note in Larrabee v. Lumbert, 32 Maine, 97, is erroneous in that respect. It was allowed in that case by consent. Insurance Co. v. Woodbury, 45 Maine, 447.

But where a mortgagee insures the property by the authority of the mortgager, and charges him with the expense, then any insurance recovered should be accounted for. And if a mortgager covenants to insure, and fails to do so, the mortgagee can himself insure at the mortgager's expense.

One of the defendants testifies that "Stinchfield agreed to pay all taxes and insurance." He also says, "We have had the house, stable and mill insured, and have paid the insurance, $108." We think this is evidence of an insurance obtained by the mortgagees at the expense of the mortgager on account of his failure to keep his verbal covenant to insure, and renders it proper that the net proceeds of any insurance obtained should be allowed in the settlement between them.

But this cannot be, if the insurance was collected under a policy in which it is agreed between the insured and insurer that the company in case of loss should be subrogated to the right of the mortgagee. For in such case the insurance is not in fact on the mortgager's account, nor is it such an insurance as could be made available to him. Jones, Mort. (2d ed.) § 420, and cases in note.

The complainant may redeem the whole property upon payment of whatever may be due upon the whole debt. Inasmuch as the complainant sets up a claim exceeding the equitable right, neither party to recover costs up to the entry of this order; and whether future costs shall be recovered by either side, to be reserved for decision when the proceedings are to be finally terminated. Another reason why complainant should not recover costs is, that when his bill was commenced the mortgage debt was not due. The mortgage could not be redeemed until 1880. The bill was commenced long before that time. But as the mortgage is now due, and no point is taken that the proceeding was premature, it will probably be for the interest of all the parties that their matters may be adjusted under this bill. For which purpose a master must be appointed, unless the parties can best determine the accounts between themselves.

Decree accordingly.

APPLETON, C. J., WALTON, DANFORTH, VIRGIN, and LIBBEY, JJ., concurred.

McLAREN v. BREWER.

(51 Me. 402.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. 1863.

Bill in equity. Heard on demurrer.

B. Bradbury, for complainant. A. Hayden, for defendants.

KENT, J. The case, as stated in the bill, to which a general demurrer has been filed, is in substance this: I. N. M. Brewer, the intestate, on the 25th of October, 1851, gave to the complainant a mortgage of a ship, then on the stocks, to secure all sums of money then due, and such further sums as the complainant might furnish and advance to said Brewer, for the purpose of finishing said ship and fitting her for sea. The vessel was completed, and was registered in the name of said Brewer as owner of seven-eighths, and of Nathaniel Y. French of one-eighth. The said Brewer, on the back of said mortgage, acknowledged in writing that the ship thus registered was the vessel named in the mortgage. The mortgage was duly recorded, on the day of registry, in the custom house, and afterwards in the town clerk's office. Soon afterwards the ship proceeded to sea, and has never since been in this state, except in June, 1858, and the complainant has not exercised control over her or received any possession under his mortgage. In February, 1858, the ship being in New Orleans, the said Brewer sold to said French the seven-eighths of the ship, which then stood in his name, for their full value, making no reservation of the rights of the complainant under his mortgage, but giving an absolute bill of sale, with warranty, of said seven-eighths. Upon the sale, Brewer received from French, as part of the consideration, his three negotiable notes, amounting in all to $12,240, in nearly equal sums, and payable at different dates, the latest being the first day of March, 1859; the said notes being secured by a mortgage of said vessel given by French to Brewer. In March, 1858, a few weeks after the sale, Brewer died, and the respondent has been appointed as administratrix on his estate, and said notes and mortgage to Brewer have come into her hands as such administratrix. One of the notes has been paid to her, and she still holds the other notes and mortgage. Brewer's estate is represented as insolvent, and commissioners have been appointed, and have reported that the claim of the complainant is $3,654.85; and, at the time of the decease of Brewer, a large part of the debt intended to be secured by the mortgage to him was due and unpaid, and has not since been paid.

The prayer of the bill is that the proceeds of the sale of the ship, thus existing in the notes, should be applied by the administratrix to the payment of the complainant's debt secured by the mortgage, and for such relief as the nature of the case may require.

The principal question which arises is whether a mortgagee of a vessel which has been sold in another and a distant state, by the mortgagor in possession, by an absolute bill of sale of the entire vessel or interest, and with warranty, without any prior authority from the mortgagee, can follow the proceeds of the sale, existing in the notes given for the purchase, and in the possession of the mortgagor, or his representative.

It is a well-settled doctrine, both in law and in equity, that a mere change of property from one form to another cannot, in itself, divest the owner, or those who have distinct and immediate rights in the thing in its original shape, of their property in it. As a general rule, that right attaches to the new form, so long as such new property is capable of being identified and distinguished from all other property, and no rights of any bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, without notice, intervene. It makes no difference, in law, into what other form the change may have been made, whether into promissory notes received as the consideration of the transfer, or into other merchandise. The product is substituted for the original thing, and so remains, as long as it can be clearly shown to be such substitute. It ceases when the means of distinguishing and identifying fail. Scott v. Surman, Willes, 400; Whitcomb v. Jacobs, Salk. 160; Taylor v. Plumer (a leading case) 3 Maule & S. 562; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1258, 1259.

Money itself may be followed if it can be thus identified. The difficulty in relation to money usually is that, as it has "no ear mark," it cannot be thus distinguished; but this is simply a failure of proof, but does not alter or disprove the principle. Taylor v. Plumer, above cited.

This doctrine has been often applied to agents, factors, and trustees, where the sale has been rightfully made, and the proceeds are existing in notes or other property, and the agent dies or becomes insolvent. Thompson v. Perkins, 3 Mason, 232, Fed. Cas. No. 13,972; Story's Equity, before cited.

This class of cases is where the sale was made by a person intrusted with the property with a power to sell, or where the sale has been subsequently ratified and confirmed.

But the same principle applies to cases where the property of a party has been misapplied, or a trust fund has been wrongfully converted. "An abuse of trust can confer no rights upon the party abusing it, or on those who are in privity with him." Story, Eq. Jur. § 1258. The case of Taylor v. Plumer, before cited, was one of fraudulent transfer. Mr. Justice Story, in Conrad v. Insurance Co., 1 Pet. 448, says that this general principle "has been extended to cases where there has been a fraudulent or tortious misapplication of property."

It may be admitted that the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee does not of itself, and unconnected with other facts, create the relation of principal and agent, or give any right to the mortgagor to sell the whole property by an absolute bill of sale, with warranty of a perfect title. The mortgagor in possession may sell his interest, i. e., his right to redeem, but he is a wrongdoer if he sells and delivers the entire property to a purchaser without the knowledge or assent of the mortgagee. Such sale, if the existence of the mortgage is not disclosed, is now made a criminal offense. St. 1860, c. 150. It may also be granted that, as to the mortgagee and his title and interest, such sale does not convey, nor impair his title, and that he may pursue and enforce his right to the thing, wherever he may find it.

But we think that, under the circumstances stated in this bill, he has an election to do so, or to follow the proceeds existing in the new form of negotiable notes in the hands of the mortgagor or the representative of his estate. He may do this on the ground that he assents to and affirms the sale, and to the change of the property mortgaged to him from a vessel to the notes taken. A subsequent ratification is equivalent to a prior authority. We have seen that, if he had had prior authority, he would have come under the rule so often applied to agents and factors.

He may do this, also, on the other ground, that it was a wrongful, if not a fraudulent, conversion of his property by the mortgagor in possession, and he may so far waive the tort as to pursue the proceeds in the new form, whilst they can be identified. He must elect which course to pursue. He cannot have both remedies. Murray v. Libbern, 2 Johns. Ch. 441; Murray v. Ballou, 1 Johns. Ch. 566.

The bill sufficiently sets out an indebtedness covered by the mortgage. The complainant must, of course, establish such indebtedness, i. e., for money advanced for the purpose of finishing the ship and fitting her for sea. No other debt or claim is covered by the mortgage.

But as to this debt, under the circumstances of this case, the law imputes a trust in the mortgagor during his life, and that trust follows the notes in the hands of his personal representative. The proceeds of the sale of the ship, in her hands, stand in place of the thing sold, and should be applied as we have a right to presume Mr. Brewer, if he had lived, would have applied them, so far as needed, to the discharge of the debt secured by the mortgage.

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—4

In this case there is not a plain and adequate remedy at law. The estate is insolvent, and, to say the least, it would require a peculiar action and judgment in law to take these proceeds out of the general mass of the estate, which by law should be distributed pro rata among all the creditors, and appropriate it specifically to the complainant's debt. Such appropriation is peculiarly the proper province of a court of equity.

According to the statement in the bill, the claim of the complainant is not equal to any one of the notes, and it would be difficult to find any principle of law by which an action of trover could be maintained for them. The estate is entitled to the notes and the proceeds after the mortgage debt is paid, and the claim set up is based on an imputed trust, and not on a legal title to the notes.

It is worthy of observation that the words limiting the equity powers of this court to cases, "where the parties have not a plain and adequate remedy at law," which are found in Rev. St. 1841, c. 96, are omitted in the present Revised Statutes. We are not called upon, in this case, to determine whether the omission of these words does in fact enlarge or alter the equity powers of this court. It seems to leave them under the general rules of equity in all cases where the subject-matter is made by statute cognizable in equity.

It was declared by this court, in Tappan v. Deblois, 45 Me. 131, that "by the Revised Statutes of this state (1857) we have jurisdiction of all cases of trust, whether arising by implication of law or created by deed or will."

Demurrer overruled.

APPLETON, C. J., CUTTING, DAVIS, DICKERSON, and BARROWS, JJ., concurred.

CLEMENTS v. TILLMAN et al.

(5 S. E. 194, 79 Ga. 451.)

Supreme Court of Georgia. February 13, 1888.

Error from superior court, Muscogee county; Smith, Judge.

Suit by Hattie E. Tillman and William L. Tillman, plaintiffs and defendants in error, against John W. Clements, defendant and plaintiff in error, for an account and settlement of a legacy due said Hattie E. Tillman under the will of one Jacob A. Clements, John W. Clements being an executor of the same.

The following is the official report:

Hattie E. Tillman, a legatee under the will of Jacob A. Clements, deceased, with her husband and trustee, William L. Tillman, filed their bill for account and settlement against John W. Clements, executor, and Sarah B. Clements, executrix, of said will. The bill contained charges of mismanagement of the estate, violations of the provisions of said bill, and non-payment by the executors of the interest of complainant as legatee. The defendants answered the bill; but as their answers are not material or necessary to an understanding of the errors complained of, they are not set forth. The jury returned the following verdict: "We, the jury, find that Sarah B. Clements has no property or effects of the estate of Jacob A. Clements, deceased, in her hands, as executrix or otherwise. We, the jury, further find that John W. Clements, as executor of the will of Jacob A. Clements, deceased, has now in his hands the sum of eight hundred and ten dollars principal and five hundred dollars interest, belonging to Hattie E. Tillman, as legatee under the will of Jacob A. Clements." Upon this verdict the following decree was rendered by the court: "Whereupon, the premises considered, it is ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the complainant do recover the same sum of eight hundred and ten dollars principal and the further sum of five hundred dollars interest to this date, and the further sum of ——— dollars, costs of suit in this behalf laid out and expended, for which said several sums let execution issue, to be levied in the first place of the goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of said Jacob A. Clements, deceased, in the hands of John W. Clements, executor of the will of said Jacob A. Clements, if to be found; and if not to be found, then to be levied of the personal goods and chattels, lands and tenements, of said John W. Clements. It is further ordered and decreed by said court that the said John W. Clements do satisfy and pay the aforesaid amounts, principal, interest, and costs, to the said complainant, on or before the first day of January next; and, in default thereof, that he be held and deemed to be in contempt of the order and decree of this court." Plaintiff in error excepts to the portion of the decree embodied by the last sentence, and says the court erred in rendering a decree to be enforced by attachment for contempt—"First, because the verdict was a money verdict, and the same could only be enforced by execution; second, because the verdict of the jury was a money verdict, and could not be enforced by an attachment for contempt, and could only be enforced by execution; third, because the verdict of the jury was a money verdict, and was a debt, and to enforce the decree by an attachment for contempt would be to imprison the defendant for debt, which is prohibited by the constitution of the state; fourth, because the decree sought and moved for provides both for the enforcement of it by execution, and an attachment for contempt; and the complainant should be required to elect whether she would proceed to enforce it by execution or attachment for contempt if the court determined that it could be enforced by attachment for contempt."

C. J. Thornton, for plaintiff in error. L. F. Garrard, for defendants in error.

KIBBEE, J.¹ Originally, in the absence of statutes providing otherwise, decrees of courts of equity, of whatever kind or nature, operated strictly and exclusively in personam. The only remedy for their enforcement was by what is termed "process of contempt," under which the party failing to obey them was arrested and imprisoned until he yielded obedience, or purged the contempt by showing that disobedience was not wilful, but the result of inability not produced by his own fault or contumacy. The writ of assistance to deliver possession, and even the sequestration to compel the performance of a decree, are comparatively of recent origin. Our statutes expressly provide that "all orders and decrees of the court may be enforced by attachment against the person; decrees for money may be enforced by execution against the property." Code, § 3099. "A decree in favor of any party, for a specific sum of money, or for regular installments of money, shall be enforced by execution against property as at law." Code, § 4215. "Every decree or order of a court of equity may be enforced by attachment against the person for contempt; and if a decree be partly for money and partly for the performance of a duty, the former may be enforced by execution, and the latter by attachment or other process." Code, § 4216. The clear legislative intent is manifest to enlarge and render more efficacious equitable remedies, while preserving the remedies the courts had previously employed in the absence of statutes providing others. Under our statutes, when a party is decreed to perform a duty, or to do any act other than the mere payment of money, which the court has jurisdiction to adjudge he shall do, if he disobeys, the authority of the court is defied; he is guilty of contempt, and the arrest and imprisonment of his person is not imprisonment for debt in any appropriate sense of the term. But if a court of equity should render a simple decree for money on a simple money verdict,—a decree which it may now enforce by the ordinary common-law process against property,—the failure to pay the decree would not be contempt, nor could compulsory process against the person of the party in default be resorted to to enforce payment. In Coughlin v. Ehlert, 39 Mo. 285, the court uses the following language: "We do not mean to say that a party may not be put in contempt for disobeying a decree for the performance of acts which are within his power, and which the court may properly order to be done. If it were shown, for instance, that the party had in his possession a certain specific sum of money or other thing which he refused to deliver up, under the order of the court, for any purpose, it may very well be that his disobedience would be a contempt for which he might lawfully be imprisoned." In Carlton v. Carlton, 44 Ga. 220, Judge McCay, delivering the opinion, says: "We do not intend to say that simply because a debt is adjudged by a decree in chancery, instead of by a judgment at law, it may therefore be enforced by imprisonment. The imprisonment must be clearly for the contempt of the process of the court, and be of one who is able and unwilling to obey the order of the court. * * * It ought never to be resorted to except as a penal process, founded on the unwillingness of the party to obey.

¹ Blandford, J., being disqualified, Judge Kibbee, of the Oconee circuit, was designated to preside in his stead.

The moment it appears that there is inability, it would clearly be the duty of the judge to discharge the party," etc. The court further held that, "ordinarily, it would be improper to include in the order the alternative order for imprisonment on failure, since it is not to be presumed that a contempt will ensue." The constitutional provision, "there shall be no imprisonment for debt," was not intended to interfere with the traditional power of chancery courts to punish for contempt all refusals to obey their lawful decrees and orders. This proposition may be conceded to be sound without affecting the case at bar in any respect. "The power in question was never exercised by chancery courts except in those cases where a trust in the property or fund arose between the parties litigant, or some specific interest in it was claimed, or the chattel had some peculiar value and importance that a recovery of damages at law for its detention or conversion was inadequate. Such interference was in the nature of a bill quia timet, and was asserted only on a proper showing that the fund or property was in danger of loss or destruction." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 708-710. "No jurisdiction to compel the payment of an ordinary money demand unconnected with such peculiar equities ever existed in chancery courts, nor had they the power to compel such payment by punishing the refusal to pay under the guise of contempt."

In the case at bar the decree was right in awarding an execution against the executor as set forth in said decree, but the facts did not authorize an alternative order imprisoning the defendant on failure to pay. Judgment reversed.

HART v. SANSOM et al.

(3 Sup. Ct. 586, 110 U. S. 151.)

Supreme Court of the United States. January 21, 1884.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Texas.

Henry J. Leovy and W. Hallett Phillips, for plaintiff in error. A. S. Lathrop, for defendants in error.

GRAY, J. This is a writ of error sued out by Edmond J. Hart, a citizen of Louisiana, to reverse a judgment rendered against him in the circuit court of the United States for the Northern district of Texas, in an action brought by him against Marion Sansom and the heirs at law of Thomas M. League, citizens of Texas, to recover a tract of land in Johnson county, in that state, of which they had dispossessed him. At the trial, Hart proved his title under a patent from the republic of Texas to League, and a deed with general covenants of warranty from League, dated August 19, 1846, and both recorded on December 9, 1879, and it appeared that the defendant Sansom held possession of the land under a lease from the other defendants and as their tenant. The defendants offered in evidence the record of a judgment rendered by the district court of Johnson county, on August 24, 1875, upon a petition filed June 11, 1873, by the heirs at law of League, (who died intestate November 5, 1865,) against Virgil Wilkerson, Orlando Dorsey, and several other persons, and Hart, alleging that Wilkerson ejected the plaintiffs from this land, and unlawfully withheld possession thereof from them; that on October 29, 1870, the defendant Dorsey, by deed duly recorded, conveyed to some of the other defendants than Wilkerson and Hart three-fourths of the land, reserving in that deed the remaining fourth to himself, and that other deeds (particularly set forth) of parts of the land were afterwards made to the rest of such other defendants and recorded; that the defendant Hart "sets up some pretended claim and title to said land;" and that "the defendant Wilkerson is a naked trespasser upon the land of the plaintiffs, and that the several other defendants' several deeds, which appear upon the record of deeds of Johnson county as aforesaid, are fraudulent and void, and that the said pretended claims and deeds, and each and all of them, cast a cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs;" and praying "that they have judgment, that the cloud upon the title of the plaintiffs, created by the several deeds aforesaid, be removed, and that the said deeds, and each and all of them, be declared null and void, and be canceled and discharged of record, and that the title of the plaintiffs in and to said premises and every part thereof, may be confirmed and established as against said defendants and each and every of them, and all persons claiming through or under them," and for a writ of possession, damages, and costs. That record also showed the issue and due service of citations to all the defendants except Dorsey and Hart; the issue of a citation directing the sheriff to serve Hart, being a citizen of Louisiana, by publication, and the sheriff's return showing the execution of the citation by such publication in a newspaper of the county four successive weeks before the return day, and a like service by publication on Dorsey, a citizen of New York. That record further showed a default of all the defendants; and that upon a writ of inquiry the jury assessed damages against Dorsey and Hart; found as facts the issue of the patent to League and the title of the plaintiffs as his heirs; that Hart "claimed said land;" and that a deed was made by Dorsey and recorded, as alleged in the petition, but that Hart and Dorsey respectively had no title of record or otherwise; and returned a verdict "for the plaintiffs; and that they recover the land described in the petition." That record finally showed a judgment "that the plaintiffs recover of the defendants the premises described," and "that the several deeds in the plaintiff's petition mentioned be and the same are hereby annulled and canceled, and for naught held, and the cloud thereby removed," and for costs, and that execution issue for the costs. The circuit court, against the plaintiff's objection, admitted the judgment in evidence, instructed the jury that it divested the plaintiff of his title to the land, and directed a verdict for the defendants.

The plaintiff, deriving his title under a deed with covenants of general warranty from League, is entitled to maintain this action against League's heirs, who are estopped by those covenants, unless the former judgment in the action brought by them in the state court has adjudicated the title as between them and the present plaintiff. It is therefore necessary to consider the nature and effect of that judgment. The petition combined, in accordance with the practice prevailing in that state, an action in the nature of ejectment to recover possession of the land, and a suit in equity to remove a cloud upon the plaintiffs' title; and the service by publication was in the form authorized by the local statutes against non-residents. 1 Pasch. Dig. Laws Tex. (4th Ed.) art. 25. The petition alleges that Wilkerson was in possession; and that the other defendants, except Hart, held recorded deeds, which were fraudulent and void, and cast a cloud upon the plaintiffs' title. But as to Hart, it did not allege that he was in possession, or was in privity with the other defendants, or that he held any deed, but only that he set up some pretended claim and title. And the verdict finds that he claimed the land, but had no title of record or otherwise therein. The judgment is that the plaintiffs recover the land of the defendants, and that the deeds mentioned in the petition be and are annulled and canceled, and the cloud thereby removed, and for costs; and execution is awarded for costs only, and not for any writ or process in the nature of a writ of possession or habere facias.

It is difficult to see how any part of that judgment (except for costs) is applicable to Hart; for that part which is for recovery of possession certainly cannot apply to Hart, who was not in possession; and that part which removes the cloud upon the plaintiff's title appears to be limited to the cloud created by the deeds mentioned in the petition; and the petition does not allege, and the verdict negatives, that Hart held any deed. But if there is any judgment (except for costs) against Hart, it is, upon the most liberal construction, only a decree removing the cloud created by his pretended claim of title, and is no bar to the present action. Generally, if not universally, equity jurisdiction is exercised in personam, and not in rem, and depends upon the control of the court over the parties, by reason of their presence or residence, and not upon the place where the land lies in regard to which relief is sought. Upon a bill for the removal of a cloud upon title, as upon a bill for the specific performance of an agreement to convey, the decree, unless otherwise expressly provided by statute, is clearly not a judgment in rem, establishing a title in land, but operates in personam only, by restraining the defendant from asserting his claim, and directing him to deliver up his deed to be canceled, or to execute a relief to the plaintiff. Langd. Eq. Pl. (2d Ed.) §§ 43, 184; Massie v. Watts, 6 Cranch, 148; Orton v. Smith, 18 How. 263; Vandever v. Freeman, 20 Tex. 334. It would doubtless be within the power of the state in which the land lies to provide by statute that if the defendant is not found within the jurisdiction, or refuses to make or to cancel a deed, this should be done in his behalf by a trustee appointed by the court for that purpose. Felch v. Hooper, 119 Mass. 52; Ager v. Murray, 105 U. S. 126, 132. But in such a case, as in the ordinary exercise of its jurisdiction, a court of equity acts in personam, by compelling a deed to be executed or canceled by or in behalf of the party. It has no inherent power, by the mere force of its decree, to annul a deed or to establish a title.

In the judgment in question, no trustee to act in behalf of the defendant was appointed by the court, nor have we been referred to any statute authorizing such an appointment to be made. The utmost effect which can be attributed to the judgment, as against Hart, is that of an ordinary decree for the removal by him, as well as by the other defendants, of a cloud upon the plaintiff's title. Such a decree, being in personam merely, can only be supported against a person who is not a citizen or resident of the state in which it is rendered, by actual service upon him within its jurisdiction; and constructive service by publication in a newspaper is not sufficient. The courts of the state might perhaps feel bound to give effect to the service made as directed by its statutes. But no court deriving its authority from another government will recognize a merely constructive service as bringing the person within the jurisdiction of the court. The judgment would be allowed no force in the courts of any other state; and it is of no greater force, as against a citizen of another state, in a court of the United States, though held within the state in which the judgment was rendered. Hollingsworth v. Barbour, 4 Pet. 466, 475; Boswell's Lessee v. Otis, 9 How. 336; Bischoff v. Wethered, 9 Wall. 812; Knowles v. Gaslight Co., 19 Wall. 58; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714. See, also, Schibsby v. Westenholz, L. R. 6 Q. B. 155; The City of Mecca, 6 Prob. Div. 106.

The circuit court having ruled and instructed the jury otherwise, its judgment must be reversed, and the cause remanded with directions to set aside the verdict, and to order a new trial.

ADAMS v. MESSENGER.

(17 N. E. 491, 147 Mass. 185.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Middlesex. June 19, 1888.

Appeal from supreme judicial court, Middlesex county.

Bill in equity, by George B. Adams against William T. Messenger, to compel the performance of an agreement to furnish the plaintiff with certain perfect working injectors for steam-boilers, and to apply for and assign to plaintiff certain letters patent in the dominion of Canada. Hearing in the supreme judicial court upon defendant's demurrer, which was sustained, and the plaintiff appealed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

Wm. B. Durant, for plaintiff. Charles S. Knowles, for defendant.

DEVENS, J. It is the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff has a full, complete, and adequate remedy at common law by a suit for damages, and that the court, sitting in equity, cannot grant the relief sought by the prayers of the bill. The controversy arises from the failure to perform an executory written contract. So far as this relates to personal property, the objections arising from the statute of frauds, which have sometimes been found to exist when oral contracts were sought to be enforced, have, of course, no application. The general rule that contracts as to the purchase of personal property are not specifically enforced, as are those which relate to real property, does not rest on the ground of any distinction between the two classes of property other than that which arises from their character. Contracts which relate to real property can necessarily only be satisfied by a conveyance of the particular estate or parcel contracted for, while those which relate to personal property are often fully satisfied by damages which enable the party injured to obtain elsewhere in the market precisely similar property to that which he had agreed to purchase. The distinction between real and personal property is entirely subordinate to the question whether an adequate remedy can thus be afforded. If, from the nature of the personal property, it cannot, a court of equity will entertain jurisdiction to enforce the contract. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 717; Clark v. Flint, 22 Pick. 231. A contract for bank, railway, or other corporation stock, freely sold in the market, might not be thus enforced, but it would be otherwise where the stock was limited in amount, held in a few hands, and not ordinarily to be obtained. White v. Schuyler, 1 Abb. Prac. (N. S.) 300; Treasurer v. Mining Co., 23 Cal. 390; Poole v. Middleton, 29 Beav. 646; Doloret v. Rothschild, 1 Sim. & S. 590. Where articles of personal property, also, are peculiar and individual in their character, or have an especial value on account of the associations connected with them, as pictures, curiosities, family furniture, or heirlooms, specific performance of a contract in relation to them will be decreed. Lloyd v. Loaring, 6 Ves. 773; Fells v. Read, 3 Ves. 70; Lowther v. Lowther, 13 Ves. 95; Williams v. Howard, 3 Murph. 74. An agreement to assign a patent will be specifically enforced. Binney v. Annan, 107 Mass. 94. Nor do we perceive any reason why an agreement to furnish articles which the vendor alone can supply, whether because their manufacture is guarded by a patent or for any other reason, should not also be thus enforced. Hapgood v. Rosenstock, 23 Fed. 86. As the value of a patent-right cannot be ascertained by computation, so it is impossible, with any approach to accuracy, to ascertain how much a vendee would suffer from not being able to obtain such articles for use in his business.

The contract of the defendant was twofold: to furnish and deliver certain described working steam-injectors, within a specified time, to the plaintiff; and also that if the defendant shall make improvements in injectors for steamboilers, and shall take out patents therefor in the United States, he will apply for letters patent in Canada, and, on obtaining them, will assign and convey the same to the plaintiff, and that he will not do any act prejudicial to these letters patent of Canada, or the monopoly thus secured. It is said that the court will not enforce a contract for personal services when such services require the exercise of peculiar skill, intellectual ability, and judgment, and that, therefore, the defendant cannot be ordered to make and deliver the injectors contracted for. But the principle on which it is held that a court of equity cannot decree one to perform a personal service involving peculiar talent or skill, because it cannot so mould its order and so supervise the individual executing it that it can determine whether he has honestly obeyed it or not, has no application here. The defendant has agreed to furnish and deliver certain injectors, which the contract shows to be patented articles. There is nothing in the bill from which it is to be inferred that they were yet to be made when the contract was executed; but, if it be assumed that they were, there is nothing from which it can be inferred that any skill peculiar to the defendant was required to construct them. For aught that appears, they could be made by any intelligent artificer in the metals of which they were composed. The details of their manufacture are given by reference to the patents, which are referred to in the agreement; so that no difficulty, such as has sometimes been experienced, could have been found in describing accurately and even minutely the articles to be furnished. Nor are there found in the case at bar any continuous duties to be done, or work to be performed, requiring any permanent supervision, which, as it could not be concluded within a definite and reasonable time, has sometimes been held an obstacle to the enforcement of a contract by the court. Agreements to make an archway under a railway, or to erect a siding at a particular point for the convenience of the land-owner, have been ordered to be specifically enforced. Although the party aggrieved might have obtained damages which would have been sufficient to have enabled him to pay for constructing them, and although the work to be done necessarily involved engineering skill as well as labor, he was not bound to assume the responsibility or the labor of doing that which the defendant had agreed to do. Storer v. Railway Co., 2 Younge & C. Ch. 48; Greene v. Railway Co., L. R. 13 Eq. 44. The case at bar is readily distinguishable from that of Wollensak v. Briggs, 20 Bradw. 50, on which the defendant much relies. In that case the defendant was to construct for the plaintiff certain improved machinery for a particular purpose, but no details were given as to the form, structure, principle, or mode of operating the proposed machine. It was obviously a contract too indefinite to enable the court to order its specific enforcement.

It is urged that specific performance of a part only of a contract will not be ordered when it is not in the power of the court to order the enforcement of the whole, and that it would not be possible to enforce that portion of the contract which relates to the application for letters patent in Canada, and the subsequent assignment of them. But where two parts of a contract are distinctly separable, as in the case at bar, there is no reason why one should not be enforced, and the plaintiff compensated in damages for the breach of the other. When a contract relates to but a single subject, and it is impossible for the defendant to perform it except partially, the plaintiff is entitled to the benefit of such partial performance, and to compensation, if it be possible to compute what is just, so far as it is unperformed. It was therefore held in Davis v. Parker, 14 Allen, 94, that where one had agreed to convey land, with release of dower, and was unable to procure a release of dower, the purchaser was entitled to a conveyance without such release, with an abatement from the purchase money of the value of the wife's interest at the time of the conveyance. See, also, Milkman v. Ordway, 106 Mass. 253; Curran v. Water-Power Co., 116 Mass. 90.

We have assumed, in favor of the defendant's contention, that the only relief that the plaintiff could obtain for the breach of that portion of the agreement which relates to the application for a patent in Canada for the improvements which defendant had made, would be in damages. We have not intended thus to decide. That equity, by virtue of its control over the persons before the court, takes cognizance of many things which they may do or be able to do abroad, while they are themselves personally here, will not be controverted. One may be enjoined from prosecuting a suit abroad. He may be compelled to convey land situated abroad, although the conveyance must be according to the laws of the foreign country, and must be sent there for record. Pingree v. Coffin, 12 Gray, 288; Dehon v. Foster, 4 Allen, 545; Cunningham v. Butler, 142 Mass. 47, 6 N. E. 782; Bailey v. Ryder, 10 N. Y. 363; Newton v. Bronson, 13 N. Y. 587. There is nothing to show that the plaintiff, in making his application in Canada for the patent, is compelled to leave the state, any more than he would be compelled to do so if he was an applicant at Washington. The grant of such a patent is an act of administration only. If it were to be granted here, the party would be ordered to make application. It was held in Runstetler v. Atkinson, 4 MacArthur, 382, that where a formal assignment of an invention had not been made, but a valid agreement had been made so to assign, equity would order the party to make the formal assignment, and also to make application for the patent, which, in such case, would issue to the assignee. The laws of Canada, which we can know only as facts, are not before us by any allegations as to them. If all that is required by them is a formal application in writing by the inventor, there would seem to be, from the allegations of the bill, sufficient reason why the defendant should be required to make and forward it, or place it in the hands of the plaintiff to be forwarded, to the Canadian authorities. In any event, as the application is preliminary only to obtaining letters patent for the purpose of assigning them to the plaintiff, the averments of the bill, taken in connection with the terms of the agreement, set forth a good reason why the plaintiff may ask an assignment of his title to the improvements in question from the defendant, so far as the dominion of Canada is concerned, and also why the defendant should be restrained from alienating or in any way incumbering any right he may have to letters patent from Canada if plaintiff should decide to seek his remedy in this form, rather than in damages for breach of this part of the contract. Demurrer overruled.

EWING v. LITCHFIELD et al.

(22 S. E. 362, 91 Va. 575.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. June 27, 1895.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county; Sheffey, Judge.

Bill by one Litchfield and others against Thomas Ewing. Decree for complainants, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

White & Penn, for appellant. Daniel Trigg, for appellees.

KEITH, P. This bill was filed in the circuit court of Washington county by Litchfield and others, and sets forth the following facts: In January, 1890, the plaintiffs entered into a contract with J. D. Imboden, by which the plaintiffs and the said Imboden agreed to procure $100,000 of the stock of the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company at the price of $10 or less per share of $100 each. These shares, together with 15,000 shares owned by the plaintiffs, were to be voted in a stockholders' meeting, to be held within a period named, and upon a notice prescribed in the contract, so as to acquire the control of $1,950,000 of the stock which remained in the treasury of the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company. This block of 19,500 shares of stock was to be sold to Imboden at $10 per share, and in consideration of his purchase of the said treasury stock at this reduced rate he undertook to secure and cause to be submitted to the said meeting of stockholders, for their ratification, a contract, by and on behalf of the Danville & East Tennessee Railroad Company and the Atlantic & Danville Railroad Company with the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company, binding the railroad companies to extend their roads into the lands and coal fields of the coal and iron company, or to make connections therewith satisfactory to the said parties by means of other railroads, by the 1st of January, 1893, and to complete and have in operation the line of said railroad companies from Abingdon to Damascus on or before the 1st day of January, 1891, and to complete and have in operation all that part of the line of said railroads and their connections, so as to connect Abingdon and the coal fields, by the 1st of January, 1893, and then binding the said railroad companies, under certain terms therein named, for the transportation of the product of the coal fields, owned by the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company. It is further provided that, unless the party of the first part, J. D. Imboden, or his assignees, shall, at the meeting of the stockholders provided in the contract, purchase the treasury stock and deliver or cause to be delivered the contract of the railroad companies, as hereinbefore provided, or in the event of the failure of the first party to notify the parties of the second part of his readiness to conform to and to comply with the provisions of this agreement, then the contract entered into was to be null and void, except that the parties of the second part "shall be entitled to demand and receive from the party of the first part the amount of $50,000 of the stock of the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company, or $5,000 in lieu thereof by way of ascertained and liquidated damages on account of the breach of this contract." There are details of the contract entered into between the parties which I have thought it unnecessary to set out, but have contented myself with reciting what I conceived to be the features of the contract upon which this controversy depends. The $50,000 of stock was to be deposited with the Exchange National Bank of Lynchburg by the party of the first part, to be held in accordance with the provisions of the contract, and it was also provided that the party of the first part should have the right to elect to pay either the stock or the money in cash as damages, in the event of his failure to comply with his contract. Subsequently an amended bill was filed, and Thomas Ewing was made a party defendant, it appearing that J. D. Imboden, in executing the contract set out in the original bill, was acting as the agent of Ewing, and that Imboden had no personal interest in it. To this bill there was a demurrer, which the circuit court overruled, and such proceedings were had that a final decree was entered in the cause, from which Thomas Ewing has appealed, and his appeal presents for our consideration at the outset the propriety of the decree of the circuit court upon the demurrer to the bill.

It will be observed that this suit is not brought to enforce the specific performance of that which the defendant contracted to do,—that is, to procure contracts from certain railroad corporations to build a line of railway into the coal fields controlled by the plaintiffs within a stipulated period; in other words, it is not a suit for the specific performance of the principal contract entered into between the parties. Stated broadly, that was a contract upon the part of Ewing to construct, or for him to procure others to construct, certain lines of road to certain points named in the contract, the object being to develop the coal fields owned by the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company, in which company the plaintiffs were large stockholders. Upon the part of the plaintiffs, in consideration of Ewing procuring this road to be built, or procuring a satisfactory contract upon the part of others to build it, they were to unite with him, who, in the meantime, with their aid, was to secure $100,000 of the stock of the Virginia & Tennessee Coal & Iron Company, thus constituting a controlling interest in the company, and thereby give to the appellant the control of 19,500 shares of stock, at $10 per share. In a proper case a court of equity delights specifically to enforce contracts where the parties have no other remedy, or the remedy afforded elsewhere is less complete or satisfactory; but here the undertaking of the defendant is to build a railroad, or to procure others to build it, and courts of equity will not enforce contracts for that purpose. This seems to be well settled.

The object, and the only object, of this bill is to recover what the parties have agreed upon, either as a penalty or forfeiture, or as liquidated damages. The breach of the contract is recognized as the foundation of the relief sought, and the plaintiffs have resorted to this court, and invoked its aid to enable them to gather in the form of damages the fruits of a mere breach of contract. There are cases in which courts of equity will award damages, but they are cases where, having obtained jurisdiction over the subject and of the parties, under some of the well-recognized sources of equity jurisdiction, it is found necessary to award damages in order to do full and complete justice by way of compensation, as when, in the enforcement of a contract for the sale of land, the court finds itself unable to give the party seeking and entitled to its aid all that, under his contract, he should recover. In such a case the court will, as far as possible, specifically execute the contract, and then ascertain the damages accruing by reason of its inability in the particular case thus to afford complete relief. The giving of the damages is ancillary or auxiliary to the jurisdiction specifically to enforce the performance of the contract. See Nagle v. Newton, 22 Grat. 814. The case before us being in its essence for the recovery of damages for a breach of contract, a court of equity is not to be beguiled into granting the relief sought because it is ingeniously and artfully concealed under cover of a prayer to compel the assignment of certain shares of stock. The great weight of authority in this country is that a court of equity will not entertain a bill for such a purpose, though in England it seems to be otherwise. Had the subject and object of the principal contract between the parties in this case been the sale and purchase of the $50,000 of the stock in question, a court of equity would have left them to their remedy at law, and will certainly not harken to their prayer when it appears that the stock, the assignment of which is sought, is itself but one form of the penalty or liquidated damages agreed upon as the measure of the injury sustained by the breach of the contract entered into. Much of the argument addressed to us had for its object to enable us to determine whether or not the stock, or in lieu thereof the $5,000 in money, agreed to be transferred or paid by the appellant in case of a failure to perform the contract, was to be considered as a penalty or as liquidated damages. This is a feature of the controversy which it is not necessary for us to determine, because in neither aspect of it are the plaintiffs entitled to the relief sought. A court of equity will neither enforce a penalty or forfeiture, nor permit it to be enforced in a court of law.

It will go even further than this. It will not permit a party, by the voluntary payment of the agreed penalty, to defeat the enforcement of the alternative contract. It will not entertain a suit for the recovery of damages merely, nor will it undertake to give damages save, as before observed, as ancillary or auxiliary to some one of its recognized subjects of jurisdiction; and so far from liquidated damages constituting an exception to the rule that courts of equity will not entertain suits for damages for breach of contract, it seems that, if the damages for the breach of a contract have been liquidated by the parties to the contract (that is, ascertained and agreed upon), that fact, so far from inviting the assistance of a court of equity, is sufficient to repel it. Indeed, this must of necessity be so, for, as the jurisdiction of the court to enforce contracts specifically rests upon the insufficiency of damages as a redress or remedy for failure to comply with a contract, the very foundation of jurisdiction seems wanting in those cases where the parties themselves have otherwise determined, and have fixed a money value in the form of liquidated damages upon the injury sustained by its breach. In this view is found an explanation of the leaning shown by courts of equity, in doubtful cases, to construe such agreements as we are here considering as creating a penalty or forfeiture rather than liquidated damages. For, if it be determined that it is but liquidated damages, the jurisdiction of a court of equity is at an end, but if it be construed as a forfeiture or penalty, then it affords no obstruction to the interpretation of the court of equity, because it will prohibit either the enforcement or the voluntary payment of the penalty or forfeiture, and will compel the performance of the alternative contract if a proper case be made. Courts of equity, therefore, always strongly incline to that construction which declares it to be a forfeiture or penalty rather than liquidated damages. In this case, however, a court of equity is without motive to prefer the one to the other construction. The alternative for which the penalty is given, if it be a penalty, is the securing of a contract for the building of a railroad. It is obviously impossible to compel the defendant either to build it himself or to procure others to build it. It will leave the parties, in the forum appropriate for that relief, to recover damages for its breach,—liquidated damages, if a court of law shall be of opinion that the parties so intended the stipulation in the contract, or damages in ordinary cases, if a court of law shall be of opinion that the stock or money stipulated to be paid was a penalty. We have not referred to cases. Cases upon the subject of the specific performance of contracts and other subjects discussed are too numerous even for citation. The whole subject has been treated with great fullness and ability in Pomeroy's Equity, and we shall content ourselves with referring to the appropriate chapters in that work, and especially to sections 446, 447, 1401-1403, and to Lawson, Rights, Rem. & Prac. pp. 2588, 2590, 2591, as sustaining the views here presented.

We are of opinion that the demurrer to the bill should have been sustained, and the bill dismissed, and therefore enter a decree reversing the decree of the circuit court.

BUCHANAN, J., absent.

CRAIG v. HUKILL et al.

(16 S. E. 363, 37 W. Va. 520.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of West Virginia.
Dec. 22, 1892.

Appeal from circuit court, Monongalia county.

Bill by Joseph W. Craig against E. M. Hukill & Co. and others for partition of land. There was a decree for partition. Defendant E. M. Hukill appeals. Reversed.

Okey Johnson, W. P. Hubbard, and Keck, Son & Fast, for appellant. Cox & Baker, for appellee.

BRANNON, J. W. M. Davis executed to David Kennedy a lease of a tract of land for a term of years, for the purpose of drilling for petroleum oil, which lease has come by assignment to E. M. Hukill. The deed of lease contains a covenant on the part of the lessee to commence operations for oil development within nine months, or for payment of a certain sum of money per month until commencement of work, with a provision that a failure to do one or the other should work an absolute forfeiture of the lease. Afterwards Davis executed an instrument by which he agreed to sell to H. P. Griffith all the oil and gas under the said tract, and Griffith transferred all his right in said tract to Joseph W. Craig. Davis had a life estate in said tract, with remainder in fee to his children; and, by the death of one of them, he inherited an undivided one-fifth share therein. Hukill, claiming under the first-mentioned lease, as also under a lease from the guardian of the surviving children, bored for and produced oil on the premises. Craig brought a suit in equity in the circuit court of Monongalia county against Hukill, Davis, and others, praying that the tract be partitioned, and one-fifth assigned as the share of Davis in fee, and that all the oil and gas under it be assigned to the plaintiff, Craig. The theory of Craig for relief is that by reason of failure to commence operations, or to pay money in lieu thereof, as provided in the lease to Kennedy, it had become forfeited, and he had, by the said agreement between Davis and Griffith, become entitled, in exclusion of all rights under the Kennedy lease, to all oil which Davis could convey. Obviously, Craig can get relief only through an enforcement of the forfeiture of the Kennedy lease. Thus, at the threshold of the case, we are met with the question whether a court of equity will enforce this alleged forfeiture.

Affirmative relief against penalties and forfeitures was one of the springs or fountains of equity jurisdiction, and the jurisdiction was very early exercised; and it would be going in the very opposite direction, and acting contrary to its essential principles, to affirmatively enforce a forfeiture. The elementary books on equity jurisprudence state the rule as almost an axiom, that equity never enforces a penalty or forfeiture. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1319; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 459; Bisp. Eq. § 181; Beach, Mod. Eq. Jur. § 1013. Mr. Pomeroy, in 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 460, says that rule is without exception; and I confess my search has led me to the same conclusion. This doctrine is supported in America by decisions of the highest authority, coming from jurists of the most eminent name,—among them, Kent and Marshall; and there seems to be no change or qualification in later decisions. Livingston v. Tompkins, 4 Johns. Ch. 415; Horsburg v. Baker, 1 Pet. 232; Marshall v. Vicksburg, 15 Wall. 146. The estate under the Kennedy lease certainly vested; and the plaintiff seeks, by a suit in equity, to divest it, which he can only do by declaring and enforcing the forfeiture of that lease, for the plaintiff's right must depend for its birth and existence on that forfeiture. In Livingston v. Tompkins, supra, it was held that "equity will not assist the recovery of a penalty or forfeiture, or anything in the nature of a forfeiture," and "will not lend its aid to divest an estate for the breach of a condition subsequent." McKim v. Mason, 2 Md. Ch. 510; Warner v. Bennett, 31 Conn. 468; Smith v. Jewett, 40 N. H. 530. In Oil Creek R. Co. v. Atlantic & G. W. R. Co., 57 Pa. 65, a bill was filed to enforce a forfeiture of a lease because of failure to build a road according to the express provisions of the lease; and the court refused, on the ground that equity never lends its aid in enforcement of a forfeiture, but will leave the parties to their legal remedies. Many cases cited in the text-books above cited sustain this principle. Though equity has jurisdiction in partition, yet it will not exercise it when it can be done only by enforcing a forfeiture, when the plaintiff's right grows only out of a forfeiture. As equity has no jurisdiction, we cannot decide the merits of the case, and therefore reverse the decree and dismiss the bill, without prejudice to the plaintiff to seek to assert his rights by any appropriate legal remedy.

KUNKLE et al. v. WHERRY.

(42 Atl. 112, 189 Pa. 198.)

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 2, 1899.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Allegheny county.

Action by H. H. Kunkle and Conrad Jordan, partners doing business as Kunkle & Jordan, against James Wherry, to recover a balance alleged to be due on a contract for granite construction. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. A. & Jas. Balph, for appellant. J. S. & E. G. Ferguson, for appellees.

FELL, J. The defendant was the contractor for the construction of a large, 10-story building, which he was required to complete in 11 months. By the terms of his contract with the owner, he was to receive $100 for each day less than the time limit, and to pay $1,000 for each day that he should exceed it, in the completion of the work. He entered into a contract with the plaintiffs for the stone and granite work. They agreed to furnish the materials, and to finish the work to the top of the second story, ready for the bricklayers, in six weeks' time after three stories of ironwork had been erected, and bound themselves "to pay the sum of $150 per day as a penalty for each and every day thereafter that the said work remains unfinished, as and for liquidated damages." The learned judge held that this stipulation should be regarded as a penalty, and not as liquidated damages, and that the defendant could set off against the plaintiffs' claim such damages only as he proved to have been actually sustained by him because of the delay of the plaintiffs in completing the work.

The rule that in actions ex contractu, where the breach of an agreement admits of compensation, the recovery may be limited to the loss actually sustained, notwithstanding a stipulation for a penalty, is founded upon the principle that one party should not be allowed to profit by the default of the other, and that compensation, and not forfeiture, is the equitable rule. Equity will regard a penalty or forfeiture as intended to secure the fulfillment of a contract, and it may preclude the injured party from recovering more than a just compensation, or from obtaining a collateral advantage. Notes to Peachy v. Duke of Somerset, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 2044; Bisp. Eq. 178. Whether a sum named as compensation for the breach of a contract is to be considered as a penalty to secure its fulfillment, from which equity will relieve, or as damages liquidated by the parties themselves, is a question which cannot be answered by the application of any general rule. The question is always one of construction, and any rule upon the subject is a mere guide to the intention of the parties. The grounds on which each case is to be considered and determined are clearly stated by our Brother Mitchell in Keck v. Bieber, 148 Pa. St. 645, 24 Atl. 170: "The general principle upon which the law awards damages is compensation for the loss suffered. The amount may be fixed by the parties in advance, but, where a lump sum is named by them, the court will always look into the question whether this is really liquidated damages, or only a penalty; the presumption being that it is the latter. The name by which it is called is of but slight weight; the controlling elements being the intent of the parties, and the special circumstances of the case." And he quotes with approval March v. Allabough, 103 Pa. St. 335: "The question * * * is to be determined by the intention of the parties, drawn from the words of the whole contract, examined in the light of its subject-matter and its surroundings; and in this examination we must consider the relation which the sum stipulated bears to the injury which may be caused by the several breaches provided against, the ease or difficulty of measuring a breach in damages, and such other matters as are legally or necessarily inherent in the transaction." From the nature of this case, the actual damages which would result from a breach of the contract would not readily be susceptible of ascertainment, and it seems to us that it was the manifest intention of the parties not to leave them to the uncertain estimate of a jury, but to fix them by express agreement. "Uncertainty as to the extent of the injuries which may ensue" was said in Powell v. Burroughs, 54 Pa. St. 329, and Coal Co. v. Schultz, 71 Pa. St. 180, "to be a criterion by which to determine whether it is a case of liquidated damages or a penalty." The damages named were for the breach of a single stipulation, and were not disproportionate to the loss which would probably result to the defendant from the failure of the plaintiffs to complete their work in time. The fifth and seventh assignments of error are sustained, and the judgment is reversed, with a venire facias de novo.

JAQUITH v. HUDSON.

(5 Mich. 123.)

Supreme Court of Michigan. May Term, 1858.

Error to circuit court, Wayne county.

The action was by Jaquith against Hudson, upon a promissory note for one thousand dollars, given by the latter to the former, April 15th, 1855, and payable twelve months after date. Defendant pleaded the general issue, and gave notice that on the trial he would prove that, previous to said 15th day of April, 1855, plaintiff and defendant had been and were partners in trade, at Trenton, in said county of Wayne, under the name of Hudson & Jaquith; that, on that day the copartnership was dissolved, and the parties then entered into an agreement, of which the following is a copy:

"This article of agreement, made and entered into between Austin E. Jaquith, of Trenton, Wayne county, and state of Michigan, of the first part, and Jonathan Hudson, of Trenton, county of Wayne, and state of Michigan, of the second part, witnesseth, that the said Austin E. Jaquith agrees to sell, and by these presents does sell and convey unto the said Jonathan Hudson, his heirs and assigns, all his right, title, and interest in the stock of goods now owned by the firm of Hudson and Jaquith, together with all the notes, books, book accounts, moneys, deposits, debts, dues, and demands, as well as all assets that in anywise belong to the said firm of Hudson & Jaquith; and that the copartnership that has existed between the said firm of Hudson & Jaquith is hereby dissolved; and that the said Austin E. Jaquith, by these presents, agrees that he will not engage in the mercantile business, in Trenton, for himself, or in connection with any other one, for the space of three years from this date, upon the forfeiture of the sum of one thousand dollars, to be collected by the said Hudson as his damages. In consideration whereof, the said Jonathan Hudson, of the second part, agrees for himself, his heirs and administrators, to pay unto the said Austin E. Jaquith the sum of nine hundred dollars, for his services in the firm of Hudson & Jaquith, together with all the money that he (the said Austin E. Jaquith) paid into said firm, deducting therefrom the amount which he (the said Austin E. Jaquith) has drawn from said firm; the remainder the said Hudson agrees to pay to the said Jaquith, his heirs or assigns, at a time and in a manner as shall be specified in a note bearing even date with these presents. And the said Hudson, for himself, his heirs and assigns, agrees to pay all the debts, notes and liabilities of the firm of Hudson & Jaquith, and to execute unto the said Jaquith a good and sufficient bond of indemnifi-cation against all claims, debts, or liabilities of the firm of Hudson & Jaquith.

"Trenton, April, 1855.

"Austin E. Jaquith. [L. S.]

"Jonathan Hudson. [L. S.]

"Witness: Arthur Edwards. Arthur Edwards, Jr."

And defendant further gave notice, among other things, that he would show, on the trial, that, after the execution of said agreement in writing, and the giving of said note in pursuance thereof, and on or about the 15th day of July, 1855, plaintiff, in violation of said agreement, entered into the mercantile business at Trenton, and had continued to carry on the same ever since; by means whereof the consideration of said note had failed. And he further gave notice, that he (the defendant) continued to carry on the mercantile business at Trenton, after the dissolution of said copartnership; and by means of the breach of said articles by plaintiff, defendant had sustained damages to the sum of one thousand dollars, liquidated by said articles for a breach thereof, which sum he would claim to have deducted from the amount of said note, on the trial.

On the trial, the plaintiff, having introduced the note in evidence, rested his case.

Defendant then proved by Arthur Edwards the due execution of said agreement. The defendant also proved by the said witness that the plaintiff resumed mercantile business in July, 1855, in the village of Trenton, within eighty rods of the old stand of Hudson & Jaquith, and had ever since continued in such business.

On cross-examination, Capt. Edwards testified that the above agreement was made in duplicate, and signed by the parties about the middle of April, 1855, which duplicates were placed in his hands, to be kept till the bond of indemnity and note mentioned in the agreement were executed; that the duplicates were not to be delivered till both parties came and demanded them. Hudson at once took exclusive possession of the store, goods, books, and papers of the old firm of Hudson & Jaquith, where the duplicate agreements were signed, and they were left in witness' hands until the other papers mentioned in them were executed. Witness did not recollect whether it was said by the parties that the agreement was not to take effect till both parties came for the duplicates. Witness never delivered to the defendant the agreement now produced by him, and cannot tell how it came into his possession. The plaintiff and defendant never came and jointly demanded the duplicates of him. He has no recollection that either of the parties ever notified him not to deliver over the papers.

On re-examination, witness said he lived at Trenton in 1855, and his papers were for the most part kept there. Witness cannot remember delivering this duplicate to defendant. It might have been delivered by him to defendant, but witness has no recollection of it.

The defendant then, by another witness, gave evidence tending to show that, not long after the date of said agreement, the bond of indemnity mentioned in the agreement was executed by defendant and delivered to the plaintiff.

No evidence was given to show any damage sustained by the defendant by reason of plaintiff's again engaging in business in Trenton.

The plaintiff then called as a witness Arthur Edwards, Jr., who testified that he was one of the subscribing witnesses to said agreement. The duplicate agreements were to go into Capt. Edwards' hands, and to be delivered only when plaintiff and defendant came together for and demanded them. When they were ready for signing, plaintiff hesitated about signing the duplicates, but witness thinks that Capt. Edwards then said that plaintiff could sign them safely, as he (the said Capt. Edwards) would hold them until they were jointly demanded; cannot remember whether Hudson or Edwards made the remark, but one of them made some remark which gave witness the impression that these duplicate papers were to be null until they should be both simultaneously delivered to the parties. Witness was in and out of the room, and did not hear the whole conversation, and cannot say positively whether Hudson was there when this remark was made. There was something said about some other papers, but witness could not recollect it distinctly.

The court was then asked by plaintiff's counsel to charge the jury as follows:

"(1) That a delivery to both parties, at the same time, of the agreement in duplicate, by Capt. Arthur Edwards, was essential to give it effect, and render it operative between the said plaintiff and defendant; and, before the defendant can claim the full benefit of it, he must show either such a delivery as was agreed upon, or a willful refusal, on the part of the plaintiff, that such delivery should be made.

"(2) That, even if the agreement set up was, in the opinion of the jury, properly delivered, as between the parties, the defendant can not recoup any damages against the plaintiff, except upon evidence showing that some damage was actually sustained by him; that the clause in the agreement as to damages cannot, of itself, and in the absence of evidence, operate to the reduction of the claim of the plaintiff, as the sum fixed in the agreement is in the nature of a penalty, and not liquidated damages; and no damages can be recovered under it except such as are proven."

The court refused so to charge; and plaintiff excepted.

The court then charged the jury in substance as follows:

That, if the jury were satisfied that the duplicate agreements were placed in Capt. Edwards' hands under the agreement between the parties that the same were not to become operative until both parties called on him to deliver them, that then they must be satisfied that such a delivery had taken place, or the agreement had never taken effect; but if, on the other hand, they should be satisfied that the real nature of the transaction was that the said duplicate agreements were to be placed in Capt. Edwards' hands solely to await the future execution and delivery of the bond, note, etc., mentioned in the agreement, and were thereupon to become operative, that then no formal delivery of said duplicates was necessary. The agreement in such case would take effect as soon as the bond, note, etc., mentioned, were made and delivered to plaintiff.

The court further charged the jury, that it was not necessary for the defendant to prove any actual damage under the plaintiff's breach of the said agreement, as the damages therein fixed were liquidated damages, and not a penalty.

The issue was then submitted to the jury on the evidence, who found a verdict for the plaintiff, in the sum of eighteen dollars and eight cents, allowing the defendant the sum of one thousand dollars mentioned in the agreement.

Plaintiff brought the case to this court, by writ of error, accompanied by bill of exceptions.

D. Bethune Duffield, for plaintiff in error.
G. V. N. Lothrop, for defendant in error.

CHRISTIANCY, J. The first point upon which the court below was requested to charge, and for the refusal of which the first exception is taken, assumed that, by the arrangement between the parties, the contract was not to become operative, or to have any force or effect, until the duplicates should be delivered by Capt. Edwards to both parties at the same time.

Whether such was the effect of the arrangement, or whether the agreements were placed in the hands of Capt. Edwards solely to await the execution and delivery of the bond and note mentioned in the contract, and thereupon to become operative, was a question which depended upon the intention of the parties, to be gathered from the whole transaction, their acts and declarations, and, in some measure, upon the nature and provisions of the contract itself. It was a question of fact involved in the issue. The court had no right to assume the truth or falsehood of either side of the question. The evidence bearing upon the point was conflicting. It was as clearly a question of fact for the jury as any other fact in issue in the cause. To have charged the jury as requested would have been an encroachment by the court upon the province of the jury.

The question was, therefore, properly submitted to the jury. The charge of the court in this particular was in all respects fair and correct, and the verdict of the jury is conclusive upon this point. The first exception, therefore, is not well taken.

The second exception raises the single question, whether the sum of $1,000, mentioned in the covenant of Jaquith not to go into business in Trenton, is to be construed as a penalty, or as stipulated damages—the plaintiff in error insisting it should be construed as the former, the defendant as the latter.

We shall not attempt here to analyze all the decided cases upon the subject, which were read and cited upon the argument, and which, with others, have been examined. It is not to be denied that there is some conflict, and more confusion, in the cases; judges have been long and constantly complaining of the confusion and want of harmony in the decisions upon this subject. But, while no one can fail to discover a very great amount of apparent conflict, still it will be found, on examination, that most of the cases, however conflicting in appearance, have yet been decided according to the justice and equity of the particular case. And while there are some isolated cases (and they are but few), which seem to rest upon no very intelligible principle, it will be found, we think, that the following general principles may be confidently said to result from, and to reconcile, the great majority of the cases, both in England and in this country:

First. The law, following the dictates of equity and natural justice, in cases of this kind, adopts the principle of just compensation for the loss or injury actually sustained; considering it no greater violation of this principle to confine the injured party to the recovery of less, than to enable him by the aid of the court to extort more. It is the application, in a court of law, of that principle long recognized in courts of equity, which, disregarding the penalty of the bond, gives only the damages actually sustained. This principle may be stated, in other words, to be, that courts of justice will not recognize or enforce a contract, or any stipulation of a contract, clearly unjust and unconscionable; a principle of common sense and common honesty so obviously in accordance with the dictates of justice and sound policy as to make it rather matter of surprise that courts of law had not always, and in all cases, adopted it to the same extent as courts of equity. And, happily for the purposes of justice, the tendency of courts of law seems now to be towards the full recognition of the principle, in all cases.

This principle of natural justice, the courts of law, following courts of equity, have, in this class of cases, adopted as the law of the contract; and they will not permit the parties by express stipulation, or any form of language, however clear the intent, to set it aside; on the familiar ground, "conventus privatorum non potest publico juri derogare."

But the court will apply this principle, and disregard the express stipulation of parties, only in those cases where it is obvious from the contract before them, and the whole subject-matter, that the principle of compensation has been disregarded, and that to carry out the express stipulation of the parties, would violate this principle, which alone the court recognizes as the law of the contract.

The violation, or disregard, of this principle of compensation, may appear to the court in various ways,—from the contract, the sum mentioned, and the subject-matter. Thus, where a large sum (say one thousand dollars) is made payable solely in consequence of the non-payment of a much smaller sum (say one hundred dollars), at a certain day; or where the contract is for the performance of several stipulations of very different degrees of importance, and one large sum is made payable on the breach of any one of them, even the most trivial, the damages for which can, in no reasonable probability, amount to that sum; in the first case, the court must see that the real damage is readily computed, and that the principle of compensation has been overlooked, or purposely disregarded; in the second case, though there may be more difficulty in ascertaining the precise amount of damage, yet, as the contract exacts the same large sum for the breach of a trivial or comparatively unimportant stipulation, as for that of the most important, or of all of them together, it is equally clear that the parties have wholly departed from the idea of just compensation, and attempted to fix a rule of damages which the law will not recognize or enforce.

We do not mean to say that the principle above stated as deducible from the cases, is to be found generally announced in express terms, in the language of the courts; but it will be found, we think, to be necessarily implied in, and to form the only rational foundation for, all that large class of cases which have held the sum to be in the nature of a penalty, notwithstanding the strongest and most explicit declarations of the parties that it was intended as stipulated and ascertained damages.

It is true, the courts in nearly all these cases profess to be construing the contract with reference to the intention of the parties, as if for the purpose of ascertaining and giving effect to that intention; yet it is obvious, from these cases, that wherever it has appeared to the court, from the face of the contract and the subject-matter, that the sum was clearly too large for just compensation, here, while they will allow any form of words, even those expressing the direct contrary, to indicate the intent to make it a penalty, yet no form of words, no force of language, is competent to the expression of the opposite intent. Here, then, is an intention incapable of expression in words; and as all written contracts must be expressed in words, it would seem to be a mere waste of time and effort to look for such an intention in such a contract. And as the question is between two opposite intents only, and the negation of the one necessarily implies the existence of the other, there would seem to be no room left for construction with reference to the intent. It must, then, be manifest that the intention of the parties in such cases is not the governing consideration.

But some of the cases attempt to justify this mode of construing the contract with reference to the intent, by declaring, in substance, that though the language is the strongest which could be used to evince the intention in favor of stipulated damages, still, if it appear clearly, by reference to the subject-matter, that the parties have made the stipulation without reference to the principle of just compensation, and so excessive as to be out of all proportion to the actual damage, the court must hold that they could not have intended it as stipulated damages, though they have so expressly declared. See, as an example of this class of cases, Kemble v. Farren, 6 Bing. 141.

Now this, it is true, may lead to the same result in the particular case, as to have placed the decision upon the true ground, viz., that though the parties actually intended the sum to be paid, as the damages agreed upon between them, yet it being clearly unconscionable, the court would disregard the intention, and refuse to enforce the stipulation. But, as a rule of construction, or interpretation of contracts, it is radically vicious, and tends to a confusion of ideas in the construction of contracts generally. It is this, more than anything else, which has produced so much apparent conflict in the decisions upon this whole subject of penalty and stipulated damages. It sets at defiance all rules of interpretation, by denying the intention of the parties to be what they, in the most unambiguous terms, have declared it to be, and finds an intention directly opposite to that which is clearly expressed—"divinatio, non interpretatio est, quæ omnino recedit a litera."

Again, the attempt to place this question upon the intention of the parties, and to make this the governing consideration, necessarily implies that, if the intention to make the sum stipulated damages should clearly appear, the court would enforce the contract according to that intention. To test this, let it be asked, whether, in such a case, if it were admitted that the parties actually intended the sum to be considered as stipulated damages, and not as a penalty, would a court of law enforce it for the amount stipulated? Clearly, they could not, without going back to the technical and long exploded doctrine which gave the whole penalty of the bond, without reference to the damages actually sustained. They would thus be simply changing the names of things, and enforcing, under the name of stipulated damages, what in its own nature is but a penalty.

The real question in this class of cases will be found to be, not what the parties intended, but whether the sum is, in fact, in the nature of a penalty; and this is to be determined by the magnitude of the sum, in connection with the subject-matter, and not at all by the words or the understanding of the parties. The intention of the parties can not alter it. While courts of law gave the penalty of the bond, the parties intended the payment of the penalty as much as they now intend the payment of stipulated damages; it must, therefore, we think, be very obvious that the actual intention of the parties, in this class of cases, and relating to this point, is wholly immaterial; and though the courts have very generally professed to base their decisions upon the intention of the parties, that intention is not, and can not be made, the real basis of these decisions. In endeavoring to reconcile their decisions with the actual intention of the parties, the courts have sometimes been compelled to use language wholly at war with any idea of interpretation, and to say "that the parties must be considered as not meaning exactly what they say." Homer v. Flintoff, 9 Mees. & W., per Park, B. May it not be said, with at least equal propriety, that the courts have sometimes said what they did not exactly mean?

The foregoing remarks are all to be confined to that class of cases where it was clear, from the sum mentioned and the subject-matter, that the principle of compensation had been disregarded.

But, secondly, there are great numbers of cases, where, from the nature of the contract and the subject-matter of the stipulation, for the breach of which the sum is provided, it is apparent to the court that the actual damages for a breach are uncertain in their nature, difficult to be ascertained, or impossible to be estimated with certainty, by reference to any pecuniary standard, and where the parties themselves are more intimately acquainted with all the peculiar circumstances, and therefore better able to compute the actual or probable damages, than courts or juries, from any evidence which can be brought before them. In all such cases, the law permits the parties to ascertain for themselves, and to provide in the contract itself, the amount of the damages which shall be paid for the breach. In permitting this, the law does not lose sight of the principle of compensation, which is the law of the contract, but merely adopts the computation or estimate of the damages made by the parties, as being the best and most certain mode of ascertaining the actual damage, or what sum will amount to a just compensation. The reason, therefore, for allowing the parties to ascertain for themselves the damages in this class of cases, is the same which denies the right in the former class of cases; viz., the courts adopt the best and most practicable mode of ascertaining the sum which will produce just compensation.

In this class of cases where the law permits the parties to ascertain and fix the amount of damages in the contract, the first inquiry obviously is, whether they have done so in fact? And here, the intention of the parties is the governing consideration; and in ascertaining this intention, no merely technical effect will be given to the particular words relating to the sum, but the entire contract, the subject-matter, and often the situation of the parties with respect to each other and to the subject-matter, will be considered. Thus though the word "penalty" be used (Sainter v. Ferguson, 7 Man., G. & S. 716; Jones v. Green, 3 Younge & J. 299; Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223), or "forfeit" (Noble v. Noble, 7 Cow. 307), or "forfeit and pay" (Fletcher v. Dycke, 2 Term R. 32), it will still be held to be stipulated damages, if, from the whole contract, the subject-matter, and situation of the parties, it can be gathered that such was their intention. And in proportion as the difficulty of ascertaining the actual damage by proof is greater or less, where this difficulty grows out of the nature of such damages, in the like proportion is the presumption more or less strong that the parties intended to fix the amount.

It remains only to apply these principles to the case before us. It is contended by the plaintiff in error, that the payment of the one thousand dollars mentioned in the covenant of Jaquith is not made dependent solely upon the breach of the stipulation not to go into business in Trenton, but that it applies equally—First, to the agreement to sell to Hudson his interest in the goods; second, to sell his interest in the books, notes, accounts, etc.; and, third, to the agreement to dissolve the partnership. But we can perceive no ground for such a construction. The language in reference to the sale of the interest in the goods, books, notes, accounts, etc., and that in reference to the dissolution, is not that of a sale in futuro, nor for the dissolution of the partnership at a future period, but it is that of a present sale and a present dissolution—"does hereby sell," and "the copartnership is hereby dissolved," is the language of the instrument. It is plain, from this language, from the subject-matter, and from all the acts of the parties, that these provisions were to take, and did take, immediate effect. There could be no possible occasion to provide any penalty or stipulated damages for the non-performance of these stipulations, because this sale and dissolution would already have been accomplished the moment the contract took effect for any purpose; and, until it took effect, the stipulation for the one thousand dollars could not take effect or afford any security, nor would Hudson be bound or need the security. But it remained to provide for the future. If Jaquith were to be at liberty to set up a rival store in the same village, it might seriously affect the success of Hudson's business; and we are bound to infer, from the whole scope of this contract, that Hudson would never have agreed to pay the consideration mentioned in it, nor to have entered into the contract at all, but for the stipulation of Jaquith "that he will not engage in the mercantile business in Trenton, for himself or in connection with any other one, for the space of three years from this date, upon the forfeiture of the sum of one thousand dollars, to be collected by said Hudson as his damages." This stipulation of Jaquith not to go into business, is the only one on his part which looks to the future; and it is to this, alone, that the language in reference to the one thousand dollars applies. Any other construction would do violence to the language, and be at war with the whole subject matter.

The damages to arise from the breach of this covenant, from the nature of the case, must be not only uncertain in their nature, but impossible to be exhibited in proof, with any reasonable degree of accuracy, by any evidence which could possibly be adduced. It is easy to see that while the damages might be very heavy, it would be very difficult clearly to prove any. Their nature and amount could be better estimated by the parties themselves, than by witnesses, courts, or juries. It is, then, precisely one of that class of cases in which it has always been recognized as peculiarly appropriate for the parties to fix and agree upon the damages for themselves. In such a case, the language must be very clear to the contrary, to overcome the inference of intent (so to fix them), to be drawn from the subject-matter and the situation of the parties; because, it is difficult to suppose, in such a case, that the party taking the stipulation intended it only to cover the amount of damages actually to be proved, as he would be entitled to the latter without the mention of any sum in the contract, and he must also be supposed to know that his actual damages, from the nature of the case, are not susceptible of legal proof to anything approaching their actual extent. That the parties actually intended, in this case, to fix the amount to be recovered, is clear from the language itself, without the aid of a reference to the subject-matter, "upon the forfeiture of the sum of one thousand dollars, to be collected by the said Hudson as his damages." It is manifest from this language that it was intended Hudson should "collect," or, in other words, receive this amount, and that it should be for his damages for the breach of the stipulation. This language is stronger than "forfeit and pay," or "under the penalty of," as these might be supposed to have reference to the form of the penal part of a bond, or to the form of action upon it, and not to the actual "collection" of the money.

It is, therefore, very clear, from every view we have been able to take of this case, that it was competent and proper for the parties to ascertain and fix for themselves the amount of damages for the breach complained of, and equally clear that they have done so in fact. From the uncertain nature of the damages, we cannot say that the sum in this case exceeds the actual damages, or that the principle of compensation has been violated. Indeed, it would have been perhaps difficult to discover a violation of this principle had the sum in this case been more than it now is, though, doubtless, even in such cases as the present, if the sum stated were so excessive as clearly to exceed all reasonable apprehension of actual loss or injury for the breach, we should be compelled to disregard the intention of the parties, and treat the sum only as a penalty to cover the actual damages to be exhibited in proof. In this case the party must be held to the amount stipulated in his contract.

The second exception, therefore, is not well taken; the court properly refused to charge as requested, and no error appearing in the record, the judgment of the circuit court for the county of Wayne must be affirmed.

The other justices concurred.

KEEBLE v. KEEBLE.

(5 South. 149, 85 Ala. 552.)

Supreme Court of Alabama. Dec. 8, 1888.

Appeal from city court, Dallas county; John Haralson, Judge.

This was an action brought by the appellant, Henry C. Keeble, against the appellee, Julia P. Keeble, as the executrix of R. C. Keeble, deceased, for the recovery of money alleged to be due the plaintiff by the defendant's testator. The defendant pleaded the general issue, payment, accord and satisfaction, and set-off. The only question in the case arose on the instruction given the jury by the court, founded on the facts set out in the seventh plea. The demurrer to this plea was overruled by the court. It was, in substance, that plaintiff and defendant's testator had been in partnership in the mercantile business. Plaintiff sold out to defendant's testator, but was employed by the latter as business manager. The terms of the employment imposed on plaintiff the obligation to wholly abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors, and, in the event he should become intoxicated, that he should pay, "as liquidated damages," the sum of $1,000. The plea alleged that plaintiff violated his promise to keep sober, and thereby became bound to pay to defendant's testator said sum of $1,000, which sum was offered as a set-off to plaintiff's demand.

Mr. Roy and White & White, for appellant. Pettus & Pettus, for appellee.

SOMERVILLE, J. The only question in this case is whether the sum of $1,000, agreed to be paid by the appellant, Henry C. Keeble, to Richard C. Keeble, the testator of the appellee, as mentioned in the written contract of employment between the parties, is to be regarded by the court as a penalty or as liquidated damages. The city court held it, in effect, to be liquidated damages, by charging the jury to find for the defendant, if the facts set out in the seventh plea were satisfactorily proved. The solution of this question is one which the courts have often confessed embarrassment in determining. No one rule can be announced which will furnish a single test or criterion for all cases, but, in most cases, a multitude of considerations are to be regarded in seeking to reach the real intention of the parties. The following general rules may be deduced from the authorities, each having more or less weight, according to the peculiar circumstances of each case, and the nature of the contract sought to be construed: (1) The court will always seek to ascertain the true and real intention of the contracting parties, giving due weight to the language or words used in the contract, but not always being absolutely controlled by them, when the enforcement of such contract operates with unconscionable hardship, or otherwise works an injustice.

(2) The mere denomination of the sum to be paid as "liquidated damages," or as "a penalty," is not conclusive on the court as to its real character. Although designated as "liquidated damages" it may be construed as a penalty, and often when called a "penalty" it may be held to be liquidated damages, where the intention to the contrary is plain. (3) The courts are disposed to lean against any interpretation of a contract which will make it liquidated damages; and, in all cases of doubtful intention, will pronounce the stipulated sum a penalty. (4) Where the payment of a smaller sum is secured by an obligation to pay a larger sum, it will be held a penalty, and not liquidated damages. (5) Where the agreement is for the performance or non-performance of a single act, or of several acts, or of several things which are but minor parts of a single complex act, and the precise damage resulting from the violation of each covenant is wholly uncertain or incapable of being ascertained save by conjecture, the parties may agree on a fixed sum as liquidated damages, and the courts will so construe it, unless it is clear on other grounds that a penalty was really intended. (6) When the contract provides for the performance of several acts of different degrees of importance, and the damages resulting from the violation of some, although not all, of the provisions are of easy ascertainment, and one large gross sum is stipulated to be paid for the breach of any, it will be construed a penalty, and not as liquidated damages. (7) When the agreement provides for the performance of one or more acts, and the stipulation is to pay the same gross sum for a partial as for a total or complete breach of performance, the sum will be construed to be a penalty. (8) Whether the sum agreed to be paid is out of proportion to the actual damages, which will probably be sustained by a breach, is a fact into which the court will not enter on inquiry, if the intent is otherwise made clear that liquidated damages, and not a penalty, are in contemplation. (9) Where the agreement is in the alternative, to do one of two acts, but is to pay a larger sum of money in the one event than in the other, the obligor having his election to do either, the amount thus agreed to be paid will be held liquidated damages, and not a penalty. (10) In applying these rules, the controlling purpose of which is to ascertain the real intention of the parties, the court will consider the nature of the contract, the terms of the whole instrument, the consequences naturally resulting from a breach of its stipulations, and the peculiar circumstances surrounding the transaction; thus permitting each case to stand, as far as possible, on its own merits and peculiarities. These rules are believed to be sustained by the preponderance of judicial decisions. Graham v. Bickham, 1 Am. Dec. 328, and note, pp. 331-340; Williams v. Vance, 30 Am. Rep. 26, and note, pp. 28-36; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 440-446; McPherson v.

Robertson, 82 Ala. 459, 2 South. 333; Hooper v. Railroad Co., 69 Ala. 529; Watts v. Shepard, 2 Ala. 425; Bish. Cont. § 1452; Curry v. Larer, 7 Pa. St. 470; Foley v. McKeegan, 4 Iowa, 1; Nash v. Hermosilla, 9 Cal. 584; Muse v. Swayne, 2 Lea, 251; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 258.

The appellant was in the employment of the appellee's testator as a business manager, at very liberal wages, having been a partner with him in the mercantile business, under the firm name of R. C. Keeble & Co. Although he was but an employé, having sold to R. C. Keeble his entire interest in the partnership business, he remained ostensibly a partner. The terms of the employment, reduced to writing, imposed on the appellant, Henry Keeble, the obligation, among other duties, "to wholly abstain from the use of intoxicating liquors," and "to continue and remain sober," giving his diligent attention to the business of his employer, and promising, in the event he should become intoxicated, that he would pay, "as liquidated damages," the sum of $1,000, which the testator, Richard Keeble, was authorized to retain out of a certain debt he owed the appellant. The appellant violated his promise by becoming intoxicated, and remained so for a long time, and acted rudely and insultingly towards the customers and employés of the testator, and otherwise deported himself, by reason of intoxication, in such manner as to do injury to the business. It is not denied by appellant's counsel that this is a total breach of the promise to keep sober; nor is it argued that the damage resulting from the violation of such a promise can be ascertained with any degree of certainty; nor even that the amount agreed to be paid as liquidated damages, in the event of a breach, is disproportionate to the damages which may have been actually sustained in this case. But the contention seems to be that, inasmuch as it was possible for a breach to occur with no actual damages other than nominal, the amount agreed to be paid should be construed to be a penalty. Unless this view is correct, the application of the foregoing rules to the construction of the agreement manifestly stamps it as a stipulation for liquidated damages, and not a penalty. It is argued, in other words, that becoming intoxicated in private, while off duty, would be a violation of the contract, but would be attended with no actual damage to the business of R. C. Keeble & Co. This fact would, in our opinion, except the case from the operation of the rules above enunciated. There are but few agreements of this kind where the stipulation is to do or not do a particular act, in which the damages may not, according to circumstances, vary, on a sliding scale, from nominal damages to a considerable sum. One may sell out the good-will of his business in a given locality, and agree to abstain from its further prosecution, or, in the event of his breach of his agreement, to pay a certain sum as liquidated damages; as, for example, not to practice one's profession as a physician or lawyer, not to run a steam-boat on a certain river or to carry on the hotel business in a particular town, not to re-establish a newspaper for a given period, or to carry on a particular branch of business within a certain distance from a named city. In all such cases, as often decided, it is competent for the parties to stipulate for the payment of a gross sum by way of liquidated damages for the violation of the agreement, and for the very reason that such damages are uncertain, fluctuating, and incapable of easy ascertainment. Williams v. Vance, 30 Am. Rep. 29-31, note; Graham v. Bickham, 1 Am. Dec. 336-338, note; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 442, note 1. It is clear that each of these various agreements may be violated by a substantial breach, and yet no damages might accrue except such as are nominal. The obligor may practice medicine, and possibly never interfere with the practice of the other contracting party; or law, without having a paying client; or he may run a steam-boat without a passenger; or an hotel without a guest; or carry on a newspaper without the least injury to any competitor. But the law will not enter upon an investigation as to the quantum of damages in such cases. This is the very matter settled by the agreement of the parties. If the act agreed not to be done is one from which, in the ordinary course of events, damages, incapable of ascertainment save by conjecture, are liable naturally to follow, sometimes more and sometimes less, according to the aggravation of the act, the court will not stop to investigate the extent of the grievance complained of as a total breach, but will accept the sum agreed on as a proper and just measurement, by way of liquidated damages, unless the real intention of the parties, under the rules above announced, designed it as a penalty. We may add, moreover, that no one can accurately estimate the physiological relation between private and public drunkenness, nor the causal connection between intoxication one time and a score of times. The latter, in each instance, may follow from the former, and the one may naturally lead to the other. There would seem to be nothing harsh or unreasonable in stipulating against the very source and beginning of the more aggravated evil sought to be avoided. The duty resting on the court, in all these cases, is to so apply the settled rules of construction as to ascertain the legally expressed and real intention of the parties. Courts are under no obligations, nor have they the power, to make a wiser or better contract for either of the parties than he may be supposed to have made for himself. The court below, in our judgment, did not err in holding, as it did, by its rulings, that the sum agreed to be paid the appellee's testator was liquidated damages, and not a penalty. Affirmed.

HEYDER et al. v. EXCELSIOR BUILDING
LOAN ASS'N NO. 2 OF CITY OF NEWARK.

(8 Atl. 310, 42 N. J. Eq. 403.)

Court of Errors and Appeals of New Jersey.
March 5, 1887.

C. T. Glen, for appellants. Guild & Lum, for respondents.

KNAPP, J. The learned master who decided this cause reached the conclusion on the evidence that the purchaser of the premises, and not the mortgagee, should bear the loss incident to the fraudulent cancellation of the mortgage made upon the record prior to the purchase, on the faith of which cancellation the buyer parted with the whole purchase money believing the property to be unincumbered. After a careful review of the case, I am led to an opposite result. I am fully impressed with the importance of securing due protection to the holders of mortgage securities, where, in pursuit of the provisions of the registry laws, the lien has been made apparent on the record. The security afforded by registry should remain undisturbed by a cancellation effected through mistake, accident, or fraud of third persons, even if by such cancellation subsequent mortgages or purchasers are made to suffer loss. Such after-acquired rights ought not to prevail against the just claims of an innocent non-negligent incumbrancer, because the record has been wrongly effaced. Cancellation of a mortgage on the record is only prima facie evidence of its discharge, and it is left to the owner making the allegation to prove the canceling to have been done by fraud, accident, or mistake. Such proof being made, the mortgage will be established, even against subsequent purchasers or mortgagees without notice. Banking Co. v. Woodruff, 2 N. J. Eq. 117; Harrison v. Railroad Co., 19 N. J. Eq. 488.

Between a mortgagee whose mortgage has been discharged of record solely through the unauthorized act of another party, and a purchaser who buys the title in the belief, induced by such cancellation, that the mortgage is satisfied and discharged, the equities are balanced, and the rights in the order of time must prevail. The lien of the mortgage must remain despite the apparent discharge. But this is apart from any default attributable to the holder of the lien. If through his negligence the record is permitted to give notice to the world that his claim is satisfied, he cannot, in the face of his own carelessness, have his mortgage enforced against a bona fide purchaser taking his title on the faith that the registry is discharged. Where one gives to another the power to practice a fraud upon innocent parties, the court will not interfere in his protection at the expense of those who have been deceived and misled by such fraud. What circumstance shall be sufficient to establish negligence, such as shall preclude a mortgagee from a decree establishing his canceled paper, must be determined as a question of fact in each particular case, tested by those rules of conduct which men of common prudence usually observe in the care and management of such securities. That it is negligence in the owner of a mortgage to permit it to be in the custody and control of the mortgagor or owner of the mortgaged premises, in view of the provisions of our statute of registry, will not admit of denial. Such an occurrence is so unusual, so imperils the owner, and therefore so unlikely to happen in business dealings, that it was regarded in Harrison v. Railroad Co. as ground for the gravest suspicion of the truthfulness of a witness who had testified to such custody by the assent of the owner of the security.

The minute of discharge of this mortgage made upon the record by the register expressed, in general form, the fact of cancellation. The entry was made upon evidence presented to the register such as the statute has declared to be sufficient authority for so doing. The mortgage was produced by the mortgagor, canceled, and there is no doubt that upon the faith of this cancellation the purchaser took title to the property, and paid the consideration. But it clearly appears that the mortgage was unpaid, and that the act of the mortgagor in procuring the entry of the discharge was fraudulent, and without the knowledge or assent of the mortgagee. If this were all of the case, and no default appeared on the part of the mortgagee, notwithstanding the forcible language of the act which declares such minute to be a full and absolute bar to and discharge of the said entry, registry, and mortgage, the right of the respondent to the lien of its security should be maintained; and it is solely upon the ground that the respondent is chargeable with negligence which tended to and actually did produce the injury that I think the decree should be reversed. The mortgage was in the possession and under the control of the mortgagor at the time when it was produced for cancellation on the record. How long he had such custody does not positively appear, but the strong inference from the testimony is that it was during the whole time between the registry of the mortgage and its cancellation. Neither the president of the association, nor its treasurer, who had charge of its securities, were able to say that they ever had the actual custody of this mortgage; and they further declare that the mortgagor, although an officer of the company, had no access whatever to the securities in the possession of the treasurer. It is therefore impossible that he should have obtained its possession by means resembling theft. His possession must, I think, be attributed either to the assent or to the negligence of the officers of the association responsible for its securities. If we regard the theory that the mortgagor, at the conclusion of his transaction of the loan, fraudulently substituted a copy of the mortgage for the original paper, and delivered that to the association, I am still forced to the conclusion that the officers were culpably negligent in permitting themselves to be thus imposed upon. The fact that he was the law officer of this body would not justify so implicit a trust in him in the matter of a loan to himself. We must assume that these officers were men of business capacity and skill. The transaction was in the line of their ordinary duties. Indeed, they did not trust to him, but employed other counsel to make searches against his property. In their ordinary transactions their habit was to submit to counsel the securities received for loans for inspection and approval. The slightest examination of the paper received by them would have shown it to be but a copy. They submitted it to no legal adviser; they gave it no examination. If it were not intended to be, as was its purport, a mere copy, leaving the original in other hands, any degree of care, exceeding the blindest confidence, must have revealed the deception. The theory fails to lead us out of the difficulty. I do not think that any circumstance presented in this case made it the appellant's duty, in order to avail himself of the rights of a bona fide purchaser, to institute personal inquiry of the mortgagee. Any rule placing him under this exaction would embrace every case of a purchase of lands that had ever been subject to mortgage which the record showed to be canceled. Such a rule, it is needless to say, would render this provision of the registry act entirely nugatory. A purchaser could then only buy with safety when the registry had been discharged, and an admission of payment obtained from the mortgagee. Doubtless circumstances may, and frequently do, arise to put the purchaser upon inquiry, and charge him with notice. It seems to me that nothing appears in this transaction which should have put this purchaser upon further inquiry. He was permitted to rely upon the record. He did so, purchasing upon the belief that it spoke the fact truly. It was false, but the deception was directly traceable to the culpable negligence of the mortgage owner, and the loss should fall upon the party chargeable with the fault.

The decree below should be reversed, and the bill of complainants be dismissed.

PHILLIPS v. PHILLIPS.

(4 De Gex, F. & J. 208.)

Court of Appeal in Chancery. Jan. 11, 1862.

F. O. Haynes, for plaintiff. Mr. Malins and John Pearson, for defendants.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.

When I reserved my judgment at the conclusion of the argument in this case, it was rather out of respect to that argument than from a feeling of any difficulty with regard to the question that had been so strenuously contested before me.

The case is a very simple one. The plaintiff claims as the grantee of an annuity granted by a deed dated in the month of February, 1820, to issue out of certain lands in the county of Monmouth, secured by powers of distress and entry. The annuity or rent charge was not to arise until the death of one Rebecca Phillips, who died in the month of December, 1839, and the first payment of the annuity became due on the 8th March, 1840.

The case was argued on both sides on the admitted basis that the legal estate was outstanding in certain incumbrancers, and is still outstanding. Subject to the annuity the grantor was entitled in fee simple in equity. In February, 1821, the grantor intermarried with one Mary Phillips. On the occasion of that marriage a settlement, dated in February, 1821, was executed, and under this deed the defendants claim, and claim, therefore, as purchasers for a valuable consideration. No payment has ever been made in respect of the annuity.

The bill was filed within twenty years, and seeks the ordinary relief applicable to the case. The defendants by their answer insist that the deed was voluntary, and therefore void, under the statute of Elizabeth, as against them in their character of purchasers for valuable consideration, and they also insist upon the statute of limitations. But in the answer the defense of purchase for valuable consideration without notice is not attempted to be raised.

At the hearing an affidavit of Mary Phillips and another person was produced, denying the fact of notice of the annuity at the time of the grant and at the time of the creation of the marriage settlement, and the contention at the bar was that the defense of purchase for valuable consideration without notice was available for the defendants under these circumstances, and ought to be allowed as a bar to the claim by the court. The vice chancellor in his judgment refused to admit the defense of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, and I entirely agree with him in the conclusion that such a defense requires to be pleaded by the answer, more especially where an answer has been put in.

But I do not mean to rest my decision upon that particular ground because I have permitted the argument to proceed with reference to the general proposition, which was maintained before me with great energy and learning, viz., that the doctrine of a court of equity was this, that it would give no relief whatever to any claimant against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. It was urged upon me that authority to this effect was to be found in some recent decisions of this court, and particularly in the case decided at the rolls of Attorney General v. Wilkins, 17 Beav. 285.

I undoubtedly was struck with the novelty and extent of the doctrine that was thus advanced, and in order to deal with the argument it becomes necessary to revert to elementary principles. I take it to be a clear proposition that every conveyance of an equitable interest is an innocent conveyance, that is to say, the grant of a person entitled merely in equity passes only that which he is justly entitled to and no more. If, therefore, a person seised of an equitable estate (the legal estate being outstanding) makes an assurance by way of mortgage or grants an annuity, and afterwards conveys the whole estate to a purchaser, he can grant to the purchaser that which he has, viz., the estate subject to the mortgage or annuity, and no more. The subsequent grantee takes only that which is left in the grantor. Hence grantees and incumbrancers claiming in equity take and are ranked according to the dates of their securities; and the maxim applies, "Qui prior est tempore potior est jure." The first grantee is potior, that is potentior. He has a better and superior, because a prior, equity. The first grantee has a right to be paid first, and it is quite immaterial whether the subsequent incumbrancers, at the time when they took their securities and paid their money, had notice of the first incumbrance or not. These elementary rules are recognized in the case of Brace v. Duchess of Marlborough, 2 P. Wms. 491, and they are further illustrated by the familiar doctrine of the court as to tacking securities. It is well known that if there are three incumbrancers, and the third incumbrancer, at the time of his incumbrance and payment of his money, had no notice of the second incumbrance, then, if the first mortgagee or incumbrancer has the legal estate, and the third pays him off, and takes an assignment of his securities and a conveyance of the legal estate, he is entitled to tack his third mortgage to the first mortgage which he has acquired, and to exclude the intermediate incumbrancer; but this doctrine is limited to the case where the first mortgagee has the legal title, for, if the first mortgagee has not the legal title, the third does not, by the transfer, obtain the legal title, and the third mortgagee, by payment off of the first, acquires no priority over the second. Now the defense of a purchaser for valuable consideration is the creature of a court of equity, and it can never be used in a manner at variance with the elementary rules which have already been stated. It seems at first to have been used as a shield against the claim in equity of persons having a legal title. Bassett v. Nosworthy, Finch, 102. 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1, is, if not the earliest, the best early reported case on the subject. There the plaintiff claimed under a legal title, and this circumstance, together with the maxim which I have referred to, probably gave rise to the notion that this defense was good only against the legal title; but there appear to be three cases in which the use of this defense is most familiar:

First, where an application is made to an auxiliary jurisdiction of the court by the possessor of a legal title, as by an heir at law (which was the case in Bassett v. Nosworthy, Finch, 102. 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 1), or by a tenant for life for the delivery of title deeds (which was the case of Wallwyn v. Lee, 9 Ves. 24), and the defendant pleads that he is a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration without notice. In such a case the defense is good, and the reason given is that, as against a purchaser for valuable consideration without notice, the court gives no assistance, that is, no assistance to the legal title. But this rule does not apply where the court exercises a legal jurisdiction concurrently with courts of law. Thus it was decided by Lord Thurlow in Williams v. Lambe, 3 Brown Ch. 264, that the defense could not be pleaded to a bill for dower, and by Sir J. Leach in Collins v. Archer, 1 Russ. & M. 284. that it was no answer to a bill for fines. In those cases the court of equity was not asked to give the plaintiff any equitable, as distinguished from legal, relief.

The second class of cases is the ordinary one of several purchasers or incumbrancers, each claiming in equity, and one who is later and last in time succeeds in obtaining an outstanding legal estate not held upon existing trusts or a judgment, or any other legal advantage the possession of which may be a protection to himself or an embarrassment to other claimants. He will not be deprived of this advantage by a court of equity. To a bill filed against him for this purpose, by a prior purchaser or incumbrancer, the defendant may maintain the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, for the principle is that a court of equity will not disarm a purchaser, that is, will not take from him the shield of any legal advantage. This is the common doctrine of the tabula in naufragio.

Thirdly, where there are circumstances that give rise to an equity as distinguished from an equitable estate,—as, for example, an equity to set aside a deed for fraud, or to correct it for mistake,—and the purchaser under the instrument maintains the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, the court will not interfere.

Now these are the three cases in which the defense in question is most commonly found. None of them involve the case that is now before me.

It was indeed said at the bar that the defendants, being in possession, had a legal advantage in respect of the possession, of which they ought not to be deprived; but that is to confound the subject of adjudication with the means of determining it. The possession is the thing which is the subject of controversy, and is to be awarded by the court to one or to the other; but the subject of controversy and the means of determining the right to that subject are perfectly different. The argument, in fact, amounts to this, "I ought not to be deprived of possession, because I have possession." The purchaser will not be deprived of anything that gives him a legal right to the possession, but the possession itself must not be confounded with the right to it.

The case therefore that I have to decide is the ordinary case of a person claiming, under an innocent equitable conveyance, that interest which existed in the grantor at the time when that conveyance was made; but, as I have already said, that interest was diminished by the estate that had been previously granted to the annuitant, and, as there was no ground for pretending that the deed creating the annuity was a voluntary deed, so there is no ground whatever for contending that the estate of the person taking under the subsequent marriage settlement is not to be treated by this court, being an equitable estate, as subject to the antecedent annuity, just as effectually as if the annuity itself had been noticed and excepted out of the operation of the subsequent instrument.

I have no difficulty, therefore, in holding that the plea of purchase for valuable consideration is upon principle not at all applicable to the case before me, even if I could take notice of it as having been rightly and regularly raised.

We next come to examine the authorities upon which the defense relies. Now, undoubtedly, I cannot assent to some observations which I find attributed to the master of the rolls in the report of the case of Attorney General v. Wilkins, 17 Beav. 285, but to the decision of that case, as explained by his honor in the subsequent case of Colyer v. Finch, 19 Beav. 500, I see no reasonable objection, and the principles that I have here been referring to are fully explained and acted on by the master of the rolls in the case of Colyer v. Finch, 19 Beav. 500. It is impossible, therefore, to suppose that he intended to lay down anything in the case of Attorney General v. Wilkins, 17 Beav. 285, which is at variance with the ordinary rules of the court as I have already explained them, or which could give countenance to the argument that has been raised before me at the bar.

I have consequently no difficulty in holding that the decree of his honor the vice chancellor is right upon the grounds on which he placed it in the court below, and that also it would have been right if he had considered the grounds which have been urged before me in support of this petition of rehearing. I therefore affirm the decree and dismiss the petition of rehearing; but, inasmuch as the plaintiff sues in forma pauperis, of course it must be dismissed without costs.

Mr. Pearson, for appellant, asked for a return of the deposit.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.

I think that the respondent should have the benefit of the deposit. You purchase the liberty of coming here by the deposit. I do not think that I can give the appellant any further costs against you, but I can give him the benefit of the deposit which, according to the rules of the court, you have made. Therefore the deposit will be given to him, unless it exceeds the costs of the appeal.

KNAPP v. BAILEY.

(9 Atl. 122, 79 Me. 195.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. March 1, 1887.

On appeal from decision of single justice at nisi prius, Penobscot county.

Bill in equity brought to remove a cloud from the complainant's title, and to redeem the land from an equitable mortgage. The judge at nisi prius rendered a decision in favor of the complainant, and the respondent appealed to the law court.

A. W. Paine and C. P. Stetson, for complainant. Davis & Bailey, for respondent.

PETERS, C. J. This bill seeks to remove a cloud overhanging the complainant's title to an undivided parcel of land,—in effect, to redeem the land from an equitable mortgage, the allegation being that the debt has been paid. We can have no reasonable doubt of the facts thus far alleged. The defendant's grantor was called as a witness by the complainant. The defendant contends that his testimony was inadmissible, and cites cases which sustain the ordinary principle that a grantor cannot dispute with his grantee the title which he has assumed to convey. The objection goes to the testimony, and not to the witness personally. The principle of estoppel, which is invoked, is aimed, not against the witness because he is a grantor, but against any oral testimony to contradict the terms of a deed. As said by Judge Curtis in answer to the same objection: "The facts to be proved were dehors the record, and one witness was as competent, in point of law, [to prove them,] as another." Where a grantor is allowed to prove a fact by another, he may do so by himself. Holbrook v. Bank, 2 Curt. 246.

It is true, as a general rule, that the effect of a deed cannot be controlled by oral evidence. But among the exceptions to the rule is that in equity, where the proof is clear and convincing, a deed absolute on its face may be construed to be an equitable mortgage. In Rowell v. Jewett, 69 Me. 293, this exceptional doctrine was first allowed to have operation in this state. It was fully accepted in Stinchfield v. Milliken, 71 Me. 567, where the opinion says: "But the transaction was in equity a mortgage,—an equitable mortgage. The criterion is the intention of the parties. In equity this intention may be ascertained from all pertinent facts, either within or without the written parts of the transaction. Where the intention is clear that an absolute conveyance is taken as a security for a debt, it is in equity a mortgage. The real intention governs." In Lewis v. Small, 71 Me. 552, the same doctrine is admitted. It has since been affirmed in other cases, receiving an able discussion in the late case of Reed v. Reed, 75 Me. 264.

The effect of many of the older cases in this state has been swept away by this new principle in our legal system,—a product of the growth of the law, very greatly promoted by legislative stimulation. The present case must be governed by the equitable rule declared in the later decisions.

Another question presented by the case is whether the statutory provision (Rev. St. c. 73, § 12) which declares that a title of a purchaser for a valuable consideration cannot be defeated by a trust, unless the purchaser had notice thereof, means actual or constructive notice. Section 8 of the same chapter requires "actual notice" of an unrecorded deed to defeat a subsequent purchaser's title from the same grantor. The two sections were incorporated in our statutory system at the same time,—in the Revision of 1841. One requires "notice," the other "actual notice." We think the difference in phraseology may be accounted for partly on the idea that section 8 would be applicable more to law cases, and section 12 more to questions in equity. We can have no doubt that there may be cases of constructive trusts where section 12 would apply. At the same time, where the facts present questions analogous to those ordinarily arising under the other section, we think actual notice would be required; that under either section, in cases generally, actual notice, as we understand the meaning of the term, would be the rule; and that actual notice applies in the present case.

There is a conflict in the cases and among writers as to what is actual notice. Much of the difference is said to be verbal only,—more apparent than real. Certain propositions, however, are quite well agreed upon by a majority of the authorities. Notice does not mean knowledge; actual knowledge is not required. Mr. Wade describes the modes of proving actual notice as of two kinds. One he denominates express notice, and the other implied. "Implied, which imputes knowledge to the party because he is shown to be anxious of having the means of knowledge, though he does not use them; in other words, where he chooses to remain voluntarily ignorant of the fact, or is grossly negligent in not following up the inquiry which the known facts suggest." Wade, Notice (2d Ed.) § 5. Some writers use the word "implied" as meaning constructive, and would regard what is here described to be implied actual notice as constructive notice merely. As applicable to actual notice, such as is required by the sections of the statute under consideration, we think the classification of the author whom we quote is satisfactory. The author further explains the distinction by adding that "notice by implication differs from constructive notice, with which it is frequently confounded, and which it greatly resembles, with respect to the character of the inference upon which it rests; constructive notice being the creature of positive law, or resting upon strictly legal inference, while implied notice arises from inference of fact." It amounts substantially to this: that actual notice may be proved by direct evidence, or it may be inferred or implied (that is, proved) as a fact from indirect evidence,—by circumstantial evidence. A man may have notice or its legal equivalent. He may be so situated as to be estopped to deny that he had actual notice. We are speaking of the statutory notice required under the conveyances act. A higher grade of evidence may be necessary to prove actual notice appertaining to commercial paper. Kellogg v. Curtis, 69 Me. 212. The same facts may sometimes be such as to prove both constructive and actual notice; that is, a court might infer constructive notice, and a jury infer actual notice, from the facts. There may be cases where the facts show actual, when they do not warrant the inference of constructive, notice; as where a deed is not regularly recorded, and not giving constructive notice, but a second purchaser sees it on the records, thereby receiving actual notice. Hastings v. Cutler, 24 N. H. 481.

Mr. Pomeroy (2 Eq. Jur. 596, note) summarizes the effect of the American cases on the point under discussion in the following words: "In a few of the states the courts have interpreted the intention of the legislature as demanding that the personal information of the unrecorded instrument should be proved by the direct evidence, and as excluding all instances of actual notice established by circumstantial evidence. In most of the states, however, where this statutory clause is found, the courts have defined the 'actual notice' required by the legislature as embracing all instances of that species in contradistinction from constructive notice; that is, all kinds of actual notice, whether proved by direct evidence or inferred as a legitimate conclusion from circumstances."

The doctrine of actual notice implied by circumstances (actual notice in the second degree) necessarily involves the rule that a purchaser, before buying, should clear up the doubts which apparently hang upon the title, by making due inquiry and investigation. If a party has knowledge of such facts as would lead a fair and prudent man, using ordinary caution, to make further inquiries, and he avoids the inquiry, he is chargeable with notice of the facts which by ordinary diligence he would have ascertained. He has no right to shut his eyes against the light before him. He does a wrong not to heed the "signs and signals" seen by him. It may be well concluded that he is avoiding notice of that which he in reality believes or knows. Actual notice of facts which to the mind of a prudent man indicate notice is proof of notice. 3 Washb. Real Prop. (3d Ed.) 335.

It must be admitted that our present views are not fully supported by the case of Spofford v. Weston, 29 Me. 140, a decision made 40 years ago. But the doctrine has grown liberally since that day, and the correctness of some things pronounced in that opinion is virtually denied in subsequent cases. Porter v. Sevey, 43 Me. 519; Hull v. Noble, 40 Me. 459; Jones v. McNarrin, 68 Me. 334. Many cases which affirm the doctrine contended for by the complainant, as well as many opposing cases, are cited by the text writers. Wade, Notice, §§ 10, 11, et seq., and cases in notes; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 603, and notes. The decided preponderance of authority supports the position that the statutory "actual notice" is a conclusion of fact capable of being established by all grades of legitimate evidence.

As to what would be a sufficiency of facts to excite inquiry no rule can very well establish. Each case depends upon its own facts. There is a great inconsistency in the cases upon this point. But we are satisfied that in the case before us the defendant must be charged with notice that his grantor held title by what equity must declare to be an invalid deed. He saw the grantor was out of possession. He could have easily ascertained that he never had possession. He knew that others had controlled the property in many ways for many years. He examined the registry when he discovered the deed in question, and there must have seen evidence of other conveyances inconsistent with its full validity. He purchased the property for $40, while worth, had the title been perfect, nearer $1,000. He took a quitclaim deed; and it is held by some courts that such an instrument of conveyance does not make him a bona fide purchaser without notice (Baker v. Humphrey, 101 U. S. 494), although in our system it is a circumstance only bearing on the question (Mansfield v. Dyer, 131 Mass. 200). More than all else, perhaps, the defendant made no inquiry of the grantor whether he had any real title or not, asking no explanations, but insisting to him that he had no valuable title. It is impossible for us to say, in the light of these impressive illuminating proofs, that the defendant purchased without notice. He purchased on the basis of a merely nominal title. We would not say that he did not believe he could legally purchase, encouraged, as he was, by the doctrine of the earlier cases, now abrogated; nor do we impute more than a want of caution and of diligence. Men's interests spur their judgments to one-sided conclusions oftentimes. The great dramatist makes a character reluctant to acknowledge the situation say, "I cannot dare to know that which I know;" while another, more quick-sighted, because anxious to believe, exclaims, "Seems, Madam! Nay, it is. I know not seems." One rejects proof on the clearest facts; the other accepts it on the slightest. Judgment affirmed.

WALTON, DANFORTH, EMERY, FOSTER, and HASKELL, JJ., concurred.

KIRSCH et al. v. TOZIER et al.

(38 N. E. 375, 143 N. Y. 390.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Oct. 23, 1894.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, fifth department.

Action brought by Theodore Kirsch and another against Orange L. Tozier, the Buffalo Savings Bank, and others, to reinstate a mortgage executed by defendant Lester H. Tozier and wife to defendant Orange L. Tozier, in trust for plaintiffs, to set aside its discharge, and for its foreclosure. The bank held a subsequent mortgage. From a judgment of the general term (18 N. Y. Supp. 334) affirming a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought to reinstate a mortgage executed by the defendant Lester H. Tozier and his wife to the defendant Orange L. Tozier, which was made in trust for the plaintiffs, Michael Kirsch and Theodore Kirsch, and for Peter Kirsch, now deceased, minor children of John Kirsch, to set aside a discharge of such mortgage executed by Orange L. Tozier, and for foreclosure of the mortgage and sale of the mortgaged premises for the benefit of the persons named, as cestuis que trustent. The lands in question consist of 102 acres, situate in the town of Sheldon, Wyoming county, N. Y., of which John Kirsch died seised in the year 1872. On the 8th day of January, 1873, the defendant Orange L. Tozier was appointed general guardian of the infant children, Michael J., Theodore and Peter Kirsch. At the time of his death John Kirsch owed debts which, with the incumbrances upon his real estate, exceeded the value of both his personal and real property. Orange L. Tozier and Elizabeth Kirsch, the latter the widow of the deceased, were appointed administrators of the estate of John Kirsch. Subsequently to this it was agreed between them and Lester H. Tozier, a son of Orange L. Tozier, that they should purchase the mortgages then existing on the farm, foreclose them, and procure a title to the land, and convey the same to Elizabeth Kirsch, who should, in turn, by mortgage thereon, secure to Lester H. Tozier the amount paid by him, and give a mortgage upon the farm of $1,000 to these three children. This arrangement was carried out, except that upon a sale of the lands, either by direct purchase at the sale or by deed coming immediately from the purchaser, Lester H. Tozier became the owner for the consideration, in all, of $1,131.56. Thereupon it was further arranged between Orange L. Tozier and the widow, Elizabeth Kirsch, that the widow should convey to the then holder of the title, Lester H. Tozier, all her interest in the lands to which she was entitled as widow, and that a mortgage should be executed by Lester H. Tozier to Orange L. Tozier, in trust for the three children, in the sum of $1,000, one-third thereof payable to each of the three children when he should arrive at age, with interest in the meantime. Having received the deed from Mrs. Elizabeth Kirsch, Lester H. Tozier and his wife executed to Orange L. Tozier, in trust for Michael Kirsch, Peter Kirsch, and Theodore Kirsch, "minor children of John M. Kirsch, deceased," the mortgage in question, dated the 15th day of October, 1875, expressing a consideration of $1,000 payable as follows: The sum of $333.33 November 13, 1887; the sum of $333.33 March 18, 1891, and the sum of $333.33 October 6, 1892,—with interest, payable annually, from the 1st day of April, 1876. This instrument was delivered to Orange L. Tozier, who caused the same to be recorded in the proper clerk's office on the 23d day of October, 1875. The mortgagee and trustee paid the interest upon this mortgage to Elizabeth Kirsch, the mother of the children, in pursuance of a previous arrangement, until the spring of 1886, since which time no part of the principal or interest has been paid thereon by the trustee for the benefit of either of the children. On the 3d day of September, 1883, Lester H. Tozier and his wife executed and delivered a deed of the farm to Orange L. Tozier, at a consideration, as expressed in the deed, of $4,000, and the record title of such farm has since been in Orange L. Tozier. After acquiring this title, and on the 19th day of February, 1886, Orange L. Tozier executed and acknowledged a discharge of the mortgage, and caused the same to be recorded in the proper clerk's office on the 9th day of March, 1886. On the 27th day of January, 1886, before the execution of such discharge, Orange L. Tozier applied to the defendant the Buffalo Savings Bank for a loan of $2,000 upon his farm, which application was granted on the 1st day of February, 1886; and on an examination of the title of such farm, submitted to the officers of the bank, there was an abstract certified by the proper clerk of Wyoming county to the effect that Orange L. Tozier appeared to be the owner of the farm. On such abstract a memorandum of the mortgage sought by this action to be reinstated described the mortgage simply as being given for $1,000 and interest, "in trust for Michael Kirsch, Theodore Kirsch, and Peter Kirsch, minor children of John M. Kirsch, deceased," having written across the face of the memorandum as follows: "Discharged March 9, 1886. E. M. Jennings, Clerk." The defendant the Buffalo Savings Bank, at the time of taking its mortgage and advancing the money thereon, had not, either through any of its officers or attorneys, any knowledge or notice of the existence of this mortgage now sought to be reinstated in this action, except the memorandum on the abstract of title of its discharge, and the constructive notice given by the record of such mortgage.

Adolph Rebadow, for appellants. F. O. Peck, for respondents.

ANDREWS, C. J. (after stating the facts). The only serious question presented on the record arises on the claim of the Buffalo Savings Bank that it was not chargeable with notice nor put upon inquiry to ascertain that the defendant Tozier had no authority to discharge the mortgage in question. The savings bank, when it took its mortgage, had constructive notice of every fact which could have been ascertained by an inspection of the deeds or mortgages or record in the chain of title. An inspection of the records of the title to the land upon which its mortgage was taken would have disclosed the mortgage given by Lester H. Tozier in October, 1875, and that it was given "in trust" for the three minor children of John M. Kirsch, deceased; that the lands covered by the mortgage were subsequently, in 1883, conveyed by Lester H. Tozier to Orange L. Tozier, the mortgagee named in the mortgage given in trust for the minor children of John M. Kirsch; that after such conveyance, and in March, 1886, Orange L. Tozier, then being the owner of the lands, and also the mortgagee "in trust" in that mortgage, himself executed and caused to be recorded a satisfaction of the mortgage, and that this occurred before any part of the sum secured by the mortgage had become due. There can be no doubt that the satisfaction of the mortgage was, as to the defendant Orange L. Tozier, a breach of trust. The satisfaction was without consideration. The question whether Tozier held the mortgage as trustee impressed with a trust in favor of the three children of John M. Kirsch admits of no doubt. The implication from the nature of the instrument, the character of the beneficiaries, and the division of the payments into three equal parts, payable at specified, but different, dates in the future, is that the instrument was intended to secure to the several beneficiaries as they became of age an equal share of the sum for which the mortgage was given. The acceptance by Orange L. Tozier of the mortgage containing the declaration of the trust was an acknowledgment of the trust on his part, and bound him to perform it. The trust was expressed in the instrument, although not fully set out in words, and any act thereafter done by him in contravention of the trust was by the common law and by the statute void. Statute of Uses and Trusts (1 Rev. St. 730, § 65). The discharge of the mortgage was not intended for the benefit of the infants, but to deprive them of the benefit of the security, and, as we have said, was a plain breach of trust. The bank knew, or must be presumed to have known, when it took its mortgage, because an examination of the records would have disclosed the facts, (1) that the mortgage was taken by Tozier in trust for infants; (2) that he satisfied it before it became due; (3) that his relation to the property had changed, so that when he executed the satisfaction he was himself the owner of the land, having an adverse interest to those beneficially interested in the security; and (4) that in satisfying the mortgage he was dealing with himself. Persons dealing with a trustee must take notice of the scope of his authority. An act within his authority will bind the trust estate or the beneficiaries as to third persons acting in good faith and without notice, although the trustee intended to defraud the estate, and actually did accomplish his purpose by means of the act in question. It has frequently been held that a person dealing with an executor, administrator, or trustee, who, from the nature of his office, or by the terms of the trust, has power to satisfy or transfer the securities of the estate, or to vary the instrument from time to time, is not bound to go further, and ascertain whether in fact the act of the executor or trustee is justified, and that no breach of trust was intended. It is sufficient for his protection that he acts in good faith, and, if the act of the executor or trustee is justified by the terms of the power, the party dealing with him is protected. Field v. Schieffelin, 7 Johns. Ch. 153. But circumstances were disclosed by the record when the bank took its mortgage which precluded the bank from relying upon the recorded satisfaction of the prior mortgage. There was no indication in the mortgage that any power was vested in the trustee, Tozier, to accept payment of the mortgage before it became due, or to vary the trust security. There was no such affirmative power conferred upon him in fact, and the case of McPherson v. Rollins, 107 N. Y. 316, 14 N. E. 411, seems to be a decisive authority that there is no implication of such a power in case of a trustee of a specified security for the benefit of minors, and no other evidence of his actual authority exists than may be implied from the fact that he is trustee of the security. The rule declared in that case operated with great severity upon one who, without any actual notice, bought the property upon an official certificate that no lien existed on the premises, paying full value therefor. There the mortgage was given to secure the payment of an annuity to the mortgagee, and also annuities to two minors until they should become of age. The mortgagee afterwards, and before the expiration of the minority of the two children, without consideration, assumed to discharge the mortgage, and the satisfaction was duly recorded. It was held that the trustee had no power to satisfy the mortgage before the termination of the trust, and that the purchaser was not protected. It is difficult to perceive any solid distinction between that case and the present. In McPherson v. Rollins there was no express direction that the mortgage security should remain unchanged during the term of the trust. It was given to secure annuities, presumably for maintenance. Here the mortgage was given to secure a gross sum, for the benefit of infants, the shares being payable, as was to be inferred, on their severally attaining full age. There is a very pregnant circumstance in the present case bearing upon the point of constructive notice. The bank relied upon a discharge by Tozier of a lien held by him as trustee on his own land. The transaction as disclosed by the record showed that in executing the satisfaction Tozier was dealing with himself, and that the act was in his own interest; and not only so, but that the mortgage was not due. Tozier was acting in the double capacity of owner of the land and trustee of a lien thereon for other persons. The transaction was unusual and special, and the savings bank, with knowledge of Tozier's relation to the land as owner and trustee, was, we think, bound to inquire by what authority he acted, and, if inquiry had been made, the invalidity of the transaction would or might have been disclosed. What circumstances will amount to constructive notice, or will put a party upon inquiry, is in many cases a question of much difficulty.

A purchaser is not required to use the utmost circumspection. He is bound to act as an ordinarily prudent and careful man would do under the circumstances. He cannot act in contravention to the dictates of reasonable prudence, or refuse to inquire when the propriety of inquiry is naturally suggested by circumstances known to him. The circumstances of this case made it, we think, the duty of the bank to inquire in respect to the authority of Tozier to discharge the prior mortgage, and, having failed to do so, it is not entitled to protection as a bona fide purchaser. Baker v. Bliss, 39 N. Y. 70, and cases cited; Story, Eq. Jur. § 400 et seq. The other questions are satisfactorily disposed of in the opinions of the referee and at general term, and do not require further elaboration. The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur. Judgment affirmed.

KNOBLOCH v. MUELER.

(17 N. E. 696, 123 Ill. 554.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. 20, 1888.

Appeal from circuit court, St. Clair county; A. Watts, Judge.

George Christian Mueller died March 27, 1870. By his will, dated March 14, 1870, his real estate was devised to his sons, George and Solomon Mueller. The will was admitted to probate, but afterwards, at the January term, 1871, in the circuit court of St. Clair county, this instrument was, on bill filed for that purpose, set aside, and declared not to be the will of said deceased. This decree was affirmed by this court. Mueller v. Rebhan, 94 Ill. 142. On the 27th day of March, 1879, Catharine Rebhan, one of the heirs at law of said George C. Mueller, deceased, filed in the circuit court of St. Clair county her bill for partition of the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ N. W., and the N. E. N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$, of section 28, town 1 N., range 7 W.,—alleging the death of said George C. Mueller intestate; that at his death he left him surviving George Mueller and Solomon Mueller, Margarite Rhinehardt, and complainant, Catharine Rebhan, his children and only heirs at law, to whom descended in equal parts the said lands; that on the death of said ancestor, George and Solomon had taken possession of the land jointly, and received the rents thereof until February 29, 1875, when George died, leaving all his property to Solomon by his will duly probated, etc., since when said Solomon has received the rents and profits of said land. The bill alleged that Solomon was the owner in fee of the undivided one-half of said lands, and the complainant and Mrs. Rhinehardt were each the owner in fee of the undivided one-fourth part thereof, as tenants in common, and prayed for partition of the land, and that Solomon be required to account for the rents and profits, etc. At the February term, 1880, of said court, said bill was taken as confessed as to Mrs. Rhinehardt, and Solomon Mueller and his wife, who was also made a party, filed their answer, admitting the material allegations of the bill, and consenting to partition of said premises according to the prayer thereof. Subsequently an amended answer and cross-bill was filed, setting up that said Solomon had made lasting and valuable improvements on the land, etc. On hearing, said defendant Solomon admitted in open court the allegations of the bill in respect of the interest of the parties as tenants in common, the death and intestacy of the ancestor, and consented to a decree of partition; and a decree declaring the several interests of the parties as set up in the bill as heirs at law of said George C. Mueller, deceased, in and to said land, was entered by the court by consent, and commissioners were appointed to make partition accordingly. At the May term, 1880, of said court, on proof that defendant Solomon had purchased the interest of his co-defendant, Margarite Rhinehardt, the decree was, on his motion, so changed as to require the commissioners theretofore appointed to set off to the said Solomon three-fourths, and to the complainant one-fourth, of said land. The issue as to rents and profits and improvements was referred to the master for proofs. At the same term the commissioners filed their report, setting off to the complainant, Mrs. Rebhan, as and for her one-fourth interest in said land, lot 10, as shown in their report, containing 48 acres of the land; and set off the residue of said tracts of land to the said Solomon. Exceptions to the report were filed, which were, at the May term, 1881, overruled by the court, and the report approved by decree duly entered. No writ of error was prosecuted or appeal taken from the decree of partition. At the February term, 1883, of said court, on hearing of the issues as to rents and profits, a decree was rendered in favor of complainant Rebhan for \$1,638.97, from which an appeal was prosecuted to the appellate court. On the 8th day of March, 1881, in consideration of \$5,050, Mrs. Rebhan, and Emil, her husband, by their warranty deed, conveyed the undivided one-fourth part of the premises of which her father died seized, and all their right, title, and interest in the whole of said land, to appellant, Thomas Knobloch; reserving, however, her rights to rents and profits theretofore accrued. This deed was filed for record March 10, 1881. At the February term, 1882, appellant brought an action of trespass against said Solomon for alleged trespasses upon said 48 acres of land set off to Mrs. Rebhan, and afterwards brought ejectment to recover the same. In March or April, 1883, appellee found a paper dated March 9, 1855, purporting to be the last will and testament of George Christian Mueller, deceased, in and by which the testator devised all his land to his two sons, George and Solomon, subject to the payment of \$1,500 to Catharine Rebhan. This will was duly admitted to probate. On July 6, 1883, Solomon Mueller, appellee here, filed in the St. Clair circuit court the present bill against appellant, Catharine Rebhan, Emil Rebhan, Margarite Rhinehardt, and Edward Abend, who, prior to the probate of the last will, had been appointed administrator of the estate of said George C. Mueller, deceased, substantially setting up the foregoing facts, and praying that said will (1855) stand as the last will and testament of the said George Christian Mueller; that the deed from Catharine and Emil Rebhan to said Knobloch be set aside as being a cloud upon complainant's title; that all proceedings in partition regarding said land, and the stating of an account of rents and profits now pending in the appellate court, and all actions commenced by said Edward Abend as aforesaid, and by said Knobloch, be no further prosecuted; and that the defendants, their attorneys, agents, etc., be perpetually enjoined from taking any further steps in regard to said action. An injunction was granted as prayed in the bill of August 25, 1883. Appellant answered, setting up that he had purchased in good faith and paid \$5,050 for the interest of Mrs. Rebhau in said land, without any notice of any adverse claim or title, and also setting up that complainant, Solomon, is estopped, by the decree of partition rendered by his consent in open court, from disputing complainant's title. At the September term, 1885, of said circuit court, a decree was entered perpetually enjoining the prosecution of said suits, and setting aside the deed from Mrs. Rebhau and her husband to appellant as a cloud on complainant's title. From this decree appellant, Knobloch, alone appealed.

W. C. Kueffner and James M. Dill, for appellant. A. R. Halbert, for appellee.

SHOPE, J., (after stating the facts as above.) The bill in this case seeks to remove, as a cloud upon the title of appellee, Solomon Mueller, derived under the will of 1855, the deed of Catharine and Emil Rebhau to appellant; and restrain by injunction the prosecution of an action of ejectment brought by appellant to recover the land partitioned to Catharine Rebhau in the proceedings instituted by her for partition of the lands of which her father died seized, and to enjoin a certain trespass suit brought for alleged trespasses upon said land by appellee, and to restrain Mrs. Rebhau from collecting $1,638.97, decreed as rents and profits in said partition proceeding. Mrs. Rebhau not having appealed from the decree against her, the latter branch of the case made by the bill is not before us. When the instrument dated March 14, 1870, purporting to be the last will and testament of George C. Mueller, who died March 20, 1870, was set aside upon bill filed for that purpose, it was supposed by all the parties in interest that his estate had descended to his heirs at law as intestate estate, and letters of administration were granted accordingly. All the parties acquiesced in this condition of affairs, and rested in the belief that the property had so descended until the discovery, in March or April, 1883, 13 years after the death of the ancestor, of the will of the 9th of March, 1855, by which the estate in question was devised to George and Solomon Mueller. The good faith of the parties is not questioned, no fraud or misconduct is alleged, or laches imputed or imputable to any one, on account of the delay in the production of this will, or in any of the proceedings had in respect to the real or personal estate prior to its discovery. When Catharine Rebhau, daughter and one of the heirs at law of said George C. Mueller, deceased, on the 22d day of March, 1879, filed her bill for partition of the real estate of which said George C. had died seized; and when Solomon Mueller filed his answer, admitting the intestacy of his father and consenting to the partition to Mrs. Rebhau and Mrs. Rhinehardt, his sisters, each a one-fourth part or interest in the land of which their common ancestor died seized, and consented to the decree therefor, the several parties in good faith believed the facts alleged in her bill to be true, and that the land had descended to the four children of George C. Mueller, deceased, in equal parts in fee. It is also equally clear that when appellant, Thomas Knobloch, purchased the interest of Catharine Rebhau in said land, and paid her therefor $5,050, that he did so in good faith, relying upon the title of said Catharine as found and declared by the circuit court of St. Clair county in said partition proceeding by the consent of appellee. Upon the production and probate of the will of 1855, in April, 1883, it became manifest that the title to said land had not in fact so descended to the heirs at law of said George Christian Mueller; but by virtue of that will the legal title thereto, at the death of the testator, vested in the devisees, George and Solomon Mueller, and that by the last will of said George Mueller, who died February 29, 1875, the legal title to the whole of said land became vested in appellee, Solomon Mueller. It is apparent that all parties, while acting in good faith, were mistaken, and that the decree of the circuit court, finding one-fourth interest of said land in fee in Catharine Rebhau, would not have been entered had the court or parties been aware of the true condition of the title to the land.

It is said by counsel for appellee that this bill may be maintained, if upon no other ground than as a bill in the nature of a bill of review. This is manifestly a misapprehension. In neither the frame of the bill, or in the prayer, has the pleader attempted a review of the decree rendered in the partition proceeding of Rebhau against Mueller et al. The bill sets out the filing of that bill, the decree of partition, and for rents and profits; but it nowhere seeks to reopen that decree, or reverse, impeach, or alter it, or to procure a rehearing of that cause upon the alleged newly-discovered matter. The prayer is to remove appellant's title, derived thereunder, as a cloud upon appellee's title, and to restrain proceedings under that decree without reopening it or setting it aside. The whole scope of the bill is to procure the relief sought upon the equitable ground of mistake of fact, as to the title at the time of the entry of that decree, without in any way interfering with it by seeking to enjoin proceedings under it. The two grounds upon which a bill of review, or bill in the nature of a bill of review, will lie, are: Errors of law, appearing on the face of the decree, without further examination of facts; and new fact or facts, discovered since the decree, which are material, and which it was impossible for the party to produce at the time the decree passed. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1576; 2 Smith, Ch. Prac. 50. Bills containing newly-discovered matter are in the nature of original bills, in so far as such new matter presents an issuable fact, and therefore admits an answer and the formation of an issue; but only so far as it relates to the truth and sufficiency of the alleged new matter, and its admissibility for the purpose of affecting and opening the original decree. Authorities supra; Buffington v. Harvey, 95 U. S. 99. The purpose of a bill of the character named is to procure a reversal, alteration, or explanation of the former decree. The bill should state the former bill, the proceedings thereon, and the decree rendered by the court, the grievance under the decree of the party presenting the bill, and the error of law or new matter discovered upon which it is sought to reverse, reopen, or impeach it. In bills of review, if the former decree has not been carried into execution, the prayer may simply be that the same may be reversed and set aside; if the former decree has been executed, that the decree be reversed, and the complainant be restored to his former condition or status, as if it had not been rendered. In bills in the nature of bills of review, instead of praying the reversal of the former decree, the prayer should be that the cause be reheard in respect to and considering the new matter at the same time it is reheard upon the original bill, etc. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1581, 1582.

The decree of partition rendered at the February term, 1880, and the subsequent decree approving the report of the commissioners rendered at the May term, 1881, of said court, remain unreversed and in full force and effect. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, and rendered its decree determining the several interests of the complainant Catharine Rebhau and appellee, by the consent of appellee, as appears by his answer filed in said cause, and by the recitals in said decree of partition. Decrees of courts of chancery, in respect of matters within their jurisdiction, are as binding and conclusive upon the parties and their privies as are judgments at law; and a decree by consent in an amicable suit has been held to have an additional claim to be considered final. Allason v. Stark, 9 Adol. & E. 255. Decree so entered by consent cannot be reversed, set aside, or impeached by bill of review or bill in the nature of a bill of review, except for fraud, unless it be shown that the consent was not in fact given, or something was inserted, as by consent, that was not consented to. 2 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 1576; Webb v. Webb, 3 Swanst. 658; Thompson v. Maxwell, 95 U. S. 391; Armstrong v. Cooper, 11 Ill. 540; Cronk v. Trumble, 66 Ill. 432; Haas v. Society, 80 Ill. 248; Atkinson v. Manks, 1 Cow. 693; Winchester v. Winchester, 121 Mass. 127; Allason v. Stark, 9 Adol. & E. 255; Earl of Hopetoun v. Ramsay, 5 Bell, App. Cas. 69. See, also, note to Duchess of Kingston's Case, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. *826 et seq. It is the general doctrine that such a decree is not reversible upon appeal or writ of error, or by bill of review for error. Armstrong v. Cooper, 11 Ill. 540. No exceptions were taken to the decree of partition, or attempt made in the cause in which it is rendered to vacate or modify it. It is undoubtedly true that, as between the parties and those chargeable with notice, courts of equity will entertain jurisdiction and grant relief, on proper bill filed, from the injurious effects of admissions and confessions of material facts, made in course of judicial proceedings, in ignorance of the rights of the party making them, where he has been guilty of no negligence, either in the discovery of the fact, or in applying to the proper forum for relief; but such relief can only be granted upon such grounds and for such reasons as would authorize the court to set aside agreements or contracts entered into by the parties. Attorney General v. Tomline, 7 Ch. Div. 388; Millspaugh v. McBride, 7 Paige, 509; Furnival v. Bogle, 4 Russ. 142; The Hiram, 1 Wheat. 440. But it is apparent that the decree in the partition proceedings can only be attacked, reversed, annulled, or set aside by direct proceedings in that case, or upon bill of review, or bill in the nature of a bill of review.

If this were not so, however, there is another ground upon which the decree must be reversed. It is the well-settled doctrine of this court that no relief will be granted in equity, in cases of this sort, injuriously affecting intervening rights acquired in good faith, after the rendition of a judgment or decree, and in reliance thereon. So it has been held that amendments may be made in judicial proceedings, but not so as to affect the intervening rights of third persons accruing prior to such amendment. Shirley v. Phillips, 17 Ill. 473; Coughran v. Gutcheus, 18 Ill. 390; Sickmon v. Wood, 69 Ill. 329; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 165. Relief will not be granted to the prejudice of appellant, if he has an equal equity with appellee, and is equally entitled to the protection of the court. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 165. As already seen, all the parties to the partition proceedings supposed in good faith that Mrs. Rebhau was the owner in fee of the undivided one-fourth of the lands of which her father died seized, and that on the 8th day of March, 1881, appellant purchased her interest in such lands for a full and adequate consideration, without notice, actual or constructive, of any defect in her title, and in good faith. All the elements to constitute him a bona fide purchaser are present; that is, a valuable consideration paid, absence of notice, and presence of good faith. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 745. His grantor had, by a court of competent jurisdiction, in a proceeding instituted to find and declare her interests in these lands, been adjudged, by the consent and admission of appellee, to be the owner in fee of the undivided one-fourth part thereof, and there was nothing in the record or elsewhere apparent to disclose that she, who was thus clothed with apparent legal title, was not the owner in fact of that interest in the land. Nor is it shown or claimed that further inquiry would then have disclosed anything to cast suspicion upon her title. The defense of a bona fide purchaser had its rise in equity, upon the doctrine that a court of equity acts upon the conscience of him against whom relief is sought; and if he has done no wrong, or it would be unconscientious or inequitable to grant the relief, the court will refuse to exercise its jurisdiction. If, in equity and good conscience, the complainant should not obtain what he seeks, or the defendant ought not to suffer what is demanded, then the court will withhold its power. In theory, it is said, the defense of a bona fide purchaser presupposes some defect in purchaser's title; but the court refuses to investigate the validity of the title of either party, upon the ground that good conscience does not dictate that he who has dealt honestly, in good faith, and without notice, should be deprived of the legal right he has thereby gained. Id. § 739. There was formerly much apparent conflict in the adjudged cases as to when the defense of a bona fide purchaser would be availing. In Phillips v. Phillips, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 208, Lord Westbury grouped the cases in which a bona fide purchaser will be protected into three general classes, and reduced the doctrine to a formula, which it is said by Pomeroy (2 Eq. Jur. § 742) has been accepted, by subsequent judges almost without exception. The doctrine thus formulated, so far as applicable here, is: "Thirdly, when there are circumstances which give rise to an equity, as distinguished from an equitable estate,—as, for example, an equity to set aside a deed for fraud, or to correct it for mistake,—and the purchaser under the instrument maintains the plea of purchase for valuable consideration without notice, the court will not interfere."

Without extended discussion, it is apparent that the bill here filed seeks relief ancillary to the legal estate of appellee. The purpose of the bill is to remove the deed to appellant as a cloud upon appellee's legal title, and to enjoin the assertion of rights by appellant thereunder. The right to the relief sought exists, if at all, upon the equity arising out of the alleged mistake as to the title to said land in the grantor of appellant. This brings the case directly within the rule above given, which is sustained by the weight of modern authority; and, if appellant has made out his defense as bona fide purchaser, he should have prevailed in the court below. The decree of partition, as seen, was rendered by a court of competent jurisdiction, having jurisdiction of the person and of the subject-matter, and by appellee's consent. Appellant without notice, for full value, and in perfect good faith, acquired the title, sought to be removed as a cloud upon appellee's title, from the party found and declared by that decree to be the owner, and we can perceive no principle upon which a court of conscience can hold that appellant shall lose in consequence of the mutual mistake, rather than appellee. It cannot be said that the equities of appellee are superior to those of appellant in respect of the title thus acquired, and, the equities being equal, the court will give no assistance to the legal title, (2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 742, and cases cited,) but will remit the complainant to his remedy at law.

It is said, however, that, at the time appellant purchased, the report of the commissioners had not been confirmed by the court, and that he purchased subject to having the interest of his grantor, as found by the commissioners, set aside. It is true that exceptions to the report of the commissioners were then pending, but none of the exceptions questioned the right or title of Catharine Rebhau to the undivided one-fourth part of the real estate of which her father died seized. Such exception related simply to the manner of partition, and the conduct of the commissioners in making the same. There was nothing therein to put appellant upon notice or inquiry as to the title of Mrs. Rebhau. He bought subject, as a matter of course, to having the amount set off to Mrs. Rebhau changed or diminished by subsequent action of the commissioners, or to have their report set aside by the court; but his purchase was of her interest in the land, which was conceded by appellant and declared by the court to be a one-fourth interest therein.

It is also said by counsel for appellee that appellant may rely upon the covenants of warranty in his deed from the Rebhaus, and therefore the equities are with appellee. It is not shown whether Mrs. Rebhau, and her husband, who joined in the execution of said deed, are solvent or insolvent, and we perceive no principle, nor is any suggested by counsel, upon which appellant should be driven to resort to his legal remedy against his grantor for indemnity from loss, especially in view of the fact that it is not shown that such remedy would be availing. It will not be proper for us to here discuss or determine the right of appellee to the money paid by appellant for the land in question, or as to whether he has any remedy in respect of the same.

We are of opinion that the defense of a bona fide purchaser has been maintained, and, upon both of the grounds indicated, the right of appellee to the relief sought should have been denied, as against appellant, Knobloch, and the bill dismissed as to him. For the error of the court in this regard, the decree, in so far as it affects the appellant, Knobloch, will be reversed, and the cause remanded to the circuit court of St. Clair county, with instructions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion, dismissing the bill as to said appellant.

MAYOR, ETC., OF CITY OF BALTIMORE et al. v. WHITTINGTON.

(27 Atl. 984, 78 Md. 231.)

Court of Appeals of Maryland. Nov. 16, 1893.

Appeal from circuit court of Baltimore city.

Suit by Jacob Craft Whittington against the mayor and city council of Baltimore and Clarence M. Ellinger for injunction. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Argued before ROBINSON, C. J., and BRISCOE, BRYAN, FOWLER, and McSHERRY, JJ.

Thos. G. Hayes, Jas. P. Gorter, Wm. S. Bryan, Jr., and F. W. Story, for appellants. F. C. Slingluff and T. Wallis Blackiston, for appellee.

McSHERRY, J. By section 47, art. 49, of the Municipal Code of Baltimore City, it is enacted, in substance, that when any lots of ground are chargeable with the payment of taxes, and are subject to ground rents or leases for terms of years, renewable forever, the collector shall, in the sale of such lots for nonpayment of taxes, first sell only the leasehold interest, if it should sell for an amount sufficient to pay the taxes, but, if it should not, then that he shall sell the whole fee-simple estate, provided these provisions "shall not apply to cases where the books of the city do not disclose the fact that the lot or lots are on lease as aforesaid, or unless the collector shall have actual notice of such lease prior to the sale thereof." The city tax collector of Baltimore sold in March, 1891, for the nonpayment of state and city taxes, the fee-simple estate in a lot of ground on Druid Hill avenue, and the mayor and city council became the purchaser. The sale was reported to the circuit court of Baltimore city, and was ratified in May, 1892. In October following, the city, through and by its comptroller, sold the lot to Clarence M. Ellinger, to whom it was thereafter conveyed. When the sale was made by the collector, the lot was subject to a lease for 99 years, renewable forever, which was owned by J. Henry Weber, and the reversion or fee was owned by the appellee, Whittington. The unpaid taxes were due by the owner of the leasehold estate, but the collector sold the whole fee, without having first offered, or having attempted to sell, the leasehold, as required by the section of the City Code to which reference has been made. There was no entry on the books of the collector showing that the lot was subject to a lease, and the single question involved in the case is whether, when the collector made the sale, he had "actual notice" of the existence of the lease. If he had, the sale was irregular. If it was irregular, the decree of the circuit court of Baltimore city, restraining by injunction the mayor and city council, and its grantee, Ellinger, from disturbing the possession of the owner of the reversion, must be affirmed.

It appears by the record that in 1883 proceedings were instituted in the circuit court of Baltimore city by Rebecca and Mary McKen against J. Henry Weber for a sale of this same leasehold estate under a mortgage thereon executed by Weber in 1881. Mr. T. Wallis Blackiston was appointed trustee to make the sale. He took possession of the property, and collected the rents and profits, but, owing to a depreciation in its value, made no sale of it. In the meantime the ground rent was regularly paid to the appellee, up to July, 1892, but the state and city taxes for the eight years beginning with 1882 remained unpaid. On the 1st day of December, 1890, Lewis N. Hopkins, city collector, filed a petition in the foreclosure proceedings representing that taxes for the years just mentioned were in arrear upon the property "decreed to be sold." The petition further stated that the collector was unable to enforce the collection of those taxes by reason of the pendency of the foreclosure proceedings, and it prayed that the trustee might be required to pay the taxes out of the rents theretofore collected from the property, or that the collector might "be allowed to proceed to collect said taxes by sale of the property in the ordinary way." This petition was signed by the late Mr. W. A. Hammond, "city solicitor, attorney for petitioner," and was sworn to by the deputy city collector. Subsequently, an order was passed, requiring the trustee to pay the taxes within five days out of the funds previously collected by him "as rents from the property decreed to be sold," and directing, upon his failure to do so, that the property be sold in the ordinary way by the collector. The trustee did fail to pay the taxes, and the collector made, under authority of this order, the sale of March, 1891, already mentioned. It is upon these facts that the appellee relies to show that the collector had "actual notice" of the existence of the leasehold estate.

Notice is of two kinds,—actual and constructive. Actual notice may be either express or implied. If the one, it is established by direct evidence; if the other, by the proof of circumstances from which it is inferable as a fact. Constructive notice is, on the other hand, always a presumption of law. Express notice embraces, not only knowledge, but also that which is communicated by direct information, either written or oral, from those who are cognizant of the fact communicated. Wade, Notice, § 6. Implied notice, which is equally actual notice, arises where the party to be charged is shown to have had knowledge of such facts and circumstances as would lead him, by the exercise of due diligence, to a knowledge of the principal fact. 16 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 790. Or, as defined by the supreme court of Missouri in Rhodes v. Outcalt, 48

Mo. 370, "a notice is regarded in law as actual when the party sought to be affected by it knows of the particular fact, or is conscious of having the means of knowing it, although he may not employ the means in his possession for the purpose of gaining further information." It is simply circumstantial evidence from which notice may be inferred. It differs from constructive notice, with which it is frequently confounded, and which it greatly resembles, in respect to the character of the inference upon which it rests; constructive notice being the creature of positive law, resting upon strictly legal presumptions, which are not allowed to be controverted, (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 399; Townsend v. Little, 109 U. S. 504, 3 Sup. Ct. 357,) while implied notice arises from inference of fact, (Williamson v. Brown, 15 N. Y. 354; Wade, Notice, § 3.) With constructive notice we are not now concerned, and it is not pretended that the city collector had express notice, or knowledge personally, of the existence of the leasehold estate. But he became a party to the equity proceeding, wherein a decree had been passed directing a sale of the leasehold interest. He did more. He asked, notwithstanding the decree had been long before signed and enrolled, that he be permitted to sell for the nonpayment of taxes, under the summary process of distraint, the identical property previously decreed to be sold, and no other or different interest; and the property which had been thus previously decreed to be sold was not the fee simple, but only the leasehold interest in the lot in question. He obviously knew there was a proceeding pending in the circuit court of Baltimore city, having for its object the sale of some interest in the property. He knew, further, the equity proceeding interfered with the execution of his distraints, and he applied to the court for leave to proceed, in spite of the decree, to sell the same property which had been decreed to be sold. We say he knew these things, and we say so, not because the record shows that he was personally aware of them, as matters of actual knowledge, but because the deputy city collector and the collector's attorney, both of whom were his agents in this transaction, did have such knowledge; the one having sworn to the facts stated in the petition, and the other having signed the petition itself. So both the attorney and the deputy collector knew, or at least were in possession of facts which would necessarily lead, upon the exercise of the slightest diligence, to a knowledge or notice, of the existence of the lease. They must therefore be regarded as knowing that which, with ordinary diligence, they might have known, or that which they were conscious of having the means of knowing. This result is not a legal presumption, but an inference of fact, and it seems to us an irresistible inference. It would be idle to say that the collector was ignorant of facts relating to the title to property which he was about to sell for the nonpayment of taxes, when his deputy, acting for him and in his name, was in full possession of them, or that he did not know the things which his attorney was aware of in that particular proceeding respecting the state of the title; and it would be equally idle to say that the deputy, when he swore to the petition, and the attorney, when he signed it, filed it, and procured a court's order upon it, were not apprised of the character of the estate previously decreed to be sold, or were not in a position where they were conscious of having the means of knowing precisely what property the decree affected. At all events, the exercise of ordinary diligence would most assuredly have informed both of these agents of the collector of every fact which the records in the equity case disclosed, and among those facts was the material and important one that the lot was subject to a lease for 99 years, renewable forever. It is consequently a legitimate inference of fact that both of these representatives of the collector knew what the record in the foreclosure case disclosed as to there being a leasehold estate in Weber, and not a fee, and this was implied actual notice. Notice to the attorney, as well as notice to the deputy, was notice to the collector, and was actual, and not merely constructive, notice to him, for the principal is bound by and affected with notice to his agent, and he is equally bound by notice received by his attorney in the same transaction. Astor v. Wells, 4 Wheat. 466; Reed's Appeal, 34 Pa. St. 209; Houseman v. Association, 81 Pa. St. 256; Smith v. Ayer, 101 U. S. 320. If this were not so, then, in every case where notice is necessary, it might be avoided by simply employing an agent. We are, for the reasons we have given, of opinion that the collector had, through the means we have indicated, such actual notice of the existence of the lease as to bring him within the proviso quoted from the City Code, and that he was therefore not authorized to sell the fee-simple estate until he had first offered the leasehold for sale. It results, then, that the sale made by him was irregular, and the decree granting the injunction applied for by the appellee must be affirmed. Decree affirmed, with costs in this court and in the court below.

WILLIAMSON v. BROWN.

(15 N. Y. 354.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1857.

The plaintiff was the grantee of fifty acres of land on which there was no recorded incumbrance. His grantor purchased the land of the defendant, giving back a mortgage for a part of the purchase price.

The defendant commenced to foreclose his mortgage by advertisement, whereupon this action was brought to restrain the foreclosure. The other material facts appear in the opinion.

D. H. Marsh, for appellant. J. R. Lawrence, for respondent.

SELDEN, J. The referee's report is conclusive as to the facts. It states, in substance, that the plaintiff had sufficient information to put him upon inquiry as to the defendant's mortgage; but that, after making all the inquiry which upon such information it became his duty to make, he failed to discover that any such mortgage existed. This being, as I think, what the referee intended to state, is to be assumed as the true interpretation of his report.

The question in the case, therefore, is, as to the nature and effect of that kind of notice so frequently mentioned as notice sufficient to put a party upon inquiry. The counsel for the plaintiff contends that while such a notice may be all that is required in some cases of equitable cognizance, it is not sufficient, in cases arising under the registry acts, to charge the party claiming under a recorded title with knowledge of a prior unregistered conveyance. He cites several authorities in support of this position.

In the case of Dey v. Dunham, 2 Johns. Ch. 182, Chancellor Kent says, in regard to notice under the registry act: "If notice that is to put a party upon inquiry be sufficient to break in upon the policy and the express provisions of the act, then indeed the conclusion would be different; but I do not apprehend that the decisions go that length." Again, in his Commentaries, speaking on the same subject, he says: "Implied notice may be equally effectual with direct and positive notice; but then it must not be that notice which is barely sufficient to put a party upon inquiry."

So in Jackson v. Van Valkenburgh, 8 Cow. 260, Woodworth, J., says: "If these rules be applied to the present case, the notice was defective. It may have answered to put a person on inquiry, in a case where that species of notice is sufficient; but we have seen that to supply the place of registry, the law proceeds a step further."

A reference to some of the earlier decisions under the registry acts of England will tend, I think, to explain these remarks, which were probably suggested by those decisions. One of the earliest, if not the first of the English recording acts was that of 7 Anne, chapter 20. That act differed from our general registry act in one important respect. It did not, in terms, require that the party to be protected by the act should be a bona fide purchaser. Its language was: "And that every such deed or conveyance, that shall at any time after, etc., be made and executed, shall be adjudged fraudulent and void, against any subsequent purchaser or mortgagee for valuable consideration, unless," etc.

The English judges found some difficulty at first in allowing any equity, however strong, to control the explicit terms of the statute. It was soon seen, however, that adhering to the strict letter of the act would open the door to the grossest frauds. Courts of equity, therefore, began, but with great caution, to give relief when the fraud was palpable. Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 275, was a case in which the complainant sought relief against a mortgage having a preference under the registry act, on the ground that the mortgagee had notice. Lord Hardwicke dismissed the bill, but admitted that "apparent fraud, or clear and undoubted notice would be a proper ground of relief." Again, he said: "There may possibly have been cases of relief upon notice, divested of fraud, but then the proof must be extremely clear."

Jolland v. Stainbridge, 3 Ves. 478, is another case in which relief was denied. The master of the rolls, however, there says: "I must admit now that the registry is not conclusive evidence, but it is equally clear that it must be satisfactorily proved, that the person who registers the subsequent deed must have known exactly the situation of the persons having the prior deed, and knowing that, registered in order to defraud them of that title."

Chancellor Kent refers to these cases in Dey v. Dunham (supra) and his remarks in that case, as to the effect, under the registry acts, of notice sufficient to put a party upon inquiry, were evidently made under the influence of the language of Lord Hardwicke and the master of the rolls, above quoted.

But the English courts have since seen, that if they recognized any equity founded upon notice to the subsequent purchaser of the prior unregistered conveyance, it became necessarily a mere question of good faith on the part of such purchaser. They now apply, therefore, the same rules in regard to notice, to cases arising under the registry acts, as to all other cases.

It will be sufficient to refer to one only among the modern English cases on this subject, viz.: Whitbread v. Jordan, 1 Younge & C. 303. The plaintiff was a London brewer, and supplied Jordan, who was a publican, with beer. It was the common practice with brewers in London to lend money to publicans whom they supplied with beer, upon a deposit of their title deeds. Jordan had deposited certain deeds with the plaintiff, pursuant to this custom. He afterward gave to one Boulnois, a wine merchant, a mortgage upon the property covered by the deeds deposited, which was duly recorded. Boulnois had notice of Jordan's debt to the plaintiff, and of the existing customs between brewers and publicans, but he made no inquiry of the brewers. The suit was brought to enforce the equitable mortgage arising from the deposit. Baron Alderson held that the notice to Boulnois was sufficient to make it his duty to inquire as to the existence of the deposit; that his not doing so was evidence of bad faith; and the plaintiff's right, under his equitable mortgage, was sustained. No case could show more strongly that notice which puts the party upon inquiry is sufficient even under the registry act.

The cases in our own courts, since Dey v. Dunham and Jackson v. Van Valkenburgh (supra), hold substantially the same doctrine. (Tuttle v. Jackson, 6 Wend. 213; Jackson v. Post, 15 Wend. 588; Grimstone v. Carter, 3 Paige, 421.)

I can see no foundation in reason for a distinction between the evidence requisite to establish a want of good faith, in a case arising under the recording act, and in any other case, and the authorities here referred to are sufficient to show that no such distinction is recognized, at the present day, by the courts. The question, however, remains, whether this species of notice is absolutely conclusive upon the rights of the parties. The plaintiff's counsel contends, that knowledge sufficient to put the purchaser upon inquiry is only presumptive evidence of actual notice, and may be repelled by showing that the party did inquire with reasonable diligence, but failed to ascertain the existence of the unregistered conveyance; while, on the other hand, it is insisted that notice which makes it the duty of the party to inquire, amounts to constructive notice of the prior conveyance, the law presuming that due inquiry will necessarily lead to its discovery.

The counsel for the defendant cites several authorities in support of his position, and among others the cases of Tuttle v. Jackson and Grimstone v. Carter (supra). In the first of these cases, Walworth, chancellor, says: "If the subsequent purchaser knows of the unregistered conveyance at the time of his purchase, he cannot protect himself against that conveyance; and whatever is sufficient to make it his duty to inquire as to the rights of others is considered legal notice to him of those rights;" and in Grimstone v. Carter, the same judge says: "And if the person claiming the prior equity is in the actual possession of the estate, and the purchaser has notice of that fact, it is sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the actual rights of such possessor, and is good constructive notice of those rights."

It must be conceded that the language used by the learned chancellor in these cases, if strictly accurate, would go to sustain the doctrine contended for by the defendant's counsel. Notice is of two kinds: actual and constructive. Actual notice embraces all degrees and grades of evidence, from the most direct and positive proof to the slightest circumstance from which a jury would be warranted in inferring notice. It is a mere question of fact, and is open to every species of legitimate evidence which may tend to strengthen or impair the conclusion. Constructive notice, on the other hand, is a legal inference from established facts; and like other legal presumptions, does not admit of dispute. "Constructive notice," says Judge Story, "is in its nature no more than evidence of notice, the presumption of which is so violent that the court will not even allow of its being controverted." (Story, Eq. Jur. § 399.)

A recorded deed is an instance of constructive notice. It is of no consequence whether the second purchaser has actual notice of the prior deed or not. He is bound to take, and is presumed to have, the requisite notice. So, too, notice to an agent is constructive notice to the principal; and it would not in the least avail the latter to show that the agent had neglected to communicate the fact. In such cases, the law imputes notice to the party whether he has it or not. Legal or implied notice, therefore, is the same as constructive notice, and cannot be controverted by proof.

But it will be found, on looking into the cases, that there is much want of precision in the use of these terms. They have been not unfrequently applied to degrees of evidence barely sufficient to warrant a jury in inferring actual notice and which the slightest opposing proof would repel, instead of being confined to those legal presumptions of notice which no proof can overthrow. The use of these terms by the chancellor, therefore, in Tuttle v. Jackson, and Grimstone v. Carter, is by no means conclusive.

The phraseology uniformly used, as descriptive of the kind of notice in question, "sufficient to put the party upon inquiry," would seem to imply that if the party is faithful in making inquiries, but fails to discover the conveyance, he will be protected. The import of the terms is, that it becomes the duty of the party to inquire. If, then, he performs that duty is he still to be bound, without any actual notice? The presumption of notice which arises from proof of that degree of knowledge which will put a party upon inquiry is, I apprehend, not a presumption of law, but of fact, and may, therefore, be controverted by evidence.

In Whitbread v. Jordan (supra), Baron Alderson laid down the rule as follows: "When a party having knowledge of such facts as would lead any honest man, using ordinary caution, to make further inquiries, does not make, but on the contrary studiously avoids making, such obvious inquiries, he must be taken to have notice of those facts, which, if he had used such ordinary diligence, he would readily have ascertained." This very plainly implies that proof that the party has used due diligence, but without effect, would repel the presumption. In this case it is true the decision was against the party having the notice. But in Jones v. Smith, 1 Hare, 43, we have a case in which a party, who had knowledge sufficient to put him on inquiry, was nevertheless held not bound by the notice.

The defendant had loaned money upon the security of the estate of David Jones, the father of the plaintiff. At the time of the loan he was informed by David Jones and his wife, that a settlement was made previous to the marriage, but was at the same time assured that it only affected the property of the wife. He insisted upon seeing the settlement, but was told that it was in the hands of a relative, and that it could not be seen without giving offense to an aged aunt of the wife, from whom they had expectations. David Jones, however, after some further conversation, promised that he would try to procure it for exhibition to the defendant. This promise he failed to perform. It turned out that the settlement included the lands upon which the money was loaned. Here was certainly knowledge enough to put the party upon inquiry; for he was apprised of the existence of the very document which was the foundation of the complainant's claim. He did inquire, however, and made every reasonable effort to see the settlement itself, but was baffled by the plausible pretenses of David Smith. The vice-chancellor held the notice insufficient. He said: "The affairs of mankind cannot be carried on with ordinary security, if a doctrine like that of constructive notice is to be refined upon until it is extended to cases like the present."

Possession by a third person, under some previous title, has frequently but inaccurately been said to amount to constructive notice to a purchaser, of the nature and extent of such prior right. Such a possession puts the purchaser upon inquiry, and makes it his duty to pursue his inquiries with diligence, but is not absolutely conclusive upon him. In Hanbury v. Litchfield, 2 Mylne & K. 629, when the question arose, the master of the rolls said: "It is true that when a tenant is in possession of the premises, a purchaser has implied notice of the nature of his title; but, if, at the time of his purchase, the tenant in possession is not the original lessee, but merely holds under a derivative lease, and has no knowledge of the covenants contained in the original lease, it has never been considered that it was want of due diligence in the purchaser, which is to fix him with implied notice, if he does not pursue his inquiries through every derivative lessee until he arrives at the person entitled to the original lease, which can alone convey to him information of the covenants."

This doctrine is confirmed by the language of Judge Story in Flagg v. Mann, 2 Sumn. 554, Fed. Cas. No. 4,847. He says: "I admit that the rule in equity seems to be, that where a tenant or other person is in possession of the estate at the time of the purchase, the purchaser is put upon inquiry as to the title; and if he does not inquire, he is bound in the same manner as if he had inquired and had positive notice of the title of the party in possession."

It is still further confirmed by the case of Rogers v. Jones, 8 N. H. 264. The language of Parker, J., in that case is very emphatic. He says: "To say that he (the purchaser) was put upon inquiry, and that having made all due investigation without obtaining any knowledge of title, he was still chargeable with notice of a deed, if one did really exist, would be absurd."

If these authorities are to be relied upon, and I see no reason to doubt their correctness, the true doctrine on this subject is, that where a purchaser has knowledge of any fact sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the existence of some right or title in conflict with that he is about to purchase, he is presumed either to have made the inquiry and ascertained the extent of such prior right, or to have been guilty of a degree of negligence equally fatal to his claim to be considered as a bona fide purchaser. This presumption, however, is a mere inference of fact, and may be repelled by proof that the purchaser failed to discover the prior right, notwithstanding the exercise of proper diligence on his part.

The judgment should be reversed, and there should be a new trial, with costs to abide the event.

PAIGE, J. The question to be decided is, whether, under the finding of the referee, the plaintiff is to be deemed to have had at the time of his purchase legal notice of the prior unrecorded mortgage of the defendant. The referee finds that the plaintiff had sufficient information or belief of the existence of such mortgage to put him upon inquiry, but that upon pursuing such inquiry to the extent of such information and belief, he did not find that such mortgage existed or had been given. It seems to me that the two findings are inconsistent with each other. If the plaintiff, on pursuing an inquiry to the full extent of his information and belief as to the existence of the defendant's mortgage, was unable to find that it either then existed or had been given, the highest evidence is furnished that the information received or belief entertained by the plaintiff was not sufficient to put him on inquiry as to the existence of such mortgage. The last part of this finding effectually disproves the fact previously found of the sufficiency of notice to put the plaintiff on inquiry. The two facts are utterly inconsistent with each other, and cannot possibly co-exist.

The remarks of Parker, J., in Rogers v. Jones, 8 N. H. 264, 269, are directly apposite to the facts found by the referee. Judge Parker says: "To say that he (demandant) was put upon inquiry, and that having made all due investigation without obtaining any knowledge of title, he was still chargeable with notice of a deed, if one did really exist, would be absurd." The sound sense of these observations is clearly shown by the principle of the rule that information sufficient to put a party upon inquiry is equivalent to evidence of actual notice or to direct and positive notice. That principle is that such information will, if followed by an inquiry prosecuted with due diligence, lead to a knowledge of the fact with notice of which the party is sought to be charged. Hence, in all cases where the question of implied notice of a prior unrecorded mortgage or conveyance arises as a question of fact to be determined, the court must decide whether the information possessed by the party would, if it had been followed up by proper examination, have led to a discovery of such mortgage or conveyance. If the determination is that such an examination would have resulted in a discovery of the mortgage or conveyance, the conclusion of law necessarily results that the information possessed by the party amounted to implied notice of such instrument. But if the determination is the converse of the one stated, the information of the party cannot be held to be an implied notice of the deed or mortgage. These propositions will be found to be fully sustained by authority. (Kennedy v. Green, 3 Mylne & K. 699; 2 Sugd. Vend. 552 [Am. Ed. 1851] marg. p. 1052; 4 Kent, Comm. 172; Insurance Co. v. Halsey, 4 Sandf. 577, 578; Id., 8 N. Y. 274, 275; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 398-400, 400a; Jackson v. Burgott, 10 Johns. 461; Dunham v. Dey, 15 Johns. 568, 569, in error; Jackson v. Given, 8 Johns. 137; Jolland v. Stainbridge, 3 Ves. 478; Pendleton v. Fay, 2 Paige, 205.) Where the information is sufficient to lead a party to a knowledge of a prior unrecorded conveyance, a neglect to make the necessary inquiry to acquire such knowledge will not excuse him, but he will be chargeable with a knowledge of its existence; the rule being that a party in possession of certain information will be chargeable with a knowledge of all facts which an inquiry, suggested by such information, prosecuted with due diligence, would have disclosed to him. (4 Sandf. 578; 3 Mylne & K. 699.) In this case the fact being found by the referee that the plaintiff, after pursuing an inquiry to the extent of his information, failed to discover the existence of the defendant's mortgage, it seems to me that neither law nor justice will justify us in holding the plaintiff chargeable with implied notice of such mortgage. The doctrine of notice and its operation in favor of a prior unrecorded deed or mortgage rests upon a question of fraud, and on the evidence necessary to infer it. (4 Kent, Comm. 172.) Actual notice affects the conscience, and convicts the junior purchaser of a fraudulent intent to defeat the prior conveyance. His knowledge of facts and circumstances at the time of the second purchase sufficient to enable him, on due inquiry, to discover the existence of the prior conveyance, is evidence from which a fraudulent intent may be inferred. (15 Johns. 569; 2 Johns. Ch. 190; Jackson v. Burgott, 10 Johns. 462.) Now, if it is ascertained and found as a fact, that the facts and circumstances within the knowledge of the second purchaser, at the time of his purchase, were insufficient to lead him, on a diligent examination, to a discovery of the prior conveyance, how upon this finding can a fraudulent intent be inferred, and if not, how can he be charged with notice which implies a fraudulent intent? It is not in the nature of things, that a knowledge of the same facts and circumstances shall, at one and the same time, be held evidence of both innocence and guilt. I think the rule well established, that an inference of a fraudulent intent on the part of a junior purchaser or mortgagee must, in the absence of actual notice, be founded on clear and strong circumstances, and that such inference must be necessary and unquestionable. (McMechan v. Griffing, 3 Pick. 149, 154, 155; Hine v. Dodd, 2 Atk. 275; Jackson v. Given, 8 Johns. 137; 2 Mass. 509; 2 Johns. Ch. 189; 15 Johns. 569; 8 Cow. 264, 266.)

For the above reasons, both the judgment rendered on the report of the referee and the judgment of the general term affirming the same, should be reversed, and a new trial should be granted.

Judgment reversed.

THOMAS et al. v. BURNETT.

(21 N. E. 352, 128 Ill. 37.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. April 5, 1889.

Error to circuit court, Randolph county;
GEORGE W. WALL, Judge.Charles W. Thomas, pro se. James A. Watts, for defendant in error.

SHOPE, J. This was a bill filed by Martha J. Burnett against Charles W. Thomas and the sheriff of Randolph county, to set aside a certificate of purchase held by Thomas upon a 40-acre tract of land owned by the complainant, as a cloud on her title, and to enjoin the sheriff from making a deed under such certificate. Both parties claimed title under James Burnett, a son of the complainant. It is conceded that on the 29th day of March, 1882, James Burnett was the owner of the tract of land in controversy, which was inclosed and in cultivation, but upon which there was no house. On that day the complainant, as it is shown, bought the land in good faith from her son for the sum of $1,600. No deed was made until in the month of April following, when James Burnett conveyed the land to complainant. No question arises in respect to the payment of the purchase money at the date of the purchase. The land had been fenced, and under cultivation for over 20 years. David C. Thompson had for some years acted as the agent of James Burnett, while he was owner, and had rented the land from year to year. The deed to complainant was not recorded until October 22, 1884, and the land stood on the assessment books in the name of James Burnett, until 1885. The complainant, after her purchase, retained Thompson as her agent in respect of this land, who, in August, 1882, rented the land as the complainant's to one Jordan for one year, who raised a crop thereon, and retained possession of the same until in August, 1883, when he surrendered possession to Thompson. In March, 1884, the agent rented the lands to Yagle. At each renting the agent informed the tenants that complainant was the owner of the premises, and that he was renting it for her. A crop was raised on the land each year after 1882 by the tenants of complainant, and the fences were kept in repair by her agent, who collected the rent, and paid the same to her. On the 10th day of October, 1883, Margaret Gilfillen sued out an attachment against James Burnett in the Randolph circuit court returnable to the March term thereof, then following, and this land was levied upon on that day as the property of James Burnett, and a certificate of levy duly filed. At the September term, 1884, of said court, said plaintiff in attachment recovered judgment for $2,500 against said Burnett. Special execution was issued thereon, under which, on October 22, 1884, the tract in controversy was sold to defendant Thomas, attorney of the plaintiff in question, for $1,900, and the sheriff delivered to Thomas a certicate of purchase, which is the certificate now sought to be set aside.

Section 31 of the conveyance act declares that all deeds, etc., authorized by law to be recorded, "shall take effect and be in force from and after the time of filing the same for record, and not before, as to all creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice; and all such deeds and title papers shall be adjudged void as to all such creditors and subsequent purchasers without notice, until the same shall be filed for record." An attaching creditor, who levies his attachment without notice of a prior unrecorded deed of his debtor, either actual or constructive, acquires a lien, which, if perfected by judgment, execution, sale, and deed, will hold the legal estate as against the grantee in a prior unrecorded deed. Having acquired a lien as an innocent creditor without notice, he will have a right to enforce the same, notwithstanding he may have, subsequently to the levying of his attachment, received notice of the deed. Martin v. Dryden, 1 Gilman, 187; Stribling v. Ross, 16 Ill. 122; Jones v. Jones, Id. 117; Henderson v. Downing, 24 Miss. 106. Unless, therefore, the plaintiff in attachment had notice, either actual or constructive, of the unrecorded deed from James Burnett to Mrs. Burnett, the lien thereby acquired must prevail over the rights of the complainant under that deed. The statute makes her deed void as against the attaching creditor if a lien on the property was thereby secured in good faith, and without notice of her rights. Complainant's right to the relief sought depends, therefore, upon the fact whether the plaintiff in attachment, at the time of the levy of the writ, had notice of her rights. There is no pretense that she had actual notice of the unrecorded deed, but it is claimed that she had constructive notice, arising from the possession of the land by complainant. Complainant took possession after her purchase by her agent and tenants, as we have seen, long prior to the levy of the attachment, and which possession she has ever since retained. It is well settled that actual possession of land by a party under an unrecorded deed is constructive notice of the legal and equitable right of the party in possession. The possession by tenant is the same in all respects as if by the party himself. Franz v. Orton, 75 Ill. 100; Whitaker v. Miller, 83 Ill. 381; Coari v. Olsen, 91 Ill. 273. It is claimed by plaintiff in error that possession, to have the effect of notice, must be of that character which will arrest attention, and the case of Loughridge v. Bowland, 52 Miss. 546, is referred to as sustaining that position. In that case the grantor of the land at the time of the conveyance was in possession of the same by his tenant. After the sale the same tenant continued to hold possession under an agreement to pay rent to the grantees. There was then nothing more than a technical attornment by the tenant to the purchaser. And the court held that the mere attornment of the tenant, without any visible change in the character of the holding, was not sufficient to put a creditor or subsequent purchaser on inquiry. It is not necessary to the decision of this case to express any opinion in respect of the doctrine there announced, for the reason that after the complainant's purchase she through her agent made a lease of the property to Jordan. This was in August, 1882, and for one year, and under it a crop was raised. The tenant was informed that his landlord was Mrs. Burnett, the complainant. The agent, as before stated, kept the place in repair as her agent, collected the rents, and paid them to her. Here were open, notorious acts of ownership asserted in an unequivocal manner by the complainant. Thompson, the agent, was not himself in possession of the property, but the tenants of complainant were, and it was their possession which constituted notice. It is, however, said that there was no tenant in actual possession at the time of the levy of the attachment, and therefore the plaintiff in error was not chargeable with notice of the unrecorded deed. The tenant's possession of land is that of his landlord. The Jordans occupied the land up to August, 1883, and this was notice to the world of Mrs. Burnett's title, to all intents as if she had occupied it. Actual residence is not essential to continuous possession. If the party is in actual possession of the land, and there are continuous acts of ownership, it is sufficient. Coleman v. Billings, 89 Ill. 183; Ford v. Marcall, 107 Ill. 136. The land here in controversy was improved, and under fence. In such case, the owner will not lose his possession by failing to be continuously in the actual occupancy or use of the land by himself or tenant. The fact that a short time may have elapsed between the actual occupancy by one tenant, before another tenant takes possession, will not be a loss of possession by the owner. The improvements, the fact that a crop had been raised the previous season, will clearly indicate the possession, and will be sufficient to put others dealing with the property upon inquiry. The attachment here was levied October 10, 1883, a short time after the tenants had surrendered possession, to Thompson, complainant's agent, who still continued to act as such agent in taking care of the property, and the plaintiff should have made inquiry before levying her writ of attachment. It is apparent this could have been done, either of the outgoing tenants or of the agent. Any reasonable, prudent man, contemplating a purchase of the property, would have made such inquiry; and it is clear that an inquiry of the Jordans or of Thompson would have led to notice of the claim of complainant, and of the existence of the unrecorded deed. We think the circumstances are such as to charge the attaching creditor with notice of the deed from James Burnett to the complainant. This being so, the circuit court committed no error in granting the relief prayed, and its decree will be affirmed.

PRINGLE v. DUNN et al.

(37 Wis. 449.)

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. Jan. Term, 1875.

Appeal from circuit court, Milwaukee county.

Action by one Pringle against Andrew Dunn and wife and others to foreclose a mortgage given to the La Crosse & Milwaukee Railroad Company to secure a bond of said company for $5,000, payable January 1, 1864, said mortgage bearing date April 11, 1854, and alleged to have been recorded on such date, and afterwards assigned to plaintiff, as a bona fide purchaser for value. There was no record of the assignment. The court found that the witnesses to the mortgage did not subscribe it at the time of its execution, but after it had been recorded; that, after such subscription, it was not again recorded; that the plaintiff was the bona fide holder of the bond and mortgage; that the defendants other than Andrew Dunn and wife had no actual knowledge of the mortgage, and the recording of the mortgage before it was subscribed was not constructive notice; and dismissed the complaint. Plaintiff appeals. Modified.

Mariner, Smith & Ordway, for appellant. Guy C. Prentiss, J. P. C. Cottrill, and John W. Cary, for respondents.

COLE, J. Before approaching the legal questions involved in this case, it is necessary to determine a question of fact; and that is, does the evidence show that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was properly attested when first left at the office of the register, so as to entitle it to record? There is considerable testimony in the case which tends strongly to prove that the mortgage had no witnesses when it was recorded. And the court found as a fact that the mortgage was not subscribed by the witnesses Baker and McFarlane at the time of its execution, and before it was transcribed upon the records and entered in the general index, but was subscribed by these witnesses after it was recorded, and that it was not again recorded. This finding affirms one important fact, which is much contested by the defendants, which is the genuineness of the signature of the witness A. J. McFarlane to the instrument. An attempt is made to prove, and it is argued that the evidence shows, that McFarlane never signed the mortgage as a witness, and that his signature thereto is a forgery. On this point we will only make the remark that we are satisfied from the evidence, and especially by an inspection of the writings themselves, of the authenticity of the signature. Whether the mortgage was subscribed by the witnesses at the time of its execution and before it was left at the office for registry is a question of more doubt upon the evidence. The testimony is quite strong and positive that the mortgage had no subscribing witnesses when it was recorded. But this testimony is contradicted; and, considering the circumstances attending the execution and delivery of the mortgage, we think the probabilities favor the inference that the instrument was witnessed when it was left for record. According to this view, there was a mistake in transcribing the mortgage upon the record by omitting the names of the witnesses. The weight of the evidence, to our minds, supports this inference or conclusion. It is to be observed that the mortgage is perfect and fair on its face, showing two witnesses. A strong presumption fairly arises from the instrument itself that it was witnessed at the time of its execution. This presumption is not overcome nor repelled by the testimony offered to show that it was not witnessed at that time. In respect to the degree or quantity of evidence necessary to justify a finding that the subscribing witnesses signed the instrument after it was executed and recorded, the case would seem to come within the rule laid down in Kercheval v. Doty, 31 Wis. 478, where it is said: "The proposition being to set aside or invalidate a written contract by evidence of a far less certain and reliable character than the writing itself, the greatest clearness and certainty of proof should be required. It is like the cases where the object is to correct or reform a deed or other instrument on the ground of mistake, or to set aside or rescind it on the same ground; where the rule is that the fact must be established by clear and satisfactory evidence." The testimony offered to show that the mortgage was not witnessed when executed and before it was recorded falls short of this rule. The fact is not established by clear and conclusive proof that it was not witnessed when executed. It would serve no useful purpose to go into a detailed discussion of the evidence upon this point, and we shall not do so. It is sufficient to say that, giving to the testimony offered to show that the mortgage was not witnessed before it was received for record all the weight to which it is entitled, it fails to establish that fact in a clear, satisfactory manner.

Assuming, then, that the mortgage was witnessed when it was left at the office of the register to be recorded, the further important inquiry arises as to what effect must be given to the record as constructive notice to subsequent bona fide purchasers for value. This record was in this state. The entry of the mortgage was made in the general index book, but the full record of the instrument had no subscribing witnesses; and therefore the question is, would such a record operate as constructive notice to subsequent purchasers for value, independent of any actual notice? It is claimed by the counsel for the plaintiff that the record does and should so operate, notwithstanding the mistake in the registration or recording of the instrument in extenso. This presents a question of no little difficulty, which must be solved by the application of general principles of law to the provisions of our statute.

It is a familiar rule that an instrument must be properly executed and acknowledged so as to entitle it to record, in order to make the registry thereof operate as constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser. Says Mr. Justice Story: "The doctrine as to the registration of deeds being constructive notice to all subsequent purchasers is not to be understood of all deeds and conveyances which may be de facto registered, but of such only as are authorized or required by law to be registered, and are duly registered in compliance with law. If they are not authorized or required to be registered, or the registry itself is not in compliance with the law, the act of registration is treated as a mere nullity; and then the subsequent purchaser is affected only by such actual notice as would amount to a fraud." 1 Eq. Jur. § 404. See, also Ely v. Wilcox, 20 Wis. 528; Fallass v. Pierce, 30 Wis. 444; Lessee of Heister v. Fortner, 2 Bin. 40; Shove v. Larsen, 22 Wis. 142, and cases cited on page 146. Under our statute, among other requisites, two witnesses are essential to a conveyance, to entitle it to record. The statute requires every register to keep a general index, each page of which shall be divided into eight columns, with heads to the respective columns as prescribed; and the duty is imposed upon the register to make correct entries in said index of every instrument received by him for record, under the respective and appropriate heads, and immediately to enter in the appropriate column, and in the order of time in which it was received, the day and hour of reception; and it is declared that the instrument "shall be considered as recorded at the time so noted." Rev. St. 1858, c. 13, §§ 142, 143. In Shove v. Larsen, supra, the effect of this index containing correct entries of matters required to be made therein was considered, and it was held that by force of the statute it operated as constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser. In that case the index contained an accurate description of the land mortgaged, but in transcribing the mortgage at large upon the records a mistake was made in the description; and it was claimed in behalf of the subsequent purchaser that it was the registration of the instrument at large which alone amounted to constructive notice. But this construction of the statute was not adopted, the court holding that a subsequent purchaser was bound to take notice of the entries in the index, which the law required the register to make. This result seemed to follow necessarily from the language of the statute, which declared that the instrument should be considered as recorded at the time noted. Time might elapse before the instrument was transcribed at large on the record, or it might be lost, and not transcribed at all, leaving the index the only record of its contents. And the manifest intention of the statute seemed to be to make the index notice of all proper entries from its date, and also of the instrument itself until it was registered in full. The further consequence would seem necessarily to result from this view of the statute that the registration of the conveyance in extenso relates back to the registration in the index, and from thence there is constructive notice of the contents of the instrument. The doctrine of Shove v. Larsen was approved in Hay v. Hill, 24 Wis. 235, but the court refused to make the entry in the index in that case operate as constructive notice, because upon its very face it bore conclusive evidence that it was not made at its date; in other words, the rectitude and integrity of the index were successfully impeached by the index itself. See, also, Insurance Co. v. Scales, 27 Wis. 640. Where there is nothing upon the face of the index to impeach or throw suspicion upon its accuracy, there it would affect a subsequent purchaser with notice of those facts which the law required to appear therein. Doubtless, a still further consequence follows from this construction of the statute, namely, that where, by some mistake, there is a discrepancy between the proper index entries and the instrument as registered, there each supplies the defects of the other in the constructive notice thereby given; that is, it appears to be the intention of the statute to charge the subsequent purchaser constructively with such knowledge as the proper index entries afford, as well as with notice of those facts derived from the registration itself. He is presumed to have examined the whole record, and is affected with notice of what it contains. But when the instrument, as registered in full, appears defective in some material and essential parts, which are not supplied by the index entries, what effect, then, must be given the record as constructive notice? This is really the difficult question in this case. From the entries in the index it would not appear whether the mortgage was witnessed or not. The presumption from the mere entries themselves would be that it was witnessed and acknowledged, so as to entitle it to record; but when the mortgage, as registered in full, was examined, it would be found that it had no witnesses, and had no business on the records. As the record itself is only constructive notice of its contents, it is difficult to perceive how it can go beyond the facts appearing upon it, and charge a purchaser constructively with knowledge of a fact not in the record.

One of the counsel for the defendants states the argument on this point as follows: He insists and claims that the entries in the index books, so far as they indicated that the mortgage had been filed for record, indicated also that the mortgage was so executed as to entitle these entries of it to be made; but that, when the full record was looked at for all the particulars of the mortgage, and perhaps for the express purpose of verifying the entries in the index, it is found that the apparent assertion by the index entries that the mortgage was properly executed was wholly untrue, and that the mortgage in fact was no incumbrance. The fact, as truly shown to exist by the full record, overcomes and destroys the false assertion as to the fact in the index. And, it appearing by the instrument registered that it was not entitled to record, both the registration and index itself cease to affect the purchaser with constructive notice.

It is not readily perceived wherein this argument as to the effect of our various provisions upon the subject of registration is unsound. The question mainly depends upon the construction of our own statutes. So far as we are aware, this is the first time the point has been presented in this court for adjudication. We have derived but little aid from the decisions in other states, for the reason that few of them have similar statutory provisions. We have been referred by the counsel for the plaintiff to two cases in Michigan,—Brown v. McCormick, 28 Mich. 215, and Starkweather v. Martin, Id. 472. In Brown v. McCormick the effect of the registry, as notice to subsequent purchasers, was made to turn upon the curative act of 1861, mentioned in the opinion. In Starkweather v. Martin the question was, how far the absence, on the registry of a deed, of any mark or device indicating a seal, or of any statement of the register that the original was sealed, affected the validity of the record entry as evidence of title. The record entry of the deed was made more than forty years before the cause was decided, by the proper officer, and in the appropriate place for the registry of deeds, under the law permitting the registry of only sealed instruments; and the instrument was in the form of a warranty deed, purporting to be acknowledged and dated at a time when it was the common and lawful course to seal conveyances, and contrary to official duty to take the acknowledgment unless the conveyance was sealed, and where the conclusion, attestation clause, and certificate of acknowledgment of the instrument all spoke of it as under seal. The court said that these facts and incidents, taken together, afforded a very strong presumption that the original was sealed.

The doctrine of this case does not seem to have a very strong bearing upon the question under consideration. It may be said that it was contrary to the duty of the register to record the mortgage unless it was properly acknowledged and witnessed, and that a presumption arises that he would not have done so. But in answer to this it may also be said that the law made it the duty of the register to record the mortgage unless it was properly acknowledged and witnessed, and that a presumption arises that he would not have done so. But in answer to this it may also be said that the law made it the duty of the register to record, or cause to be recorded correctly, all instruments authorized by law to be recorded. Section 140, c. 13, Rev. St. 1858. And the presumption that he performed his duty in recording the mortgage correctly is as strong as the presumption that he would not have recorded it unless it was entitled to registry.

In Shove v. Larsen, a number of cases are referred to which hold that a mistake in recording a deed, or recording it out of its order, renders the registration ineffectual as notice to subsequent incumbrancers and purchasers. The doctrine of those cases would seem to be applicable to the case before us. The registration and index entries being incomplete, because showing that the mortgage had no subscribing witnesses, constructive notice could not be presumed of such a record; for the principle "that the registry is notice of the tenor and effect of the instrument recorded only as it appears upon that record" fully applies. Shepherd v. Burkhalter, 13 Ga. 443. See, in addition to the cases cited in Shove v. Larsen, Brown v. Kirkman, 1 Ohio St. 116; Stevens v. Hampton, 46 Mo. 404; Bishop v. Schneider, Id. 472; Terrell v. Andrew Co., 44 Mo. 309; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 288.

The question, then, arises whether the evidence shows that any of the defendants were affected with actual notice of the mortgage. This question, we think, must be answered in the affirmative, so far as the defendants Thomas Maloy and Stanislaus Bartosz are concerned.

In the deposition taken on his own behalf, but read as a part of the plaintiff's case, Thomas Maloy distinctly admits that he had heard, when he purchased his lots, that there was a defective railroad mortgage upon them, but that he did not look for it, because his abstract did not show it. It is claimed by one of the counsel for the defendants that this related to the Aiken mortgage, and not to the one upon which this action is brought. It seems to us, however, that this is a totally inadmissible construction of the testimony. He most certainly refers to the mortgage in suit. And what he had heard about there being a defective railroad mortgage upon the property was sufficient to put him upon inquiry. Parker v. Kane, 4 Wis. 1. "What is sufficient to put a purchaser upon an inquiry is good notice; that is, where a man has sufficient information to lead him to a fact, he shall be deemed conscious of it."

Sugd. Vend. (9th London Ed.) p. 335. "In regard to the inquiry required of a party, it should be such as a prudent and careful man would exercise in his own business of equal importance. Accordingly, where the mortgagee is informed that there are charges affecting the estate, and is cognizant of two only, he cannot claim to be a purchaser without notice of other charges, because he believes that the two, which satisfy the word "charges," are all the charges upon it. He is bound to inquire whether there are any others. The rule with respect to the consequences of a purchaser abstaining from making inquiries does not depend exclusively upon a fraudulent motive. A man may abstain from mere heedlessness or stupidity, and be none the less responsible for the consequences; but, if he make reasonable inquiry, and is deterred by a false answer, he is excusable, if it be of a character to delude a prudent man." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 400b; Jackson v. Van Valkenburgh, 8 Cow. 260. Independently of the record, Maloy had notice of the existence of the mortgage, or had a knowledge of such facts as to call for further inquiry. He cannot, therefore, be protected as an innocent purchaser for value.

The defendant Bartosz must be charged with notice of the mortgage by the recitals in the deed from Tenney and wife to his immediate grantor. He was present when that deed was executed and delivered to his uncle. He testifies that he did not know whether anything was said about the railroad mortgage at that time or not; that he did not understand English very well. The purchase was really made by his uncle for him. And, whether he fully understood the conversation at the time about incumbrances, he must be chargeable with notice of what appears in his chain of title. This clause was in the deed to his uncle; "Said premises are free and clear from all incumbrances except a mortgage to the La Crosse Railroad Co., which I am to save said Bartosz harmless from." The general rule upon this subject is "that, where a purchaser cannot make out a title but by a deed which leads him to another fact, he will be presumed to have knowledge of that fact." The following authorities are very clear and decisive upon that point: Fitzhugh v. Barnard, 12 Mich. 105; Case v. Erwin, 18 Mich. 434; Baker v. Mather, 25 Mich. 51; Insurance Co. v. Halsey, 8 N. Y. 271; Frost v. Beekman, 1 Johns. Ch. 298; Gibert v. Peteler, 38 N. Y. 165; Acer v. Westcott, 46 N. Y. 384; Coles v. Sims, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 1. The clause in the deed referred to the mortgage as an existing incumbrance, and he cannot now, in good faith, claim that it is not a lien upon his property.

The counsel for the plaintiff claims that the defendant McLindon had actual knowledge of the existence of the mortgage. It is true, he testified that when he purchased he knew by report that there was a railroad mortgage upon the property, but he says that the report stated that the mortgage was void. Were he not protected by another principal, he could not certainly be regarded as a bona fide purchaser. But he purchased from S. S. Johnson, or claims through Johnson, in whom the title stood free from any taint. For the rule is well settled that a purchaser affected with notice may protect himself by purchasing of another who is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration. For a similar reason, if a person who has notice sells to another who has no notice, and is a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, the latter may protect his title, although it was affected with the equity arising from notice in the hands of the person from whom he derived it. Mr. Justice Story says this doctrine, in both of its branches, has been settled for nearly a century and a half in England. 1 Eq. Jur. § 410. He states an exception to the rule, which was recognized and enforced in Ely v. Wilcox, 26 Wis. 91, where the estate became revested in the original fraudulent grantee, when the original equity was held to reattach to it. There is no pretense that McLindon comes within the exception; and, as a bona fide purchase of an estate for a valuable consideration purges away the equity from the estate in the hands of all persons who derive title under it, he is protected. It is said that it does not appear that Johnson's title was derived from the common source. As we understand the bill of exceptions, an abstract was offered in evidence to show title from Bunn, by various intermediate conveyances, to the defendant, which was ruled out on the plaintiff's objection. But perhaps it is a better answer to the objection to say that the plaintiff has made the defendants parties under the general allegation that they claim some interest in or title to the mortgaged premises, which was subject to the mortgage. This allegation implies that this interest was not adverse, but was derived from Dunn, though subsequent in date, and inferior in right, to the plaintiff's mortgage.

It was further insisted that the evidence showed that the defendant Mary Maloy had actual notice of the mortgage. We do not think this position is sustained by the testimony. It is attempted to charge her with the same actual knowledge her husband had, because he aided her when she made her purchase of Martin Maloy. It does not appear that anything was said at this time about the railroad mortgage, or that she ever had any notice of it. It does not appear, even, that he was acting as her agent in any legal sense; and, besides, if he were, his knowledge, acquired at another time, when not engaged in her business, ought not to be imputed to her. Notice, to bind the principal, should be brought home to the agent while engaged in the business or negotiation of the principal, and when it would be a breach of trust in the former not to communicate the knowledge to the latter. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 408, and cases cited in note 1. The evidence fails to bring her within that rule.

A number of other questions were discussed upon the argument; but we believe these observations dispose of all the more important ones.

The judgment of the circuit court as to the defendants Thomas Maloy and Stanislaus Bartosz must be reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this decision.

It is so ordered.

DEASON et al. v. TAYLOR.

(53 Miss. 697.)

Supreme Court of Mississippi. Oct., 1876.

Appeal from chancery court, Lincoln county; Thomas Y. Berry, Chancellor.

Bill in equity by Bentonville Taylor against J. B. Deason, M. W. Hoskins, and G. W. Hoskins, her husband, Ellen McClendon and A. D. McClendon, her husband, to recover the balance of the purchase money of certain land, and to subject land to the payment of the same.

The bill showed that on February 16, 1872, the complainant sold and conveyed the land in question to J. B. Deason; the deed, which was duly recorded on February 19, 1872, reciting a consideration of "the sum of $700, to be paid to the party of the first part on or before the first day of July, 1872, by the party of the second part." For the purchase money Deason gave his note, of even date with the deed, as follows: "On or before the first day of July next, I promise to pay Bentonville Taylor, or bearer, the sum of $700, for town lots conveyed by him to me this day. This sum is to be paid in Mississippi state certificates of indebtedness at par." After maturity of the note, Deason sold and conveyed the lots to the defendant M. W. Hoskins, and the latter and her husband sold and conveyed the same to the defendant Ellen McClendon. When Deason sold and conveyed the lots to the defendant Hoskins, he informed her agent that he had paid Taylor all the purchase money.

The defendants demurred to the bill, on the ground that the complainant had no vendor's lien, it appearing on the face of the bill that the consideration for the sale of the lands was not money or United States currency; and because the recital in the deed was not notice to the defendants Hoskins and McClendon of the complainant's equity.

The demurrer was overruled, and an answer filed, and upon final hearing a decree was rendered for the complainant for the balance of the purchase money due him, and foreclosing his vendor's lien on the land. The defendants appeal.

Sessions & Cassedy, for appellants. Chrisman & Thompson, for appellee. Bentonville Taylor, pro se.

CHALMERS, J. We are content with the finding of the chancellor on the facts. If any injustice was done in fixing the amount due, it was to the appellee, and not to the appellants. The fact that the note was dischargeable in Mississippi certificates of indebtedness (known as Alcorn money) did not deprive it of the protection of the vendor's equitable lien. Harvey v. Kelly, 41 Miss. 490.

In the face of the deed which Taylor excuted to Deason was this recital: "The party of the first part (the vendor), for and in consideration of the sum of $700, to be paid on or before the first day of July, 1872, by the party of the second part" (the vendee), &c. For this sum of $700, Deason, the vendee, executed his note to Taylor, due 1st of July, 1872. The deed was recorded at once, and Deason took possession of the premises. Without having completed payment in full of the note, Deason sold the premises in 1874 to Hoskins, who subsequently sold to Mrs. McClendon. Both Hoskins and Mrs. McClendon deny actual knowledge, at and before their purchases, that any thing remained due to Taylor.

Did the law give them constructive notice of Taylor's rights? Nothing is better settled than that the purchaser of real estate is bound to take notice of all recitals in the chain of title through which his own title is derived. Not only is he bound by everything stated in the several conveyances constituting that chain, but he is bound fully to investigate and explore everything to which his attention is thereby directed. Where, therefore, he is informed by any of the preceding conveyances, upon which his own deed rests, that the land has been sold on a credit, he is bound to inform himself as to whether the purchase money has been paid since the execution of the deed. Wiseman v. Hutchinson, 20 Ind. 40; Croskey v. Chapman, 26 Ind. 333; Johnston v. Gwathmey, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 317.

It is argued, however, that this principle only applies before the maturity of the notes, as shown by the recitals of the deed, and that it will not apply where, as in the case at bar, subsequent purchasers have bought after the notes were past due. It is said that, in such case, the subsequent purchasers may rely upon a presumption that the original debt has been paid. We know of no principle which would justify a reliance upon such a presumption, and it is expressly negatived by the cases of Honore v. Bakewell, 6 B. Mon. 67, and Thornton v. Knox, Id. 74. They may rely upon such presumption after sufficient time has elapsed to bar the notes, although, in fact, they may have been renewed. Avent v. McCorkle, 45 Miss. 221.

It appears in the case at bar that the subsequent purchasers knew that Deason had bought the realty on a credit, because they asked him at the time of their purchase if he had paid all the money due Taylor. It was their own folly if they relied upon his assurances, instead of applying for information to Taylor, who lived in an adjoining county, and is shown by the bill to be a practising lawyer, well known in Brookhaven, where the lots were situated and all the defendants resided.

Decree affirmed.

HOUSTON v. TIMMERMAN.¹

(21 Pac. 1037, 14 Or. 499.)

Supreme Court of Oregon. May 3, 1889.

Appeal from circuit court, Linn county.

Hewitt & Bryant and Tilman Ford, for appellant. J. K. Weatherford and D. R. N. Blackburn, for respondent.

LORD, J. This was a suit to partition certain lands described herein. The defendant denied that the respondent had any interest in said lands, and alleged that she was the owner in fee-simple, and entitled to the possession of the whole of said premises. The plaintiff, in reply, denied this, and alleged affirmatively that some time in July, 1884, she commenced a suit against A. J. Houston for a divorce and alimony, and for an equal undivided one-third of the real property then owned by said Houston, and that he was the owner in fee of said real property, which was duly described therein. That the summons in said divorce suit was served on —, 1884, and that prior to that time and prior to the 26th day of September, 1884, the defendant Timmerman had notice that the complaint for divorce and one-third of said real property had been filed by the plaintiff against her husband. That on the 5th day of February, 1886, a decree was entered, granting a divorce in favor of the plaintiff, and adjudging her to be the owner of the undivided one-third of said real property, etc. The court below, after a trial of said cause, rendered a decree therein, granting the prayer of plaintiff for partition, except as to the 160 acres of land mentioned therein, and partition was ordered and made on June 26, 1888, and confirmed by the court. The defendant Timmerman derived her title to the premises in dispute in this wise: On the 15th day of March, 1880, the plaintiff's husband, A. J. Houston, for value, made and delivered his promissory note to the defendant Timmerman for the sum of $3,400, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from date; that, the said A. J. Houston failing to pay said note, the defendant Timmerman commenced suit on the 26th day of September, 1884, and caused service of summons to be made upon him on that day, and that on October 27, 1884, the defendant Timmerman recovered judgment against the said A. J. Houston for the sum of $5,463.87, which, on the same day, was duly docketed in the judgment lien docket, and thereupon became a lien upon all the real property mentioned in the complaint in this suit. It further appears that on March 19, 1883, said A. J. Houston made and delivered his promissory note to J. T. Williams for $1,000, with interest from date at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, payable six months after date, and to secure the payment of the same executed a mortgage, which was duly recorded, upon the 160 acres of land set out in the complaint. The said Houston failing to pay said note, the mortgage was foreclosed against the said Houston and the plaintiff herein. The defendant Timmerman, however, answered, setting up her judgment, and asked, if the property be sold to foreclose said mortgage, that the overplus, if any, should be applied in payment of her judgment, and a decree was accordingly so entered, etc.; that execution was issued upon said decree, and said 160 acres was sold to the defendant Timmerman for $2,500; that thereafter, on May 13, 1885, execution was issued upon said judgment, and the remainder of the premises described herein was sold to the defendant Timmerman, and said sale confirmed, and deeds were duly executed by the sheriff to said defendant.

It will be noticed that the suit of the defendant Timmerman to recover the amount due on the note against A. J. Houston, who was then the husband of the plaintiff herein, was commenced after the suit of the plaintiff for divorce against her husband, and that a judgment was recovered and docketed before a decree in the divorce suit was rendered, and in which one-third of the real estate then owned by the husband was decreed to the plaintiff. It is true, there was no direct proof of the date of the service of the summons in the divorce suit; but, as this will not affect the result reached, it is immaterial. The contention is that the defendant Timmerman was a purchaser pendente lite. There is, however, a preliminary question to be first disposed of, namely, that the appeal was not taken within six months as allowed by law. The answer to this is that the objection relates to the interlocutory or first decree, and not to the final decree, and that, as our own Code does not authorize an appeal from interlocutory judgments or decrees, but only from such as are final, and, the appeal from the final decree being within six months, there was a right of appeal, and the objection, therefore, is unavailing.

An examination of the statutes of the two states from which the authorities were read, to the effect that an appeal might be taken before a final judgment or decree was entered shows that appeals in those states may be taken from interlocutory judgments or decrees, which, not being the case under our Code, they fail on application. See Freem. Co-tenancy, §§ 519, 527. But to return. Among the ordinances or rules adopted by Lord Chancellor BACON "for the better and more regular administration of justice" was one which provided that, where a person "comes in pendente lite, and while the suit is in full prosecution, and without any color of allowance, or privity of the court there regularly, the decree bindeth." Chancellor KENT said that a "lis pendens duly prosecuted and not conclusive is notice to a purchaser so as to affect and bind his interest by the decree." Strictly speaking, however, the doctrine of lis pendens is not founded upon notice, but upon reasons of public policy, founded upon necessity. "It affects him," said Lord Chancellor CRANWORTH, "not because it amounts to notice, but because the law does not allow litigant parties to give to others, pending the litigation, rights to the property in dispute, so as to prejudice the opposite party. * * * The necessities of mankind require that the decision of the court shall be binding, not only on the litigant parties, but also on those who derive title under them by alienation made pending the suit, whether such alienees had or had not notice pending proceedings. If this were not so, there could be no certainty that litigation would ever come to an end." Belamy v. Sabine, 1 De Gex & J. 566. The main purpose of the rule is to keep the subject-matter of the litigation within the power of the court until the judgment or decree shall be entered; otherwise, by successive alienations, its judgment or decree could be rendered abortive, and thus make it impossible for the court to execute its judgments or decree. Hence the general proposition that one who purchases of either party to the suit the subject-matter of the litigation, after the court has acquired jurisdiction, is bound by the judgment or decree, whether he purchased for a valuable consideration or not, and without any express or implied notice in point of fact, is sustained by many authorities, and disputed by none. Eyster v. Gaff, 91 U. S. 521; Grant v. Bennett, 96 Ill. 513; Randall v. Lower, 98 Ind. 261; Daniels v. Henderson, 49 Cal. 242; Blanchard v. Ware, 43 Iowa, 530; Carr v. Lewis, 15 Mo. App. 551; Currie v. Fowler, 5 J. J. Marsh. 145; Hiern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 120; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 405. The doctrine of lis pendens was introduced in analogy to the rule at common law in a real action "where if the defendant aliens after pendency of the writ, the judgment in the action will overreach such alienation." Sorell v. Carpenter, 2 P. Wms. 482. And this may account for the leaning in some of the courts to restrict the application of the rule of lis pendens to actions or suits affecting title to real property. McLaurine v. Monroe, 30 Mo. 469; Winston v. Westfeldt, 22 Ala. 760; Baldwin v. Love, 2 J. J. Marsh. 489; Murray v. Lylburn, 2 Johns. Ch. 441. But it is hardly considered well settled that it may not with equal propriety be applied to the sales of chattels. Two things, however, seem indispensable to give it effect: (1) That the litigation must be about some specific thing, which must necessarily be affected by the termination of the suit; and (2) that the particular property involved in the suit "must be so pointed out by the proceeding as to warn the whole world that they intermeddle at their peril." Freem. Judgm. §§ 196, 197. Now, the divorce suit of the plaintiff was not brought specifically to recover the one-third of the real estate of her husband, as was decreed in the divorce proceeding. The land was not the subject-matter of the litigation, and the subject of the suit was not to recover title that belonged to the plaintiff. It was incidental and collateral to the divorce proceeding. The court has no jurisdiction to affect the title of the husband to his lands, or decree that one-third of them shall be set apart for her in her own right and title, independent of a decree for divorce. Nor has the plaintiff any title on which to base a suit to recover any portion of the same, except as it comes by force of the statute upon a decree for divorce. A proceeding in divorce is partly in personam and partly in rem, and, in so far as it is to affect the marriage status, it is to change a thing independent of the parties, and is a proceeding not against the parties in personam, but against their status in rem. 5 Amer. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, "Divorce," 751. The matter upon which the jurisdiction acts is the status. The marriage is the thing which the suit is brought to dissolve. It is the subject of the litigation; but, as incidental to it, the court may grant temporary alimony pendente lite, or permanent alimony, when a decree for divorce is rendered. And the general rule is that bills for alimony do not bind the property of the defendant with lis pendens. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 196; Brightman v. Brightman, 1 R. I. 112; Isler v. Brown, 66 N. C. 556; Almond v. Almond, 4 Rand. (Va.) 662. But the court cannot affect the title of the real property of the defendant in a divorce proceeding until the point is reached that a decree of divorce is to be rendered. Temporary alimony may be granted pendente lite, but the title of the real estate of the defendant remains intact, and cannot be affected during the pendency of the proceeding, but only when the proceeding for a divorce has terminated, and a decree rendered that the marriage is dissolved, and then only by force of the statute.

¹ Upon the subject of lis pendens generally, see note to Newman v. Chapman, 14 Am. Dec. 774-779.

Our statute provides: "Whenever a marriage shall be declared void or dissolved the party at whose prayer such decree shall be made shall in all cases be entitled to the undivided one-third part in his or her undivided right in fee of the whole of the real estate owned by the other at the time of such decree; and it * * * shall be the duty of the court to enter a decree in accordance with this provision." Code Or. § 499. It is "whenever a marriage shall be declared dissolved" that the statute operates, not before, or pendente lite; and the court then becomes authorized, and it is its "duty," "to enter a decree" for the undivided one-third part in fee of the whole of the real estate "owned by the defendant at the time of such decree" for a divorce. It must be manifest, then, that the primary object of the suit is to affect the marriage relation,—its status; that it is the specific matter in controversy to be affected; and that it is only when the status is changed by a decree of divorce that the statute operates to divest title "owned" by the defendants, and that it then becomes the duty of the court to enter a decree in accordance with its provisions. Nor do the cases cited by counsel sustain his contention. In Tolerton v. Williard, 30 Ohio St. 586, the suit was of "double aspect," as said by the court, and was brought to protect her equitable right in property which was the subject of dispute. This property was bought with the wife's money, and she sought a restoration of her rights. The court says: "It is evident that the court in coming to its conclusion did take these equities into consideration, so that the decree may fairly be considered an equitable one in her favor." And again: "In a proceeding like the one under consideration where the wife claims rights in her husband's property other than those arising from the marital relation, and insists upon them in connection with her claim for alimony, the court is fully authorized to pass upon them." In Daniel v. Hodges, 87 N. C. 97, the proceeding was for alimony, and the only property which the husband owned was a lot that the wife sought to have subjected to her claim, and was in actual possession of it by order of the court when her husband, pending the litigation, conveyed it to another, and the court held, under the exceptional circumstances of the case, that the doctrine of lis pendens applied. There the proceeding was to subject the specific thing to her claim, which the husband attempted to defeat by conveying away the property, and the court, while admitting the general doctrine that a lis pendens was not applicable in such cases, said: "We are of the opinion the petition for alimony under the particular circumstances of the case constituted such a lis pendens as affected the purchaser with notice, independent of the actual notice had, and rendered the deeds void." But this has no relevancy to the case at bar. There she sought to subject the property to her claim for alimony, and the suit was directed specifically against it, and she was put in actual possession by order of the court, and then it was only "under the peculiar circumstances of the case" that the court thought the purchaser from the husband pending the litigation was affected with the rule of lis pendens. Here there was no alienation of the property, which was only incidentally involved, or any charge of any act on the part of the defendant Houston to defeat any right whatever which might accrue to the plaintiff, if the marriage should be dissolved. If the defendant Houston had conveyed away the property to another with the object of defeating her right, upon a decree for divorce, to any interest in his lands, such purchaser may be affected with the rule of lis pendens in such case; but that is not the question here, and which it will be time enough to decide when properly presented for our consideration. The debt which the defendant Houston owed the defendant Timmerman was contracted long before the suit for divorce was commenced, or the cause or ground of the divorce existed, and doubtless the credit was given on the faith of the property, a part of which included the property in dispute, then owned by Houston. There is no pretense of any fraud or collusion, or that the debt is not an honest obligation which Houston ought to have paid long before the divorce proceeding was instituted. Although the commencement of the divorce suit might result in a decree which would affect the property of the defendant, the property was not the subject specifically of the litigation, and by reason thereof was not withdrawn from such burdens as might be legally imposed upon it for just claims upon judgments recovered and docketed against its owner, prior to divesting him of his title by force of the statute under the decree. The defendant Timmerman had the legal right to commence her action to recover the money due on the note of Houston, and the fact that the wife of Houston had instituted proceedings for a divorce did not affect that right, but when judgment was recovered thereon, and docketed, by force of law, the lands then owned by him in that county, including the land in dispute, became subject to the lien of such judgment; and, as the facts show that this was before any decree was rendered in the divorce whereby title to such lands could be divested, it follows that whoever took title from him subsequently, either by contract or by operation of law, took said title cum onere, or subject to the lien of such judgment. It results, as a purchaser of said lands at an execution sale upon such judgment, the defendant Timmerman was not affected by or subject to the rule of lis pendens, and her deed thereby rendered invalid. It is true, in the divorce suit the property was described in the complaint and decree, which, since the decision in Bamford v. Bamford, 4 Or. 30, has been deemed essential to reach the property of the guilty party, but it is apprehended that neither allegation or proof concerning the lands is necessary, but that it is enough and a sufficient compliance with the latter clause of section 499, Code Or., to say in effect that the party obtaining the divorce is hereby entitled to one-third of the real property owned by the other, whatever it may be. In this view, if any question arises as to what property was so owned by him, it can be determined by appropriate proceedings for that purpose between the parties interested, much better than in a divorce suit, in which it is neither proper nor convenient that third parties, in order to protect their rights, should be compelled to intervene and become parties to a controversy between husband and wife in a divorce proceeding. Barrett v. Failing, 6 Sawy. 475, 3 Fed. Rep. 471. So that, however we look at the facts of this record, our conclusion is that the decree of the lower court must be reversed, and it is so ordered.

HORN v. COLE et al.

(51 N. H. 287.)

Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire.
July Term, 1868.

Mr. Fletcher, for plaintiff. Mr. Ray, for defendants.

PERLEY, C. J. There is no complaint that the rulings and instructions of the court on the trial were erroneous or improper, provided the evidence warranted the jury in returning a verdict for the defendants; and the verdict must stand, if the evidence was competent to prove such representations by the plaintiff as would estop him to set up his title to the goods attached to the property of Charles E. Horn.

The evidence reported in the case was competent to prove that the plaintiff made the representations on the occasion and in the circumstances testified to by Cole; that the plaintiff, though not indebted to Cole, was in debt to others; that Cole, believing the representations to be true, and relying on them as true, caused the goods to be attached as the property of Charles E. Horn; and, also, that the plaintiff made these representations knowing them to be false, with the intention that all persons who were interested in the subject should take them to be true, and act on them as such, and with the intention to mislead and deceive all to whom the representations were communicated, and induce them to act on them as true; that his intention was to deceive his own creditors, and prevent them from taking the goods as his for the debts which he owed to them. These facts must be taken to have been established by the verdict.

But, as there was no evidence that the plaintiff knew Cole had any demand against Charles E. Horn, we cannot infer that the plaintiff had Cole in his mind as an individual whom he meant to deceive by his false representations, or that he had an intent to prevent Cole from taking the goods for a debt which he owed to Cole, as he owed no such debt; and, on the evidence reported, the jury were not at liberty to find that the plaintiff had Cole in his mind as an individual whom he meant to deceive and defraud by inducing him to take the goods for his demand against Charles E. Horn. This raises the point, which the counsel for the plaintiff takes, whether, to estop a party from showing that his representations were false, it is necessary that the false representations should have been intended to deceive and defraud the individual party who trusted to them and acted on them, provided there was a general intention to deceive and defraud all persons who were interested in the subject-matter of the false representations.

The ground on which a party is precluded from proving that his representations on which another has acted were false is, that to permit it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. This has been sometimes called an "equitable estoppel," because the jurisdiction of enforcing this equity belonged originally and peculiarly to courts of equity, and does not appear to have been familiarly exercised at law until within a comparatively recent date; and, so far as relates to suits at law affecting the title to land, I understand that in England and in some of the United States the jurisdiction is still confined to courts of equity. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166, 168; Evans v. Bicknell, 6 Ves. 174, 178; Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469. The doctrine, however, is a very old head of equity, and is recognized and applied in a great number of the early cases. Dyer v. Dyer, 2 Ch. Cas. 108; Teasdale v. Teasdale, 13 Vin. Abr. 539; Hobbs v. Norton, 1 Vern. 136; Gale v. Lindo, Id. 475; Hunsden v. Cheyney, 2 Vern. 150; Lamlee v. Hanman, Id. 499; Raw v. Pote, Id. 239; Blanchet v. Foster, 2 Ves. Sr. 264; East India Co. v. Vincent, 2 Atk. 83; Stiles v. Cowper, 3 Atk. 693; Webber v. Farmer, 13 Vin. Abr. 525; 2 Brown, Parl. Cas. 88; 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 481; Neville v. Wilkinson, 1 Brown, Ch. 543; Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166; Strong v. Ellsworth, 26 Vt. 366.

Many of these cases related to underhand agreements in fraud of marriage settlements; but the principle is of general application. 1 Fonbl. Eq. 267, note x. Relief was given according to the circumstances of the case, —sometimes by enjoining suits at law, in which the legal title was set up, and sometimes by decreeing conveyances and the cancelling of deeds and other instruments; but in all these cases relief was given in equity contrary to the strict legal rights of the defendants.

Thus, in the case of an equitable estoppel, a party is not allowed to assert his strict legal right because, in the circumstances of the individual case, it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. Take the present case for an illustration. In trover, following the legal definition of the action, if the plaintiff proves property in himself and a conversion by the defendant, he has maintained his action, and is entitled to a verdict and judgment. It is conceded that the plaintiff owned the goods, and that the defendants converted them. The defense here set up appeals from the strict rule at law to the equitable doctrine that a party shall not be allowed to exercise his legal right of proving the facts, if, on account of his previous declarations or conduct, it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. So in a writ of entry; by the technical rules at law, if the demandant proves seisin in himself and a disseisin by the tenant within the time of limitation, he is entitled to judgment; but if the demandant, having a dormant title to the land demanded, concealed his title, and encouraged the tenant to purchase from another, he is not allowed, in our practice, to set up his legal title, because it would be contrary to equity and good conscience.

It thus appears that what has been called an "equitable estoppel," and sometimes, with less propriety, an "estoppel in pais," is properly and peculiarly a doctrine of equity, originally introduced there to prevent a party from taking a dishonest and unconscientious advantage of his strict legal rights,—though now with us, like many other doctrines of equity, habitually administered at law. But formerly the practice was different, and suits at law, the courts being incapable of giving effect to this equity, were often enjoined where the party insisted on his rights at law contrary to the equitable doctrine, as in Raw v. Pote, Stiles v. Cowper, and Webber v. Farmer, qua supra.

It would have a tendency to mislead us in the present inquiry, as there is reason to suspect that it has sometimes misled others, if we should confound this doctrine of equity with the legal estoppel by matter in pais. The equitable estoppel and legal estoppel agree indeed in this, that they both preclude from showing the truth in the individual case. The grounds, however, on which they do it are not only different, but directly opposite. The legal estoppel shuts out the truth, and also the equity and justice of the individual case on account of the supposed paramount importance of rigorously enforcing a certain and unvarying maxim of the law. For reasons of general policy, a record is held to import incontrovertible verity, and for the same reason a party is not permitted to contradict his solemn admission by deed. And the same is equally true of legal estoppels by matter in pais. Certain acts done out of court and without deed were, by a technical and unyielding rule of law, upheld on like grounds of public policy, and followed always by certain legal consequences. The legal effect of such acts was not permitted to be controverted by proof.

Thus, if one accepts a lease and enters under it, he is estopped to claim any other estate in the land during the term; he cannot show that he owned the land when the lease was made. Estoppels by matter in pais were few in number, and all of this general and well defined character; and they all enforced some technical rule of the law against the truth, and also against the justice and equity of the individual case. Coke, in his examination of the different kinds of estoppel by matter in pais, enumerates the following: "By livery, by entry, by acceptance of rent, by partition, and by acceptance of an estate." Co. Litt. 352a. In Lyon v. Reed, 13 Mees. & W. 309, Parke, B., speaking of legal estoppels by matter in pais, says: "They are but few, and are pointed out by Lord Coke, Co. Litt. 352a. They are all cases which anciently really were, and in contemplation of law have always continued to be, acts of notoriety no less solemn than the execution of a deed, such as livery, acceptance of an estate, and the like. Whether a party had or had not concurred in an act of this sort was deemed a matter which there could be no difficulty in ascertaining, and then the legal consequences follow."

In the authorities which contain the most complete enumeration of the different kinds of legal estoppels and the fullest discussion of the law on the subject, I find no allusion to the equitable estoppel which we are now considering. All legal estoppels, whether by record, by deed, or by matter in pais, depended on strict legal rules, and shut out proof of the truth and justice of the individual case. Viner, Abr., "Estoppel," passim; Lyon v. Reed, 13 Mees. & W. 309; Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 658.

For this reason, because legal estoppels, whether by record, deed, or matter in pais, shut out proof of the truth and justice of individual cases, they have been called odious, and have been construed with much strictness against parties that set them up. They were formerly required, like other defences regarded as inequitable, to be pleaded with certainty to a certain intent in every particular. If they were relied on by way of averment, and tried by the jury, the jury might find, and according to some authorities were bound by their oath veritatem dicere to find, according to the truth of the case, regardless of the estoppel. Trials Per Pais, 284; Co. Litt. 227a; Com. Dig. "Estoppel," E, 10. The practice is now different, and legal estoppels may be relied on, when given in evidence, without being specially pleaded. Legal estoppels exclude evidence of the truth and the equity of the particular case to support a strict rule of law, on grounds of public policy.

Equitable estoppels are admitted on the exactly opposite ground of promoting the equity and justice of the individual case by preventing a party from asserting his rights under a general technical rule of law, when he has so conducted himself that it would be contrary to equity and good conscience for him to allege and prove the truth. The facts upon which equitable estoppels depend are usually proved by oral evidence; and the evidence should doubtless be carefully scrutinized, and be full and satisfactory, before it should be admitted to estop the party from showing the truth, especially in cases affecting the title to land. But where the facts are clearly proved, the maxim that estoppels are odious—which was used in reference to legal estoppels, because they shut out the truth and justice of the case—ought not to be applied to these equitable estoppels, as it has sometimes been, inadvertently, as I think, from a supposed analogy with the legal estoppel by matter in pais, to which they have, in this respect, no resemblance whatever. Lord Campbell, in Howard v. Hudson, 2 El. & Bl. 10; Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349, 351. In other cases, where more attention has been paid to the real nature of this equitable doctrine, it has been held that such estoppels are not odious, and to be construed strictly, but are entitled to a fair and liberal application, like other equitable doctrines which are admitted to suppress fraud and promote honesty and fair dealing. Mellor and Compton, J.J., in Ashpitel v. Bryan, 3 Best & S. 474; Cowen, J., in Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 220; Com. v. Moltz, 10 Pa. St. 530, 531; Buckingham v. Hanna, 2 Ohio St. 557; Van-Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 326; Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, 128.

In this equitable estoppel, the party is forbidden to set up his legal title because he has so conducted himself that to do it would be contrary to equity and good conscience. As in other cases of fraud and dishonesty, the circumstances out of which the question may arise are of infinite variety; and, unless courts at law are willing to abdicate the duty of administering the equitable doctrine effectually in suppression of fraud and dishonesty, the application of it cannot be confined within the limit of any narrow technical definition, such as will relieve courts from looking, as in other cases depending on fraud and dishonesty, to the circumstances of each individual case. Certain general rules will doubtless apply, as in other cases where relief is sought on such grounds. But I find myself unable to agree with the authorities where the old maxim that legal estoppels are odious has been applied to this equitable estoppel, and where attempts have been made to lay down strict definitions, such as would defeat the remedy in a large proportion of the cases that fall within the principle on which the doctrine is founded.

The doctrine having been borrowed from equity, courts at law that have adopted it should obviously look to the practice in equity for their guide in the application of it; and in equity, the doctrine has been liberally applied to suppress fraud and enforce honesty and fair dealing, without any attempt to confine the doctrine within the limits of a strict definition. For instance, the doctrine has not in equity been limited to cases where there was an actual intention to deceive. The cases are numerous where the party who was estopped by his declarations or his conduct to set up his legal title, was ignorant of it at the time, and of course could have had no actual intention to deceive by concealing his title. Yet, if the circumstances were such that he ought to have informed himself, it has been held to be contrary to equity and good conscience to set up his title, though he was in fact ignorant of it when he made the representations. Hobbs v. Norton, Hunsden v. Cheyney, Teasdale v. Teasdale, qua supra; and Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 470. So, if the party knew the facts, but mistook the law. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166. Nor is it necessary in equity that the intention should be to deceive any particular individual or individuals. If the representations are such, and made in such circumstances, that all persons interested in the subject have the right to rely on them as true, their truth cannot be denied by the party that has made them against any one who has trusted to them and acted on them. Gale v. Lindo, Webber v. Farmer, qua supra.

In the much and well considered case of Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, 128, Storrs, J., delivering the opinion of the court, says: "The doctrine of estoppel in pais, notwithstanding the great number of cases which have turned upon it and are reported in the books, cannot be said even yet to rest upon any determinate legal test which will reconcile the decisions, or will embrace all transactions to which the general principles of equitable necessity wherein it originated demand that it should be applied. In fact, it is because it is so peculiarly a doctrine of practical equity, that its technical application is so difficult, and its reduction to the form of abstract formulas is still unaccomplished." This was said in 1856, and little has since been done towards extricating the doctrine from the confusion and conflict of authority with which it was then embarrassed. This, as I think, has been caused by the fact that courts have continued to exercise their ingenuity in the vain attempt to compress a broad doctrine of equity within the narrow limits of a technical definition.

The case of Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469, decided as late as 1837, appears to have been regarded, both in England and in this country, as the leading case at law on this subject. It was trover by the mortgagee of personal goods against the defendants, who were purchasers at a sheriff's sale on execution against the mortgagor. The facts set up in defence were, that the plaintiff was present at the sale, did not disclose his title as mortgagee, and encouraged the defendants to purchase. The question on trial was as to the property of the plaintiff in the goods, and Lord Denman directed a verdict for the plaintiff. A rule to show cause why the verdict should not be set aside was made absolute.

In delivering the judgment of the court, Lord Denman said: "His [the plaintiff's] title having been established, the property could only be divested by gift or sale, of which no specific act was even surmised. But the rule of law is clear that where one, by his words or conduct, willfully causes another to believe the existence of a certain state of things, and induces him to act on that belief so as to alter his own previous position, the former is concluded from averring a different state of things as existing at the same time; and the plaintiff might have parted with his interest in the property by a verbal gift or sale, without any other formalities that threw technical difficulties in the way of legal evidence. And we think his conduct in standing by and giving a kind of sanction to the proceedings under the execution was a fact of such a nature that the opinion of the jury ought to have been taken whether he had not, in point of fact, ceased to be the owner."

It is worthy of note that in this suit at law

the court, so late as 1837, after stating the general equitable doctrine, did not venture to put the defence directly on the ground that the plaintiff was estopped by his conduct to prove the truth of the case, but allowed the facts to go to the jury as evidence that the plaintiff, in some undefined and mysterious way, had parted with his property in the goods. So late and so reluctant were the courts to admit in suits at law this defence, which depended on fraud and dishonesty, and which belonged, originally and appropriately, to the jurisdiction in equity.

It can hardly be supposed that Lord Denman, in the statement which he made of this equitable doctrine in reference to the facts of that case, understood that he was laying down a technical definition fixing the limits of the doctrine, and excluding all cases that did not come clearly within the terms which he used on that occasion. Nevertheless, the remarks of Lord Denman have often been treated as a sort of authoritative text covering the whole ground, which it was the business of courts in later cases to expound and explain. And it is curious to observe what different and contradictory interpretations have been put on his statement of the equitable doctrine. It has been cited in Massachusetts as authority for decisions in which it has been held that the representations, to estop the party from showing they were not true, must have been made with the intent to deceive, and the intent to deceive the party who sets up the defence. Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen, 455; Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349. And in California the same case has been relied on for the rule that where a representation comes in any way to the ears of a party, who acts on it, the party making the representation is estopped to deny its truth, unless it had the character of a confidential communication. Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204. In England it has been treated as a statement of the equitable doctrine made in reference to the circumstances of that case, and not intended as a formal and complete definition. Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 654; Gregg v. Wells, 10 Adol. & E. 90; Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 212.

It would be a laborious and not a profitable task to attempt an analysis of all the recent decisions on this subject. I will briefly advert to some of those which appear to be the most important.

In Plumer v. Lord, 9 Allen, 455, it was held that to create an estoppel in pais, the declarations or acts must have been accompanied with a design to mislead; and Langdon v. Doud, 10 Allen, 433, is to the same point. In Andrews v. Lyons, 11 Allen, 349, the court went one step further, and decided that the declarations or acts must have been accompanied with a design to deceive the party who sets up the estoppel, and induce him to act on them; and in this last case it is said that such an estoppel shuts out the truth, and is odious, and must be strictly proved. In Hawes v. Marchant, 1 Curt. 144, Fed. Cas. No. 6,240, the rule is laid down that to be estopped the party must have designedly made admissions inconsistent with the defense or claim which he proposes to set up, and another, with his knowledge and consent, so acted on this admission, that he will be injured by allowing the admission to be disputed; and this rule is cited and apparently approved in Audenried v. Betteley, 5 Allen, 382.

In these cases, it is to be observed, the court have not been content with saying, in reference to the facts before them, that, if certain things concurred in the case, it would fall within the equitable doctrine, and the party would be estopped, but they have undertaken to lay down a strict legal definition of general application, excluding from the operation of the doctrine all cases that do not fall within the terms of the definition. Applying the rule as laid down in Hawes v. Marchant to the present case, if Horn had known that Cole had a demand against Charles E. Horn, had falsely represented to Cole that the goods belonged to Charles, with the design to deceive him and induce him to attach the goods as the property of Charles, and Cole, relying on the representation, had taken the goods as the property of Charles, and as Horn intended, yet if, after he had made the false representation, he did not know that the goods were taken as the property of Charles, and assent that they should be so taken, he would not be estopped to set up his own title in the goods. The statement that another party must have acted on the false statement with his knowledge and assent must mean this, or it can mean nothing; for he could not know that he had acted on it at all until the act was done and accomplished.

The remark of Lord Campbell in Howard v. Hudson, qua supra, though not called for by the case, is to the effect that the representation must have been intended to deceive.

These authorities would seem to sustain the plaintiff's counsel fully in his position that the false representation must not only be intended to deceive but also to deceive the identical party that acted on them.

There are, however, authorities of equal respectability, and in greater numbers, which maintain a different doctrine.

In England, the case of Pickard v. Sears does not appear to have been understood as intended to lay down a complete definition of the equitable doctrine excluding all cases that could not be brought within the terms of the remarks made by Lord Denman. In Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 654, it was held that the term "willfully," used in Pickard v. Sears, was not to be understood in the sense of "maliciously"; and that, whatever a man's real meaning may be, if he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant he should act on it, and he did act on it as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth. This is wholly inconsistent with the notion that an intention to deceive is an essential ingredient of the representation, which precludes the party making it from showing that it was false. So in Jorden v. Money, 5 H. L. Cas. 212, it was held not to be necessary that the party making the representations should know that they were false; that no fraud need have been intended at the time; but, if the party unwittingly misled another, you must add that he has misled him under such circumstances that he had reasonable ground for supposing that the person whom he was misleading would act upon what he was saying.

In Gregg v. Wells, 10 Adol. & E. 90, Lord Denman says: "Pickard v. Sears was in my mind at the time of the trial, and the principle of that case may be stated even more broadly than it is there laid down. A party who negligently or culpably stands by and allows another to contract on the faith and understanding of a fact which he can contradict, cannot afterwards dispute that fact in the action against the person whom he has himself assisted in deceiving." This shows that Lord Denman did not himself understand that his remarks in Pickard v. Sears were to be taken as a definition and limitation of the equitable doctrine, for he says the principle of the case might be stated more broadly than it is laid down there, and may include the case of a culpable negligence. So Hobbs v. Norton, 1 Vern. 136; Hunsden v. Cheyney, 2 Vern. 150; Teasdale v. Teasdale, 13 Vin. Abr. 539; Burrowes v. Lock, 10 Ves. 475,—before cited, show that the practice in equity does not require that there should in all cases be an intention to deceive, or even a knowledge that the representation was false.

We come now to the decisions in this country, which give a broader application to this doctrine than those before cited.

In Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 221, the general doctrine is said to be that when a party, either by his declarations or his conduct, has influenced a third person to act in a particular manner, he will not be afterwards permitted to deny the truth of the admission if the consequence would be to work an injury to such third person, and that in such case it must appear—First, that he made an admission which is clearly inconsistent with the evidence he proposes to give, or the claim which he proposes to set up; second, that the party has acted on the admission; third, that he will be injured by allowing the truth of the admission to be disputed. According to this interpretation of the equitable doctrine, it would seem not to be necessary that the representation should be intended to deceive, or that the party making it should know it to be false, or that it should be intended the party should act on it, who does so in fact, and is deceived by it. The rule of this case has been adopted and followed in Newman v. Hook, 37 Mo. 207; Carpenter v. Stillwell, 12 Barb. 135; and Eldred v. Hazlett, 33 Pa. St. 316.

In Roe v. Jerome, 18 Conn. 138, the general doctrine is stated to be that where one person, by his words or conduct causes another to believe in a certain state of things, and thus induces him to act on that belief, so as injuriously to affect his previous position, he is concluded from averring a different state of things as existing at the time; and this rule was followed in the later cases of Cowles v. Bacon, 21 Conn. 451, and Dyer v. Cady, 20 Conn. 563; and in Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, before cited, it is said that the doctrine did not then rest on any determinate, legal test which will embrace all transactions to which the general principles of equity, in which it originated, demand that it should be applied.

Buchanan v. Moore, 13 Serg. & R. 304, 306, is to the point that, though the party believed his representation to be true, and made it under a mistake, he is estopped to show that he made the representation innocently believing it to be true, provided the other party acted on it, and had reason to act on it, as true. So in Strong v. Ellsworth, 26 Vt. 366, it is said by Redfield, C. J., that he who by his words or actions, or his silence even, intentionally or carelessly induces another to do an act which he would not otherwise have done, and which will prove injurious to him if he is not allowed to insist on the fulfillment, may insist on such fulfillment; and that the doctrine of equitable estoppels lies at the foundation of morals. In Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204, it was held that where a statement made to a third person is not confidential, but general, and is acted on by others, the party making the declaration is estopped to deny its truth; that the intention with which the declaration is made is not material, except, perhaps, where it is confidential. This case and Quirk v. Thomas, 6 Mich. 76, are authorities that to work the estoppel it is not necessary the declaration should be made to the party who acts on it, nor in his presence, nor that the declaration should be intended to come to the knowledge of any particular person.

In a suit at law to recover damages for a false affirmation that the signer of a note was of age, it was decided, in Lobdell v. Baker, 1 Metc. (Mass.) 193, that it was not necessary to allege or prove that the defendant knew the signer was an infant. Wiide, J., in delivering the opinion of the court, said: "A party may render himself liable in an action for damages to a party prejudiced by a false affirmation, though not made with any fraudulent intention." This, it may be said, is not directly in point, but the only difference is in the form of the remedy. The principle involved is the same, whether the question is raised in a suit to recover damages for the false representation, or redress is sought by estopping the party to prove the falsehood of the representation. Both cases go on the same general ground that the party is responsible for the consequences of his false representation.

There are numerous authorities that it is not necessary to the estoppel that the declarations or conduct should be intended to deceive any particular person or persons; that, if they were intended to deceive generally, or were of such a character, and made in such circumstances, that it must have been understood they were likely to deceive, and any person using due diligence was in fact deceived by them, it is enough. Gregg v. Wells, 10 Adol. & E. 90; Wendell v. Van Rensselaer, 1 Johns. Ch. 353; Adams v. Brown, 16 Ohio St. 78; Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 221; Quirk v. Thomas, 6 Mich. 76; Mitchell v. Reed, 9 Cal. 204.

It has been declared in many cases that this equitable estoppel involves a question of legal ethics, and applies wherever a party has made a representation, by words or conduct, which he cannot in equity and good conscience prove to be false; and that this kind of estoppel, being a broad doctrine of equity, cannot be limited in application by the terms of any narrow legal definition. In Canal Co. v. Hathaway, 8 Wend. 483, it is said by Sutherland, J., that the party is estopped when in good conscience and equity he ought not to be permitted to gainsay his admission; and in the same case, by Nelson, J.: "From the means in which the party must avail himself of these estoppels, it is obvious there can be no fixed and settled rules of universal application." And in Dezell v. Odell, 3 Hill, 225, Bronson, J., adopting the language of Nelson, J., in Canal Co. v. Hathaway, adds, "It is a question of ethics." In Strong v. Ellsworth, 26 Vt. 366, Redfield, J., says the doctrine lies at the foundation of morals. In Lucas v. Hart, 5 Iowa, 415, the court holds that: "In these estoppels there can be no fixed and settled rules of universal application to regulate them as in technical legal estoppels; that in many, and probably in most, instances, whether the act or admission shall operate as an estoppel or not must depend on the circumstances of the case, though there are some general rules which may materially assist in the examination of such cases." In the application of these general rules to that case the court decided that the acts and admissions of the respondent estopped him from asserting his title to the property in question; that to permit him to do it would be "unconscionable, and contrary to that fairness and honest dealing which courts of equity seek ever to promote and encourage."

In Frost v. Saratoga Ins. Co., 5 Denio, 154, it is said by Beardsley, C. J., that such an estoppel is a question of ethics, and is allowed to prevent fraud and injustice, and exists wherever a party cannot in good conscience gainsay his own acts or assertions.

The case of Preston v. Mann, 25 Conn. 118, is strong to the point that this estoppel, depending on a broad doctrine of equity, cannot be governed in application by narrow and strict rules of construction, such as have prevailed in legal estoppels.

In some, if not in most, of the cases, in which it is said that if a party makes representations intending to deceive the party that acts on them, the equitable estoppel applies, it was not intended, as I think, to lay down a rule excluding all cases that did not fall within the statement made in reference to the facts of the case then under consideration; that what is said is not to be taken as a rule to limit and define the doctrine and exclude all other cases. They say, if such and such things concur, "this case will fall within the doctrine"; but they do not intend to say no other cases are within it. For example, in Kinney v. Farnsworth, 17 Conn. 361, Storrs, J., says that "admissions which have been the means, designedly, of leading others to a particular course of conduct, cannot afterwards be conscientiously retracted by one who has made them." He could not have intended to lay down the rule that one would in no case be estopped by a representation not designed to deceive, because the same judge, in Preston v. Mann, says: "The doctrine is not reduced to the limits of any formula," and, "whatever the motive may be, if one so acts or speaks that the natural consequence of his words or conduct will be to influence another to change his condition, he is legally charged with the intent to induce the other to believe and to act on that belief, if such proves to be the result." So Lord Denman, speaking, in Gregg v. Wells, 10 Adol. & E. 90, of his judgment in Pickard v. Sears, says: "The principle of that case may be stated even more broadly than it is there laid down."

In this state we have several cases where the general question has been more or less considered. In Wells v. Pierce, 27 N. H. 503, the doctrine of equitable estoppel was traced to its origin in equity, and it was held that if the owner actively encourages the purchase of his property from another, he will be precluded from claiming it, though he was not aware of his interest at the time; which is clearly in conflict with the notion that the representation must be accompanied with an intention to deceive. In Davis v. Handy, 37 N. H. 65, the doctrine of Wells v. Pierce was approved and applied. In the recent case of Drew v. Kimball, 43 N. H. 285, one point directly involved was whether it was necessary that the party to be estopped should intend to deceive and defraud the individual to whom the representation was made, and who set up the defence; and it was held that it was not necessary. Indeed it seems to me that it would be trifling with a doctrine depending on equity and good conscience to hold otherwise. So, if a representation was intended to deceive one man, and it in fact deceived and defrauded another. Then, again, if the representation were intended to have one operation, and, as it turned out, deceived and defrauded by another method not contemplated by the party at the time, but still the natural consequence of the representation, it would be quibbling with a doctrine depending for its application on the morality of the act to hold that the party would not be answerable for the consequences of his false and fraudulent representation as much as if it had taken effect on the party and in the manner intended. In a case depending on a question of "legal ethics," it would bring down the morality of the law to a very low standard to hold that a party was not liable for the wrong caused by his fraud to one man, because the fraud was contrived against another man.

In Drew v. Kimball the case did not raise the precise point taken in this case. But, on a full discussion of the general doctrine, and a review of the authorities, the court, adopting the hypothetical case put by Parke, B., in Freeman v. Cooke, say: "If, whatever a man's intentions may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant he should act upon it, and he did act upon it, as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth. In short, the representations are to be regarded as willful when the person making them means them to be acted on, or if, without regard to intention, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe it was meant he should act on it."

There have been several other cases in this state where this equitable doctrine has been considered and applied. Thompson v. Sanborn, 11 N. H. 201; Simons v. Steele, 36 N.

H. 73; McMahon v. Portsmouth Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 22 N. H. 15; Odlin v. Gove, 41 N. H. 473; Corbett v. Norcross, 35 N. H. 99, 115; Richardson v. Chickering, 41 N. H. 380, 385. Though I do not find that the precise point taken here for the plaintiff has been directly decided in any of our cases, yet the general current of our decisions on the subject tends to a liberal application of the doctrine for the suppression of fraud and dishonesty, and the promotion of justice and fair dealing. No disposition has been shown in the courts of this state to treat this equitable estoppel as odious, and embarrass its application by attempts to confine it within the limits of a narrow technical definition. We are content to follow where the spirit and general tone of these decisions lead; and they lead plainly to the conclusion that, where a man makes a statement disclaiming his title to property, in a manner and under circumstances such as he must understand those who heard the statement would believe to be true, and, if they had an interest in the subject, would act on as true, and one, using his own means of knowledge with due diligence, acts on the statement as true, the party who makes the statement cannot show that his representation was false, to the injury of the party who believed it to be true, and acted on it as such; that he will be liable for the natural consequences of his representation, and cannot be heard to say that the party actually injured was not the one he meant to deceive, or that his fraud did not take effect in the manner he intended.

Our conclusion is that, on the facts which the verdict has established, the plaintiff was estopped to show his representation that the goods belonged to Charles E. Horn to be false, though he did not know that the defendant Cole had any demand against Charles E. Horn, and though he had not Cole in his mind as the party whom he meant to deceive.

Judgment on the verdict.

DICKERSON v. COLGROVE.

(100 U. S. 578.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Oct., 1879.

Error to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Michigan.

George W. Lawton, for plaintiff in error.
M. J. Smiley, for defendant in error.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE delivered the opinion of the court.

This is an action of ejectment brought by Dickerson and Wheeler. The latter died during the progress of the suit. The parties agreed in writing to submit the case to the court without the intervention of a jury. The court found the facts. So far as it is necessary to state them, they may be thus summarized: Micajah Chauncey owned the land in controversy. He died on the — day of February, 1853, leaving two children, Edmund Chauncey and Sarah Kline. They were his only heirs at law. He is the common source of title of all the parties in this litigation. On the 3d of March, 1853, John Kline and Sarah, his wife, conveyed by warranty deed the entire premises to Lowell Morton. The deed was duly recorded on the 6th of March, 1854, and on the 1st of April, 1854, Lowell Morton entered into possession of the premises. He and the defendants have ever since been in actual possession, claiming to own and hold the property as tenants in common. The latter were in possession at the commencement of this suit, claiming title through conveyances from Lowell Morton. Prior to the 1st of April, 1856, Lowell Morton learned that Edmund Chauncey was one of the children of Micajah Chauncey, and that he lived in California. Whereupon Lowell Morton procured Eleazer Morton to write to Edmund Chauncey to learn whether he made any claim to the premises. On the 1st of April, 1856, Edmund Chauncey, still living in California, addressed a letter to his sister, Sarah Kline, then living in Michigan, wherein he disavowed, in strong terms, the intention ever to assert such a claim.

The contents of this letter subsequently came to the knowledge of Lowell Morton, who thereafter conveyed to the defendants by warranty deeds. Under these deeds they have since held and claimed title, and have occupied and improved the property. On the 9th of July, 1865, Edmund Chauncey conveyed the undivided half of the premises, by quitclaim deed, to Orlando B. Dickerson and James Witherell. On the 1st of May, 1868, Witherell conveyed all his right, title, and interest to William W. Wheeler, one of the original plaintiffs. The suit was instituted on the 6th of March, 1873. Lowell Morton and the defendants had then been in possession eighteen years and eleven months. The court below held as conclusions of law that the action was barred by the statute of limitations of Michigan of 1863, and by an estoppel in pais, and gave judgment accordingly. The plaintiff thereupon sued out this writ of error.

Both the conclusions of law are relied upon as errors for the reversal of the judgment. Our remarks will be confined to the point of estoppel.

This defence is founded upon the letter of Edmund Chauncey. The contents of the letter of Morton, to which it refers, are not given in the finding of facts, but the subject of that letter and the inquiry which it made appear clearly in the letter of Chauncey. He said: "Mr. Morton wrote me a letter. He wanted to know if I intended to claim any of the Conger farm" (meaning the premises in controversy). "You can tell Mr. Morton for me, he need not fear any thing from me. Thank God, I am well off here, and you can claim all there. This letter will be enough for him. I intended to give you and yours all my property there, and more if you need it." The phrase, "I intended to give," etc., implies that he knew his half of the farm had already been sold to Morton, and that he could not, therefore, give his sister, to whom the letter was addressed, any part of that property. It does not appear that there was any other property held by them as coparceners. He says further, that he intended to give her more if she needed it. All this was communicated to Lowell Morton. What was the effect upon him? He was lulled into security. He took no measures to perfect his title, nor to procure any redress from the Klines, who had conveyed and been paid for the whole of the property while they owned but the half. On the contrary, he gave thereafter deeds of warranty to all the defendants,—who are sixty-two in number,—and he and they occupied and improved the premises down to the commencement of this suit. Between that time and the date of the letter was a period of nearly seventeen years. What improvements were made and how far the property had risen in value are not disclosed, nor does it appear what stimulated Chauncey to violate his promise and commence this attack on the defendants.

The estoppel here relied upon is known as an equitable estoppel, or estoppel in pais. The law upon the subject is well settled. The vital principle is that he who by his language or conduct leads another to do what he would not otherwise have done, shall not subject such person to loss or injury by disappointing the expectations upon which he acted. Such a change of position is sternly forbidden. It involves fraud and falsehood, and the law abhors both. This remedy is always so applied as to promote the ends of justice. It is available only for protection, and cannot be used as a weapon of assault. It accomplishes that which ought to be done between man and man, and is not permitted to go beyond this limit. It is akin to the principle involved in the limitation of actions, and does its work of justice and repose where the statute cannot be invoked. Here, according to the finding of the court, the time of adverse possession lacked but a year and a month of being twenty years,—when it is conceded the statutory bar would have been complete.

In Faxton v. Faxon, 28 Mich. 159, a mortgagee holding several mortgages prevailed on a son of the deceased mortgagor, then intending to remove to a distance, to remain on the premises and support the family, by assuring him that the mortgages should never be enforced. The son supported the family, and the property grew in value under his tillage. After the lapse of several years the mortgagee proceeded to foreclose. He was held to be estopped by his assurances upon which the son had acted. The court said: "The complainant may have estopped himself without any positive agreement, if he intentionally led the defendants to do or abstain from doing any thing involving labor or expenditure to any considerable amount, by giving them to understand they should be relieved from the burden of the mortgages. In Harkness v. Toulmin, 25 Mich. 80, and Truesdale v. Ward, 24 Mich. 117, this principle was applied, in the former case, to the extent of destroying a chattel mortgage, and in the latter, of forfeiting rights under a land contract, where parties were led to believe they were abandoned. There is no rule more necessary to enforce good faith than that which compels a person to abstain from asserting claims which he has induced others to suppose he would not rely on. The rule does not rest on the assumption that he has obtained any personal gain or advantage, but on the fact that he has induced others to act in such a manner that they will be seriously prejudiced if he is allowed to fail in carrying out what he has encouraged them to expect." Cooley, J., was inclined to doubt the sufficiency of the proof, but said, finally: "His" (the mortgagee's) "assurances have undoubtedly been relied upon and acted upon by the defendants, and, considering the great lapse of time without any claim under the mortgages on the part of the complainant, I am not disposed to dissent from the conclusion of my Brethren." The case before us arose also in Michigan. In Evans v. Snyder, 64 Mo. 516, the heirs assailed an administrator's sale. No order of sale could be found. This was held to be a fatal defect. But the supreme court of the state held that where they stood silently by for years, while the occupant was making valuable and lasting improvements on the property, and redeeming it from the lien of the ancestor's debts, they would be estopped from afterwards asserting their claim. Here, as by Judge Cooley, stress is laid upon the lapse of time. This is also a feature of the case in hand.

Other authorities to the same effect are very numerous. They may be readily found.

It is unnecessary to extend this opinion by referring to them.

We think the facts disclosed in the record make a complete case of estoppel in pais.

But it is said this objection to the plaintiff's claim is not available at law, and must be set up in equity.

"This is certainly not the common law. Littleton says: 'And so a man can see one thing in this case, that a man shall be estopped by matter of fact, though there be no writing, by deed or otherwise.' Lord Coke, commenting hereon, gives an instance of estoppel by matter in fact,—this very case of partition. Co. Litt. 356, § 667. And such an award has been held sufficient to estop a party against whom ejectment was brought. Morris v. Rosser, 3 East, 15." Brown v. Wheeler, 17 Conn. 345, 353.

In City of Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, 6 Pet. 431, the proprietors of the city plat, in 1789, dedicated the ground between Front street and the Ohio river to the public for commercial and other purposes. The legal title had not then emanated from the government of the United States. In this state of things the statute of limitations does not run. White long subsequently acquired the legal title and brought ejectment for the premises. This court said (page 441): "This is a possessory action, and the plaintiff, to entitle himself to recover, must have the right of possession; and whatever takes away this right of possession will deprive him of the remedy by ejectment. Adams, Ej. 32; Starkie, part 4, 505-507." This is the rule laid down by Lord Mansfield, in Atkyns v. Hoarde, 1 Burr. 119. "Ejectment," says he, "is a possessory remedy, and only competent where the lessor of the plaintiff may enter, and every plaintiff in ejectment must show a right of possession as well as of property." If the plaintiff in the present case was not entitled to possession, how, according to this authority, could he recover? If he had recovered, and a court of equity would have enjoined him from executing the judgment by a writ of possession, we ask, again, how could he recover in this action? Is not the concession that relief could be had in equity fatal to the proposition we are considering? In Stoddard v. Chambers, 2 How. 284, it was said by this court: "On a title by estoppel, an action of ejectment can be maintained." We do not overlook the fact that a land claim had been conveyed before it was confirmed by an act of congress to the assignor and his legal representatives. It was held that on such confirmation the legal title became vested in the former, "and inured, by way of estoppel, to his grantee and those who claimed by deed under him." In that case, as in this, there was no formal transfer of the title. The transfer was made, as under a statute of limitations, when the bar is complete, by operation of law. Leffingwell v. Warren, 2 Black, 599. Why may not a like transfer be held to have been made in this case? The reason given for the rule of inurement and estoppel by virtue of conveyances is, that it avoids circuity of action. Does not the same consideration apply, with equal force, in cases of estoppel in pais? Why is it necessary to go into equity in one case and not in the other?

It has never been held that the statute of frauds applies to cases of inurement, and it has been conceded that it does not affect cases of dedication. Where is the difference in principle in this respect between those cases and the one before us? But here this point cannot arise, because the promise relied upon was in writing. In City of Cincinnati v. White's Lessee, supra, this court, speaking of the dedication there in question, said, "The law considers it in the nature of an estoppel in pais, which precludes the original owner from revoking such dedication," and that a grant might have been presumed, "if that had been necessary, and the fee might be considered in abeyance until a competent grantee appeared to receive it; which was as early as the year 1802, when the city was incorporated." Here there was a grantee capable of taking the fee all the time from the date of the letter. The common law is reason dealing by the light of experience with human affairs. One of its merits is that it has the capacity to reach the ends of justice by the shortest paths.

The passage of a title by inurement and estoppel is its work without the help of legislation. We think no sound reason can be given why the same thing should not follow in cases of estoppel in pais where land is concerned.

This subject has been carefully examined in Bigelow, Estop. pp. 533, 537. The learned author comes to no final conclusion whether in cases like this the defence may be made at law, or whether a resort to equity is necessary. The former is our view. Whether the title passed or not, the fact that the plaintiff was not entitled to possession of the premises was fatal to the action.

Chauncey conveyed to the plaintiff in error by deed of quitclaim. He is not, therefore, a bona fide purchaser. Piatt v. Oliver, 3 How. 333; May v. Le Claire, 11 Wall. 217. Morton and the defendants were in possession. For both these reasons, he took whatever title he acquired subject to all the rights, legal and equitable, of Morton and of the defendants, who deraigned their titles from the latter.

Judgment affirmed.

CONTINENTAL NAT. BANK v. NATIONAL BANK OF COMMONWEALTH.

(50 N. Y. 575.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1872.

Action to recover $63,062.50 paid by plaintiff upon a check dated May 1, 1866, drawn upon plaintiff by John Ross to the order of J. S. Cronise & Co. The headnote states the facts. Judgment for plaintiff.

Luther R. Marsh, for appellant. James Emott, for respondent.

FOLGER, J. The jury have found to be a forgery, the writing on the check, which purports to be a certification thereof by the plaintiff's teller. They have also found that the teller, when resorted to, in effect pronounced it genuine.

That the plaintiff would be bound by the act of its teller, had he in fact certified the check, is settled. Farmers' & Mechanics' Bank v. Butchers' & Drovers' Bank, 16 N. Y. 123, 69 Am. Dec. 678; 14 N. Y. 623. Nor do we doubt that an admission by him that it was genuine, made on the presentation to him of the counterfeited certification and inquiry put, also binds the plaintiff. We can see no difference in result, and effect upon others dealing with the check on the strength of that admission, between writing "Timpson, teller," signifying good, upon a worthless check, and declaring that the words "Timpson, teller," already there, were written there by him. In the one case they are his own, and signify good. In the other he adopts them as his own, and so makes them his own, and they signify good. This was the effect of his admission. And see 53 Me. 103, and Bank v. Crafts, 4 Allen, 447.

There seems to be no dispute but that the defendant takes the place of Cronise & Co., and may avail itself of any defense to the action of the plaintiff which that firm of brokers could have made.

The question then arises, is the plaintiff, by the other facts presented, estopped from maintaining that in truth the certification was a forgery, and the admission of its teller an innocent mistake?

There is no disagreement as to the general definition of an estoppel in pais. It is agreed that there must have been some act or declaration of the plaintiff or of its agent to the defendant's assignors, which so affected the conduct of the latter to their injury, as that it would be unjust now to permit the plaintiff to set up the truth of the case to the contrary of its mistaken act or declaration.

But the plaintiff insists that there are certain limitations to be put upon this generality.

1st. The plaintiff claims that it is necessary that its act or declaration must have been made to mislead.

To this proposition the plaintiff cites Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469; 33 Eng. Com. Law, 115, where the court say: "Where one by his words or conduct willfully causes another," etc. But this word "willfully," used in the decision in that case, has subsequently received judicial comment and limitation. Thus in Freeman v. Cooke, 2 Exch. 654, the court say: "By the term 'willfully,' however, in that rule, we must understand, if, whatever a man's real intentions may be, he so conducts himself that a reasonable man would take the representation to be true, and believe that it was meant that he should act upon it, and he did act upon it as true, the party making the representation would be equally precluded from contesting its truth; and conduct by negligence or omission, where there is a duty cast upon any person by usage of trade or otherwise to disclose the truth, may often have the same effect."

So in Cornish v. Abington, 4 Hurl. & N. 549, Pollock, C. B., says: "The jury having found that the defendant, whether intentionally or not, led the plaintiff to form an opinion that he was dealing with the defendant and induced him to furnish goods to the defendant, the defendant must pay him for them." And referring to Freeman v. Cooke, and Pickard v. Sears, supra, the learned chief baron remarks to the effect that the word "willfully" means nothing more than "voluntarily," and he holds that if the representation was made voluntarily, though the effect upon the hearer was produced unintentionally, the same result would follow; and that if a party uses language which, in the ordinary course of business and the general sense in which words are understood, conveys a certain meaning, he cannot afterward say that he is not bound, if another so understanding it has acted upon it. Of course, this general language here extracted should be read in connection with the facts of that case to prevent carrying the force of these words too far. But it is shown that "willfully" and "voluntarily," as used in the definition of an estoppel, are convertible.

In Manufacturers' & Traders' Bank v. Hazard, 30 N. Y. 226, it is said that it is not necessary to an equitable estoppel that the party should design to mislead. Be this dictum or rule, we do not find that it has been in this state disputed or questioned.

In In re Bahia & S. P. Ry. Co., L. R., 3 Q. B. 584, it is held that if a representation is made with the intention that it shall be acted upon by another, and he does so, there is an estoppel from denying the truth of what was represented to be the fact, and that the case is within the principle of Pickard v. Sears, as explained by Freeman v. Cooke, both supra.

The word "willful" does not mean mal animo, but so far willfully that the party, making the representation acted upon, means that it shall be acted upon in that way. Per Compton, J., in Howard v. Hudson, 2 Ell. & Bl. 1.

And we hold that there need not be, upon the part of the person making a declaration or doing an act, an intention to mislead the one who is induced to rely upon it. There are cases in which parties have been estopped where their acts or declarations have been done or made in ignorance of their own rights, not knowing that the law of the land gave them such rights. Here, certainly, there could be no purpose to mislead others, for there was not the knowledge to inform the purpose, and both parties were equally and innocently misled. Storrs v. Barker, 6 Johns. Ch. 166, 10 Am. Dec. 316. Indeed, it would limit the rule much within the reason of it, if it were restricted to cases where there was an element of fraudulent purpose. In very many of the cases in which the rule has been applied, there was no more than negligence on the part of him who was estopped. And it has long been held, that where it is a breach of good faith to allow the truth to be shown, there an admission will estop. Gaylor v. Van Loan, 15 Wend. 308. There are decisions where the rule has been stated as the plaintiff claims it. We have looked at those cited by it. It was not necessary to the conclusions of the court in those, that such restriction should be put upon the rule, and we do not think that the language employed was used with the intention of making such a limitation, for the facts of the case did not require it.

2d. The plaintiff further claims that Cronise & Co. parted with the gold and took the check before the declaration of the teller was made known to them, and that before an estoppel can be insisted upon, it must appear that they acted in reliance thereupon, or altered their position in consequence thereof, or parted with some value on the faith therein.

The fair result of the testimony is, that Ross left the office of Cronise & Co. before the return of their messenger to it from the bank, and Cronise & Co. had then delivered the gold checks. They did not act, after his return, relying upon the declaration of the teller which the messenger brought to them.

Assuming, for the present, that they did in reliance upon that declaration refrain from action and left untaken any measures for the arrest of Ross or the stoppage of payment on the checks he had received; assuming that it is reasonably probable, that if they had been told by the plaintiff the reverse of what they were told, they would have acted and would have taken those measures; assuming that it is reasonably probable that action and such measures would have prevented the whole or some part of the damage which befell, can it be held that the conduct of Cronise & Co. was so affected to their injury by the declaration of the plaintiff as that the defendant may set up the declaration in estoppel of the plaintiff? The proposition contained in this query we understand the plaintiff to resist. And this, because the act, the affirmative act, had been done which changed the position of Cronise & Co. toward Ross and the transaction before the declaration was made known to them, and had not been done in reliance upon it. And this is a denial, that after a declaration is made and is relied upon, an omission thereby induced to act and to take such measures as will arrest an impending evil, and an injury resulting from such omission, can be made available as an estoppel.

In Howard v. Hudson, supra, Lord Campbell, Ch. J., recognizes the existence of the principle, that doing an act and omission to act are the same. And see Helme v. Insurance Co., 61 Pa. 107, 100 Am. Dec. 621. In Knights v. Wiffin, L. R., 5 Q. B. 660, the person who relied upon the declaration had before it was made and not in reliance upon it, paid his money for property not delivered, but after it was made, relying upon it, took no active course of conduct, remaining content and passive. Had the declaration been the reverse of what it was, which would then have been true, he might have taken active measures tending to retrieve his position. He rested satisfied in the belief, as a reasonable man, that the property had been passed to him as agreed. And he was damaged. The right of estoppel was there upheld, and it was maintained upon the ground of the plaintiff relying upon the statement and taking no steps further, and of his abstaining from active measures of recovery in consequence of the statement. It was there held, that acquiescent reliance upon the defendant's statement was an alteration of the plaintiff's position.

In Bank v. Keene, 53 Me. 103, the question was presented. The plaintiff there held a note purporting to have been signed by the defendant. Hearing that the same was forged, the plaintiff asked the defendant, who, looking at the note, admitted the signature to be genuine. The plaintiff, in reliance on that admission, refrained from taking any proceedings against him who passed the note to it, so as to secure payment from him. The instructions to the jury were: That if the plaintiff, relying upon the defendant's admission, was induced to refrain from obtaining security by arrest of the one passing the note upon it, or by attachment of his property, and thereby sustained an injury, the defendant would be estopped from denying his signature. This instruction was declared by the court on review to be in harmony with the principles applicable to estoppels in pais. And see 15 Wend. 308, and Brown v. Sprague, 5 Denio, 545.

These cases appear to us to lay down a sound rule. It must be that the conduct of men, which may be influenced by the declarations of those with whom they deal, is not confined to that which is shown by affirmative and positive acts following upon and induced by those declarations. Conduct is not alone that which is active, positive and affirmative. Conduct, as limited to this inquiry, is the reserve of one's own powers of person and property, and of those means of help which can be summoned from friendly or accommodating sources and from the tribunals and officers of justice, and is as often forbearance of their use and quiescence and contentment with affairs as they are, as action designed to change affairs. And such quiescence and content, induced by false or erroneous statement, may be quite as damaging as any result from action. It is as bad to fail to recover property gone, when with the knowledge of an existing fact it might have been retrieved, as it is to lose it. And so it is as damaging to rely in quiet upon an untrue statement, to the neglect of using the means of recovery, as it is to rely upon an untrue statement, and by action thereon meet with loss irreparable. To hold otherwise, would be to assert that the law makes a difference between damage received by action and omission to act, in circumstances precisely similar, save in these elements. When an act produces conduct from which flows injury, it cannot matter whether that conduct be affirmative or negative, active or quiescent.

We assumed, for the purpose of the previous consideration of one branch of the subject, that Cronise & Co. did, in reliance upon the declaration of the plaintiff, refrain from action and leave untaken any measures. The jury have so found the fact, and the finding is sustained by the testimony. We also assumed that it was reasonably probable that if they had been told the truth by the plaintiff they would have acted, and have taken measures which would have prevented the whole or some of the injury which befell. The jury have found that this assumption is well founded.

Though, as is conceded herein, Ross left the office of the brokers before their messenger returned, he had left but a very short time; a time so short that had the plaintiff declared the certification a forgery and the check worthless, there was ground for the jury to find that there was time for the broker's clerk, with his speed of foot, to have gone from the bank of plaintiff to the office of Speyers, there have learned the falsity of Ross' assertion of a delivery of gold to Speyer, and thence to the office of Cronise & Co., and have delivered his message soon enough for measures to have been decided upon and taken for the stoppage of the payment of the checks at the Bank of New York. We leave out of view for the present the checks upon the sub-treasury.

Nor was it a strained, unnatural nor unjustified inference for the jury to make that the clerk would so have done, and that Cronise

& Co. would have taken such measures and made stoppage of payment. It was but applying to the facts of the case and to the position of the parties in this transaction, the common knowledge of human nature and its workings under powerful incentives, and at a particular spot in the state and a particular hour of the day when those incentives are pressed in their greatest strength.

And from these findings thus authorized, it was a legitimate conclusion that Cronise & Co. suffered injury by the declaration to them of the plaintiff.

And if there is nothing else in the case the verdict and judgment are to be sustained.

The plaintiff insists however that the learned judge at circuit made several errors in his refusals to charge as requested, and in the charge which he delivered to the jury.

We will notice all of these instances which are indicated upon the points handed up, alluding to the requests by the numbers given to them in the points.

The second, third and fifth requests are already covered by what we have said.

The seventh request is: "That the jury cannot speculate upon what might have been done or attempted by Cronise & Co. after the delivery by them of the gold certificates or gold checks to the person calling himself John Ross, had they been apprised that the certificate was a forgery after such delivery."

If by the word "speculate," which is the word of controlling meaning in the request, was meant to guess, or to reason to practical results from unproven premises, doubtless the jury had no right so to do. And there would have been no error in the learned judge if he had so told the jury. But it would have been in the nature of an abstract proposition not necessarily involved in not growing out of the particular case. Hence it was not error for him to decline to charge, except as he did thereafter charge. He did charge them that Cronise & Co. to set up an estoppel must have had time to stop payment of the gold; that the circumstances must have been such as that they could have done it; that they must have occupied such a relation to the transaction as that they could with reasonable diligence have arrested the crime in its consummation and have secured the gold; that they must have still stood in a position where they could have corrected any act and could have saved the gold. This put the jury upon the proper inquiry. Nor can we concede that at the close of the trial the question of estoppel had become one of law only and for the court, as is claimed by the learned counsel for the plaintiff. He admits that there were two questions yet for the jury; whether the certification was forged or not, and whether its genuineness was admitted. And surely it was still a question of fact how much relative time had been spent by the respective actors from the moment Ross left the office of Cronise & Co. until the payment of the checks at the Bank of New York, and considering the relative positions of the different business places, whether in that lapse of time Cronise & Co. under all the circumstances could have made effectual interposition to stop payment of the checks delivered to him, or have made any successful effort at recaption of the gold if he had received it.

It is claimed that the learned judge erred in charging the jury that the delivery of the gold checks was not in law a delivery of the gold.

The points call our attention to that part of the charge in which the language of the judge is: "The delivery of these gold checks on the part of Mr. Cronise, it is insisted upon, is in law a delivery of the gold. I think that it was not."

It is proper to see in what connection this was said. For standing alone or applied to any and every case of a delivery of checks, it might be in some of them erroneous. What was the practical application of it for the minds of the jury? The topic then under the learned judge's and the jury's attention was whether Cronise & Co. could, under the facts of the case, in any proper view of them, be considered as injured by the plaintiff's declaration; and the judge precedes the remark excepted to by saying: "If Cronise, in point of fact, had done all that could be done on his part at that time, and had put himself in such a position that this admission could not affect his action to his prejudice, then the principle of estoppel would have no application to the case so far as he is concerned." Then he tells them, in the remark excepted to, in effect: It is insisted that the delivery of these checks was a delivery of the gold, in law, so that he could not reclaim it; and if he could not reclaim it then he was not injured by the declaration, for there was nothing he could do after such delivery. We may infer, properly, from the words "it is insisted," that all this had passed before the jury in the argument of counsel, either to the jury or to the court, and was a reference thereto. If it should be admitted to be technically inaccurate as a statement of law, applicable to all cases, it did not tend to mislead on this occasion; and for the purpose for which it was uttered, it was correct. Doubtless the handing over of the checks was a delivery of the gold to fulfill the contract for the sale of it, in accordance with the rules of the brokers' board under which the original parties to the transaction acted. But it was not such a delivery as prevented Cronise & Co. from intercepting the checks at the counter of the Bank of New York, and there forbidding and stopping payment of them.

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—8

And this is true, whether the gold be dollars, in which to make payment of a debt payable, or a commodity to be transferred in satisfaction of a contract for the sale and delivery of a chattel. The scope of the remarks of the court to the jury was that notwithstanding Cronise & Co. had put these checks into the hands of Ross, still they could stop payment of them at the place of payment. And, so considered, it did not mislead the jury from the question at issue, or give them an erroneous rule of law by which to dispose of it.

The plaintiff claims that even if it should be held that it is estopped to show the truth, as to so much of the gold as was paid to Ross over the counter of the Bank of New York, it should not be as to so much of it as was represented by the checks on the sub-treasury. And if these checks were alone concerned in the transaction, it might be said with force that Ross could have as soon got payment on them and clear escaped, as Harmon, the clerk, could have made his errand and returned. But these checks are connected with those on the Bank of New York; and Ross did not depart with the avails of the one until he had got the avails of the other. If Ross first went to the sub-treasury and obtained payment, then he afterward went to the Bank of New York; and he was there, or to and from there, from ten to fifteen minutes; and this opportunity for stopping payment of the checks at the Bank of New York was also opportunity for arrest of his person, and obtaining from him the gold got at the sub-treasury. And if it be said that he may have passed away the checks on the sub-treasury in the street to a confederate, still he was at the Bank of New York to be seized, and the coercion of arrest to be used upon him. In 53 Me. 103, arrest is named as one of the means of obtaining security which the plaintiff had let slip; and in L. R., 5 Q. B. 660, Blackburn, J., goes so far as to say that it needs not that it should appear that any benefit would result from the attempt to secure payment, but that the injured party had the right to make that attempt; and losing the exercise of the right by his reliance on the declaration, the declarant was estopped. We need not go so far here. Arrest and detention of the swindler is a powerful means in coercing restoration; and arrest and detention were as probably in the power of Cronise & Co. as the stoppage of the payment of the checks at the Bank of New York.

The judgment appealed from should be affirmed, with costs to the respondent.

All concur except RAPALLO, J., who concurs as to all but the sub-treasury gold.

Judgment affirmed.

GALBRAITH et al. v. LUNSFORD.¹

(9 S. W. 365, 87 Tenn. 89.)

Supreme Court of Tennessee. Oct. 18, 1888.

Appeal from chancery court, Knox county; Henry R. Gibson, Chancellor.

Ejectment by J. P. Galbraith and others against B. F. Lunsford; the controversy being as to the location of a division line. In the plot referred to by the arbitrator the line from F to E represents the original boundary, and the one which complainant now seeks to have established as the true one. The line from O to P represents the boundary as recognized for many years, and alleged by defendants to have become the boundary by estoppel. Defendant had judgment and complainant appealed.

Luckey & Yoe and Pickle & Turner, for complainants. Jesse L. Rogers, for respondent.

FOLKES, J. This is an ejectment bill, the disposition of which was dependent upon a question of boundary. After answer and proof, the cause was submitted to Mr. Jerome Templeton, a solicitor of this court, as an arbitrator, who was "to hear and decide the same according to the law and the evidence." The award was to be in writing, and was to be made the decree of the court. The arbitrator presented his award, wherein was stated his findings of fact and of law, adjudging that the bill should be dismissed. Complainants excepted to the award, upon the ground that the arbitrator manifestly undertook, as he was required by the submission, to decide the case according to law; but that he had misconceived the law, and determined the case contrary thereto, upon the facts as found by him. The chancellor overruled the exceptions, and entered a final decree, making the award the judgment of the court. Complainants have appealed, assigning as error the action of the court in refusing to set aside the award, and in entering decree thereon. Under the submission the arbitrator was judge of the facts and the law, and was not required to give the grounds of his decision; in which event it would have been presumed that he had decided according to law. But, having stated his findings of fact, it was proper for the court to determine, on the exceptions presented, whether the conclusions of law announced by the arbitrator were warranted by the facts as found in a case where, by the terms of the submission, the award was to be in accord with the law. Powell v. Riley, 15 Lea, 153. The proof is not in the record, having properly been omitted, inasmuch as no question was made—if, indeed, any could have been made—as to the correctness of the conclusions of fact reached by the arbitrator.

¹ Upon the subject of equitable estoppel generally, see note to this case in 1 L. R. A. 522-524.

We are therefore to consider only the question propounded in the exception to the award, to wit, that the deductions of law upon the facts as found are contrary to law.

The complainants, in support of their exceptions in the court below, now advance the following propositions in their assignments of error in this court: (1) "A line which could be easily ascertained by survey, and which had been known, and was lost or overlooked by mutual mistake, was and is not a doubtful line, that could be agreed upon or fixed, or become the true line, and binding by recognition, because void under the statute of frauds." (2) "Recognition of a line under a mistake of fact, where it was mutual, and either could have discovered the mistake by survey or otherwise, is not binding on either party, and neither party can set up the mistake against the other, by way of estoppel or otherwise; as mistake is as much that of one as the other, and fault, if any, is equal; and, besides, one's admission, made under mistake, will be relieved against in equity, more especially when mistake is mutual." (3) "Recognition of a line, not the true one, will not divest title to land out of a married woman nor minor, by estoppel or otherwise, as a married woman cannot be divested or part with title to land in that way; but more especially when it was by mistake of fact, as well upon the part of her adversary as that of her own, and when either could have easily discovered the mistake; nor is such married woman or descendant estopped to set up the truth, and recover accordingly; and more especially in a court of equity."

Robbed of their verbiage, the assignments of error are to the effect (1) that the line or boundary, under the facts as found by the arbitrator,—there being, as assumed by the assignments, no bona fide doubt, as to the true line, entertained by both parties,—was not such a doubtful boundary as could be established by parol or acquiescence. (2) That the doctrine of equitable estoppel does not apply at all to the facts as found. (3) And, if applicable, it cannot be effectual, as against married women.

Before disposing of these propositions, let us see what are the findings of the arbitrator, as shown by the award itself. We quote:

"Without going into the details of the proof, I find as follows:

"(1) The south boundary line of grant No. 18,417, to Wm. Cox, issued October 3, 1833, is the line from F to E in plot (Exhibit A) to the deposition of F. W. Galbraith. I further find that, as an original proposition, the north boundary line of the 250-acre tract—Wm. Cox to Jacob Pate, September 22, 1814—was the line from I to T, on same plot; and in 1833, when said grant was issued, the two tracts adjoined the lines here above described,—being the same as far as the latter extended, and being the dividing line of the tracts. I add that, if I am mistaken as to the true south boundary of said grant, the result would be the same, because the deed—Geo. M. Combs to Wm. Cox, February 10, 1814—covered both tracts, and both parties to this suit derive title from Wm. Cox; and I am convinced the north boundary line of the 250-acre tract is the line I to T; that is, if not under said grant, certainly under the Combs deed, so far as these parties are concerned, Wm. Cox owned the land in controversy.

"(2) I find that somewhere between August 11, 1846, and March 28, 1857,—that is, while Presley S. Chesher owned the 250-acre tract, or prior to August 11, 1846,—said dividing line was lost, or at least its location became doubtful. As a consequence, Chesher, between the point, I, and the New Market road, on said plot, cleared and inclosed the land up to and along the line from O to P on said plot, being the disputed line, as defendants claim it. Chesher did this under a claim of right, which, I infer from the circumstances, he thought that was his line. There is a marked line there, not as old as the line from F to E, but still an old line. Further, B. F. McFarland and wife, Sarah M. L. McFarland, a daughter, and the vendee of Wm. Cox, made the same mistake. They either forgot or never knew where the true dividing line was, and they clearly recognized the line from O to P as the dividing line between them and Chesher. I find no evidence that Mrs. McFarland ever recognized said last-named line before her marriage. The deed to her from her father, containing the boundaries of said grant, is dated April 16, 1841, and conveys to her by her maiden name. Her marriage was subsequent, but the date does not appear. On one occasion, while John E. Hopkins owned the 82-acre tract, being the northern portion of the 250 acres,—that is, after November 3, 1866, and prior to 1869, when Mrs. McFarland died,—she and John E. Hopkins went along the Chesher fence, along the line from O to P, talking about a trade as to Mrs. McFarland's land north of said line. She then recognized said line as the dividing line between her and Hopkins. This is cited as showing the recognition of said line, as defendants claim it, was not by B. F. McFarland only, but also by his wife. This recognition extends as far back as 40 years ago, or to 1848. In 1870 the heirs at law of Sarah M. L. McFarland, deceased, recognized the same line, O to P, when they partitioned among themselves the lands inherited from their mother. When John Neal bought the 82-acre tract from B. F. McFarland, November 3, 1863, and when Hopkins bought the same from Neal, in 1866, said line, O to P, was the dividing line, being lived up to and recognized by McFarland and wife; and we may assume that both Hopkins and Neal bought with that understanding, well justified by the conduct of McFarland and wife.

In 1870 the commissioners making partition did the locating of lines; but that only shows the mistake about the division line had become the understanding of the neighborhood. By accepting the partition, the heirs showed themselves ignorant of any mistake, so long had it (the line) been recognized. In 1873, John E. Hopkins, desiring to build a new dwelling-house, procured the division line to be run by J. P. Galbraith, the husband of one of the McFarland heirs, who showed him where to build. Several other of the McFarland heirs were then at home in the neighborhood, and must have known of the building of the house, which was on their land, as they claim it now; but was on Hopkins' land, and just south of the division line, as they must have known Hopkins claimed it. To say the least of it, they were silent when they should have spoken. In 1877, R. M. Barton, Jr., and wife, Jennie M. Barton, the latter being one of the McFarland heirs, by deed called for the Hopkins division line from O to P. In July, 1877, Barton and wife sold the residue of the land partitioned to the latter to Wm. Galbraith; and some time afterwards, and prior to June, 1882, when Wm. Galbraith filed his bill against John E. Hopkins, the discovery was made that the line, so long recognized and lived up to on both sides as the true division line,—that is, the line from O to P,—was a mistake, and that the true line was from F to E or from 3 to J on said plot. The line from O to P never was consistent with the 2d call, 'thence north 10 poles to a stake,' or with the fourth call, 'thence north 44 poles to a stake,' in the deed from McFarland to John Neal, made in 1863. Nor was the same consistent with the calls of the deed from Wm. Cox to Jacob Pate, made September 22, 1814; nor was the same consistent with the oldest marked line on the ground. An accurate survey, at any time, ought to have discovered the true line. But so it was, the parties on both sides the line made a mutual mistake, without taking the trouble of a survey, on which they acted from some time prior to 1848 to some time after 1877. After so long a public acquiescence, and so many public acts, some by solemn deeds of record on the part of Sarah M. L. McFarland, her husband, and her heirs, under the influence and with the knowledge of which strangers have bought the adjoining land, and built a valuable house thereon worth many more times the value of land involved, can the McFarland heirs now be heard to complain of said mistake, and be allowed to correct the same? "Where the true locality of the line is doubtful, such acts are regarded as furnishing evidence that the line so recognized is the true line; nor are either of the parties at liberty afterwards to abandon such line, although the line should afterwards be ascertained at a different place. Gilchrist v. McGee, 9 Yerg. 458, 459, Green, J. See, also, Merriwether v. Larmon, 3 Sneed, 446, 448. In the application of the principle of equitable estoppel, there is no exception in the case of married women. 2 Herm. Estop. 1232. See, also, Howell v. Hale, 5 Lea, 405; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 814-818; Crittenden v. Posey, 1 Head, 320; Stephenson v. Walker, 8 Baxt. 289. And the doctrine applies to infants having such intelligence as to enable them to comprehend the import of their conduct. Barham v. Turbeville, 1 Swan, 438. If this authority is doubted, still the only infant affected is Mrs. Barton; who with her husband, after her majority, ratified her former recognition of the line so long lived up to. I do not think the case of Wm. Galbraith v. John E. Hopkins, is res adjudicata, because (1) complainants in this cause (except Barton's wife) were not parties to that suit; (2) the land involved here was not involved in that suit. The subject-matter was not the same. Being clear in my convictions above expressed, without discussing the question of the statute of limitations, I decide, having considered the case as arbitrator, according to the submission made in the case, that complainants' bill be dismissed, with costs. [Signed] Jerome Templeton."

We have given the entire award, so that it may be seen what were the findings of fact and of law. The award must be taken as a whole, and not in detached sentences. It will not do to cull out words here and there, and from them argue that the parties knew where the true line was. The mutuality of the mistake, and the ease with which the parties might have discovered the same, had they taken the old deeds and procured the services of a competent surveyor, does not render it any the less a mistake. The fact still remains that there was an honest ignorance of the whereabouts of the true line, and a bona fide recognition of the line indicated on the plot as O to P. If, with full knowledge of the true line, another be fixed by verbal agreement, such agreement is within the statute of frauds, and consequently void; but, where there is doubt or ignorance as to the true locality of the line, a parol agreement, fixing the line between adjoining owners, is not within the statute; and, where satisfactorily established, will be enforced by the courts, notwithstanding it may afterwards be demonstrated that the agreed line was erroneously fixed. And such adjustment may be shown, as well by circumstances and recognition, as by direct evidence of a formal agreement, when parties have acted thereon. Houston v. Matthews, 1 Yerg. 116; Gilchrist v. McGee, 9 Yerg. 458; Merriwether v. Larmon, 3 Sneed, 451; Lewallen v. Overton, 9 Humph. 76; Rogers v. White, 1 Sneed, 69; Riggs v. Parker, Meigs, 49; Yarborough v. Abernathy, Id. 420.

The cases on this subject are numerous in this state, and citations might be multiplied; but they clearly make the distinction, and establish the principles as stated above.

This being so, it is not difficult to apply them to the findings of fact made by the arbitrator in the case at bar. We have admissions and declarations, we have conveyances made, and partitions had, calling for the line O to P. We have long acquiescence on the part of complainants, and those under whom they claim, coupled with the expenditure of money by defendant in building improvements upon the property in dispute, largely in excess of the value of the land itself, induced not only by what had long been the understanding of the parties as to the location of the line, but by positive pointing out of the line, with knowledge that the improvements were then about to be made. And during all this time we have absolute ignorance on the part of the adjoining owner as to the true line; ignorance none the less absolute by reason of the fact that, in the opinion of the arbitrator, it might have easily been removed by a survey. There was no survey, and the honest ignorance remained, until shortly before the filing of the bill in this cause. This is not a case of silence, but of numerous affirmative acts and admissions that were calculated to and did influence the conduct of defendants, and which acts and admissions are inconsistent with the claim of title now sought to be set up. The facts as found would seem to make out a case of estoppel, unless the disability of coverture prevents the application of this doctrine, as is strenuously insisted upon by the learned counsel for complainants. Let us see how this is. The contention is that, as a married woman cannot, in reference to her lands, bind herself by title-bond, power of attorney, contract of sale, or even a deed, without privy examination, and certificate of acknowledgment in a prescribed form showing that it was done freely, voluntarily, and understandingly, it would be an anomaly in the law to hold that she might part with her title indirectly, when she had no purpose to do so, and when, instead of doing so freely, voluntarily, and understandingly, she was actually in ignorance, or laboring under a mistake of fact. And cases are cited which seem to sustain the contention. It must be admitted that the cases on this subject are to a certain extent conflicting. But much of the difficulty and confusion is due to a failure to observe the distinction between the cases which seek, by the doctrine of estoppel, to validate those contracts of a married woman which by law are declared void, and the cases where, in the absence of any contract, and independent of any contract or agreement, her conduct has been held to prevent her from asserting what would otherwise be a right. To the former class belongs the case of Dodd v. Benthal, 4 Heisk. 601. And the language of the judge delivering the opinion in that case, at page 607, where he says: "The complainant being both an infant and feme covert at the time of the execution of the deed in question, no act of affirmance or disaffirmance in pais on her part during coverture could be binding upon her," etc.,—is correct when confined to a contract of a person under disability, which by law is void in consequence of such disability. To the latter class, above referred to, belongs the case of Howell v. Hale, 5 Lea, 405. Here the conduct of the married woman, independent of any contract, operates to estop her in the same manner and to the same extent as if she were a feme sole. So in the case at bar, while there are facts and circumstances upon which a contract might be implied that would be binding upon a person sui juris, yet there are also such admissions, statements, and conduct on the part of the complainants and their ancestor as are amply sufficient to create an estoppel entirely independent of, and altogether outside of, any idea or claim of a contract. Mr. Pomeroy says "that while, upon the question how far the doctrine of equitable estoppel by conduct applies to married women, there is some conflict among the decisions, the tendency of modern authority, however, is strongly towards the enforcement of the estoppel against married women, as against persons sui juris, with little or no limitation on account of their disability;" and that the decisions to the contrary seem to be in opposition to the general current of authority. Modern English cases, as well as American, are cited to sustain the text. Section 814, and notes. The case of Morrison v. Wilson, 13 Cal. 495, relied on so confidently by counsel for complainants, seems to not only deny the application of an estoppel in pais to a married woman, but goes so far as to hold that affirmative fraud on her part will not effect that result. It is sufficient to say of this case that it not only loses sight of the distinction referred to as to the defective execution of a contract, but is directly opposed to our own adjudged cases, so far as the element of fraud is concerned. The doctrine of estoppel has, by courts of this state, been applied to married women and infants. Thus in Howell v. Hale, 5 Lea, 405, she was held estopped by matter in pais. She had by her conduct induced Thornhill to purchase the mortgage debt on her land, leading him to believe that the land should stand liable therefor. This court held her estopped by her conduct to make defense to said mortgage, whether she might have done so or not, as against the original mortgagee. In Cooley v. Steele, 2 Head, 606, we have a clear case of estoppel in pais applied to a married woman. She had, in a deposition, made a statement, as to title to certain shares, contrary to what she there asserted in the case before the court. This court said: "Complainant would be clearly entitled, upon well-established principles, to the relief sought, but for the estoppel created by her oath in the before-mentioned deposition." To the same effect is Pilcher v. Smith, Id.

208, where it is said: "The legal disability of coverture carries with it no license or privilege to practice fraud or deception on other persons." Estoppel in pais has also been applied to infants by this court. Barham v. Turbeville, 1 Swan, 437; Adams v. Fite, 3 Baxt. 69. In the latter case the court, after finding the weight of the proof in favor of the complainant having been of age at time of the execution of the deed, continuing, said: "Both on the ground of long acquiescence, and of the concealment of the fact that he was not of age, when complainant had good reason to know that Ewing was trading with him as sui juris, complainant is repelled, even if he was in fact only twenty years of age when he made the deed." It is true that in the case of Barham v. Turbeville the infant was not merely silent, but actively proclaimed his father's title to the property he subsequently sued for; and the court puts the estoppel upon the ground of actual and purposed fraud, which was right and proper, under the facts of that case. But, so far as the opinion in this case undertakes to hold that actual and positive fraud, at the time of the act set up as constituting the estoppel, is essential to the application of the doctrine of estoppel, it is obiter and unsound, as we shall presently undertake to show.

It is also urged that actual fraud must exist before an estoppel can be maintained against one sui juris; and a fortiori before it can be applied to a married woman, if against the latter it can be invoked at all. It is true that there is a theory which makes the essence of equitable estoppel to consist of fraud; but this theory is not sustained by principle nor authority. There are many well-settled cases of estoppel familiar to courts of equity, which do not rest upon fraud; and instances are admitted, even by the courts, which maintain this theory, which cannot be said to involve any element of fraud, unless by a complete perversion of language and misuse of terms. The confusion to be found in some of the books on this subject is due doubtless to the fact that the fraud referred to has its origin in the effort afterwards to set up rights contrary to the conduct of the party, although at the time of the act constituting the estoppel there was the most perfect good faith. The term, as used in such cases, is, as Mr. Pomeroy expresses it, virtually synonymous with "unconscientious" or "inequitable." It is in this sense that it may be said that it is a fraud or fraudulent to attempt to repudiate the conduct which has induced the other party to act, and upon which the estoppel is predicated; but it is entirely another thing to say that the conduct itself—the acts, words, or silence of the party—constituting the estoppel must be an actual fraud, done with the intention of deceiving. It may therefore be safely said that although fraud may be, and often is, an ingredient in the conduct of the party estopped, it is not an essential element, if the word is used in its commonly accepted sense; and the use of the term is unnecessary, and often improper, unless applied to the effort of the party estopped to repudiate his conduct, and to assert a right or claim in contravention thereof. The best-considered cases are in accord with the views above expressed. Bank v. Bank, 50 N. Y. 575; Waring v. Somborn, 82 N. Y. 604. And although the earlier Pennsylvania decisions generally leaned strongly in favor of the theory that an actual fraud is of the essence of every such estoppel by conduct, it is worthy of note that in the late case in that state of Bidwell v. Pittsburgh, 85 Pa. 412, it is said: "It is not necessary that the party against whom an estoppel is alleged should have intended to deceive. It is sufficient if he intended that his conduct should induce another to act upon it, and the other, relying on it, did so act." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 804, 805, et seq. The case of Brant v. Coal Co., 93 U. S. 326, pressed upon us by counsel for complainant as establishing the contention that fraud is an essential element in the application of the doctrine of estoppel, and that it is essential that the party invoking the estoppel was himself not only destitute of the knowledge of the true state of the title, but also of any convenient or available means of acquiring such knowledge, merits special mention. In addition to what we have already said as to the first proposition, we will be content to adopt Mr. Pomeroy's note upon this case, where, after quoting freely of the opinion, he says: "With great deference to the opinion of so able a judge, I think his error in this passage is evident. It consists in taking a special rule, established from motives of policy for a particular condition of fact, and raising it to the position of a universal rule. Where an estoppel by conduct is alleged to prevent a legal owner of land from asserting his legal title, courts of equity, in order to avoid the literal requirements of the statute of frauds, were driven to the element of fraud in the conduct as essential. See the text, sections 805-807. The passage quoted from Judge Story is dealing with this long-settled rule of equity, and not with the subject of equitable estoppel in general. When this special rule is made universal, its inconsistency with many familiar instances of equitable estoppel becomes apparent, and Judge Field is forced to escape from the antagonism by denying that these instances do in fact belong to the doctrine. If this conclusion be correct, then some of the most important and well-settled species of the estoppel, uniformly regarded as such by text writers and courts, must be abandoned, and the beneficent doctrine itself must be curtailed in its operation to one particular class of cases. This result is in direct opposition to the tendency of judicial decisions, and of the discussion of text writers." See note 1 to section 806, Pom. Eq. Jur., and cases there cited. It is worthy of notice, also, that, in the opinion referred to, Judge Field quotes approvingly from the Pennsylvania case of Hill v. Epley, 31 Pa. 334, language which is practically, to all intents, an abandonment of the extreme position supposed to be maintained in the Brant Case. The language referred to is: "The primary ground of the doctrine is that it would be a fraud in a party to assert what his previous conduct had denied, when on the faith of that denial others have acted." The element of fraud is essential either in the intention of the party estopped, or in the effect of the evidence which he attempts to set up; so that at last the difficulty seems to be in the use of terms, rather than in the true principles controlling the doctrine under consideration. As to the second proposition for which the Brant Case is cited, it is sufficient to say that it does not sustain the position that the mutuality of the mistake, or the possibility of having discovered it, prevents the application of the doctrine of estoppel. It merely asserts the familiar rule that where the party setting up the estoppel knew the true condition of the title, either in fact or in contemplation of law, the doctrine will not avail him; the fact being in that case, as shown in the opinion, that "he knew he was obtaining only a life-estate by his purchase."

This opinion is already too long to allow further elaboration on the question of estoppel under the facts of this case. It will, however, not be out of place to add that I find nothing in the numerous reported cases in this state, from Patton v. McClure, Mart. & Y. 339, down to Allen v. Westbrook, 16 Lea, 251, that makes willful fraud on the part of the party sought to be estopped, in the act constituting the grounds of the estoppel, essential to the application of the doctrine. We hold, therefore, that there is, in the case at bar, on the facts as found by the arbitrator, every element of an equitable estoppel, and complainants must be repelled. The disability of coverture is not sufficient to defeat this result. Let the decree of the chancellor be affirmed, with costs.

STARRY v. KORAB.

(21 N. W. 600, 65 Iowa, 267.)

Supreme Court of Iowa. Dec. 8, 1884.

Appeal from superior court of Cedar Rapids.

This is an appeal from an order in a garnishment proceeding discharging the garnishee. Plaintiff obtained judgment against one Joseph Lustick, on which execution issued, and appellee was garnished as a supposed debtor of the defendant in execution. At the proper time he appeared, and answered that he was not indebted to said Lustick in any sum, and that he did not have any property in his possession belonging to him. Plaintiff filed a pleading controverting this answer, in which it is alleged that in a conversation had between plaintiff and garnishee before the execution was issued, garnishee stated that he was indebted to Lustick in a certain sum, and that he would not pay the same to Lustick until plaintiff had an opportunity to procure the issuance of an execution on said judgment and serve notice of garnishment on him thereunder; and that, relying on this representation, and believing it to be true, plaintiff, at great expense and trouble to himself, procured said execution to issue, and caused the garnishee to be served with notice of garnishment thereunder, and that the garnishee is now estopped by his representation and conduct from denying that he was indebted to Lustick at the time he was served with the notice. The garnishee demurred to this pleading on the ground that it did not show that he was in fact indebted to Lustick when the notice of garnishment was served, and the facts averred in the pleading did not create an estoppel. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to plead further, judgment was entered discharging the garnishee. Plaintiff appeals.

Blake & Hormel, for appellant. Bowman & Swisher, for appellee.

REED, J. The purpose of the pleader was undoubtedly to set up in the pleading controverting the answer of the garnishee what is denominated an equitable estoppel. The effect of such estoppel is to preclude the party from asserting a strict legal right, on the ground that his assertion of such right, under the circumstances of the case, would be against equity and good conscience. The pleading assumes that at the time the notice of garnishment was served on the garnishee he was not in fact indebted to Lustick, and that on strict legal grounds he was entitled to be discharged. But the claim is that, having induced plaintiff, by the representation that he was indebted to Lustick, to institute the garnishment proceeding and incur the expense and trouble incident thereto, it would be manifestly unjust and inequitable in him to assert his exemption from liability thereon. And the question presented by the record is whether, under the facts stated in the pleading, the garnishee is estopped to deny that he is indebted to Lustick.

It will be observed that the representation on which plaintiff claims to have acted in instituting the garnishment proceedings consisted (1) in the statement of a matter of fact, viz., that the garnishee was at that time indebted to Lustick in a certain amount; and (2) in a promise or agreement as to his conduct in the future, viz., that he would withhold the amount and not pay it over to Lustick until plaintiff would have an opportunity to procure an execution to issue, and notice of garnishment to be served upon him. But it does not appear from the averments of the pleading that the statement as to the matter of fact was not true when it was made; that is, it is not averred that the garnishee was not indebted to Lustick at the time the representation was made. Some time elapsed between the making of the representation and the service of the garnishment notice, and for anything that appears in the pleading the garnishee may have been indebted to Lustick at the time of the representation, and have paid the amount to him before the notice was served upon him. If those are the facts, the injury and damages which would result to plaintiff in case of the garnishee's discharge would be occasioned, not by his denial of the truth of his statement that he was indebted to Lustick, but by his failure to perform the agreement to retain in his hands the amount of the indebtedness until the notice of garnishment should be served upon him. But an estoppel does not arise from the mere failure of a party to perform an executory agreement.

The doctrine of estoppel is applied to prevent the injustice which would result if one who has once asserted the existence of a fact, and thereby induced another to act in the belief of the truth of that statement so as to change his previous position, were permitted afterwards to deny its truth. Under such circumstances, and as against the one who made the statement, the law is that it shall be conclusively presumed to be true. Pickard v. Sears, 6 Adol. & E. 469. But it is difficult to conceive a case in which one who is sued for the mere failure to perform an executory agreement would be precluded by the law from making any defense against the claims. It may be that plaintiff has a cause of action against the garnishee on the agreement; but if so he clearly cannot enforce it in this proceeding. His remedy in that case must be sought in an original action against the party as defendant. In this proceeding, if he can recover at all, he can do so only by showing either that the garnishee was indebted to the defendant in execution when the notice of garnishment was served on him, or that such a state of facts existed as that he is estopped to deny that he was so indebted. The pleading in question, in our opinion, does not show either of these states of fact. Affirmed.

PENN et al. v. GUGGENHEIMER et al.
(76 Va. 839.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. Oct. 16, 1882.

Appeal from circuit court, Botetourt county.

Bill by Max Guggenheimer and others against William J. Penn, as administrator of Stuart B. Penn and in his own right, Ann S. Penn, and others, to ascertain the interest of William J. Penn in the estate of S. B. Penn, deceased, and to subject the same to judgments of plaintiff against said William J. Penn. Under the will of Charles B. Penn certain lands were given to his children. He owned a third interest in certain land on James river, known as the "Home Place," the other two-thirds of which belonged to his wife by descent from her father. Under said will he expressed a wish that his wife should retain the "home place," and at her death it should be the property of her son Stuart B. Penn. The widow, in 1850, received the personal estate given to her under the will of her husband, and gave a receipt reciting that she received it "agreeably to the provisions of his said last will and testament." At the same time the "home place" was put on the land book of the county and assessed for taxes in her name as tenant for life and devisee of her husband. She never renounced the will, nor had dower assigned, but she filed an answer in 1867 to the plaintiff's bill, in which answer she denied that she had done anything to divest herself of her two-thirds in the "home place." The circuit court entered a decree that the widow had elected to accept the provision in the will of her husband, and that the remainder of the "home place" passed on the death of the said Stuart B. Penn, childless, among others, to the said William J. Penn, who was entitled to an interest of one-fourth, subject to his mother's life estate, which interest was liable to be subjected by his creditors to the satisfaction of their judgment liens. From this judgment Ann S. Penn appealed, and, pending the appeal, died. Affirmed.

Edmund Pendleton, for Mrs. Ann S. Penn.
J. H. H. Figgatt and John J. Allen, for Max Guggenheimer. G. W. & L. C. Hansbrough, for George Skillen Penn and Mrs. Frances L. Mayo.

STAPLES, J. The main question in this case turns upon the construction to be given to the will of Charles B. Penn which was admitted to probate at the September term of the county court of Botetourt, in the year 1849. The testator, at the time of his death, was possessed of a valuable real and personal estate, which he devised and bequeathed to his wife, Mrs. Ann Penn, and to his four children. To his two sons George S. Penn and William Penn he gave severally a tract of land. To Mrs. Mayo, his married daughter, he gave certain real estate and a sum of $10,000 in bank stock. To his wife he bequeathed all his slaves, with the full confidence that she would make such disposition of them among his children as should be just and equitable, after retaining such of them as she might desire for her own use during her lifetime. His other personal estate he directed to be sold, and the balance remaining, after the payment of his debts, together with the proceeds of any real estate not specifically devised, he bequeathed to his wife, with the full confidence that she would divide it among his children as she might deem just and proper.

The third clause of the will, which gives rise to this controversy, is as follows:

"It is my will and desire that my wife shall retain the home place, and at her death it shall be the property of my son Stuart B. Penn, which I hereby give to him, his heirs, and assigns forever."

The home place, thus mentioned by the testator, is a tract of about 820 acres, one-half of which, known as the "lower half," was the property of Mrs. Penn, devised to her by her father. She was also the owner of one-third of the upper half of the tract, derived by descent from her sisters.

The testator was entitled to two undivided thirds acquired by purchase in the upper half of the tract. So that his interest at the time of his death did not exceed one-third of the entire tract.

The first question arising under the clause already quoted is whether the testator intended to dispose of the entire tract, or whether the will is to be construed as disposing merely of his undivided third.

If the former interpretation be the true one, it is conceded that it was incumbent upon Mrs. Penn, the widow, to make her election, and that she cannot claim both her own estate and the provision made for her by the will.

Before entering into a discussion of that question it will be proper briefly to advert to some of the principles of law governing in such cases.

The doctrine of election is said to rest upon the equitable ground that no man can be permitted to claim inconsistent rights with regard to the same subject, and that any one who asserts an interest under an instrument is bound to give full effect, as far as he can, to that instrument. Or, as it is sometimes expressed, he who accepts a benefit under a deed or will must adopt the contents of the whole instrument, conforming to all its provisions, and relinquishing every right inconsistent with it.

In the terse language of Lord Rosslyn in Wilson v. Lord Townsend, 2 Ves. Jr. 697: "You cannot act. You cannot come forth to a court of justice claiming in repugnant rights. When you claim under a deed, you must claim under the whole deed together. You cannot take one clause, and advise the court to shut their eyes against the rest.

Suppose, in a will, a legacy is given to you by one clause; by another, an estate of which you are in the possession is given to another. While you hold that, you shall not claim the legacy." 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 465, 466; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 1, pp. 541, 547, 548; Kinnaird v. Williams, 8 Leigh, 400; Craig v. Walthall, 14 Grat. 518; Dixon v. McCue, Id. 540. In order, however, to raise a case of election, it is well settled the intention on the part of the testator to give that which is not his own must be clear and unmistakable. It must appear from language which is unequivocal, which leaves no room for doubt as to the testator's design. The necessity for an election can never arise from an uncertain or dubious interpretation of the clause of donation. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 472; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 10.

It is not necessary, however, that this intention should be expressly declared. The dispositions of the instrument, fairly and reasonably interpreted, may of themselves show a clear design on the part of the testator to bestow upon the devisee property which in fact belongs to another.

As in other cases, the intention may be gathered from the whole and every part of the instrument. The difficulty of ascertaining the testator's intent, it is said, is always much greater where he has a partial interest in the estate devised than where he undertakes to dispose of an estate in which he has no interest.

In the former case, the presumption is that he intended to dispose of that which he might properly dispose of, and nothing more; and this presumption will always prevail, unless the intention is clearly manifested by demonstration plain, or necessary implication on the part of the testator to dispose of the whole estate, including the interest of third parties. Generally, when the testator has an undivided interest in certain property, and he employs general words in disposing of it, as "all my lands," or "all my estate," no case of election arises from it; for it does not plainly appear that he meant to dispose of anything but what was strictly his own. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1087; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 489.

A case of election does arise, however, when the testator, having an undivided or partial interest in an estate, devises it specifically, thus indicating a purpose to bestow it as an entirety. This rule on this subject is thus laid down in 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 489. Where the testator proposes to give the whole thing itself, using language which, by reasonable intention, must necessarily describe and define the whole corpus of the thing in which his particular interest exists as a distinct and identified piece of property, then an intention to bestow the whole, and not merely the testator's individual share, must be inferred, and a case for an election arises. This rule is mentioned and commented on by Judge Christian in delivering the opinion of this court in Gregory v. Gates, 30 Grat. 83, to which I refer as authority for other views here announced.

Now, let us apply these principles to the case in hand. In the first place, there can be no doubt that the tract of land or estate in question was universally known and described as the "Home Place." It is so spoken of by all the witnesses, by the parties, and it was so denominated in all the pleadings. Mrs. Penn, in her answer, describes it as the "Home Place." She speaks of the "upper half of the home place" and the "lower half of the home place." It is scarcely to be supposed that the testator would term it differently from every other person; that he referred only to his partial interest of one-third when by universal consent, usage, and habit, the entire tract was known and recognized as the home place. His language is: "That my wife shall retain the home place, and at her death it [the home place] shall be the property of my son Stuart B. Penn, which I hereby give him, his heirs and assigns, forever." What gives some significance, at least, to this language is that the mansion house, occupied by the testator and his family for many years, was located, not upon the half in which the testator had an interest of two-thirds, but upon that portion exclusively owned by Mrs. Penn. It was this portion upon which the family resided that might with some propriety be termed the "Home Place," and not the two undivided thirds of one-half, constituting merely a part of the tract.

It was said in the argument before this court that the language of the clause now under consideration is different from the other clauses of the will. For example, that the testator, when disposing of his own property, invariably uses the words, "I give and bequeath," whereas in the present instance he merely expresses the wish that his wife shall retain the home place. This difference of phraseology grows out of the fact that the testator was carefully defining and limiting an estate to be enjoyed by his wife during her life, and the language used by him was such as he supposed would accomplish the object. He then proceeds to say that it is his will and desire at her death it (the home place) "shall be the property of my son Stuart B. Penn, which I hereby give him, his heirs and assigns, forever." It is impossible by argument or illustration to add to the force and perspicuity of this language. Nothing can be plainer, more direct and comprehensive. The cases of Padbury v. Clark, 2 Macn. & G. 298; Howells v. Jenkins, 2 Johns. & H. 706; Grosvenor v. Durston, 25 Beav. 97; Grissell v. Swinhoe, L. R. 7 Eq. 291, 295,—in which it was held that the devisee was bound to elect,—are directly in point and conclusive of the question.

The other dispositions made by the testator confirm thoroughly this view of his intention. He gave to his son George S. Penn an estate worth about $11,000, to his son William Penn an estate of the value of $14,000, and to Mrs. Mayo property worth $12,000 or $15,000.

The provision made for his wife was more than sufficient for her support and maintenance during her life in the most comfortable and abundant manner. If, however, he designed that his son Stuart B. Penn should take the one-third of the home place, subject to the incumbrance of the life estate, the provision for him was wholly inadequate, and disproportionate to the benefits conferred upon his other children. On the other hand, if the testator intended that the entire home place should be the property of his son Stuart B. Penn, the period of his enjoyment would be postponed until the death of Mrs. Penn, and the value of the devise would be about equal to the provision for the other children.

I am therefore of opinion that by the plain terms of the will Mrs. Penn was put to her election, and that she could not and cannot choose both her own estate and the bequests made in her favor.

The next inquiry is, whether Mrs. Penn did, in fact, elect to claim under the will.

An election may be implied as well as expressed. Whether there has been an election must be determined upon the circumstances of each particular case, rather than upon any general principles. 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 539, 571, 572. It may be inferred from the conduct of the party, his acts, his omissions, and his mode of dealing with the property. Unequivocal acts of ownership, with knowledge of the right to elect, and not through a mistake with respect to the condition and value of the estate, will generally be deemed an election to take under the will. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 514, 515. Lapse of time, although not of itself conclusive, yet, when connected with circumstances of enjoyment, may be decisive upon the question of election.

In Adsit v. Adsit, 2 Johns. Ch. 448, 451, Chancellor Kent said: "Taking possession of property under a will or other instrument, and exercising unequivocal acts of ownership over it for a long period of time, will amount to a binding election."

"Positive acts of acceptance or renunciation," says Mr. Justice Story, "may arise from long acquiescence, or from other circumstances of a stringent nature, and are not indispensable."

"Again," he says, "it may be necessary to consider whether he [the devisee] can restore other persons affected by his claim to the same situation as if the acts had not been performed, or the acquiescence had not existed, and whether there has been such a lapse of time as ought to preclude the court from entering upon such inquiries upon its general doctrine of not entertaining suits upon stale demands or after long delays." 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1097-1098.

Where the election is once made by the party bound to elect, either expressly or impliedly, and with full knowledge of all the facts, it binds not only himself, but also all those parties who claim under him, his representatives and heirs. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 516.

Let us apply these principles to the case before us. Upon the death of the testator, in the year 1849, Mrs. Penn continued in the possession of the home place until the present time, a period of 30 years. It does not appear that she ever expressed any dissatisfaction with the provisions of the will till the filing of her answer in the cause in the year 1867. In the year 1850 the entire tract was entered upon the commissioner's books of the county and assessed with taxes in her name, as tenant for life. Whether this was done by her direction or not, it does not appear. It can scarcely be supposed she was ignorant of a fact disclosed on every tax ticket paid by her.

It has been already stated that by the will testator's slaves were given to Mrs. Penn, in full confidence that she would make such disposition of them among his children as would be just and equitable, after retaining such proportion of them as she might desire for her own use during her life.

The residue of the real and personal estate was also given to her in trust for the benefit of the children. In the year 1850,—not long after the testator's death,—the executors turned over to her the entire personal estate, including slaves, and took her receipt, stating that this was done in conformity with the provisions of the will. The executors must therefore have understood that Mrs. Penn had accepted the provision made for her benefit. Upon no other ground would they have been warranted in thus dealing with the assets. The terms of the receipt given by her show that she was perfectly apprised of the contents of the will, that she knew the condition and value of the property, and that she had united with the executors in fulfilling the intentions and wishes of the testator. Had Mrs. Penn renounced the will, as she was bound to do, in order to claim her own estate, she would have been entitled only to one-third of the slaves for life, and one-third of the personal property absolutely. As it was, she received from the executors under the will 49 slaves, of the value of $18,370, and other property, worth between $5,000 and $6,000. The testimony shows that Mrs. Penn never made any formal division of the property; that she, however, distributed among her children about 12 of the slaves, retaining the residue in her own possession, for her own use and benefit, until their emancipation in 1865. It is of no sort of consequence that during his lifetime Stuart B. Penn resided at the home place, and managed and controlled all the operations of the estate. This was, of course, done by the authority of Mrs. Penn, and doubtless for the reason that it was more agreeable to her that one of her sons should relieve her of the trouble and responsibility, to which, amid the infirmities of declining years, she was unequal. She certainly exercised a dominion and ownership of the property, to which she was entitled only under her husband's will, and which she could never have assumed unless she intended to conform to its provisions.

After this long lapse of time, after this long-continued enjoyment and possession of the estate, and unequivocal recognition of the provisions of the will by receiving the property from the executors, it is too late for Mrs. Penn, at this day, to disclaim the testator's bounty, and assert title to her own estate.

The slaves have long since been emancipated, the personal property exhausted, and it is now impossible to place the children in the condition they would have occupied had Mrs. Penn in the outset declared her intention to hold her own property.

So far from it, it is very clear that she made her election to claim under the will, and that she did so with a deliberate and intelligent choice, and with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, and of her own rights. No possible injury can accrue to any one from the conclusion thus reached, for Mrs. Penn lived and died in the enjoyment of the estate. She never attempted any other disposition of it.

Stuart B. Penn, the devisee, is dead, without children, and the estate has passed in due course of law to Mrs. Penn's children. A contrary decision can result only in disturbing a condition of things settled and acquiesced in for many years by all parties. I think, therefore, there is no error upon this branch of the case in the decision of the circuit court.

The learned counsel for the appellant, in his petition for an appeal, and in his argument before this court, has taken the ground that the parties bringing this suit are neither heirs nor purchasers nor beneficiaries under the will of Charles Penn, but judgment creditors of William J. Penn, and, as such, intruders and volunteers, seeking to set aside a family settlement, and to vest in William J. Penn an interest which he himself does not claim, and to which he never asserted any title. It will not be denied that complainants, by virtue of their judgments, have a lien upon all the real estate of their debtor, and that under our statute they may enforce that lien in a court of equity.

This right of the complainants, and, indeed, of all judgment creditors, cannot be affected by any omission of disclaimer on the part of the debtor. According to repeated decisions of this court, when the freehold has once vested, the owner cannot divest himself of the title by any mere parol disclaimer; but he can only do so by deed or some other act sufficient to pass an estate. Even had William J. Penn executed such deed, voluntarily relinquishing his title, his creditors would not be bound by it. When the court has once settled that Stuart B. Penn is entitled to the home place under the will of his father, William J. Penn, as one of his heirs, has an absolute title to his just share or proportion of that estate, and his creditors may not only subject it to satisfaction of their debts, but they may resort to a court of equity for the purpose of ascertaining that interest, and of removing every obstacle in the way of the just enforcement of their liens. William J. Penn can no more defeat the claims of his creditors by a disclaimer of title than he could do so by a voluntary deed, or gift or assignment.

In Dold v. Geiger's Adm'r, 2 Grat. 98, it was held that choses in action, to which the wife becomes entitled during coverture, are liable to the claims of the husband's creditors, and a voluntary relinquishment of the same by the husband, and a settlement upon the wife, before being reduced into possession, will not protect such choses in action from such creditors' claims.

Judge Stanard, in answer to an objection similar to the one made here, said: "I think it may safely be laid down as a just deduction from the elementary principles of our law that the general rule is that the rights of property of a debtor, whether in possession or in action, present or reversionary, in law or in equity, and of value adequate to pay his debts, and without which he is insolvent, and the payment of his debts must be frustrated, cannot by the mere volition of the debtor, in the form of assignment, surrender, or other modes of arrest, pass to volunteers without valuable consideration, and be thereby placed in the hands of such volunteers, beyond the reach and secure from the claims of such creditors." This opinion of Judge Stanard, and, indeed, the decision itself, constitutes a complete answer to the points made by counsel, and render unnecessary any further discussion of the subject.

The next question is whether the circuit court erred in disallowing the account of William J. Penn against the estate of Stuart B. Penn, for money alleged to have been paid by the former as administrator of Stuart B. Penn. The latter died in the year 1857, considerably indebted. William B. Penn qualified as his administrator, and removed to the home place, thereafter residing with his mother, the life tenant. There is no doubt that the net income derived from the estate was appropriated by him to the payment of his brother's debts. The only question is whether this income was sufficient for that purpose, or whether any part of the indebtedness was discharged by William J. Penn out of his private means. William J. Penn, in one of his depositions, states that from 1857 to 1860 he realized from the home place an income of $6,196.15, all of which, by the direction of his mother, was applied to the payment of his brother's debts. He further states that Stuart B. Penn had a note in bank of $4,600, for which the witness, at the request of his mother, substituted his own note. The larger portion of this latter note was paid off by him in February, 1864, and the balance in 1865, in Confederate money. This, reduced to its actual value in sound money, amounts to a very insignificant sum.

In the concluding part of William J. Penn's deposition he expresses the opinion that he has been fully reimbursed for all moneys expended by him in the payment of his brother's debts. Unfortunately for the parties setting up this claim, William J. Penn is their witness, and their only witness. They cannot ask the court to discard their own testimony, and enter a decree in their favor upon a case unsupported by proof. I have no doubt, however, that William J. Penn has given an accurate and truthful account of his transactions and dealings with the estate.

The home place was regarded as one of the most valuable estates on James river, yielding a large income annually to its owners. A very small portion of its profits was required for the support of Mrs. Penn; the balance passed into the hands of William J. Penn, and I am satisfied that he was fully reimbursed for every dollar appropriated by him for the payment of his brother's debts.

The complainants, after the fullest opportunity, have been unable to adduce any testimony to the contrary. They are clearly not entitled to a reversal of the decree in the present state of the case, and it is most apparent that nothing is to be gained by further inquiry.

Upon the whole, I think the decree of the circuit court should be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

FITZHUGH v. HUBBARD.

(41 Ark. 64.)

Supreme Court of Arkansas. May Term, 1883.

Appeal from circuit court, Phillips county;
J. N. Cypert, Judge.M. T. Sanders and Tappan & Hornor, for appellant. Thweatt & Quarles, for appellee.

SMITH, J. William St. John Hubbard died in the year 1878. Just before his death he made his will, which was afterwards duly proved, and which is in the words following:

"I bequeath and leave unto my brother, Edward L. Hubbard, the full amount of his indebtedness to me, and the remainder of my property, both personal and real, to my sister, Mrs. Sarah L. Fitzhugh, after paying all of my debts, and my sister to administer without bond."

In point of fact Edward L. Hubbard was not then indebted to the testator. He had formerly owed the testator a debt of $4,221.61, which was evidenced by note and secured by deed of trust upon real estate; but this debt had been transferred, eight months before the execution of the will, to Mrs. Sarah L. Fitzhugh. The deed of trust contained the usual power of foreclosure by advertisement and sale upon default in payment; and, in case of the refusal of the trustee to act, the sheriff of Phillips county was empowered to execute it.

Cage, the trustee, who was also the draftsman of the will, did refuse to sell the property, alleging as his reason that the debt had been satisfied by the provisions of the will, whereupon the services of the sheriff were called into requisition. After due notice he sold and conveyed the lands to Mrs. Fitzhugh, who brought ejectment. The defendant set up as an equitable defense that the deed of trust under which the plaintiff claimed title had been canceled, and the debt which it was intended to secure had been released to him by virtue of said will. The cause was transferred to equity. Testimony was taken on both sides, and at the hearing the court required Mrs. Fitzhugh to elect whether she would affirm the will and accept the devise to her, or renounce the same and assert a right to the debt due by Edward L. Hubbard. She elected to take under the will. The court thereupon dismissed her complaint, set aside the trustee's sale and conveyance, and canceled Edward L. Hubbard's note and deed of trust. Mrs. Fitzhugh has appealed, and the main question is whether this is a proper case for the application of the doctrine of election.

"An election in equity is a choice which a party is compelled to make between the acceptance of a benefit under an instrument and the retention of some property, already his own, which is attempted to be disposed of in favor of a third party by virtue of the same instrument. The doctrine rests upon the principle that a person claiming under an instrument shall not interfere by title paramount to prevent another part of the same instrument from having effect according to its construction. He cannot accept and reject the same instrument. It is a doctrine which is principally exhibited in cases of wills. * * *

"The most common instance which is put of a case of an election is where a testator gives money or lands to A., and by the same will gives something of A.'s to B. Here A. must elect. He must either give effect to the will by allowing B. to have the property which the testator intended should go to him, or, if he chooses to disregard the will and retain his own property, he must make good the value of the gift to the disappointed beneficiary." Bisp. Eq. § 295; see, also, Story, Eq. Jur. § 1076 et seq.; 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 342.

Here the testator has undertaken to dispose of a debt which belonged to Mrs. Fitzhugh. But he has given her the whole of his own estate. Her conscience is therefore affected by the implied condition annexed to the testator's bounty that, while availing herself of the will in one direction, she shall not defeat its operation in another.

The ultimate question in all such cases is this: Did the testator intend that the devisee, upon accepting the benefit conferred upon him, should acquiesce in the donation of the devisee's own property to another? Hence it becomes important to determine how far parol evidence is receivable to manifest such intention. Cage and other witnesses were sworn to prove declarations of the testator that in using the language, "indebtedness to me," he referred to the debt which had been assigned to Mrs. Fitzhugh. In Robinson v. Bishop, 23 Ark. 378, this court expressed its preference to construe wills from their own terms, rather than to take the deposition of the scrivener as to what the testator meant by particular clauses.

Parol evidence is admissible, in this class of causes, to the same extent as in other cases, in aid of the construction of written instruments, and no further. You may show the condition of the subject-matter and the surrounding circumstances, so as to place the court in the position of the testator; but his purpose to put the devisee to his election must appear from the will itself. 2 Redf. Wills, 745.

But as it was in proof that Edward L. Hubbard owed the testator no other debt, the will can have no reasonable construction without including Mrs. Fitzhugh's debt.

The decree below is affirmed.

WILBANKS et al. v. WILBANKS.

(18 Ill. 17.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Nov. Term, 1856.

Error to circuit court, Jefferson county.

The defendant in error filed his bill against the plaintiffs, to enjoin the plaintiffs from prosecuting an action of ejectment against Walter S. Akin and David Rotramel, for the recovery of forty acres of land which the defendant in error claims under the will of his father, Robert A. D. Wilbanks, deceased.

The bill states that R. A. D. Wilbanks, the father, entered the forty acres in the name of his wife, Sarah U. Wilbanks; that she died leaving the plaintiffs in error her heirs at law by her said husband; that the forty acres in dispute were part of the homestead or farm upon which said Wilbanks, the father, and wife resided.

That Wilbanks, the father, married a second time and afterward died, leaving a son, the defendant in error, by his second wife, and made a will bequeathing to his said second wife, for life, the homestead, and at her death willed it to the defendant in error, and that the forty acres were included in the bequest.

That the plaintiffs in error were also provided for, one of them (T. J. Wilbanks) having a specific bequest left to him, of real and personal estate, and that the others were also as to the balance of the real estate of the testator undisposed of, made residuary legatees.

The defendant in error asks that the plaintiffs be enjoined from prosecuting their action at law, for the reason that the intestate, by devising the said tract of land to the defendant, intended to put the plaintiffs off with what he gave them under the will, and that the plaintiffs ought to elect whether they would refund the value of the land or be perpetually enjoined from prosecuting their action at law.

The plaintiffs demurred to the bill generally and specially, and contend that the facts stated in the bill do not warrant the issuance of an injunction against the plaintiffs, because the defendants to the suit at law are not parties; that from the face of the bill they are manifestly proper parties to the proceedings, and for that cause the demurrer ought to have been sustained to the bill; they also contend that the facts stated in the bill do not show a case of election in equity at all, because: 1st, they were residuary legatees; 2d, Wilbanks, the intestate, was tenant by the curtesy, and had an interest in the land in question; 3d, because the testator treated the land as his own property; and, 4th, the forty acres of land in dispute are not described in the will at all, and the court will not supply the defect by implication, from the fact that it was within the boundaries of the land bequeathed to his second wife and the defendant upon her decease.

The demurrer was sustained. The plaintiffs stood by their demurrer; but the court ruled them notwithstanding to answer over, which they refused to do. A decree pro confesso was entered at September term, 1855, of the Jefferson circuit court, and the plaintiffs were perpetually and unconditionally enjoined from prosecuting their suit at law.

The plaintiffs assign for error, the ruling of the court below, on the demurrer, and contend that the demurrer ought to have been sustained to the bill, and that the overruling the demurrer and granting the injunction was erroneous, and that the decree of the court was rendered without any equity whatever to support it; and further, that if the injunction ought to have been awarded at all, it ought to have been awarded on condition of the plaintiff failing to elect.

R. S. Nelson, for plaintiffs in error. D. Baugh, for defendant in error.

SCATES, C. J. The testator in this case disposed of all his estate, both real and personal. The objects of his bounty were exclusively those upon whom the law would have cast the estate in case of intestacy; but whether in the same proportions under the will as at law, does not appear. Whether the provisions of the will are as beneficial as those of the law, or not, the devisees may not therefore disturb or set aside its provisions, unless under circumstances which raise a right of election.

The widow accepted the devise made to her, which barred her dower; and the heirs as such merely could not avoid the provisions of the will, which disposed of the whole estates, real and personal, so far as they belonged to the testator. The legal title to the tract in controversy was not in the testator, but the plaintiffs, his children by a former wife, as heirs to their mother, in whose name the land had been purchased of the United States.

The testator devised this tract to his second wife for life, as a part of his homestead, with remainder to defendant in fee, his son by the second wife.

The object of the bill by defendant is to enjoin the plaintiffs from proceeding in ejectment, to recover the land as heirs at law of their mother, upon the ground that they have devises and bequests made to them by the same will, of which they have accepted, and they cannot, therefore, in equity and conscience be permitted to claim under the will the benefit of the devises and bequests to them, without giving full effect to it in every respect, so far as they are concerned.

We think the circumstances clearly present a case for election (waiving any question of a resulting trust for the husband), and assuming the fact to be as is alleged, that the provisions of the will have been accepted, the plaintiffs are estopped in equity and conscience from all claim to this tract of their own, which is given to the defendant. In the general language of the authorities, they may not, at the same time, take under the will and contrary to it. This was the doctrine of the civil law, from whence, doubtless, we derived the rule. But it seems to have been confined to cases of wills by the civil law, while the rule with us has been extended to deeds and other contracts; and it has been held to be the rule at law as well as in equity.

The intention of the author of the deed or will to dispose of property which is not his, must be manifest; it is difficult to apply the doctrine of election when the testator has some present interest in the estate disposed of, though not entirely his own; for it might be that he intended to dispose only of his own interest. Yet it is a question of intention, which is to prevail, and will be gathered from the terms of the instrument.

An absolute power in the testator to dispose of the subject, and an intention to exercise that power, seems in general sufficient to make a case of election; a devise to the heir, although inoperative, compels him to elect between the estate devised, and claims adverse to the will. The estate descending to the heir under his election to claim against the will, descends subject to the implied condition.

These principles are extracted from Mr. Swanston's note to Dillon v. Parker, 1 Swanst. 394b. The doctrine of election is very fully and comprehensively laid down in that case and note, and in Gratton v. Haward, 1 Swanst. 413, and note c. See also, Noys v. Mordaunt, 2 Vern. 581; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1075-1096; 2 Williams, Ex'rs 1236, section 9 of Election (E) and notes; 1 Rop. Husb. & Wife, 566, note 1; (7 Law Lib. 334.)

It has been suggested that the testator here was tenant by the curtesy of this tract of land, and it should therefore be intended and understood that he devised that interest which belonged to him, and not the fee, which was in his children by his first wife. This view of the devise cannot help or explain away the plain and obvious meaning and intention upon the face of the instrument; and that was to pass the fee in all the lands disposed of in the will. Besides, this would make the will inoperative as to this tract; for the estate by curtesy terminated with the life of the testator, at which time the devise took effect. We cannot indulge in a construction that would defeat the intention, make the provision inoperative, or render the will void. Nor can we indirectly do the same thing by supposing that the testator believed this tract to belong to him; and intended only to dispose of so much as belonged to him. Where such appears to have been the clear intention of the testator to dispose of so much, and no more than he might own, and the particular property was devised or bequeathed under the impression that it belonged to the testator, then, it may be, that the question of repugnancy and election might not arise; but the devisee or legatee might take the interest given, without surrendering his claim to his own property. Still the foundation of the doctrine of election is the intention of the testator. So that when he clearly intends to dispose of the property of another, real or personal, although the will or deed alone and of itself may be ineffectual, inoperative, or void as a conveyance or sale, yet it affords authentic evidence of the intention of the testator or grantor, and that intention shall be made effectual and prevail to transfer the property of one who accepts a benefit under such will or deed. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1077. Indeed, in section 1076, Mr. Justice Story illustrates this doctrine of election by putting a case precisely like that before us. If the testator should devise an estate belonging to his son, or heir at law, to a third person, and should in the same will bequeath to his son, or heir at law, a legacy of one hundred thousand dollars, etc., an implied or constructive election is raised. The son or heir must relinquish his own estate or the bequest under the will.

The party is entitled to a full knowledge of the circumstances, and of the situation and value of the estates or provisions made; and an election made in actual ignorance of material facts will not preclude the party from exercising the right anew upon obtaining full information. This record does not show that the election here was without full knowledge of all material facts.

But admitting that the plaintiffs may yet make a new election, if they claim, by descent and against the will, all the lands and personalty devised and bequeathed to them in the will, they will be liable to make compensation to the disappointed devisee to the extent of the value of the devise intended for him. So that equity will lay hold of the devise or bequest renounced, and substitute compensation for the devise or bequest defeated. See 2 Story, Eq. Jur. and 1 Swanst. above.

Whether by renunciation the party forfeits all interest, as in case of estates upon express conditions, or is entitled to any surplus after full compensation, as seems to be warranted by the current of authorities, is immaterial here, it seems to us. For its loss to defendant from the midst of his homestead tract, would cost plaintiffs more in compensation out of their devises than it could be worth to them thus situated and surrounded. And they cannot now assert their title as heirs to their mother, without making compensation to defendant, out of the devises to them in the will. Decree affirmed.

ROGERS v. JONES.

(3 Ch. Div. 688.)

High Court of Justice. Aug. 3, 1876.

By a marriage settlement dated the 11th of November, 1833, certain messuages and hereditaments (including six cottages in Rhos street, Ruthin) were settled to the use of William Williams for life, with remainder to the use of his wife, Jane Williams, for life, with remainder to the use of the first and other sons of W. Williams in tail, and for default of such issue to the use of his first and other daughters in tail, and for default of such issue to the use of the heirs of the survivor of them, the said W. Williams and Jane Williams.

William Williams, by his will made in 1860, gave to his said wife, Jane Williams, all his real estate during her life, and after her decease he purported to devise "all those six cottages situate in Rhos street" (being part of the property included in the said settlement) to his nephew, Thomas Rogers, his heirs and assigns.

The testator died in 1860 without issue, and his widow, Jane Williams, became absolutely entitled under the settlement to the property therein comprised.

In 1864 Thomas Rogers, not being aware of the settlement, sold and conveyed to the plaintiff his supposed reversionary interest under the testator's will in the said cottages.

In 1875 Jane Williams died, having appointed the defendants, W. D. Jones and R. P. Davies, her executors.

After the death of Jane Williams, the plaintiff first ascertained that she had, in 1872, sold the six cottages in Rhos street to a purchaser for value without notice of the devise in the testator's will.

The plaintiff now brought his action against the executors of Jane Williams, and submitted that he was entitled to be indemnified out of her estate in respect of the loss sustained by him in consequence of the sale of the cottages by the defendant, or that such sale was an election by her to take the cottages against the will of the testator, and that, consequently, the plaintiff, as the person injured by such election, was entitled to receive compensation for such injury out of the other benefits derived by Jane Williams under the will of the testator, for the loss occasioned to the plaintiff by such election, and to have the amount of such benefits ascertained and paid out of her estate.

C. C. Ellis & Co., for plaintiff. F. W. Adams, for defendant.

Chitty, Q. C., and Mr. Romer, for plaintiff. Cookson, Q. C., and Mr. Bradford, for defendant.

JESSEL, M. R. The testator in this case gave his real estate to his wife for her life, with remainder as to six cottages, which did not belong to him, to his nephew Thomas Rogers. At the time of the devise the testator's only interest in these cottages was a life estate under the settlement, with a contingent remainder if he survived his wife.

Under these circumstances a case of election arises. The doctrine of election is this, that if a person whose property a testator affects to give away takes other benefits under the same will, and at the same time elects to keep his own property, he must make compensation to the person affected by his election to an extent not exceeding the benefits he receives. In this case the widow, having elected to take against the will, was bound to make compensation to the plaintiff to the extent of the benefits she received under the will. Therefore, in her lifetime, she might to this extent have been thus made liable.

But it is said that the plaintiff's right to be indemnified is lost by the death of the widow. Why? I see no principle upon which her death should exonerate her estate. The liability of her estate must now be ascertained, and there must be an inquiry as to the amount of the benefits which the widow received in her lifetime under the will, and as to the compensation to which the plaintiff is entitled in respect of the loss he has sustained by not getting possession of the six cottages at the death of the widow, so far as such loss does not exceed her benefits under the will.

The pleadings to be amended by making T. Rogers complainant.

KONVALINKA v. SCHLEGEL et al.

(9 N. E. 868, 104 N. Y. 125.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Jan. 18, 1887.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, second department.

John W. Konvalinka, Henry McCloskey, and W. E. Glover, for appellant, Konvalinka, Ex'r, etc. George Bliss, for respondents, Maria Schlegel and another.

ANDREWS, J. The question is whether the widow of the testator is put to her election between dower and the provision in the will. The estate of the testator consisted of both real and personal property. The will, after directing the payment of the testator's debts and funeral expenses, and after giving to his wife the bedroom furniture in his dwelling-house, and to his children the rest of the furniture therein, proceeds as follows: "All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate, property, and effects of every nature, kind, and description I give, devise, and bequeath to my executors and executrix hereinafter named, and I authorize and direct them to sell and dispose of the same at such time, and on such terms, as to them shall seem best, and to divide the proceeds thereof equally among my wife and children, share and share alike." There can be no controversy as to the general principles governing the question of election between dower and a provision for the widow in the will. Dower is favored. It is never excluded by a provision for a wife except by express words, or by necessary implication. Where there are no express words, there must be, upon the face of the will, a demonstration of the intention of the testator that the widow shall not take both dower and the provision. The will furnishes this demonstration only when it clearly appears, without ambiguity or doubt, that to permit the widow to claim both dower and the provision would interfere with the other dispositions, and disturb the scheme of the testator as manifested by his will. The intention of the testator to put the widow to an election cannot be inferred from the extent of the provision, or because she is devisee under the will for life or in fee, or because it may seem to the court that to permit the widow to claim both the provision and dower would be unjust as a family arrangement; or even because it may be inferred or believed, in view of all the circumstances, that, if the attention of the testator had been drawn to the subject, he would have expressly excluded dower. We repeat, the only sufficient and adequate demonstration which, in the absence of express words, will put the widow to her election, is a clear incompatibility arising on the face of the will between a claim of dower and a claim to the benefit given by the will. We cite a few of the cases in this state showing the general principle, and the wide range of application. Adsit v. Adsit, 2 Johns. Ch. 452; Sanford v. Jackson, 10 Paige, 266; Church v. Bull, 2 Denio, 430; Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502; Fuller v. Yates, 8 Paige, 325; Havens v. Havens, 1 Sandf. Ch. 331; Wood v. Wood, 5 Paige, 599.

In view of these settled rules, we think the widow in this case was not put to her election. The devise to the executors was void as a trust, but valid as a power in trust, for the sale of the lands and a division of the proceeds, and the lands descended to the heirs of the testator subject to the execution of the power. 1 Rev. St. p. 729, § 56; Cooke v. Platt, 98 N. Y. 35.

It is strenuously urged that, the power of sale being peremptory, it worked an equitable conversion of the land into personalty, as of the time of the testator's death, and created a trust in the executors in the proceeds for the purpose of distribution, which trust it is alleged is inconsistent with a claim of dower. The doctrine of equitable conversion, as the phrase implies, is a fiction of equity, which is frequently applied to solve questions as to the validity of trusts; to determine the legal character of the interests of beneficiaries; the devolution of property, as between real and personal representatives; and for other purposes. It seems to be supposed that there is a necessary repugnancy between the existence of a trust in real property created by a will and an outstanding dower interest of a widow in the trust property. We perceive no foundation for this contention. If the purposes of a trust, as declared, require that the entire title, free from the dower interest of the widow, should be vested in the trustees, in order to effectuate the purposes of the testator in creating it, a clear case for an election is presented. Vernon v. Vernon, 53 N. Y. 351. But the mere creation of a trust for the sale of real property, and its distribution, is not inconsistent with the existence of a dower interest in the same property. There is no legal difficulty in the trustee executing the power of sale, but the sale will necessarily be subject to the widow's right of dower, as it would be subject to any outstanding interest in a third person paramount to that of the trustee.

In the cases of Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 577, and Tobias v. Ketchum, 32 N. Y. 327, the widow was put to her election, not because the vesting of the title in trustees was per se inconsistent with a claim for dower, but for the reason that the will made a disposition of the income, and contained other provisions which would be in part defeated if dower was insisted upon. There is language in the latter case which, disconnected from the context, may give color to the contention of the appellant. But it is the principle upon which adjudged cases proceed which is mainly to be looked to, because a correct principle is sometimes mis-

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.—9

Digitized by

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

applied. There is, however, no ground for misapprehension of the meaning of the learned judge in that case, interpreting his language with reference to facts then under consideration.

It has frequently been declared that powers of or in trust for sale are not inconsistent with the widow's right of dower. Gibson v. Gibson, 17 Eng. Law & Eq. 349; Bending v. Bending, 3 Kay & J. 257; Adsit v. Adsit, supra; In re Frazer, 92 N. Y. 239. And it was held in Wood v. Wood, 5 Paige, 596, that the widow was not put to her election, where the testator devised all his property to trustees, with a peremptory power of sale, and directed the payment to the widow of an annuity out of the converted fund. The same conclusion was reached, under very similar circumstances, in Fuller v. Yates, 8 Paige, 325; and in Re Frazer, supra, the widow's dower was held not to be excluded by a provision in the will, although as to a portion of the realty the power of sale given to the executors was peremptory.

The general doctrine is very clearly stated by the vice-chancellor in Ellis v. Lewis, 3 Hare, 310: "I take the law to be clearly settled at this day that a devise of lands eo nomine upon trusts for sale, or a devise of lands eo nomine to a devisee beneficially, does not, per se, express an intention to devise the lands otherwise than subject to its legal incidents, dower included." This remark of the vice-chancellor also answers the claim that the testator, when he described as the subject of the dower, "all the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate," meant the entire title, or the estate as enjoyed by him. A similar argument was answered by Lord Thurlow in Foster v. Cook, 3 Brown, Ch. 347. "Because," he said, "the testator gives all his property to the trustees, I am to gather, from his having given all he has, that he has given that which he has not."

The argument that the testator intended equality of division between his wife and children is also answered by the same consideration. The proceeds of the testator's estate were by the will to be equally distributed. It left untouched the dower of the widow, which he could not sell or authorize to be sold, and which was a legal right not derived from him, and paramount to all others. It may be conjectured, perhaps reasonably inferred, that the testator really intended the provision for his wife to be exclusive of any other interest, but so it is not written in the will, and we are not permitted to yield any force to the suggestion. It is a question of legal interpretation, which has been settled.

The judgment should therefore be affirmed. All concur.

REED v. DICKERMAN.

(29 Pick. 146.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
October Term, 1831.

Writ of dower. The following facts were agreed to by the parties.

Elijah Reed, the late husband of the demandant, died seised in fee of the land described in the writ. On August 8, 1816, he made his last will, containing the following provisions: "I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Lucy Reed, and Alice Reed, my daughter, one-half of my dwelling house where I now live, the southerly part of said house, and the north buttery in said house, during my wife's natural life. Also to my beloved wife I give and bequeath one-half of my indoor movables. I also give and bequeath to my beloved wife one cow, which I order my sons, Solomon and Elijah, to keep for her, or some other in the room of it, free from any expense to her during her natural life. Also I give and bequeath to my wife and my daughter, Alice Reed, one heifer, a year old last spring, and hereby order my two sons, Solomon and Elijah, to be at one-half the expense of keeping said heifer for their mother." The will was proved in September, 1816. Soon after the death of the testator, the demandant selected a cow from the stock on the farm, and that cow, or another instead of it, has ever since been kept on the farm for her by her sons, Solomon and Elijah, and she has had the use of it ever since, until within a year past, when she sold it. A heifer was provided for her and Alice by Solomon and Elijah, and was kept by them for their mother until it died, which happened soon after the probate of the will. The demandant has always, since the death of her husband, been in the possession of the indoor movables. She has always lived in that part of the house which was devised to her, and Alice has lived with her. It appeared by the records of the probate court that in March, 1829, the judge of probate appointed a committee to set off by metes and bounds and define that part of the dwelling house of the testator unto his widow and Alice, which was devised to them for their use during their natural life, together with the cellar, privileges, and appurtenances; and in April, 1829, the committee made a return, showing their performance of the duty required of them. The real estate of the testator was appraised, soon after his death, at $10,529, and the personal at $647, his debts amounted to a sum between $3,000 and $3,600, the real estate given to Alice was worth $900, one-half of the indoor movables was worth $95, and the fee simple of the whole dwelling house was worth between $1,300 and $1,400. A demand was made upon the defendant, on July 5, 1830, to assign dower to the demandant.

On the foregoing facts, or such of them as would be admissible in evidence on a trial before a jury, and on such inferences as may be legally made from them, the case was submitted to the court, and if, in the opinion of the court, the demandant was entitled to recover, the defendant was to be defaulted; but otherwise, the demandant was to become nonsuit.

Mr. Eddy, for demandant. W. Baylies and Mr. Miller, for tenant.

MORTON, J. The demandant is clearly entitled to recover her dower, unless she is barred by the provision made for her in the will of Elijah Reed. In that is given to her a freehold estate in a part of the dwelling house of the deceased, and also certain personal property. The will contains no declaration of the testator's intention, whether this was to be in lieu of, or in addition to, the dower of his widow.

By St. 1783, c. 24, § 8, "the widow, in all cases, may waive the provision made for her in the will of her deceased husband, and claim her dower, and have the same assigned her in the same manner as though her husband had died intestate, in which case she shall receive no benefit from such provision, unless it appears by the will plainly the testator's intention to be in addition to her dower." This is a material alteration of a rule of the common law applicable to this case. By that rule a devise or bequest to a widow is presumed to be in addition to her dower, unless it clearly appears that it was the intention of the testator that it should be in lieu of dower.

The wife has a legal interest in her husband's estate, of which she cannot be divested without her own consent. After his death she is legally entitled to dower, unless by some act of her own during his lifetime she has barred her right, or after his decease voluntarily relinquished that right. A bequest or devise is deemed a bounty, and not the payment or satisfaction of a pre-existing debt or obligation. A gratuity cannot extinguish a legal right; hence the common-law rule that a donation in a will does not operate as an extinguishment of the right of dower, but is presumed to be a gratuity in addition to the existing legal right, but a donation may be made on a condition, and that condition may as well be the relinquishment of the right of dower as the performance of any other act, and if a donation in a will be made on the express condition that dower shall not be claimed, or, if it clearly appear from the will that it was the intention of the testator that the widow should not have both the donation and the dower, then the donation shall be taken to be in lieu of dower, and the widow cannot hold both. She may have her election. She cannot claim under the will and adversely to it; but she is not thereby divested of her right of dower, but may have her election between her dower and the provision made for her in the will.

By the clause of our statute just quoted, this presumption of law is reversed, and the provision in the will is deemed to be in lieu of dower, unless it plainly appears that the testator intended it to be in addition to it.

In this case there is no express declaration that the testamentary provision was intended to be in addition to dower, nor can any such intention be inferred from all the will taken together. The inadequacy of the provision alone will not justify such an inference.

The plaintiff must therefore take the devise and bequests in the will, unless she seasonably elected to waive them. The statute seems to presume an acceptance. There is some positive act to be done by the widow, indicating her election, before she can be entitled to dower. The demand required to be made thirty days before an action can be commenced might be considered an election, where no election had previously been made.

Within what time shall a widow be holden to waive the provision made for her in the will, or to be bound by it? In New York, the widow shall be deemed to have elected to take the testamentary provision, unless she enters upon or commences a suit for her dower within one year after her husband's death. In Virginia, she is allowed nine months, and in Vermont only sixty days, in which to make her election; and, on failure to do it, she is confined to her dower at common law. Our statute has not fixed any precise time for the election; but doubtless the widow would be holden to have accepted the testamentary provision, unless she waived it in a reasonable time, that the settlement of the estate might be closed and distribution made among the heirs. What shall be deemed a reasonable time, not being fixed by statute, cannot be accurately defined by any general rule, and need not now be discussed. For we are all of opinion that, under the circumstances of this case, the demandant is precluded from waiving the provisions of the will and claiming dower.

Fourteen years elapsed after the probate of the will before any demand of dower was made. During the whole of this time she occupied the real estate which was devised to her. The personal property bequeathed to her was received by her, and some of it has been disposed of by her. The benefit of the other provision in the will in her favor had been enjoyed by her. A decree of the probate court has been made, assigning to her by definite bounds that part of the real estate which was devised to her; and the whole estate has passed out of the hands of the original devisees. We think, after all this, it is too late for the widow to waive the provision made for her in the will and claim her dower.

It is true that in equity the widow may sometimes be relieved from an improvident election; but this can only be done where some deception or fraud was practiced upon her, or at least where she acted under an ignorance of the facts or a misapprehension of her legal rights. But here is no evidence of any deception, or misapprehension, or even ignorance of the circumstances of the case. The plaintiff chose to regard and carry into effect the provisions and directions contained in her husband's will. No desire to avoid it on her part was known to exist till many years after the death of her husband, and not until the estate had passed from her family into the hands of strangers. We are entirely clear that she cannot now change her determination, waive the provisions of the will, and claim her dower.

STRONG v. WILLIAMS.

(12 Mass. 391.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
1815.

PUTNAM, J. delivered the opinion of the court.

The general rule anciently established in chancery was, that when a testator being indebted gave to his creditor a legacy equal to, or exceeding the amount of his debt, the legacy should be considered as a satisfaction for the debt. The rule has been acknowledged in later cases, but with marks of disapprobation, and a disposition to restrain its operation in all cases where, from circumstances to be collected from the will, it might be inferred that the testator had a different intention. Haynes v. Mico, 1 Bro. Cha. Ca. 131. Thus where the testator left a sufficient estate, it was determined that he was to be presumed to have been kind as well as just. So if the legacy was of a less sum than the debt; or of a different nature; or upon conditions; or not equally beneficial in some one particular, although more so in another.

All the cases agree that the intention of the testator ought to prevail; and that, prima facie at least, whatever is given in a will is to be intended as a bounty. But by later cases the courts have not been disposed to understand the testator as meaning to pay a debt, when he declares that he makes a gift; unless the circumstances of the case should lead to a different conclusion.

Thus in the case cited for the plaintiff, Brown v. Dawson, 2 Vern. 498, where the wife joined in the sale of her jointure, and the husband gave her a note of 7*l.* 10*s.* per annum for her life; and afterwards upon another such sale he gave her a bond for 6*l.* 10*s.* per annum for her life; and he afterwards made his will, and gave her 14*l.* per annum for life: the legacy was adjudged to be a satisfaction for the note and bond. Here it will be perceived that the annuity given in the will amounted exactly to the sums secured by the bond and note: and the presumption of satisfaction proceeded upon the similitude of the legacy to the debt. 2 Fonbl. 330, in notis. So in the case of Fowler v. Fowler, 3 P. Will. 353, the general rule was applied. There the husband, being indebted to the wife for arrears due by the marriage settlement, gave her a larger legacy by the will: and it was held a satisfaction of the debt. But it is to be observed that lord chancellor Talbot expressed great dissatisfaction with the rule: and it does not appear that any circumstances could be found, to take the case out of its general application. In that case the court refused parole evidence, to prove that the testator intended both should be paid.

But cases of this nature must depend upon the circumstances: and there must be a strong presumption, to induce a belief that the testator intended the legacy as a payment, and not as a bounty. 2 Fonbl. 332. Thus where the testatrix had given her servant a bond for 20*l.* free of taxes for her life, and afterwards made her will and gave the servant 20*l.* per annum payable half yearly, but said nothing about the taxes, the court held that both should be paid. Atkinson v. Webb, 2 Vern. 478.—Here the legacy, being not quite so beneficial as the debt, did not raise a presumption that it was intended as a payment.

So where the testator having sufficient assets, and having manifested great kindness for the legatee, gave a legacy of a greater amount than he owed, it was holden by lord chancellor Cowper, that the testator might be presumed to be kind as well as just: and he decreed the payment of the legacy as well as the debt. Cuthbert v. Peacock, 1 Salk. 155. It has been holden that a legacy for a less sum than the debt shall never be taken as satisfaction; 2 Salk. 508; and that specific things devised are never to be considered as satisfaction of a debt, unless so expressed. 2 Eq. Ca. Abr. title Devises pl. 21, cited Bac. Abr. Legacies D.

So the circumstance, that the testator had devised "that all his debts and legacies should be paid," was holden sufficient to take the case out of the general rule: as where the testator, indebted to his maid servant 100*l.*, by bond for wages, afterwards gave her 500*l.* lord chancellor King decreed that both should be paid, as the testator had made provision for the payment of his debts. 1 P. Will. 408, 409, vide note.

So where it appeared that the legatee had lived with the testatrix as a servant for twenty or thirty years, and she had given her a bond for 260*l.* and in one month afterwards she made her will and gave her 500*l.*: and in another clause she gave the rest of her servants 5*l.* apiece, but not to Jane Greese, the legatee; "because," said the testatrix, "I have done well for her before;" and she also made provision for her debts and legacies. Lord Hardwicke thought the circumstances above stated took the case out of the general rule, and decreed the legacy to be no satisfaction for the debt. Richardson v. Greese, 3 Atk. 65; Nicholls v. Judson, S. P., 2 Atk. 301; Clark v. Sewell, S. P., 3 Atk. 97.

So where the testator was indebted for goods on an open account, a legacy for a larger sum was not held a satisfaction: because he might not know whether he was indebted or not; and therefore no presumption was to arise, that he intended merely to pay a debt. Powel's Case, 1 P. Will. 299; 10 Mod. Case No. 201, p. 398.

In the case at bar, the consideration for the legacy appears from the will to have been for the services of the legatee. A presumption that the legacy was intended to be a satisfaction of the bond also, must rest on the fact that the bond was given for the same services: of which fact there is no evidence before us. It may have been for a different cause. We can only presume that it was for a lawful one.

It appears also from the will, that the testator intended his debts and legacies should be paid, before his residuary legatees should take any thing. The pecuniary legacy to the plaintiff also is not so much as the debt; and therefore cannot be considered as a payment of it. Neither is there any declaration of the testator, that the specific articles given should be considered as a satisfaction of the debt. It appears also that there are sufficient assets.

From a consideration of the principles and decisions applicable to this case, we are therefore all of opinion that the plaintiff ought to recover.

Defendant defaulted.

DEICHMAN v. ARNDT.

(22 Atl. 799, 49 N. J. Eq. 106.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. 26, 1891.

Action by Deichman against Arndt for the construction of a will.

Charles A. Fitch, for complainant. Wm. M. Davis, for defendant.

BIRD, V. C. By the bill in this case the complainant asks the aid of the court in determining the true construction of the last will of Ann Arndt, deceased, and consequently the rights of the legatees and devisees under said will. At the time of her death and of the making of her will she was the owner of a lot of land with a dwelling thereon, in which she resided. Before the making of her will she gave a bond to William M. Davis, the guardian of Harry King Arndt, one of her infant children, conditioned for the payment of $500, with interest. To secure this bond she gave a mortgage upon said house and lot. By her will she devises this house and lot to her son Harry in the following language: "I give to my son Harry King Arndt, absolutely, to be held in trust, however, by my executor hereinafter named, the dwelling-house and lot where-in I now reside, situate on Main street, in Phillipsburg, N. J., until he arrives at the age of twenty-one (21) years; my executor to rent the same, collect the rent, pay all taxes, insurance, services, and repairs, and the balance remaining to be used for the support and maintenance of my son Harry King Arndt, hereinbefore named." Two questions are presented in the bill for consideration, viz.: Is the devise to be regarded as a payment and discharge of the bond, and is the gift to Harry an absolute fee? In this case the testatrix in clear language directs that all of her debts be paid as soon as conveniently can be after her decease. She makes disposition of her personal estate, including bank-stock, giving a portion thereof to her daughter, a portion to another son, and a portion to the said Harry. The division of this personal property is not equal, but the extent of inequality is not made apparent. She first gives to her daughter certain household furniture; and, in the second place, to her son Frank certain household furniture; and, in the third place, makes the devise of the house and lot to Harry. She then provides for the protection of her cemetery lot, and gives the three children all of her silver-ware. Immediately after this she directs her executor to sell "the balance of my household effects," and to divide the proceeds thereof between her three children, directing him, however, to hold the share of Harry until he arrives at the age of 21 years. Then she directs her executors to collect the dividends of her 19 shares of bank-stock, and to pay the same towards the support and maintenance of Harry until he arrives at the age of 21 years, at which last-mentioned date he is authorized to sell the said stock and divide the proceeds between her three children. Notwithstanding this last provision, she authorizes her executor to sell all the said shares of bank-stock at such time or times as he shall think fit, and to invest the proceeds, and pay the interest thereof for the support and maintenance of her son Harry until he arrives at the age of 21 years. She then directs that the residue of her estate, "consisting principally of bonds and mortgages and notes, money and stock, should be divided equally between my three children, share and share alike, my executor, however, retaining that portion falling to my son Harry King Arndt until he arrives at the age of twenty-one years." From this it appears that the testatrix was indebted to the guardian of her son in the sum of $500: that she made her said son both devisee and legatee, imposing a condition upon the devise that the executor should receive the rents and profits until the son arrives at the age of 21 years, for his support and maintenance, and a like condition upon the gift of the legacy; and that, as the matter stands, both the devise and the legacy are of uncertain value. Where there is nothing to show a contrary intention upon the part of the testator, and he directs the payment of his debts, the gift of a legacy is never presumed to have been given for the purpose of discharging a debt due from the testator to the legatee. Van Riper v. Van Riper, 2 N. J. Eq. 1, Heisler v. Sharp, 44 N. J. Eq. 167, 14 Atl. Rep. 624; Rusling v. Rusling, 42 N. J. Eq. 594, 8 Atl. Rep. 534; Chancey's Case, 1 P. Wms. 408, 410, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. 752, notes, 820; Reynolds v. Robinson, 82 N. Y. 103; Boughton v. Flint, 74 N. Y. 477; In re Huish, 43 Ch. Div. 260. The courts so little favor the discharge of debts by legacies that they have uniformly laid hold of slight circumstances to overcome the presumption that payment was intended independently of the direction to pay debts. Hence, when the gift has been of land or of goods and chattels, or upon conditions unfavorable to the donee when compared with the present discharge of the debt, the payment of both has been required. 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. 821. "Money and land being things of a different kind, the one, though of greater value, shall never be taken in satisfaction of the other, unless so expressed." "Whatever is given by will is prima facie to be intended a benevolence." Eastwood v. Vinke, 2 P. Wms. 613, 616. In this case the court remarked: "But, though the court has gone so far, it never yet construed a devise of land to be a satisfaction for a debt of money." In Bryant v. Hunter, 3 Wash. C. C. 48, Fed. Cas. No. 2,068, WASHINGTON, J., says: "The general rule is that a devise of land is not a satisfaction or part performance of an agreement to pay money." See, also, Eaton v. Benton, 2 Hill, 576, 580. The bond in this case being for the payment of money, and the gift being land, the construction must necessarily be controlled by the cases cited. It can make no difference that the payment of the bond was secured by mortgage on the land devised. It cannot be doubted but that the gifts of goods and chattels and proceeds of bank-stock and residue by the testatrix to her son Harry are alike subject to the same conditions that govern with respect to the devise of land. According to all of the cases there is no similitude whatever between those gifts and the obligation which the testatrix had directed her executor to pay.

I have not thought it necessary to put any stress upon the fact that both the bond and the mortgage were given to the guardian of the devisee and legatee. It has been suggested that if this bond be paid to the guardian of Harry, Harry's proportion of the estate of the testatrix will be much larger than the portion received by his brother and sister. This would be an important consideration if it were the duty of courts to construe wills so as to make an equal disposition of the estate disposed of thereby among legatees and devisees, irrespective of the directions of the will. There is nothing in this will to give any certain assurance to the court that the testatrix intended to make an equal disposition of her estate among her children. If there be any inequality in the value of the gifts, the testatrix may have had very good reason therefor; but, whether she had or not, she had a lawful right to make any distinction she chose. This bond must be first paid out of the personal estate, as other debts, before the payment of any of the legacies.

The next question presented for consideration is whether or not the interest devised to Harry be less than the fee-simple absolute. When the sentence making the devise to Harry is read, if there be any doubt as to the extent of the interest devised, such doubt will be dissipated upon careful reflection. The testatrix first declares that she gives him the premises absolutely, but afterwards gives such directions as at first view would seem to have been intended as a qualification to the extent of limiting his interest to the rents and profits until he arrives at the age of 21 years. But when this sentence and this apparent qualification are read in connection with the succeeding clauses in the will, by which gifts are made to Harry, the doubt is removed. She ordered the silver to be divided between her three children; but Harry's interest in other personal property and in the bank-stock and in the residue of the personal property is to be retained by the executor, and the interest and dividends paid to Harry, until he arrives at the age of 21 years, when he is entitled to the possession of the principal. From the control given to the executor over the interest of Harry until he arrive at the age of 21 years the testatrix in all probability intended to provide against the necessity of appointing a guardian for him. In my judgment the fee-simple absolute vested in Harry.

DEWITT v. YATES.

(10 Johns. 156.)

Supreme Court of New York. May, 1813.

This was an action of debt for a legacy. The cause was tried at the Saratoga circuit in September, 1812. Peter Yates, by his last will, dated the 15th of August, 1807, bequeathed as follows: "Item, I give to my daughter Maria's children, of her body, two hundred and fifty pounds; if any of the five children should de cease before my de cease, or after, the parts of the de ceased shall come to the then living; each of them is to have fifty pounds when they come of age, or when they or either of them should marry."

In a subsequent part of the will, the testator having devised the half of a farm, etc., to his son-in-law, Philip Vanderbergh, and his wife, and the other half to his wife, etc., directs as follows: "In consideration of which, it is my will, and I do hereby order, that the said Philip Vanderbergh, his heirs, etc., shall pay to the children of my said daughter Maria, to wit, Sarah (the wife of the plaintiff), John, Maria, Catalina, and Catharine, the sum of two hundred and fifty pounds, equal to 625 dollars, to be paid unto them and each of them, in sums of fifty pounds, as they respectively shall arrive at the age of 21 years, or on the day that they or either of them shall marry," and appointed the defendant and three others his executors.

It was proved that Philip Vanderbergh, the devisee, in October, 1807, paid to the plaintiffs the 50 pounds given to Sarah, the wife of the plaintiff, and named in the second clause of the will.

It was admitted that a year had elapsed since the death of the testator; that the plaintiffs had duly demanded payment of the legacy, mentioned in the first clause, of the defendant, previous to the commencement of the suit, and had tendered and filed a bond according to the directions of the statute; and that the defendant had assets in his hands, after payment of all debts and other legacies, sufficient to pay the legacy in question.

The defendant offered a witness to prove that, before and at the time the testator made his will, he expressed his intention to give one legacy to the children of his daughter Maria, and that was the legacy directed to be paid by Philip Vanderbergh; but the evidence was objected to, and overruled by the judge.

A verdict was taken for the plaintiffs, subject to the opinion of the court, on a case made.

Mr. Huntington, for plaintiffs. Mr. Skinner, for defendant.

KENT, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court. This is the case of a sum of money given twice in the same instrument to the same legatee. The general rule on this subject, from a review of the numerous cases, appears evidently to be that where the sum is repeated in the same writing the legatee can take only one of the sums bequeathed. The latter sum is held to be a substitution, and they are not taken cumulatively, unless there be some evident intention that they should be so considered, and it lays with the legatee to show that intention and rebut the contrary presumption; but where the two bequests are in different instruments, as by will in the one case and by a codicil in the other, the presumption is in favor of the legatee, and the burden of contesting that presumption is cast upon the executor. The presumption either way, whether against the cumulation because the legacy is repeated in the same instrument, or whether in favor of it because the legacy is by different instruments, is liable to be controlled and repelled by internal evidence, and the circumstances of the case. Godol. Leg. p. 3, c. 26, § 46; Swinb. pt. 7, c. 21, § 13; Duke of St. Albans v. Beauchamp, 2 Atk. 636; Garth v. Meyrick, 1 Brown, Ch. 30; Ridges v. Morrison, Id. 389; Hooley v. Hatton, Id. 390, note; Wallop v. Hewett, 2 Ch. R. 37; Newport v. Kinaston, Id. 58; James v. Semmens, 2 H. Bl. 214; Allen v. Callen, 3 Ves. Jun. 289; Barclay v. Wainwright, Id. 462; Osborne v. Duke of Leeds, 5 Ves. 369. This question, which appears to have arisen so often and to have been so learnedly and ably discussed in the English courts, was equally familiar to the civil law. The same rule existed there, and subject to the same control. Dig. 30, 1, 34; Dig. 22, 3, 12; and the notes of Gothofrede, Id.; Voet, Con. ad Pand. tom. 2, 408, s. 34. And Chancellor D'Aguesseau, in his pleadings in the Case of the Heirs of Vaugermain (Oeuvres, tom. 2, 21), adopts and applies the same rule to a case arising under the French law. The civil law puts the case altogether upon the point of the testator's intention; but then, if the legacy was repeated in the same instrument, it required the highest and strongest proof to accumulate it. Evidentissimis probationibus ostendatur testatorem multiplicasse legatum voluisse.

In the present case, what are the intrinsic circumstances to show a manifest intent of the testator to multiply the legacy? The only material variation in the two bequests is that, in the latter instance, the legacy was charged upon Philip Vanderbergh in respect of the real estate to him devised; but this affords no evidence of an intention to accumulate. The inference is the other way. It was only strengthening the security of the legacy by means of the charge. There was no specified object. There was no assigned reason or cause, as respected the legatees, for repeating the bequest. Courts have required some new or additional cause for enlarging the bounty before they have held it accumulative, unless the words of the will clearly showed the intent. In a will, the testator gave double legacies to his daughters, but he added, in those cases, that they were "in addition" to what he had before given; and the master of the rolls, in Barclay v. Wainwright, said that he laid considerable stress upon this, that where the testator meant addition he expressed it. The whole will denotes throughout a careful and studied apportionment of the testator's estate among his children, according to his opinion of their wants and circumstances; and he imposed several trusts and charges, probably with a view to greater accuracy in the partition of his estate. He appoints four sons executors, but he charges his funeral expenses upon three, and his debts upon two, of them. A small variation in the direction as to payment will not alter the construction. In Halford v. Wood, 4 Ves. 76, the legacy was an annuity of £30 for life, and in the one instance it was declared to be payable quarterly, and in the other instance the will was silent as to the payment, and yet it was not held accumulative. So, also, in Greenwood v. Greenwood, 1 Brown, Ch. 31, note, the one legacy was simply to Mary Cook, but the other was to Mary Cook "for her own use and disposing, notwithstanding her coverture"; and yet Lord Bathurst decreed that she was entitled to one legacy only.

As, then, the substituted legacy in this case has been paid by the devisee, on whom it was charged, the defendant is entitled to judgment.

Judgment for the defendant.

EDWARDS et al. v. RAINIER'S EX'RS.
(17 Ohio St. 597.)

Supreme Court of Ohio. Dec. Term, 1867.

Error to court of common pleas, Pickaway county. Reserved in the district court.

The original petition was filed by the executors of Isaac Rainier, deceased, against his devisees and legatees, on the 3d day of June, 1864, in the court of common pleas of Pickaway county, to obtain a construction of the will of said deceased.

The will is dated September 8, 1860, to which a codicil is added, dated December 4, 1861. The testator died March 25, 1863, and his will was admitted to probate April 29, 1863, and is as follows:

"(1) I will that all my just debts and funeral charges be paid.

"(2) I give and bequeath to Mary Rainier, my much-esteemed wife, in lieu of her right of dower, thirty acres of land during her natural life, and bounded as follows: * * * Out of the farm on which I now reside, situated in Madison township, Pickaway county. And I also give to my wife all the household and kitchen furniture of every description, except what is hereafter willed. And I also give to my wife five hundred dollars in cash; and I also give her my sorrel mare Fly, and my top buggy, with the harness belonging thereto. And my said wife is to have sufficient timber of any part of said quarter section, for the use and support of her said dower, together with fuel sufficient for fire. And the widow may select what books she may think proper for her own use, except those hereafter willed.

"(3) I give and bequeath to my daughter Sarah A. Edwards, wife of Stephen S. Edwards, all notes I hold against Stephen S. Edwards, of every description whatever, up to the first day of November, 1852; and I also give to my daughter, Sarah A. Edwards, fifteen hundred dollars in cash.

"(4) I give and bequeath to my son Isaac Rainier the use, occupation, and enjoyment of the northwest quarter of section eleven, in Violet township, Fairfield county, Ohio, to have and to hold during his natural life, and then to his heirs.

"(5) I give and bequeath to my daughter Hester Ann Adell the use, occupation, and enjoyment of the northeast quarter of section number fourteen, situate in Violet township, Fairfield county, and state of Ohio, to have and to hold during her natural life, and then to her heirs, subject to the dower of my wife, Mary Rainier. And the said Hester Ann Adell, wife of George Adell, is to pay to my daughter Sarah A. Edwards, wife of Stephen S. Edwards, one thousand dollars in money, in the following payments, to wit, one hundred dollars per year. The first payment to be made one year after my death, and if the said Hester Ann Adell should fail to make the above payments as required, and should it become necessary to sell any portion of the land, it is my will it shall be taken off the west side, not to exceed thirty acres."

(6) In this item the testator gives to his son John F. Rainier the northwest quarter of section number fourteen, in Madison township, "subject to the widow's dower above written"; and he also gives him "the horse power wood saw, and all the reaping and mowing machines, and all wagons and farming utensils of every description whatever, and all the stock of every kind (except two cows, which I leave to the widow, she having choice); also Clerk's Commentaries on the Old and New Testament, six volumes, Webster's Unabridged Dictionary, and all the books belonging to me not taken by the widow; and I also give to my son John F. Rainier all mechanic tools of every kind whatever, and one bedstead, bed, and bedding."

(7) In this item he gives to his daughter Mary E. Pontius, wife of Franklin G. Pontius, the northwest half of the northeast quarter of section eleven, in Violet township, and "five hundred dollars in money, including a duebill" of $82 against said Franklin G. Pontius.

"(8) I give and bequeath to my niece Almira Ebright one bedstead, bed, and bedding; and I also give to Almira Ebright one hundred dollars in money, provided she continues to live with the family until she arrives at the age of eighteen years, if there should be that amount remaining after paying off the other legatees as above given.

"If the widow should see proper to marry again, she then shall forfeit her interest in my real estate, and my daughter Hester Ann Adell and my son John F. Rainier shall pay, each of them, two hundred and fifty dollars in lieu thereof.

"All the above legacies to be paid in two years after my decease, or as soon after as can be collected."

The testator appointed John F. Rainier and George Adell executors of his will.

By the codicil, the testator gave the northwest quarter of section eleven, in Violet township, to John F. Rainier and George Adell in trust for Isaac Rainier for life, and then to his heirs, and revoked all right that Isaac had in the foregoing will except as expressed in the codicil.

He gives to John all the household furniture after the death of his wife, and adds the following clause: "And it is my will that each my several children shall have all the growing and matured crops that may be (on) the different tracts of land that I have willed to them as above written."

It was claimed by the executors that the sum of $1,000, mentioned in the fifth item of the will, was intended to be a part payment of the sum of $1,500 bequeathed in the third item to Sarah A. Edwards; while the latter claimed that said sum of $1,000 was a legacy to her in addition to the sum of $1,500. The executors aver that the personalty is insufficient to pay said legacy unless said sum of $1,000 be applied for that purpose; but Mrs. Edwards answers that the personalty was sufficient when the will was executed, and that if there is not now enough it is because it was expended in improvements on the real estate. This is not denied by reply.

The executors claim the corn in cribs, on the lands devised as aforesaid, at the time of the testator's decease; but the same is claimed by the respective devisees of the land on which the corn was grown and matured, and on which the cribs were severally located.

The court of common pleas decreed that the will be construed to give to Sarah A. Edwards a legacy of $1,500 only; that the sum of $1,000 mentioned in the fifth clause is a fund for the part payment thereof, and not an additional legacy; that the corn in the cribs passed to the executors, and not to the devisees; and that the sum of $500 given to the widow is a debt in lieu of dower, and not a legacy.

To reverse this decree a petition in error was filed in the district court, which was there reserved for decision in this court.

The following are the assignments of error:

(1) There was error in finding that the legacy to Sarah A. Edwards was a legacy of $1,500 only, and not a legacy or legacies of $2,500.

(2) There was error in finding that the corn named in the petition as being in the cribs on the land of Isaac is not embraced in the provisions of the will, but belongs to the executors.

(3) There was error in finding that the sum of $500 to the widow is a debt in lieu of dower, and not a legacy.

(4) General assignment of errors.

C. N. Olds, for plaintiffs. Henry F. Page, for defendants.

DAY, C. J. We are called upon, under this proceeding in error, to determine whether the court of common pleas correctly construed the will of Isaac Rainier, deceased. No bill of exceptions was taken in that court embodying the evidence there given, and, so far as evidence was admissible to aid in the construction of the will, it may be presumed to have been before the court. At most, however, the evidence could only inform the court of all the circumstances that surrounded the testator, to aid it in determining the meaning the testator intended should be given to the words he used in the will.

With this presumption in favor of the judgment below, we are left to construe the will by the language used therein, aided only, on the principal question, by a fact conceded by the pleadings, that the testator, when he executed the will, had personal property sufficient to fill all the legacies upon the largest construction of the bequests.

It is claimed by the executors that the sum of $1,000, to be paid by Mrs. Adell to Mrs. Edwards, is to be applied on the legacy to her of $1,500, and is not to be regarded as a legacy in addition to that sum.

Mrs. Edwards claims that it was the intention of the testator to give her both sums.

Here arises the principal question presented for our consideration: Was the $1,000 intended by the testator to be an additional benefit or legacy to Mrs. Edwards?

The books afford us but little aid in the solution of this question: for, in the language of Chief Justice Hornblower in Jones v. Creveling's Ex'rs, 19 N. J. Law, 127: "After a careful examination of the cases cited on the argument and of many others, I am satisfied, notwithstanding all the nice distinctions that have been taken by courts of law and courts of equity upon the subject of single or cumulative legacies, we must come down to the plain common-sense question of what was the intention of the testator."

Chief Justice Kent, after much research, arrived at substantially the same result in De Witt v. Yates, 10 Johns. 156. Although he recognizes the general rule that, where the sum is repeated in the same writing, the presumption is against the legatee, and that where the two bequests are in different instruments the presumption is in his favor, he adds: "The presumption either way, whether against the cumulation, because the legacy is repeated in the same instrument, or whether in favor of it, because the legacy is by different instruments, is liable to be controlled and repelled by internal evidence, and the circumstances of the case."

The general rule is stated in an English treatise to be that, where two legacies are given by the same testamentary instrument of equal amount, courts infer an intention in the testator to give but one legacy; and that, "where the legacies given by the same testamentary instrument to the same person are of different amounts, the legacy shall be considered accumulative." Rop. Leg. *996, *998.

If the $1,000 was in the form of a direct bequest, these authorities might aid us in arriving at a conclusion; but the real question is whether that sum was intended to be in part payment of a legacy already expressly given in the will; if not, the question is settled, for it is clear that the testator intended Mrs. Edwards should have the money. If he did not intend that it should apply in part payment of the $1,500, it is equally clear that he intended it should be an additional legacy.

The only question then is whether the testator intended that Mrs. Edwards should receive the sum of $1,000, to be paid to her as directed in the fifth item of the will, in part payment of the legacy he had given her in the third.

The intention of the testator in relation to this "is to be gathered from the phraseology of the will itself, and, to arrive at this intention, it is necessary to look into the entire instrument." Williams v. Veach, 17 Ohio, 180; Beckwith v. Moore, 14 Ohio St. 129; Brasher v. Marsh, 15 Ohio St. 103.

Let us then look at the will. We search in vain for any expression of a purpose that the $1,000 should be applied in part satisfaction of the legacy bequeathed in the third item of the will. There is no language used in the instrument from which such an intention can fairly be implied. It would have been most natural, in a matter of so much importance, to have indicated that the $1,000 was to be paid to Mrs. Edwards, to apply on the legacy before given to her, if such was the intention of the testator. If he intended to make the mode of paying this legacy of $1,500 to differ so widely from that of paying all the other legacies in his will, it is singular that he did not add to the gift of "fifteen hundred dollars in cash" some words indicating such a purpose, or else have done so in connection with the direction that a $1,000 should be paid to the legatee of the $1,500. This strikes us with the more surprise, if such was his intention, since in other parts of his will, in matters of less importance, he is sufficiently explicit. Where he directs two of his legatees to pay money to his widow in the contingency of her marriage, he specifies that it shall be "in lieu" of her interest in his real estate. In the second item he gives his wife all the household and kitchen furniture, except what is "hereafter willed"; she is also to have such books as she may select, "except those hereafter willed"; and in the sixth clause he devises land subject to the widow's dower "above written." While thus explicit in minor matters, if such was his purpose he would naturally have added to the legacy of $1,500, or to the requirement to pay the legatee of that amount the sum of $1,000, some words indicating a purpose to have the latter sum applied on the former.

Nor was it at all singular, as contended in argument, that the testator did not embrace in the third item all he intended to give his daughter Mrs. Edwards, but left a part to be inserted in the fifth.

After providing for his wife in the second clause, it would seem that he makes a further provision for her in the fifth, in relation to the real estate; clearly, in the sixth, he gives her some property in addition to that bequeathed to her in the second. Moreover, there are obvious reasons, if he did intend to give the $1,000 in addition to the $1,500, why he should insert that gift in the clause we find it, and no particular reason why both gifts should be inserted in one item of the will. One was a general legacy; the other was to be paid by a particular person, and at particular times, and is in a clause naming the person to pay it, and providing the means of securing payment. It would have been more certain, doubtless, if the testator had added, in the fifth item, for what purpose he directed the sum of $1,000 to be paid to Mrs. Edwards, whether as payment on the legacy already given to her, or in addition thereto. He did, however, take care to express a purpose that the money should be paid by Mrs. Adell to Mrs. Edwards; and there he leaves it in her hands, without any intimation but that he intended it should be fully and unconditionally her property; certainly there is no intimation that he intended it to diminish the amount of the legacy before given to her.

Nor can the failure to express any purpose to have the $1,000 applied on the legacy of $1,500 be the result of haste, for the testator lived two years and a half after he made the will; neither was it the result of accident or oversight, for he carefully revised his will, more than a year after its execution, as is shown by the codicil then added thereto.

While, then, we fail to find in the will anything from which it can fairly be inferred that the testator intended the $1,000 should be applied in reduction of the legacy of $1,500, is it not clearly inferable from the will that he intended it should be in addition thereto?

In Creveling's Ex'rs v. Jones, 21 N. J. Law, 576, it is said: "Upon a question whether two legacies shall be construed to be cumulative or not, a fair and forcible argument in support of the increase may be drawn from the fact that they are for different sums; or the sums are stated in different sections of the will; or one in the will and another in a codicil; or the sums are made payable at different times, or out of different funds."

We find in this will nearly all these indices of cumulative legacies. But if we seek to find the intent of the testator, I think it may be clearly discovered if we give to the language he has used in the will its natural and ordinary meaning, and give to every part of the instrument its just operation and effect. 1 Redf. Wills, 431.

The testator concludes his will by directing "all the above legacies to be paid in two years" after his decease. This embraces the whole $1,500, as much as any part of it. It is a direction to his executors not to pay part of any legacy, but "all." This direction applies only to the legacies to be paid by the executors, and not to the amount to be paid by one legatee to another. In such cases the testator not only specifies the amount to be paid, but the person to pay it, and in every instance it is to be paid in consideration of real estate devised. The executors have no more to do, for aught that appears in the will, with the amount to be paid by Mrs. Adell to Mrs. Edwards, than they have with the several amounts to be paid by other devisees to the widow in case of her marriage.

The sum directed to be paid by Mrs. Adell to Mrs. Edwards is a matter that the testator has left entirely between them, and not as a legacy that the executors are called upon to settle out of the personalty; therefore they are directed to pay "all" the legacies in two years, and the sum to be paid by one daughter to the other is left upon a different security, and to be divided into payments that are to run for longer periods. Moreover, upon the other construction, the executors might not know for years, beyond the time limited for the payment of legacies, what amount to pay on the $1,500, for they could not know how much Mrs. Adell would pay, or, if she failed to pay, how much the land charge would sell for.

If the clear and plain directions of the testator in his will be executed, there will be no difficulty; the executors will pay "all" the legacies in two years, and the annual payments due from Mrs. Adell will be paid every year for ten years; then the intent of the testator, as expressed by the language he has used, will be fulfilled.

The will cannot be construed to apply the $1,000 to the reduction of the legacy of $1,500, without adding to the instrument material words not written there by the testator.

We cannot think, in the absence of any intimation of the kind, that the testator intended to diminish his legacy of $1,500 "in cash," which he positively directs to be paid in two years, by directing that part of it be paid in ten years without interest.

The plain reading of the will affords the only consistent construction that can be given to it, and points out the only practical method of its execution. If we give to all the language the testator has used bearing upon the question its natural and ordinary import, and there stop to inquire for the meaning of the testator, his intention is clear and obvious. It is only when we begin to strain or distort what the testator has said by constructions or presumptions that doubts of his intention arise. To adopt the construction claimed by one party, "we must expunge, transpose, or interpolate material words; to sustain that of the other, we leave the will as it is." Reading the will, then, as it is written, we think the testator clearly intended to give Mrs. Edwards a legacy of $1,500 in cash, to be paid in two years by his executors, out of the estate that would come to their hands; and, in addition thereto, to give her $1,000, to be paid by a different person, out of a different fund, and at widely different times. In so holding we but leave the money where the testator willed to leave it, and so left it after a deliberate revision of his will.

The court of common pleas, therefore, erred in their construction of the will upon this point.

As to the amount bequeathed to the widow in lieu of dower, although error is assigned upon this ruling of the common pleas, it is not now urged. We do not feel called upon, therefore, to express an opinion on that point. Indeed, it is doubtful if the question can be made on this record. The reasons, however, for sustaining the holding of that court on this point are so strong, that we are content to affirm that part of the decree without further consideration.

As to the corn in the cribs, we think the codicil may be fairly construed to mean as held by the common pleas.

We see no reason, therefore, why the decree of that court should not be affirmed in all respects, except as to the construction of the will relating to the bequests to Mrs. Edwards; as to that, it must be reversed; and, unless cause be shown to the contrary, a final decree will be entered here in favor of the plaintiffs in error.

WHITE, WELCH, BRINKERHOFF, and SCOTT, JJ., concur.

ROQUET v. ELDRIDGE et al.

(118 Ind. 147, 20 N. E. Rep. 733.)

Supreme Court of Indiana. April 2, 1889.

Appeal from circuit court, Vigo county; Joshua Jump, Special Judge.

Action by Hugh D. Roquet, administrator c. t. a., etc., of William B. Eldridge, deceased, against William G. Eldridge and others, heirs, devisees, and legatees of said decedent, to settle the estate. From a judgment declaring certain legacies adeemed, the legatees, William G. Eldridge and others, appeal.

C. F. McNutt and Stimson & Stimson, for appellants. S. C. Davis and S. B. Davis, for appellee.

MITCHELL, J. After the issues were joined in the court below, the judgment appealed from was rendered upon an agreed statement of facts. The questions for decision arise out of the facts agreed upon, which, so far as they are material, are as follows: In November, 1863, William B. Eldridge executed his last will and testament, by the second clause of which he devised to his sons Hamilton Eldridge and Abram A. Eldridge his homestead farm, to be held by them jointly. To his daughters, Amanda and Cynthia, and to his sons William G. and Robert B., he bequeathed $500 each, to be paid in cash, which sums were to be taken and considered as in full of each of their respective interests in the homestead farm. The will contained a recital, the effect of which was that the devises and bequests thus made were to be considered as the disposition of the homestead farm among the testator's children, and were not to affect any other interest or estate. Afterwards, and during the life-time of the testator, his sons Hamilton and Abram A. Eldridge, devisees of the homestead farm, furnished their father $2,000 in money, out of which he paid to each of the four legatees above named the sum of $500, and received from each a receipt of the following tenor, viz.: "Received of William B. Eldridge, $500, in consideration of my interest in his homestead farm, corresponding with his last will." One of the daughters was a married woman at the time she received the money and executed the receipt therefor, as above. The testator died in February, 1881, having had but the six children named above. He had only about $500 in value of personal property, which, with the farm above mentioned, valued at about $6,400, comprised his whole estate.

On behalf of the administrator with the will annexed, it is insisted that the sums paid to the several legatees by the testator in his life-time constituted a satisfaction or ademption of the legacies provided by the will, while the legatees insist that the legacies are specific or demonstrative in their character, and that since it does not appear that the money paid them was raised out of, or derived from, the land comprised in the homestead farm, the payment did not work an ademption of the sums bequeathed by the will. The legacies were, however, neither specific nor demonstrative. Speaking upon the subject of specific legacies, the lord chancellor in Fielding v. Preston, 1 De Gex & J. 438, said: "There have been attempts in various cases to determine the meaning of a specific legacy, and what is the test whereby such legacies may be distinguished from general bequests. There are objections to most of the definitions, but I think we are quite safe in treating that as a specific bequest which the testator directs to be enjoyed in specie." A legacy is specific when it can be satisfied only by the transfer or delivery of some particular portion of or article belonging to the estate, which the testator intended should be transferred to the legatee in specie. 2 Redf. Wills, 122; 2 Rap. & L. Law Dict. tit. "Legacy." Lord Hardwicke said, in Ellis v. Walker, Amb. 309: "The court leans against considering legacies as specific." Unless, therefore, it appears that the money or thing to be transferred is so clearly identified and inherently described as that the legatee can say to the executor that all or a portion of the very fund or property in question was transferred by the will, the bequest will not be regarded as specific. Sidebotham v. Watson, 11 Hare, 170.

While it is true the doctrine of ademption does not apply to specific devises or legacies, as a general rule, (Swails v. Swails, 98 Ind. 511,) yet, even in case of a specific devise or bequest, if the very thing devised or bequeathed had been transferred to the devisee or legatee in the life-time of the testator, so that there would be nothing left for the will to operate upon, an effectual ademption would have taken place.

Accepting the foregoing as the true criterion of a specific legacy, it becomes clear that the bequest of $500 in cash to each of the sons and daughters named, and the further direction that this was to be considered in full of their respective interests in the homestead farm, and that the devises and bequests previously made were not to affect any other interest or estate, did not constitute a specific bequest of any portion of the testator's estate to be transferred in specie. Neither did the legacies belong to that intermediate class which are sometimes denominated "demonstrative," and which are peculiar, in that they are not ordinarily liable to be adeemed or abated by an advancement made in a general way. "A demonstrative legacy is a bequest of a sum of money payable out of a particular fund or thing. It is a pecuniary legacy, 'given generally, but with a demonstration of a particular fund as the source of its payment.'

It is therefore equivalent to, or in the nature of, a devise or bequest of so much or such a part of the fund or thing specified." Glass v. Dunn, 17 Ohio St. 413; 5 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 541; 2 Redf. Wills, 140, 141.

While it is quite true the will plainly indicates that the sums bequeathed to the sons and daughters named were to be taken in full of their respective interests in the homestead farm, which was specifically devised to the two other sons named in the will, there is no direction that the bequests are to be paid out of any particular fund, or that the fund out of which payment is to be made is to be derived from the rents, issues, or profits of the land, or that the legatees are to have any interest, as such, in the land itself. The implication is that the bequests were chargeable against the devisees of the land, or, at most, that they should be chargeable upon the farm. Moreover, since it appears by the agreed statement of facts that the sons to whom the homestead farm was devised furnished the money with which the legacies were paid, it is not apparent why this should not be held to satisfy the bequests, even though it should be conceded that they were payable out of the land. If thus payable, it must have been contemplated that the amount should constitute a charge upon the farm, to be removed by the devisees at some time, by paying the several amounts to the legatees. We know of no authority which would justify a holding that a general legacy which is payable out of a particular fund, or in a specified manner, may not be satisfied, in case the legatee receives the amount thereof from the testator in his lifetime, out of the very fund devoted to the payment of the bequest, provided it clearly appears that the amount was given and received with the intention that it should work an ademption of the legacy. If we assume that the homestead farm was to be the source from which the fund was to be derived, out of which the legacies were payable, the conclusion follows that the devisees of the farm were to take it subject to the burden of paying the legacies after the testator's death. Having furnished the money to the testator during his life-time with which to pay off the bequests, and the money having been paid to the legatees and received by them for that purpose, the legacies are effectually satisfied from the very source contemplated by the will. An ademption results where a parent or other person standing in loco parentis, after having made a bequest, gives a portion to the child to whom the bequest is made, equal to or in excess of the amount bequeathed, the portion given and the legacy being ejusdem generis. Weston v. Johnson, 48 Ind. 1. Within the rule thus stated the legacies were adeemed.

Whether a legacy be specific or demonstrative, if it clearly appears that the particular thing or fund bequeathed has been irrevocably delivered over to the legatee in the lifetime of the testator, the legacy is adeemed because the testator's title to the thing or fund has been divested by the gift, and has become vested in the legatee during the lifetime of the testator. Clayton v. Akin, 38 Ga. 320.

The fact that one of the legatees was a married woman at the time she received the money from her father and signed the receipt is of no consequence. The receipt of the money from the source contemplated by the will satisfied the legacy by operation of law, and not by force of any contract. Money paid to a married woman in ademption of a legacy produces the same legal result as if she were unmarried.

There was no error. The judgment is affirmed, with costs.

ROGERS et al. v. FRENCH.

(19 Ga. 316.)

Supreme Court of Georgia. Jan. Term, 1856.

Error from superior court, Marion county; Worrill, Judge.

In equity.

John French and Elizabeth, his wife, filed a bill against the executors of John Rushin, deceased, for the recovery of the legacies left them under the will. The bill and answer are voluminous, as is also the evidence in the case. The following is sufficient to understand the questions made in this court:

The defendants gave in evidence the following receipt:

"July 30, 1830. Received of John Rushin Five Hundred Dollars, which is considered and to be considered by all whom it may concern as that amount advanced by him, the said John Rushin, to me as legacy, that would ever be coming to me from him in his lifetime, or from his estate after his decease.

"[Signed] John French."

John Rushin's will was dated 26th June, 1855, and by that will he gave to Mrs. French a little negro worth not exceeding $200, and one equal share of all his property. Subsequent to the making of his will, he distributed some of his negroes to his children, among others, to Mrs. French. There was some evidence to show that the question of the ademption of this legacy of the little negro had been submitted to Judge Taylor. Defendants' solicitors requested the court to charge: "(1) That if they believed that after the making of the will, bequeathing to complainant a little negro worth $200, over and above her equal proportion of the property to be distributed under the will of John Rushin, the testator, in his lifetime, gave complainant a negro of equal or greater value than the one mentioned in the will, this is prima facie an ademption of the legacy; and, to rebut this presumption of an ademption, the testimony must be clear and relevant, not presumptive merely, but a demonstration from the language and conduct of the testator that he considered the gift by the will as a subsisting benefit."

The court declined to charge the latter portion of this request, but charged "that, to rebut the presumption of an ademption, the jury might resort to presumptive evidence, but the presumption must be clear and satisfactory; that if they believed the testator gave complainant, after the making of the will, and at or about the same time he gave other property to each of his other children of equal value, they might infer from these facts that the legacy was not adeemed."

Defendants' counsel farther requested the court to charge: (2) That in a court of equity the presumption is against a double portion, and the receipt given by French in 1830, although it bears date prior to the will, is, nevertheless, a charge against him, for which he is bound to account.

This the court declined to charge: (3) As to effect of a responsive answer as evidence, and that an answer is responsive where it has necessary connection with and grows out of the allegation, and is explanatory thereof.

This the court gave, and added: He supposed the latter clause referred to that portion of defendants' answer which stated that Judge Taylor had determined that the legacy of the little negro was adeemed. The court charged that this was not responsive, there being no allegation in the bill on the subject.

To these charges as given, and refusals to charge, defendants excepted, and have assigned error thereon.

Miller & Hall, for plaintiffs in error. Stubbs & Hill, for defendant in error.

LUMPKIN, J. (1) Was the court right in refusing to give the first charge as requested, without the modification and explanation which accompanied it in the charge as given?

In Ex parte Pye, 18 Ves. 152, Lord Eldon observes "that where a father gives a legacy to a child the legacy, coming from the father to his child, must be understood as a portion, though it is not so described in the will, and afterwards advancing a portion to that child, though there may be slight circumstances of difference between the advance and the portion, and a difference in amount, yet the father will be intended to have the same purpose in each instance; and the advance is, therefore, an ademption of the legacy. But a stranger giving a legacy is understood as giving a bounty, not paying a debt. He must, therefore, be proved to mean it as a portion or provision, either on the face of the will, or if it may be, as it seems it may, by evidence applying directly to the gift proposed by the will." (See, also, Elkenhead's Case cited in 2 Vern. 257; Precedents in Chancery, 182, and Ambler, 325.)

Thus, then, we have the rule clearly stated and carrying this doctrine of ademption to its utmost limits. The English courts regret, as well they may, that it has been pushed so far. We see and feel the reasonableness of the rule which requires the courts to lean against double portions, as it is called; and we can readily understand why a legacy in a will should be adeemed by a subsequent advance having the same object in view as the legacy, notwithstanding any slight difference in value or amount between the legacy and the advance. A father, for instance, directs by his will his executors to pay to a daughter $1,000 to purchase, upon her marriage, household furniture. The child, however, marries in the lifetime of the father, and he advances to her $1,000, or some sum approximating to that, for the same purpose specified in the will. This is, and manifestly should be, a case of ademp-tion, and so should all others standing upon the same footing. But suppose the legacy be a little negro for a nurse, and the subsequent advance be of money to buy a carriage, is there any propriety in construing this advance to be an ademption of the legacy?

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—10

Listen to the reasoning of the chancellor in the case of Pye, just cited, in support of what he deduces from the books as the "unquestionable doctrine" of the courts upon the subject: "By a sort of artificial rule, in the application of which legitimate children have been very harshly treated, upon an artificial notion that the father is paying a debt of nature, if the father afterwards advances a portion on the marriage of that child, though of less amount, it is a satisfaction of the whole or in part; and in some cases it has gone the length, consistent with the principle, but showing the fallacy of much of the reasoning, that the portion, though much less than the legacy, has been held a satisfaction, in some instances, upon this ground, that the father, owing what is called a debt of nature, is the judge of that provision by which he means to satisfy it; and though, at the time of making the will, he thought he could not discharge that debt with less than £10,000, yet, by a change of his circumstances and of his sentiments upon that moral obligation, it may be satisfied by the advance of a portion of £5,000."

Is not such reasoning from the mouth of such a judge well calculated to inspire the hope that the day is not distant when all precedents will be abolished, and every case be tried by an enlightened tribunal upon its own merits? To such a consummation the world must, from the necessity of the case, to say nothing of its policy, sooner or later come; for the world will not contain the law books that will be written, much less will lawyers and judges, with their stinted income, be able to buy them. Necessity will become the mother of justice in this case, as she is said to be generally of invention. Would that some Caliph Omar would arise to apply the torch to all the repositories of legal learning throughout the globe! Precedent! Precedent! This is the vampire that is forever draining the very life blood of justice. Give the books of reports as fuel for baths. They will contribute much more to the health, happiness, and convenience of the people than as at present employed.

But to return from this digression, and without elaborating the rule further, we remark that the presumed ademption may be destroyed or confirmed by the application of parol evidence of a different intention by the testator. 2 Atk. 48; 3 Atk. 77; 7 Ves. 708; Select Eq. Cas. 141. And this was the substance of the charge as given. The judge instructed the jury that they might, in order to rebut the presumption that the advance made by the testator to French and wife, in his lifetime, and subsequent to the making of the will, was an ademption, look to the fact of whether or not similar advancements were made to the other children; and this the court was authorized to do by the testimony of Mrs. Wilkes, the widow of John Rushin, who states that she lived with the testator from 1834, the year before he made his will, down to 1843, when he died, and that the advancements made to all the children during that period were equal, and that the testator tried to make them so.

(2) Was the advance of $500 made in land by the testator to John French, the husband of his daughter, in 1830, five years before he made his will, a charge against his share of the estate? The case of Upton v. Prince, Cases Tem. Talb. 71, is cited in support of the proposition that an advance made prior to the making of a will may adeem a legacy. The testator, William Prince, had two sons,—William and Peter, Elizabeth, Sarah, Mary, and Anne. In his lifetime, and soon after the sons became of age, they desired their father to advance to each of them a sum of money toward setting them up in the world, and agreed that whatever he should advance should be part of what he should give them by will, whereupon the father, on the 11th of June, 1734, advanced £1500 to William Prince, who gave the following instrument for the same: "Received of my father the sum of £1500, which I do hereby acknowledge to be on account and in part of what he hath given or shall, in and by his last will, give unto me his son." And on the 31st March, 1727, the father advanced £1500 to Peter Prince, who gave a similar instrument to that of his brother. On the 17th of August, 1730, William Prince, the father, executed his will, which contains the following recital: "And whereas, I have heretofore paid to, given, or advanced with my children, William, Elizabeth and Sarah, the sum of £1500 apiece, now, I do hereby, in like manner, give and bequeath unto my three other children, Peter, Mary and Anne, the several sums of £1500 apiece." He then willed that the residue of his estate should be divided in six equal parts, and gives the one-sixth to each of his children. He deposited the two receipts given by William and Peter in a drawer with his will, and intimated that the said drawer should not be opened after his death by either of his said sons unless his other children, or one of his sons-in-law, were present.

The question was whether Peter should have a new sum of £1500 upon the words of the will, or whether he should not be in the same case with William; they both being equally advanced by the father, and this seeming only a mistake in the testator. The lord chancellor decreed the £1500 received by Peter in his father's lifetime to be a satisfaction for what the father gave him by his will, and that he should not have another £1500 upon the words of the will.

While we controvert the general doctrine that a previous advance made to a child shall adeem an express gift by a subsequent will, wherein and whereby the testator undertakes to dispose of the property which he then has, still we are not prepared to deny the justice of this case. Here it was a question of intention, as it should be in every case, and all the facts go to show that Peter's name was, by mistake, inserted with those of the unportioned part of the children. The whole will establishes that it was the intention of the testator that the two sums of £1500 paid to William and Peter should be deducted out of the legacies given to them; else why deposit their receipts in a drawer with his will with directions that the drawer should not be opened after his death by either of his said sons unless his other children, or one of his sons-in-law, were present?

Before dismissing this case, I would remark that the able counsel, Mr. Hall, who adduces it, concedes that it is the only direct authority he can find upon the point; and, if he has found none others, we may safely assume that none other exists. I will add that Upton v. Prince is only recognized by Mr. Williams on Executors, and other law writers in this way. They say, in referring to it, that if an advance previously made will adeem a legacy a fortiori will an advance made subsequent to the execution of the will. In our judgment it is always a question of intention, in all cases, whether the advance be before or after the execution of the will, and that no arbitrary rule should control the matter.

How, then, stands the present case? The testimony shows that in 1830, the date of the receipt given for $500 given by French to his father-in-law, old man Rushin advanced $500 to each of his children. This fact is not disputed, but it is insisted that French got $500 extra of the rest; else it is asked, why should a receipt be required of him when the rest gave none? Perhaps they have been lost or destroyed. The defendants, and not French, have had the custody of the testator's papers. Perhaps French lived at a distance and forwarded this receipt, not knowing but such an acknowledgment would be exacted of all. Be this as it may, there is one fact which, to our minds, is conclusive, that this $500 was not intended by the testator to be a charge on the legacy of French and wife. In his will he mentions, in every other case, what sums are to be charged against his other children, or a portion of them; and there is not a word as to this extra advance, as it is pretended, to French. It was made five years only before the will was executed, and his attention was called to the subject by referring to the respective advances made to some of the other children. It is not likely that this would have been overlooked or forgotten. He is silent as to the $500 advance made to each of the children in 1830, and from this we infer that the testator himself considered that all, at that time, were advanced pari passu.

But it is suggested that the defendants have sworn to the fact, and that their answer is not overcome by counteracting testimony. They only testify as to their information and belief, and the rule does not apply to such answers.

(3) Was the court wrong in making the addition which it did to the third charge, as requested? It is not complained that the charge, as asked, was not given. The error assigned is that the judge selected that portion of the defendant's answer which set forth the award made by Judge Taylor, and stated that the same was not responsive to the bill, whereas, it is urged that the same was responsive, and that admitting it was not. Still, it was wrong to single out this particular portion of the answer and omit any reference to the rest.

In the first place, we concur with the circuit court in holding that the reference to the award made by Judge Taylor was not responsive to any allegation, but matter purely in evidence; and, secondly, that the omission of the court to refer to the rest of the answer was favorable to the defendants. It left the jury to infer that the balance of the answer was responsive.

It is finally contended that the advancements made to the different legatees, and to French and wife amongst the rest, should be brought into hotchpot; but no such necessity exists, provided the advancements were equal, for in that event each is entitled to an equal share under the will of what remains. We see no error in this record, to make it proper to send back a case, like this, which has been pending so long, and occupied so much time of the country. There should be an end of litigation unless manifest injustice has been done.

CLARK v. JETTON.

(5 Sneed, 229.)

Supreme Court of Tennessee. December Term, 1857.

This bill was filed in the chancery court at Murfreesboro, for the purposes fully stated in the opinion. At the October Term, 1857, Chancellor Ridley gave a decree for the complainants, from which the defendants appealed.

W. L. Martin, for complainants. Rucker and E. A. Keeble, for defendants.

CARUTHERS, J. On the 29th April, 1851, John L. Jetton made his will, disposing of all his property to his wife, children, and grandchildren. He gave to his wife one-third of his land for life, and one-tenth of "all his slaves and other personal property," after the payment of debts and expenses. Item 3. "After the payment of debts and expenses aforesaid, and the taking out one-tenth for my widow, the residue of said slaves, and other personal property, monies, etc.," "I direct to be divided into nine equal parts, one part of which I give to my son Lewis, one part to the children of Mary Graham, one part to Jane Barr, one part to Charlotte Bryant;" and so on to each of his daughters, nine in number. He limits the estates of his daughters to their natural lives, to their separate use, and then to their children, in remainder. He died in 1854. His will was proven and recorded without contest. After the execution of this will, the testator made several deeds of gift to a part of his children and his widow, the defendant. On the 19th August, 1853, he made a deed of gift to his wife for life, and then to all her children one negro woman and child; and, on the same day, he gave by deed to a trustee, for the benefit and separate use of his daughter Francis L. Burke, a negro man; and at the same time, and in the same way, a negro man was given to his daughter Jane Barr. On the 25th August, 1853, he gave a negro boy to his son Lewis; and, on the 29th, he gave to a trustee, for the use and benefit of his daughter Martha A. Sawyer, a lot in Pulaski and a negro man, with the same limitations and restrictions.

These deeds of gift were all regularly proven and recorded. This bill was filed September, 1856, by the children and legatees, not thus advanced, for the purpose of setting aside all said deeds of gift, upon the ground of the mental incapacity of the donor, and undue influence on the part of his wife; and, if this cannot be done, they pray that the several gifts may be held to satisfy the legacies of defendants by way of ademption. Upon the first question we have no difficulty. The old man was very intemperate and aged, but had sufficient capacity to make a binding contract at the time these deeds were made. Such is the opinion of the witnesses to the deeds, although one of them, who was draftsman, was led to doubt upon that subject by some interviews a month or more afterwards, yet at the time of the transaction he has no doubt. The proof falls short entirely of showing that degree of mental unsoundness or imbecility that would invalidate the gifts; but it is insisted that, if he were not of unsound mind, yet his intellect was so enfeebled by long-continued inebriety that he was easily influenced by his wife, and that she, against his will, caused him to make these donations, by the exercise of an absolute dominion over his will. As an evidence of this, it is said that she procured, by her dictation and power over him, a remainder interest to be vested in an illegitimate child of hers, born before his marriage with her, jointly with her children by him, in the two slaves given to her for life. He had taken this child with her, and raised it in his house with his other children; and it is not unnatural that he should freely yield to her wishes in giving to it a small pittance of his estate. Whether this child will get anything under the deed is a question not now to be decided, and does not affect the argument. There is evidence that for several of the last years of his life, embracing the time of these gifts, she managed most of his business, and that he deferred to her in many things; but this was rendered necessary by his intemperate habits, and was a prudent delegation of authority, rather than an evidence of either a want of sense or submission to undue influence. He sometimes said he was in torment, etc., when he was drunk. It was very natural he should feel that way when under the dominion of liquor; and that she should "torment" him about his self-destructing habits was to be expected, in view of the destruction of health and happiness, which was the inevitable consequence of his ruinous course; but it by no means follows, as a necessary consequence, that the fact that she vexed or tormented him would augment her influence. His remarks about not being able to do as he pleased, or at liberty to invite his friends to dinner, etc., are all attributable to the same cause, and have very little weight in establishing this point, for which they are adduced in evidence. In all this, we find nothing to authorize the conclusion, or at least not sufficient for that purpose, that he was unduly influenced by her to make the deeds of gift in question, or that there was any fraud practiced upon him by his wife, or anybody else. He deliberately made the arrangement with his attorney to write them, and gave every evidence of a free and settled purpose in doing what he did. The deeds of gift were, therefore, valid and binding, and vested good titles in the donees.

2. The second ground assumed by the complainants is that the gifts, if good, operated as an ademption of the legacies in the will to the extent, at least, of the value of the property, and that, in the division of the property under the will, the respective donees must be made to account for it. This is a more difficult question, and must be decided by reference to the authorities. The general rule on this subject is that where a parent, or one standing in loco parentis, gives a legacy to a child, and afterwards advances a portion to that child, it will be an ademption or satisfaction of the legacy to the extent of the value of the portion, unless a contrary intent appears. 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 1143, and subsequent pages; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1111. But the rule has several qualifications and exceptions. It is founded on the presumption that a bequest by the father is intended as a portion to the child, and so of the after gift; and the presumption will be that a double portion was not intended, where nothing else appears, and therefore it will be taken that the gift was intended as a satisfaction of the legacy when it is of equal or greater value, and, if less, pro tanto. Rop. Leg. 370, 374; 2 Williams, Ex'rs, 1143. The word "ademption," is synonymous with "satisfaction" when applied to specific legacies. In that case, the disposition of the thing given before the death of the testator is a complete extinction of the legacy, and the intention of the testator in such cases is immaterial, because there is nothing at the time the will takes effect for it to operate upon. Rop. Leg. 329. But in respect to general legacies, the question is one of intention, and this intention will be presumed, as we have said, in all cases of legacies and subsequent gifts by a parent, or one standing in, or occupying the place of, parent, unless that presumption is rebutted. Such is the general rule. But this presumption of ademption will not prevail, (1) where the testamentary portion and subsequent advancement are not of the same nature; (2) where the latter depends on a contingency, and the former is certain; (3) when either is in lieu of, or a compensation for, an interest to which the child is entitled; or (4) where the bequest is of a residue or part of a residue. Williams, Ex'rs, 1144, 1145. Rop. Leg. 377, states that another exception to the general rule is where the bequest is of an "uncertain amount." "It has, therefore, been determined more than once," he says, "that a devise of a residue, or of part of a residue, to a child, is not adeemed by a subsequent gift upon the legatee's marriage." Though, Sir W. Grant intimated a doubt as to the correctness of this opinion, in 15 Ves. 513, as the author states, yet it is considered well settled as the law, when not controlled by special circumstances. In Farnham v. Philips, 2 Atk. 216, Lord Hardwicke said, "There was no case where the devise had been of a residue that was uncertain, and that at the testator's death might be more or less, in which the gift of a subsequent portion had been held an ademption." Where a testator directed a debt of 100 pounds to be paid out of an estate, and the residue divided between his wife and children, and afterwards gave one of his daughters a thousand pounds, it was held that this did not operate as an ademption of her testamentary share of the residue. This was the case of Farnham v. Philips, above cited. The application of this doctrine to the case before us produces a result that we would rather avoid, if we could do so upon any principle settled by authority. It must result in giving the defendants the benefit of the will, as well as the deeds of gift. The provision for them under the will is that they are each to have one-ninth of the residue of his slaves and other personal property and money, after the payment of debts, expenses, and the one-tenth to the widow. The testamentary portions or legacies must be fluctuating and uncertain, or, in the language of the books, they may "be more or less, something, or nothing" at the death of the testator and settlement of the estate. In answer to the seeming injustice of this doctrine, it may be said that it is the right of every man to give as a bounty to his children, or others, in such proportions as he chooses, to some more and others less. Where he intends or desires equality, or to make gifts in his lifetime operate in the ademption or satisfaction of general legacies, it is easy to express such purpose. Where he fails to do so, the rules of law must prevail without regard to the consequences. This doctrine of ademption does not apply to real estate, nor to legacies and gifts to others than children, or those who stand in that relation, in cases of general legacies. This distinction rests upon artificial reasons, the justice and propriety of which are not very clear, nor the reasons on which it is founded approved; but that branch of the doctrine, having no application to the case before us, need not be discussed, but left for a case to which it applies. The decree will be reversed, and the bill dismissed as to this branch of the case, but remanded for further proceedings as to other matters connected with the settlement of the estate.

KEEP et al. v. MILLER et al.

(6 Atl. 495, 42 N. J. Eq. 100.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 6, 1886.

Bill for relief. On final hearing upon pleadings and proofs. Facts are given in the opinion.

Alfred Mills, for complainants. S. D. Haines and S. B. Ransom, for defendant Faulks.

RUNYON, Ch. The bill states that John B. Miller, deceased, late of Madison, in the county of Morris, made and entered into a valid contract in writing with Jehiel K. Hoyt upon the twenty-fifth of April, 1872, for the sale and conveyance by him to the latter, or to such company of individuals as might be named by him, (Hoyt,) certain land therein mentioned for the price of $800 an acre; and that on or about the tenth of June following he made another like agreement in writing with Hoyt for the conveyance to him, his heirs and assigns, or to such person or persons as he might designate, of the same property, on or before the first day of September then next, for the price of $39,392, to be paid, and which Hoyt thereby stipulated to pay, as follows: $100 upon the execution of the agreement, and $4,900 on the delivery of the deed,—the balance, $34,392, to be secured by the bond of the grantee or grantees, and his or their mortgage of the property; that the time for the delivery of the deed was, by another agreement in writing, made on the twentieth of August, 1872, between Miller and Hoyt, extended to the first day of October then next; that Miller died September 5, 1872, intestate, leaving a widow and a son, the defendant David L. Miller, who was his only heir at law; that letters of administration of his estate were granted to Theodore Little, October 1, 1872; that after the death of John B. Miller, and on or about the twenty-eighth of September, 1872, Hoyt notified David L. Miller that he would be ready to take the deed, and carry out the agreement on his part on the first of October then next, and requested Miller, as heir at law, to deliver at that date a deed for the property, in conformity with the contract, to Henry E. Reddish and Henry O. Ohlen, whom he designated as grantees; that David L. Miller did not and never would convey the property, except upon condition that he should receive the purchase money for his own use; that the complainants are informed that Reddish and Ohlen, on or about the first of October, 1872, demanded of David L. Miller that he convey the property to them by warranty deed, free from any dower of his wife, and from the dower of the widow of his father, and from the lien of certain judgments which were of record against him, David L. Miller, and tendered the money and bond and mortgage, but he would not comply with the request; that neither David L. Miller, nor Hoyt, Reddish, or Ohlen, ever requested the widow to release her dower to Reddish and Ohlen; that she never refused to release it to them, but was at all times ready to release it upon condition that the purchase money should be paid, and secured to be paid, to the administrator of John B. Miller, and that David L. Miller was aware of her readiness to release upon that condition; that on or about the thirteenth of December, 1872, the widow wrote a letter to her late husband's administrator in which she said that she had expected to join with her husband in the conveyance to the purchaser, but he died before any conveyance was made; that she was still ready to do all that she could to perform the agreement, and was ready to release her dower on condition that the purchase money should be paid, or secured to be paid, to the administrator, and she offered to release her dower upon those terms in case the administrator should take judicial proceedings to compel specific performance of the agreement; that he did bring suit to that end in this court in December, 1872; that in January following the widow died, and the complainants in this suit were appointed administrators of her estate; that in the suit brought by the administrator of John B. Miller specific performance was decreed, but the decree was, upon appeal, reversed, so far as Hoyt and Reddish and Ohlen, and the performance of the agreement by them, were concerned.

By the decree of the court of errors and appeals the bill was dismissed as to those defendants, but was retained as to the others, in order that the legal representatives of the widow might have an opportunity of raising, by cross-bill, the question whether they have any remedy against David L. Miller. This suit is brought accordingly by the administrators of Mrs. Miller against David L. Miller and his wife, and his assignee in bankruptcy, (he filed his petition in bankruptcy after the decree for specific performance was entered,) the administrator of John B. Miller, (he refused to bring the suit, or to join in it, or to permit the complainants to bring it in his name,) and the administrators of a judgment creditor of David L. Miller. The prayer of the bill is that the land may be decreed to be personal property, and may be sold under the order of this court; that the proceeds of the sale may go into the hands of the administrator of John B. Miller as personal property, to be administered and distributed by him accordingly; that it may be decreed that the complainants, as the legal representatives of the widow, shall have her share thereof according to law; and that, if necessary, it may be decreed that David L. Miller's wife has no dower in the property, and that the judgment above mentioned is no lien upon the premises. None of the defendants have answered except the assignee in bankruptcy.

By the decree in the above-mentioned suit, brought by John B. Miller's administrator, (Miller's Adm'r v. Miller, 25 N. J. Eq. 355; S. C. on appeal, Reddish v. Miller's Adm'r, 27 N. J. Eq. 514,) in addition to decreeing specific performance, it was decreed that David L. Miller, at and ever since the death of his father, had been, and at the date of the decree was, seized of the property as a trustee to and for the use of Reddish and Ohlen, and not otherwise, and that David L. Miller's wife was not, and had not been, entitled to any dower or right of dower in or to the land, and that the judgment creditors of David L. Miller were not entitled to any lien to or claim upon or against the property by virtue of their judgments, and also that the moneys decreed to be paid, and the bond and mortgage decreed to be given, on account of purchase money, were and should be personal assets in the hands of the administrator of John B. Miller, and should be by him administered as personal property in due and legal course of administration, and that he should pay to the administrators of the widow her distributive share thereof. That decree (it was made over 10 years ago) was not appealed from by David L. Miller.

The only question presented for decision is whether, under the circumstances of the case, the contract of sale worked an equitable conversion of the land into money at the death of John B. Miller. That it would have done so had the contract been enforced against the vendee is indisputable, and is not denied. But the answering defendant insists that the failure to compel specific performance prevents such result. That failure, however, was due, not to the invalidity of the contract, but to the fact that, because of the length of time which had elapsed between the time fixed by the contract (as extended) for the completion of the purchase and the making of the decree for specific performance, it was inequitable to require the vendee to complete the purchase, seeing that he had tendered himself ready to comply with the requirements of the contract on his part at the time fixed, and that in the meantime the property had fallen in value. It may be remarked that the noncompliance upon the part of the heir was not due to the widow. She did not refuse to release. She was never asked to release. On the thirteenth of December, 1872, she stated to her late husband's administrator, by letter, that she was willing to release in case he should take judicial proceedings to compel specific performance of the contract. It is proved that on the very day on which, under the contract as extended, the deed was to be delivered, her attorney stated to the attorney of Reddish and Ohlen that she was willing to release upon such a payment as would secure her rights, by which was meant payment to her husband's administrator, and not to David L. Miller.

A valid and binding contract of sale such as a court of equity will specifically enforce against an unwilling purchaser operates as a conversion. The cases in which the court has refused to decree that a contract for sale works equitable conversion are those in which the contract was such as equity would not enforce.

The counsel for the answering defendant insists that the decision in the case of Teneick v. Flagg, 29 N. J. Law, 25, is decisive of the question under consideration, and is adverse to the claim of the complainants. But it is to be observed that that was an action at law. Mrs. Attie Teneick had agreed to convey land to James Buckalew, and had received part of the purchase money. He refused to accept the deed because of the pendency of an action of ejectment brought against Mrs. Teneick by other parties to obtain possession of the land. She delivered a deed for the property to her agent, to be delivered by him to Buckalew upon the favorable termination of the action of ejectment. She died before the termination was reached. By her death the action of ejectment abated, and it was not renewed. After her death her heirs conveyed the property to Buckalew in pursuance of her agreement, and the purchase money was paid to her administrators. The husband of one of the heirs brought suit against the administrators to recover a share of the money. The court held that he was entitled to recover, on the ground that on the death of Mrs. Teneick the title descended to her heirs; the deed held in escrow passing no title, since the event on which it was to be delivered to Buckalew did not happen in the life-time of the grantor, and at her death the deed ceased to have any validity. In the decision of the case the difference between the equitable rule and the legal rule was distinctly recognized by Justice Haines in his opinion. The cause was, of course, decided in the court of law upon the legal rule.

Upon a full and careful consideration of the matter I reached the conclusion in the suit for specific performance that the contract worked a conversion. See Miller's Adm'r v. Miller, supra. The only new feature now presented is the fact that the appellate court has decided that specific performance ought not to have been decreed. The reason for that conclusion has already been stated. It was not the invalidity of the contract, nor any consideration which rendered the contract unenforceable in equity at the death of John B. Miller, or at the time fixed by the contract for completing the purchase. The contract was one which, at the time fixed by it for completing the purchase, could have been enforced against the purchaser in equity, and it would have been enforced at that time on the application of the heir, with the consent of the widow, and she was willing to join him in enforcing it if he had been willing to secure to her her right in the purchase money. In equity he ought to have enforced it. Equity regards that as done which ought to have been done. The doctrine of conversion is a reasonable one. In this case, John B. Miller had made a sale of the property, which, had he lived, he would have been able to enforce in equity, and which it is to be presumed he would have enforced. He had sold the property at a high price. It should not be, and it is not, in the power of the heir to defeat the right of the next of kin by his own unwillingness to carry out the contract. By force of the contract the vendor became in equity trustee of the property for the vendee, and the latter became trustee of the purchase money for the former. It has been held that the equitable rights of the next of kin of the vendor are not defeated, where the vendee, by his laches, after the death of the vendor, loses his right to specific performance, provided the contract was enforceable in equity at the death of the vendor. Curre v. Bowyer, reported in a note to Farrar v. Earl of Winterton, 5 Beav. 1. Where there is a contract for the sale of an estate, the estate is in equity considered as converted into personalty from the time of the contract, although the purchaser has an election to purchase or not as he shall see fit. Lawes v. Bennet, 1 N. J. Law, 167; Sugd. Vend. (8th Am. Ed.) 187, and cases cited.

The sale in this case worked an equitable conversion of the land into money, and the widow was entitled, accordingly, to a distributive share of the purchase money as part of the personal property of her husband.

WHELESS v. WHELESS et al.

(21 S. W. 595, 92 Tenn. 293.)

Supreme Court of Tennessee. March 2, 1893.

Appeal from chancery court, Davidson county; J. A. Cartwright, Special Chancellor.

Bill for partition by Joseph Wheless and others against H. H. Wheless. Judgment for complainants. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Dickenson & Frazer, Stokes & Stokes, and Frizzell & Zarecor, for appellant. Joseph Wheless, Jr., and N. D. Malone, for respondent G. A. Tillman, guardian ad litem. J. S. Pilcher, for widow of J. F. Wheless. J. W. Byrnes, for petitioner McCrosky.

CALDWELL, J. Gen. John F. Wheless died intestate and without issue, leaving a widow, and numerous collateral kindred. The bill in this cause was filed for a partition of his lands, where that could be done, and for sale and division of proceeds, where partition in kind might not be practicable. The widow, in her answer, claimed that the undivided interest of her husband in what is known as the "Baxter Smith Tract" was not realty, but personal property, under the doctrine of equitable conversion, and that it therefore belonged to her, as distributee, and not to the heirs. The chancellor decided this question against her, and she appealed.

No doctrine is more firmly fixed in English and American jurisprudence than that of equitable conversion, by which, under certain circumstances, real estate is treated, in equity, as personal property, and personal estate as real property. Through this doctrine, courts of equity treat as land money directed to be employed in the purchase of land, and, as money, land directed to be sold and converted into money; and the direction upon which the conversion arises may be made by will, or by deed, settlement, or other contract inter vivos. Adams, Eq. *135, 136; 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 371; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 790; 4 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 127; 6 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 664, 665. It was early recognized in this state, (Stephenson v. Yandle, 3 Hayw. [Tenn.] 109.) and has since been applied in several cases upon the construction of wills. McCormick v. Cantrell, 7 Yerg. 615; Williams v. Bradley, 7 Heisk. 58; Green v. Davidson, 4 Baxt. 448. The difficulty which sometimes arises in the application of the principle to a particular instrument lies, not in the subtlety of the principle itself, but rather in ascertaining the intention of the maker from the words employed. To operate as a conversion, the direction that the form of the property be changed must be imperative, in the sense of being positive and unmistakable. If the intention, as gathered from the whole instrument, be left in doubt, or the direction allows the trustee to sell or not, as he deems best, the courts are not at liberty to say that a conversion has taken place, but must deal with the property according to its actual form and character. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1214. Mr.

Pomeroy says: "No express declaration in the instrument is needed that land shall be treated as money, although not sold, or that money shall be deemed land, although not actually laid out in the purchase of land. The only essential requisite is an absolute expression of an intention that the land shall be sold, and turned into money, or that the money shall be expended in the purchase of land. * * * The true test, in all such cases, is a simple one: Has the will or deed creating the trust absolutely directed, or has the contract stipulated, that the real estate be turned into personal, or the personal estate be turned into real?" 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1159. Again: "The whole scope and meaning of the fundamental principle underlying the doctrine are involved in the existence of a duty resting upon the trustees or other parties to do the specified act; for, unless the equitable right exists, there is no room for the operation of the maxim, 'Equity regards that as done which ought to be done.' The rule is therefore firmly settled that, in order to work a conversion while the property is yet actually unchanged in form, there must be a clear and imperative direction in the will, deed, or settlement, or a clear, imperative agreement in the contract, to convert the property; that is, to sell the land for money, or to lay out the money in the purchase of land. If the act of converting—that is, the act, itself, of selling the land, or of laying out the money in land—is left to the option, discretion, or choice of the trustees, or other parties, then no equitable conversion will take place, because no duty to make the change rests upon them. It is not essential, however, that the direction should be express, in order to be imperative. It may be necessarily implied. * * * If by express language, or by a reasonable construction of all its terms, the instrument shows an intention that the original form of the property shall be changed, then a conversion necessarily takes place." Id. § 1160. To the same effect are Wurt's Exr's v. Page, 19 N. J. Eq. 375; Ford v. Ford, 70 Wis. 19, 33 N. W. Rep. 188; Hobson v. Hale, 95 N. Y. 588. Numerous other authorities, textbooks, and judicial decisions are at hand; but they are, in the main, so harmonious, and so entirely in accord with the full quotations just made from Mr. Pomeroy, that we forbear to make further citations with respect to the character of direction necessary to work the notional change, and call the doctrine of equitable conversion into play. As a matter of some moment on the question of construction, it is well to observe that unless the sale or purchase contemplated is expressly directed to be made at a specified time in the future, or upon the happening of some particular event, which may or may not happen, the conversion takes place, in wills, as from the death of the testator; and in deeds, and other instruments inter vivos, as from the date of their execution. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1162.

The instrument upon which the controversy arises in this cause is a deed, in the following language: "We, Baxter Smith and wife, Bettie G. Smith, * * * in consideration of the sum of $34,395.60, paid and secured to be paid as hereinafter mentioned, have bargained and sold, and do hereby transfer and convey, unto James H. Yarbrough, in trust, as hereinafter mentioned, the following tract of land * * * to have and to hold, for himself and other beneficiaries hereinafter named, in trust for the following uses and purposes: That is to say, said tract of land has been jointly purchased by James C. Warner, Percy Warner, John P. White, John F. Wheless, B. F. Wilson, W. M. Grantland, Charles L. Ridley, Baxter Smith, and J. H. Yarbrough, L. H. Davis, and G. A. Maddux,—the last three purchasing as a firm, under the firm name and style of Yarbrough, Maddux and Davis,—each paying and to pay one tenth of the purchase money for said land, as hereafter set out, except John P. White, who pays two tenths. * * * Said tract of land is conveyed to said J. H. Yarbrough, as trustee for said named purchasers, with power and authority to hold, possess, and manage the same in their interest and behalf, and to sell and convey the same, by deed in fee simple, upon the written direction of a majority in value of the adult beneficial owners then living, upon such terms and conditions as they may direct, and to collect and divide the proceeds of sale among said beneficiaries, their heirs, administrators, executors, and assigns, as their several interests may appear. * * * The aforesaid sum of $34,395.60 has been paid, and secured to be paid, as follows: * * * To secure the payment of the promissory notes herein described, a lien is expressly retained upon the share or interest of the maker alone, and not against the tract as a whole. In case any of the beneficiaries herein named, in order to preserve his or their own title, should have to pay and discharge for another any accruing taxes or other incumbrance or lien upon the whole property, then, in that event, he or they shall have a lien upon the share or interest of the person who has failed to make such payment. Should said J. H. Yarbrough desire to resign the trust herein given him, he may do so, by and with the consent and approval, in writing, of a majority in value of the adult beneficiaries, owners, named above, and appoint in his room and stead a new trustee, and clothe him with like power and duties as those now conferred on him, by a suitable deed of conveyance in writing, to be recorded in the register's office of Davidson county, Tennessee."

Such are the material portions of the instrument the court is called upon to construe in this case; and the inquiry is whether the land conveyed thereby is to be treated, in equity, as realty, or as personality. If as realty, the share of Gen. Wheless passed to his heirs, under the statute of descent; if as personality, it went to his widow, as sole distributee, subject in either case, of course, to his debts.

A general view of the deed readily discloses a proposed speculation, entered into by several persons jointly,—a syndicate buying land to sell again. In furtherance of the scheme a trustee was appointed, and the land conveyed to him for the benefit of all the purchasers,—for each of them according to his interest. The idea of a resale, as the ultimate object of the enterprise, runs through the whole instrument. It appears, from the nature of the transaction; from the words conferring upon the trustee power and authority "to sell, * * * and collect and divide the proceeds;" and from the provision for appointment of a successor in case the trustee should resign. That a partition in kind should ever occur, or that the trust should cease before a sale of the land and division of its proceeds were fully accomplished, was never contemplated. The land was bought to sell again, and a trustee was appointed as a part of the plan. All this is clear; but it is entirely consistent with the proposition that the trust was created merely as a cheaper and more convenient method of preserving and conveying the land. More is required to make a case of equitable conversion. The fact of a contemplated resale is present in every purchase of land upon speculation; and land purchased with such view is not converted into personality by the mere appointment of a trustee to receive the title, and as the agency through which the resale is to be accomplished for the owners. It is manifest that the paramount object of the enterprise was a resale of the land through the trustee, as representative of the beneficial owners, yet the deed does not contain any imperative direction that he shall sell; no absolute, unconditional duty to sell is placed upon him. "The equitable 'ought'" is not to be found in the deed, either as a matter expressed or to be necessarily implied. Not only does it contain no positive direction that he shall sell, but it, in reality, does not even permit him to sell, upon his own motion. His only power of sale is made to depend, expressly, upon the direction of others. He has no independent authority in that respect. The words of the deed on this point are: "With power and authority to hold, possess, and manage the same in their interest and behalf, and to sell and convey the same, by deed in fee simple, upon the written direction of a majority in value of the adult beneficial owners then living, upon such terms and conditions as they may direct." This language imposes upon the trustee no positive, unqualified obligation to sell the land at all events. At most, it but gives him authority to sell at such time, and upon such terms and conditions, as others may direct. In effect, it but makes him the instrumentality through which a majority of the beneficial owners living at any given time may make a sale. He has no right to sell without their written direction, and no authority to demand or require such direction at one time or another. It cannot be that a conversion was wrought by the creation of a trust so passive as this one is.

To meet the fact that the trustee has no power to sell unless directed by a majority of the adult beneficiaries to do so, it is suggested that the beneficiaries themselves are clothed with a trust, to the extent of being empowered to direct when and how the sale shall be made, and that they are bound to give such direction. There can be no doubt that it was contemplated that the beneficiaries should at some time give the trustee the required direction to sell the land, and that a duty was, to that extent, indirectly devolved upon them; but that can hardly be said to have made trustees of them, or to have magnified the limited power of the real trustee into an imperative obligation to convert the land into money. The purchasers, though intending an ultimate sale, clearly had no thought that the terms of the deed changed the character of the property, and converted the real estate into personality. That they intended the land to be held as realty until actually sold and turned into money is manifest from the general frame and terms of the deed, and especially from those parts of it retaining separate liens in favor of the grantor, and providing for a special lien in favor of such beneficiaries as might be compelled to pay taxes or discharge liens for others. In the portion of the deed last referred to, the interest of each of the several beneficiaries is referred to as an interest in land, as such, and provisions are made with reference thereto which would be inappropriate as applied to personality. We are of opinion that the deed shows upon its face when considered as a whole, that the land was conveyed to a trustee merely for convenience, and to save expense and trouble in the ultimate sale and conveyance, and that no conversion took place.

Our attention has been called to the very instructive and soundly reasoned case of Crane v. Bolles, (N. J. Ch.) 24 Atl. Rep. 237, in which a conversion of land into money was held to have occurred under direction contained in a will. There are several points of similarity between that case and this one, and perhaps as many important differences. The principles of law laid down in that case are the same recognized and applied by us in this one, the difference in result reached being due to difference in purport of instruments construed. Without stating the aspects in which the two instruments agree, or those in which they differ, we are content with simply saying that the court in that case said that the direction for sale was "imperative," and did not depend on the "request or consent" of the testator's children, while in this case there is no imperative direction to sell, and the power to sell does depend on the direction of the beneficiaries. Affirm the decree.

PRENTICE v. JANSSEN.

(79 N. Y. 478.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1879.

C. Bainbridge Smith, for appellants. Joshua M. Van Cott, for respondents.

MILLER, J. The complaint in this action demands an equitable partition or sale of several pieces of land therein described, upon a portion of which was erected a hotel, called the Pavilion Hotel, together with the personal property, consisting of furniture in said hotel, and that an account be taken of the disbursements and expenditures made by the plaintiff, Augustus Prentice, for the benefit of and as additions to said property, and that the share of the defendant, Mary Ann Janssen, be charged upon the same and deducted from her portion of the proceeds of the sale of the property. The land belonged to Francis Blancard at the time of his decease in 1868, and the title is derived under the provisions of his last will and testament. The plaintiff, Augustus Prentice, holds three-fourths, by conveyances from the residuary legatees or their representatives, and the defendant, Mary Ann Janssen, the remaining one-fourth. The defendant last named has joined with the plaintiff in making leases of the property since 1873; large sums have been expended in making improvements by the owners, and the rents have been received and applied in part, if not entirely, for that purpose.

The residuary clause in the will of Francis Blancard devised and bequeathed his property to five of his children, among whom were Francis H. Blancard and the defendant, Mary Ann Janssen. It also authorized Francis H. Blancard to carry on the hotel business in the Pavilion Hotel, for the term of five years, if he so desired, and the executors were empowered and directed, after the testator's death, to sell and convert into money all the real and personal property of which he should be seized or possessed, including the hotel property, after the right of occupancy of his son had ceased, as they should deem advisable, and divide the proceeds equally among the residuary legatees. The son, Francis H., died before the testator, and no action was ever taken by the executors to sell the property, and it remained undisposed of, and was used and regarded by the owners as real estate to which they had title. Only one of the executors, the defendant, Gerhard Janssen, was living at the time of the commencement of this action, and he is made a party, as the husband of the defendant, Mary Ann Janssen, and does not by his answer claim any rights as executor or that he is a proper party as such. The answers admitted that plaintiff and the defendant, Mrs. Janssen, owned the property as tenants in common. We think that under the provisions cited from the testator's will, the executors who were donees of a power took no estate in the lands as trustees, but merely a power in trust to be executed for the purposes of distribution, according to the will, which was liable to be defeated by a reconversion of the property, which was made personal by the will, into real estate.

The testator by the authority and direction to his executors to sell the real estate, constructively converted the same into personal estate, and being thus converted, the residuary legatees were entitled to take the same as such and had a right at their election to reconvert into real estate. No distinct and positive act is required for such a purpose, and the rule applicable to such a case is that "in the reconversion of real estate a slight expression of intention will likewise be considered sufficient to demonstrate an election on the part of those absolutely entitled." Leigh & D. Conv. (5 Law Library), m. p. 168; Mutlow v. Bigg, L. R., 1 Ch. Div. 385; 1 Jarm. Wills, 523 et seq. The real estate was not disposed of by the executors under the provisions contained in the will, and as there was no lawful purpose for which a sale was absolutely required there was no obstacle to prevent a reconversion of the same by the parties in interest from personal into real estate. This they elected to do by positive and unequivocal acts. Three of the four residuary interests were conveyed to the plaintiff, Augustus Prentice, and the defendant, Mary Ann Janssen, retained the other one-fourth. The whole has since been enjoyed, possessed and treated the same as real estate. This was done by the acquiescence of the executors and all the parties in interest, not only by possession, but by acts showing their intention beyond any question. In Story, Eq. Jur. § 793, it is said that if land is directed to be converted into money merely, the party entitled to the beneficial interest may if he elects so to do, prevent any conversion of the property and hold it as it is. This has been done by the residuary legatees here; and as the lands were not sold and disposed of by the executors, and no diversion made, the rule applies that the person entitled to the money, being of lawful age, can elect to take the land, if the rights of others will not be affected by such election. Hetzel v. Barber, 69 N. Y. 1, 11. No rights of other parties were injured by the election to reconvert; and as three-fourths of the residuary interests had been sold and conveyed to the plaintiff by those who were entitled to the proceeds of a sale, if one had been made under the power, and the owner of the remaining one-fourth had assented to the reconversion, by exercising acts of ownership, and the purpose of the power had become unattainable, the power to sell became extinguished, and the plaintiff and defendant already named became owners as tenants in common. Hetzel v.

Barber, supra; Garvey v. McDevitt, 72 N. Y. 563. Neither the will itself nor the surrounding circumstances evince in any way that the testator intended not only to confer a power of sale, but that the exercise of such power would become absolutely necessary to enable the executors to make the distribution required to the residuary legatees, within the principle laid down in Crittenden v. Fairchild, 41 N. Y. 289, 292, which is relied upon by the defendant's counsel. The facts here are far different from the case cited. The distribution was actually made and the purpose of the will fully accomplished by the reconversion of the personal estate into real estate by the parties in interest, as is quite obvious, and each of the legatees had received their full share as directed; thus rendering the exercise of the power of no avail. It follows that the executors having only a power to sell for the purpose of distribution—which power never was exercised, and which became of no use by reason of the reconversion of the land into realty—Gerhard Janssen, the surviving executor, had no right, title, interest, or lien upon the property, which rendered him a necessary party to the action as such executor. The provision of 1 Rev. St. p. 735, § 107, which makes a power of sale a lien or charge upon the land, has no application when it had ceased to operate, and was of no practical use. As by the reconversion no interest remained in the executors, there could be no lien or charge upon the land. Equity would not interfere to compel the execution of the power under 1 Rev. St. p. 734, § 96, because the purpose had been accomplished without its exercise.

Nor was it necessary that Gerhard Janssen, the surviving executor, should be a party for any other reason. In regard to the payment of debts and legacies there was no evidence that any debt or legacy remained unpaid when this action was brought. Seven years had then elapsed, and as debts and legacies are primarily to be paid out of the personal estate, unless express directions or a clear intent to the contrary is found, or to be gathered from the will (Bevan v. Cooper, 72 N. Y. 317; Kinnier v. Rogers, 42 N. Y. 531), the presumption is that they have been paid. The burden of proof was on the defendants to establish that they were not, if such was the fact. No such defense was set up in the answer or interposed upon the trial, and as the case stood the plaintiff was not required to show that the debts and legacies had been paid. The same remarks will apply to the point made, that there was no payment or accounting for the testamentary expenses.

Charles Blancard, a son of the testator, was not, we think, a necessary party defendant in this action. By the will he is bequeathed the sum of $5,000, and he is not named therein as a residuary legatee. It is claimed that he became entitled to an interest in the residuary portion of the estate which was given by the testator to his brother Francis, who died before the testator, without leaving any child or descendant, and that the share bequeathed and devised to Francis lapsed and his share descended to the testator's heirs at law; that Charles Blancard was one of them, and therefore a necessary party to the action. Without considering the question whether the devise to Francis H. Blancard having lapsed it passed, under the residuary clause, to the four children named who survived him, or whether the papers produced upon the argument of this appeal, showing that Charles Blancard had sold and conveyed away all the interest which he may have had in the property, and therefore was not a proper and necessary party to the action, it is sufficient to say that the point does not arise upon the record before us, and it is a complete answer to the objection that the admission made by the pleadings, that the plaintiff and the defendant are the sole owners of the real estate, dispensed with the production of evidence upon the trial to establish such fact and preclude the objection that Charles Blancard had an outstanding interest as an heir at law under the residuary clause in the will of Francis Blancard.

No title was acquired by the deed from Wemple, as executor of Caroline Blancard, deceased, of the interest of the decedent in one of the lots of the Pavilion Hotel, to the defendant, Mary Ann Janssen. Nor is there any valid reason why Mrs. Janssen should be subrogated in this action to his rights because the real estate had been converted into personalty. By the will of Caroline Blancard the executor was authorized and empowered, during the minority of the nephews and nieces of the testatrix, to whom she had given one-half of the property, to sell or lease jointly with the other owners of the undivided shares therein. After one of the devisees became of age the executor conveyed to Mrs. Janssen all the interest and estate vested in him as such. He had no estate in the premises and only a power in trust, which was to be executed while the devisees were in a minority in connection with the other owners. He had therefore no authority to execute the conveyance to Mrs. Janssen, and the deed was invalid and conferred upon her no title. Subsequently Mr. Wemple, as special guardian of one of the devisees, who was an infant, by order of the court conveyed all of her interest under the will of Caroline Blancard, including that which had been previously attempted to be conveyed to Mrs. Janssen, to the plaintiff, Augustus Prentice, and by other conveyances the interest of the other devisees was acquired by him. As the executor had no authority to convey the premises, the right acquired by the deed of the special guardian could not be affected by the knowledge of the purchaser of the conveyance to Mrs. Janssen.

We think that the share of Mrs. Janssen was properly chargeable with its proportion of expenditures made by Augustus Prentice, the plaintiff, for repairs and improvements of the property. By the lease $5,000 was to be applied for improvements and repairs. It was supposed that they would not exceed that amount; but the covenant to make repairs was properly construed by the referee to mean that the lessors were to make all repairs, whether they exceeded the sum named or not. It also appears from the referee's findings that Mrs. Janssen after she had knowledge that the repairs exceeded the sum specified, assented to the appropriation of additional sums due for rents, to be used in making improvements; that she stood by and did not object to the erection of a new building, and she thus acquiesced in all the expenditures actually made. Under such circumstances there certainly was an implied obligation that she should pay her share of the moneys expended for the benefit of the property in which she had a common interest, and they are a proper charge against the defendant's portion of the real estate sought to be partitioned or sold. In making the repairs the plaintiff, Augustus Prentice, did not occupy the position of a volunteer, without any authority of his co-tenant, but acted under the lease, which, as we have seen, covered the amount actually expended, and that this was done with the assent and approval of the defendant. The case of Taylor v. Baldwin, 10 Barb. 582, 626, which is relied upon by the defendant's counsel, is not adverse to the views expressed.

There is no valid objection to charging the defendant's share of the proceeds of the sale with the amounts expended, as found by the referee. These expenses were incurred in reference to the property under special circumstances which, we think, render it chargeable therewith, and the judgment properly provided for the payment of defendant's proportion out of her share of the avails realized upon a sale. Nor is any reason shown why she should not be charged with her share of the costs, as found by the referee.

There was no error in the allowance of the architect's fees. Although there is some confusion in the referee's report in regard thereto, it nevertheless appears from the receipts introduced in evidence that the amounts charged in the account were actually paid to him.

We think the court properly ordered that the sale of the real estate and the personal property should be made as one parcel. The real estate as the referee found was so situated that a sale of one portion would interfere materially with the value of the remainder, and the personal property, being purchased for the benefit of the hotel, was of such a character that it could be disposed of more advantageously by a sale with the real estate than by a separate sale. No reason therefore exists why the sale of the whole real and personal estate should not be made together in a single lot. We have examined the authorities cited by the defendant's counsel upon the question last considered, and none of them sustain the position that the court has not the power, in an equitable action, where the parties are tenants in common of real and personal property, to direct a sale of both in one parcel when their interest will be promoted by such a sale.

There was no error, and the judgment should be affirmed. All concur.

Judgment affirmed.

KOPPER v. DYER.
DYER v. KOPPER et al.
(9 Atl. 4. 59 Vt. 477.)

Supreme Court of Vermont. April 30, 1887.

Appeal from chancery, Addison county, December term, 1886; Taft, Chancellor.

Bill in chancery seeking relief from a decree of foreclosure, which had become absolute, on the ground of accident. Heard on pleadings and master's report. Decree that the orator is entitled to relief according to the prayer of his bill, and that the cross-bill of defendant, Dyer, be dismissed, with costs, from which defendant appealed.

In August, 1880, defendant, John M. Dyer, sold and conveyed to Frederick Kopper the premises in controversy, known as the "Lake Dunmore Hotel Property," together with a large amount of personal property used in connection therewith, for $13,500. Of said purchase money, $10,500 was secured by mortgages of said real estate and personal property, both executed by Kopper to Dyer, August 23, 1880, conditioned that Kopper pay Mary C. Goddard, according to their tenor, certain notes, amounting to $10,500, which Dyer had executed, and which were secured by mortgage on his other real estate; that Kopper pay all unassessed taxes on the Lake Dunmore property on the grand list of 1880; and that he keep the premises insured in the sum of $5,000 for Dyer's benefit. The premises have been continually occupied by Kopper, with the exception stated below, and he is now in possession. The taxes were paid by Kopper to and including 1884. The condition respecting insurance has not been complied with. In 1884, Dyer paid insurance premiums to the amount of $75. For default in payment, Mary C. Goddard foreclosed her mortgage against Dyer, and obtained a decree of foreclosure at the September term, 1882, of the Franklin county court of chancery. January 19, 1883, Dyer, fearing that Kopper might not satisfy the Goddard decree, and for the purpose of being sure that his own property would not be sacrificed, procured the National Life Insurance Company to hold in readiness for him the amount required to pay that decree; and on May 23, 1883, obtained the same from the company, and paid it in satisfaction of that decree. Dyer was also compelled to pay the company the further sum of $193.85, in consideration of its having held said amount in readiness from January to May. Dyer also paid $32.86 costs of the Goddard foreclosure. Dyer made several attempts to foreclose his mortgage against Kopper, and finally it was decreed "that, unless the said Frederick Kopper pay to the clerk of this court, for the benefit of the orator, the sum of $500 on or before January 1, 1885, and the sum of $8,052.09 on or before the first day of June, 1885, he, (the said Frederick Kopper,) and all persons claiming under him, shall be foreclosed and forever barred from all equity of redemption in said premises." Kopper did not pay the $500 as required by the decree, but sent his personal check under circumstances stated in the opinion. January 2, 1885, Dyer obtained of the clerk of the court a certified copy of the decree for record, and a writ of possession thereunder, and immediately took possession of the property, and has paid taxes thereon since. Kopper at once brought the original bill in this cause, praying for such relief as shall give the orator the benefit of the payment already made, as much as he would have had if the currency had been paid into court, as ordered by the decree; that the decree be opened, and further order made on terms, meet to the court, to relieve the orator from the loss that must result to him should no relief be granted; and for an injunction restraining the defendant from any further proceedings under the writ of possession, and from exercising any use or control of the premises. The bill and injunction were served, and Dyer withdrew from the premises. June 1, 1885, Kopper caused the sum of $8,600 to be tendered Dyer in payment of the installment of said decree falling due on that day. Dyer refused to receive it, claiming that Kopper did not owe him, and that the property was his. Kopper afterwards filed his supplemental bill in this cause, setting up the tender, and claiming the benefit thereof, with said payment of $500 to the clerk as a compliance with the terms of the foreclosure decree. Dyer filed his answer to said bill, September 22, 1885, and an amendment thereto, February 20, 1886. May 29, 1885, Kopper conveyed the premises, together with the personal property thereon, which had been mortgaged to Dyer, to Wyman H. Merritt and Frank E. Briggs by warranty deed, which deed was given Merritt and Briggs as security to them for the loan of the money which was tendered to Dyer, June 1, 1885. April 14, 1886, Dyer filed his cross-bill against Kopper, Merritt, and Briggs, for a disclosure of the mortgaged personal property, for surrender of the premises, and an accounting for their use; or, if the decree is to be opened and further time given to redeem, for a correction of the decree, and an accounting and foreclosure. Demurrers to the cross-bill having been overruled, the same was taken as confessed against Merritt and Briggs; and Kopper filed his answer thereto June 19, 1886. The other facts appear in the opinion.

Stewart & Wilds, for Dyer. Ormsbee & Briggs, J. M. Slade, and Noble & Smith, for Kopper.

ROWELL, J. Kopper seeks relief on the ground of accident. That chancery may grant relief on that ground, in cases of this kind, cannot be doubted; and the first question that arises is, has the orator made a case that calls for the interposition of the court in his behalf?

The term "accident," in its legal significance, is difficult to define. Judge Story defines it as embracing, "not merely inevitable casualty, or the act of Providence, or what is technically called vis major, or irresistible force, but such unforeseen events, misfortunes, losses, acts or omissions, as are not the result of any negligence or misconduct in the party" affected thereby. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 78. Mr. Pomeroy justly criticises this definition as including what are not accidents at all, but mistakes, and as omitting the very central element of the equitable conception, and defines it thus: "'Accident' is an unforeseen and unexpected event, occurring external to the party affected by it, and of which his own agency is not the proximate cause, whereby, contrary to his own intention and wish, he loses some legal right, or becomes subjected to some legal liability, and another person acquires a corresponding legal right, which it would be a violation of good conscience for the latter person, under the circumstances, to retain." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 823. And the chief point of the thing is that, because of the unforeseen and unexpected character of the occurrence by which the legal relation of the parties has been unintentionally changed, the party injuriously affected thereby is, in good conscience, entitled to relief that will restore those relations to their original character, and place him in his former position. Id. § 824. But, as a general rule, relief will not be granted unless it can be done with justice to the other party; for, if he cannot be put in as good a situation as he would have been in had the other party performed, the court will not interpose. Rose v. Rose, Amb. 331.

Equity, in many instances, relieves against forfeitures occasioned by the non-payment of money at a day certain; and this, although there is no accident, but negligence instead, on the ground that the condition and the forfeiture are regarded as merely security for the payment of the money. This is the ground on which tenants are relieved from forfeitures for the non-payment of rent as stipulated, and mortgagors are allowed to redeem after the law-day has passed. And although the agreement is not wholly pecuniary, nor measured by pecuniary compensation, still, if the party bound by it has been prevented by accident, without his fault, from an exact fulfillment, so that a forfeiture is thereby incurred, equity will interpose, and relieve him from the forfeiture, upon his making compensation, if necessary, or doing anything else in his power to satisfy the equitable rights of the other party. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 833.

In Cage v. Russel, 2 Vent. 352, it is laid down as a standing rule of equity that a forfeiture shall not bind when the thing can be done afterwards, or any compensation can be made for it. Forfeitures are odious, and courts struggle against them, and relief is granted for the non-performance of diverse collateral acts whereby they are incurred; as for not laying out a specific sum in repairs in a given time, (Sanders v. Pope, 12 Ves. 282,) for cutting down timber when covenanted against, (Northcote v. Duke, Amb. 511,) for not renewing a lease in time, (Rawstorne v. Bentley, 4 Brown Ch. *415,) and the like. Relief is also granted against forfeitures incurred by unintentional breaches of the condition of mortgages for support, on terms that the party in fault fully compensate and indemnify the other party for all he has lost by reason of the breach. Henry v. Tupper, 29 Vt. 358.

In Adams v. Haskell, 10 Wis. 123, the defendants were prevented by accident from reaching the place of a foreclosure sale until after it was completed, and the court for that reason ordered a resale, but on terms.

In Pierson v. Claves, 15 Vt. 93, the orator, by reason of pending negotiations of settlement, without negligence on his part, let the time of redemption expire; and he was relieved by opening the decree, and giving further time to redeem.

The case of Bostwick v. Stiles, 35 Conn. 195, is confessedly much in point. That was a bill to open a decree of foreclosure, and obtain further time. The mortgage debt was about $4,000, and the value of the premises twice that sum. The time limited for payment was August 5th. The petitioner intended to redeem, but, not having sufficient means of his own, he applied to his uncle—a man of property—to help him, and he agreed to, and to furnish the money on August 3d, on which the petitioner relied; but, for some reason not explained, he did not furnish the money as agreed, and the petitioner delayed making other arrangements until the evening of August 5th, when he applied to Russell for assistance. Russell had no money, but plenty of government bonds, and agreed to make payment in them if defendant would take them; and accordingly went to defendant's house that evening, after defendant had gone to bed, and told his wife that he had come prepared to redeem the mortgage for the petitioner, but defendant did not get up, but sent word by his wife that he was sick, and Russell went away. On this state of facts, the court held that the petitioner's failure to pay on August 5th was occasioned by accident, without fault or neglect on his part, and that the accident lay in the fact of his uncle's failure to furnish the money as agreed, and as the petitioner had reason to believe he would. The court says that there is a degree of uncertainty in regard to all business expectations, and that no more ought to be required in respect of future obligations imposed by law than that such means shall be taken to fulfill them as will render it reasonably certain, as far as human sagacity can foresee, that they will be performed.

It is common in England to enlarge the time of redemption on application before the day of payment; and, though the indulgence is not granted of course, it is said not to require a very strong case to obtain it. And the time may be enlarged more than once. Thus, in Jones v. Creswicke, 9 Sim. 304, after the time had been enlarged, and after the order absolute had been made, though not drawn up, the time was again enlarged, on the ground that the man who had agreed to lend the defendant the money was prevented by illness from going up to London on the day it was due, and his wife, whom he had deputed to carry it up, was prevented from doing so because the London coach was full the day before. And see Edwards v. Cunliffe, 1 Madd. 287.

And the decree may be opened after the order absolute has been made and enrolled. Thus, in Ford v. Wastell, 6 Hare, 229, notwithstanding the order absolute had been drawn up and enrolled, the decree was opened because all the plaintiff's property was involved in an administration suit that she was justified in believing would terminate in season to enable her to avail herself of her property with which to meet the payment, but which had not yet terminated. See, also, Thornhill v. Manning, 1 Sim. (N. S.) 451, in which the promptness of the mortgagor in applying was regarded as the great and important feature in the case to guide the court in deciding what it ought to do.

Applying these principles, as shown and illustrated by the cases, it is quite out of the question to say that the defendant is entitled to keep this property, and that the orator has not made a case that calls for the interposition of the court in his behalf. The orator gave $13,500 for the property, and had paid $2,724 towards it, and expended about $10,000 upon it in improvements and repairs; and on January 1, 1885, the time limited by the decree for paying the installment of $500, he believed the real estate fairly worth $5,000 or $6,000 more than he gave for it. He was exceedingly anxious to redeem the property, but had no available means of his own, and relied for means wherewith to pay his debts partly on income assured to members of his family, and partly on the equity of redemption in the property, his ability to make which available at the value he put upon it being his only means of escape from absolute bankruptcy. It appears that his wife and her sister, Miss Jenkins, owned property in New York City, as to which he was agent, and that before and on December 29, 1884, he had been in negotiation with one Martin of that city in respect to leasing it to him; and it was agreed that, on delivery of proper leases thereof, Martin should advance to him $650 towards performance on his part, and Kopper relied on the use of that money to pay the $500 installment. Accordingly he went to New York on December 30th, with the lease executed, found Martin, and made an appointment with him for 11 o'clock the next day; and, on going to the place at the time appointed, found a message postponing the appointment to the office of an attorney down town at 2 that afternoon; whereupon, being unable to communicate with Martin, he went to the office down town at 2, and found that Martin had been there, but had gone. He afterwards met Martin on the street, and, being exceedingly anxious to obtain the money, persuaded him to go back to the attorney's office; but, he being out, they went to another attorney's office, and he was out; and finally he persuaded Martin to give him his check for $650 before the leases were approved by an attorney. But this was after 3 o'clock, when all the banks in the city were closed. Said check was good, but, being drawn on a bank in the upper part of the city, and it being after banking hours, it was impossible for Kopper to draw the money on it that day. He had for several years kept a deposit account with the Second National Bank of that city, and had at this time a small balance standing to his credit there, and that bank was accustomed to place to his credit the amount of such checks as he deposited there properly indorsed. He had previously carried checks to that bank after business hours for deposit, handing them in over the railing to be credited to him at the opening of the bank the next day. On this occasion he properly indorsed said check "for deposit," and sent it to said bank by a district messenger boy, but whether it reached the bank or not that day does not appear. At the same time he drew two checks on said bank to the order of the person who was then the clerk of the court in which the decree was obtained,—one for $575, (which he supposed to be the amount required to pay said installment, but which was in fact more than was required;) and one for $25, for a sum otherwise payable to the clerk,—inclosed them in an envelope, with a letter to the clerk, went to the Grand Central Depot, and sent the package to Middlebury by the porter of the sleeping-car, inclosing it in another envelope to the station-agent there, requesting him to deliver the package to the clerk immediately, which he did on the morning of January 1st, which day was a legal holiday in New York; and the $650 check was passed to Kopper's credit by the Second National Bank on the next day, the first business day after it was received. Dyer refused to take Kopper's check of the clerk, and the clerk did not treat it as payment of the installment, nor regard it as available funds in his hands, until it was paid, and the avails credited to him by the collecting bank, which was on January 5th, on which day he was trustee by some of Kopper's other creditors, and on the 6th this bill was brought.

On these facts, and the others disclosed by the record, Kopper cannot justly be charged with negligence. The means he had tak-

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—11

Digitized by

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

en to obtain the money rendered it reasonably certain that he would succeed, and that he was anxious to obtain it abundantly appears. That he did not meet Martin at 11 nor at 2 was an unforeseen and unexpected occurrence, external to himself, of which his agency was not the proximate, nor even the remote, cause, and thereby he was prevented from sending his money seasonably, in a form that would have been treated and regarded as payment, whereby, contrary to his own intention and wish, he lost his legal right to pay, and Dyer acquired a legal right not to have him pay; and in these circumstances Kopper is entitled to relief that will reinstate him in his former position, on terms that he satisfy the equitable rights of the other party.

But he cannot have relief under his bill as drawn, for it is not adapted to his case. The original bill goes upon the ground that he is entitled to have his attempted payment of the first installment treated as an actual, seasonable payment; while the supplemental bill sets up a tender of the other installment, and asks that it be adjudged a payment thereof, and that the defendant be decreed to accept and receive the same in full satisfaction and discharge of the decree. But his attempted payment was not payment, and he is not entitled to have it treated as such, because neither the money, nor its equivalent, seasonably came into the hands of the clerk, and Dyer was not bound to accept and receive his check as payment, though he might have safely taken the money after the time expired, if he could have got it; for taking an installment after the time for paying it is expired does not open the decree as to installments for the payment of which the time has not expired. Smalley v. Hickok, 12 Vt. 153; Gilson v. Whitney, an unreported case in Windsor county a few years ago, ut audiui. Nor was the tender of the second installment effective; for, not having paid the first, he had no legal standing for tendering the second.

Redemption is the appropriate relief in this case. Indeed, it is said that whenever a mortgagor is driven to the necessity of filing a bill against the mortgagee, it must be one to redeem, and that the court can relieve him only by allowing a redemption. Goldsmith v. Osborne, 1 Edw. Ch. 560; Cholmley v. Countess of Oxford, 2 Atk. 267; Lord Langdale in Dalton v. Hayter, 7 Beav. 313. But the bill lacks some of the essential elements of a bill to redeem. It neither offers nor avers a willingness to pay, which is necessary by all the authorities. But, inasmuch as the orator is entitled to relief, he should not be turned out of court, but allowed to amend his bill into a bill to redeem, if he shall be so advised. Harrigan v. Bacon, 57 Vt. 644.

There was no necessity for bringing the cross-bill. The chattel mortgage was not embraced in the original bill, and so could not be the subject of a decree; and discovery of property subject to it could not aid in defending the original bill. As to the execution of the decree by giving possession, that can be done by summary process. R. L. §§ 766, 767; Kershaw v. Thompson, 4 Johns. Ch. 609; Ludlow v. Lansing, Hopk. Ch. 231; Valentine v. Teller, Id. 422; Yates v. Hambly, 2 Atk. 237.

As to the use of the premises pending suit, the defendant would be entitled in respect thereof, if at all, only on failure of the original bill, in which event he could avail himself of his rights by way of claim for injunction damages. And, as to the alternative prayer for foreclosing any remaining equity, that would be the result of any decree on the original bill. Nor was there any necessity for bringing in Briggs and Merritt, for they purchased pendente lite, and so will be bound by any decree made. Besides, treating them as entitled to the benefit of their demurrer, as they were treated at the bar, they are not proper parties to the cross-bill; for new parties cannot be made in that way. A cross-bill, by force of the term, is a bill by a defendant against the plaintiff or other defendants in the same suit, or both. If an orator desires to make new parties, he amends his bill, and makes them, although it be in respect of matters that have transpired since the filing of his bill; though until very recently, in respect of such matters, he would have brought a supplemental bill. If the interest of the defendant requires the presence of new parties, he takes his objection for want of them, and the orator is forced to bring them in, or have his bill dismissed; and if, at the hearing, the court finds new parties indispensable, it refuses to proceed. These remedies cover the whole subject, and a cross-bill to make new parties is not only irregular and improper, but wholly unnecessary. Shields v. Barrow, 17 How. 130.

But if they are not entitled to the benefit of their demurrer because the bill has been taken as confessed as to them, yet Kopper's defense avails for them; for, when the defendants are jointly interested, a decree pro confesso as to some merely takes away their standing in court, and disentitles them to appear or be heard on many questions certainly without an order of court; but the success of the others avails for them, and the bill will be dismissed as to all. 1 Hoff. Ch. Pr. 554; Clason v. Morris, 10 Johns. 524; Frow v. De La Vega, 15 Wall. 552.

As to the terms that will satisfy the equitable rights of Dyer. As between the two, it belonged to Kopper to pay the Goddard mortgage, and Dyer stood as his surety in respect thereof. Field v. Hamilton, 45 Vt. 35; Wells v. Tucker, 57 Vt. 223; Comstock v. Drohan, 71 N. Y. 9. Hence Dyer is entitled to be reimbursed, not only the principal sum that he paid to redeem said mortgage, but his reasonable costs and expenses in that behalf in good faith incurred. Hayden v. Cabot, 17 Mass. 168; Downer v. Baxter, 30 Vt. 467; Hulett v. Soullard, 26 Vt. 295; Comstock v. Drohan, 71 N. Y. 9.

As to the costs of that foreclosure, it sufficiently appears that they were properly incurred, and Dyer is justly entitled to reimbursement. But, as to the amount paid by him to the insurance company for holding in readiness the money wherewith to redeem, it does not sufficiently appear that that was such a prudent and necessary thing to do in the circumstances as to entitle him to reimbursement. The mortgage of the premises in question being conditioned to keep the property insured for Dyer's benefit, which Kopper neglected to do, he is chargeable with the insurance premium of $75 that Dyer was compelled to pay in 1884, and this was included in the decree. He is also chargeable with the $60.30 paid by Dyer for taxes, as shown by the master's report, as well as with all the other taxes that Dyer has since paid, or that he shall hereafter pay, or become liable to pay, on the property.

As Kopper put his bill upon false ground, namely, that he had performed the decree when he had not, Dyer was justified in defending it, and should recover his costs; and as Dyer had a right, after the decree became absolute, to deal with the property as his own, he is entitled to the costs of his writ of possession, and of the execution of it. Cree v. Lord, 25 Vt. 498. In Thornhill v. Manning, 1 Sim. (N. S.) 451, the costs of an ejectment were allowed in a similar case.

The decree dismissing the cross-bill is affirmed; but the decree for the orator in the original bill is reversed, and the case remanded, with mandate.

PATTON et al. v. CAMPBELL.

(70 Ill. 72.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Sept. Term, 1873.

Bentley, Swett & Quigg, for appellants.
Waite & Clarke, for appellee.

CRAIG, J. This was a bill in chancery, filed in the superior court of Cook county, by George W. Campbell, as assignee in bankruptcy of the late firm of Durham & Wood, against William Patton and others, to recover the value of certain goods which had been replevied by Patton & Co. from Durham & Wood.

It appears from the record that on or about the 20th of October, 1870, Patton & Co., of New York, sold Durham & Wood, of Chicago, a bill of goods, amounting to $1,600, on a credit of four months. About the first of November, after the sale, Durham & Wood failed, and Patton & Co. commenced an action of replevin to recover the goods they had sold. A replevin bond in the penal sum of $1,000, in the usual form, was filed with the papers in the action, and $800 or $900 worth of the goods were replevied.

In the fire of October 8th and 9th, 1871, the papers in the case, including the bond, were destroyed. Subsequently the action was dismissed.

The defendants answered the bill, to which replication was filed, the cause was heard on the proofs taken, and decree rendered in favor of complainants for $850.

The defendants bring the cause to this court, and seek to reverse the decree on two grounds:

First. For the reason a court of chancery has no jurisdiction, the remedy of complainants being complete at law.

Second. The purchase of goods from Patton & Co., by Durham & Wood, was fraudulent, and Patton & Co., upon discovery of the fraud, had the right to rescind the sale and replevy the property.

The questions will be considered in the order in which they are raised.

The bill in this case is filed to recover upon an instrument under seal, which had been destroyed.

The jurisdiction of a court of equity arising from accident is a very old head, in equity, and probably coeval with its existence. But it is not every case of accident which will justify the interposition of a court of equity. The jurisdiction will be maintained only when a court of law can not grant suitable relief; and where the party has a conscientious title to relief. 1 Story, Eq. Jur., § 79.

In case, however, of lost instruments under seal, equity takes jurisdiction, on the ground that, until a recent period, it was the settled doctrine that there was no remedy on a lost bond in a court of common law, because there could be no profit of the instrument, without which the declaration would be defective. The jurisdiction having been assumed and exercised on this ground, it is still retained and upheld. 1 Story, Eq. Jur., § 81; Walmsley v. Child, 1 Vesey, Sen., 341; Fisher v. Sievres, 65 Ill. 99.

Under the allegations in the bill in this cause, we think it is well settled that a court of equity had jurisdiction.

The remaining question in the case is, were the goods purchased under such circumstances as gave the appellants the right of rescission on the ground of fraud, or was there such a fraud practised that the title to the property did not pass to Durham & Wood?

The evidence shows that Hart, who was a traveling agent for appellants, called on Durham & Wood, in Chicago, to sell them goods. They examined his samples and told him they wanted to make a large order, and wanted to buy on four months' time. Hart told them, Patton & Co. hardly ever vary from three months' time. Durham remarked, he had bought and could buy of A. T. Stewart & Co., of New York, on four months' time. On this statement, Hart sold the goods on four months' time.

It turned out, on investigation, that Durham & Wood had only bought two bills of goods of Stewart & Co., and they were sold on thirty days' credit.

While it is true the statement made by Durham, that he had bought and could buy goods of Stewart & Co. on four months' time, was false, yet, it does not appear that this statement induced Hart to sell the goods; it only had the effect to cause him to give one month longer credit on the goods than he otherwise would, which did not, in this case, in anywise affect the rights of appellants, for the reason that the failure occurred and the goods were replevied within less than two months after the sale.

It appears, from the evidence, that Hart made no objection to sell the goods on three months' time; he neither asked nor required any representations from Durham, as to the standing or responsibility of the firm, to induce him to sell the goods on a credit of three months. At the time the goods were purchased, it does not appear that Durham & Wood were in failing circumstances, insolvent, or in any manner pressed by their creditors; for aught that appears they were at that time solvent, and responsible for all their contracts.

Neither does it appear that they made any false representations in regard to what they were worth, what property they owned, or the amount of debts they had contracted.

It is not shown that the goods were bought with the intent not to pay for them, or with a view to make an assignment.

We understand the rule to be, that if a party, knowing himself to be insolvent, or in failing circumstances, by means of fraudulent pretenses or representations, purchases goods with the intention not to pay for them, but with the design to cheat the vendor out of his goods, such facts would warrant the vendor in rescinding the contract for fraud, and would justify him in recovering possession of the property by replevin, where the goods had not in good faith passed into the hands of third parties. Henshaw v. Bryant, 4 Scam. 97.

But the case under consideration does not come within this rule.

There is no evidence in this record to show that the goods were bought with any impure or wrong motives.

It is true that, some two months after the purchase of the goods, the parties went into bankruptcy, but this was involuntary, and does not, of itself, show the condition of the firm at the time the goods were bought.

Upon a careful examination of the whole record, we are satisfied the decree of the court below was correct, and it will be affirmed.

BREWER v. HERBERT.

(30 Md. 301.)

Court of Appeals of Maryland. March 11, 1869.

Appeal from circuit court, Washington county, as a court of equity.

The bill in this case was filed by the appellee for an injunction to restrain proceedings at law and for the specific performance of a contract. The appellee was the owner of a dwelling house and half lot of ground situate in Hagerstown, and sold the same to the appellant on the 9th of October, 1865, by their agreement in writing, as follows, to wit:

"Articles of agreement made and concluded this 9th day of October, 1865, between F. Dorsey Herbert and John A. K. Brewer, both of Washington county and state of Maryland, witnesseth: That in consideration of the sum of four thousand dollars, to be paid as hereinafter mentioned, the said Herbert has this day sold to the said Brewer his house and half lot of ground, situated on the corner of West Washington and Prospect streets, in Hagerstown; and the said John A. K. Brewer on his part agrees to pay the said sum of four thousand dollars, as follows: Two thousand dollars on the 1st day of April, 1866; and one thousand dollars on the 1st day of April, 1867; and one thousand dollars on the 1st day of April, 1868,—with interest from the 1st day of April, 1866; and the said Herbert doth further agree to give the said Brewer possession of the same on the 1st day of April, 1866, and on payment of the whole purchase money to make a good and sufficient deed for the same, clear of all incumbrances, to the said Brewer. In witness whereof the parties hereto have set their hands and seals on the day and year first above written.

"[Signed] F. Dorsey Herbert. [Seal.]

"J. A. K. Brewer. [Seal.]"

Of the $2,000 to be paid by the agreement on the 1st day of April, 1866, the appellant, at the request of the appellee, paid $1,000 on the 10th day of October, 1865. At the time of sale the said premises were under lease by Herbert to Dr. Berry, whose term expired on the 1st day of April, 1866. The appellee held a policy of insurance for $1,000 on the house at the time of sale, which was allowed by him to expire about the last of January, 1866. On the 5th day of February, 1866, the house was totally destroyed by fire, but without any fault on the part of the appellee or his tenant, Berry. On Monday, the 2d day of April, 1866, the 1st being Sunday, the appellee made a tender of the premises, then a vacant lot, to the appellant, which he refused to receive in its destroyed condition. The appellant having refused to receive the ground, and holding that the appellee was unable to perform his part of the contract, by reason of the destruction of the house, brought suit on the law side of the court, to recover from the appellee the said $1,000, so as aforesaid paid to him. Whereupon the appellee filed the bill in this cause to enjoin said proceedings at law and for a specific execution of the agreement. The court below by its decree enjoined said proceedings at law, and decreed a specific execution. From this decree the present appeal was taken.

Before BARTOL, C. J., and GRASON, MILLER, and ROBINSON, JJ.

Wm. T. Hamilton, for appellant. A. K. Syester, for appellee.

MILLER, J. After the execution of the written contract for the sale of the house and lot, and before the day fixed for delivery of possession and payment of the first installment of purchase money, the house was accidentally destroyed by fire, without fault of either party or of the tenant then in possession of the same. The vendor had a fee simple title to the property, and at the proper time, under the contract, offered to deliver possession of the premises in the condition in which they then were. This the vendee refused to receive because of the destruction of the house by fire, and the main question in the case is, can he on this ground successfully resist this application in equity by the vendor for a specific performance of the contract?

In contracts of this kind between private parties, the vendee is in equity the owner of the estate from the time of the contract of sale, and must sustain the loss if the estate be destroyed between the agreement and the conveyance, and will be entitled to any benefit which may accrue to it in the interim. This doctrine, notwithstanding the dictum in Stent v. Bailey, 2 P. Wms. 290, to the contrary, was plainly announced and settled by the decision of Lord Eldon, in Paine v. Meller, 6 Ves. 349, a case very similar in its circumstances to the present, where it was held that if there was no objection to the title of the vendor, or it had been accepted in fact by the vendee before the houses were burned, no solid objection to the bill for specific performance could be founded on the mere effect of the accident before conveyance, "for if the party," says the lord chancellor, "by the contract has become in equity the owner of the premises, they are his to all intents and purposes. They are vendible as his, chargeable as his, capable of being incumbered as his; they may be devised as his; they may be assets; and they would descend to his heir." This decision has always been regarded as fixing the true equitable rule in such cases. It was recognized by Sir Thomas Plumer in Harford v. Purrier, 1 Madd. Ch. 287, and in Rawlins v. Burgis, 2 Ves. & B. 387, and by Lord Chancellor Manners in Revell v. Hussey, 2 Ball & B. 287. From these and other authorities of equal weight announcing the maxim that equity regards as done that which was agreed to be done is deduced as the established doctrine in equity that from the time the owner of an estate enters into a binding agreement for its sale he holds the same in trust for the purchaser, and the latter becomes a trustee of the purchase money for the vendor, and being thus in equity the owner the vendee must bear any loss which may happen, and is entitled to any benefit which may accrue to the estate in the interim between the agreement and the conveyance. 1 Sugd. Vend. 228, 388-391; 2 Powell, Cont. 69; Dart, Vend. 114-118; 2 Story, Eq. § 1212. The contract here is not for a sale at a future day; it does not use in this respect prospective or contingent terms. Its language is: The vendor "has this day sold to" the vendee his house and lot, which clearly imports a binding contract then executed and consummated. By such terms the title in equity passes from the date of the contract, and if there were nothing else in it there would be no room for argument, for it would be impossible to withdraw the case from the operation of the rule above stated.

But it has been earnestly and strenuously urged by the appellant's counsel that as the contract contains an agreement by the vendor to deliver possession of the house and lot to the vendee on the 1st of April, 1866, the destruction of the house by fire before that period rendered performance by the vendor of this part of the contract impossible, and he cannot, therefore, either in law or equity, ask the vendee to perform his part of it; and this circumstance, it is insisted, distinguishes the case from those cited, and prevents it from falling within the principle established by them. Let us test the soundness of this argument. The vendee knew before and at the time of the contract there was a tenant in possession whose term would not expire until the 1st of April, and the first installment of the purchase money is made payable on, and interest on the deferred payments runs from, that day. The subject-matter of sale is realty,—a lot of ground with a house upon it, described as a house and lot. The agreement as to delivery is not like the usual covenant by a tenant in a lease, to deliver in as good condition and repair as when the contract was made. There is also no difficulty about delivery, except that the premises were not, as to the buildings upon them, in the same condition as at the date of the contract. The question then resolves itself into this, does the fact of the insertion into a contract like the present for the sale of real estate, of an agreement to deliver possession at a future day, make any difference in the application of the rule? It is true it does not appear in the cases cited there were in the contracts any stipulations as to delivery of possession at a future day, nor is this circumstance alluded to, but they explicitly say it is the passing of the title in equity which throws the risk of loss upon the vendee, and entitles him to accruing benefits. To this, as we have seen, a conveyance is not necessary, nor is payment of the purchase money or any part of it; for in Hampson v. Edelen, 2 Har. & J. 66, this court has decided that "a contract for land bona fide made for a valuable consideration vests the equitable interest in the vendee from the time of the execution of the contract, although the money is not paid at that time." See, also, Siter's Appeal, 26 Pa. 180. Neither can possession nor delivery of possession be necessary, for, if the contract had been silent on this subject, the vendor would have had the right to retain possession at least until the 1st of April, when the first installment of the purchase money was payable, and if the vendee had obtained possession before he would have been restrained in equity from exercising any acts of ownership prejudicial to the inheritance (Crockford v. Alexander, 15 Ves. 138; Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. 202); and yet the equitable title would all the while have been in him, subject to his disposition by deed or will, and liable for his debts. If, then, in the absence of a stipulation to deliver at a future day, there is an implied right in the vendor to retain possession until that period, and this would make no difference as to the liability of the vendee for an intermediate loss, how can the insertion of such a stipulation have in equity any different effect? The whole foundation of this doctrine of equity is that the equitable title and interest passes by the contract of sale, and from the time of its execution, and it contemplates delivery of possession as well as payment of purchase money, and a conveyance at a future period. Hence Sir Edward Sugden and Sir Thomas Plumer both cite, as in exact accord with the decision of Lord Eldon, the rule of the civil law, where the very case is put in the Institutes: "Cum autem emptio et venditio contracta sit, periculum rei venditæ statim ad emptorem pertinet, tametsi adhuc ea res emptori tradita non sit: Itaque, si cædes totæ vel aliqua ex parte incendio consumptæ fuerint—emptoris damnum est, cui necesse est, licet rem non fuerit nactus, pretium solvere." In sales of personal property delivery of the goods sold is not necessary to pass the title as between the parties, where the statute of frauds has been gratified by giving something in earnest, or payment of the whole or part of the purchase money, or a sufficient note or memorandum in writing of the bargain, and in such case the property is at the buyer's risk before delivery. Franklin v. Long, 7 Gill & J. 418. And even where the seller remaining in actual possession agrees to deliver the property at a particular place, and it is destroyed by fire before such delivery, the loss will fall on the purchaser. Terry v. Wheeler, 25 N. Y. 520. Where sales are made under authority of a court, the contract is not regarded as consummated until it has received the court's sanction or ratification, and therefore any loss happening before confirmation falls upon the vendor. Ex parte Minor, 11

Ves. 559; Wagner v. Cohen, 6 Gill, 102. But where a loss occurs after confirmation, by which the contract is consummated, it falls upon the vendee, even though no purchase money has been paid, and the vendor remains in possession. This was expressly decided in Robertson v. Skelton, 12 Beav. 260, where Lord Langdale also said: "In equity the estate belongs to the purchaser from the date of the order to confirm the report, and the right of possession belongs to the vendor till the purchase money, for which it is security, has been paid." Again, if we look to the contract itself, and gather therefrom the intent of the parties, it is clear from the language used their intention was that the equitable title and interest should pass from the day of its execution. Upon this point its terms are too positive and explicit to admit of doubt. Delivery of possession and payment of purchase money were postponed to a future day for the convenience of each party respectively, and we cannot construe the agreement to deliver into a condition that the contract shall be void if there is any change in the state or value of the property on the day of delivery, nor interpolate any such words into the instrument. We are therefore constrained to hold the argument founded on this delivery clause to be unavailing to the appellant.

But it is said specific execution of contracts is in all cases not a matter of absolute right, but of sound discretion in the court, and as the vendor cannot now deliver the house which was the main inducement to the vendee to buy, and constituted the chief value of the property, it would be inequitable to enforce the contract as against him. If this objection were sound, this doctrine of losses and benefits could never have been established. But, whilst it is conceded an application for specific performance is always addressed to the sound discretion of the court, yet where a contract respecting real estate is in writing, and is in its nature and circumstances unobjectionable, it is as much a matter of course for a court of equity to decree a specific performance of it as it is for a court of law to give damages for a breach of it. Smoot v. Rea, 19 Md. 405; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 751. "The fairness or hardship of a contract, like all its other qualities, must be judged of at the time it was entered into, not by subsequent events." If it was then certain, mutual, fair in all its parts, and for an adequate consideration, it is immaterial that by force of subsequent circumstances it has become less beneficial to one party, unless such change is in some way the fault of the party seeking its specific execution. Revell v. Hussey, 2 Ball & B. 288; Lawder v. Blachford, Beat. 526; Webb v. Railway Co., 9 Hare, 129; Low v. Treadwell, 3 Fairf. 541; Fry, Spec. Perf. 93, 98. Adherence to principle compels the courts to overlook the hardship of particular cases. But the doctrine upon which this decision rests is founded in strict justice and equity, for whilst the vendee may think it hard to be compelled to pay for that which he cannot have in the condition it was when he purchased, the vendor, with equal justice, might think it hard to lose his money after a bona fide sale of his property, because of an accident accruing to it without fault on his part. It is to be remembered too that whilst the rule burthens the vendee with a loss it also entitles him to all benefits. Thus where a reversionary interest is agreed to be purchased, and lives drop, or one agrees to purchase an estate in consideration of a life annuity to the vendor, and the cestui que vie dies, or where there is a sudden rise in the value of the land from its being required for a public purpose, before conveyance, in all such cases the vendee reaps the benefit. So in the case before us, if a valuable mine had been discovered on the premises the day after the contract, or by any unforeseen or unexpected circumstances their value had been increased a hundred fold, the benefit would have resulted to the vendee, and the vendor could not have been released from his contract. We cannot, therefore, sustain this objection to the bill.

It appears that at the date of the contract the vendor held a policy of insurance upon the house, which by accident he allowed to expire without renewal before the fire, and of this the vendee received from him no notice. A similar state of facts existed in Paine v. Meller, and was held to constitute no objection to the vendor's bill. It is admitted there was no understanding between the parties that the vendor should keep the policy alive. They did not contract on any such basis. After the contract the vendee had an insurable interest in the house, and, in the absence of all agreement on the subject, the presumption is he intended to protect himself by insuring in his own name, or to take the risk of a failure to insure. The vendor was not bound to keep up the insurance or give notice to the vendee of its having expired. If the policy had existed at the time of the loss, the vendor could have recovered from the insurance company, but, being trustee of the premises for the vendee, he would be bound in equity to account to the latter for the money so received (Reed v. Lukens, 44 Pa. 200); but his failure to renew or to give notice cannot deprive him of his right to enforce the contract of sale.

It also appears there was at the date of the contract a judgment against the vendor for $2,363.38, but he had at that time entered an appeal from the judgment to the court of appeals, and given an appeal bond with security amply sufficient for that purpose to pay the amount of the judgment with costs, in case he should fail to prosecute his appeal with effect. The authorities are clear that equity will not compel a vendee to take an imperfect or defective title, yet cases of high authority are to be found in which a pecuniary charge against which adequate security has been given has been held not to constitute a defect in title, and also where equity has enforced the agreement where a perfect title can be made at the time of the decree. But this judgment thus appealed from, with appeal bond given, does not, in the sense in which courts of equity use the terms, make this such an imperfect or defective or incumbered title as will prevent specific execution, and especially not where the decree itself, as that appealed from in fact does, can protect the vendee by providing that the judgment debt may be paid by him out of the purchase money due on the contract and in discharge thereof.

We have bestowed upon the case our best care and consideration. We find nothing in the authorities cited by the appellant's counsel sufficient to overthrow the doctrine upon which we have based our decision, and can discover no ground upon which, in justice and equity, the appellee can be denied the relief he seeks. The decree must be affirmed.

Decree affirmed.

HUNT v. ROUSMANIER'S ADM'RS.

(8 Wheat. 174.)

Supreme Court of the United States. March 14, 1823.

Appeal from circuit court of Rhode Island.

The original bill, filed by the appellant, Hunt, stated, that Lewis Rousmanier, the intestate of the defendants, applied to the plaintiff, in January, 1820, for the loan of $1,450, offering to give, in addition to his notes, a bill of sale, or a mortgage of his interest in the brig Nereus, then at sea, as collateral security for the repayment of the money. The sum requested was lent; and on the 11th of January the said Rousmanier executed two notes for the amount; and on the 15th of the same month, he executed a power of attorney, authorizing the plaintiff to make and execute a bill of sale of three-fourths of the said vessel to himself, or to any other person; and in the event of the said vessel, or her freight, being lost, to collect the money which should become due on a policy by which the vessel and freight were insured. This instrument contained also, a proviso, reciting, that the power was given for collateral security for the payment of the notes already mentioned, and was to be void on their payment; on the failure to do which, the plaintiff was to pay the amount thereof, and all expenses, out of the proceeds of the said property, and to return the residue to the said Rousmanier. The bill further stated, that on the 21st of March, 1820, the plaintiff lent to the said Rousmanier the additional sum of $700, taking his note for payment, and a similar power to dispose of his interest in the schooner Industry, then also at sea. The bill then charged, that on the 6th of May, 1820, the said Rousmanier died insolvent, having paid only $200 on the said notes. The plaintiff gave notice of his claim; and on the return of the Nereus and Industry, took possession of them, and offered the intestate's interest in them, for sale. The defendants forbade the sale; and this bill was brought to compel them to join in it. The defendants demurred generally, and the court sustained the demurrer; but gave the plaintiff leave to amend his bill. Hunt v. Ennis, 2 Mason, 244, Fed. Cas. No. 6,889.

The amended bill stated, that it was expressly agreed between the parties, that Rousmanier was to give specific security on the Nereus and Industry; and that he offered to execute a mortgage on them. That counsel was consulted on the subject, who advised, that a power of attorney, such as was actually executed, should be taken in preference to a mortgage, because it was equally valid and effectual as a security, and would prevent the necessity of changing the papers of the vessels, or of taking possession of them on their arrival in port. The powers were, accordingly, executed, with the full belief that they would, and with the intention that they should, give the plaintiff as full and perfect security as would be given by a deed of mortgage. The bill prayed, that the defendants might be decreed to join in a sale of the interest of their intestate in the Nereus and Industry, or to sell the same themselves, and pay out of the proceeds the debt due to the plaintiff. To this amended bill, also, the defendants demurred, and on argument, the demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed. From this decree, the plaintiff appealed to this court. The cause was argued at the last term.

Mr. Wheaton, for appellant. Mr. Hunter, for respondents.

MARSHALL, C. J., delivered the opinion of the court. The counsel for the appellant objects to the decree of the circuit court on two grounds. He contends, 1. That this power of attorney does, by its own operation, entitle the plaintiff, for the satisfaction of his debt, to the interest of Rousmanier in the Nereus and the Industry. 2. Or, if this be not so, that a court of chancery will, the conveyance being defective, lend its aid to carry the contract into execution, according to the intention of the parties.

1. We will consider the effect of the power of attorney. This instrument contains no words of conveyance or of assignment, but is a simple power to sell and convey. As the power of one man to act for another, depends on the will and license of that other, the power ceases, when the will, or this permission, is withdrawn. The general rule, therefore, is, that a letter of attorney may, at any time, be revoked by the party who makes it; and is revoked by his death. But this general rule, which results from the nature of the act, has sustained some modification. Where a letter of attorney forms a part of a contract, and is a security for money, or for the performance of any act which is deemed valuable, it is generally made irrevocable, in terms, or if not so, is deemed irrevocable in law. 2 Esp. 565. Although a letter of attorney depends, from its nature, on the will of the person making it, and may, in general, be recalled at his will; yet, if he binds himself, for a consideration, in terms, or by the nature of his contract, not to change his will, the law will not permit him to change it. Rousmanier, therefore, could not, during his life, by any act of his own, have revoked this letter of attorney. But does it retain its efficacy after his death? We think, it does not. We think it well settled, that a power of attorney, though irrevocable during the life of the party, becomes extinct by his death.

This principle is asserted in Littleton (section 66), by Lord Coke, in his commentary on that section (52b), and in Willes' Reports (105, note, and 565). The legal reason of the rule is a plain one. It seems founded on the presumption, that the substitute acts by virtue of the authority of his principal, existing at the time the act is performed; and on the manner in which he must execute his authority, as stated in Combes' Case, 9 Coke, 766. In that case, it was resolved, that "when any has authority, as attorney, to do any act, he ought to do it in his name who gave the authority." The reason of this resolution is obvious. The title can, regularly, pass out of the person in whom it is vested, only by a conveyance in his own name; and this cannot be executed by another for him, when it could not, in law, be executed by himself. A conveyance in the name of a person, who was dead at the time, would be a manifest absurdity.

This general doctrine, that a power must be executed in the name of a person who gives it, a doctrine founded on the nature of the transaction, is most usually engrafted in the power itself. Its usual language is, that the substitute shall do that which he is empowered to do, in the name of his principal. He is put in the place and stead of his principal, and is to act in his name. This accustomed form is observed in the instrument under consideration. Hunt is constituted the attorney, and is authorized to make, and execute, a regular bill of sale, in the name of Rousmanier. Now, as an authority must be pursued, in order to make the act of the substitute the act of the principal, it is necessary, that this bill of sale should be in the name of Rousmanier; and it would be a gross absurdity, that a deed should purport to be executed by him, even by attorney, after his death; for, the attorney is in the place of the principal, capable of doing that alone which the principal might do.

This general rule, that a power ceases with the life of the person giving it, admits of one exception. If a power be coupled with an "interest," it survives the person giving it, and may be executed after his death. As this proposition is laid down too positively in the books to be controverted, it becomes necessary to inquire, what is meant by the expression, "a power coupled with an interest?" Is it an interest in the subject on which the power is to be exercised? or is it an interest in that which is produced by the exercise of the power? We hold it to be clear, that the interest which can protect a power, after the death of a person who creates it, must be an interest in the thing itself. In other words, the power must be engrafted on an estate in the thing. The words themselves would seem to import this meaning. "A power coupled with an interest," is a power which accompanies, or is connected with, an interest. The power and the interest are united in the same person. But if we are to understand by the word "interest," an interest in that which is to be produced by the exercise of the power, then they are never united. The power, to produce the interest, must be exercised, and by its exercise, is extinguished. The power ceases, when the interest commences, and therefore, cannot, in accurate law language, be said to be "coupled" with it.

But the substantial basis of the opinion of the court on this point, is found in the legal reason of the principle. The interest or title in the thing being vested in the person who gives the power, remains in him, unless it be conveyed with the power, and can pass out of him only by regular act in his own name. The act of the substitute, therefore, which, in such a case, is the act of the principal, to be legally effectual, must be in his name, must be such an act as the principal himself would be capable of performing, and which would be valid, if performed by him. Such a power necessarily ceases with the life of the person making it. But if the interest, or estate, passes with the power, and vests in the person by whom the power is to be exercised, such person acts in his own name. The estate, being in him, passes from him, by a conveyance in his own name. He is no longer a substitute, acting in the place and name of another, but is a principal, acting in his own name, in pursuance of powers which limit his estate. The legal reason which limits a power to the life of the person giving it, exists no longer, and the rule ceases with the reason on which it is founded. The intention of the instrument may be effected, without violating any legal principle.

This idea may be in some degree illustrated by examples of cases in which the law is clear, and which are incompatible with any other exposition of the term "power coupled with an interest." If the word "interest," thus used, indicated a title to the proceeds of the sale, and not a title to the thing to be sold, then a power to A., to sell for his own benefit, would be a power coupled with an interest; but a power to A., to sell for the benefit of B., would be a naked power, which could be executed only in the life of the person who gave it. Yet, for this distinction, no legal reason can be assigned. Nor is there any reason for it in justice; for, a power to A., to sell for the benefit of B., may be as much a part of the contract on which B. advances his money, as if the power had been made to himself. If this were the true exposition of the term, then a power to A., to sell for the use of B., inserted in a conveyance to A., of the thing to be sold, would not be a power coupled with an interest, and, consequently, could not be exercised, after the death of the person making it; while a power to A., to sell and pay a debt to himself, though not accompanied with any conveyance which might vest the title in him, would enable him to make the conveyance, and to pass a title, not in him, even after the vivifying principle of the power had become extinct. But every day's experience teaches us, that the law is not, as the first case put would suppose. We know, that a power to A., to sell for the benefit of B., engrafted on an estate conveyed to

A., may be exercised at any time, and is not affected by the death of the person who created it. It is, then, a power coupled with an interest, although the person to whom it is given had no interest in its exercise. His power is coupled with an interest in the thing, which enables him to execute it in his own name, and is, therefore, not dependent on the life of the person who created it.

The general rule, that a power of attorney, though irrevocable by the party, during his life, is extinguished by his death, is not affected by the circumstance, that testamentary powers are executed after the death of the testator. The law, in allowing a testamentary disposition of property, not only permits a will to be considered as a conveyance, but gives it an operation which is not allowed to deeds which have their effect during the life of the person who executes them. An estate given by will may take effect at a future time, or on a future contingency, and in the meantime, descends to the heir. The power is, necessarily, to be executed after the death of the person who makes it, and cannot exist during his life. It is the intention, that it shall be executed after his death. The conveyance made by the person to whom it is given, takes effect by virtue of the will, and the purchaser holds his title under it. Every case of a power given in a will, is considered in a court of chancery as a trust for the benefit of the person for whose use the power is made, and as a devise or bequest to that person.

It is, then, deemed perfectly clear, that the power given in this case, is a naked power, not coupled with an interest, which, though irrevocable by Rousmanier himself, expired on his death. It remains to inquire, whether the appellant is entitled to the aid of this court, to give effect to the intention of the parties, to subject the interest of Rousmanier in the Nereus and Industry to the payment of the money advanced by the plaintiff, on the credit of those vessels, the instrument taken for that purpose having totally failed to effect its object.

This is the point on which the plaintiff most relies, and is that on which the court has felt most doubt. That the parties intended, the one to give, and the other to receive, an effective security on the two vessels mentioned in the bill, is admitted; and the question is, whether the law of this court will enable it to carry this intent into execution, when the instrument relied on by both parties has failed to accomplish its object. The respondents insist, that there is no defect in the instrument itself; that it contains precisely what it was intended to contain, and is the instrument which was chosen by the parties, deliberately, on the advice of counsel, and intended to be the consummation of their agreement. That in such a case the written agreement cannot be varied by parol testimony. The counsel for the appellant contends, with great force, that the cases in which parol testimony has been rejected, are cases in which the agreement itself has been committed to writing; and one of the parties has sought to contradict, explain or vary it, by parol evidence. That in this case, the agreement is not reduced to writing. The power of attorney does not profess to be the agreement, but is a collateral instrument, to enable the party to have the benefit of it, leaving the agreement still in full force, in its original form. That this parol agreement, not being within the statute of frauds, would be enforced by this court, if the power of attorney had not been executed; and not being merged in the power, ought now to be executed. That the power being incompetent to its object, the court will enforce the agreement against general creditors. This argument is entitled to, and has received, very deliberate consideration.

The first inquiry respects the fact. Does this power of attorney purport to be the agreement? Is it an instrument collateral to the agreement? Or is it an execution of the agreement itself, in the form intended by both the parties? The bill states an offer on the part of Rousmanier to give a mortgage on the vessels, either in the usual form, or in the form of an absolute bill of sale, the vendor taking a defeasance; but does not state any agreement for that particular security. The agreement stated in the bill is, generally, that the plaintiff, in addition to the notes of Rousmanier, should have specific security on the vessel; and it alleges that the parties applied to counsel for advice respecting the most desirable mode of taking this security. On a comparison of the advantages and disadvantages of a mortgage, and an irrevocable power of attorney, counsel advised the latter instrument, and assigned reasons for his advice, the validity of which being admitted by the parties, the power of attorney was prepared and executed, and was received by the plaintiff as full security for his loans. This is the case made by the amended bill; and it appears to the court, to be a case in which the notes and power of attorney are admitted to be a complete consummation of the agreement. The thing stipulated was a collateral security on the Nereus and Industry. On advice of counsel, this power of attorney was selected, and given as that security. We think it a complete execution of that part of the agreement; as complete, though not as safe an execution of it, as a mortgage would have been.

It is contended, that the letter of attorney does not contain all the terms of the agreement. Neither would a bill of sale, nor a deed of mortgage, contain them. Neither instrument constitutes the agreement itself, but is that for which the agreement stipulated. The agreement consisted of a loan of money on the part of Hunt, and of notes for its repayment, and of a collateral security on the Nereus and Industry, on the part of Rousmanier. The money was advanced, the notes were given, and this letter of attorney was, on advice of counsel, executed and received as the collateral security which Hunt required. The letter of attorney is as much an execution of that part of the agreement which stipulated a collateral security, as the notes are an execution of that part which stipulated that notes should be given.

But this power, although a complete security, during the life of Rousmanier, has been rendered inoperative by his death. The legal character of the security was misunderstood by the parties. They did not suppose, that the power would, in law, expire with Rousmanier. The question for the consideration of the court is this: If money be advanced on a general stipulation to give security for its repayment on a specific article; and the parties deliberately, on advice of counsel, agree on a particular instrument, which is executed, but, from a legal quality inherent in its nature, that was unknown to the parties, becomes extinct by the death of one of them; can a court of equity direct a new security of a different character to be given? or direct that to be done which the parties supposed would have been effected by the instrument agreed on between them? This question has been very elaborately argued, and every case has been cited which could be supposed to bear upon it. No one of these cases decides the very question now before the court. It must depend on the principles to be collected from them.

It is a general rule, that an agreement in writing, or an instrument carrying an agreement into execution, shall not be varied by parol testimony, stating conversations or circumstances anterior to the written instrument. This rule is recognized in courts of equity as well as in courts of law; but courts of equity grant relief in cases of fraud and mistake, which cannot be obtained in courts of law. In such cases, a court of equity may carry the intention of the parties into execution, where the written agreement fails to express that intention. In this case, there is no ingredient of fraud. Mistake is the sole ground on which the plaintiff comes into court; and that mistake is in the law. The fact is, in all respects, what it was supposed to be. The instrument taken, is the instrument intended to be taken. But it is, contrary to the expectation of the parties, extinguished by an event not foreseen nor adverted to, and is, therefore, incapable of effecting the object for which it was given. Does a court of equity, in such a case, substitute a different instrument for that which has failed to effect its object?

In general, the mistakes against which a court of equity relieves, are mistakes in fact. The decisions on this subject, though not always very distinctly stated, appear to be founded on some misconception of fact. Yet some of them bear a considerable analogy to that under consideration. Among these, is that class of cases in which a joint obligation has been set up in equity against the representatives of a deceased obligor, who were discharged at law. If the principle of these decisions be, that the bond was joint, from a mere mistake of the law, and that the court will relieve against this mistake, on the ground of the pre-existing equity, arising from the advance of the money, it must be admitted, that they have a strong bearing on the case at bar. But the judges in the courts of equity seem to have placed them on mistake in fact, arising from the ignorance of the draftsman. In Simpson v. Vaughan, 2 Atk. 33, the bond was drawn by the obligor himself, and under circumstances which induced the court to be of opinion, that it was intended to be joint and several. In Underhill v. Horwood, 10 Ves. 209, 227, Lord Eldon, speaking of cases in which a joint bond has been set up against the representatives of a deceased obligor, says, "the court has inferred, from the nature of the condition, and the transaction, that it was made joint, by mistake. That is, the instrument is not what the parties intended in fact. They intended a joint and several obligation; the scrivener has, by mistake, prepared a joint obligation."

All the cases in which the court has sustained a joint bond against the representatives of the deceased obligor, have turned upon a supposed mistake in drawing the bond. It was not until the case of Sumner v. Powell, 2 Mer. 36, that anything was said by the judge who determined the cause, from which it might be inferred, that relief in these cases would be afforded on any other principle than mistake in fact. In that case, the court refused its aid, because there was no equity antecedent to the obligation. In delivering his judgment, the master of the rolls (Sir W. Grant) indicated very clearly an opinion, that a prior equitable consideration, received by the deceased, was indispensable to the setting up of a joint obligation against his representatives; and added, "so, where a joint bond has, in equity, been considered as several, there has been a credit previously given to the different persons who have entered into the obligation." Had this case gone so far as to decide, that "the credit previously given" was the sole ground on which a court of equity would consider a joint bond as several, it would have gone far to show, that the equitable obligation remained, and might be enforced, after the legal obligation of the instrument had expired. But the case does not go so far; it does not change the principle on which the court had uniformly proceeded, nor discard the idea, that relief is to be granted, because the obligation was made joint, by a mistake in point of fact. The case only decides, that this mistake, in point of fact, will not be presumed by the court, in a case where no equity existed antecedent to the obligation, where no advantage was received by, and no credit given to, the person against whose estate the instrument is to be set up. Yet, the course of the court seems to be uniform, to presume a mistake, in point of fact, in every case where a joint obligation has been given, and a benefit has been received by the deceased obligor. No proof of actual mistake is required; the existence of an antecedent equity is sufficient. In cases attended by precisely the same circumstances, so far as respects mistake, relief will be given against the representatives of a deceased obligor, who had received the benefit of the obligation, and refused against the representatives of him who had not received it. Yet the legal obligation is as completely extinguished in the one case as in the other; and the facts stated, in some of the cases in which these decisions have been made, would rather conduce to the opinion, that the bond was made joint, from ignorance of the legal consequences of a joint obligation, than from any mistake in fact.

The case of Lansdown v. Lansdown, Mos. 364, if it be law, has no inconsiderable bearing on this cause. The right of the heir-at-law was contested by a younger member of the family, and the arbitrator to whom the subject was referred decided against him. He executed a deed in compliance with this award, and was afterwards relieved against it, on the principle that he was ignorant of his title. The case does not suppose this fact, that he was the eldest son, to have been unknown to him; and if he was ignorant of anything, it was of the law, which gave him, as eldest son, the estate he had conveyed to a younger brother. Yet he was relieved in chancery against this conveyance. There are certainly strong objections to this decision in other respects; but, as a case in which relief has been granted on a mistake in law, it cannot be entirely disregarded.

Although we do not find the naked principle, that relief may be granted on account of ignorance of law, asserted in the books, we find no case in which it has been decided, that a plain and acknowledged mistake in law is beyond the reach of equity. In the case of Lord Irnham v. Child, 1 Brown, Ch. 91, application was made to the chancellor to establish a clause, which had been, it was said, agreed upon, but which had been considered by the parties, and excluded from the written instrument, by consent. It is true, they excluded the clause, from a mistaken opinion that it would make the contract usurious, but they did not believe that the legal effect of the contract was precisely the same as if the clause had been inserted. They weighed the consequences of inserting and omitting the clause, and preferred the latter. That, too, was a case to which the statute applied. Most of the cases which have been cited were within the statute of frauds, and it is not easy to say, how much has been the influence of that statute on them.

The case cited by the respondent's counsel from Precedents in Chancery, is not of this description; but it does not appear from that case that the power of attorney was intended, or believed, to be a lien. In this case, the fact of mistake is placed beyond any controversy. It is averred in the bill, and admitted by the demurrer, that "the powers of attorney were given by the said Rousmanier, and received by the said Hunt, under the belief that they were, and with the intention that they should create, a specific lien and security on the said vessels." We find no case which we think precisely in point; and are unwilling, where the effect of the instrument is acknowledged to have been entirely misunderstood by both parties, to say, that a court of equity is incapable of affording relief. The decree of the circuit court is reversed; but as this is a case in which creditors are concerned, the court, instead of giving a final decree on the demurrer, in favor of the plaintiff, directs the cause to be remanded, that the circuit court may permit the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and to answer the bill.

Decree: This cause came on to be heard, on the transcript of the record of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, and was argued by counsel: on consideration whereof, this court is of opinion, that the said circuit court erred, in sustaining the demurrer of the defendants, and dismissing the bill of the complainant. It is, therefore, decreed and ordered, that the decree of the said circuit court in this case be, and the same is hereby, reversed and annulled. And it is further ordered, that the said cause be remanded to the said circuit court, with directions to permit the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and to answer the bill of the complainants.

HUNT v. ROUSMANIERE'S ADM'RS.
(1 Peters, 1.)

Supreme Court of the United States. January Term, 1828.

(See ante, 170.)

Appeal from the circuit court of Rhode Island. The appellant filed a bill on the chancery side of the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, setting forth that, in January, 1820, Louis Rousmaniere obtained from him two loans of money, amounting, together, to $2,150; and at the time the first loan was made, Rousmaniere offered to give, in addition to his notes, a bill of sale, or mortgage, of his interest in the brig Nereus, then at sea, as a collateral security for the repayment of the money. A few days after the delivery of the first note, dated 11th of January, 1820, he executed a power of attorney, authorizing the plaintiff to make and execute a bill of sale, of three-fourths of the Nereus, to himself, or to any other person; and in the event of the loss of the vessel, to collect the money which should become due on a policy, by which the vessel and freight were insured. In the power of attorney, it was recited that it was given as collateral security for the payment of the notes, and was to be void on their payment; on the failure of which, the plaintiff was to pay the amount and all expenses, and to return the residue to Rousmaniere. On the 21st of March, 1821, an additional sum of $700 was loaned, for which a note was taken, and similar power of attorney given, to sell his interest in the schooner Industry; this vessel being also still at sea.

On the 6th of May, 1820, Rousmaniere died intestate and insolvent, having paid $200 on account of the notes; and the plaintiff gave notice of his claim to the commissioners of insolvency, appointed under the authority of the insolvent law of Rhode Island. The plaintiff, in his bill, alleged, that, on the return of the Nereus and Industry, he took possession of them, and offered the interest of the intestate in them, for sale; and the defendants having forbidden the sale, this bill was brought to compel them to join in it.

To this bill, the defendants demurred; and their demurrer was sustained in the circuit court; but leave was given to the plaintiff to amend. An amended bill was then filed, in which it was stated, that it was expressly agreed between the parties, that Rousmaniere was to give specific security on the Nereus and Industry, and that he offered to execute a mortgage on them. Counsel was consulted on the subject, who advised that the power of attorney, which was actually executed, should be taken in preference to a mortgage, because it was equally valid and effectual as a security, and would prevent the necessity of changing the papers of the vessels, or of taking possession of them on their return to port. These securities were, it was alleged, executed, with a full belief that they would, and with intention that they should, give to the plaintiff, as full and perfect a security, as would be given by a mortgage.

The defendants having also demurred to the amended bill, the circuit court decided in favor of the demurrer, and dismissed the bill; and an appeal was entered to this court. At the February session, 1823, this court considered that the appellant might be entitled to the relief prayed for in equity, but the respondents were permitted to withdraw their demurrer, and to file an answer in the court below. 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. Ed. 589. The answer of the defendants admitted the loans of money, and the delivery of the promissory notes, and that but $200 were paid, before the death of the intestate. The execution of the powers of attorney was also admitted, but it was denied that possession of the vessels was taken by the appellant; and they alleged their resistance of the attempt to take possession of them. The answer also asserted ignorance of any agreement for a specific lien on the vessels, except that imported by the language of the powers of attorney; that they had heard and believed, that the appellant meant to be concerned, as a partner, in a voyage of one of the vessels, which was relinquished, and that afterwards he offered to loan the money on security; upon which, the intestate offered to give a mortgage, but the appellant preferred taking the powers of attorney, to avoid inconvenience, and took the powers of attorney, by advice of counsel. The answer also stated, that a bill of sale of the vessels, dated the day before the death of the intestate, by which the vessels were intended to be conveyed to one Bateman, and which the respondents stated, they had heard and believed; was intended to be executed on the evening of that day. The answer also alleged the insolvency of Rousmaniere, and that it existed a long time before his death; which they asserted must have been known to the appellant, and that the intestate resorted to improper modes to keep up his credit.

The evidence taken in the case, consisted of the deposition of Mr. Hazard, the counsel who drew the papers, and in which he stated, that they were intended by both parties to have the effect of a specific lien or mortgage, and he advised them, they would have that effect; and also the deposition of Mr. Merchant, to show that the appellant admitted, that the motive by which he was induced to make the loan, was to compensate Rousmaniere for the disappointment sustained by his not uniting with him in a voyage of one of his vessels; and, accordingly, an agreement was made, by which the appellant was to let Rousmaniere have a sum of money, and that he was to give a bill of sale of a certain vessel; but that afterwards he refused to take the same, on account of the inconvenience and difficulties which might attend the same; and that he had consulted with Mr. Hazard, upon the subject, who told him, that he could or would draw an irrevocable power of attorney to sell, which would do as well, or words to that effect; and which was accordingly done.

The circuit court pronounce a decree, declaring, that the appellant had no specific lien or security upon either of the vessels, and no equity to be relieved respecting them, and dismissing the bill, with costs; from which decree, an appeal was entered to this court.

On the part of the appellant, it was contended, that the decree ought to be reversed, and a decree entered for the appellant. That the answers to the bill did not respond to the only material facts in the cause; it being fully proved, that the powers of attorney were intended to have the effect of a specific lien, the appellant was entitled to the relief he sought, upon the principles laid down in the former decisions of this court.

Kimball & Webster, for appellant. Mr. Wirt, Atty. Gen., and Mr. Robbins, for appellees.

WASHINGTON, J. This case was before this court in the year 1823, and is reported in 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. Ed. 589, and was then argued at great length, by the counsel concerned in it. After full consideration, it was decided, that the power of attorney given by Rousmaniere, the intestate, to the appellant, Hunt, authorizing him to make and execute a bill of sale of three-fourths of the Nereus and of the Industry, to himself, or any other person, and in the event of their being lost, to collect the money which should become due under a policy upon them and their freight, was a naked power, not coupled with an interest, which, though irrevocable by Rousmaniere, in his lifetime, expired on his death.

That this species of security was agreed upon, and given under a misunderstanding by the parties, of its legal character, was conceded in the argument of the cause by the bar and bench; and the second question for the consideration of the court, was, whether a court of equity could afford relief in such a case, by directing a new security of a different character to be given? or by decreeing that to be done, which the parties supposed would have been effected by the instrument agreed upon? After an examination of the cases, applicable to the general question, it was stated by the chief justice, who delivered the opinion of the court, that none of them asserted the naked principle, that relief could be granted, on the ground of ignorance of law, or decided, that a plain and acknowledged mistake in law, was beyond the reach of a court of equity. The conclusion, to which he came, is expressed in the following terms: "We find no case which we think precisely in point; and are unwilling, where the effect of the instrument is acknowledged to have been entirely misunderstood, by both parties, to say, that a court of equity is incapable of affording relief." The decree was, accordingly, reversed; but the case being one in which creditors were concerned, the court, instead of giving a final decree on the demurrer, in favor of the plaintiff, directed the cause to be remanded, that the circuit court might permit the defendants to withdraw their demurrer, and to answer the bill.

After the cause was returned to that court, the demurrer was withdrawn, and an answer was filed, in which the defendants, after admitting the loans mentioned in the bills, by the plaintiff to their intestate, and the notes given for the same, by the latter, and their non-payment; assert their ignorance of any agreement between the plaintiff and their intestate, that the former should have a specific security, other than the powers of attorney, to sell vessels and to collect the proceeds, or, the amount of the policies, in case they should be lost; but express their belief, that the powers of attorney were selected by the plaintiff, in preference to the other securities, which were offered by the intestate. The answer further states, that the estate of Rousmaniere is greatly insolvent, and had been so before his death; that the plaintiff had exhibited and proved his demand, as stated in his bill, before the commissioners of insolvency, duly appointed upon the estate of Rousmaniere; and that his dividend thereon declared, or to be declared, the defendants were, and would be ready to pay according to law.

The principal deposition, taken in the cause, is that of Benjamin Hazard, counselor at law, who deposes, that he drew the powers of attorney, annexed to the original bill; that on the day the first power was executed, Hunt and Rousmaniere came to his office, when the latter stated, that the former had loaned, or agreed to loan, to him, a sum of money, upon security to be given by him, on his interest in the brig Nereus, and that he was desirous the security should be as ample and available to Hunt, as it could be made; that he wished and was ready, to give a bill of sale of the property, or a mortgage on it, or any other security, which Mr. Hunt might prefer. Both the parties declared, that they had called upon the witness, to request him to draw the writings, and to obtain his opinion, as to the kind of instrument which would give the most perfect security to the lender. That the deponent then told the parties, that a bill of sale, or mortgage, would be good security, but that an irrevocable power of attorney, such as was afterwards executed, would be as effectual and good security, as either of the others; and would prevent the necessity of changing the vessel's papers, and of Hunt's taking possession of the vessel, upon her arrival from sea. That the parties then requested him to draw such an instrument, as, in his opinion, would most effectually and fully secure Mr. Hunt; and that the plaintiff frequently asked him, whilst he was drawing the power, and after he had finished, and read it to the parties, if he was quite certain, that the power would be as safe and available to him, as a bill of sale or mortgage, and that upon his assurances that it was, it was then executed. The witness then proceeds to express his opinion, from his knowledge of the parties, and from their declaration at the time, that Rousmaniere would readily have given an absolute bill of sale of the property or any other security which could have been asked; and that Hunt would not have accepted the one which was afterwards executed, if he had not considered it to be as extensive and perfect a security, in all respects, as an absolute bill of sale; and he adds, more positively, that such was the understanding and agreement of both the parties. It appears, by the testimony of this witness, that he drew the power of attorney concerning the Industry, for securing the second loan made by the plaintiff to Rousmaniere, and that the circumstances attending that transaction, were essentially the same as those which have been stated, in respect to the first loan.

We find another deposition in the record, which deserves to be noticed, as it consists of declarations, made by the plaintiff, after the powers of attorney were executed, and may serve, in some measure, to explain the more positive testimony given by Mr. Hazard. This witness, William Merchant, deposes, that after the decease of Rousmaniere, the plaintiff stated to him, and to a Mr. Rhodes, that in consequence of his declining to engage in an enterprise in one of the vessels of Rousmaniere, to which he had at one time consented, and of the complaints of Rousmaniere, on that account, he was induced to offer to Rousmaniere a loan of money. That an agreement was accordingly made, by which he, Hunt, was to let Rousmaniere have a certain sum on loan, and Rousmaniere was to give him a bill of sale of a certain vessel; but that, afterwards, Hunt, reflecting, that if he took that security, he would have to take out papers at the custom-house, in his own name, be subject to give bonds for the vessel, and perhaps, be made liable for breaches of law committed by others, he consulted with Mr. Hazard upon the subject; who told him, that he could, or would, draw an irrevocable power of attorney to sell, which would do as well, and which was accordingly done.

The cause coming on to be heard in the court below, and that court being of opinion, that the plaintiff had no lien or specific security upon these vessels, and no equity to have such lien or security created, against the general creditors of Rousmaniere, dismissed the bill; from which decree, the cause has been brought, by appeal, to this court. It must be admitted, that the case, as it is now presented to the court, is not materially variant from that which we formerly had to consider; except in relation to the rights of the general creditors, against the insolvent estate of a deceased debtor, in opposition to the equity which a particular creditor seeks, by this bill, to set up. The allegations of the bills, filed in this cause, which were, on the former occasion admitted by the demurrer to be true, are now fully proved, by the testimony taken in the cause.

Before proceeding to state the general question, to which the facts in this case give rise, or the principles of equity which apply to it, it will be necessary, distinctly, to ascertain, what was the real agreement concluded upon between the plaintiff and the intestate, the performance of which, on the part of the latter, was intended to be secured by the powers of attorney? Was it, that Rousmaniere should, in addition to his notes for the money agreed to be loaned to him by the plaintiff, give a specific and available security on the Nereus and the Industry, or was the particular kind of security selected by the parties, and did it constitute a part of the agreement? It is most obvious, from the plaintiff's own statement, in his amended bill, as well as from the depositions appearing in the record, that the agreement was not closed, until the interview between the parties to it, with Mr. Hazard, had taken place. The amended bill states, that the specific security which Rousmaniere offered to give, was a mortgage of the two vessels, for which irrevocable powers of attorney were substituted, by the advice of Mr. Hazard, and for reasons, which it would seem, were approved of and acted upon by the plaintiff. From the testimony of Mr. Merchant, it would appear, that the security proposed by Rousmaniere was a bill of sale of the vessels, which the plaintiff declined accepting, for reasons of his own, uninfluenced by any suggestions of Mr. Hazard, who merely proposed the powers of attorney as a substitute for the other forms of security which had been offered by Rousmaniere. The difference between these statements is not very material, since it is apparent, from both of them, that the proposed security, by irrevocable powers of attorney, was selected by the plaintiff, and incorporated into the agreement, by the assent of both the parties. The powers of attorney do not contain, nor do they profess to contain, the agreement of the parties; but was a mere execution of that agreement, so far as it stipulated to give to the plaintiff, a specific security on the two vessels, in the mode selected and approved of by the parties; to which extent, it was a complete consummation of the agreement. Such was the opinion of this court, upon a former discussion of this cause, in the year 1823, and such is its present opinion. Upon this state of the case, the general question to be decided, is the same now that it formerly was, and is that which has already been stated.

There are certain principles of equity, applicable to this question, which, as general principles, we hold to be incontrovertible. The first is, that where an instrument is drawn and executed, which professes, or is intended, to carry into execution an agreement, whether in writing or by parol, previously entered into, but which, by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or law, does not fulfil, or which violates, the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement, equity will correct the mistake, so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement. The reason is obvious: the execution of agreements, fairly and legally entered into, is one of the peculiar branches of equity jurisdiction; and if the instrument which is intended to execute the agreement, be, from any cause, insufficient for that purpose, the agreement remains as much unexecuted, as if one of the parties had refused, altogether, to comply with his engagement; and a court of equity will, in the exercise of its acknowledged jurisdiction, afford relief in the one case, as well as in the other, by compelling the delinquent party fully to perform his agreement, according to the terms of it, and to the manifest intention of the parties. So, if the mistake exist, not in the instrument, which is intended to give effect to the agreement, but in the agreement itself, and is clearly proved to have been the result of ignorance of some material fact, a court of equity will, in general, grant relief, according to the nature of the particular case in which it is sought. Whether these principles, or either of them, apply to the present case, must, of course, depend upon the real character of the agreement under consideration. If it has been correctly stated, it follows, that the instrument, by means of which the specific security was to be given, was selected by the parties to the agreement, or rather by the plaintiff; Rousmaniere having proposed to give a mortgage or bill of sale of the vessels, which the plaintiff, after consideration, and advice of counsel, thought proper to reject, for reasons which were entirely satisfactory to himself. That the form of the instrument, so chosen by the plaintiff, and prepared by the person who drew it, conforms not, in every respect, to the one agreed upon, is not even asserted in the bill, or in the argument of counsel. The avowed object of the plaintiff was, to obtain a valid security, but in such a manner, as that the legal interest in the property should remain with Rousmaniere, so that the plaintiff might be under no necessity to take out papers at the custom-house, in his own name, and might not be subject to give bonds for the vessels, or to liabilities for breaches of law, committed by those who were intrusted with the management of them. That the general intention of the parties was, to provide a security, as effectual as a mortgage of the vessels would be, can admit of no doubt; and if such had been their agreement, the insufficiency of the instruments to effect that object, which were afterwards prepared, would have furnished a ground for the interposition of a court of equity, which the representatives of Rousmaniere could not easily have resisted. But the plaintiff was not satisfied to leave the kind of security which he was willing to receive, undetermined; having finally made up his mind, by the advice of his counsel, not to accept of a mortgage, or bill of sale, in nature of a mortgage. He thought it safest, therefore, to designate the instrument; and having deliberately done so, it met the view of both parties, and was as completely incorporated into their agreement, as were the notes of hand for the sum intended to be secured. In coming to this determination, it is not pretended, that the plaintiff was misled by ignorance of any fact, connected with the agreement which he was about to conclude. If, then, the agreement was not founded in a mistake of any material fact, and if it was executed in strict conformity with itself; we think it would be unprecedented, for a court of equity to decree another security to be given, not only different from that which had been agreed upon, but one which had been deliberately considered and rejected by the party now asking for relief; or to treat the case, as if such other security had in fact been agreed upon and executed. Had Rousmaniere after receiving the money agreed to be loaned to him, refused to give an irrevocable power of attorney, but offered to execute a mortgage of the vessels, no court of equity could have compelled the plaintiff to accept the security so offered. Or, if he had totally refused to execute the agreement, and the plaintiff had filed his bill, praying that the defendant might be compelled to execute a mortgage, instead of an irrevocable power of attorney; could that court have granted the relief specifically asked for? We think not. Equity may compel parties to perform their agreements, when fairly entered into, according to their terms; but it has no power to make agreements for parties, and then compel them to execute the same. The former is a legitimate branch of its jurisdiction, and in its exercise, is highly beneficial to society; the latter is without its authority, and the exercise of it would be not only an usurpation of power, but would be highly mischievous in its consequences.

If the court could not have compelled the plaintiff to accept, or Rousmaniere to execute, any other instrument than the one which had been agreed upon between them, the case is in no respect altered, by the death of the latter, and the consequent inefficiency of the particular security which had been selected; the objection to the relief asked for, being in both cases the same, namely, that the court can only enforce the performance of an agreement, according to its terms, and to the intention of the parties; and cannot force upon them a different agreement. That the intention of the parties to this agreement, was frustrated, by the happening of an event, not thought of, probably, by them, or by the counsel who was consulted upon the occasion, is manifest. The kind of security which was chosen, would have been equally effectual, for the purpose intended, with a mortgage, had Rousmaniere lived until the power had been executed; and it may, therefore, admit of some doubt, at least, whether the loss of the intended security is to be attributed to a want of foresight, in the parties, or to a mistake of the counsel, in respect to a matter of law. The case will, however, be considered in the latter point of view.

The question, then, is, ought the court to grant the relief which is asked for, upon the ground of mistake arising from any ignorance of law? We hold the general rule to be, that a mistake of this character is not a ground for reforming a deed founded on such mistake; and whatever exceptions there may be to this rule, they are not only few in number, but they will be found to have something peculiar in their characters.

The strongest case which was cited and relied upon by the appellant's counsel, was that of Lansdown v. Lansdown, reported in Mos. 364. Admitting, for the present, the authority of this case, it is most apparent, from the face of it, that the decision of the court might well be supported, upon a principle not involved in the question we are examining. The subject which the court had to decide, arose out of a dispute between an heir-at-law, and a younger member of the family, who was entitled to an estate descended; and this question the parties agreed to submit to arbitration. The award being against the heir-at-law, he executed a deed in compliance with it, but was relieved against it, on the principle, that he was ignorant of his title. If the decision of the court proceeded upon the ground, that the plaintiff was ignorant of the fact that he was the eldest son, it was clearly a case proper for relief, upon a principle which has already been considered. If the mistake was of his legal rights, as heir-at-law, it is not going too far, to presume, that the opinion of the court may have been founded upon the belief, that the heir-at-law was imposed upon by some unfair representations of his better informed opponent; or that his ignorance of a legal principle, so universally understood by all, where the right of primogeniture forms a part of the law of descents, demonstrated a degree of mental imbecility, which might well entitle him to relief. He acted, besides, under the pressure of an award, which was manifestly repugnant to law, and for aught that is stated in this case, this may have appeared upon the face of it. But if this case must be considered as an exception from the general rule which has been mentioned; the circumstances attending it, do not entitle it, were it otherwise objectionable, to be respected as an authority, but in cases which it closely resembles.

There is a class of cases which, it has been supposed, forms an exception from this general rule, but which will be found, upon examination, to come within the one which was first stated. The cases alluded to, are those in which equity has afforded relief against the representatives of a deceased obligor, in a joint bond, given for money lent to both the obligors, although such representatives were discharged at law. The principle upon which these cases manifestly proceed, is, that the money being lent to both, the law raises a promise in both to pay, and equity considers the security of the bond as being intended, by the parties, to be co-extensive with this implied contract by both to pay the debt. To effect this intention, the bond should have been made joint and several; and the mistake in the form, by which it is made joint, is not in the agreement of the parties, but in the execution of it by the draftsman. The cases in which the general rule has been adhered to, are, many of them, of a character which strongly test the principle upon which the rule itself is founded. Two or three only need be referred to. If the obligee, in a joint bond, by two or more, agree with one of the obligors, to relieve him from his obligation, and does accordingly execute a release, by which all the obligors are discharged at law, equity will not afford relief against this legal consequence, although the release was given under a manifest misapprehension of the legal effect of it, in relation to the other obligors. So, in the case of Worrall v. Jacob, 3 Merv. 271, where a person having a power of appointment and revocation, and, under a mistaken supposition, that a deed might be altered or revoked, although no power of revocation had been reserved, executed the power of appointment, without reserving a power of revocation; the court refused to relieve against the mistake. The case of Lord Irnham v. Child, 1 Brown, Ch. 92, is a very strong one in support of a general rule, and closely resembles the present, in most of the material circumstances attending it. The object of the suit was to set up a clause containing a power of redemption, in a deed granting an annuity, which, it was said, had been agreed upon by the parties, but which, after deliberation, was excluded by consent, from a mistaken opinion, that it would render the contract usurious. The court, notwithstanding the omission manifestly proceeded upon a misapprehension of the parties as to the law, refused to relieve, by establishing the rejected clause.

It is not the intention of the court, in the case now under consideration, to lay it down, that there may not be case in which a court of equity will relieve against a plain mistake, arising from ignorance of law. But we mean to say, that where the parties, upon deliberation and advice, reject one species of security, and agree to select another, under a misapprehension of the law as to the nature of the security so selected, a court of equity will not, on the ground of such misapprehension, and the insufficiency of such security, in consequence of a subsequent event, not foreseen, perhaps, or thought of, direct a new security, of a different character, to be given, or decree that to be done, which the parties supposed would have been effected by the instrument which was finally agreed upon.

If the court would not interfere in such a case, generally, much less would it do so in favor of one creditor, against the general creditors of an insolvent estate, whose equity is, at least, equal to that of the party seeking to obtain a preference, and who, in point of law, stand upon the same ground with himself. This is not a bill asking for a specific performance of an agreement to execute a valid deed for securing a debt; in which case, the party asking relief would be entitled to a specific lien; and the court would consider the debtor as a trustee for the creditor, of the property on which the security was agreed to be given. The agreement has been fully executed, and the only complaint is, that the agreement itself was founded upon a misapprehension of the law, and the prayer is to be relieved against the consequences of such mistake. If all other difficulties were out of the way, the equity of the general creditors to be paid their debts equally with the plaintiff, would, we think, be sufficient to induce the court to leave the parties where the law has placed them. The decree is to be affirmed, with costs.

Decree affirmed.

JORDAN v. STEVENS.

(51 Me. 78.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. 1863.

Suit in equity submitted on bill, answers and proofs.

Howard & Strout, for complainant. E. & F. Fox, for respondents.

DAVIS, J. Jonathan Stevens, the father of the parties to this suit, died in November, 1857, leaving personal property valued at about $3,000, and real estate worth nearly $5,000. The plaintiff, being a widow, had worked in his family for many years, receiving therefor one dollar a week. A short time before his death he gave her a life lease of his homestead in Portland, worth about $2,000, to take effect upon his decease. Whether he did this for the reason that he thought that he had not paid her enough for her services, or because she needed a larger share of the property than the other heirs, does not appear, and is immaterial. He died intestate, leaving seven children, and the issue of another not living.

The property leased to the plaintiff was described as situated "on Chestnut street." After the death of her father, the plaintiff had the lease altered so as to read "Wilmot street." This was done at the suggestion of some of the defendants; and besides, as the property was otherwise sufficiently described, the mistake of the street did not affect the lease, and the alteration was immaterial.

It is contended that the lease was void because it was not to take effect until a future day; but, whatever may have been supposed to be the law in regard to the validity of deeds to take effect in futuro, it is now well settled in this state that such deeds are not for that reason void. Wyman v. Brown, 50 Me. 139.

But some of the defendants thought the lease to the plaintiff was invalid, and so informed her. Taking their testimony as true, which we do not question, they did not intentionally deceive her on this point. They actually thought there was a defect of which they could take advantage. She was unlearned in every respect, not being able to write her own name. It is evident that she put confidence in them, believing them to be better informed than herself; and supposing, from their representations, that her title to the homestead, by the lease, had failed, she was induced by them to relinquish all her interest in the whole estate of her father, in consideration of a new life lease from them of the same property embraced in her first lease.

One-eighth of the estate, subject to her life interest in the homestead, must have been worth nearly or quite eight hundred dollars. This she conveyed to them. Their new lease to her was of no value whatever; for the title was already in her. Can she obtain relief in equity?

It is claimed that she has no remedy, because there was no fraud; and the mistake was not one of fact, but of law.

In this state jurisdiction in equity in cases of "mistake" is expressly conferred by statute; nor is it, in terms, limited to mistakes of fact. The legislature may be presumed to have used the word as generally understood in equity proceedings; and therefore we shall have to inquire whether courts of equity have been accustomed to grant relief in cases like the one before us.

This question has frequently arisen in this country and in England, and authorities are not wanting in both countries in support of the doctrine that no distinction should be made between mistakes of law and mistakes of fact.

It is quite true, as Judge Redfield observes (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 130, note), "that the distinction between mistakes of law and mistakes of fact, so far as equitable relief is concerned, is one of policy rather than of principle"; and yet it may not be the less necessary to maintain and observe it. No government could be administered at all, under which ignorance of the criminal law should be held a sufficient excuse for violating it; and the same principle is applicable to the civil law. This is not on the ground that every one is presumed to know the law; for, though this is often repeated as an axiom, a presumption so variant from the truth cannot be recognized by the law. The ground on which the doctrine rests is this, that it is impossible to uphold the government, and so to maintain its administration as to protect public and private rights, except on the principle that the rights and liabilities of every one shall be the same as if he knew the law.

If all contracts made in ignorance of the law were to be held invalid, there would be no certainty in business and no security in titles. All rights of property would be endangered, and the most important encouragements for industry and enterprise would be taken away. It is indispensable, therefore, that the obligation of contracts should be maintained, unless there is some stronger reason for annulling them than a mere mistake of the law. Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend. 407.

This question is discussed at length by Judge Story, and nearly all the English and American authorities are referred to, and many of them examined. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. c. 5 (Redf. Ed.). But while the weight of authority is clearly against granting relief merely on account of a mistake of the law, it seems to be conceded in nearly all the cases, and expressly decided in many of them, that there are exceptions to this rule. Hunt v. Rousmanier, 1 Pet. 15; Bank v. Daniel, 12 Pet. 32.

Instead of saying that there are "exceptions" to the rule, it would probably be more correct to say that, while relief will never be granted merely on account of the mistake of the law, there are cases where there are other elements, not in themselves sufficient to authorize the court to interpose, but which, combined with such a mistake, will entitle the party to relief. It is important therefore to inquire what it is that, with a mistake of the law, will justify the interposition of the court, where there is no fraud, or accident, or mistake of fact.

If a party, who himself knows the law, should deceive another, by misrepresenting the law to him, or, knowing him to be ignorant of it, should therein take advantage of him, relief would be granted on the ground of fraud. So that such a case is within neither the rule nor the exception.

It has sometimes been said that when money or other property has been obtained under a mistake of the law, which the defendant ought not in good conscience to retain, he should be compelled to restore it. Northrup v. Graves, 19 Conn. 548; Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 139. This is just as a principle, but entirely indefinite as a rule. It proposes nothing but the opinion of the court in each case, on a matter in regard to which there may be great differences of opinion. It overlooks the public interests involved in maintaining the obligation of contracts. Generally, as between the parties, a mistake of law has as equitable a claim to relief as a mistake of fact.

It is believed that in nearly all such cases, where relief has been granted, in addition to the intrinsic equity in favor of the plaintiff, two facts have been found, (1) that there has been a marked disparity in the position and intelligence of the parties, so that they have not been on equal terms; and (2) that the party obtaining the property persuaded or induced the other to part with it, so that there has been "undue influence" on the one side and "undue confidence" on the other. 1 Story's Eq. 120. When property has been obtained under such circumstances, and by such means, courts of equity have never hesitated to compel its restoration, though both the parties acted under a mistake of the law; and there would be still stronger reasons for granting relief in such a case, if the party from whom the property had been obtained had been led into his mistake of the law by the other party. Sparks v. White, 7 Humph. 86; Fitzgerald v. Peck, 4 Litt. (Ky.) 127.

Thus, in Pickering v. Pickering, 2 Beav. 31, Lord Langdale set aside certain agreements entered into under a mistake of the law, on the ground that "the parties were not on equal terms," and that the plaintiff acted under the influence of the defendant; and the same thing was done in Wheeler v. Smith, 9 How. 55, because the parties "did not stand on equal ground," and the plaintiff "did not act freely, and with a proper understanding of his rights."

This question has arisen more frequently in cases where parties have been mistaken in regard to their titles to real estate. Thus, in Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. 126, the defendant sold to the plaintiff property which he already owned, and the court compelled a restoration of the purchase money. It may have been, as Bronson, J., suggests, in Champlin v. Laytin, 18 Wend. 407, on the ground that the defendant "misled" the plaintiff in regard to his title; but the correctness of the decision is not questioned by Lord Cottenham, in Stewart v. Stewart, 6 Clark & F. 964.

Judge Story suggests that such a case "seems to involve, in some measure, a mistake of fact,—that is, of the fact of ownership,—arising from a mistake of the law." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 122, 130. And, in King v. Doolittle, 1 Head, 77, the decision is put on that ground. But, if all the other facts are agreed and known to the parties, the question of "ownership" can be nothing but one of law; and in such cases, as in others, courts of equity should not interfere, unless it appears that there was a difference in the condition of the parties, so that, instead of both acting voluntarily, one was misled or unduly influenced by the other. Nor will the court then interpose, in the absence of fraud, unless the defendant, as well as the plaintiff, can be restored substantially to the same situation as before. Crozier v. Acer, 7 Paige, 137.

Nor where there is a real controversy between parties, and the case is one of any doubt, will the court set aside a compromise fairly made by them, though it should afterwards appear that one has thereby received property to which he was not legally entitled. Steele v. White, 2 Paige, 478; Trigg v. Reed, 5 Humph. 529. On the contrary, courts of equity encourage such compromises; but here, too, as in other cases, if the parties are not on equal terms, and one misleads the other, and obtains property thereby against right and equity, as well as against law, he will be compelled to restore it. "If a party, acting in ignorance of a plain and settled principle of law," says the vice chancellor, Sir John Leach, "is induced to give up a portion of his indisputable property under the name of a compromise, a court of equity will relieve him from the consequences of his mistake." Naylor v. Winch, 1 Sim. & S. 564. And though this was a dictum, the principle was fully applied by the supreme court of the United States in Wheeler v. Smith, previously cited. And the same doctrine has been recognized by this court in the case of Freeman v. Curtis, 51 Me. 140. And, in both of these cases, relief was granted, not on the ground that a mistake of the law alone entitles one to relief, but that, though there be no actual fraud, if one is unduly influenced and misled by the other to do that which he would not have done but for such influence, and he has in consequence conveyed to the other property without any consideration therefor, or purchased what was already legally his own, the court will, if it can be done, restore both of the parties to the same condition as before.

The case at bar is one of this kind. The parties were not on equal terms. The plaintiff was ignorant, in business affairs, as well as in other respects. Having confidence in the defendants, she relied upon what they told her. It does not appear that she doubted the validity of her father's lease to her, until such doubts were communicated to her from them. The proposition for her to release her interest in all the other property did not originate with her, but with them; and she was induced to accept it by the fear which they had impressed upon her that she otherwise would have to give up the homestead. She acted under their influence. They believed that there was a defect in the first lease, and they meant to take advantage of it. As was said by the master of the rolls, afterwards Lord Kenyon, in Evans v. Llewellyn, 1 Coxe, 333, "though there was no fraud, there was something like fraud, for an undue advantage was taken of her situation. The party was not competent to protect herself, and therefore this court is bound to afford her such protection."

The bill is sustained, with costs; and the defendants must be decreed to pay her a distributive share of the personal estate, with interest from the time of distribution, making her equal with them, and to release to her one-eighth of all the real estate, and account to her for her share of the rents and profits of the portion not occupied by her.

APPLETON, C. J., and KENT, WALTON, and DICKERSON, JJ., concurred.

STAFFORD v. FETTERS.

(8 N. W. 322, 55 Iowa, 484.)

Supreme Court of Iowa. March 23, 1881.

Appeal from circuit court, Warren county.

Action at law against the indorser of a promissory note. Defendant set up an equitable defense, and the relief prayed for therein was granted him by the decree of the circuit court. Plaintiff appeals.

Seevers & Sampson, for appellant. H. McNeil, for appellee.

BECK, J. 1. The defendant, being the payee of a negotiable promissory note, transferred it to plaintiff by the following indorsement: "For value received, I assign the within note to James Stafford. [Signed] H. J. Feters." The action was brought at law upon this indorsement. The defendant pleaded an equitable defense, wherein he substantially alleged that, by the agreement under which the note was transferred, the plaintiff was to take the note without recourse upon defendant, and that the parties adopted the form of transfer as expressing such agreement, and neither of them at the time intended that it should have any other effect than to express the agreement between them, and neither knew that it did have the effect which the law gives to such instruments. Defendant, upon this answer, as in a cross-bill, prays that the indorsement be reformed so as to express the true agreement made and intended to be set out by the parties, and that other proper relief be granted. A demurrer to this count of the answer was overruled, and the issues raised by this pleading were tried as an action in chancery. It is triable here de novo.

2. The evidence very satisfactorily establishes the facts set up in the equitable defense. The defendant positively and explicitly testifies that the agreement required him to transfer the note without liability; that he had no intention to express any different contract by the indorsement, and was ignorant of the legal effect of the instrument; and that plaintiff expressly disclaimed that he expected or desired defendant to become bound for the payment of the note. Six witnesses positively and strongly corroborated defendant's testimony. They heard the conversation between the parties when defendant signed the indorsement. The plaintiff, in his testimony, denies the statement of defendant. We must accept the facts of the case presented by the testimony of defendant and his witnesses. We are required to determine whether, upon these facts, equity will grant relief to defendant by reforming the indorsement upon the note so that it will express the real contract of the parties.

3. The agreement of the parties, the meeting of their minds upon the conditions and obligations touching the subject contemplated by them, constitutes their contract. The written instrument is made the evidence of that contract. If it fails to present their agreement, the contract it expresses is not the agreement of the parties, and the true contract remains unexecuted. In such a case equity will reform the writing, causing it to express the intentions of the parties. This relief will be granted without regard to the cause of the failure of the instrument to express the true contract, whether it be from fraud, mistake in the use of language, or any other thing which prevented the expression of the intentions of the parties.

4. But there is another familiar rule of equity upon which plaintiff relies to defeat the application of these doctrines to this case, namely, relief will not be granted to correct mistakes at law.

The rule has no application to mistakes in the language of a contract, or in the choice of the form of an instrument, whereby it has an effect different from the intention of the parties. If parties, intending to sell and purchase lands, should, in ignorance of its legal effect, execute a lease, equity would reform the instrument, though it was a mistake of law which led them to adopt it. This mistake, it will be noticed, affects the very contract the parties intended. They intended a deed, but a lease was made. But where two are bound by a bond, and the obligee releases one, mistakingly believing that the other will remain bound, equity will not grant him relief, for the reason that the release is just what he intended it to be; his mistake related to the effect of the contract in matters not contemplated therein. The mistakes of law against which equity will not relieve are those which pertain to the subject of the contract, and were inducements thereto, or considerations therefor. In such cases the parties intended to make the very contracts which they executed, but were induced to make them by a mistake of law.

Further illustrations taken from the books make our expression of the rules plainer. A tenant for life purchased a reversion under the mistake of law that such purchase would cut off the remainder in tail and vest the fee in him. It was held that he could not have relief. A power of attorney was taken from a debtor as a security; but the debtor died before the power was executed. Equity would not grant relief. In each of these cases the very contracts entered into by the parties were embodied in the instruments. The mistakes were as to the results to be reached which were inducements to the contracts. In the first case the purchaser supposed that the acquisition of the reversion would vest in him the fee-simple title. This was the inducement for the purchase. It was a mistake of law. In the second case it was the purpose of the parties to secure the payment of the debt. They mistakenly chose a power of attorney to effect their object. But their purpose was defeated by the law which provides that the death of the grantor revokes a power of attorney. In these cases, it will be observed, the instruments were of the character intended by the parties. The mistakes pertained to the effect of the instruments upon the rights of the parties not contemplated by the contracts or provided for therein.

But, on the other hand, when parties enter into an agreement, which, through mistake of law or fact, they reduce to writing, and the instrument fails to express their true agreement, or omits stipulations agreed upon, or contains terms contrary to the intention of the parties, equity will reform the writing, making it conform to the agreement entered into by the parties.

The doctrines we have stated are familiar to the profession. They have ample support in the authorities. See Noulin v. Pyne, 47 Iowa, 293; Hunt v. Rosemaniers, 8 Wheat. 174, 1 Pet. 1; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 113, 116, et seq., and cases cited; Kerr, Fraud & M. (Am. Ed.) 396 et seq., and page 418 and cases cited; Reynolds v. Meelick, 17 Iowa, 585.

In the case before us the parties agreed that plaintiff should take the note without recourse on defendant. They mistakenly supposed that the form of assignment of the note would have that effect, being ignorant of the provisions of the law of commercial paper which makes the indorser liable in case of default of the maker of the note. This was a mistake of the law, but it pertained to the instrument itself, and, by reason of it, the writing does not express the true agreement of the parties. Equity will reform it.

Glenn v. Statlee, 42 Iowa, 107, and Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138, are not in conflict with our conclusions just expressed. In each case the mistake was not in expressing the contract, but as to its legal effect. The parties executed an instrument expressing the very contract intended, but the instruments had a legal effect unknown to, and not intended by, the parties.

These decisions are also distinguishable from the case at bar by the fact that in each of them the rights of persons other than the parties to the contracts are involved. They were actions upon delivery bonds. Creditors not parties thereto were beneficiaries. The law will, in such cases, rather impose hardship upon the parties who made a mistake than upon one chargeable with no fault.

We reach the conclusion that the circuit court correctly rendered a decree reforming the assignment indorsed upon the note, and dismissing plaintiff's petition.

Affirmed.

GREEN v. MORRIS & E. R. CO.

(12 N. J. Eq. 165.)

Court of Errors and Appeals. October Term, 1858.

E. W. Whelpley, for demurrer. L. A. Chandler and F. T. Frelinghuysen, contra.

THE CHANCELLOR. The following are the material facts stated in the bill: The complainant is the owner of a farm in the county of Morris. The defendants, in the construction of their railroad, made an excavation through the complainant's farm of about five hundred feet in length, and varying from five to twelve feet deep. Commissioners were called under the charter of the company, who assessed the complainant's damages at six hundred and eighty dollars. From this award the complainant appealed to the inferior court of common pleas of the county of Morris, in which court he was entitled to review the award and to a trial by jury. Before the time for hearing arrived, Samuel B. Halsey and Freeman Wood represented to the complainant that they were acting for and on behalf of the railroad company, and proposed to submit the matters in difference to three arbitrators, to be selected by the parties, to which the complainant assented. The arbitrators were selected, and the submission was reduced to writing. The same matters were submitted to the arbitrators as were before, and acted upon by the commissioners appointed under and by virtue of the charter. By the ninth section of the charter of the company, they are obliged to construct and keep in repair good and sufficient bridges or passages over or under the said railroad or roads, where any public or other road shall cross the same; and also, where the railroad shall intersect any farm or lands of any individual, to provide and keep in repair suitable wagonways over or under said road, so that he may pass the same; and if the company neglect to perform the said duty, after giving twenty days' notice to the company, the owner of the land may do it himself, and recover the valuation by common process of law.

The arbitrators, thus selected, proceeded to discharge the duties imposed upon them in the presence of the complainant, and of Halsey and Wood, who appeared and acted on behalf of the company. During their deliberations, the complainant stated that he should require a suitable wagonway over the railroad, where it crossed his farm. This was assented to, but Halsey and Wood stated that this was a matter with which the arbitrators had nothing to do, and was no part of the submission, but was an independent duty, imposed upon the company by their charter. This view was acquiesced in by the arbitrators and by all parties, and it is admitted to have been a correct view. The arbitrators awarded that the company should pay to the complainant eight hundred dollars for his damages. In awarding this amount, they did not take into consideration the matter of bridges or crossings. Soon after the award was completed, Halsey and Wood went to the complainant with eight hundred dollars, and with a deed, prepared and ready for execution, from the complainant and his wife to the company. The complainant objected to signing the deed on the ground that it did not, in express words, reserve all his rights as to a crossing or bridges over the railroad. Halsey and Wood assured him that such rights were not at all affected by the deed. The deed was a special one in its character. Mr. Halsey was a lawyer by profession. The complainant knew this, and he relied upon his integrity, as well as his professional learning. Upon Mr. Halsey's reassurances that the deed was a proper one, and did not compromise the complainant's rights to proper crossings over the road, he received the money, and executed and delivered the deed to Halsey and Wood. They delivered it to the company, giving the officers full knowledge of all that had occurred. The complainant gave notice to the company to construct a bridge over their railroad where it crosses his land, and upon the company's neglecting to do so the complainant himself constructed the bridge at an expense exceeding seven hundred dollars. He then instituted a suit in the supreme court against the company, under the ninth section of their charter, to recover the value of the work done. The company set up, as a plea in bar to the recovery, the deed given by the complainant to the company. This bill is brought to relieve the complainant from legal effect of that deed. The bill prays that the deed may be reformed, and that the defendants may be enjoined from setting up the deed in bar to the complainant's action at law. To this bill the defendants have filed a general demurrer.

The principal ground urged in support of the demurrer is that the object of the bill is to correct a mistake of law, and that the maxim is that ignorance of law furnishes no excuse to a person either for a breach or for an omission of a duty, ignorantia legis neminem excusat, and that the same principle applies to agreements entered into in good faith, but under a mistake of the law.

Such undoubtedly is the general rule. It has been adhered to with great strictness by some authorities, while by others exceptions have been made to the rule altogether irreconcilable with the principles and reasons upon which it has been established. Some of these conflicting authorities are referred to and commented upon in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 113, etc. But that the rule has its proper exceptions is beyond all dispute.

In 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 113, 116, the rule is laid down that agreements made and acts done under a mistake of law are, if not otherwise objectionable, generally held valid and obligatory. The author says that he lays down the doctrine in this guarded and qualified manner because there are authorities which are supposed to contradict it, or at least to form exceptions to it; and in the case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 1 Pet. 17, 7 L. Ed. 27, a case much relied upon by the defendant's counsel, Mr. Justice Washington, in delivering the opinion of the court, says, "It is not the intention of the court, in the case now under consideration, to lay it down that there may not be cases in which a court of equity will relieve against a plain mistake arising from ignorance of law."

There are several considerations which induce me to consider this case as very properly embraced within the exceptions to the rule. The decision of the case does not rest exclusively upon the mere fact of a mistake in law upon the part of the complainant. This deed does not carry out the intention of the parties; and it is not necessary to resort to parol testimony to establish this fact. It was executed for the sole purpose of carrying into effect the award of the arbitrators. By that award, the complainant's rights and privileges under the ninth section of the defendant's charter were not impaired, nor were they in any manner whatever affected by it. The object of the deed was to give to the company the same rights and privileges in and upon the complainant's lands as the award gave them, and no more. All that is necessary to enable the court to reform this deed, and to make it comply with the intention of the parties, is to have before it the award which it was the design of all parties, by this deed, to carry into execution. The mistake is a mistake of the draftsman, and he acting as the agent of the party who now seeks to take advantage of the mistake. Mr. Halsey prepared the deed, and took it to the complainant to be executed. It was his misapprehension of the law that led to the mistake. It was not the carelessness or ignorance of the complainant, but of the defendants' agent. Mr. Justice Story, in commenting upon the case already referred to in 1 Pet. 1, 13, 7 L. Ed. 27, 14 Story, Eq. Jur. § 115, remarks: If there had been any mistake in the instrument itself, so that it did not contain what the parties had agreed on, that would have formed a very different case, for where an instrument is drawn and executed which professes, or is intended, to carry into execution an agreement previously entered into, but which, by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or to law, does not fulfill that intention, or violates it, equity will correct the mistake, so as to produce a conformity to the instrument. Now we have before us an agreement in writing, the award of the arbitrators, to carry which into execution the deed was executed. By a misapprehension of the law on the part of all parties, and more particularly of the defendants' agent, who drew the deed, it releases valuable legal rights of the complainant which are not affected by that award. All the bill asks is that the deed may be made to conform to the award.

In the case of Champlin v. Layton, 1 Edw. Ch. 467, it was decided that a contract entered into under a mutual misconception of legal rights, amounting to a mistake of law in the contracting parties, is as liable to be set aside or rescinded as a contract founded in mistake of matters of fact. In his opinion in that case the vice chancellor says: So, if both parties should be ignorant of a matter of law, and should enter into a contract for a particular object, the result whereof would, by law, be different from what they mutually intended,—here, on account of the surprise or immediate result of the mistake of both,—there can be no good reason why the court should not interfere in order to prevent the enforcement of the contract, and relieve from the unexpected consequences of it. To refuse would be to permit one party to take an unconscientious advantage of the other, and to derive a benefit from a contract which neither of them intended it should produce. In Stapylton v. Scott, 13 Ves. 424, the lord chancellor says: I admit, where the contract has proceeded upon the mistake of both parties, that avoids the contract at law as well as here. In Willan v. Willan, 16 Ves. 72, an agreement was decreed to be given up upon the ground of surprise, neither party understanding the effect of it. This exception to the rule is recognized in the case of Hunt v. Rousmanier, 8 Wheat. 174, 5 L. Ed. 589.

The case before the court is entitled to much more favorable consideration than these cases, from the fact, before referred to, that the mutual mistake is to be attributed to the agent of the defendants. He prepared the deed, and he assured the complainant that it was correct. There was no want of ordinary prudence in the complainant's relying upon his judgment. He was a lawyer by profession, and it was natural and becoming that the complainant should have confided in him.

There is another consideration which very properly enters into the case. It is a deed procured from the complainant, by the solicitation of the defendants or their agent, which conveys to them valuable rights and privileges without any consideration. The award gives to the complainant eight hundred dollars as a remuneration for his damages; but the legal effect of the deed is not only a release of the damages, for which the defendant was compensated, but a release of rights and privileges more valuable to the complainant than the pecuniary compensation awarded to him. The relative situation of the parties is a matter of some consideration in a court of equity. One was a plain man, the other a professional man, professing skill and experience as to the matter in which he volunteered to advise. I have no doubt, if this deed does not comport with the award, as to the propriety of the court's reforming it.

But I am embarrassed with another view of the case. In my judgment, the deed in question does not operate as a release of any rights the complainant may have under the ninth section of the defendants' charter. In other words, it is no legal bar to the complainant's recovery in his suit at law. The bill assumes that it is a bar. The counsel for the defendants raised an objection that the fact of its being a bar to the complainant's recovery was not, with sufficient directness and distinctness, averred in the bill; but it is assumed throughout the bill to be, in connection with the use the defendant is making of the deed, the foundation for the complainant's suit. A distinct averment as to the legal effect of the deed is not necessary. The construction of the deed by the court could not at all depend upon the complainant's opinion of it, nor would the complainant be bound here or elsewhere by such an averment.

The deed recites that the company, by virtue of their act of incorporation, had surveyed their route from Morristown to Dover over and upon the lands of the complainant, giving a description of the land by metes and bounds, and then proceeds as follows: "Now be it known that the said Thomas Green and his wife, in consideration of the sum of eight hundred dollars, to them in hand well and truly paid by the said the Morris and Essex Railroad Company, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, have and by these presents to grant, bargain, sell, convey, and confirm to the said the Morris and Essex Railroad Company, and to their successors and assigns, forever, the right, liberty, and privilege of erecting upon the tract of land above described, by its officers, agents, engineers, superintendents, contractors, workmen, and other persons in their employ, and to take possession of, hold, have, use, occupy, and excavate the same, and to erect embankments, bridges, and all other works necessary to lay rails, and do all other things which shall be suitable or necessary for the completion or repair of said road or roads; to have and to hold the said tract of land and premises unto the said the Morris and Essex Railroad Company, and to its successors and assigns forever, for the purposes above mentioned, and for all the other purposes mentioned in the said act of incorporation and the several supplements thereto. In witness whereof," etc.

The seventh section of the act provides the mode in which the company shall proceed, if they cannot agree with the owner of the land, to acquire the same by assessment. Three commissioners are to be appointed, who are to assess the value of the land and the damages, upon payment of which the company have the right to enter upon and occupy the land for the purposes of the railroad. The provisions of the ninth section are wholly independent of those of the seventh section, and make it obligatory upon the company to construct and keep in repair bridges or passages over or under the railroad, where it crosses public or private roads, and where it intersects lands of individuals. It is very manifest that the assessment to be made by the commissioners does not include any compensation for such bridges or passages, and that, notwithstanding such assessment, the duty still remains upon the company to construct such bridges and passages over the road. If this is not so, then the ninth section is superfluous. The company cannot take possession of the land except under the provisions of the seventh section; and, if the assessment provided for in that section includes a remuneration to the land owner for bridging, etc., there could be no propriety in imposing that duty by the ninth section. The deed in question conveys to the defendants nothing more than the liberty of erecting upon the land described the necessary superstructure for their railroad, and the necessary embankments, bridges, etc. This is the same right, and neither more nor less than they would have acquired by an assessment under the seventh section of the act. I do not see how, with any propriety, a construction can be put upon this deed that will release the company from the duties imposed by the ninth section. An assessment by commissioners would not have released them, and, in my judgment, this deed confers upon them no additional rights, and releases them from no other duties or obligations. The language used in the deed is the same language used in the sixth section of the act, which defines what rights the company acquire by assessment. The deed confines the company to the same use of the land as the act confines them under the assessment. The language in the deed is an exact copy of the language of the act.

If, then, this construction of the deed is the correct one, there is no necessity of reforming it; but the defendants contend for a different construction, and, upon their construction, insist that it is a bar to the complainant's recovery in his suit at law. If their construction is the correct one, then the complainant is entitled to the protection of the court. Under such circumstances he had a right, when the defendants, by a formal plea at law, contended for such a construction of his deed, to claim the protection of this court. It was not safe for him to risk his case at law. If the court at law should be against him, it would then be too late for him to ask relief in this court. Would it be right, notwithstanding the construction this court has put upon the deed, to dismiss the complainant out of court? The court at law is not bound by the construction this court may put upon the deed. If the complainant's bill should be dismissed, and the court at law should differ from this court, the complainant will be without remedy. It may be asked, how can this court make a decree to reform the deed when it is of opinion that it needs no reformation? But the court need not adopt any such inconsistency. It can afford to the complainant adequate relief without making a decree to reform the deed. A decree enjoining the defendants from setting up the deed as a bar to the complainant's recovery in the action at law will afford him all the protection that is necessary.

I have no doubt that, under the circumstances of this case as it is made by his bill, the complainant is entitled to relief.

The demurrer is overruled, with costs.

GRISWOLD v. HAZARD et al. (four cases).
(Nos. 50-53.)

(11 Sup. Ct. 972, 141 U. S. 260.)

Supreme Court of the United States. May 25, 1891.

In error to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.

Appeals from the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island.

The first of the above suits was brought by Griswold, a citizen of New York, against the appellees, citizens of Rhode Island, to obtain a decree canceling or (if relief of that character could not be granted) reforming a certain bond, for the sum of $53,735, executed by Thomas C. Durant, as principal, and Griswold and S. D. Bradford, as his sureties. It was heard upon bill, answer, and proofs, and the bill was dismissed.

The action at law, No. 53, was brought by the appellees against Griswold upon the above bond in one of the courts of Rhode Island, and was removed, upon his petition, to the circuit court of the United States for the district of Rhode Island, where a judgment was rendered against him for the sum of $66,470.

The other two cases, Nos. 51 and 52, were suits in equity brought by Griswold, pending the action at law in the circuit court, to obtain an injunction against its further prosecution. The relief asked, in each of those suits, was denied, and the bills were dismissed.

All of the cases have their origin in a suit in equity brought, August 22, 1868, in the supreme court of Rhode Island, by Isaac P. Hazard, of that state, against Thomas C. Durant, Oliver Ames, Benjamin E. Bates, John Duff, Cornelius S. Bushnell, Sidney Dillon, Henry S. McComb, the Credit Mobilier of America, a Pennsylvania corporation, and the Union Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by acts of congress. Hazard sued on behalf of himself and all other stockholders in the first-named corporation who should become parties to his bill. Durant, from an early date in 1864 until May 18, 1867, was president of the Credit Mobilier of America; having, it was alleged, to a great extent, the management of its affairs, and the confidence of its directors and trustees, as well as the control of its finances and disbursements, and of its treasurer, clerks, and servants. The theory of the bill was that he had acquired a large amount of the stock of the Credit Mobilier of America upon which dividends had been paid in money and in the stock and bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the amount of such bonds exceeding, it was alleged, $700,000, and the amount of such stock of the last-named corporation being nearly $2,000,000; and that the shares of stock, bonds, and moneys, so received by him, belonged equitably to the Credit Mobilier of America and its stockholders.

The bill alleged that Durant's pecuniary condition was precarious; that he was, and for a long time had been, largely engaged in hazardous speculations and financial operations, sustaining thereby heavy losses, and liable to sustain others; that any recovery against him, it was feared, could not be enforced by execution or the ordinary process of law; that he was "about to depart out of the state, and out of the jurisdiction of this court;" and that the defendants, (the individual defendants being sued as trustees in a certain contract with the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the profits of which belonged to the Credit Mobilier of America and its stockholders,) "though requested so to do," had wholly neglected and refused to take any steps to compel him to account for said moneys, stocks, and bonds, so received and improperly appropriated.

The principal relief asked was that Durant be required to pay over and deliver to the Credit Mobilier of America and the plaintiff Hazard such sums of money and shares of stock as should appear upon an accounting to be justly due or belonging to that corporation and to Hazard, and to make such transfer of the stock and bonds as would fully protect its and his rights in the premises; that the amounts ascertained to be due be adjudged a lien upon the shares in the stock of each of said corporations, owned or held by or standing in the name of Durant, as well as upon the above contract assigned to the defendant trustees and the dividends, earnings, stocks, and bonds received or to be received by virtue of that contract, to the extent of the shares to which Durant might be entitled under it; and that, on default in the payment and delivery of the moneys, stocks, and bonds so found due, all such stocks and bonds be sold under the direction of the court, or otherwise transferred and apportioned equitably among the rightful owners and claimants thereof; and that such stock, bonds, moneys, interest, and rights, so procured by Durant, be deemed and taken as the rightful property of the Credit Mobilier of America and its stockholders. The bill prayed that Durant be restrained from departing out of the state, and out of the jurisdiction of the court, by writ of ne exeat, issued under its seal and by its order.

A writ of ne exeat was ordered to be issued, August 22, 1868, for $53,735. It was in these words:

"Whereas, it is represented to our supreme court, sitting in equity, on the part of Isaac P. Hazard and others, complainants, against Thomas C. Durant and others, defendants, that said Thomas C. Durant is greatly indebted to the said complainant, and designs quickly to go into other parts beyond this state, (as by oath made in that behalf appears,) which tends to the great prejudice and damage of the said complainants: Therefore, in order to prevent this injustice, we hereby command you that you do, without delay, cause the said Thomas C. Durant to come before you and give sufficient bail or security, in the sum of fifty-three thousand seven hundred and thirty-five dollars, that he, said Thomas C. Durant, will not go, or attempt to go, into parts beyond this state without the leave of our said court; and, in case the said Thomas C. Durant shall refuse to give such bail or security, then you are to commit him, the said Durant, to our county jail, in your precinct, there to be kept in safe custody until he shall do it of his own accord; and when you shall have taken such security you are forthwith to make and return a certificate thereof to our said court, distinctly and plainly, under your hand, together with this writ."

Durant was arrested under this writ on the night of August 22, 1868, and on the 24th he executed, with Griswold and Bradford, as his sureties, the following bond, drawn by one of Hazard's attorneys:

"Know all men that we, Thomas C. Durant, as principal, and John N. A. Griswold and S. Dexter Bradford, as sureties, are firmly bound to Isaac P. Hazard, Rowland Hazard, Rowland G. Hazard, Elizabeth Hazard, Elizabeth Hazard, trustee, Anna Hazard, Mary P. Hazard, Lydia Torrey, Sophia Vernon, and Anna Horner in the sum of fifty-three thousand seven hundred and thirty-five dollars, to be paid said obligees, their executors, administrators, or assigns; to which payment we bind ourselves, our several and respective heirs, executors, and administrators, jointly and severally, hereby.

"Sealed with our seals and dated this 24th day of August, A. D. 1868.

"The condition of this obligation is that said Thomas C. Durant shall on his part abide and perform the orders and decrees of the supreme court of the state of Rhode Island in the suit in equity of Isaac P. Hazard and others against said Thomas C. Durant and others, now pending in said court within and for the county of Newport." This is the bond above referred to.

Under the latter date, and presumably before the execution of that bond, the attorneys of Hazard and Durant signed the following agreement: "In the above entitled case it is agreed that said Thomas C. Durant shall file a bond, with surety in the penalty marked in the writ of ne exeat therein, to abide and perform the orders and decrees of the court in said cause, and that thereupon the writ of ne exeat aforesaid shall be discharged, and that the court may enter decree accordingly." The court, under the same date, entered the following order: "Thomas C. Durant, one of the defendants in this suit, having executed and filed a bond, with sureties, to abide and perform the orders and decrees of the court made in this suit, it is now, by consent, ordered that the writ of ne exeat heretofore issued be discharged." For some reason not explained, the writ of ne exeat was not returned to the clerk's office and filed until October 21, 1868. The sheriff made this return on the writ: "Newport, August 24, 1868. I caused the within-named Thomas C. Durant personally to come before me, as within commanded, on the 22d day of this month, and now the writ is discharged by order of court."

On the 2d day of December, 1882, more than 14 years after the commencement of Hazard's suit, it was ordered, adjudged, and decreed in that suit, among other things, as follows:

"Second. That the defendant Thomas C. Durant is accountable for and do, within 90 days from the date hereof, pay the sum of $16,071,659.97, with interest from this date, the said sum, with interest thereon, to be deposited in the registry of this court, or be paid, in the first instance, to Rowland Hazard, of South Kingston, in said state, and Henry Martin, of Brooklyn, in the state of New York, who are hereby appointed special commissioners, with authority, jointly and severally, to collect and receive the same, and with power to take such steps to collect the same as may be necessary and according to law, and said fund, or so much thereof as may be collected by process or otherwise, is hereby directed to be paid and deposited in the registry of this court to the credit of this cause.

"Third. Of the aforesaid total sum of $16,071,659.97, the defendant Thomas C. Durant is hereby allowed and is decreed to be entitled to pay and discharge $8,816,232.93, or any part thereof pro tanto, by transferring and delivering stock of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and first mortgage and sinking fund bonds of said company, as per Statement G, now exhibited to the court, and directed to be filed in this cause, with all dividends which may have been collected or received by said defendant or his assigns after the date of this decree, together with interest on the same to the date of payment thereof by said defendant, the certificates of said stock, with transfers thereof, and the said bonds to be delivered to the said Rowland Hazard and Henry Martin, who are hereby appointed special commissioners to receive the same, and who are hereby authorized and directed to sell the same, or such portions thereof as may be delivered to them from time to time as they are secured, at public auction, and receive the proceeds thereof, and, after deducting the costs and charges of such sales, deposit the same in the registry of this court to the credit of this cause: provided, however, that the said privilege herein granted to the said defendant Thomas C. Durant to transfer and deliver said stocks and bonds in partial discharge and payment of the sum hereinbefore decreed to be paid by him be exercised by him within thirty days from the date of the entering this decree; and that, in default of such transfer and delivery, or of the transfer and delivery of the entire amount of said stock and bonds within the said thirty days, the obligation of the defendant Thomas C. Durant to pay the said proportion of the said sum or of the residue of the same, after deducting the amount of such stocks and bonds as may be delivered, as aforesaid, at their face value, shall become, and is hereby declared to be, absolute; and provided further, nevertheless, that the said option or privilege of the said Thomas C. Durant shall not interfere in any manner with any order or decree in the cause touching the transfer, delivery, sale, or other disposition of said stock and bonds.

"Fourth. The defendant Thomas C. Durant is likewise ordered and directed to transfer and deliver, within thirty days from the date hereof, five thousand seven hundred and seven 45-100 (5,707 45-100) shares of the stock of the Credit Mobilier of America, (which stock has been found by the master to have been purchased with the funds of the Credit Mobilier, and which stock, with any dividends or profits accrued or to accrue on the same, is hereby declared to be the property of said corporation, subject to the decrees and orders in this cause,) with any interest, dividends, rights, benefits, and profits which may have accrued to the said Thomas C. Durant as the holder of the said 5,707 45-100 shares of stock, or any part thereof, and not heretofore charged against him, said transfer and delivery to be made to the said Rowland Hazard and Henry Martin, or either of them, as special commissioners, with power, which is hereby granted to said commissioners, forthwith to take such measures, by suit or suits in their own names, or otherwise, as they may be advised is lawful and necessary to enforce such transfer, collection, or delivery, and said stocks to be held by said commissioners subject to the further order of the court in this cause.

"Fifth. All interlocutory injunctions heretofore made in this cause, so far as consistent with this decree, are declared to be and are hereby made perpetual, and the further consideration of the cause, and particularly as to allowances to the complainants for costs, expenses, and services, and as to the distribution of the funds that may be deposited in the registry of the court to the credit of the cause, and also the consideration of any order or decree which may be necessary in the premises against the defendant Thomas C. Durant, by reason of any default which may be made by him touching any portion of this decree, and also the consideration of any other and further decree herein against or concerning the defendants other than the said Thomas C. Durant, be, and they hereby are, directed to stand over, with leave to any party in interest, save parties in contempt or parties who may appear to be for any other cause disqualified, to apply at any time for further orders and directions."

The bill in case No. 50 was filed September 13, 1881. That suit proceeds upon these grounds: That the bond of August 24, 1868, whereby Griswold became bound, as one of the sureties of Durant, that the latter should "on his part abide and perform the orders and decrees of the supreme court of the state of Rhode Island in the suit in equity of Isaac P. Hazard and others against said Thomas C. Durant and others, now [then] pending in said court," was obtained by fraud, and by concealment from him of facts he was entitled to have communicated to him before he assumed the obligations imposed by that instrument; that he intended to sign, and believed, at the time, that he signed, a bond which simply bound him for the appearance of Durant, so that he should be personally amenable to the process and orders of the court in the suit brought by Hazard; that the execution of the bond in question was the result of mistake; that the agreement whereby, upon the execution by Durant of a bond, the writ of ne exeat was to be discharged, was made without his knowledge or consent, as was also the order of court in pursuance of such agreement, and was in derogation of his rights; that his purpose to become surety only for Durant's appearance to answer the process of the court was well known at the time to the plaintiff and his attorneys, who prepared, and supervised the execution of, the bond; and that the writ of ne exeat was sued out upon the ground that Durant was about to depart from the state, when, in fact, he only contemplated coming to the state.

Protesting that the legal effect of the bond was that he should be responsible only for the appearance of Durant, so as to be subject to the process of the court in the Hazard suit, and averring his willingness to execute a proper ne exeat bond, he prayed that the bond in question be set aside as having been obtained by fraud, imposition, and mistake, or reformed, as indicated, and that the defendants be restrained by injunction from enforcing it in its present shape.

The answers of the defendants put in issue the material allegations of the bill. The plaintiff filed a replication, and proofs being taken, and the cause heard, the bill, as already stated, was dismissed. (C. C.) 26 Fed. 135.

The action at law, being case No. 53, was commenced March 3, 1883, in one of the courts of Rhode Island, and was removed, upon Griswold's application, to the circuit court of the United States. The declaration set out the bond of August 24, 1868, alleged that Bradford, one of the sureties thereon, was dead, and that Durant had not kept its condition, in that he had not performed the above decree of December 2, 1882, in the equity suit brought by Hazard; whereby the plaintiffs Rowland Hazard, Rowland G. Hazard, Anna Hazard, and Lydia Torrey were entitled to have and demand of him the amount of said bond, $53,735. A copy of that decree was made an exhibit in the declaration. The defendant Griswold filed ten pleas, each of which was in bar of the action. One of the pleas made a copy of the proceedings in Hazard's suit a part of it. Demurrers and replications were filed to the pleas, those to the second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh pleas being special demurrers. By an order entered July 1, 1884, the demurrers were sustained to the second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh pleas, the opinion of the court being delivered by Mr. Justice Gray. (C. C.) 21 Fed. 178.

Pursuant to a stipulation of counsel, dated November 26, 1883, that the plaintiff might demur specially to the second, third, fourth, fifth, and seventh pleas, and, in case the demurrers were overruled, reply to those pleas as if no demurrers had been filed, and that amended pleas, if desired, might be filed by the defendant, and in obedience to the order of court requiring the amended pleas to be filed on or before October 15, 1884, the defendant, on the 14th of October, 1884, filed amended third, fourth, fifth, and seventh pleas. The case was subsequently heard on a motion by plaintiff, made November 19, 1884, that the amended pleas be stricken out, and on the 30th of March, 1885, this order was made: "Plaintiff's motion to strike amended pleas from the files is granted." Certain stipulations were made between counsel; among others, one to the effect "that the plaintiffs were able to prove under the decree of the supreme court of Rhode Island, in the equity suit brought by Hazard, an amount of damage in excess of the penal sum of the bond declared on in this suit." A jury having been waived in writing, the court gave judgment, as of February 12, 1887, against Griswold, for $66,470.

The suit in equity No. 51 was brought June 12, 1885. The bill in that case, after referring to the suit in equity brought by Isaac P. Hazard in 1868, showed that, on the 17th of November, 1875, Rowland G. Hazard commenced a suit in equity in one of the courts of Pennsylvania, against the Credit Mobilier of America and others, which was subsequently removed to the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Pennsylvania, that being the domicile of the corporation; that in such suit Oliver Ames was appointed receiver of all the goods, chattels, rights, and effects of the corporation, and was authorized by the court in Pennsylvania to deliver to Durant a deed of release from all actions, causes of action, suits, bills, bonds, writings obligatory, debts, dues, duties, reckonings, accounts, sums of money, judgments, executions, extents, quarrels, controversies, trespasses, damages, and demands whatever, both in law or equity, which the Credit Mobilier of America then had, or might at any time thereafter have, claim, allege, or demand, against said Durant, for or by reason or means of any matter, cause, or thing whatever; that afterwards, on the 27th day of October, 1881, Ames, under the said authority, and in consideration of the execution by Durant of a deed conveying the title to certain lands mentioned in the order of court authorizing the release, delivered to the latter a deed of release, of the kind above indicated, of all sums of money then due or owing to, or thereafter to become due to, said corporation; that the above equity suit in the supreme court of Rhode Island was, and had been, wholly controlled by Rowland G. Hazard; that, notwithstanding the delivery of the above deed to Durant, the latter suit was proceeded with, and the supreme court of Rhode Island rendered a decree refusing to allow him to set it up as a bar to the entering of such decree, on the ground that he was in contempt of that court for violation of one of its decrees rendered therein; and that after the delivery of the deed of release to Durant the plaintiff requested the defendants to surrender the bond of August 24, 1868, and to abstain from suing him thereon, but they refused to comply with that request. The relief asked was an injunction restraining the defendants from further proceeding in the action at law. Upon a hearing before Judges Colt and Carpenter a demurrer to the bill was sustained, and the bill dismissed, October 28, 1886, Judge Carpenter delivering the opinion of the court. (C. C.) 28 Fed. 597.

The bill in case No. 52 was filed June 12, 1885. It assailed the jurisdiction of the supreme court of Rhode Island over the subject-matter of the suit in equity brought by Hazard, upon the ground that before bringing it neither the plaintiff therein, Isaac P. Hazard, nor any other stockholder of the Credit Mobilier of America, requested the managing committee of the board of directors or the stockholders of that corporation to begin legal or equitable proceedings against Durant. The cause was heard upon demurrer before Judges Colt and Carpenter. The demurrer was sustained, and the bill dismissed, the opinion of the circuit court being delivered by Judge Carpenter. (C. C.) 28 Fed. 578.

James C. Carter, for appellants and plaintiffs in error. Elias Merwin and Sam'l Madrox, for appellees and defendants in error.

Mr. Justice HARLAN, after stating the facts in the foregoing language, delivered the opinion of the court.

These four cases are so closely connected in their facts, as well as in the questions of law presented for determination, that it is convenient to dispose of them by one opinion.

Our attention will be directed first to case No. 50, in which a decree is sought to cancel, or, in the alternative, to reform, the bond of August 24, 1868, executed by Durant as principal, and by Griswold and Bradford as sureties, and to restrain the defendants from suing upon it in its present form. The granting or refusing of such a decree depends, of course, upon the inquiry whether the plaintiff Griswold has, by evidence sufficiently clear and convincing, manifested his right to the relief asked.

While in respect to some matters there is a conflict among the witnesses, certain facts and circumstances are clearly established, and may be summarized as follows: Durant, in August, 1868, was a citizen and resident of New York. He went to Newport for a brief stay, and was there on the morning of Saturday, August 22d. About noon of that day the suit in which the writ of ne exeat issued was commenced against him. He was then sailing, with several friends, in his yacht on the high seas. The yacht landed at the Newport wharf shortly before 11 o'clock at night. Upon his stepping ashore he was notified by two officers, who had kept continuous watch for him at the wharf during the afternoon, that they had a writ for his arrest,—meaning the above writ of ne exeat,—and that he must go to jail. He accompanied them to that place, one of the counsel of Hazard, Mr. Peckham, following on foot to the sheriff's office. Information of the arrest having been communicated to Mr. H. W. Gray, also a citizen of New York, temporarily at Newport, that gentleman went to Griswold, who was his uncle, and begged the latter to go to the jail and become bail for Durant's appearance. Griswold had only a slight acquaintance with Durant, never having met him until the spring of 1868, and held no personal or business relations of any kind with him. To oblige his nephew, who was Durant's friend, and merely as an act of kindness and courtesy to a stranger, (Griswold then resided in Newport,) he acceded to the request to become bail for Durant's appearance in court, and for that purpose only went to the jail. Hazard learned, a little before 11 o'clock, that Durant had been arrested as he landed from his yacht, and that owing to the lateness of the hour the sheriff had taken him directly to jail instead of his own office, "as had been previously arranged." He went immediately to the lodgings of one of his attorneys, Mr. Bradley, and caused him "to go and see what could be done to prevent Durant from remaining in jail over Sunday," authorizing his attorney to use his name "for the purpose of releasing said Durant from jail until Monday, it being regarded as very doubtful whether Durant in the short time then remaining before Sunday would be able to provide the necessary bonds."

Shortly after Griswold, accompanied by Gray, reached the jail, the two counsel of Hazard, namely, Bradley and Peckham, arrived there, and a few moments later Gov. Van Zandt came in obedience to a message from Durant, conveyed by Bradford, to act as his counsel. Hazard, it seems, did not accompany his counsel to the jail. It was now nearly 12 o'clock. All who were at the jail agree that they were there only because of the arrest of Durant under a writ commanding the sheriff to take bail from him, in the sum of $53.735, that he would not go or attempt to go into parts beyond the state without the leave of the court, and, if such bail were not given, to commit him to and keep him in jail until he gave bail of his own accord; and, such security being taken, the officer was required by the writ to return a certificate thereof to the court. There is no claim that any one present was ignorant of the terms of the writ, or of the extent of the authority of the officer charged with its execution. It is further agreed by all the witnesses that there was a conversation at the jail between the lawyers and Durant as to what could be done in order to effect the latter's release. But in this discussion or conversation Griswold took no part whatever. That much is distinctly stated by Peckham, one of Hazard's attorneys who drew the bond, and supervised the execution of the writ of ne exeat, although he says that the sureties could not "help hearing, if they paid any attention." It is equally beyond dispute that the object of Griswold's presence at the jail was well known to Hazard's attorneys.

Just here arises the difference among the witnesses as to what took place at the jail. Detailing what occurred according to his recollection at that place, Peckham says: "When I got to the jail I found there Judge Bradley, who had only preceded me there by a minute or two; Mr. Durant; Charles C. Van Zandt, his counsel; Mr. Griswold; Dexter Bradford; and a stranger, who was, I presume, Mr. Gray. Mr. Van Zandt and Judge Bradley were already talking about the release of Mr. Durant from custody. Judge Bradley said: 'That is a simple matter. Let him give the bond called for by the writ.' The nature of that bond was briefly explained. Mr. Durant said that it was out of the question for him to give it; that he couldn't remain any longer in Rhode Island; that his presence was absolutely demanded outside of the state, and forthwith; and that he must leave here Monday morning. It was suggested that he might file his answer, and apply for the discharge of the writ immediately; but he said, 'I know what proceedings in court are, and I can't remain here at all.' It was then proposed that he should give a bond in the same amount marked in the two writs in the two cases, conditioned to abide and perform whatever decrees the court might make against him in those suits. The nature of these proposed bonds was freely discussed by Judge Bradley, Mr. Van Zandt, and Mr. Durant, and the fact that they were bonds which would hold the principal and sureties liable to pay money in case Durant should not perform any decree made by the court was commented on by Mr. Van Zandt and Mr. Durant. During all this interview Judge Bradley did all the talking for the complainants, and Mr. Van Zandt and Mr. Durant spoke about equally for their side." The same witness states: "Mr. Van Zandt having conferred with Mr. Durant, and those two having conferred with the sureties,—I mean Mr. Griswold and Mr. Bradford,—Mr. Van Zandt then announced that they would give the bonds proposed. As it was then very late, it was further agreed that all should meet at my office on the following Monday morning, soon after midnight, and execute the papers. Besides these bonds, it was also agreed that the respective counsel should sign an agreement that upon the bonds being executed the writs of ne exeat should be absolutely discharged. Just at the close of the interview Judge Bradley addressed himself to all present, saying that he wished to make sure that all understood the arrangement alike, and he stated that Mr. Durant was to give bonds, with Mr. Griswold and Mr. Bradford as sureties, in the sums marked in the writs, to abide and perform all the decrees of the court in the suit; that counsel should sign agreements for the discharge of the writs; that all should meet at my office soon after midnight Monday morning and sign the papers; that in the meantime Mr. Durant would go free from custody upon his word of honor, and he appealed to the sureties, saying: 'We rely upon you, gentlemen, to see that he attends.' We then separated. I prepared the papers, and had them lying upon my table when we met, pursuant to the arrangement. They were read. Mr. Griswold took an active part at this meeting, and, I think, read the papers for himself. The papers were signed without any objection or discussion at that time. Probably we were not together at my office more than ten minutes." Referring to the interview at the jail, Bradley testified that nothing was said, to the best of his recollection and belief, by any one, conveying the idea that the complainants were to obtain from the defendant only a bail-bond for his appearance; and that "the terms of the bond were expressed so as to exclude the idea that it was merely a bail for appearance, and to provide that it should be a bond to abide and perform the order of the court." He further said that the bond "was to be a security," and it was so announced. In all material respects his evidence was in accord with the recollection of Peckham.

But there was other evidence which precludes our accepting the version of the affair given by those gentlemen. Gray, Griswold, Durant, and Van Zandt, with more or less distinctness, but all emphatically, state that neither at the jail Saturday night, nor at the meeting before daylight on Monday morning, was there a hint, suggestion, or proposition, in any form, that Durant should give bond, with sureties, conditioned that he would abide and perform the decrees that might be rendered in the Hazard suit, or that any bond was talked of except one that would make the sureties responsible simply for his appearance in the state, so as to be subject to the orders and process of the court. Gov. Van Zandt testifies, touching the meeting at the jail: "It was proposed by Judge Bradley that Dr. Durant should give bond, with two sureties, which should be substituted for the writ and the writ withdrawn. I then understood from the conversation that the bond was in the nature of a bail-bond, and that when the sureties delivered Dr. Durant into the custody of the court, to either perform its orders and decrees personally, or to suffer such penalties personally as the court might impose, they would comply with the conditions of the bond. Nothing was said in my presence by any person inconsistent with these views." Again, referring to what took place at the time the bond was actually signed, the same witness says: "A bond, prepared by Messrs. Peckham and Bradley, was handed to me as counsel for Mr. Durant; there was some little discussion as to whether it should be made to the sheriff of Newport county, or to the complainants in the then suit. Judge Bradley preferred the latter, and it was so done. I told Mr. Durant that, in my opinion, it was a proper bond to secure his appearance in the suit, and the bond was then executed. * * * I heard nothing said by Judge Bradley or Mr. Peckham, except what I have already stated; I myself told Mr. Durant that, in my opinion, the instrument was, in effect, a bail-bond." Further: "There was nothing said or intimated by any person in my presence or hearing on that occasion to indicate that the bond was a security instead of a surety." The statements of Gov. Van Zandt are fully sustained by the depositions of Gray, Griswold, and Durant.

In view of this great preponderance of evidence upon the side of the plaintiff, as to what occurred at the jail before the separation of the parties to meet Monday morning for the consummation of the business, the court is not at liberty to accept the account given by the defendants' attorneys of the interview of Saturday night. And we have a strong conviction that the recollection of Griswold, Gray, Durant, and Van Zandt as to that interview, is sustained by all the inherent probabilities of the case. And in saying this we would not be understood as reflecting upon the integrity of Hazard's attorneys. The difference in the recollection of gentlemen, in respect to transactions in which they took part, often happens, without any reason to suspect that any of them would intentionally deviate from the line of absolute truth. Such differences existing, the court can only be guided by the weight of the evidence, where the witnesses are intelligent, of equal credibility, and had equal opportunities to know what occurred. In the first place, it is not at all probable that Griswold would have executed the bond in question, as surety, if he had been informed, or believed, that it bound him absolutely, within the amount specified in such bond, for the payment of any sum adjudged against Durant,—almost an entire stranger to him. In the next place, we cannot suppose that the counsel who went to the jail to represent the interests of Hazard, had any other purpose in going there except to see that that was, substantially, accomplished which the writ of ne exeat authorized, namely, the obtaining of bail that would prevent Durant's departure from the state without the leave of the court, and thus have him, at all times, pending Hazard's suit, subject to its rightful power in respect to any decree to be rendered. That was evidently Bradley's purpose, for, according to Peckham's evidence, he suggested that Durant could effect his release by executing the bond specified in the writ. But when the nature of such a bond was explained, and it appeared that the necessity for Durant's being out of the state on Monday rendered that course entirely impracticable, the latter was then informed—according to the evidence of Peckham—that he could file an answer and apply for the discharge of the writ immediately. What was meant by this suggestion? It could have meant but one thing, namely, that it was in the power of Durant to obtain, without objection, if not of right, a discharge of the writ, after answering, by executing a bond of some kind. A party arrested upon ne exeat may obtain the discharge of the writ, upon motion or petition, and after notice, and according to some authorities, "it is a matter of course to order the ne exeat to be discharged, upon the defendant's giving security to answer the complainant's bill, and to render himself amenable to the process of the court pending the litigation, and to such process as may be issued to compel a performance of the final decree. * * * Or, where the defendant cannot procure such security as will satisfy the sheriff, or if he wishes to leave the state before the termination of the suit, he may apply to the court to discharge the ne exeat upon his giving proper security to answer and be amenable to process; and upon such application the court will take such security as it may deem sufficient, and will discharge the sheriff from liability." 2 Barb. Ch. Prac. 655, 656; Mitchell v. Bunch, 2 Paige, 606, 621; Brayton v. Smith, 6 Paige, 489, 491; McNamara v. Dwyer, 7 Paige, 239, 244. See, also, Jac. Law Dict. tit. "Ne Exeat Regno;" Johnson v. Clendenin, 5 Gill & J. 463, 481. In Re Griswold, 13 R. I. 126, determined September 20, 1880, Griswold, by petition, sought to be discharged from the bond in question on his principal's placing himself within the jurisdiction of the court, and subject to its orders and decrees. He seems to have proceeded, in that case, upon the ground that he was entitled, of right, to the order of discharge asked. But the supreme court of Rhode Island did not accept that view, observing that it could not regard "a bond to abide and perform the decree as equivalent merely to a bond to abide the event of the suit." To do so, the court said, would be to ignore wholly the word "perform" contained in the bond, which, upon its face, appeared to be given by agreement of the parties. While it was there said, and properly, that the court may require as a condition of the discharge of a writ of ne exeat that the respondent give security to perform the decree,—citing Robertson v. Wilkie, Amb. 177, and Atkinson v. Leonard, 3 Brown, Ch. 218,—it was conceded that "courts will generally discharge a writ of ne exeat upon the respondents giving security to abide the decree on the hearing of the suit." If Durant had remained in Newport, and, upon filing his answer, had applied for the discharge of the writ of ne exeat upon his giving bond with security simply to abide the decree, and place himself, when required, within the jurisdiction of the court, it is inconceivable that the state court would, under the circumstances, have denied his application. But it was further said in that case—and this is quite significant in its bearing upon another question to be presently adverted to—that, "even if the bond in question was to be considered as having no other effect than a bond to abide the decree made upon hearing the cause, the petition could not be granted in the present stage of the proceedings. No final decree in the cause has yet been reached."

As, therefore, Durant could have filed his answer, and, conformably to the general rule, have obtained a discharge of the writ upon giving bond, with surety, that he would be amenable to the orders and process of the court; as he could not, consistently with his engagements, remain in Rhode Island long enough to have an answer prepared, and to move for the discharge of the writ, upon sufficient bond to be by him given; and as Hazard and his counsel expressed a desire that Durant should not be held in custody over Sunday,—what more natural and equitable than that the parties should, by consent, bring about that which Durant must have understood from Bradley that he could accomplish, through the orders of the court, namely, have a bond executed with surety compelling his presence in the state when required by the orders of the court, or subjecting his sureties to personal liability if he did not render himself amenable to its process. If the suggestion that Durant could file his answer and apply to the court for the discharge of the writ (of course, upon bond securing his amenability to the process of the court) had been adopted, the plaintiff would not have obtained a bond making the surety absolutely responsible, within the penal sum named in the writ and bond, for a money decree against Durant. It is therefore unreasonable to suppose that the parties separated Saturday night under an agreement that Hazard should have from Durant a bond that would subject his sureties to a larger responsibility than was involved in the suggestion made that Durant could obtain an order of court for the discharge of the writ. On the contrary, it is more reasonable to suppose that the bond which, on Saturday night, was agreed to be executed on the next Monday morning, was one that would accomplish, by agreement of parties, precisely what Hazard's attorney suggested that Durant might accomplish by an order of court. The agreement of the parties was thus made to take the place of an order of court, because Durant assured Hazard's attorneys that he could not remain in Newport long enough to make a formal application for the discharge of the writ upon a proper bond.

We are of opinion that, although the condition of the bond in question was that Durant should "abide and perform the orders and decrees" of the court in suit in which it was given, all the parties, according to the decided preponderance of evidence, intended to, at the time, as an instrument binding the sureties for the appearance of the principal so as to be amenable to the process and decrees of the court, upon default in which, and not before, were they to be liable to pay the penalty. If the bond means, in law, more than that,—and counsel in this court agree that it does,—the case is one of a mutual mistake, clearly established, as to the legal effect of the instrument. There was no mistake as to the mere words of the bond; for it was drawn by one of Hazard's attorneys, and was read by Griswold before signing it. But, according to the great weight of the evidence, there was a mistake, on both sides, as to the legal import of the terms employed to give effect to the mutual agreement. In short, the instrument does not express the thought and intention which the parties had at the time of its execution. And this mistake was attended by circumstances that render it inequitable for the obligees in the bond to take advantage of it. The instrument was drawn by one of Hazard's attorneys, and was presented and accepted as embodying the agreement previously reached. Griswold was unskilled in the law, and took the word "perform" as implying performance in the sense of Durant's becoming amenable to the process of the court. He had no reason—unless the recollection of Gray, Durant, Van Zandt, and himself as to what occurred is wholly at fault—to doubt that the bond expressed the real agreement; especially if he heard Van Zandt's statement to Durant, when the latter was about to sign the bond, that it "was, in effect, a bail-bond." A court of equity ought not to allow that mistake, satisfactorily established and thus caused, to stand uncorrected, and thereby subject a surety to liability he did not intend to assume, and which, according to the decided preponderance of the evidence, there was at the time no purpose to impose upon him. While it is laid down that "a mere mistake of law, stripped of all other circumstances, constitutes no ground for the reformation of written contracts," yet "the rule that an admitted or clearly established misapprehension of the law does create a basis for the interference of courts of equity, resting on discretion and to be exercised only in the most unquestionable and flagrant cases, is certainly more in consonance with the best-considered and best-reasoned cases upon this point both English and American." Snell v. Insurance Co., 98 U. S. 85, 90, 92, 25 L. Ed. 52; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (Redf. Ed.) §§ 138e, 138f; Stockbridge Iron Co. v. Hudson Iron Co., 102 Mass. 45, 48; Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 309, 316; Jones v. Clifford, 3 Ch. Div. 779, 791, 792; Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373, 377; Green v. Railroad Co., 12 N. J. Eq. 165, 170; Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185, 190; State v. Paup, 13 Ark. 129; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 1, 979-984; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 843-847.

The conclusion reached upon this branch of the case is the only one consistent with fair dealing towards those who were willing to become sureties for the appearance of Durant. If it be not justified upon the ground of mistake as to the mutual agreement, superinduced by the conduct of the party seeking now to take advantage of it, there could be no escape from the conclusion that the taking of a bond that made Griswold absolutely liable as surety, for any amount adjudged to be due from Durant, and not greater than the penal sum named, was, under all the circumstances disclosed, a fraud in law upon him. If the attorneys of Hazard intended to obtain, by means of a bond, more than he was entitled to by such a bond as the writ of ne exeat called for, and more than the court would ordinarily have given them, upon Durant's application to discharge the writ; if they intended to secure a bond that would make Griswold personally liable, within the penal sum, for any money decree passed against Durant, then a fraud was perpetrated upon him, which entitles him to relief; for, according to the decided preponderance of the evidence it must be assumed that Hazard's attorneys knew that he signed the bond in the belief that, pursuant to the previous understanding, it was one to secure Durant's appearance, nothing more, and yet they failed to inform him, at the time, that it was drawn so as to impose upon him a much larger responsibility. Their silence upon that question was, under the circumstances, equivalent to a direct affirmation that the bond meant what Griswold supposed it did. In view of what passed at the jail on Saturday night, their duty was, by sufficient explanation, to correct the misapprehension under which he evidently labored. Besides, there can be no doubt, under the evidence, that the agreement to discharge the writ was reached without consultation with Gris-would. No one of the witnesses states that he was consulted about that matter, or that he was informed as to the legal result of an agreement or order to discharge the writ. He testifies that he knew nothing of any such agreement. So that while Hazard's attorney, according to his evidence, was preparing a bond that would bind Griswold absolutely to pay any decree, not in excess of $53,735, that might be rendered against one who was almost a stranger to him, and who, Hazard stated in his bill, was then engaged in hazardous speculations, and was in a precarious condition pecuniarily, he was, as the representative of Hazard, under an agreement with Durant, of which Griswold had no knowledge, that the writ of ne exeat should be discharged; thus compelling the surety to risk the insolvency of the principal, and putting it out of his power, for his own protection, to surrender the principal, and obtain the cancellation of the bond, as, in that case, the surety might have done, if the bond had been, as he supposed it was, one simply for the appearance of Durant. The concealment of this agreement from Griswold was, under the circumstances, a wrong to him. "The contract of suretyship," says Mr. Story, "imports entire good faith and confidence between the parties in regard to the whole transaction. Any concealment of material facts, or any express or implied misrepresentation of such facts, or any undue advantage taken of the surety by the creditor, either by surprise or by withholding proper information, will undoubtedly furnish a sufficient ground to invalidate the contract." Again: "If a party taking a guaranty from a surety conceals from him facts which go to increase his risk, and suffers him to enter into the contract under false impressions as to the real state of the facts, such a concealment will amount to a fraud, because the party is bound to make the disclosure." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 324, 215. To the same effect are Bank v. Cooper, 36 Me. 180, 196; Smith v. Bank, 1 Dow, 272, 292; Railton v. Mathews, 10 Clark & F. 934, 943; Small v. Currie, 2 Drew. 102, 114; Phillips v. Foxall, L. R. 7 Q. B. 666, 672; Pidcock v. Bishop, 3 Barn. & C. 605; Adams' Eq. 179. But we do not rest our decision upon any ground of fraud in law or fraud in fact. We acquit the attorneys of Hazard of any desire or purpose to do injustice to Griswold, or to commit a fraud upon him. But we are constrained, by the settled rules of evidence, to hold, as already indicated, that their recollection of the circumstances under which the bond of August 24th was executed is materially at fault, and that the alleged mistake is established by convincing proof.

But it is said that Griswold was guilty of such laches in seeking the relief now asked that he is not entitled to the aid of a court of equity. This position is based principally upon what Peckham says occurred between him and Griswold in the fall of the year after the execution of the bond. Peckham testifies: "About the last of October or the 1st of November, 1868, along that time, I met Mr. Griswold on Thames street, in Newport, near my office. He spoke of this bond as if it were a bail-bond. I said, 'No; it is a bond upon which you may be liable to pay money. If, for example, the court should find a judgment against Durant for any sum of money, and he did not pay it, you could be held for the amount named in these bonds.' He said, 'Well, I guess you are right, but I must see Durant about it. He must do something about it.' I asked him, 'Why, he is rich enough, isn't he?' and Mr. Griswold said, 'Yes; he is rich enough, but he is reckless, and there is no telling how long such a man may stay rich, and he must give me security.' I would like to add here that I mentioned this to Mr. Honey last winter. Mr. Honey said that he was confident, from conversations he had had with his client, Mr. Griswold, that Mr. Griswold had no recollection of any such conversation with me; and I replied that, if Mr. Griswold did not recollect it, I should hesitate about swearing to it, and that I did not think I would swear to it under those circumstances, and that certainly I would not like to do so. Still I have felt bound to state it here, upon further reflection, with these explanations." If this be a correct statement of what passed between Peckham and Griswold, upon the occasion referred to, it is significant as showing that months after the bond was executed Griswold spoke of it as a bail-bond. His declaration, after Peckham's explanation of its terms, "I guess you are right," naturally meant no more than a courteous acquiescence, without discussion, in the opinion expressed by one learned in the law. Griswold, while recalling the fact that he expressed to Peckham his belief that it was a bail-bond, denies explicitly that he, on that or any other occasion, ever admitted that it was other than a bail-bond.

Besides, there was no absolute necessity for Griswold's moving in the matter until after some decree was passed against Durant, and until an attempt was made to hold him personally responsible for the amount of the bond. He made an effort in Re Griswold, 13 R. I. 125, to be discharged from his bond upon the principal's placing himself within the jurisdiction of the court. But, as we have seen, the court, after declining to discharge the bond, said that, even if the bond in question was to be considered as having no other effect than a bond to abide the decree made upon hearing the cause, the petition for its discharge would not be considered by it until a final decree was passed. The judgment in that case was passed September 30, 1880. Notwithstanding this announcement, and doubtless because of the intimation that the bond meant more, in law, than he supposed, Griswold commenced the present suit more than a year before the decree was rendered against Durant, and before the action at law was brought on the bond. Under the peculiar circumstances of this case, we think the defense of laches is without substantial merit. Whether laches is to be imputed to a party seeking the aid of a court of equity depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. There are no circumstances here that would justify a refusal to grant the relief asked because of Griswold's delay in instituting suit to have the bond canceled or reformed.

In the view the court takes of this case, the proper decree to make, if Durant were living, would be one reforming the bond of August 24, 1868, so as to make Griswold liable for the penal sum named only in the event that the principal failed to appear and become subject to the orders and decrees of the court in the suit in which the writ of ne exeat was issued. But such a decree would not now be appropriate. Under the circumstances, the only decree that will accomplish the ends of substantial justice is one perpetually enjoining the prosecution of any action, suit, or proceeding to make him liable in any sum on or by reason of said bond.

We come now to the action at law No. 53, in which there was a judgment against Griswold on the bond of August 24, 1868, for the sum of $66,470. It is assigned for error that the court sustained the demurrers to the original second, third, fourth, and fifth pleas, ordered the amended third, fourth, and fifth pleas to be stricken from the files, and denied the defendant's motions, at the trial, for judgment on his eighth and ninth pleas. It has been assumed in argument that the record in this case substantially presents, among other questions, the following: (1) Whether the bond of August 24, 1868, was not obtained by such fraud and concealment as rendered it void as against Griswold. (2) Whether upon the face of the record of the equity suit in which the order or decree of December 2, 1882, was rendered the court was not without jurisdiction of the subject-matter of that suit, the essential object of which, it is argued, was to administer the affairs, and distribute the assets, of a Pennsylvania corporation, by means of decrees and orders of a court in Rhode Island. (3) Whether simple duress operating only on the principal in the bond could be taken advantage of by the surety. (4) Whether the plaintiffs, notwithstanding the stipulation of Griswold's counsel, at the trial, that they were able to prove, under the decree of December 2, 1882, "an amount of damage in excess of the penal sum of the bond declared on," could maintain an action on the bond for that or any other sum, until it was ascertained and adjudged in Hazard's equity suit, what distinct part, if any, of the $16,071,659.97 for which Durant was adjudged by the supreme court of Rhode Island to be accountable to the Credit Mobilier of America, actually belonged, or would be ultimately awarded, to the obligees in the bond.

These questions have been argued by the counsel of the respective parties with signal ability, and their importance is recognized. But, in view of the present condition of the record of this case, it is not deemed best now to discuss them. The ground upon which the court below ordered the amended pleas to be stricken from the files does not appear. It may be that the motion was treated as a formal demurrer (Slocumb v. Powers, 10 R. I. 255), or was granted because, in the judgment of the court, the amended pleas did not materially change the defense as presented in the pleas to which special demurrers were sustained, and were not, therefore, fairly embraced by the stipulation made by counsel for their being filed. But, in our judgment, the amended pleas were much broader, as well as more specific in their averments, than were the original pleas; and the questions arising upon them could have been more appropriately raised by demurrer. Smith v. Carroll (R. I. July 19, 1890) 20 Atl. 227. We are the more willing to make this disposition of the case, because of the decision in case No. 50 in respect to Griswold's liability upon the bond sued on. In view of what has been there said, the discussion of the above questions would seem to be unnecessary.

The demurrer to the bill in No. 51 was properly sustained. The error, if any, committed by the supreme court of Rhode Island in not allowing the release, executed to Durant by the receiver in the Pennsylvania court of the Credit Mobilier of America, to be interposed as a defense in the suit brought by Hazard against Durant and others, could not be corrected by bill in equity, filed by a surety on the bond of August 24th; for the reason, if there were no other, that the release was delivered prior to the judgment in the state court constituting the basis of the action at law on the bond.

The demurrer to the bill in case No. 52 was also properly sustained. In that case the validity of the proceedings in the supreme court of Rhode Island, by Hazard against Durant and others, was assailed upon the ground that the bill in that suit did not sufficiently show that any effort had been made by Hazard, the plaintiff therein, and who sued as stockholder, to procure corporate action against Durant by the Credit Mobilier of America. It is only necessary to say that this ground presents only a question of mere error in the judgment of the state court, and does not affect its jurisdiction.

The decree in suit No. 50 must be reversed, with directions to enter a new decree perpetually enjoining the defendants therein, and each of them, from prosecuting any suit, action, or proceeding against Griswold on the bond executed by him on the 24th of August, 1868, as one of the sureties of Thomas C. Durant; the decrees in cases Nos. 51 and 52 must be affirmed; and the judgment in the action at law No. 53 must be reversed with directions for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion. Griswold is entitled to his costs in this court in cases 50 and 53, and the appellees in the other cases are entitled to their costs here as against Griswold. It is so ordered.

BRADLEY and BREWER, JJ., did not participate in the decision of this case.

MARSHALL et al. v. WESTROPE.

(67 N. W. 257, 98 Iowa, 324.)

Supreme Court of Iowa. May 18, 1896.

Appeal from district court, Shelby county; A. B. Thornell, Judge.

Suit in equity to reform a contract of assignment of certain accounts made by defendant to plaintiffs, and to recover on the contract so reformed the sum of $270, being the value of certain machinery delivered by plaintiffs to defendant in consideration of the assignment. The defendant admitted the receipt of the machinery, the assignment of the accounts, and a certain modification of the contract of assignment, but denied each and every other claim of plaintiffs. He also pleaded an election of remedies on the part of plaintiffs, by which they confirmed and elected to stand on the original contract as made. There was a trial to the court, and judgment and decree for plaintiffs. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Smith & Cullison, for appellant. Nash, Phelps & Mosier, for appellees.

DEEMER, J. In the year 1891, plaintiffs, a copartnership, were engaged in selling farm machinery at the town of Audubon. Defendant had for a number of years prior thereto been managing and conducting a farm in Audubon county for his father. On or about March 1st, he moved onto a farm of his own, in Shelby county, intending to cultivate it for his own use and benefit. Desirous of purchasing some farm implements, he visited plaintiffs' place of business, with the avowed intention of securing the same. It appears that the defendant was the owner of a stallion, which was "stood" for the season of 1890 in Montgomery or Cass counties, by an agent of defendant, under an arrangement by which the parties who received the services of the stallion were to pay a certain amount therefor in the event the mares bred to him were got with foal; otherwise, nothing should be paid. The defendant was the owner of certain claims for services resulting from the use of the stallion, which he proposed to transfer to plaintiffs for the farm machinery he desired to purchase. No agreement was reached at the first interview, but it was arranged that defendant should see if he could purchase the machinery of some other person at a lower price, and, if not, it was supposed that the negotiations would be renewed. About March 27th, the defendant wrote plaintiffs a letter of which the following is a copy: "Marshall & Sharp: I can make the trade in Harlan, but they are not so low in price as you are. Jones would not make the price he stated and furnish the goods he named. Inclosed find assignment for same. Please sign and date, and keep one, and send me one, and let me know by return mail, because I will want to know at once if the deal is closed. I would come over, but my house burned to the ground last Saturday night, and I cannot leave. Very truly, O. D. Westrope." In this letter was inclosed a contract for the plaintiffs' signature, the material parts of which are as follows: After stating that plaintiffs had sold certain machinery to defendant, it recites: "That, as payment therefor, the said O. D. Westrope enters into and does hereby assign and transfer to said Marshall & Sharp the following accounts for services of the stallion named General Duke, in the year 1890, to wit: [Here follows a list of the accounts, with the amounts of each set out, aggregating the sum of $300.] The said Marshall & Sharp taking and accepting said accounts in full satisfaction of said claim; the said O. D. Westrope hereby agreeing that all foals not paid for by July 1st, 1891, that he will pay to said Marshall & Sharp such account remaining unpaid, and said account so paid by him to be reassigned to him. Marshall & Sharp. O. D. Westrope. Dated at Audubon, Ia., March 28, 1891." These contracts were signed by appellees as indicated, and one of them (there being two) was returned to appellant, and the other retained by appellees. Afterwards one of the articles called for by the contract was substituted by another, and all the goods with the substitute named were shipped to the appellant. But three of the mares served to appellant's horse proved to be with foal, and appellees received but $30 from the accounts so assigned. The other accounts never matured, because the mares did not prove to be with foal. The appellant, being called upon to make payment of the balance of the purchase price, refused, claiming that he had fully performed his contract. The appellees thereupon instituted an action at law against the appellant, alleging (1) that appellant had procured its signature to the contract by fraud and misrepresentation; (2) that there was an implied warranty in the sale of the accounts, to the effect that they were subsisting and enforceable against the parties whose accounts they purported to be; and (3) that appellant received the property without any consideration therefor having been paid by him. The appellant made an issue of fact on the first claim, and demurred to the second and third. The demurrer was sustained as to the third, and overruled as to the second. Defendant thereupon answered the second, pleading that, under the arrangements had with those who secured the services of his stallion, it was agreed that nothing should be paid unless the mares were got with foal; that plaintiffs knew of this arrangement when they accepted the assignment of the accounts. Thereupon plaintiffs amended their petition by adding another count, in which they claimed that, by mutual mistake, or by mistake on their part and fraud on defendant's, the words "foals" was inserted in that part of the contract containing the guaranty, instead of the word "accounts"; and they asked that the mistake be corrected, and the contract reformed. A motion was then filed by defendant attacking the petition on the ground of misjoinder. This motion was sustained, but plaintiffs were permitted to file this last count as an independent action in equity. Certain pleadings were filed attacking this equitable pleading, which need not be referred to, and finally the defendant answered, admitting the receipt of the goods as alleged, but denying the fraud and mistake. He also pleaded that plaintiffs, by the institution of the law action, had confirmed the contract, and elected to stand thereon, and that they could not now be allowed to repudiate it; and that the contract was merged in a judgment by which the rights of the parties were fully determined. Defendant also pleaded that plaintiffs, with full knowledge of the contents of the written contract, and that the word "foals" was used therein, confirmed the same, and elected to stand by the conditions thereof. The plaintiffs filed a reply, denying this last claim of defendant, and also filed a demurrer to that part of the answer pleading an election and confirmation. This demurrer was submitted with the case, and the court, in rendering the decree, sustained the demurrer, reformed the contract as prayed, and rendered judgment for plaintiffs. Defendant excepted to the rulings, and appeals.

1. The first point relied upon by appellant is that the court erred in sustaining the demurrer to that part of his answer pleading election and confirmation. It is said that plaintiffs, by reason of having commenced their suit at law, elected to rely upon the contract, and that they cannot now be allowed to change front, and seek to have it reformed. The question presented is not open for our consideration. The suit is an equitable one, triable de novo in this court, upon the issues of fact presented to the lower court; and, while the appellant might also have the case considered on error, yet, to do so, he must assign the errors of which he complains. Powers v. O'Brien Co., 54 Iowa, 501, 6 N. W. 720; Patterson v. Jack, 59 Iowa, 632, 13 N. W. 724; Hodgin v. Toler, 70 Iowa, 21, 30 N. W. 1. There is no assignment of errors, and we cannot, therefore, review the action of the trial court in sustaining appellees' demurrer. It may not be inappropriate to say, however, that we do not think the facts as pleaded in defendant's answer constitute such an election of remedies, or such a claim of right, as prevents the appellees from asking for a reformation of the contract upon which the suit is founded.

2. The appellees alleged in their petition that the contract of sale "did not express the real contract entered into between plaintiff and defendant, * * * in that the word 'foals' was, by fraud or mistake of the defendant, used in the place of the word 'accounts,' * * * but that plaintiff, through mistake as to the contents of said instrument, believed that the word 'accounts' was used in the said instrument where the word 'foals' is found, and was thereby induced to sign the said instrument." In an amendment to the petition, the appellees said "that either said instrument did not express the intention and real contract of the parties signing the same by reason of the mistake of both parties or of the scrivener drawing the same, or that the defendant fraudulently presented the same to plaintiffs, intending that plaintiffs should be misled thereby, and knowing that plaintiffs were in error as to the terms and to its sufficiency to express the contract between them." It is now insisted that the evidence does not sustain either claim. It seems to us that this is true in so far as it relates to the alleged mistake of fact recited in the original petition. The evidence conclusively shows that both members of plaintiffs' firm knew when they signed the contract just what it contained. They knew that the word "foals" was used, instead of the word "accounts." They talked about the contract with each other before signing it. The defendant says that there was no mistake; that the language used was just as he intended. Manifestly, there was no such mistake of fact as to justify a reformation of the instrument, for the plain reason that neither party was mistaken in regard to what was in fact in the contract. A mistake, to be such as the law will relieve from, must be mutual and reciprocal. When the contract as executed is just as the parties intended to make it, the court has no power to reform it because of mistake of fact. To do so would be making a new contract for the parties, and would also impose upon one burdens which he did not intend to assume. No court has the power to make a new contract for the parties. It can only do what the parties mutually and manifestly intended at the time they signed the same. The mistake made, if any, was with reference to the efficacy of the terms used to carry out the intent of the parties, and this is the real claim made by the appellees. We have, then, the question: Will a court of equity reform a contract under such circumstances? In the case of Lee v. Percival, 52 N. W. 543, we held, following the rule laid down by Prof. Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, that "if, on the other hand, after making an agreement, in the process of reducing it to a written form, the instrument, by means of a mistake of law, fails to express the contract which the parties actually entered into, equity will interfere with the appropriate relief, either by way of defense to its enforcement or by cancellation or reformation, to the same extent as if the failure of the writing to express the real contract was caused by a mistake of fact. In this instance there is no mistake as to the legal import of the contract actually made; but the mistake of law prevents the real contract from being embodied in the written instrument." The counterpart of this proposition announced by Prof. Pomeroy is: "The doctrine is settled that, in general, a mistake of law, pure and simple, is not adequate ground for relief." Section 842. "The rule is well settled that a simple mistake by a party as to the legal effect of an agreement which he executes, or as to the legal result of an act which he performs, is no ground for either defensive or affirmative relief. * * * The principle underlying this rule is that equity will not interfere for the purpose of carrying out an intention which the parties did not have when they entered into a transaction, but which they might or even would have had if they had been more correctly informed as to the law,—if they had not been mistaken as to the legal scope and effect of their transaction." Section 843. "If an agreement is what it was intended to be, equity will not interfere with it because the parties have mistaken its legal import and effect." Section 845. We now have the two rules stated as concisely as general principles may be, and it is next important to determine under which of them this case falls. We have seen that if the parties, at the time they made their agreement,—at the time their minds met,—mutually understood that the defendant was to guaranty all the accounts which he transferred to plaintiffs, but that, in the process of reducing their agreement to writing, they used the word "foals" under the mistaken idea that it was as broad as the word "accounts," then equity will afford relief. But if they made an agreement that defendant should guaranty the foals, under the mistaken idea that this would be a guaranty of the accounts, then no relief can be granted. It is also a well-settled and oft-repeated rule of law that, before mistakes of either fact or law can be relieved from either affirmatively or negatively, it is essential that the proofs be clear, strong, convincing, and free from reasonable doubt. Gelpcke v. Blake, 15 Iowa, 387; Clute v. Frazier (Iowa) 12 N. W. 327. There is another rule which it may be well to note, as it is relied upon by the appellees in this case. It is as follows: "A mistake which will warrant a court of equity in reforming a written contract must be a mistake made by both parties to the agreement, or it must be the mistake of one party by which his intentions have failed of correct expression, and there must be fraud in the other party in taking advantage of the mistake, and obtaining a contract with the knowledge that the one dealing with him is in error as to what are its terms." Bryce v. Insurance Co., 55 N. Y. 243; Winans v. Huyck, 71 Iowa, 459, 32 N. W. 422. Another principle which is suggested by appellant may also be stated. It is to the effect that a mistake caused by the want of that care and diligence in the transaction which should be used by every person of reasonable prudence, and the absence of which would be a violation of legal duty, will not be relieved from by a court of equity.

Turning now to the evidence, we find that it establishes the following facts: The defendant, desirous of purchasing some farm machinery, visited the plaintiffs, and received from them their lowest and best price therefor. He then offered to exchange some accounts in payment or as collateral security for the purchase price. The plaintiffs would not accept these accounts without a guaranty from the defendant, and they so told him. Defendant then said he would be responsible and pay all accounts that were not paid and turned over to plaintiffs by July 1st. The plaintiffs then said they would accept the proposition. All parties understood at the time the condition of the accounts,—that the parties against whom they purported to be were not to be responsible unless the mares proved to be with foal. The defendant wished to do a little more figuring, and said that he was going over to his farm, and would look the matter up a little further, and would write what he concluded to do about the matter. It was further agreed that, if the trade was consummated, the goods should be shipped to defendant over the Rock Island Railroad. The next plaintiffs heard from defendant was by letter of date March 27, 1891, a copy of which we have already given. When plaintiffs signed the contract which was inclosed in defendant's letter, they understood they were carrying out the arrangements previously made. Some time in September of the year 1891, the plaintiffs ascertained they were not going to receive more than $30 from the accounts which were assigned them, and they called on defendant for payment. Defendant put them off from time to time, and finally announced that he intended to stand upon his contract. When plaintiffs signed the contract, they knew the words it contained, and their mistake, which we are abundantly satisfied they made, was as to the legal effect thereof. We feel quite certain that the defendant, when he first talked to the plaintiffs, intended to guaranty all the assigned accounts, and not those only which fully matured. It is not so clear, however, that he, in drafting the contract, intended, by the words used, to make himself responsible for the accounts without reference to the foals.

Now, in applying the law to these facts, the first inquiry is, what was the contract as actually entered into by the parties? for it must be remembered that this is not a suit to cancel or set the writing aside, but to make it conform to the real agreement of the parties. If, then, the instrument itself is the contract the parties in fact made, then there is nothing to reform. But if they made a parol contract,—if there was in fact a meeting of the minds of the parties,—and they made a mutual mistake in reducing it to writing, and used terms which did not express the real contract between them, equity will reform the instrument to make it correspond with the contract as actually made. It is apparent from what we have said, as well as from some other circumstances in the case which we cannot take the space to state, that, while the parties were making propositions and negotiations with each other for a trade, their minds never in fact met until the plaintiffs signed the written instrument which was sent for their signature. This was the contract between the parties; and although it did not, for lack of apt words, express what they thought it did, this was the only agreement they made.

It is well to inquire what other contract did they in fact make which should be given force and vitality. The answer is, none. The whole matter as it stood at the end of the personal interview between the parties was in the form of propositions by one to the other. The acceptance by the defendant was not of the offer made him by the plaintiffs. He in truth sent another proposition when he mailed the contracts signed by himself. These contracts were not in accord with the previous negotiations of the parties; but the plaintiffs, when they signed them, knew full well what they contained, and, if any agreement was made, it was the one expressed in the writing. It may be that, because of a mistake of law, the minds of the parties never met. But, if this be conceded, it will not aid the plaintiffs; for they are insisting upon the performance of a contract which they say they did make. They are not suing to avoid an instrument because they never agreed to it. Moreover, if they were asking cancellation or rescission, their own negligence in signing the contract would seem to be a bar to relief of this kind.

There is no evidence of fraud of any kind on the part of the defendant. He forwarded such an agreement as he proposed to make with the plaintiffs, and they, without any kind of imposition, misrepresentation, concealment, or other inequitable conduct on defendant's part, signed the instrument with full knowledge of what it contained. The most that can be claimed from the evidence is that the defendant forwarded the instrument with intent to induce plaintiffs to believe that it was in accord with the previous negotiations, but this is a mere inference, which is squarely denied by the defendant. The presumptions are with the defendant, and the rule is well settled that fraud will not be presumed, but must be proved by him who alleges it.

An insuperable objection to relief on the ground of fraud is the negligence of the plaintiffs in signing the instrument. They had the same means of knowledge as to the legal effect of the words used as the defendant; and, if they were mistaken as to the proper legal construction thereof, it was not due, so far as we can learn from the record, to any fault of the defendant. The case, then, is one of mistake of law, pure and simple, and a court of equity cannot reform it. If we should attempt to do so, we would make a new contract for the parties, and impose upon one of them burdens to which he has never assented. While it may seem like a hardship to say that plaintiffs shall not recover for the machinery delivered defendant, yet the case is one of mistake of law, in which some person must suffer; "and the law wisely, though sometimes with great apparent hardship, leaves it for him to suffer who committed the mistake."

These conclusions are supported by the following, among other, authorities: Reed v. Root, 59 Iowa, 359, 13 N. W. 323; Moorman v. Collier, 32 Iowa, 138; Stafford v. Fetters, 55 Iowa, 484, 8 N. W. 322; Baker v. Massey, 50 Iowa, 399; Nowlin v. Pyne, 47 Iowa, 293; Hallam v. Corlett, 71 Iowa, 446, 32 N. W. 449. See, also, the cases cited in the first part of this opinion.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment must be reversed.

RENARD v. CLINK et al.

(51 N. W. 692, 91 Mich. 1.)

Supreme Court of Michigan. March 18, 1892.

Appeal from circuit court, Charlevoix county, in chancery; Jonathan G. Ramsdell, Judge.

Suit to foreclose a mortgage by Louisa Renard against Alice A. Clink, Eliza S. Fogg, John Nichols, and Walter L. French. Bill dismissed. Complainant appeals. Reversed.

Norton & Keat, for appellant. S. H. Clink, for appellees.

MONTGOMERY, J. The bill in this cause was filed to foreclose a mortgage executed by the defendant Alice A. Clink to one A. H. Van Dusen, and by him assigned to complainant. The other defendants are subsequent purchasers with notice, after the mortgage became due. A foreclosure at law was attempted, a sale made, and a deed executed to complainant; but, owing to the fact that the assignment of the mortgage to complainant was not of record at the time of said attempted foreclosure, that proceeding proved ineffectual. After the complainant had obtained her deed on the foreclosure at law, and before the filing of the present bill, the defendant Clink tendered to complainant the amount due upon the mortgage, exclusive of the costs of such former foreclosure; and in this proceeding it is claimed that such tender operated to discharge the lien of the mortgage. The court below sustained this defense, and dismissed the bill.

It is made clear by the testimony that the complainant, at the time she refused the tender, supposed that she had acquired title by her former foreclosure, and that, notwithstanding this, she was ready to accept the amount of the mortgage, interest, and costs. It also appears that she offered to take the money tendered so far as it would go, but that defendant refused to permit this unless she would accept it in full payment and discharge of the mortgage. Under these circumstances, we think the court below erred in dismissing the bill. Under the repeated rulings of this court, a tender of the full amount due upon the mortgage will operate to discharge the lien of the mortgage if the tender be refused without adequate excuse. Moynahan v. Moore, 9 Mich. 9; Eslow v. Mitchell, 26 Mich. 500; Sager v. Tupper, 35 Mich. 134; Stewart v. Brown, 48 Mich. 383, 12 N. W. 499. But in the present case it appears beyond question that the complainant had no purpose of exacting from the defendant any sum beyond what she believed to be her legal due.

While it is a general rule that equity will not relieve against a mistake of law, this rule is not universal. Where parties, with knowledge of the facts, and without any inequitable incidents, have made an agreement or other instrument as they intended it should be, and the writing expresses the transaction as it was understood and designed to be made, equity will not allow a defense, or grant a reformation or rescission, although one of the parties may have mistaken or misconceived its legal meaning, scope, or effect. Martin v. Hamlin, 18 Mich. 354; Lapp v. Lapp, 43 Mich. 287, 5 N. W. 317. But where a person is ignorant or mistaken with respect to his own antecedent and existing private legal rights, interest, or estate, and enters into some transaction the legal scope and operation of which he correctly apprehends and understands, for the purpose of affecting such assumed rights, interests, or estates, equity will grant its relief, defensive or affirmative, treating the mistake as analogous to, if not identical with, a mistake of fact. 2 Pom. Eq. § 849, p. 314; Reynell v. Sprye, 8 Hare, 222; Blakeman v. Blakeman, 39 Conn. 320; Whelen's Appeal, 70 Pa. St. 410; Hearst v. Pujol, 44 Cal. 230; Morgan v. Dod, 3 Colo. 551; Cooper v. Phibbs, L. R. 2 H. L. 149; Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, 2 Jac. & W. 205. In Myer v. Hart, 40 Mich. 517, the mortgagor filed his bill to set aside a mortgage sale, and asked that the premises be relieved from the mortgage lien. The court found that the mortgagee was mistaken as to his legal rights, but was acting in good faith, and refused to enforce the statutory penalty, and decreed that the mortgagor pay the mortgage debt as a condition to relief. In Canfield v. Conkling, 41 Mich. 371, 2 N. W. 191, a bill was filed to set aside a mortgage, and to recover the penalty for refusal to discharge it on tender of the amount due. The court found that the tender was sufficient, and say: "He [defendant] was bound to accept the tender, and complainant had made out a sufficient case for relief. But the question was one on which he might be mistaken without any serious fault, and we do not think it one where the mortgage ought to be held canceled without payment; nor is it a case calling for the statutory penalty for a willful and knowing wrongful refusal to discharge the mortgage." The decree below should be reversed, and a decree entered in this court providing for a sale of the mortgaged premises to satisfy the amount due and unpaid upon the mortgage. The defendant will recover the costs of the court below, and the complainant will be entitled to the costs incurred in this court. The other justices concurred.

TITUS v. ROCHESTER GERMAN INS. CO.

(31 S. W. 127, 97 Ky. 567.)

Court of Appeals of Kentucky. May 24, 1895.

Appeal from circuit court, Jefferson county.

"To be officially reported."

Action by U. S. Titus against the Rochester German Insurance Company for rescission of a contract. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Simrall, Bodley & Doolan, for appellant. Gibson, Marshall & Lochre, for appellee.

EASTIN, J. This equitable action was brought by appellant to rescind a contract made with appellee by which, as alleged, he was induced to accept, in satisfaction of a loss under a policy of insurance issued to him by appellee, an amount equal to one-half of that loss and to one-half of the amount of insurance named in the policy. As grounds of rescission, the petition charges that appellant was ignorant of his legal rights under the policy, and that, through fraud and imposition practiced upon him by appellee's agents, and by willful misrepresentations made by them as to his rights under the contract of insurance, he was induced to accept a part of his claim in satisfaction of the whole. The chancellor sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and, appellant declining to plead further, his petition was dismissed, from which ruling this appeal is prosecuted; so that the only question for consideration here is whether or not the facts alleged in the petition, and admitted by the demurrer, are sufficient in equity to entitle appellant to the relief sought.

The petition charges, in the fullest and strongest terms, appellant's ignorance of the rights and obligations of the parties under the policy of insurance, and full knowledge on part of appellee both as to the rights of the parties and as to appellant's ignorance of them, as well as false and fraudulent misrepresentations made by appellee's agents for the purpose of deceiving, and which did deceive, appellant, as to the validity of his claim under the policy. It charges, among other things, that appellee fully understood its liability to appellant for the full amount of his loss; that he was ignorant of the law governing his rights and appellee's obligations, while appellee both knew his rights and knew that he was ignorant of them, and with this knowledge, and intending to deceive and defraud him, fraudulently represented to him that, by reason of an incumbrance on a part of the insured property, his entire claim under the policy was forfeited; that these false representations were made to him by appellee for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding him; and that by these false and fraudulent representations, and through ignorance of his legal rights, he was induced to accept the sum of $400 in satisfaction of a loss of $800, when, except for these fraudulent representations and his ignorance, he would not have done so. These charges being admitted, it seems to us that the case presented involves something more than an effort to obtain relief purely on the ground of a mistake of law, or mere ignorance on part of appellant as to his legal rights under the contract of insurance. It becomes, in addition to this, a case of actual fraud, where, by fraudulent misrepresentations, made for the purpose and with the intent to deceive, the known ignorance of one of the parties to the contract has been willfully taken advantage of, and he has thereby been induced to surrender a valid, subsisting right without consideration. It is true that the ignorance relied upon is an ignorance of law, rather than of facts, and that this is not always or perhaps generally, and when standing alone, available as a ground of relief against an executed contract, no matter how inequitable it may be. On this point the decisions of the courts of this country, as well as the English courts, are by no means uniform; but, in our opinion, the weight of authority and the decisions of this court would now forbid that a party who, with full knowledge of the ignorance of the other contracting party, has not only encouraged that ignorance, and made it the more dense by his own false and fraudulent misrepresentations, but has willfully deceived and led that other into a mistaken conception of his legal rights, should shield himself behind the general doctrine that a mere mistake of law affords no ground for relief. This view seems to be upheld by many, if not all, of the modern text writers who are recognized as authority on the question. Mr. Kerr, in his well-known work, in treating of this subject, says: "But if it appear that the mistake was induced or encouraged by the misrepresentations of the other party to the transaction, or was perceived by him, and taken advantage of, the court will be more disposed to grant relief than in cases where it does not appear that he was aware of the mistake." Kerr, Fraud & M. pp. 399, 400. And, in his work on Equity, Mr. Bispham lays down this doctrine in even stronger and less uncertain terms. He says: "Where ignorance of the law exists on one side, and that ignorance is known and taken advantage of by the other party, the former will be relieved. More particularly will this be so if the mistake was encouraged or induced by misrepresentations of the other party." Bisp. Eq. § 188. Under the admitted facts of this case and the circumstances surrounding and leading up to the mistake relied on here, it is clearly brought within the text above quoted; and many other authorities to the same effect, including reported cases in many of the states of this Union, might be cited, if it were necessary.

We fully recognize the wisdom of that rule which always inclines the courts to uphold and enforce the validity of voluntary compromises and adjustments between parties of their legal differences, when fairly arrived at. Nor would any mere ignorance of or mistake in the law governing any doubtful and disputed legal proposition, on part of either of the parties to the compromise, in the absence of evidence tending to show that he has been overreached or unfairly dealt with or taken advantage of, and where supported by a good consideration, be sufficient, in our judgment, to justify the rescission of a compromise settlement deliberately made between parties, standing upon an equal footing, and with full knowledge of all the facts. If every mistake of law were sufficient to warrant the interference of the courts, then no compromise of a disputed legal proposition would be final, for in every such case one party or the other to the controversy is mistaken as to the law of the case. Upon the record before us, there may be some question as to how far there was a controversy between these parties over any doubtful legal question that might have been litigated in court, or exactly what was the nature and extent of the same. It is alleged in the petition that appellee claimed that all rights of appellant under his policy of insurance were forfeited by reason of the existence of an incumbrance upon a part of the insured property; but it is further alleged that appellee, at the time the contract of insurance was made, "had full knowledge of the same, and, having such knowledge, made the contract, and issued the policy aforesaid." This allegation is admitted to be true, and, in the absence of anything further in the pleading pertaining to this point, we are unable to see in this the basis of a doubtful disputed legal proposition which might have been litigated in the courts, or to know exactly what controversy was settled by the parties. But waiving the question as to the nature and extent of the controversy between appellant and appellee, and reverting to the character of the compromises which courts will uphold, we now quote from an other text writer, who uses this language, to wit: "Voluntary settlements are so favored that if a doubt or dispute exists between parties with respect to their rights, and all have the same knowledge or means of obtaining knowledge concerning the circumstances involving these rights, and there is no fraud, misrepresentation, concealment, or other misleading incident, a compromise into which they thus voluntarily enter must stand and be enforced, although the final issue may be different from that which was anticipated, and although the disposition made by the parties in their agreement may not be that which the court would have decreed had the controversy been brought before it for decision. Of course, there must not only be no misrepresentation, imposition, or concealment; there must also be a full disclosure of all material facts within the knowledge of the parties, whether demanded or not by the others." Pom. Eq. Jur. § 850. Under the authorities quoted, it is manifest that the compromise contract sought to be rescinded here is within the control of a court of equity, and may be set aside. And now, referring to the decisions of this court, and to the doctrine established in this state, it seems to us still clearer that the contract complained of, and which was made under the circumstances set forth in the petition and admitted by appellee, cannot be sustained. In an exhaustive opinion, in which the authorities were ably reviewed, by Judge Robertson, after referring to the difficulty of determining in every case when a contract was, in fact, made under a mistake of law, it is said: "When it can be made perfectly evident that the only consideration of a contract was a mistake as to the legal rights or obligations of the parties, and when there has been no fair compromise of bona fide and doubtful claims, we do not doubt that the agreement might be avoided on the ground of a clear mistake of law, and a total want, therefore, of consideration or mutuality." Underwood v. Brockman, 4 Dana, 309. In the case of Ray v. Bank, 3 B. Mon. 510, this court referred to and approved the above case, and said: "Upon the whole, we would remark that whenever, by a clear and palpable mistake of law or fact, essentially bearing upon and affecting the contract, money has been paid without cause or consideration, which in law, honor, or conscience was not due and payable, and which in honor or good conscience ought not to be retained, it was and ought to be recovered back." Both of these cases are cited with approval in the case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hopkins Co., 87 Ky. 613, 9 S. W. 497, and the doctrine laid down therein has not been departed from by this court. It will be seen that the question of fraud did not enter into the decision of either of those cases, but that they are almost entirely based upon the fact that there was no good consideration to uphold the contracts; that it was not a fair compromise of bona fide and doubtful claims; and that the money was not in law, honor, or conscience payable, and ought not in honor or good conscience to be retained. If, for these reasons, a contract made under a clear mistake of law may be set aside, then how much stronger reason is there for annulling the contract under consideration? Not only was this contract, according to this record, as it comes before us, wholly without consideration, and not only was the money surrendered by appellant on his claim not due in law, honor, or conscience, and surrendered only under a clear mistake of law, but it is further admitted by the demurrer that this contract was obtained, and that appellant was induced to surrender one-half of his claim, by the actual false and fraudulent misrepresentations of appellee, knowingly made for the purpose of deceiving and defrauding appellant. We are clearly of the opinion that the chancellor erred in sustaining the demurrer to the petition, and, for the reasons indicated, his judgment dismissing appellant's petition is reversed, and the action is remanded, with directions to set aside that order, and to overrule the demurrer, and give appellee leave to file an answer.

ERKENS v. NICOLIN.

(40 N. W. Rep. 567, 39 Minn. 461.)

Supreme Court of Minnesota. Nov. 28, 1888.

Appeal by defendant from an order of the district court for Scott county, Edson, J., presiding, refusing a new trial after a trial by the court.

Peck & Brown, for appellant. E. Southworth, for respondent.

MITCHELL, J. Action to recover back the money paid by plaintiff to defendant for a quitclaim deed of a piece of land in the village of Jordan. The facts, as disclosed by the evidence, are that defendant platted into lots a tract of land, of which he was the owner, lying between Water street and Sand creek. As shown upon the plat, the north and south lines of the lots extend from Water street to the creek. The distance marked on the plat gave the length of these lines as 80 feet, but the actual distance from Water street to the creek was 110 feet. One of these lots, and the adjoining 35 feet of another, had been conveyed by defendant, according to the plat, to plaintiff or plaintiff's grantor. Subsequently defendant claimed and stated to plaintiff, in substance, that the lots only extended back 80 feet, according to the distance indicated on the plat, and hence that he still owned the strip of 30 feet next to the creek. Plaintiff knew that defendant's claim was based wholly upon the theory that the distance given on the plat would control, and hence that his claim of title was in fact but expressions of opinion as to the legal effect and construction to be given to the plat. So far as the evidence shows, defendant made this claim in good faith, and honestly supposed that his deeds of the lots only conveyed 80 feet. Plaintiff took the matter under consideration for nearly a month, and went to the register's office and examined the plat for himself. He then obtained from defendant and wife a quitclaim deed of all the land down to the creek, and paid therefor the money which he now seeks to recover. When he paid the money he knew all the facts, and had the same means of knowledge of them which defendant had. The transaction was unaffected by any fraud, trust, confidence, or the like. The parties dealt with each other at arm's length. Plaintiff was not laboring under any mistake of facts. He took the deed and paid his money under a mistake of law as to his antecedent existing legal rights in the property, supposing that, according to the proper legal construction of the plat, the lots were only 80 feet deep. However, under the doctrine of Nicolin v. Schneiderhan, 37 Minn. 63, 33 N. W. Rep. 33, since decided by this court, it is now settled that a deed of lots according to this plat would cover all the land down to the creek, under the rule that distances must yield to natural boundaries called for in a deed. We are unable to see that this case differs in principle from Perkins v. Trinka, 30 Minn. 241, 15 N. W. Rep. 115, and Hall v. Wheeler, 37 Minn. 522, 35 N. W. Rep. 377.

It is unnecessary to enter into any discussion of the question (left in great confusion in the books) when, if ever, relief will be granted on the ground of mistake in law alone, or whether there is any difference between mistake of law and ignorance of law, or between ignorance or mistake as to a general rule of law and ignorance or mistake of law as to existing individual rights in the property which is the subject-matter of the contract. We hold that money paid under mistake of law cannot be recovered back where the transaction is unaffected by any fraud, trust, confidence, or the like, but both parties acted in good faith, knew all the facts, and had equal means of knowing them, especially where, as was evidently the fact in this case, the transaction was intended to remove or settle a question of doubt as to title. It would be impossible to foresee all the consequences which would result from allowing parties to avoid their contracts in such cases on the mere plea of ignorance or mistake of law affecting their rights. It would be difficult to tell what titles would stand, or what contracts would be binding, if grantors and grantees were at liberty to set up such a plea. This may seem to work inequitably in the present case, but more mischief will always result from attempting to mould the law to what seems natural justice in a particular case than from a steady adherence to general principles.

Order reversed.

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.—14

GRYMES v. SANDERS et al.

(93 U. S. 55.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Oct. Term, 1876.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Virginia.

Conway Robinson and Mr. Leigh Robinson, for appellant. Edwin L. Stanton and George M. Dallas, for appellees.

Mr. Justice SWAYNE. The appellant was the defendant in the court below. The record discloses no ground for any imputation against him. It was not claimed in the discussion at the bar, nor is it insisted in the printed arguments submitted by the counsel for the appellees, that there was on his part any misrepresentation, intentional or otherwise, or any indirection whatsoever. Nor has it been alleged that there was any intentional misrepresentation or purpose to deceive on the part of others.

The case rests entirely upon the ground of mistake. The question presented for our determination is whether that mistake was of such a character, and attended with such circumstances, as entitle the appellees to the relief sought by their bill and decreed to them by the court below.

Peyton Grymes, the appellant, owned two tracts of land in Orange county, Va., lying about twenty-five miles from Orange court-house. The larger tract was regarded as valuable, on account of the gold supposed to be upon it. The two tracts were separated by intervening gold-bearing lands, which the appellant had sold to others. Catlett applied to him for authority to sell the two tracts, which the appellant still owned. It was given by parol; and the appellant agreed to give, as Catlett's compensation, all he could get for the property above $20,000. Catlett offered to sell to Lanagan. Lanagan was unable to spare the time to visit the property, but proposed to send Howel Fisher to examine it. This was assented to; and Catlett thereupon wrote to Peyton Grymes, Jr., the son of the appellant, to have a conveyance ready for Fisher and himself at the court-house upon their arrival. The conveyance was provided accordingly, and Peyton Grymes, Jr., drove them to the lands. They arrived after dark, and stayed all night at a house on the gold-bearing tract. Fisher insisted that he must be back at the court-house in time to take a designated train east the ensuing day. This involved the necessity of an early start the next morning. It was arranged that Peyton Grymes, Jr., should have Peyton Hume, who lived near at hand, meet Fisher on the premises in the morning and show them to him, while Grymes got his team ready for their return to the court-house. Hume met Fisher accordingly, and showed him a place where there had been washing for surface-gold, and then took him to an abandoned shaft, which he supposed was on the premises. There Fisher examined the quartz and other debris lying about. But a very few minutes had elapsed when Grymes announced that his team was ready. The party immediately started back to the court-house. Arriving too late for the train, they drove to the house of the appellant; and Fisher remained there until one o'clock that night. While Fisher was there, considerable conversation occurred between him and the appellant in relation to the property; but it does not appear that any thing was said material to either party in this controversy. Fisher proceeded to Philadelphia, and reported favorably to Lanagan, and subsequently, at his request, to Repplier, who became a party to the negotiation. He represented to both of them that the abandoned shaft was upon the premises. Catlett went to Philadelphia, and there he sold the property to the appellees for $25,000. Fisher was sent to the court-house to investigate the title. He employed Mr. Williams, a legal gentleman living there, to assist him. A deed was prepared by Mr. Williams, and executed by the appellant on the 21st of March, 1866. On the 7th of April ensuing, the appellees paid over $12,500 of the purchase-money, and gave their bond to the appellant for the same amount, payable six months from date, with interest. The deed was placed in the hands of a depository, to be held as an escrow until the bond should be paid. Catlett, under a power of attorney, received the first installment, paid over to the appellant $10,000, and retained the residue on account of the compensation to which he was entitled under the contract between them. The vendees requested Hume to hold possession of the property for them until they should make some other arrangement. He occupied the premises until the following July, when, with their consent, he transferred the possession to Gordon. In that month, Lanagan and Repplier came to see the property. Hume was there washing for gold. He began to do so with the permission of the appellant before the sale, and had continued the work without intermission. The appellees desired to be shown the boundary-lines. Hume said he did not know where they were, and referred them to Johnson. Johnson came. The appellees desired to be taken to the shaft which had been shown to Fisher. Johnson said it was not on the premises. Hume thought it was. Johnson was positive; and he was right. The appellees seemed surprised, but said little on the subject. They proceeded to examine the premises within the lines, and, before taking their departure, employed Gordon to explore the property for gold. Subsequently this arrangement was abandoned, and they paid him for the time and money he had expended in getting ready for the work. In September, they sent Bowman as their agent to make the exploration. On his way, he stopped at the court-house, and told the appellant that the shaft shown to Fisher as on the land was not on it. The appellant replied instantly, "that there was no shaft on the land he had sold to Repplier and Lanagan, and that he had never represented to any one that there was a shaft on the land, and that he had never authorized any one to make such a representation, nor did he know or have reason to believe that any such representation had, in fact, been made by any one." It does not appear that his attention had before been called to the subject, or that he was before advised that any mistake as to the shaft had occurred. Bowman spent some days upon the land, and made a number of cuts, all of which were shallow. The deepest was only fifteen feet in depth. It was made under the direction of Embry and Johnson, two experienced miners living in the neighborhood. It reached a vein of quartz, but penetrated only a little way into it. They thought the prospect very encouraging, and urged that the cut should be made deeper.

Bowman declined to do anything more, and left the premises. No further exploration was ever made. Johnson says, "I know the land well, and know there has been gold found upon it, and a great deal of gold, too,—that is to say, surface-gold,—but it has never been worked for vein-gold. The gold that I refer to was found by the defendant, Grymes, and those that worked under him." He considered Bowman's examination "imperfect and insufficient." He had had "twenty-three years' experience in mining for gold."

Embry's testimony is to the same effect, both as to the surface-gold and the character of the examination made by Bowman. The premises lie between the Melville and the Greenwood Mines. Before the war, a bucket of ore, of from three to four gallons, taken from the latter mine, yielded $2,400 of gold. This, however, was exceptional. In the spring of 1869 a vein was struck, from forty to fifty feet below the surface, yielding $500 to the ton. Work was stopped by the influx of water. It was to be resumed as soon as an engine, which was ordered, should arrive. Ore at that depth, yielding from eight to ten dollars a ton, will pay a profit. Embry says he is well acquainted with the courses of the veins in the Melville and the Greenwood Mines, and that "the Greenwood veins do pass through the land in controversy, and some of the Melville veins do also." Speaking of Bowman and his last cut, he says:—

"At the place I showed him where to cut he struck a vein, but just cut into the top of it; he did not go down through it, or across it. From the appearance of the vein, I was very certain that he would find gold ore, if he would cut across it and go deep into it, and I told him so at the time; but he said that they had sent for him to return home, and he couldn't stay longer to make the examination, and went off, leaving the cut as it was; and the exploration to this day has never been renewed. I am still satisfied, that, whenever a proper examination is made, gold, and a great deal of it, will be found in that vein; for it is the same vein which passes through the Greenwood Mine, which was struck last spring, and yielded $500 to the ton. His examination in other respects, as well as this, was imperfect and insufficient. I don't think he did any thing like making a proper exploration for gold. I don't think he had more than three or four hands, and they were not engaged more than eight or ten days at the utmost."

In September, 1866, Repplier instructed Catlett to advise the appellant, that, by reason of the mistake as to the shaft, the appellees demanded the return of the purchase-money which had been paid. In the spring of 1867, Lanagan, upon the same ground, made the same demand in person. The appellant replied, that he had parted with the money. He promised to reflect on the subject, and address Lanagan by letter. He did write accordingly, but the appellees have not produced the letter. This bill was filed on the 21st of March, 1868.

A mistake as to a matter of fact, to warrant relief in equity, must be material, and the fact must be such that it animated and controlled the conduct of the party. It must go to the essence of the object in view, and not be merely incidental. The court must be satisfied, that but for the mistake the complainant would not have assumed the obligation from which he seeks to be relieved. Kerr on Mistake and Fraud, 408; Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529; Jennings v. Broughton, 17 Beav. 241; Thompson v. Jackson, 3 Rand. 507; Harrod's Heirs v. Cowan, Hardin, 553; Hill v. Bush, 19 Barb. (Ark.) 522; Juzan v. Toulmin, 9 Ala. 662.

Does the case in hand come within this category?

When Fisher made his examination at the shaft, it had been abandoned. This was prima facie proof that it was of no account. It does not appear that he thought of having an analysis made of any of the debris about it, nor that the debris indicated in any wise the presence of gold. He requested Hume to send him specimens from the shafts on the contiguous tracts, and it was done. No such request was made touching the shaft in question, and none were sent. It is neither alleged nor proved that there was a purpose at any time, on the part of the appellees, to work the shaft. The quartz found was certainly not more encouraging than that taken from the last cut made by Bowman under the advice of Embry and Johnson. This cut he refused to deepen, and abandoned. When Lanagan and Repplier were told by Johnson that the shaft was not on the premises, they said nothing about abandoning the contract, and nothing which manifested that they attached any particular consequence to the matter, and certainly nothing which indicated that they regarded the shaft as vital to the value of the property. They proceeded with their examination of the premises as if the discovery had not been made. On his way to Philadelphia, after this visit, Lanagan saw and talked several times with Williams, who had prepared the deed. Williams says, "I cannot recollect all that was said in those conversations, but I do know that nothing was said about the shaft, and that he said nothing to produce the impression that he was dissatisfied or disappointed in any respect with the property after the examination that he had made of it." Lanagan's conversation with Houseworth was to the same effect.

The subsequent conduct of the appellees shows that the mistake had no effect upon their minds for a considerable period after its discovery, and then it seems to have been rather a pretext than a cause.

Mistake, to be available in equity, must not have arisen from negligence, where the means of knowledge were easily accessible. The party complaining must have exercised at least the degree of diligence "which may be fairly expected from a reasonable person." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, 407.

Fisher, the agent of the appellees, who had the deed prepared, was within a few hours' travel of the land when the deed was executed. He knew the grantor had sold contiguous lands upon which veins of gold had been found, and that the course and direction of those veins were important to the premises in question. He could easily have taken measures to see and verify the boundary-lines on the ground. He did nothing of the kind. The appellees paid their money without even inquiring of any one professing to know where the lines were. The courses and distances specified in the deed show that a surveyor had been employed. Why was he not called upon? The appellants sat quietly in the dark, until the mistake was developed by the light of subsequent events. Full knowledge was within their reach all the time, from the beginning of the negotiation until the transaction was closed. It was their own fault that they did not avail themselves of it. In Shirley v. Davis, 6 Ves. 678, the complainant, being desirous to become a freeholder in Essex, bought a house which he supposed to be in that county. It proved to be in Kent. He was compelled in equity to complete the purchase. The mistake there, as here, was the result of the want of proper diligence. See also Seton v. Slade, 7 Ves. 269; 2 Kent's Com. 485; 1 Story's Eq., sects. 146, 147; Attwood v. Small, 6 Cl. & Fin. 338; Jennings v. Broughton, 17 Beav. 234; Campbell v. Ingilby, 1 De G. & J. 405; Garrett v. Burleson, 25 Tex. 44; Warner v. Daniels et al., 1 Woodb. & M. 91; Ferson v. Sanger, id. 139; Lamb v. Harris, 8 Ga. 546;

Trigg v. Read, 5 Humph. 529; Haywood v. Cope, 25 Beav. 143.

Where a party desires to rescind upon the ground of mistake or fraud, he must, upon the discovery of the facts, at once announce his purpose, and adhere to it. If he be silent, and continue to treat the property as his own, he will be held to have waived the objection, and will be conclusively bound by the contract, as if the mistake or fraud had not occurred. He is not permitted to play fast and loose. Delay and vacillation are fatal to the right which had before subsisted. These remarks are peculiarly applicable to speculative property like that here in question, which is liable to large and constant fluctuations in value. Thomas v. Bartow, 48 N. Y. 200; Flint v. Woodin, 9 Hare, 622; Jennings v. Broughton, 5 De G., M. & G. 139; Lloyd v. Brewster, 4 Paige, 537; Saratoga & S. R. R. Co. v. Row, 24 Wend. 74; Minturn v. Main, 3 Seld. 220; 7 Rob. Prac., c. 25, sect. 2, p. 432; Campbell v. Fleming, 1 Ad. & El. 41; Sugd. Vend. (14th ed.) 335; Diman v. Providence, W. & B. R. Co., 5 R. I. 130.

A court of equity is always reluctant to rescind, unless the parties can be put back in statu quo. If this cannot be done, it will give such relief only where the clearest and strongest equity imperatively demands it. Here the appellant received the money paid on the contract in entire good faith. He parted with it before he was aware of the claim of the appellees, and cannot conveniently restore it. The imperfect and abortive exploration made by Bowman has injured the credit of the property. Times have since changed. There is less demand for such property, and it has fallen largely in market value. Under the circumstances, the loss ought not to be borne by the appellant. Hunt v. Silk, 5 East, 452; Minturn v. Main, 3 Seld. 227; Okill v. Whittaker, 2 Phill. 340; Brisbane v. Dacres, 5 Taunt. 144; Andrew v. Hancock, 1 Brod. & B. 37; Skyring v. Greenwood, 4 Barn. & C. 289; Jennings v. Broughton, 5 De G., M. & G. 139.

The parties, in dealing with the property in question, stood upon a footing of equality. They judged and acted respectively for themselves. The contract was deliberately entered into on both sides. The appellant guaranteed the title, and nothing more. The appellees assumed the payment of the purchase-money. They assumed no other liability. There was neither obligation nor liability on either side, beyond what was expressly stipulated. If the property had proved unexpectedly to be of inestimable value, the appellant could have no further or other claim. If entirely worthless, the appellees assumed the risk, and must take the consequences. Segur v. Tingley, 11 Conn. 142; Haywood v. Cope, 25 Beav. 140; Jennings v. Broughton, 17 id. 234; Attwood v. Small, 6 Cl. & Fin. 497; Marvin v. Bennett, 8 Paige, 321; Thom- as v. Bartow, 48 N. Y. 198; Hunter v. Goudy, 1 Ham. 451; Hall v. Thompson, 1 Sm. & M. 481.

The bill, we have shown, cannot be maintained.

In our examination of the case, we have assumed that those who are alleged to have spoken to the agent of the appellees upon the subject of the shaft, before the sale, had the requisite authority from the appellant.

Considering this to be as claimed by the appellees, our views are as we have expressed them. We have not, therefore, found it necessary to consider the question of such authority; and hence have said nothing upon that subject, and nothing as to the aspect the case would present if that question were resolved in the negative.

Decree reversed, and case remanded with directions to dismiss the bill.

RIEGEL v. AMERICAN LIFE INS. CO.
(25 Atl. 1070, 153 Pa. St. 134.)

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Feb. 13, 1893.

Appeal from court of common pleas,
Philadelphia county; THAYER, Judge.

Bill by E. Theresa Riegel, administratrix of Jacob Riegel, deceased, against the American Life Insurance Company, asking the reinstatement of a surrendered policy.
Decree sustaining a demurrer to the bill, and dismissing it, from which plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

William W. Porter and Frederick J. Geiger, for appellant. H. Hazelhurst, for ap-pellee.

STERRETT, J. When this cause was here two years ago, on appeal from decree sustaining the general demurrer, and dismissing the bill, an amendment, for the purpose of clearly expressing what at most was only implied, was moved, and allowed at bar, by adding to the fifth paragraph of the bill these words: "Both of the parties acting in respect to the transaction on the basis that the said Leisenring was then alive." That defect in the bill, however, did not appear to be the ground on which the demurrer was sustained in the court below. The plaintiff's equity, grounded on averments of fact contained in the bill, and admitted by the pleading, was then fully considered, and emphatically sustained, in a clear and convincing opinion by our Brother WILLIAMS, reported in 140 Pa. St. 201, and 21 Atl. Rep.
392. The decree was accordingly reversed, and record remitted, with direction that the defendant plead or answer, etc. After full consideration of the facts and circumstances, the opinion referred to concluded thus: "Upon these facts, if the attention of the learned judge had not been diverted from them, we feel sure he would have reached the same conclusion that we have reached,—that it would be grossly inequitable to hold the plaintiff to a bargain made under the influence of a mistake of fact like that before us. This mistake the demurrer admits. If there had been any circumstance which the defendant could have set up to show that a correction of this mistake at this time would be inequitable, it should have been shown to the court by answer. If such circumstances do exist, they may yet be presented, as the case goes back to enable the defendant to take defense upon the merits." The defendant company, having been declared insolvent, was duly dissolved, on application of the attorney general, more than a year before the answer was filed by Mr.
Ritchie, the then president of the Real-Estate Title Insurance Company, which, in the interim, appears to have been appointed receiver of the defunct company. No plea or answer was ever filed by any officer of said company, nor by any one, on its behalf, who had any knowledge, otherwise than by information obtained from others, of the facts averred in the bill.
Mr. Ritchie and his company were entire strangers to the transaction, and neither of them appears to have had any knowledge of the facts upon which plaintiff's equity is grounded; and of course it was impossible for him, as president of the receiver company, to answer otherwise than upon information and belief. In the jurat to his answer he swears the allegations thereof are true "so far as they are therein stated as of his own knowledge," etc.; but the answer contains not a single allegation that purports to be "as of his own knowledge."

The special evidential efficacy of a responsive answer in equity is due to the fact that the plaintiff, by calling on the defendant to answer the allegations of the bill, appeals to his conscience, accredits him, and pro hac makes him his own witness. The plaintiff in this case never called upon Mr. Ritchie, or any other stranger to the transactions alleged in the bill, to make answer thereto. The officers of the insurance company, who were cognizant of those transactions, were the proper persons to deny, if they could of their own knowledge, the averments of the bill, and thus make the answer responsive. The answer of Mr. Ritchie in this case is in no sense a responsive answer.
It is merely pleading; and, as such, put in issue the facts in dispute, without more.
Eaton's Appeal, 66 Pa. St. 490; Burke's Appeal, 99 Pa. St. 361; Socher's Appeal, 104
Pa. St. 609; Coleman v. Ross, 46 Pa. St.
185; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1528, 1529; 3 Greenl.
Ev. §§ 287-289; Daniell, Ch. Pr. 846. In note to the latter it is said that an answer which alleges as facts what the defendant could not personally know, though responsive to the bill, simply puts plaintiff upon proof of his own allegations. So, too, in 3 Greenl. Ev. § 287, it is said that, if the fact asserted by the defendant is such that it is not and cannot be within his own knowledge, but is in truth only an expression of his strong conviction of its existence, or is what he deems an infallible deduction from facts which were known to him, his answer is not responsive, in the sense of being evidence in his own favor.
The nature of his testimony cannot be changed by the positiveness of his assertion. The answer of an infant by his guardian ad litem, though it be responsive to the bill, and sworn to by the guardian, is not evidence in his favor.

But whether the answer be regarded as responsive or not, the proofs were quite sufficient to warrant the learned master in finding, as he did, the truth of every material averment in the bill. His findings of fact are in strict accord with the uncontradicted testimony, and his conclusions of law are so manifestly correct that his report should have been unhesitatingly approved, and decree made in accordance therewith. No testimony, either written or oral, was introduced by or on behalf of the defendant. All the material facts on which plaintiff's equity is grounded were as clearly and conclusively established as if they had been admitted by answer, or by demurrer to the bill; so that practically we have now before us substantially the same questions that were fully considered and determined when the case was here before. In that appeal the fourth and fifth specifications of errors are quotations from the opinion of the learned president of the court below dismissing the bill, wherein, speaking of the new contract, he says: "(4) It was not a contract induced by a mistake about facts, but a contract made in view of doubtful facts, and because of the doubtful facts. (5) It was in the nature of a compromise, founded upon the doubts which existed, not upon any mistake of the facts." In this appeal the third specification, quoted from the opinion of same learned judge, again dismissing the bill, is that "the new contract was not a contract induced by mutual mistake about the facts, but a contract made in view of doubtful facts, and because of the doubtful facts." The second specification in this is in effect the same as the fifth in the former appeal. These propositions go to the very heart of the plaintiff's case. They substantially involve the only cardinal questions that are or ever have been in it, and about which there is the slightest room for doubt. They are the very questions that were considered and decided by this court when the case was here before. That clearly appears in the opinion, wherein, after reciting the facts averred in the bill, it is said: "The case presented on these facts was that of a contract entered into under the influence of a mutual mistake, and a claim for relief from such contract. The mistake was in relation to the fact of Leisenring's death. Both parties evidently supposed and acted on the supposition that he was alive, and that the annual premiums upon his life, which had become burdensome to Mrs. Riegel, must be continued indefinitely until his death should take place. As it had become difficult for her to pay these premiums, the only way in which she could be relieved from them was to surrender her policy, and accept a paid-up policy for such smaller sum as the premiums already paid would purchase. Rather than take the risk of losing the entire amount of the policy, by her inability to keep up the annual payments, she surrendered her policy for $6,000, and accepted in lieu of it a paid-up policy for $2,500. This was the contract she made while in ignorance of Leisenring's death. At the time she made it she was already relieved from the burdensome premiums, and the entire amount of the policy was honestly due her from the company. What was the effect of the mistake upon her? Simply to take from her the difference between the two policies, and give her absolutely nothing for it. She surrendered a policy for $6,000, on which the liability of the company was already fixed, and received one for $2,500, to secure relief from a burden already removed. The company parted with nothing. She secured nothing. The whole transaction was a mistake, and, if the decree of the court stands, the result will be to take $3,500 from Mrs. Riegel and give it to the insurance company. These facts seem to us to present a clear and a strong case for equitable relief, so strong, indeed, that a mere statement of them is the only argument necessary for its support. The duty of a chancellor to relieve in cases of mutual mistake is so well settled that no citation of authorities can be needed.

* * * The learned judge who heard this case in the court below, and who is thoroughly familiar with the principle to which we have referred, seems to have been misled in regard to the facts set up in the bill. He treats the arrangement made between Mrs. Riegel and the company on the 20th of March as a compromise of a claim against the company for the alleged death of Leisenring, which Mrs. Riegel was unable to establish, because unable to show the death. As the fact of the death, and the consequent liability of the company on the policy, were uncertain, it was a case for the application of the doctrine that the adjustment of a doubtful claim constituted a valid consideration for the surrender of the policy and the acceptance of the new one, and upon this theory the decree was entered. But it nowhere appears that Mrs. Riegel made any claim on the company, or supposed that she had any. She was asking relief from future payments of premiums on a policy on which she supposed future payments would have to be made, and, to get this relief, she was willing to sacrifice more than one half of the sum insured. The company was willing, in consideration of the large reduction of its liability, to give her a policy for what her payments would purchase, and relieve her in future. This is an exchange often made, and adjusted by well-settled rules. It was a compromise of nothing. We do not doubt the correctness of the rule applied by the learned judge in cases to which it is fairly applicable, but this is not one of them. The plaintiff distinctly avers that she did not know of the death of Leisenring until some 10 days after the exchange of policies was effected, and that 'both parties to the transaction were acting, in respect thereto, on the basis that Leisenring was alive.' She distinctly avers that the object of the arrangement was to secure relief for herself from the indefinite payment of premiums that had become burdensome to her; that the new policy was accepted for that reason, and the old one surrendered, at a time when, had she known the fact, she was entitled to demand the entire sum upon which she had so long and so steadily paid the burdensome premiums."

Little, if anything, can be profitably added to what is so clearly and forcibly said in the foregoing quotations in support of our former decree. The error into which the learned judge of the common pleas appears to have unintentionally fallen in the outset, and to which he seems to cling so pertinaciously, is not so much in regard to the well-settled principles of equity, upon which relief is granted in cases of mutual ignorance or mistake of material facts, as in the construction which he put upon the undisputed acts and declarations of the parties to this contention, and the circumstances connected therewith. Sufficient reference to those principles is made in our former opinion, but it may not be amiss to revert to some of them. The general rule is that an act done or a contract made under a mistake of a material fact is voidable and relievable in equity. The fact must of course be material to the act or contract; for, though there may be an accidental mistake or ignorance of the fact, yet, if the act or contract is not materially affected by it, relief will not be granted. Thus, A. buys from B. an estate to which the latter is supposed to have an unquestionable title. It turns out, upon due investigation of the facts unknown at the time to both parties, that B. has no title; as, if there be a nearer heir than B., who was supposed to be dead, but is in fact living. In such a case equity would relieve the purchaser and rescind the contract. But suppose A. buys from B. an estate the location of which was well known to each of them, and they mutually believed it contained 20 acres, when in fact it contained only 19 $\frac{1}{4}$ acres, and the difference would not have varied the purchase in the view of either party; in such a case the mistake would not be ground for rescission of the contract. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 140, 141. It makes no difference in application of the principle that the subject-matter of the contract be known to both parties to be liable to a contingency which may destroy it immediately; for, if the contingency has, unknown to the parties, already happened, the contract will be avoided, as founded on a mutual mistake of a matter constituting the basis of the contract. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 143a, 143b. The principle is illustrated by familiar examples, employed by text writers, thus: A. agrees to buy a certain horse from B. It turns out that the horse is dead at the time of the bargain, though neither party was then aware of the fact. The agreement is void. A. agrees to buy a house belonging to B. The house was previously destroyed by fire, but the parties dealt in ignorance of that fact. The contract, not being for sale of the land on which the house stood, was not enforceable. So, too, A., being entitled to an estate for the life of B., agreed to sell it to C. B. was dead, but both parties were ignorant of the fact. The agreement was avoided. For similar reasons, a life insurance cannot be revived by payment of a premium within the time allowed for that purpose by the original contract, but after the life had dropped, unknown to both insurer and assured, although it was in existence when the premium became due, and although the insurer has waived proof of the party's health, which, by the terms of the renewal, it might have required. The waiver applies to the proof of health, not to the fact of his being alive. Pritchard v. Society, 3 C. B. (N. S.) 622. Mr. Pollock, in his excellent treatise on the Principles of Contract, (page *441,) states the general principle thus: "An agreement is void if it relates to a subject-matter (whether a material subject of ownership, or a particular title or right) contemplated by the parties as existing, but which in fact did not exist." This is followed by an interesting discussion of the subject, with numerous illustrations of the principles involved. See Cochrane v. Willis, 1 Ch. App. 58; Allen v. Hammond, 11 Pet. 71; Hitchcock v. Giddings, 4 Price, 135; Hore v. Becher, 12 Sim. 465; Couturier v. Hastie, 5 H. L. Cas. 673. In many of the cases prominence is given to failure of consideration, resulting from mutual mistake or ignorance of material facts, but entire failure of consideration is not an essential ingredient in any case.

It cannot be doubted that in exchanging the old for the new policy both parties acted on the basis that Leisenring was then alive. Their every act in the transaction was predicated of that as an assumed fact. The new policy, like the old one, was a risk on a life assumed to be then in being. The difference between them was that the one carried with it an obligation on the part of the holder to pay annual premiums during the life of Leisenring; the other exempted her from that obligation. She purchased that exemption by surrendering seven twelfths of the original insurance, or $3,500. If the exchange was not made on the assumption by both parties that Leisenring was then alive, the company stultified itself by issuing a paid-up policy on the life of one who was then in his grave; and the plaintiff was guilty of the supreme folly of paying $3,500 for exemption from a liability which, by the previous death of Leisenring, had ipso facto ceased. In other words, at the time the exchange of policies was made, the plaintiff had a perfectly valid claim upon the defendant for the full amount of the insurance, $6,000, and surrendered $3,500 of that to secure exemption from a liability that had ceased to exist; but she and the company were both at that time ignorant of the fact that the life on which the original risk was taken had previously dropped. The supposed element of doubt as to whether Leisenring was then dead or not never entered into the contemplation of either party; nor did it form any part of the consideration for exchange of policies. The positive and uncontradicted proof by the actuary of the company was that the amount of the paid-up policy was ascertained and fixed, according to the established rules of the company, at the very sum that would have been required if Leisenring had been personally present in the office when the terms of exchange were settled. The central fact underlying the transaction, and to which every circumstance connected therewith clearly points, was the assumption by both parties that Leisenring was then in full life. When last theretofore heard from he was alive, and the presumption was that he continued to live. In the absence of any knowledge to the contrary, it was quite natural and reasonable that the parties, in making the exchange, should act upon that presumption, and assume, as they evidently did, that he was still alive. Of course they could not know positively that he was then alive, any more than any one can certainly know that a friend from whom he is far separated by distance is now living. In view of the undisputed facts as to the acts of both parties, and everything connected with the transaction, it would be wholly unreasonable and unwarranted to hold that the parties treated upon the basis that the fact which was the subject of their agreement was doubtful, or that the contract was made "in view of doubtful facts, and because of the doubtful facts." In the light of the proofs upon which the findings of the master are based, and of all the circumstances, the acts of the parties are not susceptible of any such construction as has been put upon them by the learned judge of the common pleas. In short, the facts established by the uncontradicted proofs, and found by the master, are essentially the same as those admitted by the demurrer, and upon which our former decree was based. Certainly they are not less favorable to the plaintiff now than then. It therefore appears to us that a proper consideration of the orderly administration of justice should have resulted in a decree in accordance with the views expressed in our former opinion.

This proceeding is not grounded upon a previous rescission of the agreement under which the exchange of policies was made, but is for the purpose of enforcing a rescission by decree of this court, etc.

It is therefore adjudged that the decree of the court of common pleas be reversed and set aside, and exceptions to master's report dismissed; and it is now adjudged and decreed that the contract under which said exchange of insurance policies was made be rescinded; that the paid-up policy for $2,500 be surrendered and canceled; and that the original policy of insurance be reinstated, as of date of its surrender; and it is further adjudged and decreed that the defendant company pay to the plaintiff the sum of $6,000, with interest from October 4, 1889, and also all the costs of this proceeding.

PAXSON, C. J. I dissent, and would affirm the decree, upon the clear and able opinion of the learned judge below.

MITCHELL, J. I concur with the chief justice in his dissent.

NEWTON v. TOLLES.

TOLLES v. NEWTON.

(19 Atl. 1092, 66 N. H. 136.)

Supreme Court of New Hampshire. Hillsborough. March 14, 1890.

Bill in equity for the rescission of a contract for the purchase of a farm and other property, and for the return of money paid as a part of the purchase money. Facts found by the court: The defendant, Sophia A. Tolles, employed R., a real-estate agent in Nashua, to sell her farm. In May, 1886, Newton, seeking to buy a farm, applied to R., who informed him of the Tolles farm, told him it contained 200 acres, took him to see it, and there pointed out to him such of the courses and boundaries as he knew; but he did not know, or undertake to point out, all of them. Afterwards, R., as agent of Tolles, and Newton executed an agreement by which Tolles agreed to sell, and Newton to buy, the Tolles farm for $5,400, to be paid $200 on the execution of the agreement, $1,000 on the delivery, on or before June 1, 1886, of a bond for a deed, $1,000 on or before July 10, 1886, and $3,200 on the delivery, on or before October 20, 1886, of a good and sufficient deed, "said Newton to have all the stock, tools, hay, grain," etc. On the margin of the agreement, "farm contains about 200 acres" was written. Newton paid $200 May 15, Tolles executed and delivered to Newton a bond conditioned to convey to him "a certain lot or parcel of land situated in Nashua," and particularly described by metes and bounds, "meaning and intending to convey all the homestead farm, containing about two hundred acres, as by deed of heirs of Horace C. Tolles, to me, and all other land and right in said homestead farm," upon Newton's payment of $1,000 on the delivery of the bond, $1,000 on or before July 10, 1886, and $3,200 on the delivery, on or before October 20, 1886, of a good and sufficient deed. On the margin of the deed was written: "It is agreed, for the above consideration, that said Newton is to have all the stock, tools, hay, grain, &c., and that said Tolles is to remove only household furniture and family stores from said premises." Prior to 1879 the Tolles farm comprised about 203 acres, of which the defendant and her husband owned a part in common, and each a part in severalty. In that year the heirs of Horace C., then deceased, conveyed a parcel of about 25 acres to Xenophon Tolles, and all their interest in the rest of the farm to the defendant. In January, 1886, the defendant sold about 18 acres to C., who sold to Roby. A parcel of about 25 acres, called the "Salmon Brook Meadow," was half a mile distant from, and had no connection with, the rest of the farm, except in its use as a part of it. These parcels were not shown to Newton by R., and are not covered by the particular description given in the bond. Newton at the time of the bargain did not understand that they were included in his purchase, but he understood that he was buying the Tolles farm, and that it contained 200 acres. The defendant did not intend to convey, nor understand that she agreed to convey, the three parcels, or any of them; but she understood and believed that the farm, as described in the bond, contained about 200 acres. It in fact contains about 135 acres. In June, 1886, Newton discovered that Tolles owned the Salmon Brook meadow, and learned of its connection with the farm. He thereupon claimed possession of it, and that it was included in the bargain, but his claim was denied. He refused to pay the installment due July 10th and August 21st. Tolles brought a suit at law to recover it, which is the record of the above-named actions. About the 1st of August, Newton found by a survey that the farm as described in the bond contains only 135 acres. October 20, 1886, Tolles tendered to Newton a warranty deed of the premises of which he is in possession, and demanded payment of the balance of the purchase money. Newton refused to accept the deed, and on the same day filed his bill, in which he offers to restore the real and personal property to the defendant, and give up and cancel the bond, and to account for the rents and profits while he has been in possession. He has consumed the hay and grain, but has other hay and grain out of which he can return an equivalent. He sold four cows in August, but replaced them with four others of greater value. The farm has not deteriorated in value. Evidence to show that the property which Tolles by her bond was obliged to convey was of the value of $5,400 or more was excluded, subject to the defendant's exception.

G. B. S. French and H. B. Cutter, for Newton. C. W. Hiott and E. S. Cutter, for Tolles.

CARPENTER, J. There was a mutual mistake in the quantity of land. The defendant understood she was selling, and the plaintiff that he was buying, a farm of 200 acres. It in fact contains only 135 acres. The defendant, believing that the farm contained 200 acres, informed the plaintiff that it did contain that number. The plaintiff relied on her statement. Under the influence of the error common to both parties, the transaction was consummated. The mistake was one of fact in a material point affecting the value of the property. Boynton v. Hazelboom, 14 Allen, 107, 108. Its prejudicial consequences to the plaintiff are the same as if the defendant's statement had been designedly fraudulent. Spurr v. Benedict, 99 Mass. 463, 467. The deficiency is so great that it would "naturally raise the presumption of fraud, imposition, or mistake in the very essence of the contract," if the mistake were not affirmatively found. Stebbins v. Eddy, 4 Mason, 414, 420. A material mistake in the quantity does not, in its effect upon the equitable rights of the parties, differ from a like mistake in the character, situation, or title of the bargained property. It is equivalent to a mistake in the existence of a material part of the subject of the contract. The case is as if before the contract was executed, and without the knowledge of either party, a parcel containing 65 acres of the 200 contracted for had sunk in the sea. Allen v. Hammond, 11 Pet. 63, 71, 72; Hitchcock v. Giddings, 4 Price, 135; Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 141, 142. The error is as injurious to the plaintiff as if 200 acres were comprised in the state boundaries, and the defendant had no title to a parcel of 65 acres, or as if she had title to only 135-200 of the whole in common with a stranger. Hooper v. Smart, L. R. 18 Eq. 683. The defendant could not sustain a bill to compel a specific performance of the contract by the plaintiff, because it would be inequitable. Pickering v. Pickering, 38 N. H. 400, 407, 408; Eastman v. Plumer, 46 N. H. 464, 479. The party against whom a contract, made under a mutual mistake of material facts, will not be specifically enforced, is in general entitled to rescind. Pom. Spec. Perf. § 250. If there are exceptions to the rule, this case does not fall within them. It is inequitable, in the highest degree, that the defendant, by reason of her negligent and erroneous, though not fraudulent, representation, should make a profit of the sum at which the parties valued 65 acres of land, and that the plaintiff, without fault on his part, should lose that sum. Equity will prevent such a result by rescinding the contract, or decreeing a specific performance with compensation in behalf of the injured party, at his election, or by refusing specific performance on the application of the other party. Hill v. Buckley, 17 Ves. 395; Price v. North, 2 Younge & C. 620; Dalby v. Pullen, 3 Sim. 29; Leslie v. Thompson, 9 Hare, 268; Barnes v. Wood, L. R. 8 Eq. 424; Whittemore v. Whittemore, Id. 603; Iron-Works v. Wickens, L. R. 4 Ch. 101; Denny v. Hancock, L. R. 6 Ch. 1; Torrance v. Bolton, L. R. 8 Ch. 118; In re Turner, 13 Ch. Div. 130; Belknap v. Sealey, 14 N. Y. 144; Paine v. Upton, 87 N. Y. 327; Couse v. Boyles, 4 N. J. Eq. 212; Thomas v. Perry, 1 Pet. C. C. 49; Daniel v. Mitchell, 1 Story, 172; Doggett v. Emerson, 3 Story, 700; Smith v. Babcock, 2 Woodb. & M. 246; Quesnel v. Woodlief, 2 Hen. & M. 173; Lawrence v. Staigg, 8 R. I. 256; Noble v. Googins, 99 Mass. 231. Neither of the parties understood that the contract to convey "about" 200 acres was performed by conveying 135 acres. Wilson v. Randall, 67 N. Y. 338, 341, 342, and cases above cited.

No laches can be imputed to the plaintiff. He had a right to rely on the defendant's statement of the quantity. He could not discover the mistake by examining the external boundaries. Paine v. Upton, 87 N. Y. 327, 337. When, by the defendant's tender of a deed and demand of payment, he ascertained that she would not voluntarily correct the mistake, he immediately filed his bill.

The personal property formed no substantial part of the consideration. It is not named in the body of the bond, but is mentioned, apparently as an afterthought, on the margin. Upon the rescission, for any cause, by a vendee in possession of a sale of farm lands, there must in most cases, necessarily, be an accounting, in order to restore the parties to the situation they occupied prior to the contract. Upon such an accounting, all the property, the possession of which passed from the defendant to the plaintiff, or its full equivalent, together with the income derived from it, may be fully restored to her. It is no objection to a rescission, in a case of this character, that such articles as are necessarily consumed in the proper and ordinary management of a farm cannot be restored in specie. It does not appear that the plaintiff, after his discovery of the mistake, took any action by which he intended to affirm the contract, (Montgomery v. Pickering, 116 Mass. 227,) or that he did anything with the property not reasonably necessary for its preservation, or which equity would not require to be done. The plaintiff is to be relieved upon such terms as justice to both parties requires. Wiswall v. Harriman, 62 N. H. 671, 672; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 707. The offered evidence of value was immaterial, and was properly excluded. In the suit at law, there must be judgment for the defendant. The details of the decree will be settled at the trial term. Decree for the plaintiff.

ALLEN, J., did not sit. The others concurred.

DAMBMANN v. SCHULTING.

(75 N. Y. 55.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1878.

Action to set aside a release under seal, and to recover a balance for money lent defendant by the firm of C. F. Dambmann & Co., of which firm plaintiff was a partner, and to whose rights he succeeded. The facts are set forth in the opinion. Judgment for plaintiff.

C. Bainbridge Smith, for appellant. William Watson, for respondent.

EARL, J. Prior to 1866, the defendant had for many years been a merchant extensively engaged in business in the city of New York. In February of that year he had become financially embarrassed, and contemplated an assignment for the benefit of his creditors. He was finally dissuaded from making an assignment by the promise of his creditors to loan him the sum of $100,000 to aid him in meeting his obligations. There was evidence tending to show that the sums thus to be loaned were to be repaid when he became able; but he testified that it was to be optional for him to repay them, in case he paid the debts, which he then owed, in full. The court at special term found that the arrangement was that he was to repay these sums when he became able. In pursuance of this arrangement, the firm to which plaintiff belonged, and to whose rights he had succeeded, loaned defendant $10,000. On the 7th day of March, 1867, defendant had paid in full all the debts he owed when the money was loaned to him, and then, at his request, all the creditors who made the loans executed and delivered to him an instrument, of which the following is a copy, to-wit: "We the undersigned agree, in consideration of one dollar paid to us, to discharge H. Schulting from the legal payment of the money loaned to him February 1, 1866, said Schulting giving his moral obligations to refund the said money, in part or whole, as his means will allow in future." This was not a sealed instrument, and was executed upon the request of the defendant, upon the claim by him that he had done as he had agreed when the money was advanced to him. It was the clear intention of the parties, by this instrument to discharge the defendant from all legal obligation to pay the money advanced, leaving an obligation simply binding upon his conscience, but not enforceable at law, to pay when he became able, in whole or in part. If this instrument had been under seal or based upon a sufficient consideration, no proceedings in law or equity could have been thereafter taken to enforce payment against the defendant.

But according to the finding of the special term, before the execution of this instrument, the defendant was legally liable to pay when he became able, and this liability was not discharged by this instrument, for the simple reason that it was not based upon any consideration. It was not in the nature of a composition of a debtor with his creditors, and cannot be sustained upon the principles applicable to composition agreements. It does not even appear that each creditor signed it upon the consideration that other creditors would also sign it. It was a mere agreement to discharge debts without payment, and such an agreement cannot be upheld.

Down to this period of time there is no claim that there was any fraud or mistake which influenced the conduct of the plaintiff and the other creditors, and the position of the plaintiff and the defendant was as follows: While the plaintiff could legally enforce the payment of the $10,000 (the defendant being able to pay), he was under a moral obligation not to do so; and the defendant intending not to be legally bound to pay, was yet under both a legal and moral obligation to pay.

The defendant continued in business until August, 1868, when on account of failing health and despondency, he sold out his whole stock of goods to the firm of H. & A. Strousburgh & Co. for the sum of $225,000, they agreeing to pay the most of that sum upon certain of his debts, and also to pay him one-third of what the goods should sell for above the sum of $275,000. The value of the goods was not known to the defendant or his vendees, and there is no claim that this sale was not made in good faith. Soon after this sale the plaintiff, having heard thereof, called upon the defendant, and was duly informed of the sale and the terms thereof, and of the amount of his property at that time aside from his interest in the one-third of the surplus. As to that one-third, the defendant informed him that that was not worth much, and that he had offered to sell it for $18,000 or $20,000. There is no evidence or claim that in this conversation the defendant made any intentional misstatement. He had offered to several parties to sell his one-third interest for the sum named, and there is no evidence that he then believed it to be worth more. He actually made an arrangement to sell it for $20,000 to one Von Keller. A few days after however he repudiated this arrangement, but Von Keller claimed it was valid.

Defendant's vendees went on and sold the goods, and they brought $576,981; and his one-third interest amounted to about $100,000. The defendant knew as early as the 8th day of October, 1868, that goods to the amount of $400,000 had been sold, and that some yet remained to be sold. On the last-named day he went to the plaintiff and said to him that he understood that the previous paper signed by him—the discharge above set out—was not a legal release, because he had not paid any thing on account of the $10,000, and he wanted to know if the plaintiff would sign a legal release upon payment of $5,000.

The plaintiff said he would. Nothing more was said, and defendant paid him $5,000; and then the plaintiff executed to him, under seal, a full and absolute discharge from all liability. This action was brought to set aside this release, and to recover the balance of the $10,000.

The plaintiff seeks to impeach this release on account of fraud, and the court at special term decided in plaintiff's favor that the release was inoperative, as obtained by misrepresentation and concealment of material facts. The court did not find that there was any fraudulent misrepresentation, and there was none in fact. So far as I can discover, there was no misrepresentation of any kind. Neither did the court find that there was any fraudulent concealment of any facts; and there was no evidence to justify such a finding. The plaintiff had executed a discharge of his claim, which was illegal, and the defendant went to him and informed him of this fact, and stated that he wanted a legal release, and that he would pay him $5,000 if he would give it; and he gave it. He stated to the plaintiff that he was not discharged, that he wanted to be, and the plaintiff discharged him. He made no statement and used no artifice to throw him off from his guard or to entrap or mislead him. There was no reluctance on the part of the plaintiff, and the defendant had no reason to suppose there would be, as the plaintiff had already agreed in writing to discharge him. The prior instrument shows that it was the understanding of the parties that the defendant should, so far as concerned any legal liability, have just such a discharge.

The claim, under these circumstances, is that the defendant was bound to disclose to the plaintiff the change in his pecuniary circumstances since the prior conversation in August, above alluded to, and that he had no right to leave him under the erroneous impression occasioned by that conversation. It must be borne in mind that the declarations made by the defendant in that conversation were made in entire good faith, and that they were not made in any business transaction with the plaintiff, and that they had no reference to or connection with the release. The plaintiff, in executing the release, had no right to rely upon them.

The general rule is, that a party engaged in a business transaction with another can commit a legal fraud only by fraudulent misrepresentations of facts, or by such conduct or such artifice for a fraudulent purpose as will mislead the other party or throw him off from his guard, and thus cause him to omit inquiry or examination which he would otherwise make. A party buying or selling property, or executing instruments, must by inquiry or examination gain all the knowledge he desires. He cannot proceed blindly, omitting all inquiry and examination, and then complain that the other party did not volunteer all the information he had. Such is the general rule. But there are exceptions to this rule. Where there is such a relation of trust and confidence between the parties that the one is under some legal or equitable obligation to give full information to the other party—information which the other party has a right, not merely in foro conscientiae, but juris et de jure, to have, then the withholding of such information purposely may be a fraud. Story, Eq. Jur. § 207 et seq.; Hadley v. Importing Co., 13 Ohio St. 502, 82 Am. Dec. 454; Bench v. Sheldon, 14 Barb. 66; Paul v. Hadley, 23 Barb. 521.

It is not always easy to define when this relation of trust and confidence exists; and no general rule can be formulated by which its existence can be known. It is sufficient for this case to say that it did not exist here. The defendant had no reason to make the disclosure which it is claimed he should have made, and the plaintiff had no right to expect it. The defendant had no reason to suppose that the plaintiff would be under the influence of the casual conversation which was had some two months before. And further, if the defendant thought upon the subject, he had no reason to suppose that if he stated all the facts within his knowledge, it would prevent the plaintiff from giving a discharge which he had agreed to give. While he would have stated that unexpectedly his share in the proceeds of the goods was much larger than $20,000, yet he would also have stated that he had contracted to sell the share for $20,000, and that the vendee claimed to hold him to the contract. That the claim was a serious one is shown by the fact that in January, 1869, Von Keller sued him, and in April, 1870, after a trial before a referee, sustained the contract and recovered a judgment for upward of $100,000, which defendant was able to defeat finally only after a litigation of several years and a decision by this court. Von Keller v. Schulting, 50 N. Y. 108. In October, 1868, the defendant could have informed the plaintiff what his interest in the proceeds of the goods was, subject to the chances of a litigation, but what it was actually worth no one could then have told.

Without therefore questioning the facts found by the court at special term, we are of opinion that there was error in the legal conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to any relief on account of fraud.

It is further claimed that the plaintiff ought to be entitled to relief on account of mistake. He testified that he would not have executed the release if he had known the defendant's financial condition. But as already shown, the defendant was in no way responsible for his ignorance, and was under no legal or equitable obligation to disclose the facts as to his pecuniary circumstances. The plaintiff could have learned the facts by inquiry of the defendant or his vendees. There was no mistake as to any fact intrinsic to the release. Plaintiff knew that the defendant had not been legally discharged from his liability, and that for the $5,000 he was to give him an absolute release; and he gave him just such a release as he intended to. There was no mistake of any intrinsic fact essential to the contract or involved therein. The defendant's financial condition was an extrinsic fact, which might have influenced the plaintiff's action if he had known it. But ignorance of or mistake as to such a fact is not ground for affirmative equitable relief. The following illustrations of mistakes as to intrinsic facts essential to contracts, against which courts of equity will relieve, are found in the books. A. buys an estate of B. to which the latter is supposed to have an unquestionable title. It turns out, upon due investigation of the facts, that B. has no title; in such a case equity will relieve the purchaser and rescind the contract. Bingham v. Bingham, 1 Ves. Sr. 126. If a horse should be purchased, which is by both parties believed to be alive, but is, at the time, in fact dead, the purchaser would, upon the same ground, be released by rescinding the contract. Allen v. Hammond, 11 Pet. 71. If a person should execute a release to another party upon the supposition, founded on a mistake, that a certain debt or annuity had been discharged, although both parties were innocent, the release would be set aside. Hore v. Becher, 12 Sim. 465. If one should execute a release so broad in its terms as to release his rights in property, of which he was wholly ignorant, and which was not in contemplation of the parties at the time the bargain for the release was made, a court of equity might either cancel the release or restrain its application as intended. Cholmondeley v. Clinton, 2 Mer. 352; Dungers v. Angove, 2 Ves. Jr. 304. On the other hand, if the vendee is in possession of facts which will materially enhance the price of the commodity and of which he knows the vendor to be ignorant, he is not bound to communicate those facts to the vendor, and the contract will be held valid. Laidlaw v. Organ, 2 Wheat. 178. In such a case the facts unknown to the vendor are extrinsic to the contract and are not of its substance; and hence there is no ground for the interference of a court of equity.

It is clear from these and other illustrations which might be given, that a court of equity will not give relief in all cases of mistake. There are many extrinsic facts surrounding every business transaction which have an important bearing and influence upon its results. Some of them are generally unknown to one or both of the parties, and if known, might have prevented the transaction. In such cases, if a court of equity could intervene and grant relief, because a party was mistaken as to such a fact which would have prevented him from entering into the transaction if he had known the truth, there would be such uncertainty and instability in contracts as to lead to much embarrassment. As to all such facts, a party must rely upon his own circumspection, examination and inquiry; and if not imposed upon or defrauded, he must be held to his contracts. In such cases, equity will not stretch out its arm to protect those who suffer for the want of vigilance.

Judge Story lays it down as a general rule "that mistake or ignorance of facts in parties is a proper subject of relief only when it constitutes a material ingredient in the contract of the parties, and disappoints their intention by a mutual error; or where it is inconsistent with good faith, and proceeds from a violation of the obligations which are imposed by law upon the conscience of either party. But where each party is equally innocent, and there is no concealment of facts which the other party has a right to know, and no surprise or imposition exists, the mistake or ignorance, whether mutual or unilateral, is treated as laying no foundation for equitable interference." Story, Eq. Jur. § 151.

We are therefore of opinion that upon the facts disclosed in the record before us, the plaintiff was not entitled to any relief, and the judgment must be reversed and a new trial granted, costs to abide event. All concur except MILLER, J., not voting.

Judgment reversed.

CONNER v. WELCH et al.

(8 N. W. 260, 51 Wis. 431.)

Supreme Court of Wisconsin. March 2, 1881.

Appeal from circuit court, Dane county.

The case established by the pleadings and evidence is correctly stated in the brief of counsel for the plaintiff, as follows: "This action was brought to foreclose four certain mortgages made by Martin Osborne and wife upon 80 acres of land in Dane county, three of which mortgages had been satisfied of record before the commencement of the action. The facts are that on November 11, 1871, Martin Osborne was seized in fee of the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 25, town 8, range 9, Dane county. November 11, 1871, Osborne and wife gave a mortgage thereon to John W. Allen for \$800 and interest. This is still in force as a first mortgage on the property, and is not one of the four mortgages for the foreclosure of which the action was brought. It confers a right of property prior to the rights of all parties hereto, and further reference to it in the case is unnecessary. November 23, 1871, Osborne and wife gave a mortgage thereon to Patrick Duffy for \$200 and interest. This mortgage bears date prior to the Allen mortgage, but was executed later, and in terms made subject thereto. October 1, 1875, Osborne and wife gave another mortgage thereon to Patrick Duffy for \$250 and interest. December 2, 1876, Osborne and wife gave a mortgage thereon to Elizabeth Duffy for \$135 and interest. February 21, 1878, Osborne and wife gave a mortgage thereon to Michael C. Conner, the plaintiff, for \$229 and interest, which mortgage has never been satisfied of record. March 1, 1878, the defendant Christian R. Stein caused judgment to be entered against Martin Osborne in the circuit court for Dane county upon a judgment note, with warrant of attorney, by his attorneys, Welch & Botkin, a law firm of which the defendant William Welch was a member. March 2, 1878, the defendant Stein assigned said judgment to said William Welch. March 4, 1878, the said mortgages, numbers two, three, and four, for \$200, \$250, and \$135, were assigned to the defendant Stein. March 5, 1878, the defendant Stein, by his attorneys, the said Welch & Botkin, brought suit to foreclose the said mortgages, numbers two and three, for \$200 and \$250, making parties defendant thereto Osborne and wife, the mortgagors, and Conner, the plaintiff herein, holding the subsequent mortgage, number five, above mentioned, but not making a party defendant the said Welch, holding by assignment the said judgment number six. March 8, 1878, Osborne and wife, by deed of quitclaim, conveyed said premises to the plaintiff, Conner, who, at the time, had an actual knowledge of the Stein judgment and its assignment to Welch. April 9, 1878, at the office of Welch & Botkin, in the presence of Botkin, the plaintiff, Conner, paid to the defendant Stein the amount, principal and interest, of the mortgages in suit, (Nos. 2 and 3,) together with about \$115, costs of suit. At the time of payment he was still without knowledge of the Stein judgment. Neither Stein nor Botkin spoke of it. Botkin, when asked if he had told Conner of the existence of the Stein judgment, testified: 'I do not think I did. He (Conner) paid the money, and then said that he wanted the mortgages satisfied, and asked Mr. Stein to come right up with him and satisfy the mortgages, at the register of deeds' office, and get done with it; and he and Mr. Stein went out of the office for that purpose. It was at Conner's request. Not a word was said by me or Stein in regard to satisfying. There was not a syllable or whisper in regard to it.' The two mortgages were then satisfied by Stein. April 29, 1878, the plaintiff, Conner, paid Stein the amount, principal and interest, of the mortgage for \$135, number four, which, with the accompanying note, was delivered to him. Thereupon, at plaintiff's instance and request, Stein went to the register's office, accompanied by plaintiff, and satisfied the mortgage; Stein knowing, and the plaintiff not knowing, of the judgment. About December, 1878, the plaintiff first learned of the existence of the judgment from the officer having an execution thereon against this property." The complaint prays that the discharges of the three Duffy mortgages be cancelled, and for the usual judgment of foreclosure and sale in respect to those mortgages, and the mortgage for \$229 to the plaintiff, dated February 21, 1878.

It is claimed in the complaint that 40 acres of the mortgaged land was the homestead of Osborne, and an injunction was prayed against the sale of such 40 acres, on execution issued upon Stein's judgment. As to the agreement between the plaintiff and Osborne, pursuant to which the latter conveyed to the plaintiff the land mortgaged, the plaintiff testified as follows: "I bought the place of Osborne. I was to pay the mortgages. I did not give him any money besides the mortgages. * * * I gave him an account I held against him, more or less. * * * He had no money, and I paid for the making out of these papers. Forget how much that was. That is all I paid for his deed to me, except that I released him from his liability on the note of $229. Think it was agreed that I should let Osborne have his note and mortgage. Have no further claim on him or his land for that." The witness testified later that he understood he took the property in satisfaction of his claims, but that it was no part of the consideration of the deed; and, further, to the question, "Didn't you regard the giving to you by Osborne of the quitclaim deed as, between you and Osborne, a settlement of your note and mortgage against him for $229?" the plaintiff answered: "I presume so, but that was omitted in putting the amount in the deed." This is the substance of all the evidence on the subject.

The court found—"First, that all the facts stated in the complaint are true, except that no part of the mortgaged premises was the homestead of Osborne when Stein recovered his judgment, and that Stein is not the owner of such judgment; second, that the defendant Welch purchased said judgment from the defendant Stein, and took the assignment thereof absolutely, for full value, and without notice, fraud, or collusion, and that he paid therefor by crediting the said Stein on the account of the firm of Welch & Botkin, of which the defendant Welch was then and still is a member, with the face amount thereof, towards the payment for legal services theretofore rendered by the said Welch & Botkin for the said Stein, and that, as between the said Welch and the said Botkin, it was agreed that the amount of said judgment should be received by the said Welch on his individual account; third, that Mr. Botkin, the law partner of the said defendant Welch, transacted the business in the foreclosure suits set out in said complaint, and that said Welch had no knowledge of the details of said foreclosure, and of the satisfaction of the mortgages as set out in said complaint; fourth, that the cancellation of the mortgages as set out in said complaint was founded upon a mistake upon the part of the plaintiff. That mistake was the supposition that the several mortgages of record, including his own, to the amount in all of the full value of the premises, were the only liens prior to his deed from said Osborne."

As conclusions of law, the court found that the mortgage for $229, executed by Osborne to the plaintiff, is a valid subsisting lien on the land; that the discharge of the three Duffy mortgages should be cancelled, and those mortgages adjudged to be valid and subsisting liens; and that the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment of foreclosure in respect to all four mortgages, and to a sale of the land mortgaged, but not to a personal judgment against either defendant. The defendants have appealed from the judgment entered pursuant to such findings.

S. W. Botkin, for appellants. Sloan, Stevens & Morris, for respondent.

LYON, J. As we understand the testimony of the plaintiff he accepted the quitclaim deed of the mortgaged premises from Osborne pursuant to an express agreement between them that the note and mortgage of February 21, 1878, for $229, was thereby satisfied and discharged. His testimony seems to admit of no other construction. By this agreement the $229 mortgage was discharged, and the satisfactions of the Duffy mortgages by Stein, in the proper records of the county, at the request of the plaintiff, discharged those mortgages. Hence, by the acts and procurement of the plaintiff, the four mortgages in controversy were cancelled and cease to be liens upon the land covered by them. Were these subsisting mortgages, we might not find it very difficult to hold, under the authorities cited, that the interest represented by the $229 mortgage was not merged in the legal title conveyed to the plaintiff by Osborne, and that the plaintiff should be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagees in the Duffy mortgages, so that all of these mortgages could be made available to protect the plaintiff against the lien of the Stein judgment, which is junior thereto. But before the questions of merger and subrogation can be raised at all, the mortgages now cancelled and discharged must be restored and vitalized. This can only be done by cancelling and holding for naught the satisfactions of the Duffy mortgages, which the plaintiff caused to be entered of record, and his express agreement with Osborne to accept the conveyance of the legal title in full satisfaction and discharge of the $229 mortgage.

The precise question is, therefore, whether, under the circumstances of the case, the plaintiff is entitled to be relieved of those satisfactions and of such agreement. Has he shown himself entitled to have them set aside, cancelled, and held for naught? The circuit court found (no doubt correctly) that there was no fraud or collusion on the part of the defendant Welch, the owner of the Stein judgment, and granted the relief prayed on the sole ground that plaintiff acted in ignorance of the existence of that judgment, in the matter of the satisfaction and discharge of the mortgages. Undoubtedly the plaintiff knew nothing of the judgment, and, presumably, (although he has not so testified,) had he known of its existence he would not have had the mortgages discharged, or made the contract he did with Osborne for the conveyance. But that alone is not sufficient to entitle him to have the discharged mortgages reinstated as valid liens upon the land. He must also have exercised reasonable diligence to ascertain whether subsequent liens had been put upon the property. A court of equity never relieves a man from the consequences of his own culpable negligence. Discussing the rules upon which courts of equity proceed in relieving, or refusing to relieve, against contracts made or acts done through mistake, or in ignorance of material facts, Judge Story says that "where an unconscionable advantage has been gained by mere mistake or misapprehension, and there was no gross negligence on the part of the plaintiff in falling into the error, or in not sooner claiming redress, and no intervening rights have accrued, and the parties may still be placed in statu quo, equity will interfere, in its discretion, in order to prevent intolerable injustice." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 138i. In section 146 the learned author says: "It is not, however, sufficient in all cases to give the party relief, that the fact is material; but it must be such as he could not by reasonable diligence get knowledge of when he was put upon inquiry. For if, by such reasonable diligence, he could obtain knowledge of the fact, equity will not relieve him, since that would be to encourage culpable negligence." In a note to the section last cited is the following: "If a court of equity is asked to give relief in a case not fully remediable at law, or not remediable at all at law, then it grants it upon its own terms and according to its own doctrines. It gives relief only to the vigilant and not to the negligent; to those who have not been put upon their diligence to make inquiry, and not to those who, being put upon inquiry, have chosen to omit all inquiry, which would have enabled them at once to correct the mistake, or to obviate all ill effects therefrom. In short, it refuses all its aid to those who, by their own negligence, and by that alone, have incurred the loss, or may suffer the inconvenience."

In Mamlock v. Fairbanks, 46 Wis. 415, 1 N. W. 167, this court made an application of the rule above stated. That was an action to rescind a contract of sale of a certain note and mortgage by the defendant to the plaintiff, and to recover the money paid therefor. The ground upon which relief was claimed, was that the defendant misrepresented the identity of the debtors, which misrepresentation affected the value of the securities. It was held that if, by the exercise of reasonable diligence, the plaintiff had the present means of ascertaining the identity of the debtors, and was not prevented from doing so by any artifice of the vendor, there could be no recovery. The opinion contains some of the authorities for the rule, not specially cited herein, and the case is a very strong one against the plaintiff.

Levy v. Martin, 48 Wis. 198, 4 N. W. 35, is not in point. There the mortgage sought to be revived was discharged without the consent of the plaintiff, and against an express agreement between him and the personal representatives of the deceased mortgagor that it should be assigned to him. Under these circumstances we found no difficulty in cancelling the satisfaction, and subrogating the plaintiff to the rights of the original mortgagor. There was no question of diligence in the case.

We have examined the cases cited by the learned counsel for the plaintiff on the subject of the rescission of contracts or instruments for ignorance or mistake of material facts, but in none of them, so far as we have perceived, is the question of diligence raised or passed upon.

We are now to consider the question whether the present plaintiff used proper diligence to ascertain the condition of the title when he made his agreement with Osborne, and when he paid and procured the discharge of the Duffy mortgages.

The plaintiff is a man of some wealth, and is apparently familiar with the usual modes of transacting ordinary business. He evidently knew that a judgment against Osborne would be a lien upon the mortgaged premises, and also the effect upon the title of a discharge of the mortgages. He knew also that Osborne was utterly insolvent and thriftless. The number and amount of mortgages which the latter had put upon his land during the preceding seven years, absorbing its whole value, was sufficient notice to him of Osborne's pecuniary condition. The known insolvency of Osborne would naturally make an ordinarily prudent man more cautious when dealing with the title to his land. Then, again, the mortgage of Allen represented nearly or quite one-half of the value of the land, and was paramount to all the others. Stein is a merchant in Madison, and plaintiff knew him well. It does not appear that he is a dealer in real estate to any considerable extent. The very fact that he had purchased the Duffy mortgages, which were junior to the Allen mortgage, would seem to suggest to a reasonable mind that he must have had some special reason for doing so, and that such reason might well be that he became interested in some way in the land. But these circumstances, suggestive as they were, failed to open the lips of the plaintiff. He made no inquiry concerning the title either of Stein or Botkin or Osborne. Had he done so, and been told that no encumbrance had been placed upon the land subsequent to his mortgage for $229, he might stand in a very different position in this action.

But this is not all. A month after he took the conveyance from Osborne, he went with Stein to the office of the register of deeds to have the latter discharge the two oldest Duffy mortgages, and some weeks later went again to the same office to have the other Duffy mortgages discharged. Of course, he was in close proximity to the office of the clerk of the circuit court, and could easily have gone there and ascertained whether any judgments had been entered against Osborne. It seems to us that common prudence required him to do so, or else to interrogate Stein or Osborne or Botkin as to the condition of the title. Yet he made the agreement, and took the conveyance from Osborne, and procured Stein to discharge the Duffy mortgages, without doing either. He suffered the matter to rest in statu quo until an execution was issued on the judgment, and, so far as it appears, first asserted the rights claimed in this action on the day the land was sold by the sheriff under the execution, which was about 10 months after the last Duffy mortgage was discharged. Our minds are impelled to the conclusion that, under these circumstances, the plaintiff was guilty of most culpable negligence in failing to inform himself of the existence of the Stein judgment, and hence that he has no standing in a court of equity to obtain the

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—15

Digitized by

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

relief he seeks. If there is any case in the books which grants such relief, where the act sought to be relieved against was the result of negligence so gross and inexcusable, we have failed to find it. Certainly, no such case is cited by counsel. The application of this rule may work hardship in some cases; perhaps it does in this case. But the rule requires nothing unreasonable and is a most salutary one. It is infinitely better that men should be held to the consequences of their own culpable carelessness, than that courts of equity should undertake to relieve therefrom. The rule requires reasonable caution and prudence in the transaction of business, and is deeply imbedded in our jurisprudence. It is within the principle and reason of caveat emptor. Mamlock v. Fairbanks, supra. The abrogation of the rule would tend to encourage negligence, and to introduce uncertainty and confusion in all business transactions.

The judgment of the circuit court must be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to that court to dismiss the complaint.

PARK BROS. & CO., Limited, v. BLODGETT & CLAPP CO.

(29 Atl. 133, 64 Conn. 28.)

Supreme Court of Errors of Connecticut. Feb. 8, 1894.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Hartford county; Taintor, Judge.

Action by Park Bros. & Co., Limited, against the Blodgett & Clapp Company for damages for breach of contract. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Albert H. Walker, for appellant. Edward S. White, for appellee.

TORRANCE, J. This is an action brought to recover damages for the breach of a written contract, dated December 14, 1888. The contract is set out in full in the amended complaint. It is in the form of a written proposal, addressed by the plaintiff to the defendant, and is accepted by the defendant in writing upon the face of the contract. Such parts of the contract as appear to be material are here given: "We propose to supply you with fifteen net tons of tool steel, of good and suitable quality, to be furnished prior to January 1, 1890, at" prices set forth in the contract for the qualities of steel named therein. "Deliveries to be made f. o. b. Pittsburgh, and New York freight allowed to Hartford. To be specified for as your wants may require." The contract was made at Hartford, by the plaintiff through its agent A. H. Church, and by the defendant through its agent J. B. Clapp. After filing a demurrer and an answer, which may now be laid out of the case, the defendant filed an "answer, with demand for reformation of contract," in the first paragraph of which it admitted the execution of said written contract. The second, third, and fourth paragraphs of the answer are as follows: "The defendant avers that on or about December —, 1888, it was agreed by and between the plaintiff and defendant, the plaintiff acting by its said agent, A. H. Church, that the plaintiff should supply the defendant prior to January 1, 1890, with such an amount of tool steel, not exceeding fifteen tons, as the defendant's wants during that time might require, and of the kinds and upon the terms stated in said contract, and that the defendant would purchase the same of the plaintiff on said terms. (3) That by the mistake of the plaintiff and defendant, or the fraud of the plaintiff, said written contract did not embody the actual agreement made as aforesaid by the parties. (4) That the defendant accepted the proposal made to it by the plaintiff, and contained in said written contract, relying upon the representations of the plaintiff's said agent, then made to it, that by accepting the same the defendant would only be bound for the purchase of such an amount of tool steel of the kinds named therein as its wants prior to January 1, 1890, might require, and the defendant then believed that such proposal embodied the terms of the actual agreement made as aforesaid by and between the plaintiff and defendant." The fifth and last paragraph of the answer is not now material. The answer claimed, by way of equitable relief, a reformation of the written contract. In reply the plaintiff denied the three paragraphs above quoted; denied specifically that the written contract did not embody the actual agreement made by the parties; and denied the existence of any joint mistake or fraud. Thereupon the court below, sitting as a court of equity, heard the parties upon the issues thus formed, found them in favor of the defendant, and adjudged that the written contract be reformed to correspond with the contract as set out in paragraph 2 of the answer. At a subsequent term of the court, final judgment in the suit was rendered in favor of the defendant. The present appeal is based upon what occurred during the trial with reference to the reformation of the contract. Upon that hearing the agent of the defendant was a witness, on behalf of the defendant, and was asked to state "what conversation occurred between him and A. H. Church in making the contract of December 14, 1888, at and before the execution thereof, and relevant thereto." The plaintiff "objected to the reception of any parol testimony, on the ground that the same was inadmissible to vary or contradict the terms of a written instrument, or to show any other or different contract than that specified in the instrument, or to show anything relevant to the defendant's prayer for its reformation." The court overruled the objection, and admitted the testimony, and upon such testimony found and adjudged as hereinbefore stated.

The case thus presents a single question, — whether the evidence objected to was admissible under the circumstances; and this depends upon the further question, which will be first considered, whether the mistake was one which, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, a court of equity will correct. The finding of the court below is as follows: "The actual agreement between the defendant and the plaintiff was that the plaintiff should supply the defendant, prior to January 1, 1890, with such an amount of tool steel, not exceeding fifteen tons, as the defendant's wants during that time might require, and of the kinds and upon the terms stated in said contract, and that the defendant would purchase the same of the plaintiff on said terms. But by the mutual mistake of said Church and said Clapp, acting for the plaintiff and defendant respectively, concerning the legal construction of the written contract of December 14, 1888, that contract failed to express the actual agreement of the parties; and that said Church and said Clapp both intended to have the said written contract express the actual agreement made by them, and at the time of its execution believed that it did." No fraud is properly charged, and certainly none is found, and whatever claim to relief the defendant may have must rest wholly on the ground of mistake. The plaintiff claims that the mistake in question is one of law, and is of such a nature that it cannot be corrected in a court of equity. That a court of equity, under certain circumstances, may reform a written instrument founded on a mistake of fact is not disputed; but the plaintiff strenuously insists that it cannot, or will not, reform an instrument founded upon a mistake like the one here in question, which is alleged to be a mistake of law. The distinction between mistakes of law and mistakes of fact is certainly recognized in the text-books and decisions, and to a certain extent is a valid distinction; but it is not practically so important as it is often represented to be. Upon this point Mr. Markby, in his "Elements of Law" (sections 268 and 269), well says: "There is also a peculiar class of cases in which courts of equity have endeavored to undo what has been done under the influence of error and to restore parties to their former position. The courts deal with such cases in a very free manner, and I doubt whether it is possible to bring their action under any fixed rules. But here again, as far as I can judge by what I find in the text-books and in the cases referred to, the distinction between errors of law and errors of fact, though very emphatically announced, has had very little practical effect upon the decisions of the courts. The distinction is not ignored, and it may have had some influence, but it is always mixed up with other considerations, which not unfrequently outweigh it. The distinction between errors of law and errors of fact is therefore probably of much less importance than is commonly supposed. There is some satisfaction in this, because the grounds upon which the distinction is made have never been clearly stated." The distinction in question can therefore afford little or no aid in determining the question under consideration. Under certain circumstances a court of equity will, and under others it will not, reform a writing founded on a mistake of fact; under certain circumstances it will, and under others it will not, reform an instrument founded upon a mistake of law. It is no longer true, if it ever was, that a mistake of law is no ground for relief in any case, as will be seen by the cases hereinafter cited. Whether, then, the mistake now in question be regarded as one of law or one of fact is not of much consequence; the more important question is whether it is such a mistake as a court of equity will correct; and this perhaps can only, or at least can best, be determined by seeing whether it falls within any of the well-recognized classes of cases in which such relief is furnished. At the same time the fundamental equitable principle which was specially applied in the case of Northrop v. Graves, 19 Conn. 548, may also, perhaps, afford some aid in coming to a right conclusion. Stated briefly and generally, and without any attempt at strict accuracy, that principle is that in legal transactions no one shall be allowed to enrich himself unjustly at the expense of another through or by reason of an innocent mistake of law or fact, entertained without negligence by the loser, or by both. If we apply this principle to the present case, we may see that, by means of a mutual mistake in reducing the oral agreement to writing, the plaintiff, without either party intending it, gained a decided advantage over the defendant, to which it is in no way justly entitled, or at least ought not to be entitled, in a court of equity.

The written agreement certainly fails to express the real agreement of the parties in a material point; it fails to do so by reason of a mutual mistake, made, as we must assume, innocently, and without any such negligence on the part of the defendant as would debar him from the aid of a court of equity. The rights of no third parties have intervened. The instrument, if corrected, will place both parties just where they intended to place themselves in their relations to each other; and, if not corrected, it gives the plaintiff an inequitable advantage over the defendant. It is said that if, by mistake, words are inserted in a written contract which the parties did not intend to insert, or omitted which they did not intend to omit, this is a mistake of fact which a court of equity will correct in a proper case. Sibert v. McAvoy, 15 Ill. 106. If, then, the oral agreement in the case at bar had been for the sale and purchase of 5 tons of steel, and, in reducing the contract to writing, the parties had, by an unnoticed mistake, inserted "15 tons" instead of "5 tons," this would have been a mistake of fact entitling the defendant to the aid of a court of equity. In the case at bar the parties actually agreed upon what may, for brevity, be called a conditional purchase and sale, and upon that only. In reducing the contract to writing, they, by an innocent mistake, omitted words which would have expressed the true agreement, and used words which express an agreement differing materially from the only one they made. There is perhaps a distinction between the supposed case and the actual case, but it is quite shadowy. They differ not at all in their unjust consequences. In both, by an innocent mistake mutually entertained, the vendor obtains an unconscionable advantage over the vendee, a result which was not intended by either. There exists no good, substantial reason, as it seems to us, why relief should be given in the one case and refused in the other, other things being equal. It is hardly necessary to say that, in cases like the one at bar, courts of equity ought to move with great caution. Before an instrument is reformed, under such circumstances, the proof of the mistake, and that it really gives an unjust advantage to one party over the other, ought to be of the most convincing character. "Of course the presumption in favor of the written over the spoken agreement is almost resistless; and the court has wearied itself in declaring that such prayers (for relief of this kind) must be supported by overwhelming evidence, or be denied." Palmer v. Insurance Co., 54 Conn. 501, 9 Atl. 248. We are not concerned here, however, with the amount or sufficiency of the proofs upon which the court below acted, nor with the sufficiency of the pleadings; we must, upon this record, assume that the pleadings are sufficient, and that the proofs came fully up to the highest standard requirements in such cases. Upon principle, then, we think a court of equity may correct a mistake of law in a case like the one at bar, and we also think the very great weight of modern authority is in favor of that conclusion. The case clearly falls within that class of cases where there is an antecedent agreement, and, in reducing it to writing, the instrument executed, by reason of the common mistake of the parties as to the legal effect of the words used, fails, as to one or more material points, to express their actual agreement. It is perhaps not essential in all cases that there should be an antecedent agreement, as appears to be held in Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 33 N. W. 38; but we have no occasion to consider that question in the case at bar. The authorities in favor of the conclusion that a court of equity in such cases will correct a mistake, even if it be one of law, are very numerous, and the citation of a few of the more important must suffice.

In Hunt v. Rousmanier's Adm'rs, 1 Pet. 1, decided in 1828, it is said: "Where an instrument is drawn and executed which professes, or is intended, to carry into execution an agreement, whether in writing or by parol, previously entered into, but which by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or law, does not fulfill, or which violates, the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement, equity will correct the mistake so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement." It was said in the argument before us that this was a mere obiter dictum, but that is hardly correct. It is true the case was held not to fall within the principle, but the principle was said to be "incontrovertible" (page 13), and was applied to the extent at least of determining that the case then before the court did not come within it. In Snell v. Insurance Co., 98 U. S. 85, the court applied the principle so clearly stated in the case last cited, and reformed a policy of insurance, though the mistake was clearly one as to the legal effect of the language of the policy. In numerous other decisions of that court the same principle has been cautiously but repeatedly applied, but it is not necessary to cite them. On the general question, whether a court of equity will relieve against a mistake as to the legal effect of the language of a writing, the case of Griswold v. Hazard, 141 U. S. 260, 11 Sup. Ct. 972, 999, is a strong case, though perhaps hardly an authority upon the precise question in this case. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373, was a case where the oral contract was for the sale of two-thirds of certain premises, but the deed, by mistake of the scrivener, conveyed the entire premises. The words used were ones intended to be used in one sense, the error being that all concerned supposed those words would carry out the oral agreement. This was clearly a mistake "concerning the legal construction of the written contract," but the court, by Chief Justice Shaw, said: "We are of the opinion that courts of equity in such cases are not limited to affording relief only in cases of mistake of fact, and that a mistake in the legal effect of a description in a deed, or in the use of technical language, may be relieved against upon proper proof." In Goode v. Riley, 153 Mass. 585, 28 N. E. 228, decided in 1891, the court says: "The only question argued is raised by the defendant's exception to the refusal of a ruling that, if both parties intended that the description should be written as it was written, the plaintiff was not entitled to a reformation. It would be a sufficient answer that the contrary is settled in this commonwealth,"—citing a number of cases. In Kenard v. George, 44 N. H. 440, the parties, by mistake as to its legal effect, supposed a mortgage deed to be valid when it was not. The court relieved against the mistake, and said: "It seems to us to be a clear case of mutual mistake, where the instrument given and received was not in fact what all the parties to it supposed it was and intended it should be; and in such a case equity will interfere and reform the deed, and make it what the parties at the time of its execution intended to make it; and in this respect it makes no difference whether the defect in the instrument be in a statutory or common-law requisite, or whether the parties failed to make the instrument in the form they intended, or misapprehended its legal effect." In Eastman v. Association, 65 N. H. 176, 18 Atl. 745, decided in 1889, the mistake was as to the legal effect of an insurance certificate, but the court granted relief by way of reformation. The court says: "Both parties intended to make the benefit payable to Gigar's administrator. That it was not made payable to him was due to their mutual misapprehension of the legal effect of the language used in the certificate. * * * Equity requires an amendment of the writing that will make the contract what the parties supposed it was, and intended it should be, although their mistake is one of law, and not of fact." In Trusdell v. Lehman, 47 N. J. Eq. 218, 20 Atl. 391, the marginal note is as follows: "Where it clearly appears that a deed drawn professedly to carry out the agreement of the parties, previously entered into, is executed under the misapprehension that it really embodies the agreement, whereas, by mistake of the draughtsman either as to fact or law, it fails to fulfill that purpose, equity will correct the mistake by reforming the instrument in accordance with the contract." In a general way, the same rule is recognized and applied with more or less strictness in the following cases: Clayton v. Freet, 10 Ohio St. 544; Bush v. Hicks, 60 N. Y. 298; Andrews v. Andrews, 81 Me. 337, 17 Atl. 166; May v. Adams, 58 Vt. 74, 3 Atl. 187; Griffith v. Townley, 69 Mo. 13; Benson v. Markoe, 37 Minn. 30, 33 N. W. 38; Gump's Appeal, 65 Pa. St. 476; Cooper v. Phibbs, L. R. 2 H. L. 170. See, also, 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 845, and Bisp. Eq. §§ 184-191. And, whatever the law may be elsewhere, this is certainly the law of our own state. Chamberlain v. Thompson, 10 Conn. 243; Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 144; Woodbury Savings Bank v. Charter Oak Ins. Co., 31 Conn. 518; Palmer v. Insurance Co., 54 Conn. 488, 9 Atl. 248; and Haussman v. Burnham, 59 Conn. 117, 22 Atl. 1065. Indeed, since the time of Northrop v. Graves, supra, it is difficult to see how our law could have been otherwise. We conclude then that by our own law, and by the decided weight of authority elsewhere, the defendant was entitled to the relief sought. If this is so, then clearly he was entitled to the parol evidence which the plaintiff objected to; for in no other way, ordinarily, can the mistake be shown. "In such cases parol evidence is admissible to show that the party is entitled to the relief sought." Wheaton v. Wheaton, 9 Conn. 96. "It is settled, at least in equity, that this particular kind of evidence, that is to say, of mutual mistake as to the meaning of words used, is admissible for the negative purpose we have mentioned. And this principle is entirely consistent with the rule that you cannot set up prior or contemporaneous oral dealings to modify or override what you knew was the effect of your writing." Goode v. Riley, 153 Mass. 585, 28 Atl. 228; Reyn. Theory Ev. § 69; 1 Greenl. Ev. (15th Ed.) § 269a; Steph. Dig. Ev. § 90.

The view we have taken of this case renders it unnecessary to notice at any length the cases cited by counsel for the plaintiff in his able argument before us. Upon his brief, he cites five from Illinois, two from Indiana, and one from Arkansas. After an examination of them, we can only say that most of them seem to support the claims of the plaintiff. If so, we think they are opposed to the very decided weight of authority, and do not state the law as it is held in this state.

Before closing, however, we ought to notice the case of Wheaton v. Wheaton, supra, upon which the plaintiff's counsel seems to place great reliance. The case is a somewhat peculiar one. Even in that case, however, the court seems to recognize the principle governing the class of cases within which we decide the case at bar falls, for it says: "It is not alleged that the writings were not so drawn as to effectuate the intention of the parties, through the mistake of the scrivener. On the contrary it is alleged that the scrivener was not even informed what the agreement between the parties was." From the statement of the case in the record and in the opinion, it clearly appears that the mistake was not mutual; indeed, it does not even appear that at the time when the note was executed the other party even knew that there was any mistake at all on the part of anybody. Upon the facts stated, the plaintiff in this case did not bring it within the class of cases we have been considering. The case was correctly decided, not on the ground that the mistake was one of law, but on the ground that the mistake of law was one which, under the circumstances alleged, a court of equity would not correct. The court, however, in the opinion, seems to base its decision upon the distinction between mistakes of law and mistakes of fact; holding in general and unqualified terms, as was once quite customary, that the latter could be corrected and the former could not. The court probably did not mean to lay the law down in this broad and unqualified way; but if it did, it is sufficient to say that it is not a correct statement of our law, at least since the decision of Northrop v. Graves, supra. On the whole, this case of Wheaton v. Wheaton can hardly be regarded as supporting the plaintiff's contention. There is no error apparent upon the record. In this opinion the other judges concurred.

WALDEN v. SKINNER.

(101 U. S. 577.)

Supreme Court of the United States. October, 1879.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Southern District of Georgia.

Benjamin H. Hill, for appellant. A. R. Lawton, for appellee.

MR. JUSTICE CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Trusts are either express or implied, the former being such as are raised or created by the act of the parties, and the latter being such as are raised or created by presumption or construction of law. Cook v. Fountain, 3 Swanst. 585, 592.

Implied trusts may also be divided into two general classes: First, those that rest upon the presumed intention of the parties. Secondly, those which are independent of any such express intentions, and are forced upon the conscience of the party by operation of law. 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1195.

Sufficient appears to show that Sarah S. Walden, the complainant, on the sixth day of May, 1874, filed her bill of complaint in the court below against the respondents, to wit, Darius S. Skinner and John N. Lewis and Charles S. Hardee, executors of Charles S. Henry, deceased, who in his lifetime was the trustee of Penelope W. Tefft and her three children. Preliminary to the charging part of her complaint she alleges and states that on the 28th of October, 1847, she intermarried with William P. Tefft, who on the 9th of August, five years later, departed this life intestate and without children, leaving the complainant as his sole heir and legal representative; that on the 4th of June, six years subsequent to the death of her first husband, she intermarried with Charles C. Walden, who, on the eighth day of December of the next year, departed this life testate, leaving no children by the complainant, and that he by his will bequeathed to her all the property and rights owned and possessed by her at the date of their marriage; and that the father of her first husband died intestate on the 30th of June, 1862, but that no administration was ever had upon his estate, and that his widow, the mother of her first husband, departed this life testate on the 11th of September eleven years later; that her first husband had two brothers at the date of her marriage neither of whom ever married and both of whom died without children; that at the death of the elder of the two he had a life policy of insurance for $5,000, which his administrator collected and paid to his two living brothers.

Allegations then follow in the bill of complaint which relate more immediately to the subject-matter of the controversy, from which it appears that Elias Fort, June 28,

1831, conveyed a certain tract of land to Charles S. Henry and Stephen C. Greene, as trustees and in trust for Penelope W. Tefft and her three sons, William P. Tefft, Henry D. Tefft, and Charles E. Tefft, and it is therein declared that the said property is for the use of the mother during her lifetime and the three sons, and that after the death of the mother it shall be for the use of the three sons alone as tenants in common, and that in case of sale "the proceeds to be reinvested upon the same uses and trusts as aforesaid, and if not sold, then the property, after the death of the mother, was to be distributed by said trustees to each of the said sons as shall survive and attain the age of twenty-one years."

Greene, one of the trustees, subsequently died, leaving Charles S. Henry the sole surviving trustee under the trust-deed, and she charges that on the 19th of July, 1848, the mayor and aldermen of the city of Savannah conveyed to him as such trustee a certain lot of land numbered five, Monterey Ward, in said city, the lot being then subject to certain annual ground-rents, as specified in the conveyance, and the complainant avers that the conveyance is informal and incomplete, inasmuch as the trustee never signed it, as it was intended, and that it fails to set forth and express the trust interests of the three children as it should do. Wherefore she alleges that it should be reformed and be made to conform to the purposes of the trust as created and set forth in the original trust-deed.

Persuasive and convincing reasons in support of that request are alleged which will hereafter be reproduced when the merits of the controversy are considered.

Relief specific and general is prayed, as is more fully set forth in the transcript. Process was served and the respondents appeared, and after certain interlocutory proceedings filed separate answers.

All of the defenses to the merits are set up in the answer of the first-named respondent, who admits all of the preliminary matters alleged in the bill of complaint. He also admits that there was in existence at the time of the first marriage of the complainant the trust estate held by the surviving trustee arising under the conveyance from Elias Fort to the said two trustees, which, as he alleges, was held for the sole and separate use of the mother during her life, and remainder at her death to her three sons as tenants in common.

Prior to that transaction there is no controversy between the parties as to the facts, and he also admits that the authorities of the city conveyed the lot called Monterey Ward to the surviving trustee, but he alleges that by the terms of the conveyance the legal title to the lot vested in the trustee in trust for the sole and separate use of the mother, the trust being executory only so long and for such time as the cestui que trust should remain a feme covert; and he denies that the conveyance is informal and incomplete in any particular, or that it was ever expected or intended by any one that the trustee should sign the same, and he avers that it was accepted by the trustee for the purposes therein set forth.

Attempt is also made to enforce that view by a specific denial of most of the reasons assigned in the bill of complaint in support of the request that the conveyance to the trustee of the lot called Monterey Ward may be reformed so as to conform to the trusts created and expressed in the antecedent trust-deed.

Both of the other respondents allege that they are citizens of the state where the suit is brought, and deny that the circuit court had any jurisdiction to make or execute any order, judgment, or decree against them in the premises.

Proofs were taken, the parties heard, and the circuit court entered a decree in favor of the respondents, dismissing the bill of complaint. Prompt appeal was taken by the complainant to this court, and since the appeal was brought up she has filed the assignment of errors set forth in the brief of her counsel. They are ten in number, all of which will be sufficiently considered in the course of the opinion, without giving each a separate examination.

Before examining the questions presented in respect to the second deed, it becomes necessary to ascertain the true construction and meaning of the original trust-deed so far as respects the second trust therein created and defined. Eight hundred dollars constituted the consideration of the conveyance, and it was made upon the trust that if, during the lifetime of the mother of the three sons, it should be deemed advisable by her to sell and convey the premises, then upon this further trust that the trustees as aforesaid, or the survivor of them, upon her application and with her consent, signified by her being a party to the conveyance, will sell and convey the lot and improvements for the best price which can be obtained for the same, to any person or persons whatsoever, without applying to a court of law or equity for that purpose to authorize the same, and the proceeds thereof upon the same trusts as aforesaid to invest in such other property or manner as the mother of the sons shall direct and request for the same use, benefit, and behalf.

Explicit and unambiguous as that provision is, it requires no discussion to ascertain its meaning; nor is it necessary to enter into any examination of the third trust specified in the conveyance, as it is conceded that the trust property was sold by the surviving trustee for reinvestment during the lifetime of the mother at her request, she joining in the conveyance as required by the terms of the instrument creating the trust.

Twenty-four hundred dollars were received for the conveyance of the trust property, and all of that sum, except $600 turned over to the mother, was invested in buildings then being erected upon lot numbered five, called the Monterey Ward. Purchase of that lot had previously been made by the surviving trustee named in the original trust-deed, and it appears that the parties understood that it was to be upon the same uses and trusts as were contained in the trust-deed by which the title to the lot sold was acquired.

Proof that the new lot numbered five, called Monterey Ward, was purchased by the father and the three sons during the lifetime of the father seems to be entirely satisfactory, and it is equally well established that each contributed one-fourth part of the sum of $240 paid for the purchase-money of the lot. Satisfactory proof is also exhibited that Henry D. Tefft, one of the three brothers, died Aug. 13, 1849, unmarried and intestate, and that he had a valid subsisting insurance upon his life in the sum of $5,000, which his administrator collected and paid to his surviving brothers.

Eighteen hundred dollars of the proceeds arising from the sale of the property acquired by virtue of the first trust-deed were appropriated towards erecting buildings on the new lot purchased by the father and the three sons while in full life, and when the one whose life was insured deceased, the two survivors appropriated each his proportion of the money received to the same purpose, with the understanding that the property was subject to the same uses and trusts as the property previously acquired and sold.

Competent proofs of a convincing character are also exhibited in the transcript that the first husband of the complainant contributed other sums towards completing the buildings, leaving no doubt that he paid his full proportion for the improvements as well as for the lot purchased of the city authorities.

Enough appears to show that the buildings were completed more than two years before the first husband of the complainant died intestate and without children, when it is obvious that she became the sole heir to all the interest he possessed in the said estate, whatever it might be. Two years elapsed after the buildings were completed before the father of the three sons died, and the proofs show that during that period the complainant resided with the parents of her husband, and that her rights as his heir-at-law were uniformly recognized by the family; that she continued to reside there with her mother-in-law after the death of the senior Tefft, until the decease of his widow, and that throughout that period she paid one-half of all repairs, taxes, insurance, and other expenses of the property as if she were equally interested in the same with her mother-in-law, and was liable to bear an equal proportion of all such expenses.

Opposed to that is the proof that the mother-in-law, one year before her death, when in a low and depressed frame of mind, bequeathed the whole of the lot in question to the first-named respondent, who is her nephew, and on the same day executed a deed to him of the entire property, to take effect in possession after her death. Sole title to the premises in fee-simple is claimed by the respondent under those instruments, and he brought ejectment against the complainant to dispossess her of the premises, and it appears that she was at great disadvantage in attempting to defend the suit, because the trustee had omitted to see that the title was conveyed in trust for the benefit of the cestuis que trust as in the prior trust deed, as he should have done, to carry into effect the understanding of all the parties to the sale of the prior trust premises and the purchase of the lot in question. What she alleges is that the purchase of the new lot was made for the same cestuis que trust as those described in the deed of the old lot, and that the understanding of all was that the deed of the new lot should contain and declare the same uses and trusts in favor of the same persons, and the proofs to that effect are full and entirely satisfactory.

Support to that view is also derived from the fact that the surviving trustee in the old deed is the grantee in the new deed, and that he is therein more than once described as trustee, and in the introductory part of the instrument is denominated trustee of Mrs. Penelope W. Tefft, wife of Israel K. Tefft, of the city and state previously mentioned in the same instrument.

Ten years before the suit was instituted the trustee in the new deed departed this life, and the other two respondents were appointed and qualified as his executors. Unable to obtain complete redress at law, the complainant prays that the deed of conveyance from the city of the lot and improvements in question may be reformed and be made to conform to the true intent and purpose for which the lot was purchased, and to that end that it may be made to include the same uses and trusts raised, created, and declared in the prior deed from Elias Fort, according to the understanding and agreement of all the parties.

Besides that she also prays that her equities in and to the property, including the improvements, may be set forth, decreed, and allowed by the court, including such as are in her favor from the payment of taxes, insurance, and repairs upon the property during the lifetime and since the death of her mother-in-law, and that the first-named respondent may be enjoined from further proceeding in his ejectment suit to recover possession of the premises.

Courts of equity afford relief in case of mistake of facts, and allow parol evidence to vary and reform written contracts and instruments, when the defect or error arises from accident or misconception, as properly forming an exception to the general rule which excludes parol testimony offered to vary or contradict written instruments. Where the mistake is admitted by the other party, relief, as all agree, will be granted, and if it be fully proved by other evidence, Judge Story says, the reasons for granting relief seem to be equally satisfactory. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 156.

Decisions of undoubted authority hold that where an instrument is drawn and executed that professes or is intended to carry into execution an agreement, which is in writing or by parol, previously made between the parties, but which by mistake of the draftsman, either as to fact or law, does not fulfill or which violates the manifest intention of the parties to the agreement, equity will correct the mistake so as to produce a conformity of the instrument to the agreement, the reason of the rule being that the execution of agreements fairly and legally made is one of the peculiar branches of equity jurisdiction, and if the instrument intended to execute the agreement be from any cause insufficient for that purpose, the agreement remains as much unexecuted as if the party had refused altogether to comply with his engagement, and a court of equity will, in the exercise of its acknowledged jurisdiction, afford relief in the one case as well as in the other, by compelling the delinquent party to perform his undertaking according to the terms of it and the manifest intention of the parties. Hunt v. Rousmaniere's Adm'rs, 1 Pet. 1, 13; Id., 8 Wheat. 174, 211.

Even a judgment when confessed, if the agreement was made under a clear mistake, will be set aside if application be made, and the mistake shown while the judgment is within the power of the court. Such an agreement, even when made a rule of court, will not be enforced if made under a mistake, if seasonable application be made to set it aside, and if the judgment be no longer in the power of the court, relief, says Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, may be obtained in a court of chancery. The Hiram, 1 Wheat. 440, 444.

Equitable rules of the kind are applicable to sealed instruments, as well as to ordinary written agreements, the rule being that if by mistake a deed be drawn plainly different from the agreement of the parties, a court of equity will grant relief by considering the deed as if it had conformed to the antecedent agreement. So if a deed be ambiguously expressed in such a manner that it is difficult to give it a construction, the agreement may be referred to as an aid in expounding such an ambiguity; but if the deed is so expressed that a reasonable construction may be given to it, and when so given it does not plainly appear to be at variance with the agreement, then the latter is not to be regarded in the construction of the former. Hogan v. Insurance Co., 1 Wash. C. C. 419, 422, Fed. Cas. No. 6,582.

Rules of decision in suits for specific performance are necessarily affected by considerations peculiar to the nature of the right sought to be enforced and the remedy employed to accomplish the object. Where no question of fraud or mistake is involved, the rule with respect to the admission of parol evidence to vary a written contract is the same in courts of equity as in those of common law, the rule in both being that when an agreement is reduced to writing by the act and consent of the parties, the intent and meaning of the same must be sought in the instrument which they have chosen as the repository and evidence of their purpose, and not in extrinsic facts and allegations. Proof of fraud or mistake, however, may be admitted in equity to show that the terms of the instrument employed in the preparation of the same were varied or made different by addition or subtraction from what they were intended and believed to be when the same was executed.

Evidence of fraud or mistake is seldom found in the instrument itself, from which it follows that unless parol evidence may be admitted for that purpose the aggrieved party would have as little hope of redress in a court of equity as in a court of law. Even at law, all that pertains to the execution of a written instrument or to the proof that the instrument was adopted or ratified by the parties as their act or contract, is necessarily left to extrinsic evidence, and witnesses may consequently be called for the purpose of impeaching the execution of a deed or other writing under seal, and showing that its sealing or delivery was procured by fraudulently substituting one instrument for another, or by any other species of fraud by which the complaining party was misled and induced to put his name to that which was substantially different from the actual agreement. Thoroughgood's Case, 4 Coke, 4.

When the deed or other written instrument is duly executed and delivered, the courts of law hold that it contains the true agreement of the parties, and that the writing furnishes better evidence of the sense of the parties than any that can be supplied by parol; but courts of equity, says Chancellor Kent, have a broader jurisdiction and will open the written contract to let in an equity arising from facts perfectly distinct from the sense and construction of the instrument itself. Pursuant to that rule, he held it to be established that relief can be had against any deed or contract in writing founded on mistake or fraud, and that mistake may be shown by parol proof and the relief granted to the injured party whether he sets up the mistake affirmatively by bill or as a defense. Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585, 596.

Parol proof, said the same learned magistrate, is admissible in equity to correct a mistake in a written contract in favor of the complainant seeking a specific performance, especially where the contract in the first instance is imperfect without referring to extrinsic facts. Keisselbrack v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. 144; Cathcart v. Robinson, 5 Pet. 264.

Many cases support that proposition without qualification, and all or nearly all agree that it is correct where it is invoked as defence to a suit to enforce specific performance. Little or no disagreement is found in the adjudged cases to that extent, but there are many others where it is held that the rule is unsound when applied in behalf of a complainant seeking to enforce a specific performance of a contract with variations from the written instrument. Difficulty, it must be admitted, would arise in any attempt to reconcile the decided cases in that regard, but it is not necessary to enter that field of contest and conflict in the case before the court for several reasons: 1. Because by comparing the original trust deed with the deed of the lot in question, in view of the attendant circumstances, the inference is very cogent that the second was designed and intended as a complete substitute for the first. 2. Because the proof shows to a demonstration that the consideration for the purchase of the second lot was paid in equal proportions by the father and each of the three sons. 3. Because it appears that the expensive improvements made upon the lot in question were made from the moneys of each of the three sons, advanced at the request of the father. 4. Because it appears that the family and every member of it understood from the first and throughout that the trustee held the property in trust for the mother and the three sons. 5. Because the father, from the date of the deed to the time of his death, recognized the premises as acquired and held for the benefit of his wife and their three sons. 6. Because the mother of the three sons, after the decease of the first husband of complainant, recognized her as interested in the property, and continued to do so at all times throughout her life until about the time she conveyed the lot in question to the respondent.

Both the deed and her will bear date Sept. 28, 1872, and the proofs show that she was at the time in a low, depressed state of mind, and that she departed this life within one year subsequent to the execution of those instruments. Prior to that, and throughout the whole period subsequent to the death of her husband, the proofs show that she uniformly recognized the complainant as the owner of a moiety of the lot and the improvements, and always required her to pay one-half of all repairs, taxes, insurance, and other expenses of the property.

By the terms of the original deed the property was conveyed to the trustees, subject to the payment of taxes, assessments, and ground-rent, to and for the sole and separate use, benefit, and behoof of the mother and her three sons during her lifetime, and after her death to the three sons as tenants in common in equal parts, with the provision that if the mother during her lifetime should deem it advisable she might sell and convey the premises, and that in that event the further trust was raised and created that the trustees or the survivor of them, upon her application and with her consent signified by becoming a party to the conveyance, might sell and convey the lot and improvements for the best price which could be obtained for the same, without any application to a court of law or equity for that purpose, and to invest the proceeds thereof upon the same trusts in such other property or manner as the mother should direct, and for the same use, benefit, and behalf.

Provision was also made that if no such sale and re-investment was made during the lifetime of the mother, then the trustees were to sell the same for the sole use and benefit of the three sons or the survivor or survivors of them, share and share alike, until the youngest should arrive at the age of twenty-one years, when the trustees might sell and convey the same at the request of such survivor or survivors, and divide the proceeds to the survivor or survivors, share and share alike.

Taken as a whole the proofs show to the entire satisfaction of the court that the lot in question was purchased and conveyed to the surviving trustee upon the same trusts as those raised and created in the first deed, and that the trustee, through mistake, failed to have those trusts properly declared in the deed of trust to him as he should have done, and that the prayer of the bill of complainant, that the deed of the lot and improvements in question ought to be reformed and the rights of the complainant be ascertained and adjudged as if the deed in question contained the same trusts as those raised and created in the original trust deed is reasonable and proper and should be granted.

Courts of equity, beyond all doubt, possess the power to grant such relief, and the proofs, in the judgment of the court, are such as to entitle the complainant to such a decree, unless the remaining defence set up by the respondent must prevail. Cooper v. Phibbs, L. R. 2 Ch. App. 149, 186; Cochrane v. Willis, 34 Beav. 359, 366. Such a decree, of course, cannot now be made against the trustee, as he is not living; but the executors, as contended by the complainant, are competent to perform that duty, and she prays that the decree may be adapted to the present state of the parties.

Suppose all that is true, still it is contended by the principal respondent that the decree below is correct, because the claim is barred. Much discussion of that defence will not be necessary, beyond what is required to ascertain the facts.

When the father died, the complainant was living on the premises, and she continued to reside there most or all the time during the widowhood of the mother of her first husband, except while she lived with her second husband, and when he died she returned to live with her mother-in-law. During all that time the proofs show that she was constantly recognized as the lawful heir to the estate of her deceased husband, until about a year before the decease of the mother, who also resided on the premises. Prior to that, the rights of the complainant were unmistakably recognized, and nothing of consequence had occurred to indicate any intent to call her just right in question. Soon after that, however, the respondent commenced an action of ejectment against her to recover possession of the entire lot and improvements, she still being in possession, and doubtless hoping and expecting that her rights would yet be acknowledged without the necessity of expensive litigation. Expectations of the kind not being realized, she filed the present bill of complaint. Laches are imputed to her; but the court, in view of the circumstances and of the embarrassments growing out of the obvious defects in the conveyance intended to secure her rights, is of the opinion that the evidence of laches is not sufficient to bar her right to recover in the present suit. Without more, these remarks are sufficient to show that the defence cannot be sustained, and it is accordingly overruled.

Two or three remarks will be sufficient to show that the objection that the circuit court has no jurisdiction to enter the required decree against the executors of the deceased trustee cannot be sustained. Jurisdiction as between the complainant and respondent is unquestionable; and, if so, it is clear that the fact that the trustee if living was a citizen of the same state with the complainant would not defeat the jurisdiction in a case where he is a mere nominal party, and is merely joined to perform the ministerial act of conveying the title if adjudged to the complainant. Where that is so, the executor, in case of the decease of the trustee, if authorized by the law of the state to execute such a conveyance, may also be joined in the suit under like circumstances merely to accomplish the like purpose. Where the real and only controversy is between citizens of different states, or an alien and a citizen, and the plaintiff is by some positive rule of law compelled to use the name of another to perform merely a ministerial act, who has not nor ever had any interest in or control over it, the courts of the United States will not consider any others as parties to the suit than the persons between whom the litigation before them exists. McNutt v. Bland, 2 How. 9, 15; Browne v. Strode, 5 Cranch, 303; Coal Company v. Blatchford, 11 Wall. 172, 177.

Cases arise in the federal courts in which nominal or even immaterial parties are joined, on the one side or the other, with those who have the requisite citizenship to give the court jurisdiction in the case; and where that is so, the rule is settled that the mere fact that one or more of such parties reside in the same state with one of the actual parties to the controversy will not defeat the jurisdiction of the court. Decisive authority for that proposition is found in a recent ruling of Mr. Justice Miller, in which he states to the effect that mere formal parties do not oust the jurisdiction of the court, even if they are without the requisite citizenship, where it appears that the real controversy is between citizens of different States. Arapahoe Co. v. Kansas Pac. Ry. Co., 4 Dill. 277, 283, Fed. Cas. No. 502.

Nothing is claimed of the executors in this case except that they shall perform the ministerial act of conveying the title, in case the power to do so is vested in them by the law of the state, and the court shall enter a decree against the principal respondent to that effect. From all which it follows that the complainant is entitled as between herself and the principal respondent to the relief prayed in the bill of complaint; but the court, in view of all the circumstances, will not proceed to determine either the proportion of the trust property which belongs to the complainant or the amount she is entitled to recover of the said respondent. Instead of that, those matters are left to be ascertained and determined by the circuit court, with authority, if need be, to refer the cause to a master to report the facts, with his opinion thereon, subject to the confirmation of the circuit court.

Executors of the trustee, in such a case as the complainant alleges, are under the law of the state the successors of the deceased trustee, and that as such they may execute whatever remains executory in the trust at the time of his decease; from which it would follow, if that be so, that it will be the duty of the executors of the deceased trustee in this case, when the rights of the complainant are fully ascertained, to make the necessary conveyance to perfect her title to the same extent as the trustee might do if in full life. Express authority is reserved to the circuit court to ascertain the rights of the complainant as if the trust-deed was reformed, and to make the necessary decree to perfect her title in such mode and form as the law of the state and the practice of the state courts authorize and provide. Crafton v. Beal, 1 Ga. 322; Brown v. Tucker, 47 Ga. 485.

Costs in this court will be taxed to the principal respondent in favor of the complainant, but no costs will be allowed against the other two respondents.

Decree will be reversed and the cause remanded for further proceedings in conformity with the opinion of the court.

So ordered

METROPOLITAN LUMBER CO. v. LAKE SUPERIOR SHIP-CANAL, RAIL-WAY & IRON CO. et al.

(60 N. W. 278, 101 Mich. 577.)

Supreme Court of Michigan. Sept. 25, 1894.

Appeal from circuit court, Iron county, in chancery; John W. Stone, Judge.

Bill by the Metropolitan Lumber Company against the Lake Superior Ship-Canal, Railway & Iron Company and others. From a decree for complainant, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Ball & Ball, for appellants. Mead & Jennings (E. E. Osborn, of counsel), for appellee.

HOOKER, J. Complainant's bill is filed to correct a contract for the purchase of timber, by adding to it the description of certain lands which is claimed to have been omitted by mistake. The negotiations took place in Chicago, between the presidents of the corporations, complainant and defendant. The contract conveying the timber was subsequently prepared by defendants' counsel in Michigan, and was afterwards signed by the respective parties. Upon discovering the omission, which discovery was made some time after the contract was signed by complainant's president, defendants were asked to correct the mistake, but declined to do so without suit. Some time afterwards this suit was instituted. The learned circuit judge who heard the cause filed a written opinion, in which he quotes the testimony at length, which, we think, is as fair a review of the case as could be made. We agree with him that the evidence shows that the parties who negotiated the deal, both understood that the "Perch Lake Group" of lands was included in the purchase. It appears to have been omitted because defendants' president, Mr. Davis, did not specifically mention it in his telegram of instructions,—if it can be called such,—which he sent to Mr. Longyear, who was agent for the defendants at Marquette, from whom the attorney received the information upon which he prepared the contract. The telegram read as follows, viz.: "Chicago, June 6th, 188—. J. M. Longyear: Have sold to Atkinson all groups under refusal to him; also the Felch group. [Signed] Theo. M. Davis." It appears that complainant had written options on all the land covered by the negotiations, except the Felch group and the Perch lake group. The latter, not being mentioned in the telegram, was omitted. All of the witnesses who were present at the Chicago interview agree that this group was talked about, and specifically mentioned as one of the tracts to be included. Davis himself concedes this, but claims that he was figuring upon the basis of the amount of timber upon the groups, for which the complainant had written options, and that he supposed the Perch lake group was one of these. He admitted, however, that he consented to take $500,000 for the timber, exclusive of the Perch lake group, and that he asked $250,000 for that. As these sums aggregate $750,000,—the exact amount paid,—there seems little doubt of the justice of complainant's claim. We are satisfied that the complainant is justly entitled to relief.

It remains to inquire whether there is any legal obstacle to granting it. It is opposed upon several grounds, viz.: (1) The mistake was not mutual. (2) The mistake on part of complainant was committed through gross negligence, and equity will not relieve in such cases. (3) Delay in attempting to enforce complainant's claim, and going on to carry out the contract after refusal by the defendants to correct the contract, until it was impossible to put the parties in statu quo, constitutes a waiver of complainant's claim. (4) The addition of more land to the description, upon evidence of a parol contract, is contrary to the statute of frauds. We are satisfied that the omission was the result of the mistake of defendant's president in sending the telegram, supposing it to be full enough to cover the Perch lake group. There is no reason to believe that he intentionally caused this omission. We cannot accede to the proposition that complainant's president was so negligent in executing the contract without discovering the omission as to deprive the complainant of property worth $250,000. He had no reason to anticipate an attempt to cheat his company, and therefore had no occasion to be more than ordinarily careful. He was dealing with a concern whose business was methodically conducted, and he knew that it was in possession of accurate descriptions. The contract was drawn by a reputable and able lawyer. To hold that he was negligent would be to say that acceptance of a deed or writing without a comparison and verification of descriptions is such negligence as to preclude relief against mistake, no matter how serious the consequences. Atkinson died before these proceedings were commenced, and we have not the light that his testimony might throw upon the question of caution. From the testimony of Mr. Barrett, one of the defendants' witnesses, it would seem that he took the trouble to bring the contract to defendants' office, to make a comparison of the descriptions, which was done, and he went away satisfied. During this time he was ill, with a malady from which he died soon after. The claim that a mistake had been made was asserted as soon as it was discovered, and was insisted on at all times afterwards. It is true that suit was not immediately commenced, but complainant never gave the defendants reason to suppose that it had abandoned or intended to waive its claim. No injury resulted to the defendants from the delay, and the complainant was justified in exhausting persuasion, before resorting to litigation, especially in view of Davis' repeated admission that he understood the Perch lake land a part of that contract. It is strenuously urged that the statutes of frauds preclude the relief sought by complainant, the negotiations having been oral. There is conflict in the books upon the question of the effect of the statute of frauds upon the jurisdiction of courts of equity to reform instruments made in pursuance of oral agreements, where the correction sought is the addition of lands to those described. We are cited to the case of Macomber v. Peckham, 16 R. I. 485, 19 Atl. 910, as a recent adjudication upon the subject, and to Climer v. Hovey, 15 Mich. 18, in support of defendants' contention. In the former case the court was careful to withhold an opinion beyond what was required by the facts before it. In stating the facts, Durfee, C. J., says: "Nor is it a case in which it is claimed that the contract is taken out of the operation of the statute of frauds by part performance on the part of the complainant. It presents the naked question whether oral testimony will be received in equity for the purpose of reforming a written contract for the sale of real estate on the ground of mutual mistake, and of enforcing it specifically when reformed." Opposed to this case is that of Hitchins v. Pettingill, 58 N. H. 386, decided 11 years earlier by the supreme court of the state of New Hampshire, which was not noticed by the Rhode Island court. It was there held that "when reformation is sought of a deed which, through fraud or mistake, conveys less land than was orally bought, and paid for, the case does not stand as if there were no deed; and the error may be corrected without proof of such part performance as is necessary for a decree of specific performance compelling a conveyance of the whole land when no part of it has been conveyed." Many cases are cited in the opinion as supporting this proposition. This subject is also thoroughly considered in the notes to Woollam v. Hearn, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas.

Eq. 1008 et seq. The case of Climer v. Hovey, 15 Mich. 18, like the Rhode Island case, was one where the parties had not acted under the contract. In the language of Campbell, J.: "No payments are alleged, and no acts of part performance. We are therefore brought down to the simple inquiry whether mere mistake, when neither party has parted with or done anything beyond signing an executory contract for one description of land, can authorize a court of chancery to enforce a parol contract by applying the terms written concerning one estate to another not referred to in writing." The bill was dismissed, Mr. Justice Campbell basing his opinion upon the fact that nothing had been done under the contract, and that it was therefore within the operation of the statute of frauds. Chief Justice Martin concurred in the result. Mr. Justice Cooley reserved his opinion as to the power of the court to correct a mistake in a suit to enforce it, concurring upon other grounds, and with him Mr. Justice Christiancy concurred. But, whatever may be the rule where nothing has been done under the oral contract, we think that in this country the overwhelming weight of authority supports the jurisdiction where part performance is shown sufficient to warrant a specific performance under an oral contract. In this case a payment was made, and the purchaser proceeded to lumber the tracts not in dispute, before the omission was discovered, as was the case in Hitchins v. Pettingill, above cited. The case of Toll v. Davenport, 74 Mich. 397, 42 N. W. 63, appears to recognize the jurisdiction of chancery in such cases, when a parcel was omitted from a mortgage, relief being denied, for the reason that the rights of a bona fide purchaser intervened. In the later case of Kimble v. Harrington, 91 Mich. 281, 51 N. W. 936, a mortgage was reformed by the insertion of the description of a 40-acre parcel a mile distant, which was omitted by mistake. The decree of the circuit court will be affirmed, with costs. The other justices concurred.

HITCHINS v. PETTINGILL.

(58 N. H. 386.)

Supreme Court of New Hampshire. August, 1878.

Wiggin & Fernald and Mr. Hobbs, for plaintiffs. Mr. Bartlett, for defendants.

FOSTER, J. When reformation is sought of a deed which, through fraud or mistake, conveyed less land than was orally bought and paid for, the case does not stand as if there were no deed; and the error may be corrected without proof of such part performance as is necessary for a decree of specific performance compelling a conveyance of the whole land when no part of it has been conveyed. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 152-161; Adams, Eq. 169, 171; 3 Greenl. Ev. §§ 360, 363; Bloomer v. Spittle, Fisher, Ann. Dig. (1872) 131; Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385, 392; Purcell v. Miner, 4 Wall. 513; Prescott v. Hawkins, 12 N. H. 19, 28, 16 N. H. 122; Way v. Cutting, 17 N. H. 450, 451; Bellows v. Stone, 14 N. H. 175, 201; Smith v. Greeley, 14 N. H. 378; Craig v. Kittredge, 23 N. H. 231, 236; Busby v. Littlefield, 31 N. H. 193, 199, 33 N. H. 76; Webster v. Webster, 33 N. H. 18, 22, 23, 25; Doe v. Doe, 37 N. H. 268, 285; Herbert v. Odlin, 40 N. H. 267; Brown v. Glines, 42 N. H. 160; Kennard v. George, 44 N. H. 440; Leach v. Noyes, 45 N. H. 364; Peterson v. Grover, 20 Me. 363; Farley v. Bryant, 32 Me. 475; Tucker v. Madden, 44 Me. 206; Adams v. Stevens, 49 Me. 362; Burr v. Hutchinson, 61 Me. 514; Beardsley v. Knight, 10 Vt. 185, 190; Griswold v. Smith, 10 Vt. 452; Goodell v. Field, 15 Vt. 448; Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vt. 414; Brown v. Lamphear, 35 Vt. 252; Shattuck v. Gay, 45 Vt. 87; Allen v. Brown, 6 R. I. 386; Holabird v. Burr, 17 Conn. 556; Wooden v. Haviland, 18 Conn. 101; Stedwell v. Anderson, 21 Conn. 139; Knapp v. White, 23 Conn. 529; Blakeman v. Blakeman, 39 Conn. 320; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585; Wiswall v. Hall, 3 Paige, 313; Johnson v. Taber, 10 N. Y. 319; De Peyster v. Hasbrouck, 11 N. Y. 582; Rider v. Powell, 28 N. Y. 310; Welles v. Yates, 44 N. Y. 525; Bush v. Hicks, 60 N. Y. 298; Ginschio v. Ley, 1 Phila. 383; Bartle v. Vosbury, 3 Grant, Cas. 277; Wyche v. Greene, 16 Ga. 49; Durant v. Bacot, 13 N. J. Eq. 201; Weller v. Rolason, 17 N. J. Eq. 13; Ehleringer v. Moriarty, 10 Iowa, 78; Barber v. Lyon, 15 Iowa, 37; Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373; Metcalf v. Putnam, 9 Allen, 97, 100.

In the last of these cases, Bigelow, J., delivering the opinion, says: "Upon elementary principles, the plaintiff is entitled to have his deed reformed so that it may truly set forth the whole contract. * * * Upon proof of fraud in the omission of material stipulations in a written contract, a court of equity will admit parol evidence to establish the agreement, as it was understood and concluded between the parties." The defendants rely upon Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24, where the doctrine of reformation of written contracts was subjected to a limitation at variance with the settled law of this state.

A court cannot disregard a valid statute, nor regard it with favor or disfavor, nor take out of its operation a case that is within it, nor grant relief, at law or in equity, against it. The judicial question is, What purpose of the legislature appears in its acts, upon the established rules of construction? "No action shall be maintained upon a contract for the sale of land, unless the agreement upon which it is brought, or some memorandum thereof, is in writing." Gen. St. c. 201, § 12. "The supreme court shall have the powers of a court of equity in cases cognizable in such court, and may hear and determine, according to the course of equity, in case of charitable uses, trusts, fraud, accident, or mistake; * * * of specific performance of contracts; * * * and in all other cases where there is not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law." Gen. St. c. 190, § 1. These provisions, though printed in different chapters, are consistent parts of one law. We are not to give either of them a strained construction, liberal or strict, for the special purpose of justice in a particular case, or for the general purpose of making the law what in our judgment it ought to be. The meaning of one act may be shown by other acts. There may be several acts, neither of which can be properly administered in a particular case, except as part of one law comprising them all. It may be necessary to consider one statute on any subject a part of the whole law, statutory and common, on that subject, as it is necessary to consider one section or word of a statute a part of that statute. The statute of frauds, severed from all other law, written and unwritten, and taken in its literal sense, would deny these plaintiffs the relief of specific performance, even if they had taken possession of the ten-acre lot and made valuable improvements upon it, and would leave people remediless in a great number of cases of fraud, accident, or mistake, for which ample remedies are provided by the statute of equity jurisdiction; and the latter statute, torn from the general body of the law, taken literally, and administered as if there were no other law, would deprive the community of safeguards which the statute of frauds and the common law were designed to afford, and which the statute of equity was not designed to take away. The well-known general objects of these statutes are the principal guides for their construction. The statute of equity authorizes this court to administer the legal principles of the general system of equity, which, as a great branch of the law of their native country, was brought over by the colonists, and has always existed as a part of the common law, in its broadest sense, in New Hampshire. Wells v. Pierce, 27 N.

H. 503, 512; Walker v. Cheever, 35 N. H. 339, 349. The statute of frauds prevents wrong being done in certain cases by the testimony of witnesses.

If, without written evidence of a contract for the sale of land, the vendee pays for the land, and, with the knowledge and consent of the vendor, takes possession of it, and makes valuable improvements upon it, he is entitled to the relief of specific performance. Upon the literal construction of the statute of frauds there could not be a decree for specific performance in such a case, and there could not be, by parol evidence, a reformation of a deed enlarging its operation; but the statute, rightly construed, does not destroy either of these remedies, as the statute of limitations does not destroy the remedy in cases of fraudulent concealment of the cause of action (Bank v. Fairbanks, 49 N. H. 131, 141), as the registry laws do not destroy the effect of actual notice of an unrecorded deed (Gooding v. Riley, 50 N. H. 400), and as the statute of frauds does not disturb a boundary fixed by parol agreement and possession (Kellogg v. Smith, 7 Cush. 375; Knowles v. Toothaker, 58 Me. 172).

The plaintiffs are entitled to a decree for a conveyance of the ten-acre lot.

Case discharged.

STANLEY, J., did not sit.

HUNTER v. BILYEU et al.

(30 Ill. 228.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. Term, 1863.

W. H. Herndon, and S. P. Moore, for appellant. J. & D. Gillespie, for appellees.

BREESE, J. John B. Hunter, as administrator of Samuel W. Hunter, deceased, brought his action in the circuit court of Bond county, against Wesley A. and Finis Bilyeu, on a note executed by them to the intestate, dated March 30, 1850, and due March 30, 1855. Pending the action the defendants obtained an injunction on their bill of complaint, to which the administrator, and the heirs-at-law of the intestate, who were minors, and their guardian, together with Joseph Smith, were made defendants.

The bill alleges, that the note sued upon, together with others which were paid, was one and the last of a number of notes they had executed to the intestate, for certain lands lying in Bond county, for which a bond for a deed was executed and delivered to them by the intestate. That they were put into possession of the lands, and made lasting and valuable improvements on some of the tracts, but have discovered that one or more tracts, which they supposed they had bought, were not included in the bond. One of those tracts is described as "the old field tract" lying south-east of Shoal creek, and being part of the west half of the north-west quarter of section twenty-three, in town five north, range four west, containing forty and nineteen-hundredths acres; and the other, the "Gillespie tract," being the east half of the north-west quarter of the north-east quarter of the same section, township and range, containing twenty acres; the undivided half of both which tracts, the complainants allege, was purchased by them of the intestate, and was to have been included in the title bond, but by mistake was left out, and these tracts subsequently sold by the intestate to Joseph Smith.

The bill also alleges, that some time anterior to the commencement of this suit on the note, the administrator had filed a petition in the circuit court, at the September term, 1855, praying the court for an order to authorize him to make a deed to complainants for the land described in the bond; that this petition contained the same errors and mistakes as are now complained of, with another error superadded in describing the lands as being in section "twenty-five." The complainants admit they were made defendants, and had due notice of the pending of the petition, but they did not appear to defend, supposing the lands were described as in the bond, and their being made defendants was a mere ceremony, and the proceedings consistent with their rights. That these errors and mistakes were carried into the decree rendered on this petition, and in the deed which the administrator tendered to them, and by them refused. No exhibit is made of these proceedings or of this deed.

The title bond is alleged to have been written by the intestate, and delivered to the complainants and accepted by them without any objection, on the 30th of March, 1850. In the following year, 1851, the intestate left the state, and in 1852 died, leaving these infant defendants his only heirs at law.

The prayer of the bill is, that the court would order and direct the defendants to convey to complainants all of the land agreed to be conveyed to them by the intestate, and to annul and hold for naught the order of the circuit court in behalf of the administrator, or to amend and correct the decree so as to comport with justice and good conscience, and perpetually enjoin the collection of the note sued on, until they are able to comply with the understanding of Samuel W. Hunter, the intestate.

The bond is made an exhibit, and describes the lands sold, and to be conveyed on payment of the purchase money. They are: "The undivided half of a certain lot, beginning at the south corner of the south-west quarter of section 14, town 5 north, of range 4 west of the third principal meridian; thence running north fifty poles; thence west to the middle of the channel of Shoal creek; thence down the channel of Shoal creek, to the section line; thence east to the beginning corner, containing thirty-eight acres, more or less. Also, the undivided half of so much of the west half of the north-west quarter of section 23, town 5 north, range 4 west of the third principal meridian, lying on the west side of Shoal creek. Also, twenty poles south from the creek on the east line of said half; thence west to said creek; thence up said creek to the beginning. Also, the undivided half of twelve acres, more or less, of the south-west quarter, town 4 west of the third principal meridian, commencing at the south-west corner of said section; thence north fifty; thence east to the middle of the channel of Shoal creek; thence down said creek to the section line; thence west to the beginning. Also, two acres and a half of the west half of the north-west quarter of section 23, in same township and range, commencing at a stake on the east line of said land at the south-east corner of the mile post; thence south twenty poles; thence west twenty poles; thence north twenty poles; thence east twenty poles, to the beginning." This last tract was in a separate bond to Finis Bilyeu, one of the complainants, made at the same time and on the same conditions, as the bond to complainants jointly, and for convenience, no question being made on it, both bonds are considered as one.

There is a slight apparent ambiguity in the description of the undivided half of twelve acres, which is explained by the plat sworn to by the witnesses, and is the tract on the west side of the creek, contained within the

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—16

Digitized by

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

Original from

CORNELL UNIVERSITY

north and south lines of the tract of thirty-eight acres, if extended west to the section line. There is no dispute about this tract. The tract described as "also twenty poles south from the creek on the east line of said half; thence west to said creek; thence up said creek to the beginning," is understood to describe the mill yard, having the shape of a rectangular triangle, the south line being the perpendicular, the west line the base, and the creek the hypotenuse. About this tract there is no dispute.

The administrator demurred to the bill, which was afterwards withdrawn, and his answer filed, not admitting the mistake alleged, to which there was a replication. At a subsequent term, he also filed a plea of the statute of frauds and perjuries. Smith also answered, denying any knowledge when he purchased, of any sale of the tract south-east of Shoal creek, in section twenty-three. On the hearing, the bill was dismissed as to him.

Much testimony was introduced on behalf of complainants, for the purpose of showing by the declarations of the intestate, that an undivided half of other tracts besides these, namely, the tracts known as the "old field" tract, sold to Smith, and the "Gillespie" tract, were bargained for and sold, but, for some cause not fully explained, omitted from the title bond.

The lasting and valuable improvements were made by complainants on other tracts, about which there is no dispute.

The bill is, in effect, a bill to reform by parol, this title bond by incorporating into it the part lying south-east of the creek, called the "old field" tract, and the "Gillespie" tract, and when reformed, to decree a specific performance. The contract must be reformed before such a decree can pass.

This presents a question which has been much discussed in the courts of this country and of England, and on which there is great contrariety of opinion.

The question is, in a bill to reform a written instrument, in the absence of any allegation or proof of fraud, and on the ground of accident and mistake alone, is parol evidence admissible to prove an agreement to do something further than is contained in the writing, the statutes of frauds and perjuries being relied on in the defense, and which that statute requires to be proved by writing?

Whilst in England, the weight of adjudications seems to be opposed to the admission of parol evidence, in this country, it appears to be the other way. One of the leading cases in England, is that of Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. 211. It is prominent among the Leading Cases of White & Tudor (pt. 1, vol. 2), with copious notes by Hare & Wallace, 510.

In this case the bill filed by Wm. Woollam against Hearn, stated that the rent of seventy-three pounds ten shillings was inserted in the written lease by mistake, or with some unfair view; the real agreement being that the plaintiff was to have the lease upon the same rent as the defendant paid to his lessor, and that he did not pay more than sixty pounds. The prayer was for a specific performance, and that the defendant may be decreed to execute a lease according to the agreement, at the rent of sixty pounds, or such other rent as the defendant paid his lessor. The defendant, in his answer, denied that seventy-three pounds ten shillings was inserted by mistake, or with any unfair view; or that the agreement was that the plaintiff should pay the same rent as the defendant paid, which he admitted was sixty-three pounds. The bill was proved by depositions.

Sir Wm. Grant, M. R., said: "By the rule of law, independent of the statute (of frauds and perjuries), parol evidence cannot be received to contradict a written agreement. To admit it, for the purpose of proving that the written instrument does not contain the real agreement, would be the same as receiving it for every purpose. It was for the purpose of shutting out that inquiry, that the rule of law was adopted. When equity is called upon to exercise its peculiar jurisdiction by decreeing a specific performance, the party to be charged is let in to show, that, under the circumstances, the plaintiff is not entitled to have the agreement specifically performed; and there are many cases in which parol evidence of such circumstances has been admitted, as in Buxton v. Lister, 3 Atk. 383. There on the face of the instrument, a specific sum was to be given for the timbers, but it was shown, by parol, that the defendants were induced to give that, upon the representation that it was valued by two timber merchants which was not true. If this had been a bill brought by this defendant for a specific performance, I should have been bound by the decisions to admit the parol evidence, and to refuse a specific performance. But this evidence is offered, not for the purpose of resisting, but of obtaining a decree, first to falsify the written agreement, and then to substitute in its place a parol agreement to be executed by the court. There is no case in which the court has gone the length now desired. The evidence offered is to vary an agreement in a material part, and having varied it, to procure it to be executed in another form. There is nothing to show that ought to be done; and my opinion being that it ought not, I must dismiss the bill."

In the case of Rogers v. Earl, 1 Dickson, 294, which was a bill to rectify a mistake of the solicitor in drawing a marriage settlement; in Thomas v. Davis, Id. 301, to rectify a mistake in a conveyance by the omission of one of the parcels of land intended to be conveyed; in Sims v. Urry, 1 Ch. Cas. 225, to prove a mistake in the penal sum of a bond, by writing it forty instead of four hundred pounds,—verbal evidence was admitted.

In Hardwood v. Wallace, cited in Targus v.

Puget, 2 Ves. Sr. 195, where it was proposed to prove a mistake in drawing a settlement; and in Attorney General v. Sitwell, 1 Young & C. 559, etc., where it was proposed to show, by parol, that in a contract with the crown for the sale of a certain manor, with the appurtenances, the advowson was omitted by mistake,—such evidence was rejected, or deemed inadmissible. In this case Baron Alderson said: "I cannot help feeling that in the case of an executory agreement, first to reform and then to decree an execution of it, would be, virtually, to repeal the statute of frauds."

In cases within the statute of frauds, verbal evidence was held inadmissible, as in Dwight v. Pomeroy, 17 Mass. 303, where the plaintiff, being creditor of an insolvent debtor who had executed a deed of assignment in trust, for the benefit of his creditors, filed his bill against the trustees to reform an alleged mistake in the trusts expressed in the deed. And in Elder v. Elder, 10 Me. 80, where the written agreement was for the conveyance of a lot of land in Windham, formerly owned by J. E., and the plaintiff proposed to prove by parol that it was intended to include the adjoining land in Westbrook, under the same ownership, but that this was omitted by mistake. In Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63, an agreement for the sale of land was drawn in two separate instruments, one to be signed by the vendor, and the other by the purchaser, and neither of the instruments contained any reference to the other, but each was signed by the wrong party by mistake. This the plaintiff sought to prove by parol evidence, but the court held it inadmissible.

In other American cases, such evidence has been held admissible. In Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585, which was a bill for relief and for the reconveyance of a tract of land, which had been included by mistake or fraud in a deed of conveyance, verbal evidence of the mistake, on a review of all the cases, was admitted, and a reconveyance decreed. In Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385, where tenants in common agreed to make partition pursuant to a verbal award, and executed deeds accordingly; but, in the deed to the plaintiff, a parcel assigned to him was omitted by mistake; in a bill for relief, verbal evidence was held admissible, and relief thereupon decreed. So in Langdon v. Keith, 9 Vern. 299, where upon the transfer of a part of several promissory notes, secured by mortgage, an assignment of the mortgagee's entire interest in the mortgage was made, by mistake, instead of a part, relief was decreed upon verbal proof. In De Riemer v. Cantillon, 4 Johns. Ch. 85, where a portion of the land purchased at sheriff's sale was by mistake omitted in his deed to the purchaser, upon parol evidence of the fact the judgment debtors were decreed to convey to the purchaser the omitted parcel. Several other cases are referred to in this note.

It does not appear that the statute of frauds and perjuries was pleaded in any of these cases, though referred to in the argument, and in the opinion of the court.

In Woollam v. Hearn, and in many of the cases referred to in Hare & Williams' notes to that case, a distinction is made between seeking and resisting specific performance, as to the admission of evidence. It is said, though a defendant resisting a specific performance, may go into parol evidence to show that by fraud the written agreement does not express the real terms, a plaintiff cannot do so for the purpose of reforming the agreement and obtaining a specific performance of it as reformed.

This doctrine is critically examined in Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585, before cited. In that case the bill was filed to rectify a mistake in the conveyance which, by an error in the description of the land, conveyed the whole lot, or two hundred and fifty acres, instead of two hundred acres, parcel of the same.

The mistake is positively denied in the answer, and the point was, is parol proof of this mistake admissible, in opposition to the plain language of the deed, and especially in opposition to the defendant's answer?

It will be seen the statute of frauds and perjuries was not set up in the case.

After entering minutely into the parol proof of the fact of the mistake, Chancellor Kent says: "The rule in courts of law is, that the written instrument does, in contemplation of law, contain the true agreement of the parties, and that the writing furnishes better evidence of the sense of the parties, than any that can be supplied by parol. But equity has a broader jurisdiction, and will open the written contract to let in an equity arising from facts perfectly distinct from the sense and construction of the instrument itself. I have looked into most, if not all the cases on this branch of equity jurisdiction, and it appears to me to be established on great and essential grounds of justice, that relief can be had against any deed or contract in writing, founded in mistake or fraud. The mistake may be shown by parol proof, and the relief granted to the injured party, whether he sets up the mistake affirmatively by bill, or as a defense."

After reviewing many of the decisions on this question, the chancellor decides that parol proof was admissible, and that it established the mistake as charged in the bill.

It will be observed, the contract in this case was an executed contract, a deed of conveyance having been made; there was no prayer for a specific performance of a contract, but to correct a mistake in the deed. The chancellor remarks: "Whether such proof be admissible on the part of a plaintiff, who seeks a specific performance of an agreement in writing, and at the same time seeks to vary it by parol proof, has been made a question. Lord Hardwicke, in Jacques v. Statham, 3 Atk. 388, seemed to think it might be done, but such proof was rejected in Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. 211 (which we have cited at length); and in Higginson v. Clowes, 15 Ves. 516; and when Lord Redesdale said, in Clinan v. Cooke, 1 Schoales & L. 39, that he could find no decision in which a plaintiff had been permitted to show an omission in a written agreement, by mistake or fraud, he must be understood to refer to the cases of bills for a specific performance of an agreement, which was the case then before him."

This case would seem to decide nothing more than this: that in a bill to correct a mistake in an executed contract, parol proof of the mistake is admissible, and that such proof is as available for one party, or for one purpose, as for another,—as available for the plaintiff in setting up a claim, as for the defendant in resisting it. It is nowhere said, that a bill to reform an executory contract, and then decree a specific performance when reformed, against a denial, in the answer, of any mistake, and the plea of the statute of frauds and perjuries, can be sustained by parol evidence.

This decision, so far as it goes, has been followed by the courts of many other states. The cases are referred to by Hare & Wallace, on pages 539, 540, but in none of them was the denial in the answer accompanied by a plea of the statute of frauds and perjuries. Nor do these cases go farther than to assert the general principle, that independent of this statute, where it is not set up as a defense, parol evidence will be received to correct an alleged mistake in a written executed contract, when asserted by a plaintiff, and is as available for him, as for defendant.

The cases go to the extent of declaring, that parol evidence shall be admissible to correct a writing as well for a plaintiff as against him, thus establishing mutuality and equality in the operation of the doctrine.

In 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 161, in commenting on the distinction set up, the learned author says, in a note, that it is of a very artificial character, and difficult to be reconciled with the general principles of courts of equity. He says: "The ground is very clear, that a court of equity ought not to enforce a contract, when there is a mistake, against the defendant insisting upon and establishing the mistake; for it would be inequitable and unconscientious. And if the mistake is vital to the contract, there is a like clear ground, why equity should interfere at the instance of the party as plaintiff, and cancel it; and if the mistake is partial only, why, at his instance, it should reform it. In these cases, the remedial practice is equal; and the parol evidence to establish it, is equally open to both parties to use as proof. Why should not the party aggrieved by a mistake in an agreement, have relief in all cases when he is plaintiff, as well as when he is defendant? If the doctrine be founded upon the impropriety of admitting parol evidence to contradict a written agreement, that rule is not more broken in upon by the admission of it for the plaintiff than it is by the admission of it for the defendant. If the doctrine had been confined to cases arising under the statute of frauds, it would, if not more intelligible, at least have been less inconvenient in practice."

In a subsequent case,—Keisselbrack v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. 145,—which was a bill for the specific performance of an agreement in writing to execute a lease for lives "containing the usual clauses, restrictions and reservations contained in the leases given by defendant," the bill stated that a lease was offered, containing a provision that upon every sale of the demised premises, one-fifth of the purchase or consideration money should be taken by the defendant to his own use, which complainant refused to receive, alleging, that at the time of the execution of the writing, it was agreed no such quarter or fifth sales should be demanded or paid.

The defendant did not, in direct and clear terms, deny any such agreement, but denied any other or different contract than the one set forth made in writing, and as to the validity of the supposed verbal agreement, he pleaded the statute of frauds.

The point in the case was, whether this verbal agreement could be established by parol. The learned chancellor says, it did not appear to him, that the statute of frauds had any bearing on the case. "The agreement for the three life lease is in writing, and it has been partly performed, by possession taken and transferred, and rent paid. The right of the plaintiff rests upon the contract in writing, and the only inquiry is, whether there is not a mistake in the generality of the expression, that the lease was to contain the 'usual clause,' etc., and whether the parties did not intend an exception in respect to the quarter sales. There is no doubt of their declared intention to make such an exception at the time the agreement was drawn; and I am inclined to think that the writing is, and ought to be, susceptible of amendment and correction in that particular."

The proof was admitted, and the mistake corrected, partly upon the ground, that the writing itself let in parol proof, to show which were "the usual clauses," etc., and such proof being let in by the contract itself, it might, on the principle of the agreement itself, be applied to correct any mistake manifestly shown to exist, in the general and unqualified terms of that part of the written agreement which depended for its explanation upon external proof.

This court has held, as a general proposition, that the terms of a written agreement cannot be changed by parol. Baker v. Whiteside, Breese, 132; Penny v. Graves, 12 Ill. 298. And so it is held by all courts. At the same time, we have said, that whatever covenants an absolute deed may contain, parol evidence may be admitted to show that it was intended as a mortgage, or mere security for the payment of the debt, and the grantor can have relief in equity, and this, where mistake is not alleged. Purviance v. Holt, 3 Gilman, 405; Ferguson v. Sutphen, Id. 547. And it is also held, in Harlow v. Boswell, 15 Ill. 57, where parties commit their contracts to writing, this forms the only evidence of its terms.

In Scott v. Bennet, 3 Gilman, 254, this court said, it is a familiar principle that you may give evidence to explain, but not to vary, add to, or alter a written contract. Courts cannot make a new contract for the parties. But if there is doubt and uncertainty, not about what the substance of the contract is, but as to its particular application, it may be explained, and properly directed.

As a general principle, where a contract is reduced to writing, the writing affords the only evidence of the terms and conditions of the contract; all antecedent and contemporaneous verbal agreements are merged in the written contract.

There is an apparent contradiction in these several opinions, but we think a few familiar considerations will serve to reconcile them, or show that it is not real. The subjects peculiarly proper for the jurisdiction of courts of equity, are well understood to be, fraud, trusts, accident and mistake, and these courts are vested with the power to afford relief in all cases, wherein, by reason of the universality and rigor of the rules of the common law, a remedy cannot otherwise be had. The power to correct a mistake in a writing, is as much within the scope of this jurisdiction as any other mistake. The whole realm of mistake is laid open to the court, and its powers are limitless to correct, on a proper case made. That it should be dormant, when invoked to correct a mistake in a written contract, would be strange indeed. It is no answer to say, that within the rigid rule of law, the power may be exercised, but not outside of it, as that would destroy the rule. In our judgment, it has no such effect. The jurisdiction of a court of chancery to correct mistakes, is no less important to the due administration of justice, and the safety of the citizen, than the rule of the common law, that parol evidence cannot be received to add to, or vary a written contract, and in a court of equity, it must be determined, on the circumstances of each case, which shall prevail, the exercise of an unquestioned power of the court, or the rule of the common law.

The doctrine is undisputed and incontestable, that a deed, absolute on its face, may be shown, by parol, to have been intended by the parties to it, as conditional, merely, and a court of equity, on proper proof, will so hold. This contract is explained by parol evidence, and if it is made to speak a language its words do not import, who will deny that it is within the competency of that court to ascertain the real contract of the parties, and then enforce it, according to the intention of the parties? If a court of equity has not the power to correct mistakes in a deed, or other writing, on convincing proof of the existence of the alleged mistake, great injustice would be perpetrated with impunity. A man sells a vacant lot adjoining the lot on which he has a costly residence, but by the mistake of the scrivener, the deed describes the lot of his residence. An ejectment is brought—the purchaser claiming under his deed—and if no power exists in a court of equity to correct the mistake, he must surrender that which he never sold, and the purchaser recover a property he never bought. A court of chancery should not hesitate to receive parol evidence of this mistake, and on sufficient proof, correct it, else the most flagrant injustice would be perpetrated, and an undoubted power of that court be rendered ineffectual and worthless. There can be no danger in exercising this power, since the court has before it all the facts, and if they are not convincing, the stern rule of law will prevail.

The court has, in many cases, acknowledged and exercised this power, and we do not know that it has been questioned by the bar here or elsewhere.

The doctrine is fully recognized in the case of Broadwell v. Broadwell, 1 Gilman, 599, that a court of chancery will always correct any mistakes of fact which have occurred in drawing up a paper, when a proper case is presented and clearly proved, and then carry into effect the instrument when thus corrected. And herein is found the safeguard for those so litigating, a proper case must be presented and clearly proved. If it be clearly proved, who shall say that a court of equity transcends its powers, or violates the rule of law, in declaring the contract to be as the parties have made it? We cannot think the statute of frauds and perjuries has any application to such cases.

Here the bill is filed to reform this contract, by inserting in it several tracts of land, alleged to have been omitted from it by mistake, and parol evidence is relied on for such purpose; and when reformed, then the prayer is, to decree a specific performance of the contract. This proof makes the contract different from what its words import, and adds to it, and varies it very materially. It, in fact, makes a new and different contract; yet if the mistake is clearly established, which should give way, that rigid rule of the common law, or that power residing in a court of equity, to correct mistakes? The strongest and most convincing evidence will be required, before the common law rule is postponed, and the power of the court exercised. Now, what is the testimony in this case?

It consists, in great part, of loose conversations held by one Gillespie and others, with the intestate, in which he said, there was a mistake in the bond; that the tract lying south-east of Shoal creek, being part of the west half of the north-west [quarter] of [section] twenty-three was not in the bond, or not in right, and the Bilyeus had found it out. This witness states nothing in positive terms, but "thinks" the facts were so and so, as he details them. He "thinks" all the lands claimed by complainants were included in the bond, except the Gillespie tract, and thinks that intestate told him some of the numbers were wrong, and some of the land was not named in the bond. He spoke of the west half of the north-west [quarter of section] twenty-three lying south-east of Shoal creek, as not included in the bond, and that he would not rectify the mistake because they could not agree upon a division of the lands according to his understanding of the contract. This witness says that he can neither read nor write, and details only such parts of the conversation, as he "thinks" was had with the intestate. He does not say in positive terms, that the intestate admitted to him he had sold this tract to complainants, or that it was left out of the bond by mistake. No testimony could be more unsatisfactory than his, taking the whole of it together. Fenton says he "thinks" Hunter told him he drew the bond himself and that there was a mistake in it, but does not recollect what the mistake was. He says it was his understanding a bond was given by Hunter to complainants, and notes given for the payment of the money—does not say he ever saw the bond or notes—says the complainants never took possession of the Gillespie tract—on the tract south-east of the creek; they cut some timber off, put a blacksmith shop upon, and pastured the field on it while they and Hunter were in partnership; there was some money paid on the general contract, but don't know how much.

Paine states that Hunter told him complainants were to have half of this tract, when he, Hunter, sold or left, according to the contract as made with complainants, in the sale of the mill, which was in 1850. He had this conversation in the winter after the sale of the mill property; that complainants have cut and hauled saw logs, and Hunter and complainants built a blacksmith shop on this land; and "thinks" complainants repaired the fences some, but is not certain, and they used it as a pasture in connection with Hunter. Hunter also said he had sold the Gillespie tract to them, and that David Hunter was to make a deed to it. Don't know that complainants ever exercised any acts of ownership over this tract. Hunter said there was a mistake in the bond, and if his health would permit, he was coming to town to get it fixed; "thinks" the mistake applied to the tract south-east of Shoal creek, on which there was an old field. Does not know of complainants exercising any acts of ownership over this "old field tract," since they and Hunter dissolved partnership; don't know the numbers of the land.

The testimony of Clouse, and of L. G. Bil-

yeu, does not differ, substantially, from that of other witnesses.

Smith says, Hunter told him, that all the lands the complainants were to get, were included in the bonds; that half of the timber on the tract lying on the south-east side of Shoal creek, on which there was an old field, was included in the contract with complainants, and that they had got their share off, and that he had not sold the land to them. Wesley Bilyeu had stated to witness that he had an interest in this tract, and Hunter then told him as above stated. Hunter had possession of this tract when witness bought it, and had corn standing in the field on it. George Smith stated that Hunter told him that complainants had no right to the tract lying south-east of Shoal creek, but as soon as he could buy a piece from John Clouse, he would make it right, but they were to have it when he sold or left; understood this same tract was included in the original contract.

This is the substance of the evidence to prove the mistake in the bond, and part performance, which, it is very clear, is wholly insufficient for either purpose. It would be relaxing too much those salutary rules of evidence, which require a contract to be clearly proved, before a specific performance of it will be decreed. It is discretionary with the court, in all such cases, to decree or not a specific performance of a contract, and that discretion will not be exercised except in a very clear case.

This contract was made in March, 1850, and the intestate remained in the state until 1851, during a part of which time he was in partnership with complainants, in using the mill property. They paid their notes as they became due, and not a word of complaint is heard of any mistake. They were impleaded, by the administrator of the intestate, in a petition in chancery, for the purpose of obtaining an order of court, authorizing him to make a deed to them in performance of the covenant; in which suit, it was fully competent for the complainants to have litigated all these matters, but which they neglected to do. Though these proceedings are not pleaded, or set up in bar by the defendants, they might have been, successfully, and the case thus disposed of, rendering unnecessary the examination we have been compelled to give it on the issues made.

We are satisfied nothing has been shown to establish a mistake, its nature, or extent, so clearly, as to leave no doubt on the mind of the actual existence of the alleged mistake. The decree, as to the old field tract, being a part of the west half of the north-west quarter of section twenty-three, lying north-east of Shoal creek, and as to the Gillespie tract, is reversed, and the decree so modified as to exempt those tracts from its operation. The injunction will be dissolved, and the administrator, the appellant here, will be allowed to proceed with his action at law.

Decree modified.

GLASS v. HULBERT.

(102 Mass. 24.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Sept. Term, 1869.

Bill in equity for the reformation of a conveyance of lands, and for further relief. The case was reserved by the chief justice "for the consideration and decision of the full court upon the question whether, upon the allegations of the bill, the plaintiff is entitled to relief in equity, and whether the plaintiff has not a full, adequate, and complete remedy at law; the defendant also relying in his answer upon the statute of frauds."

W. H. Swift and S. W. Bowerman, for plaintiff. M. Wilcox and W. T. Filley, for defendant.

WELLS, J. The plaintiff purchased certain lots of land of the defendant, received a deed, and paid the whole amount of the purchase money. This suit is brought for relief or redress in several particulars, dissimilar in character, but all connected with the alleged oral contract of purchase. He complains: First. That a proviso was inserted in his deed, imposing upon him the burden of supporting the whole fence upon the south line of the land conveyed; and that he was induced to assent to its insertion upon the consideration, and false representation of the defendant, that the whole fence upon the east side of said land was to be maintained by the adjoining proprietor, Patrick McDaniels, by virtue of a written obligation to that effect, and that the plaintiff would be relieved from all liability to maintain any fence upon that side; as well as by certain other false representations of the defendant in relation thereto. Second. That he delivered to the defendant, in part payment of said purchase money, three bonds of the United States of $1,000 each, upon the agreement of the defendant that he would allow the full market value of the same, including premium and accrued interest at the time of the transfer thereof; and that the defendant refuses to allow and pay him the value of such premium and interest, amounting together to the sum of $315; that sum being in excess of the whole purchase money due to the defendant. Third. That during the negotiations for the sale and purchase of said lands the defendant pointed out the southeast corner of the premises proposed for sale, and represented that the land of the adjoining proprietor, McDaniels, extended to that point, and that the southerly line of the land sold would extend from the same corner to a point on the highway near a bridge; that the deed was accordingly written and accepted, describing the land as bounded on the south by a line running from the southwest corner of land of said McDaniels, at right angles to the westerly line of said McDaniels, to the highway, the defendant representing said line to be the same line previously pointed out by him to the plaintiff, and that it would strike the highway within one rod of said bridge; whereas in fact the land of said McDaniels did not extend so far as to the southeast corner of the defendant's land as pointed out by him, and the south line, running at right angles therefrom to the highway, did not strike the same within one rod of said bridge; and the deed so written and accepted did not include a considerable part of the land so offered and represented to be sold, and intended and understood by the plaintiff to have been purchased by him; the part so excluded consisting of about 17 acres of land, comprising the greater part of the meadow land in the tract as pointed out by the defendant.

The plaintiff, by his bill, does not seek to rescind the contract and conveyance, and does not offer to reconvey or release to the defendant the land conveyed, nor pray that he may be allowed to do so, and recover back the purchase money paid and bonds delivered in payment. The relief prayed for is that the defendant may be required to convey to the plaintiff the portion of the tract which was so by fraud or mistake omitted from the conveyance already made to release the plaintiff from the proviso in his deed in regard to the fence, and to pay to the plaintiff the aforesaid amount of premium and interest upon said bonds.

The argument of the plaintiff is addressed mainly to the question of the equity jurisdiction of this court in cases of fraud or mistake like that alleged in the present suit. There can be no doubt upon that point. There is no ground upon which jurisdiction in equity is so readily entertained and freely exercised. It is given to this court without restriction, if the parties have not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Gen. St. c. 113, § 2. Having jurisdiction, the question is as to the appropriate remedy. Jurisdiction in equity is often maintained, even when there is a remedy at law, for the sake of the greater facility it affords for adapting the proper relief to the peculiar necessities of each case. If the party suing is entitled to no relief other than that which may be had in an action at law, he is remitted to his remedy in that form. Even in a proper case for an appeal to equity the remedy must be sought in reference to certain recognized rules and principles of chancery jurisprudence, and is often restricted by provisions of positive law. It is not administered arbitrarily. It must flow out of and accord with the agreements and obligations of the parties, and be adapted to the condition of facts to which it is to be applied.

In the present case, the principal ground of action is the fraud or mistake by which an important part of the subject-matter of the alleged contract of sale and purchase was omitted from the deed of conveyance. If the allegations of the bill should be sustained by the proofs, they would show a clear right to have a rescission of the contract; and, upon reconveyance of the land covered by the deed, to have restoration of the bonds and money that were delivered in payment. But this relief the plaintiff does not seek; and his bill contains no offer to reconvey, without which he cannot have such relief. The prayer of the bill, and its sole purpose in this particular, is that the defendant may be compelled to convey to the plaintiff the 17 acres of land which he alleges were included in the oral contract of sale, or represented by the defendant to be so included, but omitted from the deed.

If the case stood merely upon the oral contract of sale, with a conveyance of part and a neglect or refusal to convey another part of the land which was the subject of the alleged contract, we do not think it would be contended that the plaintiff could compel a conveyance of the other land, against a party denying the contract and setting up the statute of frauds. Courts are bound to regard that statute in equity as well as at law. The only remedy in equity, in such case, would be by a rescission of the entire contract, in which the aid of the court could be obtained, if necessary, upon proper grounds.

There has been no part performance here, such as, according to the general practice in courts of equity, would be held to take the case out of the statute of frauds.

1. Payment of the whole consideration is not sufficient for that purpose. Hughes v. Morris, 2 De Gex, M. & G. 356; Thompson v. Gould, 20 Pick. 134, 138; Browne, St. Frauds, § 461; Fry, Spec. Perf. § 403; Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369; Clinan v. Cooke, 1 Schoales & L. 22, 41; Allen's Estate, 1 Watts & S. 383; Purcell v. Miner, 4 Wall. 513.

2. Possession by the purchaser, under such a deed as was given to the plaintiff, is possession according to the title thereby conveyed; and is not such a possession as to afford ground for enforcing an alleged oral agreement to convey other land, claimed to have been embraced in the same oral agreement with that conveyed. Moale v. Buchanan, 11 Gill & J. 314. The plaintiff does not appear to have been let into actual possession of the 17 acres, nor to have been induced to do any acts thereon, as owner, under his supposed rights as purchaser.

3. The conveyance of a portion of the land is neither a part performance, nor is it a recognition of the alleged oral contract, so far as it relates to the remaining land not included in the deed. On the contrary, it is in distinct disregard and implied disavowal of such a contract. The deed was given and accepted in execution of the entire contract of sale. Its terms are in literal conformity with the agreement as made. The plaintiff concedes that the southern boundary was stipulated to be described as it is written in the deed, to wit, running from the southwesterly corner of land of McDaniels, and at right angles with his westerly line, to the highway.

But the plaintiff claims that he in fact purchased the whole of a certain tract of land which included the 17 acres now in dispute; that the description of the boundaries, as agreed upon and inserted in the deed, was so agreed on and inserted upon the representation of the defendant and the belief of the plaintiff that it did include said 17 acres; and that the failure of the deed to embrace and convey that part of the land was occasioned either by the mutual mistake of the parties as to the position of the southwest corner of land of McDaniels, or else by the misrepresentation, deceit, and fraud of the defendant in relation thereto. In either alternative, the plaintiff contends that he is entitled to a reformation of the deed, to make it conform to the sale actually contracted by the parties.

Such a reformation not only requires a description of the subject-matter of the sale, different from the express terms of the oral contract, but would enlarge the effect and operation of the deed as a conveyance. It involves the transfer of the legal title to land not covered by the deed already given. It requires a new deed to be executed and delivered by the defendant to the plaintiff. Whether that deed shall embrace the entire subject of the alleged contract of purchase, with a corrected description to make it conform to facts and abutments as they were represented to be, or merely convey the 17 acres omitted from the deed already given, the order for its execution will enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of lands, for which there exists no memorandum, note, or other evidence in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith. As to the 17 acres in dispute, the obligation to convey them rests solely in the oral contract. The defendant denies any contract which includes them. The plaintiff seeks to establish such a contract by parol evidence, and enforce it. The deed itself furnishes no means of making the correction sought for, and no evidence of the contract relied on for this purpose; nor is it in any sense an acknowledgment of the substance of the alleged oral agreement.

The power to rectify deeds and other written instruments undoubtedly exists in this court, under the clauses of the statute giving equity jurisdiction in cases of fraud, accident, and mistake, or the clause giving it generally where there is no adequate remedy at law. It has been exercised in several cases. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373; Metcalf v. Putman, 9 Allen, 97. But the power will be exercised in subordination to other fixed principles of law, and especially to statute provisions. If the rules, restricting the administration of judicial remedies, which are prescribed by the statute of frauds, were to be disregarded in this branch of equity procedure, it would open the door to all the forms of fraud which that statute was intended to prevent. The statute is not a mere rule of evidence, but a limitation of judicial authority to afford a remedy. It requires that contracts for the sale of lands, in order to be enforced by judicial proceedings, must be substantiated by some writing. This provision of law cannot be dispensed with merely for the reason that the want of such writing was occasioned by accident, mistake, or fraudulent representations, unless some other ingredient enters into the case to give rise to equities stronger than those which stand upon the oral contract alone, which estop the other party from setting up the statute.

It makes no difference whether the want of a writing was accidental or intentional, by way of refusal or by reason of mutual mistake; nor that there were false representations, and a pretence of conveying the land, but a fraudulent evasion, by means whereof there was no conveyance in fact, and no proper written evidence of the agreement to convey. From the oral agreement there can be derived no legal right, either to have performance of its stipulations or written evidence of its terms. So long, therefore, as the effect of the fraud or mistake extends no further than to prevent the execution, or withhold from the other party written evidence of the agreement, it does not furnish sufficient ground for the court to disregard the statute of frauds, and enter into the investigation of the oral agreement for the purpose of enforcing it. And we do not see that the present case stands otherwise in this respect than it would if there had been no conveyance of any part of the land. As already shown, that conveyance was not in execution or recognition of the contract which the plaintiff seeks, by this bill, to enforce; and does not furnish any reason for taking the case out of the statute, on the ground of part performance. Indeed, the rule seems to be that no part performance by the party sought to be charged will take an agreement out of the statute of frauds, except in those cases where the statute itself provides for such effect. It is part performance by the party seeking to enforce, and not by the other party, to which courts of equity look, in giving relief from the statute. Caton v. Caton, 1 Ch. App. 137, L. R. 2 H. L. 127; Mundy v. Jolliffe, 5 Mylne & C. 167; Buckmaster v. Harrop, 7 Ves. 369; Browne, St. Frauds, § 453.

When the proposed reformation of an instrument involves the specific enforcement of an oral agreement within the statute of frauds, or when the term sought to be added would so modify the instrument as to make it operate to convey an interest or secure a right which can only be conveyed or secured through an instrument in writing, and for which no writing has ever existed, the statute of frauds is a sufficient answer to such a proceeding, unless the plea of the statute can be met by some ground of estoppel to deprive the party of the right to set up that defence. Jordan v. Sawkins, 1 Ves. Jr. 402; Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63; Clinan v. Cooke, 1 Schoales & L. 22.

The fact that the omission or defect in the writing, by reason of which it failed to convey the land or express the obligation which it is sought to make it convey or express, was occasioned by mistake, or by deceit and fraud, will not alone constitute such an estoppel. There must concur, also, some change in the condition or position of the party seeking relief, by reason of being induced to enter upon the execution of the agreement, or to do acts upon the faith of it as if it were executed, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the other party, either express or implied, for which he would be left without redress if the agreement were to be defeated.

Upon a somewhat extended examination of the decisions in regard to the effect of the statute of frauds upon the right to have equitable relief where the writing is defective, although many of them, where relief has been granted, hardly come within this definition in the apparent character of the particular facts upon which they were decided, yet we are satisfied that this principle of discrimination is the only one which can give consistency to the great mass of authorities upon this subject.

The case of Smith v. Underdunk, 1 Sandf. Ch. 579, is nearly like the present in its facts; and the opinion of the assistant vice-chancellor would seem to sustain the right of the plaintiff here. There was no fraud in the preparation of the deed. The judgment was based mainly upon the ground of part performance. It was held to be sufficient to take the case out of the statute that the plaintiff had been let into possession as purchaser; and the opinion indicates that possession under and in accordance with a deed of part would be a sufficient possession of the whole for the purpose of requiring a deed of the remainder. But the decision rests upon the fact of possession by the plaintiff of the entire premises, including the part for which the bill was brought. The case arose upon demurrer to the bill, which of course admitted the contract, and the alleged possession of the whole tract. The question of the statute of frauds did not arise therefore.

That the purchaser has been let into possession in pursuance of a parol agreement has been very generally recognized as sufficient to take it out of the statute. The reasoning by which this result was reached is far from satisfactory; and even where the rule prevails there are frequent intimations that it is regarded as trenching too closely upon the spirit as well as the letter of the statute. If it were now open to settle the rule anew, we cannot doubt that it would be limited to possession accompanied with or followed by such change of position of the purchaser as would subject him to loss for which he could not otherwise have adequate compensation or other redress; and that mere change of possession would not be held to take a case out of the statute. However it may be elsewhere, we are disposed to hold the rule to be so in Massachusetts.

Previously to the Statutes of 1855, c. 194, and 1856, c. 38 (Gen. St. c. 113, § 2), the power of the court to direct specific performance was confined to written contracts. Rev. St. c. 74, § 8. That power was held to be strictly limited to contracts in which the whole obligation to be enforced was expressed in the writing. Dwight v. Pomeroy, 17 Mass. 303; Brooks v. Wheelock, 11 Pick. 439; Leach v. Leach, 18 Pick. 68; Buck v. Dowley, 16 Gray, 555; Park v. Johnson, 4 Allen, 259. The provision conferring that power specifically in case of written contracts is still retained in the Gen. St. c. 113, § 2. If the subsequent clauses, conferring jurisdiction generally, are to be construed, as we think they are, to extend the power of the court, so as to give relief by way of specific performance, either of contracts wholly unwritten, or of stipulations proved by parol and incorporated into a contract by judicial rectification of a written instrument, as in Metcalf v. Putman, 9 Allen, 97, still that power ought to be exercised with constant reference and in subordination to the condition that "the party asking relief has not a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at common law," which accompanied each enlargement of the equity power of the court, and which prefaces and closes the enumeration of those powers in the General Statutes. The force of this consideration is not lessened when applied to agreements within the statute of frauds.

Mere possession of land does not expose the party to loss or danger of loss without redress at law. The parol agreement of sale and purchase, with permission to enter, though not to be enforced as a valid contract of sale, will constitute such a license as will protect the party from liability for acts done before the license is revoked, and for all acts necessary to enable him to remove himself and his property from the premises after such revocation. If possession be taken without such permission, express or implied, it is no foundation for relief in equity, according to any of the authorities. The argument, for the admission of parol evidence to prove an agreement within the statute of frauds in order to enforce it in equity, drawn from the admissibility of such evidence to maintain a defence, either at law or in equity, seems to be based upon a misconception of the purport and force of the statute, which reaches no farther than to deny the right of action to enforce such agreements.

In this commonwealth, the possession of land by a purchaser is not even notice to a third party of an unrecorded deed. The whole spirit of our laws in respect to real estate is against the policy of enabling parties to acquire or confer title, either legal or equitable, by mere parol and delivery of possession. The possession of the plaintiff, therefore, even if it extended to the tract in dispute, is not sufficient to entitle him to relief against the statute.

The principle, on which courts of equity rectify an instrument, so as to enlarge its operation, or to convey or enforce rights not found in the writing itself, and make it conform to the agreement as proved by parol evidence, on the ground of an omission, by mutual mistake, in the reduction of the agreement to writing, is, as we understand it, that in equity the previous oral agreement is held to subsist as a binding contract, notwithstanding the attempt to put it in writing; and upon clear proof of its terms the courts compel the incorporation of the omitted clause, or the modification of that which is inserted, so that the whole agreement, as actually intended to be made, shall be truly expressed and executed. Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet. 1; Oliver v. Mutual Commercial Marine Ins. Co., 2 Curt. 277, Fed. Cas. No. 10,498. But when the omitted term or obligation is within the statute of frauds, there is no valid agreement which the court is authorized to enforce, outside of the writing. In such case, relief may be had against the enforcement of the contract as written, or the assertion of rights acquired under it contrary to the terms and intent of the real agreement of the parties. Such relief may be given as well upon the suit of a plaintiff seeking to have a written contract, or some of its terms, set aside, annulled, or restricted, as to a defendant resisting its specific performance. Canedy v. Marcy, 13 Gray, 373; Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585; Keisselbrack v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. 148.

Relief in this form, although procured by parol evidence of an agreement differing from the written contract, with proof that the difference was the result of accident or mistake, does not conflict with the provisions of the statute of frauds. That statute forbids the enforcement of certain kinds of agreement without writing; but it does not forbid the defeat or restriction of written contracts; nor the use of parol evidence for the purpose of establishing the equitable grounds therefor. The parol evidence is introduced, not to establish an oral agreement independently of the writing, but to show that the written instrument contained something contrary to or in excess of the real agreement of the parties, or does not properly express that agreement. Higginson v. Clowes, 15 Ves. 516; Clowes v. Higginson, 1 Ves. & B. 524; Squier v. Campbell, 1 Mylne & C. 459, 480.

But rectification by making the contract include obligations or subject-matter to which its written terms will not apply is a direct enforcement of the oral agreement, as much in conflict with the statute of frauds as if there were no writing at all. Moale v. Buchanan, 11 Gill & J. 314; Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63; Elder v. Elder, 10 Me. 80. In Parkhurst v. Van Cortlandt, 14 Johns. 15, 32, it is said that, "where it is necessary to make out a contract in writing, no parol evidence can be admitted to supply any defects in the writing." Per Thompson, C. J. Such rectification, when the enlarged operation includes that which is within the statute of frauds, must be accomplished, if at all, under the other head of equity jurisdiction, namely, fraud. Irnham v. Child, 1 Brown, Ch. 92; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 770a; Davies v. Fitton, 2 Dru. & War. 225; Wilson v. Wilson, 5 H. L. Cas. 40, 65; Manser v. Back, 6 Hare, 443; Clarke v. Grant, 14 Ves. 519; Clinan v. Cook, 1 Schoales & L. 22.

The fraud most commonly treated as taking an agreement out of the statute of frauds is that which consists in setting up the statute against its performance, after the other party has been induced to make expenditures, or a change of situation in regard to the subject-matter of the agreement, or upon the supposition that it was to be carried into execution, and the assumption of rights thereby to be acquired; so that the refusal to complete the execution of the agreement is not merely a denial of rights which it was intended to confer, but the infliction of an unjust and unconscientious injury and loss. In such case, the party is held, by force of his acts or silent acquiescence, which have misled the other to his harm, to be estopped from setting up the statute of frauds. Hawkins v. Holmes, 1 P. Wms. 770; Parkhurst v. Van Cortlandt, 1 Johns. Ch. 274, 14 Johns. 15; Browne, St. Frauds, § 437 et seq.; Fry, Spec. Perf. §§ 384-388; Caton v. Caton, 1 Ch. App. 137, 147, L. R. 2 H. L. 127. In the last named case it is said that "the right to relief in such cases rests not merely on the contract, but on what has been done in pursuance of the contract." Per Lord Chancellor Cranworth. See, also, 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 759. But the present case, as we have already seen, does not come within the principle of this ground of equitable relief.

Fraud, which relates only to the preparation, form, and execution of the writing, is sufficient to vitiate the instrument so made. It may be set aside either in equity or at law. If it is made to include land not the subject of the actual sale, it is inoperative as to such land; and the fraud may be shown, for the purpose of defeating its recovery, in an action at law. Walker v. Swasey, 2 Allen, 312, 4 Allen, 527; Bartlett v. Drake, 100 Mass. 174. It has been questioned whether any other effect can be given to such fraud than to defeat the operation of the instrument altogether; and whether a court of equity can reform by giving it a narrower operation, as modified by parol proof, in a case within the statute of frauds.

Attorney General v. Sitwell, 1 Younge & C. Exch. 559. The difficulty is that, if the fraud vitiates and defeats the instrument, then the modified agreement to be enforced must be that which is proved by parol evidence; and this seems to violate the statute. But the instrument, in such case, is not void. It is voidable only; and that not at the election of the party who committed the fraud. He is not entitled to control the extent of the effect that shall be given to his fraudulent conduct; and it is not for him to object that the fraud is availed of only to defeat the rights, which he has secured by fraud, beyond what he is fairly entitled to by the terms of the real agreement between the parties. When those are separable, and the nature of the case will admit of it, the court may enforce the written contract in accordance with its terms, giving relief against the fraudulent excess, or the clause improperly inserted. Parol testimony, used to defeat a title or limit an interest acquired under a written instrument, or to convert it into a trust, does not necessarily conflict with the statute of frauds. It has been held that an absolute deed may, in this mode, be converted, in equity, into a mortgage. Washburn v. Merrill, 1 Day, 140; Taylor v. Luther, 2 Sumn. 228, Fed. Cas. No. 13,796; Jenkins v. Eldredge, 3 Story, 181, 293, Fed. Cas. No. 7,266; Morris v. Nixon, 1 How. 118; 4 Kent, Comm. (6th Ed.) 143. Whether this can be done in Massachusetts has not yet been decided. Newton v. Fay, 10 Allen, 505. But if it were to be so held, it would not be upon the ground of enforcing a parol agreement to reconvey; but upon the ground that such an agreement, together with proof that the deed was given and accepted only as security for a debt, made out a case of fraud, or trust, which would warrant a decree vacating the title of the grantee, as far as he attempted to hold contrary to the purposes of the conveyance. In such cases the court acts upon the estate or rights acquired under the written instrument; and within the power over that instrument which is derived from the fraud or other ground of jurisdiction. But when it is sought to extend that power to interests in land not included in the instrument, and in relation to which there is no agreement in writing, the case stands differently. Fraud may vitiate the writing which is tainted by it, but it does not supply that which the statute requires. It may destroy a title or right acquired by its means; but it has no creative force. It will not confer title. In the absence of a legal contract by the agreement of the parties, it will not establish one, nor authorize the court to declare one, by its decree.

This distinction is illustrated by the analogous rule in regard to implied trusts. Gen. St. c. 100, § 19. Parol evidence may charge the grantee of lands conveyed with a resulting or implied trust, which equity will enforce. But such evidence will not create a trust in lands already held by an absolute title.

A fraudulent misrepresentation, although sufficient to sustain an action for damages, cannot be converted into a contract to be enforced as such. Neither will it furnish the measure by which a written contract may be reformed. In this discussion we have assumed that there was a clear agreement between the parties, which the deed fails to carry out, and to which it might properly be made to conform, but for the obstacle in the statute of frauds.

It has been often asserted that where one by deceit or fraudulent contrivance prevents an agreement intended to be put in writing from being properly written or executed, he shall not avail himself of the omission, and shall not be permitted to set up the statute of fraud against the proof and enforcement of the parol agreement, or of the parol stipulation improperly omitted. But in our opinion this doctrine would practically annul the statute. The tendency of the human mind, when fraud and injustice are manifest, is to strain every point to compass its defeat; and to render full redress to the party upon whom it has been practiced. Mundy v. Jolliffe, 5 Mylne & C. 167; Taylor v. Luther, 2 Sumn. 233, Fed. Cas. No. 13,796. This influence has led to decisions in which the facts of the particular case were regarded more than the general considerations, of public policy upon which the statute is founded and entitled to be maintained. Courts have sometimes regarded it as a matter of judicial merit to wrest from under the statute all cases in which the lineaments of fraud in any form were discernible. But the impulse of moral reprobation of deceit and fraud, however commendable in itself, is liable to mislead, if taken as the guide to judicial decrees.

We apprehend that in most instances where fraud occasioning a failure of written evidence of an agreement or particular stipulation has been held to take the case out of the statute of frauds, there was some fact of prejudice to the party, or change of situation consequent upon the fraud, which was regarded as sufficient to make up the elements of an equitable estoppel. In such case, the argument is transferred to the simple question of the sufficiency of the additional circumstance for that purpose. The cases most frequently referred to are those arising out of agreements for marriage settlements. In such cases the marriage, although not regarded as a part performance of the agreement for a marriage settlement, is such an irretrievable change of situation, that, if procured by artifice, upon the faith that the settlement had been, or the assurance that it would be, executed, the other party is held to make good the agreement, and not permitted to defeat it by pleading the statute. Max- well v. Mountacute, Prec. Ch. 526; Browne, St. Frauds, §§ 441-445.

Another class of cases are those where a party acquires property by conveyance or devise secured to himself under assurances that he will transfer the property to, or hold and appropriate it for the use and benefit of, another. A trust for the benefit of such other person is charged upon the property, not by reason merely of the oral promise, but because of the fact that by means of such promise he had induced the transfer of the property to himself. Brown v. Lynch, 1 Paige, 147; Thynn v. Thynn, 1 Vern. 296; Oldham v. Litchfield, 2 Vern. 506; Devenish v. Baines, Prec. Ch. 3; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 768.

When these cases are cited in support of the doctrine that artifice or fraud in evading or preventing the execution of the writing is alone sufficient to induce a court of equity to disregard the statute and enforce the oral agreement, the subsequent change of situation or transfer of property, without which the deceit would be innocuous, seems to be overlooked, because it is not strictly in part performance of the agreement sought to be enforced. It must be manifest, however, that without such consequent act there would be no standing for the case in a court of equity. That which moves the court to a decree to enforce the agreement is not the artifice by which the execution of the writing has been evaded, but what the other party has been induced to do upon the faith of the agreement for such a writing. It is not that deceit, misrepresentation, or fraud, of itself, entitles a party to an equitable remedy; but that equity will interfere to prevent the accomplishment of the fraud which would result from the enforcement of legal rights contrary to the real agreement of the parties. Indeed, the fraud which alone justifies this exercise of equity powers by relief against the statute of frauds consists in the attempt to take advantage of that which has been done in performance or upon the faith of an agreement, while repudiating its obligations under cover of the statute. When a writing has been executed, the courts allow the fraud or mistake by which an omission or defect in the instrument has been occasioned to defeat the conclusiveness of the writing, and open the door for proof of the real agreement. But the obstacle of the statute of frauds to the enforcement of obligations, or the security of rights not expressed in the instrument remains to be removed in the same manner as if there were no writing. Phyfe v. Wardell, 2 Edw. Ch. 47; Moale v. Buchanan, 11 Gill & J. 314. The power to reform the instrument is not an independent power or branch of equity jurisdiction, but only a means of exercising the power of the court under its general jurisdiction in cases of fraud, accident, and mistake.

We are aware that the limitation which we have undertaken to define has not been uniformly observed or recognized.

In Wiswall v. Hall, 3 Paige, 313, Chancellor Walworth granted a perpetual injunction, and ordered a deed of release of title to land omitted from a deed by fraud and secret contrivance. There was no discussion of the authorities, nor of the principles upon which the case was decided; and no reference to the statute of frauds; and the statute does not appear, by the report, to have been set up against the prayer for relief.

In De Peyster v. Hasbrouck, 11 N. Y. 591, a similar decision was made in the court of appeals in New York. Here again there is no reference to the statute of frauds, no discussion of the principles involved in the decision, and no authority or precedent cited except that of Wiswall v. Hall. The mortgagor whose deed was reformed put in no answer whatever. The defence was made by parties claiming under him, and the statute of frauds does not appear to have been pleaded. Denio, C. J., in giving the opinion, proceeds to say: "It is unnecessary to refer to cases to establish the familiar doctrine that when through mistake or fraud a contract or conveyance fails to express the actual agreement of the parties, it will be reformed by a court of equity, so as to correspond with such actual agreement. The English cases have been ably digested by Chancellor Kent, and the principle has been stated with his accustomed care and accuracy, in Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585."

But in Gillespie v. Moon the relief sought and granted was by way of restricting, and not by enlarging, the operation of the deed. Such relief would not, as already shown, conflict with the statute of frauds; and neither the discussion in that case nor the citation of authorities had reference to the bearing of the statute of frauds upon the question of affording relief upon contracts relating to land. Indeed, the English cases furnish but little aid upon that point, for the reason that the courts there have generally, without reference to the statute of frauds, refused to enforce written contracts with a modification or variation set up by parol proof. Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. 211, and notes on the same in 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 404; Nurse v. Seymour, 13 Beav. 254.

The principle which was maintained by Chancellor Kent, and upon which the English authorities were cited by him in Gillespie v. Moon, was that relief in equity against the operation of a written instrument, on the ground that by fraud or mistake it did not express the true contract of the parties, might be afforded to a plaintiff seeking a modification of the contract, as well as to a defendant resisting its enforcement. That proposition must be considered as fully established. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 161. It is quite another proposition, to enlarge the subject-matter of the contract, or to add a new term to the writing, by parol evidence, and enforce it. No such proposition was presented by the case of Gillespie v. Moon, and it does not sustain the right to such relief against the statute of frauds.

That Chancellor Walworth, in Wiswall v. Hall, did not intend to decide that the statute of frauds could be disregarded if properly set up against such an enlargement of the operation of the written contract is apparent from the remarks of the same learned judge in the subsequent case of Cowles v. Bowne, 10 Paige, 535. He says: "Whether a party can come into this court for the specific performance of a mere executory agreement for the sale of lands, which in its terms is materially variant from the written agreement between the parties that has been executed according to the statute, where there has been no part performance or other equitable circumstance sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, as a mere parol contract between the parties, is a question which it will not be necessary for me to consider in this case."

In Gouverneur v. Titus, 1 Edw. Ch. 480, there was a deed of land described as being in the northwest corner of a township by mistake for the northeast corner. The grantor admitted the real contract, and had corrected the mistake by deed. The only question was whether equity would enforce the corrected deed against the lien of a judgment creditor, who had notice of the mistake. In the opinion it is said: "It is a case in which this court would interfere, as between the immediate parties, to correct the mistake." The judgment was clearly right. The dictum we are disposed to question, unless the deed itself contained some other description by means of which the land might be identified and the mistake corrected.

In Newson v. Bufferlow, 1 Dev. Eq. 379, a deed was reformed, which was made, by fraud, to include land not sold; and the fraudulent grantee was required to execute a reconveyance of the excess. The opinion contains a remark of the court that this power may be exercised as well by inserting what was omitted as by striking out what was wrongfully included. But this remark is clearly obiter dictum, and is not sustained by the authority cited, namely, Gillespie v. Moon.

In Blodgett v. Hobart, 18 Vern. 414, a mortgage was reformed by including other lands omitted by mistake. The statute of frauds was not set up in the answer nor referred to in the opinion of the court, and the answer was considered by the court to be evasive in regard to the alleged agreement for security upon such other lands.

In Tilton v. Tilton, 9 N. H. 385, the court controvert the doctrine of such a limitation, as declared in Elder v. Elder, 10 Me. 80; but the decision did not involve the question so discussed. The case arose from an attempted partition between tenants in common of real estate. There was a written agreement for partition according to the award of certain arbitrators named, and the only question was as to the effect of a substitution of other arbitrators by parol. Deeds had been executed, and the plaintiff had fully performed his part of the agreement. It was a case of part performance sufficient to take the case out of the statute of frauds, and was decided upon that ground. Besides, a partition of lands, though effected by mutual deeds of release, is not a contract for the sale of land.

Craig v. Kittridge, 3 Fost. (N. H.) 231, arose upon a partition, and was decided upon the authority of Tilton v. Tilton. Smith v. Greeley, 14 N. H. 378, was a decree upon default, without argument or opinion, against the executors and heirs of a party whose deed, by mutual mistake, failed to include certain land sold. It does not appear whether there was written evidence of the agreement, nor whether there was possession or acts of performance. It was sufficient, perhaps, that the statute was not pleaded, and the default admitted the agreement.

Caldwell v. Carrington, 9 Pet. 86, was an agreement for exchange of lands, and stands entirely upon the ground of part performance.

Notwithstanding contrary decisions and dicta, we are satisfied that upon principle the conveyance of land cannot be decreed in equity by reason merely of an oral agreement therefor against a party denying the alleged agreement and relying upon the statute of frauds, in the absence of evidence of change of situation or part performance creating an estoppel against the plea of the statute. This rule applies as well to the enforcement of such an agreement by way of rectifying a deed as to a direct suit for its specific performance. We are satisfied also that this is the rule to be derived from a great preponderance of the authorities. Whitchurch v. Bevis, 2 Brown, Ch. 559; Woollam v. Hearn, 7 Ves. 211; 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. (3d Am. Ed.) notes, [*414], Am. Notes, 691; Townshend v. Stangroom, 6 Ves. 328; Beaumont v. Bramley, Turn. & R. 41. See, also, Moale v. Bu- chanan, 11 Gill & J. 314; Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63; and Elder v. Elder, 10 Me. 80, already cited above; Adams, Eq. 171, 172; Churchill v. Rogers, 3 T. B. Mon. 81; Purcell v. Miner, 4 Wall. 513.

The prayer in regard to the fence stands differently. If that stipulation had been fraudulently inserted in the deed, the agreement being otherwise, the deed might be reformed by striking out that provision, or requiring a release of it, so as to make the writing correspond with the actual agreement. But upon the allegations of the bill there is no other agreement by which to reform the deed, and to which to make it conform. The plaintiff admits that the stipulation in the deed is precisely in accordance with the actual agreement. The fraud which he alleges relates only to the consideration or inducement upon which he was led to make that agreement; not to the form of the agreement itself. If that stipulation were to be stricken out, the writing would then not express the agreement actually made by the parties. The court cannot rectify an instrument otherwise than in accordance with the actual agreement. It cannot make an agreement for the parties. Hunt v. Rousmaniere, 1 Pet. 1, 14; Brooks v. Stolley, 3 McLean, 523, Fed. Cas. No. 1,962. If the subject-matter of this stipulation were of sufficient materiality, the fraud alleged might have the effect to defeat the whole instrument. But this effect is not sought. The plaintiff's remedy, therefore, is at law, in damages for the deceit and false representation.

The alleged agreement in regard to the premium and accrued interest upon the bonds transferred in payment for the land will not sustain a bill in equity. If such an agreement was made and broken, we see no reason why an action of assumpsit will not lie upon the agreement, or for the overpayment of the agreed price of the purchase. The remedy at law is as effectual as it can be in equity.

The entry must therefore be, bill dismissed.

DAVIS v. ELY et al.

(10 S. E. 138, 104 N. C. 16.)

Supreme Court of North Carolina. Oct. 28, 1889.

This was a civil action tried before Boykin, J., and a jury at spring term of the superior court of Pasquotank county. The complaint was as follows: (1) That on the 22d day of April, 1884, the plaintiff and defendants entered into a contract with regard to the sale and division of the Great Park estate; that a paper writing, purporting to contain the terms of said contract, was executed by Timothy Ely and wife, Hannah, by their duly-authorized agent, Harvey Terry, and by the plaintiff, through his agent, William J. Griffin. A copy of this writing is hereto attached, marked "Exhibit A," and is made a part of this complaint. (2) That the recitals and agreements set forth in said contract, down to section numbered 40, are all true. (3) That the agreement which was intended to be embodied in the contract, of which the exhibit hereto attached is a copy, was made by Francis Davis, Esq., father of the said John F. Davis, and Harvey Terry, agent of Timothy Ely, and wife, Hannah. (4) That, before the contract could be reduced to writing, the said Francis Davis left Elizabeth City for his home in Ohio, and directed one W. J. Griffin, an attorney at law, to draft said contract, and have the same executed and recorded. (5) That the said draughtsman was compelled to rely upon statements of the said Terry, and, by false and fraudulent representations by said Terry, the said contract, or that portion set forth in the paragraph numbered 40 of the exhibit, hereto attached, does not set forth the true terms agreed on. (6) That the Great Park estate was incumbered by a mortgage which had been purchased by Timothy Ely, and the equity of redemption was held by a firm known as Conrow, Bush & Lippincott; that the said John F. Davis had entered into a contract with the said Conrow, Bush & Lippincott for the purchase of their interest in the Great Park estate, except a portion known as the "Hall Tract," and the said Davis bound himself to pay off and discharge the mortgage, which was then held by the plaintiff Ely, and thereby leave the Hall tract to Conrow, Bush & Lippincott, unincumbered. This contract of Davis with Conrow, Bush & Lippincott was well known to Harvey Terry, the agent of the defendant Ely. (7) That the said Terry, as agent of the said Timothy Ely, had obtained a judgment of foreclosure on his mortgage, and the sale of the Great Park estate was advertised to take place April 22, 1884; that, after the advertisement had been posted, the said John F. Davis applied for and obtained a restraining order, commanding the commissioners to desist from the sale of the Great Park estate until a certain time mentioned in said restraining order. (8) That the said Francis Davis and Timothy Ely and Harvey Terry met in Elizabeth City on the 21st day of April, 1884, and on that day verbally made a contract which was intended to be embodied in the contract hereinbefore set out. It was only when the said Davis and Terry had thus come to terms that the said Davis consented to the sale mentioned in said contract. (9) The said Francis Davis, as agent for his son, John F. Davis, refused to treat with the said Terry upon any basis except that the Hall tract should be given or set apart to his son, John F. Davis, in order that the said John F. Davis might perform his contract with the said Conrow, Bush & Lippincott. (10) That, after much talking, it was finally agreed that the said Hall tract should be excepted, and the balance of the Great Park estate should be divided into two parts, equal in area, by a line running north and south, and the western half thereof should be given or allotted to John F. Davis and the eastern half to Timothy Ely, and, in addition to the western half, the said Davis should have the portion known as the "Hall Tract." (11) That the said Terry represented unto the said Davis that the said Hall tract contained but 1,300 acres, which the said Terry well knew to be false. In truth and in fact this complainant has been informed that the said Hall tract contains 3,000 acres. (12) That, having confidence in the integrity of said Terry, and having urgent business engagements in Ohio, the said Francis Davis left Elizabeth City on the 22d day of April, 1884, and this plaintiff did not learn of the error in the agreement for some time thereafter, and instituted suit as soon as he heard thereof. Wherefore plaintiff prays—First, that the said contract may be reformed so as to speak the true agreement of the parties as herein set out; second, that the defendants be decreed to pay all costs of this proceeding; and third, for such other and further relief as to the court may seem meet. The answer fully denied all the allegations imputing fraud, and the following issues were submitted without objection to the jury. (1) Does the written contract dated April 22, 1884, contain the true agreement entered into between the parties? (2) Was it the agreement between the parties that John F. Davis should have the Hall tract and one-half of the balance of the Great Parker estate, and the defendants the other half of the Great Parker estate? (3) Was the reservation of the Hall tract to J. F. Davis omitted from the written contract by reason of false and fraudulent representations made to the draughtsman by the defendants, or either of them? The issues show the true contention of the parties. The plaintiff offered evidence tending to show the fraud set out in the complaint, and all the other allegations of the complaint, for the purpose of reforming the contract. The defendants objected to the testimony, unless it was introduced for the purpose of rescinding the contract, whereupon the counsel for the plaintiff stated that the purpose of the testimony offered was to reform the contract, and not to rescind it. The court excluded the testimony, holding that it was not admissible for the purpose of reforming the contract, but that it was admissible for the purpose of rescinding the contract. Upon this intimation the plaintiff submitted to a nonsuit, and appealed.

C. W. Grandy, for appellant. Harvey Terry, for appellees.

SHEPHERD, J., (after stating the facts as above.) There is a hopeless conflict of authority upon the question whether a court of equity will correct an executory contract on the ground of fraud or mistake, and enforce it with the variation. In England and several of the American states such relief is denied, although a defendant, for the purpose of resisting specific performance, may show that by fraud or mistake the written contract does not express the real terms of the agreement. In other states this distinction is repudiated, and the contract will be corrected and enforced in proper cases at the instance of either party. Where such executory contracts, within the statute of frauds, are corrected and enforced, there is a further diversity, some courts holding that they will only exercise the power where the object is to restrict the subject-matter of the contract, while others hold that the contract will be corrected, although its subject is enlarged. Of this latter opinion is Mr. Pomeroy (2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 862 et seq.) and other writers of great respectability. Opposed to this view we have the English authorities, (Woolam v. Hearn, 2 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 920,) and Bisp. Eq. § 383; Whart. Ev. § 1024, and many decisions in the United States, of which the leading case is Glass v. Hulbert, 102 Mass. 24. In this case the court says that "when the proposed reformation of an instrument involves the specific enforcement of an oral agreement within the statute of frauds, or when the terms sought to be added would so modify the instrument as to make it operate to convey an interest or secure a right which can only be conveyed or secured through an instrument in writing, and for which no writing has ever existed, the statute of frauds is a sufficient answer to such a proceeding, unless the plea of the statute can be met by some ground of estoppel to deprive the party of the right to set up that defense. Jordan v. Sawkins, 1 Ves. Jr. 402; Osborn v. Phelps, 19 Conn. 63; Clinan v. Cooke, 1 Schoales & L. 22. The fact that the omission or defect in the writing by reason of which it failed to convey the land or express the obligation which it is sought to make it convey or express was occasioned by mistake, or by deceit and fraud, will not alone constitute such an estoppel. * * * Rectification, by making the contract include obligations or subject-matter to which its written terms will not apply, is a direct enforcement of the oral agreement, as much in conflict with the statute of frauds as if there were no writing at all." This decision, in so far as it holds that the subject-matter of the contract may not be enlarged, is supported by abundant authority. Story's Equity Jurisprudence is often cited to sustain the other view, but the argument there seems to be directed against the distinction between parties seeking and parties resisting specific performance. It refers to the decisions of Chancellor KENT in Gillespie v. Moon, 2 Johns. Ch. 585, and Keiselbrack v. Livingston, 4 Johns. Ch. 144. In neither of these cases was the subject-matter enlarged. In Gillespie's Case (so often cited) the correction made was the striking out of 50 acres from a written agreement which included 250. Bisp. Eq. 445, says that "in cases which fall within the statute it is obvious that to carry the rule in Gillespie's Case to the extent of holding that an agreement (for example) to convey fifty acres may, for the sake of justice and equity be construed to mean a contract to convey one hundred, would be to repeal the statute of frauds and to give effect to a simple verbal agreement to sell land. Where, however, the contention of the complainant is that something which is actually embraced in the writing was not intended to be included therein, to suffer him to show this is not to enforce a parol contract in relation to land. It is simply to prove that a written contract did not embrace all that, on its face, it appeared to include. Such was the actual state of the case in Gillespie v. Moon." It may be remarked that in most of the states where such relief is granted the doctrine of "part performance" is recognized, and the proof required is but little short of that which is necessary to enforce a contract upon that ground. In North Carolina, so far from correcting such executory contracts within the statute so as to enlarge their terms, the tendency of our decisions is to confine such corrective relief to executed contracts alone. We have been able to find no decision in point, but the words of HALL, J., in Newsom v. Bufferlow, 1 Dev. Eq. 379, strongly show the disinclination of the court to depart from the statute, except upon the most imperative demands of justice and equity. The learned judge says: "It is altogether unnecessary to inquire in this case how far courts of equity have gone in carrying into effect written executory contracts or varying them by parol evidence. Suffice it to say that the reason why they have declined giving relief in many such cases is that the plaintiff had a remedy at law. That reason is not applicable to executed contracts. In these cases the plaintiff has no remedy at law, and, unless a court of equity will give relief, he can have no redress." This distinction between executed and executory contracts is clearly put by Adams, Eq. 171: "Where land is the subject of the erroneous instrument, the reformation of an executed conveyance on parol evidence is not precluded by the statute of frauds, for otherwise it would be impossible to give relief. * * * But it does not appear that, where the defendant has insisted on the benefit of the statute, the court has ever reformed such an executory agreement on parol evidence and specifically enforced it."

Land is regarded as such a high species of property that exceptional safeguards have been devised for the preservation and security of its title, and these should not be departed from unless such departure is absolutely necessary to subserve the ends of justice. Under the former system the equitable relief we have mentioned was administered by the trained minds of learned judges, sitting as chancellors, who appreciated the grave evils which the statute was designed to prevent, and who gave full effect to the rule which required the clearest and most cogent testimony. Even then the relief in this state was confined, it seems, to executed contracts, and surely there is nothing in the new method of trying equitable issues which encourages us to leave the old moorings and venture upon a sea of trouble, confusion, and insecurity. On the ground of necessity we correct conveyances by adding clauses of defeasance and words of inheritance. We also restrict or enlarge the subject-matter, but we decline to do this in the case of executory contracts, where there can necessarily be no other object than, as in the case before us, to have it specifically enforced. It is believed that no great hardship can result from such ruling, as the court will, upon rescission, endeavor to place the parties in statu quo, and damages may be given for the fraud and deceit. The court is liberal in the adjustment of equities arising in such cases; but, even if occasional instances of hardship occur, it is far better that these should be endured than that every title in the state should be exposed to the assaults of false and fraudulent oral testimony. What we have said has no reference to the correction of ordinary executory contracts in aid of actions for damages at law, such as the correction of the terms of a bond and the like. Equity will always make the correction, and the party can sue upon the corrected contract at law. The two jurisdictions being now blended, such relief will be granted in a single action. It may be that in cases of personal property, where there is a pretium affectionis, the contract may be corrected and specifically enforced, but it is unnecessary to pass upon that question here.

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.—17

The relief sought in this action is to correct the contract so as to include the "Hall tract." It seems from the complaint that the alleged fraud consisted in certain false representations as to the number of acres made to the plaintiff when the parol agreement was made. False representations are also alleged to have been made to Mr. Griffin, the draughtsman; but these are not specified, so we must assume that they were the same as those made to his principal, Davis. However this may be, we have here a plain case where it is proposed to correct an executory contract for the sale of land by making it include a larger quantity than is stated in the writing. The plaintiff does not wish to rescind, and offers the parol testimony solely for the purpose of reformation. We think that to admit the testimony in such cases would be, as has been said, virtually repealing the statute of frauds, and opening the door to a flood of evils, the extent of which it would be impossible to estimate. The plaintiff may enforce the contract in its present form, or he may rescind it, and ask for an adjustment of any equities which may have grown out of the transaction. We think that the testimony was properly rejected, and that there is no error.

MILLER et al. v. SCAMMON.

(52 N. H. 609.)

Supreme Judicial Court of New Hampshire.
June, 1873.

In equity. The bill by Frank W. Miller and George W. Marston against Stephen Scammon alleged that the plaintiffs were the publishers of a daily newspaper, that the defendant, fraudulently intending to deceive and injure the plaintiffs, and to expose them to loss and to a prosecution for libel, persuaded and procured them to insert in their newspaper an advertisement over the signature of the defendant, and which he said was true, and which he alleged was necessary and designed to protect him against being compelled to pay certain notes therein described, which he then and there solemnly declared had been wrongfully obtained, and purporting to have been for a valuable consideration, and to have been signed by the defendant, and which he then and there pretended and asserted he never signed, and upon which he might be sued, or which might be set up in a suit against him.

The bill then avers that the allegations of the advertisement were false, and the present plaintiffs, as well as the defendant, were indicted and convicted for publishing a false and malicious libel in said advertisement, and the present plaintiffs were fined $150, which they have paid, with costs taxed at $21.63, together with other costs for counsel fees and other expenses amounting to $50, amounting in the whole to $221.63.

The plaintiffs pray that the court will ascertain the amount which they have had to pay and the damages they have suffered by reason of the fraud and deceit of the defendant, and that he may be ordered and decreed to pay the same to the plaintiffs, with interest, and for such other relief as may be just.

To this bill there was a general demurrer, and the questions of law thus raised were reserved.

W. H. Y. Hackett, for plaintiffs. Mr. Wiggin, for defendant.

FOSTER, J. As a declaration in case, to recover damages for the deceit and fraud of the defendant, the plaintiffs' bill does not seem wanting in the essential and ordinary forms of pleading. The prayer of the bill is that the court may ascertain what the plaintiffs "have had to pay, and the damages they have suffered by reason of the fraud and deceit" of the defendant, and that he may be ordered and decreed to pay the same; but the damages are specifically enumerated in dollars and cents in the bill, and no aid in equity is required for their ascertainment.

No reason is suggested in the bill why the plaintiffs have chosen to proceed in equity rather than by the usual course of the law, which is ample in its form and power for the redress of such grievances as the plaintiffs complain of, provided they are entitled to relief or satisfaction. If the plaintiffs' remedy at law is not as plain, full, complete, and adequate as it is by proceedings in equity, neither the fact nor the reasons why are suggested in this bill, which, if it may be adopted for the disposition of such a case as the present, may just as well serve hereafter as a precedent, mutatis mutandis, for a bill to recover damages for deceit, in any case in which such damages are now sought by means of an action of tort.

It is quite true that, not only by force of our statutes, but upon general principles, courts of equity exercise a general jurisdiction in cases of fraud, sometimes concurrent with, and sometimes exclusive of, the common-law courts. Gen. St. c. 190, § 1; Snell, Eq. 359. And it is said that in some cases of fraud, for which the common law affords complete and adequate relief, chancery may have concurrent jurisdiction. Snell, Eq. 359. This general proposition, however, is too broad when applied to our practice, under the rules of evidence which permit or require parties to testify. In the English practice, and perhaps in some American states, equity may entertain this concurrent jurisdiction, because, although the remedy at law may be said to be adequate, the means of obtaining the truth, where discovery by the oath of the party is essential, may be wanting or deficient in the courts of common law. "The jurisdiction of the courts of equity for the enforcement of civil rights, as distinguished from the jurisdiction of the courts of common law, derives much of its utility from the power of the great seal to compel the defendant, in a suit, to discover and set forth, upon oath, every fact and circumstance within his knowledge, information, and belief material to the plaintiff's case." Adam, Eq. 1. But to a very great extent the right to enforce discovery, and to search the conscience of the party, which was formerly only to be had in chancery, is afforded in the practice and by the statutes of our law courts as fully and effectually as by a court of equity.

"Perhaps the most general, if not the most precise, description of a court of equity, in the English and American sense," says Judge Story, "is that it has jurisdiction in cases of rights recognized and protected by the municipal jurisprudence, where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy cannot be had in the courts of common law. The remedy must be plain, for, if it be doubtful and obscure at law, equity will assert a jurisdiction. It must be adequate, for, if at law it falls short of what the party is entitled to, that founds a jurisdiction in equity; and it must be complete, that is, it must attain the full end and justice of the case. * * *

The jurisdiction of a court of equity is, therefore, sometimes concurrent with the jurisdiction of a court of law. It is sometimes exclusive of it, and it is sometimes auxiliary to it." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 33.

In the matter of actual fraud, Blackstone has said that "courts of equity are established to detect latent frauds and concealments which the process of the courts of law is not adapted to reach." 3 Bl. Comm. 431. And although it may still be that courts of liberal equity powers may entertain concurrent jurisdiction with the courts of law, even in those cases of fraud which are effectually remediable in the latter, such jurisdiction is very seldom exercised anywhere, as we believe, and never, to our knowledge, in this state. Its ordinary application is restricted to cases in which a decree is required compelling the wrongdoer, specifically, to make good his default; "and therefore," says Mr. Adams, "if the wrong require specific redress, and such specific redress is not attainable at law, there is a prerogative jurisdiction in equity to relieve." Adams' Eq., Introduction *xxxv. Sometimes, also, where the remedy at law would seem to be effectual, equity will entertain jurisdiction for the sake of avoiding circuitry of action or multiplicity of suits. Smith, Man. Eq. § 1. Indeed, as we regard it, the correct principle is laid down by Judge Story in his Equity Pleadings (section 473), where he says, "In general, courts of equity will not assume jurisdiction where the powers of the ordinary courts are sufficient for the purposes of justice, and therefore it may be stated as a general rule, subject to few exceptions, that where the plaintiff can have as effectual and complete a remedy in a court of law as in a court of equity, and that remedy is direct, certain, and adequate, a demurrer, which is in truth a demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court, will hold; but where there is a clear right, and yet there is no remedy in a court of law, or the remedy is not plain, adequate, and complete, and adapted to the particular exigency, then, and in such cases, courts of equity will maintain jurisdiction." And see 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 610.

Although the plaintiffs have not told us, in their complaint, wherein their remedy is deficient at law, they have suggested it in argument. They say, "It is a recognized rule that equity will give relief against fraud upon less direct proof than would induce a court of law to afford the same relief." But the only difference in the quality of proof seems to be with regard to the matter of presumptions; and although it is said, in support of the plaintiffs' general proposition, that courts of equity will grant relief upon the ground of fraud, established by such presumptive evidence as courts of law would not always deem sufficient proof to justify a verdict (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 190), it seems quite manifest from the charge of the plaintiffs' bill that they cannot support or derive aid to their claim from any presumptions other than those which could as well be deduced in a court of law as in equity, from the circumstances which may be disclosed and developed before a jury.

Again, the plaintiffs say, "In equity the plaintiffs are entitled to search the conscience of the defendant, and to have the benefit of his answer under oath, or of his refusal so to make it; and it is not quite certain that the defendant could be compelled to state facts as a witness which, while they would make out the plaintiffs' case, would expose him to another indictment." But our statute, permitting and compelling the testimony of parties in civil actions, seems to afford all the advantages claimed for chancery jurisdiction in this respect; and an answer to a question, searching the defendant's conscience to its lowest depths, could not, after his conviction for the libel which he uttered and the plaintiffs published, be now avoided on the ground of its tendency to expose him to a criminal prosecution, that prosecution and its consequences having once been suffered and expiated.

And, finally, they submit that "the remedy may be neither plain nor adequate, which depends upon the unwilling testimony of a convicted libeler." But a remedy will not be regarded as inadequate simply because it may be said that the evidence required to enforce it is that of an unwilling, or perhaps an untruthful, witness; and, moreover, it is not very apparent that equity is more effectual than the law to extract truth from the lips of an unwilling "convicted libeler." In the one tribunal, as in the other, the process is the same; in the one tribunal, as in the other, both parties may testify, and both be cross-examined.

In short, we are unable to discover any sufficient grounds for entertaining equitable jurisdiction of the plaintiffs' case. If the plaintiffs are entitled to relief, their remedy is plain, and not doubtful or obscure. It is by an action on the case for deceit. It is adequate, and does not fall short of what the party is entitled to, that is, it entitles him to a verdict for full and ample damages, and a judgment and execution thereon, with costs, to be levied upon his goods or estate, and, for want thereof, upon his body. And in this particular it is complete, attaining the full end and justice of the case, which requires no other decree than such a judgment and execution. In all these particulars, the definition of the terms "plain, adequate, and complete," as furnished by the books, is fully satisfied. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 33.

It is unnecessary to entertain the question whether the plaintiffs, upon the statements contained in their bill, might have a remedy at law. It would seem that everything alleged in the bill might, upon the indictment against them, have been shown in evidence. Whether, if proven by credible testimony, it would constitute a legal defense, we need not now inquire. It is said that, before a person gives general notoriety to oral calumny by circulating it in print, he must be prepared to prove its truth to the letter. An editor gives publicity to a private slander at his own risk, for he has no more right to take away the character of a man, without being able to prove the charge that he has made against him, than he has to take his property, without being able to justify the act by which he possessed himself of it. Add. Torts, 775, 776. And even the truth of the thing charged is in many jurisdictions inadmissible as a justification, and, if admitted at all, can only be received to rebut or refute the proof or inference of malice, which is said to constitute the essence of the offense. Whart. Cr. Law, 850.

It would seem that if the plaintiffs might have shown the facts which they now allege in defense of the indictment upon which they have been convicted, or if the proffered testimony was inadmissible, because affording no justification, the conviction must be regarded as putting all the parties to this bill in pari delicto, and that the plaintiffs can therefore have no claim, either in law or equity, for relief.

Bill dismissed.

BUZARD et al. v. HOUSTON.

(7 Sup. Ct. 249, 119 U. S. 347.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Dec. 13, 1886.

Appeal from the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Texas.

This was a bill in equity, filed November 23, 1881, by Buzard and Hillard, citizens of Missouri, against Houston, a citizen of Texas, the material allegations of which were as follows:

That the plaintiffs were partners in the business of pasturing and breeding cattle upon a tract of land owned by them in the state of Texas, and on October 14, 1881, negotiated a purchase from the defendants of 1,500 cows and 50 bulls, to be delivered at Lampasas, in that state, in May, 1882, at the price of $15.50 a head, one-half payable upon the signing of the contract, and the other half upon delivery of the cattle; that the terms of their agreement were stated in a memorandum of that date, signed by the parties, and intended as the basis of a more formal contract to be afterwards executed; and that the plaintiffs at once paid to the defendant $500 in part performance. That on October 31, 1881, the parties resumed negotiations, and met to complete the contract; that the defendant then proposed that, in lieu of the contract with him for the cattle mentioned in the memorandum, the plaintiffs should take from him an assignment of a similar contract in writing, dated August 13, 1881, and set forth in the bill, by which one Mosty agreed to deliver to the defendant an equal number of similar cattle, at the same time and place, at the price of $14 a head; that the defendant then stated that he had paid the sum of $15,000 on the contract with Mosty; and asked that, in case of his assigning that contract to the plaintiffs, they should pay him that sum, and also the difference of $1.50 a head in the prices mentioned in the two contracts, but finally proposed to deduct from this 25 cents a head; that, as an inducement to the plaintiffs to make the exchange of contracts, the defendant represented to them that Mosty was good and solvent, and able to perform his contract; that he was better than the defendant, and then had on his ranch 1,200 head of the cattle; and that there was no doubt of the performance of this contract, because one McNulty was a partner with Mosty in its performance; of all which the plaintiffs knew nothing, except that they knew that McNulty was a man of wealth, and fully able as well as willing to perform his contracts.

That on November 1, 1881, the plaintiffs, believing and relying on the defendant's representations aforesaid, accepted his proposition, and paid the sum of $14,500, making, with the sum of $500 already paid, the amount of $15,000, which he alleged he had paid to Mosty on his contract, and executed and delivered to the defendant their obligation to pay him, on the performance by Mosty of that contract, an additional sum of $1,837.50, being the profit on the contract with Mosty in the sale to the plaintiffs, less the deduction of 25 cents a head; and returned to him his original contract with them, and in lieu thereof received from him his contract with Mosty, and his assignment thereof to the plaintiffs indorsed thereon, and set out in the bill, containing a provision that he should not be responsible in case of any failure of performance by Mosty; that the aforesaid representations of the defendant were absolutely untrue, deceitful, and fraudulent, and were known by the defendant to be false, and the plaintiffs did not know and had no means of knowing that they were untrue; that those representations were intended by the defendant to deceive the plaintiffs, and did deceive them, to their great injury, to-wit, to the extent of the amount of $15,000 paid by them to him, and to the further extent of $10,000 for the expenses necessary to obtain other cattle, and for the loss of the increase of such cattle for the next year by reason of the impossibility of obtaining them in the exhausted condition of the market; and that Mosty, at the time of the assignment, was absolutely insolvent, and had no property subject to be taken by his creditors, and his contract was utterly worthless, as the defendant then knew.

The bill then stated that the plaintiffs brought into court the contract between the defendant and Mosty, that it might be delivered up to the defendant; and also the assignment thereof by the defendant to the plaintiffs, that it might be canceled. The bill prayed for a discovery; for a rescission and cancellation of the assignment of the contract with Mosty, and also of the plaintiffs' obligation to pay to the defendant the sum of $1,837.50; for the repayment to the plaintiffs of the excess of money received by the defendant from them beyond the amount which they were to pay him under the original contract; for a reinstatement and confirmation of that contract, and its enforcement upon such terms as the court might deem just and proper; or, if that could not be done, that the defendant be compelled to restore to the plaintiffs the sums of $500 and $14,500 received from them, and also to pay them the sum of $10,000 for damages which they had sustained by reason of the defendant's fraudulently obtaining the surrender of the original contract, and by reason of the other injuries resulting to them therefrom; and for further relief.

The defendant demurred to the bill, assigning as a cause of demurrer that the bill showed that the plaintiffs' only cause of action, if any, was for the sums of money paid by them on the contract, and for damages for breach of the contract, for which they had an adequate and complete remedy at law. The circuit court overruled the demurrer. The defendant then answered fully under oath, denying that he made any of the representations alleged, and repeating the defense taken by demurrer; the plaintiffs filed a general replication; conflicting testimony was taken; at a hearing upon pleadings and proofs the bill was dismissed, with costs; and the plaintiffs appealed to this court.

H. E. Barnard, for appellants Buzard and another. Jas. F. Miller, for appellee Houston.

Mr. Justice GRAY, after stating the case as above reported, delivered the opinion of the court.

In the judiciary act of 1789, by which the first congress established the judicial courts of the United States, and defined their jurisdiction, it is enacted that "suits in equity shall not be sustained in either of the courts of the United States, in any case where plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law." Act of September 24, 1789, c. 20, § 16 (1 Stat. 82; Rev. St. § 723.) Five days later, on September 29, 1789, the same congress proposed to the legislatures of the several states the article afterwards ratified as the seventh amendment of the constitution, which declares that "in suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." 1 Stat. 21, 98.

The effect of the provision of the judiciary act, as often stated by this court, is that "whenever a court of law is competent to take cognizance of a right, and has power to proceed to a judgment which affords a plain, adequate, and complete remedy, without the aid of a court of equity, the plaintiff must proceed at law, because the defendant has a constitutional right to a trial by jury." Hipp v. Babin, 19 How. 271, 278; Insurance Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, 621; Grand Chute v. Winegar, 15 Wall. 373, 375; Lewis v. Cocks, 23 Wall. 466, 470; Root v. Railway Co., 105 U. S. 189, 212; Killian v. Ebbinghaus, 110 U. S. 568, 573, 4 Sup. Ct. 232. In a very recent case the court said: "This enactment certainly means something; and, if only declaratory of what was always the law, it must, at least, have been intended to emphasize the rule, and to impress it upon the attention of the courts." New York Guaranty Co. v. Memphis Water Co., 107 U. S. 205, 214, 2 Sup. Ct. 279.

Accordingly a suit in equity to enforce a legal right can be brought only when the court can give more complete and effectual relief, in kind or in degree, on the equity side, than on the common-law side; as for instance, by compelling a specific performance, or the removal of a cloud on the title to real estate; or preventing an injury for which damages are not recoverable at law, as in Watson v. Sutherland, 5 Wall. 74; or where an agreement procured by fraud is of a continuing nature, and its rescission will prevent a multiplicity of suits, as in Boyce v. Grundy, 3 Pet. 210, 215, and in Jones v. Bolles, 9 Wall. 364, 369. In cases of fraud or mistake, as under any other head of chancery jurisdiction, a court of the United States will not sustain a bill in equity to obtain only a decree for the payment of money by way of damages, when the like amount can be recovered at law in an action sounding in tort or for money had and received. Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S. 487, 500, 1 Sup. Ct. 442; Ambler v. Choteau, 107 U. S. 586, 1 Sup. Ct. 556; Litchfield v. Ballou, 114 U. S. 190, 5 Sup. Ct. 820.

In England, indeed, the court of chancery, in cases of fraud, has sometimes maintained bills in equity to recover the same damages which might be recovered in an action for money had and received. But the reason for this, as clearly brought out by Lords Justices Knight Bruce and Turner, in Slim v. Croucher, 1 De Gex, F. & J. 518, 527, 528, was that such cases were within the ancient and original jurisdiction in chancery before any court of law had acquired jurisdiction of them, and that the assumption of jurisdiction by the courts of law, by gradually extending their powers, did not displace the earlier jurisdiction of the court of chancery. Upon any other ground, such bills could not be maintained. Clifford v. Brooke, 13 Ves. 131; Thompson v. Barclay, 9 Law J. Ch. 215, 218. And we have not been referred to any instance in which an English court of equity has maintained a bill in such a case as that now before us. In Newham v. May, 13 Price, 749, Chief Baron Alexander said: "It is not in every case of fraud that relief is to be administered by a court of equity. In the case, for instance, of a fraudulent warranty on the sale of a horse, or any fraud upon the sale of a chattel, no one, I apprehend, ever thought of filing a bill in equity."

The present bill states a case for which an action of deceit could be maintained at law, and would afford full, adequate, and complete remedy. The original agreement for the sale of a number of cattle, and not of any cattle in particular, does not belong to the class of contracts of which equity would decree specific performance. If the plaintiffs should be ordered to be reinstated in all their rights under that agreement, and permitted now to tender performance thereof on their part, the only relief which they could have in this suit would be a decree for damages, to be assessed by the same rules as in an action at law. The similar contract with Mosty, and the assignment thereof to the plaintiffs, are in the plaintiffs' own possession, and no judicial rescission of the assignment is needed. If the exchange of the contract was procured by the fraud alleged, it would be no more binding upon the plaintiffs at law than in equity; and in an action of deceit the plaintiffs might treat the assignment of the contract with Mosty as void, and, upon delivering up that contract to the defendant, recover full damages for the non-performance of the original agreement. No relief is sought against Mosty, and he is not made a party to the bill. The obligation executed by the plaintiffs to the defendant is not negotiable, so that there is no need of an injunction. A judgment for pecuniary damages would adjust and determine all the rights of the parties, and is the only redress to which the plaintiffs, if they prove their allegations, are entitled. There is therefore no ground upon which the bill can be maintained. Insurance Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616, and other cases above cited.

The comparative weight due to conflicting testimony such as was introduced in this case can be much better determined by seeing and hearing the witnesses than upon written depositions or a printed record.

This case does not require us to enter upon a consideration of the question under what circumstances a bill showing no ground for equitable relief, and praying for discovery as incidental only to the relief sought, is open to a demurrer to the whole bill, or may, if discovery is obtained, be retained for the purposes of granting full relief, within the rule often stated in the books, but as to the proper limits of which the authorities are conflicting. It is enough to say that the case clearly falls within the statement of Chief Justice Marshall: "But this rule cannot be abused by being employed as a mere pretext for bringing causes, proper for a court of law, into a court of equity. If the answer of the defendant discloses nothing, and the plaintiff supports his claim by evidence in his own possession, unaided by the confessions of the defendant, the established rules, limiting the jurisdiction of courts, require that he should be dismissed from the court of chancery, and permitted to assert his rights in a court of law." Russell v. Clark, 7 Cranch, 69, 89. See, also, Horsburg v. Baker, 1 Pet. 232, 236; Brown v. Swann, 10 Pet. 497, 503.

The decree of the circuit court, dismissing the bill generally, might be considered a bar to an action at law, and it is therefore, in accordance with the precedents in Rogers v. Durant, 106 U. S. 644, 1 Sup. Ct. 623, and the cases there cited, ordered that the decree be reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to enter a decree dismissing the bill for want of jurisdiction, and without prejudice to an action at law.

BRADLEY, J. (dissenting.) I dissent from the judgment in this case so far as it directs the bill to be dismissed by the court below for want of equitable jurisdiction. The complainant had been induced to give up a contract for cattle made to him by the defendant, and to accept in lieu of it an assignment from the defendant of a contract which he had from a third person who was insolvent, and whose insolvency was not known by the complainant, but was known by the defendant, though he asserted that the third person was entirely responsible. The bill seeks to abrogate and set aside the assignment, and to restore to complainant his original contract, on account of the fraud and misrepresentation practiced upon him. Having been induced to pay $15,000 in the transaction, and suffered a large amount of damages, he adds to the relief sought a prayer to have his damages assessed and decreed. This is the case made by the bill. I think it is clearly within the scope of equity jurisdiction, both on account of the fraud, and from the nature of the relief asked by the complainant; namely, the cancellation of an agreement, and the reinstatement of a contract which he had been fraudulently induced to cancel. If the bill had prayed nothing else, it seems to me clear that it would have presented a case for equity. A court of law could not give adequate relief. The existence of the assignment, and the cancellation of the first agreement, would embarrass the plaintiff in an action at law. It is different from the case of a lost note or bond. Fraud is charged, and documents exist which in equity ought not to exist. I think the complainant is entitled to have the fraudulent transaction wiped out, and to be restored to his original status.

TEFT v. STEWART et al.

(31 Mich. 367.)

Supreme Court of Michigan. Jan. Term, 1875.

Appeal from circuit court, Berrien county; in chancery.

Edward Bacon, for complainant. George S. Clapp and D. Darwin Hughes, for defendants.

GRAVES, C. J. The real grievance alleged by complainant is, that defendants combined to defraud him, and the substance of the transaction, and its incidents, which he relates at much length, may be stated from the bill as follows:

The defendant Stewart resided in St. Joseph, Berrien county, and owned a stock of goods, including a quantity of boots and shoes. This property was at Bangor, Van Buren county, and was valued by Stewart at some fourteen thousand dollars, and he wished to sell it. One Sherwin, residing in Illinois, owned a tract of about two hundred acres of land in Berrien county, which he desired to dispose of. Complainant was an acquaintance of Sherwin, and after some negotiations, it was agreed between the different parties, that Stewart should transfer to complainant the boots and shoes and one-half of the remainder of the stock, and that complainant, in consideration thereof, should procure Sherwin, upon certain terms agreed on between Sherwin and complainant, to convey the land to Stewart, but subject to an existing mortgage on it of one thousand dollars; that Carroll should buy the remaining half of the stock of Stewart, at two thousand five hundred dollars; that complainant in a few days received from Sherwin the deed going to Stewart, and called on the latter to deliver it, and get possession of the boots and shoes and his share of the other goods; whereupon Stewart stated that complainant would have no trouble about the goods, as Carroll was at Bangor, in charge of them and making an inventory; that complainant expressed himself as unwilling to deliver the deed unless Stewart would give him some writing which would assure to him his portion, as he had nothing to do with Carroll; that Stewart then stated his readiness to give such a paper, and one Devoe, a brother-in-law of complainant, being present, it was arranged that the writing should run to Devoe instead of complainant; although, as was understood, complainant was solely interested; that Stewart then made a bill of sale to Devoe of the boots and shoes, and half of the rest of the stock, and added an order to Carroll to make delivery; that complainant then gave up the deed to Stewart, who subsequently put it on record, and Devoe received the bill of sale and order, and proceeded to Bangor for the property; that complainant and Devoe then called on Carroll for it, when he refused to deliver any of it, or to allow any of it to be taken, and claimed the whole in virtue of a purchase by himself of Stewart; that complainant succeeded in getting a part of the boots and shoes, but was precluded by Carroll from getting anything more; that complainant discovered, after this claim by Carroll, that subsequent to the conclusion of the terms of the bargain as before mentioned, but before the delivery of Sherwin's deed to Stewart, and the making of the bill of sale and order by Stewart to Devoe, Carroll and Stewart had fraudulently, and without complainant's knowledge, and with intent to cheat him, made an arrangement by which Stewart had given a bill of sale of the whole property to Carroll, and had taken back a mortgage on it for two thousand five hundred dollars; that complainant had neither knowledge nor notice of this transaction when the deed was delivered to Stewart, and the bill of sale and order received from him, and first became aware of it when Carroll refused to allow anything to be taken; that Stewart and Carroll refused to recognize any right of complainant in or to the property, and refused to allow him to have any of it; that Stewart and Carroll, or one of them, have converted a portion of it and appropriated the proceeds, and mixed with the rest of the old stock other goods since procured; that Devoe has assigned to complainant, but that Stewart and Carroll wholly deny his right.

The bill waived answer on oath, and asked no preliminary or final relief by injunction. Neither did it seek to get rid of the deed made to Stewart, or to obtain the land conveyed by Stewart to complainant.

The defendants answered separately, and denied the fraud charged, and most of the material matter tending to show the grievance alleged in the bill. Their account of the transaction was in substance, that complainant was not known to Stewart in the transaction as vendee, or as a party in any way to the trade concerning the goods, and that Carroll was sole vendee.

They further explicitly claimed that the bill did not make a case of equitable cognizance, and insisted that his remedy, if any, was at law.

Proofs having been taken, the court on final hearing decreed that the defendants, within forty days after the 11th of August, 1874, should pay to complainant, or his solicitor, two thousand nine hundred and fifty dollars, with interest from that date at seven per cent., together with complainant's costs, and that he should have execution therefor. The defendant Stewart thereupon appealed, whilst the defendant Carroll acquiesced in the decree.

It appears to me quite impossible, in the face of the objection taken and insisted on, to sustain this decree without sanctioning the right to come into equity in all cases to recover damages where the grievance asserted is a fraud committed by one upon another in a dealing in personal property.

If the right contended for and carried out by the decree can be maintained, no reason is perceived why, upon the same principle, a party claiming to have been cheated in a horse trade, or in a purchase of any chattels where the amount is sufficient, may not at his election proceed to sue in chancery for damages, and preclude an investigation before a jury.

The principles and course of practice of the court are, however, not in harmony with any such procedure.

It is admitted that the books commonly say that equity has jurisdiction in all cases of fraud, but every one knows that the proposition is not to be accepted literally. It must always be understood in connection with the general and specific remedial powers of the court. These confine it absolutely to civil suits. They also confine it, when the point is seasonably and properly made and insisted on, to transactions where, in consequence of the indicated state of facts, there appears to be ground for employing some mode of action, or some kind of aid or relief not practicable in a court of law, but allowable in equity.

In the present case no injunction was called for, and there was no ground for discovery, and no discovery was sought, as the bill waived an answer on oath.

No claim was set up to have the deed from Sherwin to Stewart set aside, or to have the land conveyed to complainant, and no case is made to warrant such a claim, since the bill contains nothing to show that third persons may not have acquired interests on the faith of Stewart's title.

Indeed, no circumstances are set forth to call specially for equitable intervention or for any assistance or mode of redress peculiar to chancery procedure.

The facts as given, and the case as shaped, point to just the action and relief peculiar to a court of law. They look to a single judgment for damages, and nothing else.

The case, then, was really of legal, and not in strict propriety of equitable cognizance.

The objection was timely made and urged, and complainant was bound to regard it; and unless it is to be maintained that in all cases standing on the same principle, a complaining party is to be allowed by his election to try in chancery, and prevent an investigation by jury, the point made by appellant must be sustained, and in my judgment it should be. Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 72-74; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 691-700; Adams, Eq. Introduction, pp. 57, 58; Shepard v. Sanford, 3 Barb. Ch. 127; Bradley v. Bosley, 1 Barb. Ch. 125; Monk v. Harper, 3 Edw. Ch. 109; Pierpont v. Fowle, 2 Woodb. & M. 23, Fed. Cas. No. 11,152; Vose v. Philbrook, 3 Story, 335, Fed. Cas. No. 17,010; Insurance Co. v. Bailey, 13 Wall. 616; Hipp v. Babin, 19 How. 271; Parker v. Manufacturing Co., 2 Black, 545; Jones v. Newhall, 115 Mass. 244; Suter v. Matthews, Id. 253; Foley v. Hill, 2 H. L. Cas. 28; Crampton v. Varna R. Co., 7 Ch. App. 562, 3 Eng. R. 509; Hoare v. Bremridge, L. R. 14 Eq. 522, 3 Eng. R. 824, cited by Lord Hatherly with approbation in Ochsenbein v. Papelier, 8 Ch. App. 695, 6 Eng. R. 576; Kemp v. Tucker, 8 Ch. App. 369, 5 Eng. R. 596; Warne v. Banking Co., 5 N. J. Eq. 410; Haythorn v. Margerem, 7 N. J. Eq. 324.

There would be more reason than there is for wishing to escape from the objection noticed, if complainant's version of the affair was placed by the proofs beyond fair controversy; but it is not. The evidence is extremely conflicting in regard to the true nature of the transaction, and there is room for arguing in favor of the theory advanced on each side. The case is, then, specifically suited for investigation by jury, where the witnesses can be seen and their trustworthiness be better understood.

I think that, so far as the defendant Stewart is concerned, who alone has appealed, the decree should be reversed, and the bill dismissed, with his costs of both courts, but that the dismissal should be without prejudice to any proceedings at law against him the complainant may think proper to take.

CAMPBELL and COOLEY, JJ., concurred. CHRISTIANCY, J., did not sit in this case.

HICKS v. STEVENS.

(11 N. E. 241, 121 Ill. 186.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. March 22, 1887.

Error to appellate court, First district.

Stevens, the plaintiff, was introduced to Hicks, the defendant, by Jones, who had the option for purchasing the rights in tube-closer, an invention of Hicks, for the state of New York. Stevens talked with Hicks about investing in it. Hicks asked $50,000 for each of several states, including Pennsylvania and Ohio, and that the rights for each of these states were worth that sum, as were also the rights for the state of New York. After several interviews, Stevens told Jones he should have to give it up, as Hicks' prices were too high. Jones then asked him to take half of New York with him, and that they go in as partners on an option he had to purchase that state for $20,000. Negotiations were had, and a number of interviews took place, at which representations were made by Hicks as to the capabilities and merits of his invention, and Hicks gave Stevens a circular containing a description of such capabilities. May 30, 1883, an agreement of purchase was executed by the parties, wherein Hicks sold to Jones and Stevens the territorial rights for the state of New York to make and sell the Hicks Tube-closer. Stevens executed his three notes for $2,500 each, and delivered them to Hicks, and shortly thereafter paid him $2,500 in cash. Jones did the same. Stevens paid Jones $250, half of the amount he paid Hicks for the option. This sum Hicks gave Stevens credit for on one of his notes. Being unable to sell the tube-closer, October 16, 1883, Stevens and Jones gave Hicks a reassignment of their rights, and demanded their money and notes, which Hicks refused to give up. October 23d, Stevens notified Hicks in writing that he rescinded the contract, and demanded a return of the consideration. November 5th he filed his bill to rescind the contract, and recover the money and notes. The judge found that the patent was worthless; that Hicks' representations were material and false; and decreed that the contract be rescinded, and that the $2,500 paid and the notes be returned, but did not decree the repayment of the $250 paid by Stevens to Jones, and indorsed by Hicks on one of Stevens' notes.

On appeal the appellate court affirmed the decree, except that it added the $250 paid by Stevens to Jones to the money decree.

H. W. Wolseley, for plaintiff in error. Utman Strong and Edward A. Dicker, for defendant in error.

SHOPE, J. There is no disputing as to the making of the contract of sale in this case, or as to its terms; the principal controversy being whether Hicks, before the sale, made material representations as to the utility and value of the invention sold, which were relied on by Stevens, and which were false.

The evidence satisfies us that, prior to the consummation of the sale, the parties had frequent interviews, in which Hicks represented to Stevens and Jones that the Hicks Tube-closer was a new and valuable invention, and would save both steam and fuel; that it was a good and profitable thing to sell, and would bring great profits. Hicks also gave Stevens a printed circular setting forth therein its capabilities and merits, which, among other things, stated that "the use of the tube-closer demonstrates to a positive certainty its ability to show by the steam-gauge, in the morning, before firing up, the same steam pressure that is felt at night after the day's work. It will even hold steam in the boiler from Saturday night until Monday morning. It is guaranteed to save fully 15 per cent. of fuel, or whatever fuel is usually required to raise steam in the morning. The Hicks tube-closer will do it. It will save its cost every month." Hicks also assured Stevens, in some of the interviews, that the right to make and sell the tube-closer in either of the states of Ohio or Pennsylvania was worth $50,000; that the right to the state of New York was worth the same sum; and that the appliances could be manufactured for five dollars apiece, and would sell for $30 each, and that there was not less than 2,000 boilers in each of the states named. Most of these representations, especially those in the circulars, are not denied. Hicks, by his answer and testimony, claims that all the representations he in fact made were true, but, whether true or false, they were not relied on by Stevens in making the purchase.

It is claimed there was an error in admitting in evidence the verbal statements made by Hicks, in regard to the tube-closer, prior to the written agreement for its sale. Such statements were not admitted for the purpose of changing the terms of the written contract, but to show that its execution was procured through fraudulent misrepresentations on the part of the vendor, and for that purpose it was certainly proper. But it is said there is no charge of fraud in the bill, and hence there was no foundation in the pleadings to justify the admission of the evidence. This is a misapprehension. Good pleading requires fraud to be charged specifically, and not in general terms. The facts relied on as constituting fraud should be set forth so as to apprise the opposite party what he is called on to meet. Elston v. Blanchard, 2 Scam. 420; Davis v. Pickett, 72 Ill. 483. The bill sets forth the specific representations made by Hicks which induced the complainant to make the purchase, and then charges "that the representations in the circular given by Hicks to the complainant and Jones, and the representation that by Hicks' experience, by the use of said invention, great saving of steam and fuel could be made, and other representations of like effect, whereby complainant and Jones were induced to purchase said rights, are and were utterly false, and said invention is worthless, and by its use no saving of any practical value can be made," and were known by Hicks to be worthless and of no value. The facts alleged in the bill, if true, constitute a fraud. If it were otherwise, Hicks should have interposed a demurrer or motion to dismiss for want of equity.

It is urged that Stevens did not rely on any of the representations made by Hicks, but acted upon his own judgment; and that, if he did rely upon them, he was guilty of such negligence, in failing to properly investigate, as to deprive him of any equitable relief. To entitle a party to relief, either legal or equitable, on the ground of a fraudulent misrepresentation, he must have relied upon the representation as true; for unless the representations are believed to be true, and acted upon, it can cause no legal injury. It is necessary that he should trust the representation, but it is not essential that the false representations should be the sole inducement to his entering into the contract. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 890; 2 Pars. Cont. (5th Ed.) 773. The party acting upon a representation must, under the circumstances of the case, have been justified in relying upon it, in order to entitle him to relief. As stated in Pom. Eq. Jur. § 891: "It may be laid down as a general proposition that where the statements are of the first kind, [relating to substantial matters of fact, and not mere opinion,] and especially when they are concerning matters which, from their nature or situation, may be assumed to be within the knowledge or under the power of the party making the representation, the party to whom it is made has a right to rely on them; and, in the absence of any knowledge of his own, or of any facts which should arouse suspicion and cast doubt upon the truth of the statements, he is not bound to make inquiries and examination for himself. It does not, under such circumstances, lie in the mouth of the person asserting the fact to object or complain because the other took him at his word. If he claims that the other party was not misled, he is bound to show clearly that such party did know the real facts; the burden is on him of removing the presumption that such party relied and acted upon his statements." And in section 895 the same author says: "When a representation is made of facts which are, or may be assumed to be, within the knowledge of the party making it, the knowledge of the receiving party concerning the real facts, which shall prevent his relying on and being misled by it, must be clearly and conclusively established by the evidence."

When a party, ignorant of the real facts, and having no ready means of information, makes a purchase, or enters into a transaction as to the subject-matter of which representations have been made which are material, the law will presume, as a matter of fact, that he relied on them. Redgrave v. Hurd, 20 Ch. Div. 1; Nicols' Case, 3 De Gex & J. 387; Fishback v. Miller, 15 Nev.

428; Benj. Sales (4th Am. Ed.) 465, note b. If false representations are made as to matters of fact, and the means of knowledge are at hand, and equally available to both parties, and the purchaser, instead of resorting to them, trusts the vendor, the law, as a general rule, will not relieve him from his own want of ordinary prudence. Cooley, Torts, 487. This is the case where the property is tangible and is at hand, and subject to inspection, but a different rule obtains when the property is at a remote distance, or where the property right is intangible, and the falsity of the representations cannot be detected by inspection. In Smith v. Richards, 13 Pet. 26, it is held that when a sale is made of property, but at a remote distance, which the purchaser knows that the seller has never seen, but which he buys upon the representation of the seller, relying on its truth, such representation in effect must be deemed to amount to a warranty, or at least that the seller is bound to make it good. Cooley, Torts, 488; Maggart v. Freeman, 27 Ind. 531; Lester v. Hahan, 25 Ala. 445.

In the case at bar the purchaser was wholly unacquainted with the use, operation, and management of steam-boilers, and of the utility and value of the invention, and it is doubtful whether its capabilities, usefulness, and practical value could then have been determined, even by experts, without very considerable use and long experiment. At the date of this contract, the patent, though allowed, had not been issued, and but few of the tube-closers had been used or tested by others than the inventor. Stevens testifies that he had not seen the tube-closer in use or operation before he signed the contract; that he inquired of several to whom he was referred by Hicks, but could learn nothing as to their merits, except from one party, who said they had tried it, but had thrown it away. When Hicks was informed of this, he said he had met a similar case, and had fixed it up so that it worked all right, and that he would do the same with this one. Hicks was the inventor, and claimed to have made thorough tests of his invention, and presumably had a greater knowledge of its use, capabilities, utility, and value than any other person. From these facts, and his profession of friendship to Jones, and of his desire to put him into a good paying business, we think Stevens and Jones not only relied upon the representations, but had a right to rely on them in making their purchase. Allin v. Millison, 72 Ill. 201.

It is true that Hicks told Stevens and Jones not to take his word, but to satisfy themselves as to the merit of his invention before buying, but this cannot relieve him from liability for his misrepresentation made for the purpose of inducing the purchase. He must have known that but little, if any, information could be obtained by inquiry, from the fact the tube-closer had not been brought into general use. The inquiries made proved fruitless, as he must have known they would. In 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 896, it is said: "If, therefore, the party accompanies or follows his misrepresentations by words of general caution, or by advice to the other that he consult his friends or professional advisers before concluding the agreement, he does not thereby counteract any effect upon the transaction which his untrue statement would otherwise produce;" citing Reynel v. Sprye, 1 De Gex, M & G. 709; Smith v. Richards, 13 Pet. 26. In Eaton v. Winnie, 20 Mich. 156, the court say: "When one assumes to have knowledge upon a subject of which another may well be ignorant, and knowingly makes false statements regarding it, upon which the other relies, to his injury, we do not think it lies with him to say that the party who took his word, and relied upon it, was guilty of negligence in so doing, so as to be precluded from recovering compensation for the injury which was inflicted upon him under cover of the falsehood;" citing Railroad Co. v. Ogier, 35 Pa. 72; Gordon v. Railroad Co., 40 Barb. 550; Ernst v. Railroad Co., 35 N. Y. 28. See, also, Walsh v. Hall, 66 N. C. 233; Oswald v. McGehee, 28 Miss. 340; McClellan v. Scott, 24 Wis. 81; Starkweather v. Benjamin, 32 Mich. 305; Kendall v. Wilson, 41 Vt. 567; Pierce v. Wilson, 34 Ala. 603.

To maintain an action at law for fraud and deceit arising from false representations of a material matter connected with a transaction, it is necessary to show that the party making it knew it to be false, or occupied such a position as that the law would impute to him a knowledge of the fact. A person cannot, it is believed, be free from fraud in a court of equity when he makes a positive representation of a material fact which he does not know to be true, or has good reason to believe is true, and which in point of fact is false. In Allen v. Hart, 72 Ill. 104, it is held that it is not indispensable to a right to rescind a contract that the party making the representation knew it to be false, provided it is material, and the other party had a right to rely upon it, and did so, and was deceived; and this is believed to be sustained by the weight of authority. In this case, Hicks' facilities were superior to those of any one else for knowing whether the representations made by him were true. If he did not in fact know them to be true, he should not have so asserted to Stevens, whom he knew had no means at hand by which to detect their falsity.

There was no error in admitting in evidence the printed circular of Hicks, showing the valuable qualities of his invention. The proof shows that he gave Stevens one of them during their negotiations, containing material and important representations of what his invention would accomplish as a means of saving steam and fuel; that it would save its cost in a month; while the proof showed that practically it was of no value in the respect mentioned in the circular. These circulars were printed and distributed for the purpose of inducing others to purchase rights of him, and the statements therein may be regarded as of a more deliberate character than if made in a conversation. They were properly admitted. See 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 881, and also Cooley, Torts, 477.

As a general rule, representations as to the value of property sold, though exaggerated, do not constitute fraud, but it has some exceptions. As said in Cooley, Torts (page 484): "There are some cases, however, in which even a false assertion of an opinion will amount to a fraud; the reason being that under the circumstances the other party has a right to rely upon it without bringing his own judgment to bear. Such is the case when one is purchasing goods, the value of which can only be known to experts, and is relying upon the vendor, who is a dealer in such goods, to give him accurate information concerning them. The same rule has been applied when a dealer in patent-rights sold certain territory to one who was ignorant of its value, representing it to be very valuable, when he knew it was not." See Allen v. Hart, 72 Ill. 104. The value of a patent-right for the purpose of sales depends largely upon the usefulness of the invention, and the demand for the article patented.

Objection is made to the admissibility of some other evidence. In chancery it will be presumed that the court considered and acted only upon such as may be proper. As the other evidence in the case is sufficient to sustain the decree of the superior court, it will not be necessary to consider the objection.

It is also claimed that the appellate court erred in directing that the $250 paid by Stevens be added to the money decree. Before Stevens was introduced to Hicks, the latter made sale to Jones of an option to purchase the right to the state of New York at $20,000, and Jones had paid him $500 therefor. Jones was not bound to take the right for the state of New York, but, if he did not, he could not recover back the money he had paid for the option. Stevens bought of Jones a half interest in the option, for which he paid Jones $250. To this transaction Hicks was not a party. If Jones and Stevens together failed to purchase the state right, Stevens could not have called on Hicks to refund to him the money he had paid to Jones; and, when the contract for the purchase of the right for the state of New York was rescinded, it was the same, in substance, as if it had never been made. Hicks was again placed where he was before his sale, and Jones and Stevens having failed to exercise their option, could not compel Hicks to return the price paid for it. The bill did not seek to set aside and rescind Jones' contract for the purchase of the option; nor did Hicks refuse to let either Jones, or Jones and Stevens, purchase the right for the state of New York, but, on the contrary, was anxious to have them take it. This ruling of the appellate court is, we think, clearly erroneous.

The judgment of the appellate court will be reversed as to so much of its judgment as adds to the decree the said sum of $250, and the decree of the superior court is affirmed. Reversed in part, and affirmed in part.

STIMSON v. HELPS et al.
(10 Pac. Rep. 290, 9 Colo. 33.)

Supreme Court of Colorado. Feb. 26, 1886.

Appeal from county court, Boulder county.

The complaint sets out that on the sixth day of October, 1881, William Stimson leased to the defendants in error the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 21, in township 1, range 70 west, in said county, for the period of four years and six months, for the purpose of mining for coal, under the conditions of said lease; that they had no knowledge of the location of the boundary lines of said tract at the time of the leasing, and that they so informed Stimson, the defendant in the case; that they requested Stimson to go with them and show them the boundary lines; that the defendant, pretending to know the lines bounding said land, and their exact locality, went then and there with plaintiffs, and showed and pointed out to them what he said was the leased land, and the boundary lines thereof, especially the north and south lines thereof; that plaintiffs not then knowing the lines bounding said land, nor the exact location thereof, and relying upon what the defendant then and there pointed out to them as the leased land, and the lines thereof, then and there proceeded to work on the land pointed out, and sank shafts for mining coal thereon, and made sundry improvements thereon,—made buildings, laid tracks, etc.; that all the said work was done and labor performed and improvements made on the land pointed out by defendant to plaintiffs as the leased land, and that plaintiffs, relying upon the statements of defendant as aforesaid, and not knowing otherwise, believed they were performing the work, and making all the improvements on the land they had so leased, which they did by direction of the defendant; that while they were working on the said land Stimson was frequently present, and told the plaintiffs they were on his land, and received royalty from ore taken therefrom; that about April 10, 1882, they were notified to quit mining on said ground by the Marshall Coal Mining Company; that the land belonged to said company; that none of the said improvements were put on said leased land; and that they were compelled to quit work and mining thereon; that the improvements made by them were worth \$2,000; that Stimson falsely represented to them other and different lines than the true boundaries of said premises, and showed and pointed out to them other and different lands than the lands leased them, and thereby deceived them, and damaged them, in the sum of \$2,000. Issue joined, and trial to the court. Motion by defendant's counsel for judgment on the pleadings, and evidence overruled. Judgment for the plaintiffs in the sum of \$2,000, and costs.

Wright & Griffin, for appellant. G. Berkeley, for appellees.

ELBERT, J. The law holds a contracting party liable as for fraud on his express representations concerning facts material to the treaty, the truth of which he assumes to know, and the truth of which is not known to the other contracting party, where the representations were false, and the other party, relying upon them, has been misled to his injury. Upon such representations so made the contracting party to whom they are made has a right to rely, nor is there any duty of investigation cast upon him. In such a case the law holds a party bound to know the truth of his representations. Bigelow, Fraud, 57, 60, 63, 67, 68, 87; Kerr, Fraud & M. 54 et seq.; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 436. This is the law of this case, and, on the evidence, warranted the judgment of the court below.

The objection was made below, and is renewed here, that the complaint does not state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action. Two points are made: (1) That the complaint does not allege that the defendant knew the representations to be false; (2) that it does not allege intent to defraud.

It is not necessary, in order to constitute a fraud, that the party who makes a false representation should know it to be false. He who makes a representation as of his own knowledge, not knowing whether it be true or false, and it is in fact untrue, is guilty of fraud as much as if he knew it to be untrue. In such a case he acts to his own knowledge falsely, and the law imputes a fraudulent intent. Kerr, Fraud & M. 54 et seq., and cases cited; Bigelow, Fraud, 63, 84, 453; 3 Wait, Act. & Def. 438 et seq.; 2 Estee, Pr. 394 et seq. "Fraud" is a term which the law applies to certain facts, and where, upon the facts, the law adjudges fraud, it is not essential that the complaint should, in terms, allege it. It is sufficient if the facts stated amount to a case of fraud. Kerr, Fraud & M. 366 et seq., and cases cited; 2 Estee, Pl. 423. The complaint in this case states a substantial cause of action, and is fully supported by the evidence.

The action of the county court in refusing to allow the appellant to appeal to the district court after he had given notice of an appeal to this court, and time had been given in which to perfect it, cannot be assigned as error on this record. If it was an error, it was error not before, but after, the final judgment from which this appeal is taken.

The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

[Note from 10 Pac. Rep. 292.]

A contract secured by false and fraudulent representations cannot be enforced. Mills v. Collins, 67 Iowa, 164, 25 N. W. Rep. 109.

A court of equity will decree a rescission of a contract obtained by the fraudulent representations or conduct of one of the parties thereto, on the complaint of the other, when it satisfactorily appears that the party seeking the rescission has been misled in regard to a material matter by such representation or conduct, to his injury or prejudice. But when the facts are known to both parties, and each acts on his own judgment, the court will not rescind the contract because it may or does turn out that they, or either of them, were mistaken as to the legal effect of the facts, or the rights or obligations of the parties thereunder, and particularly when such mistake can in no way injuriously affect the right of the party complaining under the contract, or prevent him from obtaining and receiving all the benefit contemplated by it, and to which he is entitled under it. Seeley v. Reed, 25 Fed. Rep. 361.

When, by false representations or misrepresentations, a fraud has been committed, and by it the complainant has been injured, the general principles of equity jurisprudence afford a remedy. Singer Manuf'g Co. v. Yarger, 12 Fed. Rep. 487. See Chandler v. Childs, 42 Mich. 128, 3 N. W. Rep. 297; Cavender v. Roberson, 33 Kan. 626, 7 Pac. Rep. 152.

When no damage, present or prospective, can result from a fraud practiced, or false representations or misrepresentation made, a court of equity will not entertain a petition for relief. Dunn v. Remington, 9 Neb. 82, 2 N. W. Rep. 230.

A person is not at liberty to make positive assertions about facts material to a transaction unless he knows them to be true; and if a statement so made is in fact false, the assessor cannot relieve himself from the imputation of fraud by pleading ignorance, but must respond in damages to any one who has sustained loss by acting in reasonable reliance upon such assertion. Lynch v. Mercantile Trust Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 486.

Equity will not relieve against a misrepresentation, unless it be of some material matter constituting some motive to the contract, something in regard to which reliance is placed by one party on the other, and by which he was actually misled, and not merely a matter of opinion, open to the inquiry and examination of both parties. Buckner v. Street, 15 Fed. Rep. 365.

False representations may be a ground for relief, though the person making them believes them true, if the person to whom they were made relied upon them, and was induced thereby to enter into the contract. Seeberger v. Hobert, 55 Iowa, 756, 8 N. W. Rep. 482.

Fraudulent representations or misrepresentations are not ground for relief, where they are immaterial, even though they be relied upon. Hall v. Johnson, 41 Mich. 286, 2 N. W. Rep. 55. See, to same effect, Lynch v. Mercantile Trust Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 486; Seeberger v. Hobert, 55 Iowa, 756, 8 N. W. Rep. 482.

In fraudulent representation or misrepresentation the injured parties may obtain relief, even though they did not suppose every statement made to them literally true. Heineman v. Steiger, 54 Mich. 232, 19 N. W. Rep. 965.

Where the vendor honestly expresses an incorrect opinion as to the amount, quality, and value of the goods he disposes of in a sale of his business and good-will thereof, and the purchaser sees or knows the property, or has an opportunity to know it, no action for false representations will lie. Collins v. Jackson, 54 Mich. 186, 19 N. W. Rep. 947.

Mere "dealing talk" in the sale of goods, unless accompanied by some artifice to deceive the purchaser or throw him off his guard, or some concealment of intrinsic defects not easily detected by ordinary care and diligence, does not amount to misrepresentation. Reynolds v. Palmer, 21 Fed. Rep. 433.

False statements made at the time of the sale by the vendor of chattels, with the fraudulent intent to induce the purchaser to accept an inferior article as a superior one, or to give an exorbitant and unjust price therefor, will render such purchase voidable; but such false statement must be of some matter affecting the character, quantity, quality, value, or title of such chattel. Bank v. Yocum, 11 Neb. 328, 9 N. W. Rep. 84.

A statement recklessly made, without knowledge of its truth, is a false statement knowingly made, within the settled rule. Cooper v. Schlesinger, 111 U. S. 148, 4 Sup. Ct. Rep. 360.

Whether or not omission to communicate known facts will amount to fraudulent representation depends upon the circumstances of the particular case, and the relations of the parties. Britton v. Brewster, 2 Fed. Rep. 160.

Where a vendor conceals a material fact, which is substantially the consideration of the contract, and which is peculiarly within his knowledge, it is fraudulent misrepresentation. Dowling v. Lawrence, 58 Wis. 282, 16 N. W. Rep. 552.

Evidence of fraudulent representations must be clear and convincing. Wickham v. Morehouse, 16 Fed. Rep. 324.

Where a man sells a business, and the contract of sale contained a clause including all right to business done by certain agents, evidence that the seller was willing to engage in the same business with such agents is not proof of fraud in making the contract. Taylor v. Saurman, 110 Pa. St. 3, 1 Atl. Rep. 40.

It was recently held by the supreme court of Indiana, in the case of Cook v. Churchman, 104 Ind. 141, 3 N. E. Rep. 759, that where money is obtained under a contract, any fraudulent representations employed by a party thereto as a means of inducing the loan to be made, if otherwise proper, are not to be excluded because of the statute of frauds; also that where parol representations are made regarding the credit and ability of a third person, with the intent that such third person shall obtain money or credit thereon, the statute of fraud applies, and no action thereon can be maintained, although the party making the representations may have entered into a conspiracy with such person with the expectation of obtaining some incidental benefit for himself.

MITCHELL et al. v. McDOUGALL.
(62 Ill. 498.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. Term, 1872.

Appeal from circuit court, McLean county;
Thomas F. Tipton, Judge.

Bill in equity to rescind a conveyance of lands on the ground of misrepresentation and fraud.

R. E. Williams, for appellants. Benjamin
& Weldon, for appellee.

BREESE, J. In Lockridge v. Foster, 4 Scam. 569, which was a bill in chancery praying, in the alternative, for the rescission of an executed contract for the sale of land, on the ground of fraudulent representations by the vendor, this court said, on the principles of equity and justice, a contract, to be obligatory, must be justly and fairly made. The contracting parties are bound to deal honestly, and act in good faith with each other. There should be a reciprocity of candor and fairness. Both should have equal knowledge concerning the subject-matter of the contract; especially ought all the facts and circumstances which are likely to influence their action to be made known. If they have not mutually this knowledge, nor the same means of obtaining it, it is then a duty incumbent on the one having the superior information to disclose it to the other. In making the disclosure, he is bound to act in good faith and with a strict regard to truth. If he makes false representations respecting material facts, or intentionally conceals or suppresses them, he acts fraudulently, and renders himself responsible for the consequences which may result. Fraud may consist as well in a suppressio veri as in a suggestio falsi, for, in either case, it may operate to the injury of the innocent party. A false representation by the vendor, which influences the conduct of the other party, and induces him to make the purchase, will vitiate and avoid the contract. And in making the representation, it is immaterial whether he knows it to be false or not, for the consequences are the same to the vendee. If he relies on the truth of the declaration, he is equally imposed on and injured, and ought to have redress from the one who has been the cause of the injury. So a suppression or concealment by the vendor of facts, which, if known to the vendee, would have the effect to prevent him from making the purchase, will, in equity, equally vitiate the contract. A court of equity will not enforce and carry into effect contracts thus unfairly and fraudulently made; and when the injured party invokes its aid in proper time, and the circumstances of the case will permit it to be done, the contract will be rescinded and the parties restored to their original rights.

The court refers to 1 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 191-197, 204-207, and 2 Kent, Comm. 482, 490.

Sections 191-197, inclusive, treat of false suggestions, and fully support the doctrine of the case cited, on that point. Sections 204 to 207, inclusive, treat of the doctrine of suppressio veri, a doctrine which, though true in morals, is not the doctrine recognized by courts of equity, except under certain circumstances.

The extreme doctrine of some courts is, that undue concealment of a fact resting in the knowledge of one contracting party, which, if known to the other, would have prevented the contract, will vitiate the contract.

The true definition is found in section 207, supra, where it is said undue concealment which amounts to a fraud in the sense of a court of equity, and for which it will grant relief, is the non-disclosure of those facts and circumstances which one party is under some legal or equitable obligation to communicate to the other, and which the latter has a right, not merely in foro conscientiae, but juris et de jure, to know.

Under such circumstances, the concealment of an important fact would be improper and unjust; it would be an undue concealment on account of the fiduciary relation existing; but where two parties, in the absence of any such relation, are treating for an estate, and the purchaser knows, from surface indications, or otherwise, by actual boring, there is a valuable mine upon the land, the purchaser is not bound to disclose that fact to the owner, for the means of information on the subject were as accessible to the owner of the land as to the purchaser.

The rule stated by Chancellor Kent, at page 482, referred to in the opinion in 4 Scam., supra, is that each party is bound to communicate to the other his knowledge of the material facts, provided he knows the other to be ignorant of them, and they be not open and naked, or equally within the reach of his observation.

This, we admit, is a rule of moral obligation, but not enforced in the courts. It is by them qualified, as we have stated above, that the party in possession of the facts must be under some special obligation, by confidence reposed, or otherwise, to communicate them truly and fairly, and this is the doctrine of this court in the cases of Fish v. Cleland, 33 Ill. 243, and Cleland v. Fish, 43 Ill. 282, referred to by appellee's counsel.

It is qualified by Beach v. Sheldon, 14 Barb. 72; Laidlaw v. Organ, 2 Whart. 178; Knitzing v. McElrath, 5 Pa. St. 467.

In Fox v. Mackeath, 2 Brown, Ch. 400, Thurlow, Lord Chancellor, in delivering the opinion in the case where undue concealment of an important fact was charged, said: "The doubt I have is, whether this case affords facts from which principles arise to set aside this transaction, which will not, by necessary application, draw other cases into hazard. And, without insisting upon technical morality, I don't agree with those who say, that where an advantage has been taken in a contract, which a man of delicacy would not have taken, it must be set aside. Suppose, for instance, that A, knowing there to be a mine in the estate of B, of which he knew B was ignorant, should enter into a contract to purchase the estate of B for the price of the estate without considering the mine, could the court set it aside? Why not, since B was not apprized of the mine and A was? Because B, as the buyer, was not obliged, from the nature of the contract, to make the discovery. It is, therefore, essentially necessary, in order to set aside the transaction, not only that a great advantage should be taken, but it must arise from some obligation in the party to make the discovery." Not, as Justice Story says (1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 148), from an obligation in point of morals only, but of legal duty. In such a case he says, a court of equity will not correct the contract merely because a man of nice morals and honor would not have entered into it. Lord Eldon, in Turner v. Harvey, Jac. 178, approved the doctrine of Lord Thurlow and the illustration of the mine, and so does Justice Story in 1 Eq. Jur. § 207.

But we are dealing in this case with the doctrine of suggestio falsi and not of suppressio veri, as the charge in the bill is, false representations made by appellee of the value of the land and lots in Missouri.

There is much testimony in the record, from which we derive the knowledge that appellee represented to appellant, who had never been in Missouri (appellee having resided there before coming to Bloomington), that the land was good land, and was the land occupied by one Judge Smith, before the Rebellion, and improved by him. This land was the south part of section eighteen and the north part of section twenty-four, in all one hundred and sixty acres, and was worth, probably, fifteen dollars per acre. The land conveyed was in section fifteen, stony, poorly timbered, and comparatively worthless. The house in Montevallo, instead of being a desirable residence, and worth one thousand dollars, as represented by appellee, proved to be a mere shell, one story high, occupied by hogs and goats, bringing not eight dollars a month rent "right along," as represented, but unfit for human abode, and worth, with the "lot and a half," not over two hundred and fifty dollars, and, as we should judge, not at all saleable. So soon as appellant, by personal inspection on a visit to the locality, discovered the facts, he came to the conclusion appellee had imposed upon him, and at once, on his return to Bloomington, demanded a rescission of the contract and a reconveyance of the Bloomington property, and tendering deeds for the Missouri property, together with appellee's note for three hundred dollars, part of the purchase money. This being refused by appellee, this bill was filed by appellants, and pending the bill the house was consumed by fire, on which, however, appellee had effected an insurance of three thousand dollars.

The court dismissed the bill and complainants appealed.

There is no question of law made except the one we have discussed, and there is some conflict in the testimony, but a careful examination of it, as we find it in the record, satisfies us appellant has not received from appellee what he contracted for, and which contract he made wholly on the representations of appellee, which have proved to be untrue.

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.--18

It is said by appellee, there was a mistake in conveying the land as in section fifteen—that he supposed the "Smith farm" was on that section, but is willing and offers to convey the land in fact occupied by Smith in sections eighteen and twenty-four, and he insists, that a mistake being made is no ground for the rescission of the contract, as the court can and will correct the mistake. But this consideration should not prevail in this case, because appellee represented the land he was selling to be worth twenty dollars per acre, which he had purchased but a short time previously for four dollars per acre, and he asserted to appellant that such land was selling for twenty dollars an acre in that neighborhood. This he based upon a letter said to have been received by him from one Selsor, a land agent in that county. Selsor in his deposition says, the lands he referred to in that letter were among the best improved farms in that portion of Cedar and Vernon counties; he says he had no idea of fixing the price of raw lands by these figures, and did not suppose any one would be so foolish as to attempt it.

That letter, which appellee says was burnt up in the building when it was destroyed, was to this effect: "We have sold within the last two weeks ten thousand dollars worth of land, from fifteen to twenty-five dollars an acre." This was so construed by appellee to appellant as to induce the latter to believe they were lands in the neighborhood of those he was about to purchase.

The town property was of small value. Now, under such circumstances, it would not be just to allow appellee to correct the mistake in the land and claim the contract as made, but it would be just, as a mistake was made by appellee in the deed, to permit the injured party to avail of it, and, through that, repudiate the entire contract. In a case where false representations have been made, it is the province of a court of equity, if applied to for that purpose, to rescind the contract, putting the parties in statu quo.

It is claimed by appellee that the Bloomington property was taken at a very high valuation, and that he ought to be permitted to show that appellant has received from him its full value.

This we do not consider as the question before us. The question is, did appellant get what he bargained for? That he did not we think the evidence satisfactorily shows.

Appellant's right to the insurance money will hardly be questioned, as the building upon the lot when sold, is now represented by that money, and after deducting the premium paid by appellee and the cost of the addition to the building which he erected, and was covered by the insurance, we are of opinion the company should pay the balance to appellant.

On the point that Mrs. Mitchell, appellant's wife, was improperly rejected as a witness, we think the court ruled correctly; the case was in no correct legal sense her own case.

The views here expressed reverse the decree of the circuit court dismissing the bill. The cause is remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Decree reversed.

SCOTT, J., did not hear the argument in this case, and gave no opinion.

SOUTHERN DEVELOPMENT CO. OF NEVADA v. SILVA.

(8 Sup. Ct. 881, 125 U. S. 247.)

Supreme Court of the United States. March 19, 1888.Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the Northern District of California.Wm. M. Stewart, A. T. Britton, and A. B.
Browne, for appellant. J. P. Langhorne and John H. Miller, for appellee.

LAMAR, J. This is a bill in equity to rescind a contract of purchase of a silver mine on the ground of fraudulent representations, and to recover the consideration paid. The suit was commenced originally in the superior court of Inyo county, Cal., on the 8th of May, 1884; but on account of the diverse citizenship of the parties, the plaintiff being a corporation organized under the laws of Nevada, and the defendant a citizen of California, it was removed into the United States circuit court. Demurrers to the original bill and to an amended bill having been sustained, the present "second amended" bill of complaint was filed. Answer was filed by defendant, replication by complainant, and issue was joined. Testimony was taken, and the case was heard, resulting in a decree dismissing the bill on the 14th of March, 1887. It appears from the record that on the 15th of March, 1884, the appellant (who was the complainant below) purchased from the defendant a mining claim, known as the "Sterling Mine," together with other mining property, all situated in Inyo county, Cal., paying him therefor the sum of $10,000. On the 8th of May, 1884, the original bill of complaint was filed, charging, in substance, that complainant was induced to purchase said mine and mining property solely upon the representations made by Silva as to its condition, extent, and value; that such representations were made to H. M. Yerington, the president of said complainant company, and to one Forman, a mining expert in his employ, in January, 1884, when an examination of said mine was made by them; that said representations were false and fraudulent, and were well known to the defendant at the time to be such; and that said representations were, in substance and in a somewhat different order, as follows: (1) That there were 2,000 tons of ore in the mine; (2) that the bottom of what is called the "Ore Chamber" was solid ore, as good as the ore exposed on the sides of the chamber; (3) that there were not less than 500 tons of ore in and about the said ore chamber; (4) that the mine was worth $15,000; and (5) that, after going through the mine, the defendant represented to said Yerington and Forman that he had shown them all the work which had been done in or about the mine that would throw any light upon the quantity of ore therein.

The answer of the defendant is direct, positive, and unequivocal in its denials of the allegations of the bill; and, as an answer on oath is not waived, unless these denials are disproved by evidence of greater weight than the testimony of one witness, or by that of one witness with corroborating circumstances, the complainant will not be entitled to a decree; and this effect of the defendant's answer is not weakened by the fact that the equity of the complainant's bill is the allegation of fraud. Vigel v. Hopp, 104 U. S. 441; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1528; 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 844. The burden of proof is on the complainant; and unless he brings evidence sufficient to overcome the natural presumption of fair dealing and honesty, a court of equity will not be justified in setting aside a contract on the ground of fraudulent representations. In order to establish a charge of this character the complainant must show, by clear and decisive proof—First, that the defendant has made a representation in regard to a material fact; secondly, that such representation is false; thirdly, that such representation was not actually believed by the defendant, on reasonable grounds, to be true; fourthly, that it was made with intent that it should be acted on; fifthly, that it was acted on by complainant to his damage; and, sixthly, that in so acting on it the complainant was ignorant of its falsity, and reasonably believed it to be true. The first of the foregoing requisites excludes such statements as consist merely in an expression of opinion or judgment, honestly entertained; and, again, (excepting in peculiar cases,) it excludes statements by the owner and vendor of property in respect to its value.

The evidence in the case shows that in the development of this mine a tunnel, called the "Sterling Tunnel," had first been dug. At a distance of about 140 feet along the line of this tunnel, from its mouth, there are branches running easterly and westerly. About 60 feet from the main tunnel, in the eastern branch, winze No. 1 starts down. About 38 feet below the level of the tunnel, a level, known as the "38-feet level," starts off from this winze, and at the bottom of the winze, a distance of about 82 feet vertical below the main tunnel, there is another level, known as "82-feet level." In the easterly branch of the tunnel, about 30 feet from winze No. 1, there is another winze starting downward, inclining to the southeast as it goes down. This winze is numbered 2, and is connected with the 38-feet and the 82-feet levels. Intermediate between these levels is another level, known as the "55-feet level," which opens out to the eastward of winze No. 2 into a chamber about 15 feet long and about 8 feet wide. In the south-east corner of this chamber was a little hole or shaft, extending downward a few feet only. In sinking winze No. 2, Silva struck an ore body at a point opposite the 38-foot level. It was irregular in shape, dipping at an angle of about 45 degrees. Commencing at a point, comparatively speaking, it increased gradually as it descended, and was in form somewhat like a pyramid. At its base it measured 4 or 5 feet across, and it was about nine feet long. The surface of this inclined pyramid formed the floor or bottom of the chamber. There was, however, a small space between the base and opposite foot-wall, which is called the "bottom" of the chamber by complainant's witnesses, and it is the "bottom" spoken of in the bill. The ore comprising this pyramid was carbonate, and, being friable, had slacked down over the face of the pyramid to the bottom, partially covering it, and partially filling up the little hole or shaft in the south-east corner.

As to the first alleged representation, as classified above,—viz., that there were 2,000 tons of ore in sight in the mine, and that Yerington relied upon such statement when he made the purchase,—the proof utterly fails to establish either that Silva made the statement, as a statement of fact, or that Yerington relied upon such statement, even had it been made. Silva, both in his answer and in his testimony, denies ever having made the statement, and the testimony of Yerington himself is to the effect that Silva's statement was qualified by the phrase "in his judgment." This, then, is shown to have been nothing more than an expression of opinion on the part of Silva as to the quantity of ore in sight in the mine. But, even if Silva had made the statement imputed to him in the bill, there is abundant evidence to show that Yerington did not rely upon it in the purchase of the mine. Yerington's own evidence, on this point, is against him. He testifies that he did not believe that there were more than 1,000 tons of ore in the mine, and that Forman agreed with him on that point. And he further testifies that, valuing this ore at 32 ounces of ore and 45 per cent. of lead per ton, (which it appears was its approximate value, as determined by several assays,) and calculating that there would be 1,000 tons of ore there, the mine would be worth $10,000,—the sum he actually gave for it. This lacks much of coming up to the rule that the complainant must have been deceived, and deceived by the person of whom he complains. Atwood v. Small, 6 Clark & F. 232; Pasley v. Freeman, 3 Term R. 57. Besides, the quantity of ore "in sight" in a mine, as that term is understood among the miners, is at best a mere matter of opinion. It cannot be calculated with mathematical, or even with approximate, certainty. The opinions of expert miners, on a question of this kind, might reasonably differ quite materially. In the case of Tuck v. Downing, 76 Ill. 71, 94, the court say: "No man, however scientific he may be, could certainly state how a mine, with the most flattering outcrop or blow-out, will finally turn out. It is to be fully tested and worked by men of skill and judgment. Mines are not purchased and sold on a warranty, but on the prospect. 'The sight' determines the purchase. If very flattering, a party is willing to pay largely for the chance. There is no other sensible or known mode of selling this kind of property. It is, in the nature of the thing, utterly speculative, and every one knows the business is of the most fluctuating and hazardous character. How many mines have not sustained the hopes created by their outcrop!" We approve the position of the court below, that "Yerington and his expert, Forman, were as competent to judge how much ore there was 'in sight' as Silva was. They were novices in matters of that kind. This misrepresentation, if such it be, does not contain either the first, fourth, or fifth element stated by Pomeroy as essential elements in a fraudulent misrepresentation."

As stated above, the substance of the allegation of the bill is that Silva represented that the bottom of this ore chamber, which was covered with loose ore slacked down from the pyramid, was composed of ore as good as that exposed on the sides of the chamber. Silva, in his answer, expressly denies ever having made such statement. Forman testifies that with a little prospecting pick he had with him he raked through the dirt and loose ore that had slacked down, to see if it would reach the bottom of the ore chamber, but that it would not. He further says: "I asked Silva how the bottom was; if he had sunk below there. He said, 'No.' I said, 'How is the bottom. You, as a miner, know it is a suspicious thing to see a bottom covered up, or anything of that kind.' He said the bottom was as good or better than any ore which we saw in the chamber." Yerington at first testifies that Silva, in reply to a question by Forman, stated that this floor was solid ore; but he says that he does not think any comparison was made between that ore and the ore in the sides of the chamber, as narrated by Forman. On the next day, however, Yerington having, as he says, refreshed his memory,—“and I [he] had the means of doing it,”—was positive that the conversation between Silva and Forman at that time was as Forman afterwards stated it. Silva, in addition to his positive denial in his answer, testifies that "there never was a word said about that. They asked me this: 'What I thought of the ore body?' and I said 'I thought it would be extensive.' I thought so at the time, and I think so yet." The witness Eddy, who was present all the time in the ore chamber, except when he went to the 38-foot level to get a pick, does not know anything about a conversation such as Yerington and Forman narrate. On this point, then, the testimony of Silva is directly to the contrary of that of Yerington and Forman. Certain other material facts in the case seem to indicate that there is just as strong probability that Silva's statements in this matter are true as that those of Yerington and Forman are true. In the bill Yerington alleged, under oath, that Silva had discovered the fact that the bottom of the ore chamber was not composed of ore, and had afterwards covered the bottom with ore, vein-rock, and matter,—in other words, had "salted" the mine. There is no evidence in the record to prove this, or tending to prove it; on the contrary, the evidence of Yerington himself, and of the other witnesses who were examined on that point, is all to the effect that the ore covering the floor of the chamber had slacked down from natural causes in fine particles like wheat. Nor is there such evidence to show that Silva knew the character of this floor, or of the extent of the ore vein, or deposit, (as it afterwards turned out to be,) as would justify the interposition of a court of equity to set aside the contract on the ground of fraudulent representations. He had come onto the ore in excavating from the top. The sides of the ore chamber contained some ore of a good quality, and he had never demonstrated the extent and amount of ore in the pyramidal wedge in the side of the chamber. It is shown by the evidence of Yerington himself that, in the side of a drift running westerly from the ore chamber, there was ore which appeared to be continuous with the body of ore in the chamber; so that the statement Silva said he made,—viz., that he thought the ore body would be extensive,—at least, appears reasonable. Upon all the facts and circumstances apparent of record, he might have made the statement he says he made, and believed he was telling the truth. For there is also some evidence to the effect that Silva had commenced to run a drift from the bottom of winze No. 1, for the purpose of striking and cutting the supposed downward extension of the ore body in the chamber; and this, before the examination of the mine by Yerington and Forman. After the sale of the mine, Coffin, the superintendent for the complainant company, when he commenced work in the mine, started in where Silva had left off in this drift, and carried it immediately beneath the ore chamber, entering the chamber by an up-raise. Then it was that the discovery was made that the ore body, instead of being a continuous ledge or lead, was merely a deposit. Furthermore, the testimony of Yerington and Forman, as regards the little hole or shaft in the south-east corner of the chamber, is directly opposed by the testimony of Silva and Eddy. Both Yerington and Forman testify that this little shaft was completely filled up with dirt and loose ore; while Silva and Eddy both testify that it was not so filled up, but that both Yerington and Forman stood in that shaft, and took samples of ore from it. It is thus seen that the evidence on this material point does not clearly establish the fraudulent representations of Silva as claimed by the complainant; but that, on the contrary, the material facts and circumstances as disclosed by the record are entirely compatible with the theory that Silva did not make the representations charged against him, or, at most, that he merely gave expression to an opinion as to the extent of the ore body, erroneous though it proved to be. This would not constitute fraud. In the language of the court below: "This testimony was taken in June, 1866, about two and a half years after the conversations took place. They were present at the time, examining the mine, and engaged in conversation for an hour or more. These discrepancies in matters of detail during a long conversation, related by different parties, viewing the subject from different stand-points after the lapse of so long a period of time, are no more than might reasonably be expected, even in honest witnesses. There is no occasion to impute any intention to testify falsely to either. * * * Parties are extremely liable to misunderstand each other, and, in looking back upon the transaction in the light of subsequent developments, are prone to take the view most advantageous to themselves."

As to the third alleged representation,—to-wit, that there were not less than 500 tons of ore in and about that ore chamber,—Silva, both in his answer and in his testimony, denies that he ever told Yerington and Forman, or anybody else, that there were 500 tons of ore there, or that there was any amount fixed or agreed upon by them as to the quantity of ore there; while the testimony of both Yerington and Forman is to the effect that Silva said, in his opinion, or in his judgment, there were 500 tons of ore in the chamber. So that, taking the strongest testimony produced on the part of complainant upon this point, it simply amounts to an expression of opinion on the part of Silva as to the amount of the ore in the chamber, and not a statement of fact. It therefore does not constitute fraud.

It is equally true that any statements that may have been made by Silva with reference to the value of the mine, cannot, under the circumstances of this case, be considered an act of fraud on his part sufficient to warrant a court of equity in setting aside the contract herein. Yerington testifies that Silva said he had been asking $15,000 for the mine, but that he would take $12,500; while Forman says he does not recollect that Silva made any statement as to the value of the mine, but that he heard Silva say he thought it was worth $15,000. Such statements are not fraudulent in law, but are considered merely as trade talk, and mere matters of opinion, which is allowable. Gordon v. Butler, 105 U. S. 553; Mooney v. Miller, 102 Mass. 217. Moreover, it is clear, beyond question, that Yerington did not purchase the mine upon Silva's representations as to its value, as we shall hereafter see.

This disposes of all the alleged fraudulent representations, as arranged above, except the last, adversely to the complainant; and it is to this one that attention will now be directed. This charge is, substantially, that Silva represented to Yerington and Forman, when they visited the mine in January, 1884, and had gone through it, that he had shown them all the work which had been done in and about the mine that would throw any light on the quantity of ore therein. This representation is alleged to have been false and fraudulent, and well known by Silva to be such, because at a cut a short distance from the mouth of the main tunnel, at a point known as the "point of location," a little hole or shaft had been sunk which had been filled up, and was not observable at the time of the examination of the mine in January, 1884, and also because there had been a number of drill-holes made in the sides of the ore chamber, and afterwards filled up before the examination in January, 1884, so that they were not observable at that time; which holes clearly developed the fact that the ore about the chamber was nothing more than a shell, instead of a continuous body, as it appeared to the observer. The existence of the plugged-up drill-holes in the sides of the ore chamber is the worst feature of the case against Silva. They could not have been made by a former proprietor of the mine, as is slightly claimed in his behalf; for, as has been already shown in this opinion, Silva himself, or at least persons in his employ, had excavated that chamber after he had purchased it from one Edwards, in 1876. And certain it is that the drill-holes were found plugged up within a short time after he had sold the mine to the complainant company, March 15, 1884. The question is, did Silva know of their existence at the time he sold the mine, and, having such knowledge, did he falsely represent to the complainant that he knew nothing of them, thereby inducing complainant to act upon such representations? Upon this question the evidence is somewhat conflicting. Yerington testifies that after going through the mine, he asked Silva if he had shown him the whole of the mine, and he replied that he had. And Forman testifies that Silva, in reply to a question from him, said that he had shown him all the work that had been done in and about the mine that would throw any light upon the quantity of ore in the mine, or the extent of the ledge or deposit. Silva admits that, in reply to a question by Yerington, he told him that he had shown him all the work that had been done in and about the mine, either by himself or under his direction. So that the question is narrowed down to simply this: Were said drill-holes in existence at the time Silva made such statement? If so, had they been made by him, or under his direction, or did he know of their existence? In his sworn answer Silva expressly "denies that he drilled any such hole or holes through the ore into the country rock or otherwise, or thereby or at all discovered the extent of said ore, or that he filled up said drill-holes, or concealed them from view, or kept them secret from complainant," etc.; and in his testimony he also denies having any knowledge of their existence. He says that he drilled no holes in the mine except what he had to do as a miner, and that he concealed nothing from Yerington when he showed him the mine. And again he says: "I showed Mr. Yerington all the work that was done in the mine that I knew anything of." There is no direct evidence going to show who drilled the holes; and there is nothing in the entire record to connect Silva with them, except the fact that he was the owner of the mine, and was in possession of it at a time when it is most likely they were drilled. But this circumstance alone should not outweigh the positive denial of Silva in his answer, and also in his equally positive denial in his testimony, of his knowledge of the existence of said drilled holes. The law raises no presumption of knowledge of falsity from the single fact per se that the representation was false. There must be something further to establish the defendant's knowledge. Barnett v. Stanton, 2 Ala. 181; McDonald v. Trafton, 15 Me. 225. This rule is fortified by the consideration that, had he known of the limited quantity of ore in and about the "ore chamber," Silva would hardly have gone to the expense and labor of starting a drift from the bottom of winze No. 1, and constructing it for a certain distance, before the sale of the mine, for the purpose of reaching the supposed downward extension of the ore in and about that chamber. Knowing that the ore body terminated within a few inches of the surface of the chamber, and then, in the face of that knowledge, actually constructing a drift on the 82-feet level, at enormous expense, for the purpose of getting under that limited quantity of ore, would not appear a reasonable thing to do by any one, especially by such an experienced and practical miner as Silva is admitted to have been. The testimony, therefore, and all the other facts and circumstances of record, do not substantiate complainant's theory of the case on this point; in other words, there is not a satisfactory case of fraudulent representations on this point made out,—not such a case as would justify the interposition of a court of equity to set aside the contract under consideration on the ground of fraudulent representations. As regards the little hole or shaft that had been sunk at the "point of location," and afterwards filled up, so that it was not observable at the time of Yerington's visit in January, 1884, there is absolutely no testimony at all to show that Silva knew anything about its existence. He had done no work at that place, or very little at most, and was using the cut there as a sort of kitchen. The sides of the cut indicated that there was a ledge of ore there. It is admitted that Forman asked Silva why he did not "go down" on that ore, and that he replied that he considered the tunnel the best place to mine. Silva denies, both in his answer and in his testimony that he ever knew that a shaft had been sunk at the point of location, and no one is found who can testify that he did know anything about it; on the contrary, the former owner of the mine, one Edwards, testifies that he himself dug that shaft, and filled it up, prior to the time Silva purchased it, and that to his knowledge Silva did not know anything about that shaft.

It is essential that the defendant's representations should have been acted on by complainant, to his injury. Where the purchaser undertakes to make investigations of his own, and the vendor does nothing to prevent his investigation from being as full as he chooses to make it, the purchaser cannot afterwards allege that the vendor made misrepresentations. Atwood v. Small, supra; Jennings v. Broughton, 5 De Gex, M. & G. 126; Tuck v. Downing, supra. The evidence abundantly shows that Yerington had been willing to give $10,000 for the mine prior to the time he visited it, and made his examination, in January, 1884. He had made inquiries of various persons for months previous to that visit. Several experts in his employ had visited the mine, had taken samples of ore from it; and it must have been from reports thus received that Yerington had made up his mind as to what the mine was worth. From the letters of an agent (Woods) to Eddy, the testimony of the witness Boland, the testimony of the witness Anthony, Eddy's testimony, and from the testimony of Silva himself, there can be no doubt that Yerington had offered $10,000 for the mine several months before he had ever seen it; thus showing that his examination of the mine in January, 1884, merely went to corroborate the reports that he had received of it from his experts, Forman, Bliss, et al., and that it was upon such reports, and his own judgment after an examination of the mine, that he made the purchase of it.

From all which it is clear to this court that the complainant has not proven his case, and the decree below is affirmed.

PREWETT v. TRIMBLE.

(17 S. W. 356, 92 Ky. 176.)

Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Oct. 24. 1891.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county.

"To be officially reported."

Action by John T. Prewett, trustee, etc., against James G. Trimble for rescission of a contract for the purchase of bank stock. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Ed. O. O'Rear and Z. T. Young, for appellant. Wood & Day, for appellee.

LEWIS, J. January 19, 1888, appellee, then president of the Exchange Bank of Kentucky at Mt. Sterling, sold and transferred to appellant 20 shares of stock in that bank at the price of $120 per share, and 21 shares in the Mt. Sterling National Bank at $120 per share for 20 shares, and $118 for the remaining one, payment for which was then made partly in notes assigned to and received by appellee at their face value, and partly in money. May 14, 1888, appellant brought this action for rescission of the contract and restoration of the notes, or, if collected, payment of amount thereof, and the money received by appellee, and interest on the whole; it being alleged and not denied that a tender and offer to retransfer the stock and demand of repayment of the purchase price had been made by appellant and refused by appellee. It appears that December 31, 1887, a statement of resources and liabilities of the Exchange Bank of Kentucky, signed by the cashier, was published in newspapers of Mt. Sterling, and by printed cards, which were generally distributed; there being at foot of the statement an announcement that the bank had declared its usual semi-annual 4 per cent. dividend. There was printed on the same card a statement, signed by the president and directors, in which the cashier's statement was referred to as evidence of the prosperous condition and increasing business of the bank. According to that statement, the resources of the bank, having a capital of $100,000, amounted to $329,380.42, of which $245,790 were loans and discounts and $13,338.68 overdrafts, while the undivided profits were $15,851.41. But no mention was made of any insolvent debts being part of the aggregate of either loans or overdrafts. In respect to the statement it is alleged and appears that of the total amount of loans and discounts more than $30,000 consisted of stale and worthless demands, and of overdrafts at least $7,000 were likewise worthless, the drawers being insolvent; and that, after charging off such worthless demands, there would be left in the bank no undivided profits at all. It is further alleged and proved that the books of the bank showed at date of the statement about $7,600 more due to depositors, and, consequently, that much more liabilities than disclosed by it.

The evidence places beyond question that when the statement was published and circulated the real value of stock in the Exchange Bank of Kentucky, calculated and determined by the actual condition of its resources and liabilities, was not over $70 per share. It is also satisfactorily shown that when he made the purchase appellant did not know, nor have any other means of knowing, the true condition of that bank's affairs than such information as was afforded by the cashier's statement, and that given directly to him by appellee, and that he believed and acted on that information. There is discrepancy in the testimony of the parties as to what occurred between them when the contract was made; but that of another person, present at the time, is substantially that appellee said, if not directly to, in hearing of, appellant, that the notes held by the Exchange Bank of Kentucky were worth dollar for dollar, and, being asked about value of the stock, took in his hands the card upon which was printed the cashier's statement, one of which he had on a previous occasion in person given to appellant, and, referring to it, explained that, the capital being $100,000, the surplus of $15,000 made the stock worth $115 per share and more as an investment, and that it was going at $120. But, independent of what occurred between the parties at the time of the contract, it is manifest the cashier's statement was published and circulated by authority of the president and directors for the purpose and in expectation of it being accepted, and treated by the public as in all respects true and reliable; thereby not only increasing business of the bank, but keeping up or enhancing market value of the stock, in which each of them had a personal interest; and, as their own accompanying statement was obviously intended to be, it should be regarded a deliberate affirmation of the truth of that of the cashier, and as equivalent to a report of the affairs of the bank, made directly by them; and, if so, upon both principle and authority no other relation or privity between the parties to this action need be shown than the act of appellee as president indorsing and authorizing publication and circulation of the cashier's statement, and the resulting injury to appellant, who was within the class designed to be influenced by the statement. Cook, Stocks, §§ 353, 354, and cases cited. Whether they published and gave currency to the statement, knowing it to be materially untrue, and for the fraudulent purpose of deceiving the public as charged in the petition, we need not inquire; for it is not, in order to maintain this action, indispensable that appellee be shown to have known the statement was false, for it is elementary doctrine that a false representation may, in contemplation of law, be made with knowledge of its falsity,—that is, made scienter,—so as to afford a right of action in damages, and, a fortiori, ground for equitable proceedings, (1) without actual knowledge of either its truth or falsity, as when the party has affirmed his knowledge by a positive statement which implies knowledge; (2) when made under circumstances in which the party ought to have known, if he did not know, of its falsity, as when, having “special means of knowledge,” it is his duty to know. Bigelow, Frauds, pp. 509, 516. In Story, Eq. Jur. § 193, it is laid down that affirmation of a material fact that “one does not know or believe to be true is equally, in morals and law, as unjustifiable as the affirmation of what is known to be positively false; and even if the party innocently misrepresents a material fact by mistake, it is equally conclusive, for it operates as surprise and imposition on the other.” Representations by a party having means of knowledge in regard to a matter, not possessed generally, are apt to be believed and acted on, especially if he is in a situation where he owes a duty to the public to deal honestly and intelligently. Therefore something more than use of ordinary diligence to know the condition of a bank should be required of the president in order to exempt him from liability to a person who has suffered loss by a false statement or report of its affairs, officially made or affirmed by him, especially when he has been thereby personally benefited. In Cook, Stock & S. § 145, it is said on authority of numerous cases cited that any statement by the authorized agents of a corporation in regard to the status of the corporation, or material matters connected therewith, whereby subscriptions of stock are obtained, is a fraudulent representation, for which a person sustaining loss thereby may hold such agents personally liable, or have the contract rescinded. This is upon the principle and for the reason that such agents have exceptional means of knowledge, and owe a duty to speak the truth or not at all about the matter. But, as observed by the author, “in all these cases the distinction between statements relative to the prospects and capabilities of the enterprises, and statements specially specifying what does or does not exist, must be carefully borne in mind.” In this case, not the bank, but appellee personally, profited by the bargain appellant was induced by the false report or statement of its condition to make with him; and therefore it would be contrary to reason and justice for him to be permitted to enjoy the benefit of it, at the expense of appellant, upon the flimsy ground of ignorance about the material matters in reference to which he made the deliberate and positive representation, for, leaving out of view the question whether he did in fact know the statement was untrue, being in a situation to know, and where it was his duty to know, he, in contemplation of law, did know it, and consequently such statement is to be held fraudulent; and appellee has a remedy for the loss sustained either by action in damages or for rescission, for it is a settled rule that, even where one who brings about a contract by misrepresentation commits no fraud, because his representation was, when made, innocent in the ordinary sense, still if, when the fact of its falsity becomes known, he refuses to relinquish the advantage, upon offer of reciprocal relinquishment received by the injured party, it would make him guilty of constructive fraud, and the contract subject to rescission by a court of equity. In our opinion, appellant, as the record stands, was entitled to a rescission of the contract as prayed for in his petition, and the court had jurisdiction to grant it; wherefore the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded for judgment in favor of appellant.

HOLT, C. J., not sitting.

HADCOCK v. OSMER.

(47 N. E. 923, 153 N. Y. 604.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Oct. 5, 1897.

Appeal from supreme court, appellate division, Fourth department.

Action by Charles E. Hadcock, as executor, against Luman Osmer, for deceit. From a judgment of the appellate division (38 N. Y. Supp. 618) affirming a judgment entered on a verdict for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Watson M. Rogers, for appellant. Henry I'urcell, for respondent.

VANN, J. Prior to the 15th of September, 1888, Deloss Brown, as principal, and Joseph Brown, as surety, were indebted to the defendant on a past-due note for over $300, and payment thereof had repeatedly been demanded. After trying in vain to borrow money to pay the note, Deloss told the defendant that he did not know where they could get it, and asked if he must have it. The defendant said "yes," and, upon being further asked by Deloss where the money could be had, recommended him to call on one Benjamin Hadcock. He did so, and was told by Benjamin that he could not lend the money, but that his brother, Emmanuel, who was stopping with him, could let him have it. Deloss reported to the defendant that he thought he could get the money of "the Hadcocks," and that they would let him have it "some time in October." When the time came around, the Messrs. Brown started to see if they could get the money of Emmanuel Hadcock, but first went to the defendant, and asked him to go along. He said that he could not, when Deloss declared there was no use of their going alone, and thereupon the defendant wrote and delivered to the Browns a paper, of which the following is a copy: "Mr. Hadcock: The Browns are good for what money you let them have. [Signed] L. Osmer." The Hadcocks did not know the Browns, but, as they knew the defendant, on the strength of this paper Emmanuel Hadcock lent them $400, taking their note therefor, and on the same day they used the most of the money to pay their debt to the defendant. Both of the Browns were insolvent at this time, and, while the defendant may have believed they were good, he did not know whether they were good or not, and did not try to find out. Upon the trial of this action, which was brought to recover damages for false representations by means of said paper, there was but slight dispute as to the representations, their falsity, or the injury resulting therefrom; but the defendant insisted that, as he did not know that his representations were false, there could be no recovery against him. Through his counsel, he asked the trial court to charge the jury "that there can be no recovery in an action of deceit unless it appears that the defendant made the representations knowing them to be false, with intent to deceive, and that the plaintiff suffered damages in consequence thereof." The court refused to so charge, except with the modification: "That, if he made the statement that they were good as a fact, not as an opinion, without knowing whether it was true or not, then it was false in the sense that he made a statement of fact as though he knew it to be true, which he did not know to be true. That, together with what I have already said in my charge in regard to it, will enable the jury to understand what I mean." Exception was taken to the refusal to charge as requested and to the charge as made. In the body of the charge, the court, after instructing the jury as to the difference between the assertion of a fact and the expression of an opinion, told them, in substance, that if the defendant made the representation, either knowing it to be untrue, or, without knowing whether it was untrue or not, stating it as an existing fact, intending that it should be taken and acted upon as such, they might infer an intent to defraud; "because," as the court continued, "a man has no right to state a thing as a fact, which misleads the other party to his damage, unless he knows whether it is true or untrue; and if he states it, knowing and understanding that he does not know whether it is true or not, he just as much misleads the other man as though he stated it with the knowledge that it was untrue."

An action to recover damages for deceit cannot be maintained without proof of fraud as well as injury. Actionable deceit cannot be practiced without an actual intention to deceive, resulting in actual deception, and consequent loss. But, while there must be a furtive intent, it may exist when one asserts a thing to be true which he does not know to be true, as it is a fraud to affirm positive knowledge of that which one does not positively know. Where a party represents a material fact to be true to his personal knowledge, as distinguished from belief or opinion, when he does not know whether it is true or not, and it is actually untrue, he is guilty of falsehood, even if he believes it to be true; and if the statement is thus made with the intention that it shall be acted upon by another, who does so act upon it, to his injury, the result is actionable fraud. Kountze v. Kennedy, 147 N. Y. 124, 130, 41 N. E. 414; Rothschild v. Mack, 115 N. Y. 1, 7, 21 N. E. 726; Marsh v. Falker, 40 N. Y. 562, 573; Bennett v. Judson, 21 N. Y. 238; Add. Torts, 1007; 1 Bigelow, Fraud, 514. Such seems to be the case now before us, as the facts are presumed to have been found by the jury. The plaintiff's testator did not ask for information in regard to the solvency of those who wished to borrow money of him, but the defendant volunteered to give it. He was interested in the result of the loan, for the bulk of the proceeds was for his benefit. On being told that the loan would not be made without his presence, he armed the proposed borrowers with a written statement over his own signature, containing a positive assertion of a material fact, with the intention that it should be acted upon, and should induce the loan of the money. Yet he did not know the assertion thus positively made for such an important purpose to be true, and he did not investigate or seek to discover whether it was true or not, although he had dealt some with the Browns, and had some information as to their circumstances. He intended, as the jury has found upon sufficient evidence, that the lender should understand him as communicating his actual knowledge, and not as expressing his opinion, judgment, or belief. Knowing that he did not know what he said he did, and what he intended to cause another to believe he did, he took the responsibility of its truth; and honesty of belief in the supposed fact, under such circumstances, cannot relieve him from the imputation of falsehood and fraud. As was said by Judge Peckham in Rothschild v. Mack, supra: "He either knew or he did not know of the financial condition of the makers of the note. If he did know it, then he knew that the note, as to both makers and indorsers, was without value. If he did not know its condition, he yet assumed to have actual knowledge of the truth of his statement. * * * He certainly meant to convey the impression of actual knowledge of the truth of the representations he made as to the value of the note, and he either knew such representations were false, or else he was conscious that he had no actual knowledge while assuming to have it, and intending to convey such impression. If damage ensue, this makes an actionable fraudulent representation." The language of Chief Judge Andrews, in Kountze v. Kennedy, supra, is equally applicable: "One who falsely asserts a material fact, susceptible of accurate knowledge, to be true of his own knowledge, and thereby induces another to act upon the fact represented to his prejudice, commits a fraud which will sustain an action for deceit. This is not an exception to, but an application of, the principle that actual fraud must be shown to sustain such an action. The purpose of the party asserting his personal knowledge is to induce belief in the fact represented; and if he has no knowledge, and the fact is one upon which special knowledge can be predicated, the inference of fraudulent intent, in the absence of explanation, naturally results." The rule is the same in other states and in England. Thus, in Furnace Co. v. Moffatt, 147 Mass. 403, 18 N. E. 168, the court said: "The charge of fraudulent intent, in an action for deceit, may be maintained by proof of a statement made as of the party's own knowledge, which is false, provided the thing stated is not merely matter of opinion, estimate, or judgment, but is susceptible of actual knowledge; and in such case it is not necessary to make any further proof of an actual intent to deceive. The fraud consists in stating that the party knows the thing to exist, when he does not know it to exist; and if he does not know it to exist he must ordinarily be deemed to know that he does not. Forgetfulness of its existence after a former knowledge, or a mere belief of its existence, will not warrant or excuse a statement of actual knowledge." See, also, Bullitt v. Farrar, 42 Minn. 8, 43 N. W. 566; Hexter v. Bast, 125 Pa. St. 52, 17 Atl. 252; Wells v. McGeoch, 71 Wis. 196, 35 N. W. 769; Swayze v. Waldo, 73 Iowa, 749, 33 N. W. 78; Craig v. Ward, 1 Abb. Dec. 454; Evans v. Edmonds, 13 C. B. 777. The charge of the learned trial judge was within these rules, and the exceptions under consideration furnish no ground for a reversal of the judgment.

The court was further asked to charge that "there can be no recovery in this case, in any event, unless it be proven or be found that there was an actual purpose or intent on the part of the defendant, on the 15th day of September, 1888, to defraud Emmanuel Hadcock of his property." The court so charged, but added: "Of course, that is in connection with what I have already charged, that it was not necessary it should have been determined, when he made the paper, before they got the money, as to which of the Hadcocks it was to go, but there must have been an intention to cheat and defraud the person to whom this paper should be delivered, the one or the other." The defendant excepted to the modification, and now argues that it was reversible error. In the course of his charge the trial judge had said: "If it was understood by the defendant that there was a proposition to borrow of one or more Hadcocks, and he sent out a general paper addressed to Mr. Hadcock, why, then you can say whether it was not fairly intended to be delivered to such person of the family as would loan the money; and, if that is true, it is not essential that it should appear to you that it had been determined, at the time the paper was drawn, that the loan should be from one or the other. If you find that fairly the meaning, intention, and design of the parties was that whoever loaned the money should have this paper presented to him, then it may be fairly said that the representation was made to whoever did loan the money to those persons." While the defendant had at first suggested that the money might be borrowed of Benjamin Hadcock, he was finally told that "the Hadcocks" would probably make the loan. Since the brothers Hadcock lived together as members of the same family, and the paper was addressed generally to "Mr. Hadcock," it was properly left to the jury to find whether it was not the intention of the defendant that the paper should be delivered to such member of the Hadcock family as would make the loan, which was the primary object of giving the writing. As a general recommendation of credit, knowingly given to an insolvent person, will support an action for deceit in favor of any one acting thereon to his injury, so, as we think, a letter addressed simply to "Mr. Hadcock" would justify any man of that name in acting upon it, at least when it was delivered to him with the apparent authority of the writer, and there was no direction from the latter as to which one of the Hadcocks it should be given. Moreover, the evidence warranted the inference that the Browns had implied authority from the defendant to deliver the letter to either one of the Hadcocks, and hence to the plaintiff's testator. We agree with the conclusion reached by the learned appellate division, and think that their judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur, except O'BRIEN, J., who takes no part, and GRAY, J., absent. Judgment affirmed.

BORDERS v. KATTELMAN.

(31 N. E. 19, 142 Ill. 96.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. May 9, 1892.

Appeal from appellate court, Fourth district.

Bill by H. A. Kattleman against William R. Borders to set aside a sale for fraud. Complainant obtained a decree, which was affirmed by the appellate court. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Koerner & Koerner, for appellant. H. Clay Horner, for appellee.

SHOPE, J. This was a bill in chancery by appellee against appellant, Borders, to set aside and rescind a sale of property on the ground of fraud practiced by appellant upon appellee, whereby the latter was induced to part with his property in exchange for a comparatively worthless note and mortgage of a third party. About the 1st of July, 1884, appellee deposited in the banking house of Borders & Boyle $2,000, taking a certificate of deposit therefor, payable in six months after date, at 5 per cent. interest per annum. A few months thereafter the firm became embarrassed, and was dissolved by the retirement of Boyle. A new firm was formed, composed of James J. Borders and appellant, who, for a valuable consideration, agreed to indemnify Boyle against all debts and liabilities of the late banking firm. Shortly after the maturity of the certificate of deposit appellee applied to appellant at the bank for payment of said certificate, who then, as the weight of proof tends to show, stated to him that he (appellant) had a tract of land in Randolph county worth $2,800, which he had just sold and conveyed to Crozier at that price; that Crozier had paid $700 in cash, and given his promissory note to him (appellant) for $2,142, secured by mortgage on the land. It is also shown that he represented to appellee that the land was well worth $2,800; was ample security for the note, which would be promptly paid at its maturity. He advised appellee, as appellee testified, to go and see Crozier, who he represented was well posted in respect of the land. The proofs leave but little, if any, doubt that the sale of the land to Crozier was not a sale in good faith. It appears, also, from the testimony that appellee did call on Crozier for information, and was assured by him that he (Crozier) had in fact bought the land for $2,800, and given a mortgage on the same to appellant to secure a note of $2,142. Appellant also, it seems, represented their tract of land had 40 acres cleared and under cultivation. Proof shows there were only 8 or 9 acres cleared on the tract. Appellant also represented to appellee, as the chancellor found from the evidence, that the firm of Borders & Boyle was so embarrassed financially as to endanger the loss of his money deposited with that firm; that he told appellee that he did not want to see him lose anything, and advised him to take the Crozier note and mortgage in exchange for his certificate of deposit, as the only sure means of protecting himself from loss. It is only just to say that appellant denies most of these alleged representations, or that he was guilty of deceiving appellee in respect of the value or nature of the land. Appellant knew that James J. Borders, one of the partners in the firm of Borders & Boyle, was perfectly solvent, and that the new firm of which appellant was a member had obligated themselves to Boyle, the outgoing partner of the firm of Borders & Boyle, to protect him from all the liabilities of the late firm, which, of course, included appellee's certificate. Appellee not closing with the terms offered at once, appellant wrote him, urging speedy and prompt action in the matter. He wrote: "We are settling very fast with out depositors. In this way, delay is dangerous. * * * I could have used the note offered you, [Crozier note,] and can do so yet. If you want it on the terms offered, to wit, trade my note, for you to give me an order on Crozier for difference, which order, if not paid, shall not bind you, and you to become owner of full face of note and interest, which terms, if satisfactory, put your name on it, without recourse, and send same to me, and I will send you note and mortgage indorsed in same way; mortgages duly recorded. Answer by return mail. * * * I will take pleasure in showing you the land at any convenient time. I am too busy now. Besides, the ground is covered with snow, and you could not judge of the quality of the soil. I cannot put this matter off. Time is very precious with me now."

It is shown by the witness Stout that appellant told him he was about to sell this land to a man named Kattleman, and that if he cornered witness, and asked anything about the value of the land, for the witness to put the price up. After Borders had sold the notes to appellee, this same witness asked him (appellant) how he came to sell the land for the price he did, and appellant replied, as is testified, that he "had got hold of a man that had more money than brains;" and also said, in reply to a remark by the witness, that Crozier would never pay the notes,—“Of course, that is the calculation.” Most of the material representations shown by the evidence to have been made by appellant to appellee, to induce the purchase of the Crozier note and mortgage, are shown to have been untrue. Some of them, at least, if the evidence is to be credited, appear to have been made under circumstances strongly tending to charge appellant with knowledge of their untruthfulness, or, at least, he occupied such a position as to lead to the presumption of his knowledge of their falsity. He admits that he knew that J. J. Borders, one of the firm of Borders & Boyle, was perfectly solvent at the time it is shown he was endeavoring to induce appellee to believe that the firm was insolvent, and that he was in danger of losing his money. He had owned the land in question some time before the pretended sale to Crozier, professed to be familiar with it, and must be held to have had notice of its value.

The point is made that, if the means were at hand by which appellee might have satisfied himself as to the truth or falsity of the representations, he was bound to do so, and, failing to avail himself of such means, he is not entitled to the relief sought. If appellant could make a defense based upon appellee's credulity and faith in appellant's representations, it could not prevail here. It appears that appellee did try to see the land before concluding his purchase from appellant. But, it being covered with snow, it could not, as stated by appellant in his letter, be properly examined; and, moreover, appellee was assured by appellant and Crozier, to whom the land had been conveyed, that the land was of the value of $2,800, and that practically one third of it was cleared and improved. Appellant says in his letter, as has been seen, that he will take pleasure in showing appellee the land at any convenient time; that he was too busy then; and that no proper judgment could be formed by his personal inspection of it at that time. While willing to show the land at some convenient time in the future, he was unwilling to delay concluding the transaction with appellee. He wrote: "I cannot put this matter off. If you do not want the note, say so, and I will place it elsewhere." He wanted an answer by return mail. Time was exceedingly precious to appellant then. Under such circumstances, it would be in the highest degree unconscionable to permit appellant to take advantage of the fact that appellee gave credence to his word, and relied upon his statements as true. In such case, the party will not be relieved from the consequence of his false representations, because the party thereby injured trusted him, and parted with his property upon false representation of fact, which he assumed to know to be true. Where the sale is of property at a distance, so that the purchaser has not the means at hand of ascertaining the truthfulness of the vendor's representations, the vendee may rely upon their truth, and have redress if they are shown to have been materially false. Smith v. Richards, 13 Pet. 26; Maggart v. Freeman, 27 Ind. 531; Harris v. McMurray, 23 Ind. 9; Ladd v. Pigott, 114 Ill. 647, 2 N. E. 503; Savage v. Stearns, 126 Mass. 207.

Here, as it appears, appellee did not have the ability to make any proper examination of the land without further time. Appellant, it would seem, was imperious in his demand that the transaction be closed at once, having first induced appellee to believe, as before stated is shown by the evidence, that he was in danger of losing his money unless he took the Crozier notes and mortgage. Nor is it important that it should be affirmatively found that the untrue representation should have in fact been known to appellant to be false. It is well settled that it is immaterial whether a party misrepresenting a material fact knows it to be false, or makes the assertion of the fact without knowing it to be true; for the affirmation of what one does not know to be true is unjustifiable, and, if another act upon the faith of it, he who induced the action must suffer, and not the other. Story, Eq. Jur. § 193; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 877; Bigelow, Frauds, p. 410 et seq.; Cooley, Torts (2d Ed.) 582; Thompson v. Lee, 31 Ala. 292; Railroad Co. v. Tyng, 63 N. Y. 653; Allen v. Hart, 72 Ill. 104; Fauntleroy v. Wilcox, 80 Ill. 477; Hicks v. Stevens, 121 Ill. 186-197, 11 N. E. 241. So it has been held that, where the representations relate to facts which must be supposed to be within the defendant's knowledge, proof of their falsity is a sufficient showing of his knowledge that they were false. Cooley, Torts, 583; Morse v. Dearborn, 109 Mass. 593; Morgan v. Skiddy, 62 N. Y. 319. And so a party selling property is presumed to know whether the representations he affirmatively makes in respect of it are true or false. If he know them to be false, it is a positive fraud; and if he make them without knowing them to be true, for the purpose of inducing another to act upon them, it in equity amounts to fraud. Miner v. Medbury, 6 Wis. 295; Smith v. Richards, supra; McFerran v. Taylor, 3 Cranch, 270; Glasscock v. Minor, 11 Mo. 655. Taking the evidence on the part of appellee, supported by the letters of appellant and proof of extrinsic facts, we are unable to say that the chancellor was not justified in finding that appellee was induced to part with his certificate of deposit by the statements and representations of appellant of matters materially affecting the transaction, and which are shown to be untrue. All fraud and untrue statement, and that he made any untrue representations, is denied by appellant, and his version of the transaction is consistent with his honesty and good faith; but in the conflict we think the preponderance of the evidence is with appellee, and sustains the material allegations of the bill. The decree of the circuit court will accordingly be affirmed.

NEILL v. SHAMBURG et al.

(27 Atl. 992, 158 Pa. 263.)

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Nov. 6, 1893.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Forest county; Charles P. Noyes, Judge.

Bill by Elizabeth P. Neill against B. F. Shamburg and H. W. Shamburg, administrators of G. Shamburg, deceased, to rescind a contract of sale by plaintiff to defendants' intestate of an undivided half interest in a leasehold of a 200-acre tract of oil land. The price consideration of the contract of sale was $550 paid in cash, and $100 to be paid in case a well producing six or more barrels of oil per day should be found on the land. The bill was dismissed, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

T. F. Richey and Samuel T. Neill, for appellant. Julius Byles, Samuel D. Irwin, and Eugene Mackey, for appellees.

MITCHELL, J. There are two main questions of fact upon which the plaintiff's claim to relief must ultimately rest—First, serious inadequacy of price; and, secondly, fraud, actual or constructive. If either of these grounds fails, the case must fall. The master finds that there was no inadequacy of price, and, as the learned court concurs in this finding, it would be sufficient for us to say that we have not been shown that it was clear error. But an examination of the whole evidence, in deference to the earnestness of counsel, who regard this as a turning point in the case, leads us to the same conclusion. At the time of the sale,—July, 1879,—the 200-acre tract was undeveloped, except for one well, No. 8, which had been in operation about three months. The most favorable evidence as to this well was given by James, who said, "My recollection is that it started off between five and seven barrels, somewhere," while the McIntyres, Tucker, and other witnesses, put its production at from one to three barrels. The same witnesses describe the neighboring territory as "spotted," good wells and dry holes being found close together. The 50-acre tract adjoining on the northwest had at that date three wells, two of which, Nos. 5 and 6, were small, and one, No. 7, was a valuable well, having produced as high as 75 barrels, and ranging down, according to the different witnesses, from that to 7 or 8 barrels, which James McIntyre says was its production in July, 1879. Business was dull, and there was no active market for leases in that neighborhood, (Jenkins and Fogle.) Under these circumstances, it is plain that the value of the lease was almost entirely speculative. Indeed, James testifies that the value of oil territory is always speculative, until it is actually developed. It is a business with elements of great uncertainty, and that appears to have been peculiarly so in the present case. Everything depended on whether

No. 7, or the little wells near it, should be taken as the best index of the nature of the territory. The three witnesses for plaintiff put the value of the lease at from twenty thousand to eight or ten thousand dollars; the highest estimate being given by Egoff, whose testimony is badly handicapped by the fact that he was a discharged employe, who admitted that he had come forward in the case partly "to get even with" his former employer. On the other hand, we have the testimony of eight or nine witnesses, most of them with superior local knowledge, and several owners of land in the immediate vicinity, with certainly no bias to depreciate the neighborhood, all concurring that the lease was worth nothing beyond the royalty. The decided weight of the evidence is in favor of the adequacy of the consideration paid.

As this finding takes away the foundation of the plaintiff's claim to relief, the other matters may be dismissed briefly.

There was no proof of actual fraud. No express misrepresentations were shown, all that there was on the subject being the clause in the assignment of the lease stipulating a "further consideration of one hundred dollars when a well is found on said lease producing six barrels per day," etc. The master construed this as "a practical representation that no such well had then been found." In view of the fact that this is writing into a paper in which the plaintiff is the grantor, and which the grantee has not signed, a representation by the latter which is not to be found in the words used, this construction might be difficult to maintain; but, as it is in favor of the appellant, we need not consider it further. Even conceding that the representation was thus made, the master finds that it has not been shown to be untrue.

It is further claimed that Shamburg, intentionally and in bad faith, concealed from the plaintiff facts relating to the production of oil on the 50-acre lease, which she was entitled to know. It was certainly shown that Shamburg had directed his employes not to give information on this subject, but to refer parties to him. The plaintiff had no interest in the 50-acre lease, but we may concede that, when she was about to sell her part of the other lease to her cotenant, she became entitled to know such facts with regard to its production as would bear upon the value of the other. But, unless there is some exceptional circumstance to put on him the duty to speak, it is the right of every man to keep his business to himself. Possibly, Shamburg was unduly suspicious on this point, but the nature and position of his business suggested caution. Fogle testifies that Shamburg was the only person operating in that neighborhood, and James says that Shamburg told him he had spent near $150,000 in developing that territory, "and now all these fellows are anxious to pry into my business." We do not find in the acts of Shamburg, under the circumstances, anything more than a positive intention and effort to reap the benefit of his enterprise, by keeping the knowledge of its results to himself, and we agree with the master that this "falls far short of establishing fraud."

The claim of constructive fraud is based on the relations of the parties as partners, and as mortgagor and mortgagee. The master has rightly found that there was no partnership. The parties were tenants in common. No presumption of partnership arose from that relation. Walker v. Tupper, 152 Pa. St. 1, 25 Atl. Rep. 172; Dunham v. Lovetock, 27 Atl. Rep. 990, (not yet officially reported.) And there was no evidence from which to infer a partnership by intention and agreement of the parties. The relationship of mortgagor and mortgagee, like that of tenants in common, is in some respects, and to a limited degree, one of confidence. There are certain things, approximating to, if not actually involving, a breach of good faith, which neither will be permitted to do, to the prejudice of the other. But we do not find in the present case anything which requires the application of this principle. The mortgage was merely for indemnity against a contingent loss by having to pay a guaranty to third persons. Until such loss occurred, Shamburg had no claim on the mortgaged premises which changed the relation of the parties as tenants in common. Decree affirmed.

PORTER v. WOODRUFF.

(36 N. J. Eq. 174.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. October Term, 1882.

On bill, answer and proofs taken in open court.

Oscar Keen, S. H. Pennington, and Thomas N. McCarter, for complainant. John R. Emery and Henry C. Pitney, for defendant.

VAN FLEET, V. C. This is a bill by a principal against her agent. The complainant charges the defendant with many acts of misconduct in the course of his agency, some of which constitute gross frauds. The relation of principal and agent was formed between the parties in January, 1873. The complainant's husband died November 29, 1872. She was then about 68 years of age, childless, and without experience in business. She lacked both a knowledge of business and an inclination to acquire it. Her husband, by his will, gave his whole estate to her. His personal estate amounted to about $60,000. He had, by a writing, which has not been put in evidence, but the existence of which has been fully proved, recommended the defendant as a fit person to assist the complainant in the management of her estate. The defendant had been associated with the complainant's husband for many years as a ruling elder in the superintendence of the spiritual affairs of one of the most influential Presbyterian churches of the city of Newark. His reputation as a capable and trustworthy business man stood high. He was president of one of the most prominent fire insurance companies of the city of Newark. His high religious character, and the position of trust he occupied in the business community, were almost sure to give him the confidence of the most cautious person. Very shortly after the death of her husband, the complainant surrendered into the possession of the defendant all her papers and securities, and requested him to have the safe in which her husband had kept his securities removed to his office, in order that he might manage her affairs with less inconvenience to himself. This he did. From this time forth until the latter part of December, 1879, the defendant exercised over the securities and moneys of the complainant a dominion almost as absolute as he did over his own. The complainant, in describing her relations to the defendant, says: "I looked to the defendant for everything without anxiety. I just threw myself on his fidelity, as a child would on a parent, without questioning."

And the defendant, speaking on the same subject, says that the complainant and he were on terms of close friendship and intimacy; that she looked upon him as her adviser, comforter and friend, and that what he did for her was done as a friend, and were such services as a son or brother might render for a mother or a sister, without expectation of compensation, except by way of gift.

This narrative shows that the relation between the parties was one of great trust and almost blind confidence on one side, and complete control on the other. The defendant, therefore, occupied a position towards the complainant where he was bound not only to deal with her honestly and justly, but to scrupulously avoid engaging in any transaction, in respect to her estate, in which his interests might be put in antagonism to hers. He was required, in all things relating to her estate, to subordinate his interests to hers, and carefully abstain from using his power and influence over her for his own advantage and to her harm. The law by which he was bound to regulate his conduct is a law of jealousy, and under its wise provisions he can keep nothing that he has obtained from her, under the guise of a contract, to which he cannot show a title entrenched in the utmost good faith. His title must have been acquired openly, on a full and frank disclosure of every fact likely to influence her conduct, and his contract must be shown to have been just and honest in every particular.

The first of the several claims to relief presented by the bill, which I shall consider, is that in which the complainant charges that the defendant is liable for the profit made on the purchase and sale of certain railroad stock. Among the property which the complainant acquired, under the will of her husband, were 67 shares of the capital stock of the Central Railroad Company of New Jersey. After this corporation became insolvent and passed into the possession of the chancellor, the complainant became very much troubled about what was best to do with her stock, whether to sell it or to keep it. She sought information in many directions, consulted the defendant almost daily, and after undergoing much perturbation of mind upon the subject, at last, under a strong fear that if she continued to hold it, the whole would be lost, she gave the defendant peremptory direction to sell it at $16 a share. This direction was given about the 1st of May, 1878. The defendant did not sell the stock, but caused it to be transferred to his wife, and paid the complainant for it at the price it was then selling for on the market. The amount he paid was $1,072. He did not tell the complainant that he intended to purchase the stock himself or of his purpose to have it transferred to his wife, but, on the contrary, by his answer, he says that after he made up his mind to buy, he went to the complainant and told her that a sale had been effected, or could be effected, at $16 a share. In his evidence, he says that the idea of purchasing the stock for himself, as a speculation, first entered his mind after he had received direction to sell it, and after he had had an interview with Vermilyea & Co., stockbrokers of the City of New York, in which they told him that they thought the market price of the stock would advance. At the time he told the complainant that a sale had been effected, or could be effected, at $16 a share, he did not tell her that he had consulted these gentlemen, nor what opinion they had expressed. After the stock was transferred, the defendant paid to the receiver in charge of the affairs of the corporation under the re-organization scheme, the sum of $500, and in return received an adjustment bond, and also surrendered five shares of stock, and in return received an income bond. On January 30, 1880, he sold the 62 shares still standing in the name of his wife, for $5,091.75. The defendant's wife had no beneficial interest in the transaction, she paid no part of the purchase money, and received no part of the proceeds of sale.

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—19

The defendant's reticence under the circumstances was not only unnatural, but undutiful. It amounted to a concealment of information which, I think, he was bound to give. He knew that the complainant had long been in a state of painful anxiety about her stock, that she had been reaching out in almost every direction for help, and that she seized upon every scrap of information that came in her way with the greatest avidity; he knew, also, that her mind had been in a very unstable condition as to what it was best for her to do, and that she had great confidence in his shrewdness, as well as his integrity, and that she would be likely to be strongly influenced by his conduct. I am thoroughly persuaded that he concealed from her the fact that he intended to buy for the purpose of inducing her to sell, believing that if he told her he intended to become the purchaser himself, she would at once refuse to sell.

This conviction is greatly strengthened by his subsequent conduct. Shortly after the stock was transferred, its market price began to advance, and the complainant expressed regret that she had sold, and applied to the defendant to know whether she could not get the stock back again. He told her she had spoken too late. He did not acknowledge that he was its purchaser, and frankly state, as I think he should have done, that he was unwilling to return it. Subsequently, when applied to for information as to whom the complainant's stock had been sold, he answered that he did not know, but said it had been sold through Vermilyea & Co. This statement, it will be perceived, involved something more than concealment. The evidence renders it entirely clear, I think, that from the time the defendant made up his mind to buy the stock, up until the evidence of his purchase was discovered, he made a constant effort to conceal from the complainant the fact of his purchase. His motive for adopting this course originally was to prevent the complainant from retreating from the purpose to sell, and he afterwards found it necessary to adhere to it to escape her reproaches for not dealing with her openly and fairly.

The legal principle to be applied in deciding whether the defendant can successfully resist the complainant's claim is too firmly established to warrant even the most astute and courageous counsel in attempting to overthrow it or to narrow its scope. The general interests of justice and the safety of those who are compelled to repose confidence in others alike demand that the courts shall always inflexibly maintain that great and salutary rule which declares that an agent employed to sell cannot make himself the purchaser, nor, if employed to purchase, can he be himself the seller. The moment he ceases to be the representative of his employer and places himself in a position towards his principal where his interests may come in conflict with those of his principal, no matter how fair his conduct may be in the particular transaction, that moment he ceases to be that which his service requires and his duty to his principal demands. He is no longer an agent but an umpire; he ceases to be the champion of one of the contestants in the game of bargain, and sets himself up as a judge to decide, between his principal and himself, what is just and fair. The reason of the rule is apparent; owing to the selfishness and greed of our nature, there must, in the great mass of the transactions of mankind, be a strong and almost ineradicable antagonism between the interests of the seller and the buyer, and universal experience has shown that the average man will not, where his interests are brought in conflict with those of his employer, look upon his employer's interests as more important and entitled to more protection than his own.

In such cases the courts do not stop to inquire whether an agent has obtained an advantage or not, or whether his conduct has been fraudulent or not, when the fact is established that he has attempted to assume two distinct and opposite characters in the same transaction, in one of which he acted for himself and in the other pretended to act for another person, and to have secured for each the same measure of advantage that would have been obtained if each had been represented by a disinterested and loyal representative; they do not pause to speculate concerning the merits of the transaction, whether the agent has been able so far to curb his natural greed as to take no advantage, but they at once pronounce the transaction void because it is against public policy. The salutary object of the principle is not to compel restitution in case fraud has been committed or an unjust advantage has been gained, but to elevate the agent to a position where he cannot be tempted to betray his principal. Under a less stringent rule, fraud might be committed or unfair advantage taken, and yet, owing to the imperfections of the best of human institutions, the injured party be unable either to discover it or prove it in such manner as to entitle him to redress. To guard against this uncertainty, all possible temptation is removed, and the prohibition against an agent acting in a dual character is made broad enough to cover all his transactions. The rights of the principal will not be changed, nor the capacity of the agent enlarged, by the fact that the agent is not invested with a discretion, but simply acts under an authority to purchase a particular article at a specified price, or to sell a particular article at the market price. No such distinction is recognized by the adjudications, nor can it be established without removing an important safeguard against fraud. Benson v. Heathorn, 1 Younge & C. Ch. 326; Conkey v. Bond, 34 Barb. 276, 36 N. Y. 427.

In pronouncing the judgment of the court of errors and appeals in Staats v. Bergen, 17 N. J. Eq. 554, 558, the present chief justice has discussed this whole subject with his usual vigor and perspicuity. "The rule," just stated, he says, "is one of public policy. The trustee,"—and here, I think, it should be said that the persons referred to are not simply those who are strictly entitled to be called trustees, but the term is used in its most comprehensive sense, and intended to embrace all persons who act in a representative capacity, whether, according to exact nomenclature, they are styled agents, factors, executors, administrators or trustees,—“the trustee is not prevented from bidding for property which he himself sells, on the ground simply of a supposition of actual fraud, but because the law has established, as an inflexible rule, applicable to every emergency, that he shall not place himself in a situation in which he will be tempted to take advantage of his cestui que trust. This is a wise public regulation, intended to protect a species of property which otherwise would be constantly exposed to peculiar hazard. The trustee, therefore, must submit to this regulation, and if he does an act in violation of it, no matter how pure his intention may be, such act is voidable at the instance of the person whom he represents. * * * At these sales, then, the trustee is forbidden to purchase, because his interest, as such purchaser, is opposed to the interest of his cestui que trust, and he acts, therefore, under a bias in his own favor. Nor does this rule rest, to any considerable extent, in the fact that, in a particular line of cases, the trustee has peculiar opportunities for the practice of fraudulent acts with regard to the property in his charge. The rule, to be efficacious, must be general, and the law implies, therefore, that in all cases of trusts such opportunities may exist, and consequently the prohibition is universal. * * * So jealous is the law on this point, that a trustee may not put himself in a position in which, to be honest, must be a strain on him." The cases are numerous in which these principles have been enforced against persons acting in the capacity of agents. I shall cite only those most pertinent. Ex parte Lacey, 6 Ves. 625; Brookman v. Rothschild, 3 Sim. 153; Rothschild v. Brookman, 2 Dow & C. 188; Gillett v. Peppercorne, 3 Beav. 78; Moore v. Moore, 5 N. Y. 256; New York Cent. Ins. Co. v. National Protection Ins. Co., 14 N. Y. 85.

It is possible for an agent, dealing directly with his principal, to make a contract which the courts will uphold; but such transactions, to be maintained, must be characterized by the utmost good faith. There must be no misrepresentation, and an entire absence of concealment or suppression of any fact within the knowledge of the agent, which might influence the principal; and the burden of establishing the perfect fairness of the contract, in such cases, rests upon the agent. Condit v. Blackwell, 22 N. J. Eq. 481. Such transactions are never upheld, unless it is clearly shown that there has been, on the part of the person trusted, that most marked integrity, that uberrima fides, which removes all doubt respecting the fairness of the contract. Rothschild v. Brookman, ubi supra.

My conclusion is that the defendant is liable to the complainant for the profit made on the purchase and sale of the complainant's railroad stock.

The second claim to relief which I shall consider is that in which the complainant insists that she is entitled to have the sum which shall be found to be due her in the transaction just discussed, charged as a lien for unpaid purchase money on certain real estate which she conveyed, at the defendant's instance, to the defendant's wife. This claim rests upon the following facts: In March, 1874, the defendant purchased a house and lot on High street, in the city of Newark, for a residence for himself, for the sum of $15,000. On the 1st of April, 1874, he procured them to be conveyed to the complainant, and paid the purchase money as follows: The complainant and defendant executed two bonds of $4,500 each, which were secured by two mortgages, made by the complainant alone, on the property conveyed, and the complainant also assigned to the vendor a mortgage held by her against Leopold and Herman Graf for $4,000, and the balance of the purchase money, viz., $2,000, was paid in cash. The defendant admits that at the time he made this payment he might have had $2,000 of the complainant's money in his hands.

During the year immediately succeeding the conveyance, the defendant says he made improvements on the property which cost $7,000. The complainant continued to hold the title to the property until she severed her relations with the defendant. On the severance of their relations, the complainant demanding that the defendant should take the title to the High street property, discharge her from liability on the bonds which she had executed in his behalf, and return to her such part of the purchase money as her money and securities had paid. This was done. The house and lot were conveyed to the defendant's wife January 7, 1880, and the defendant then paid to the complainant, in cash, in satisfaction of the money and securities belonging to her, which he had used in paying for the house and lot, the sum of $4,594.90. The funds he used in making this payment were the proceeds of the sale of the railroad stock, which the defendant had induced the complainant to transfer to his wife. Under the force of these facts, the complainant insists that inasmuch as the moneys which the defendant paid to her were the proceeds of her property, and were, therefore, in equity hers, and not his, that it should be adjudged that the consideration which the defendant agreed to pay for the conveyance to his wife has not been paid, and consequently that she is entitled to a lien as for unpaid purchase money.

Two things are undisputed. First, that part of the consideration which the defendant was to pay for the conveyance to his wife, was to make restitution to the complainant, in money, of so much of her property as he had used, at the time of the purchase, in paying for the house and lot; and second, that in going through the form of making such restitution, he simply gave to the complainant what in equity was hers already. If the defendant, in going through the form of paying the complainant, had used money in his possession belonging to her, the legal nature of the transaction would have been so conspicuously clear that it would have been impossible to misunderstand it. So too, if he had secretly converted one of her securities into money and handed that over to her as payment, though he might have deceived her for the moment, his act would have not constituted a payment, but a fraud. This is exactly what he did do. He converted property which in equity was hers, into money, and attempted to pay her with her own money. He attempted to use that which was hers as his, and to discharge his obligation to her by giving her that which he had attempted, wrongfully, to take from her and to vest in himself. Except we travesty reason and ridicule truth, it is impossible to call such a transaction a payment.

This conclusion makes it the duty of the court to declare that the whole of the consideration which the defendant agreed to give for the conveyance to his wife has not been given, and this places the complainant in a position before the court where she is entitled to the aid of the court in enforcing her equitable rights against the land conveyed. The right of a vendor of lands to a lien in equity for unpaid purchase money, has been fully and repeatedly recognized by this court and is now a part of its established jurisprudence. This lien will be enforced, not against the purchaser, but against all who claim under him as volunteers or donees. Graves v. Coutant, 31 N. J. Eq. 763.

My judgment is that the complainant is entitled to a lien as for unpaid purchase money, against the house and lot conveyed by her to the defendant's wife, to the extent that the defendant used the money of the complainant in paying the consideration he agreed to give the complainant therefor.

The third claim made by the complainant presents the question whether or not the defendant is liable for $1,000 of the purchase money of a lot of land conveyed by the complainant to one David Brackin, in July, 1874. The lot was sold for $1,200, $200 of which was paid in cash, and the balance, as the complainant alleges, was to be secured by a first mortgage on the property sold. The defendant, she says, had charge of the whole matter, and, instead of securing the balance of the purchase money by a first mortgage on the lot sold, accepted a second mortgage on another lot, and that since then the first mortgage has been foreclosed, the mortgaged premises sold and the whole of her money lost. I shall not restate or discuss the evidence pertinent to this branch of the case. It is enough to say that, according to my view, the evidence entirely fails to establish a case against the defendant. It should be said that it clearly appears that the complainant is entirely wrong in the facts on which she rests her right to relief. It was not the first mortgage that was foreclosed, but the one held by the complainant. At the sale of the mortgaged premises they were bid in by the solicitor employed by the defendant, for the complainant, to foreclose her mortgage, for $700. The complainant refused to take title to the mortgaged premises, and they were afterwards conveyed to the defendant's daughter by his direction, and he subsequently assumed control over them. The defendant paid the taxed costs of the suit and the expenses of the sale, but nothing more, though he procured the mortgaged premises to be conveyed to his daughter. In stating the account between the parties the defendant must be charged with the sum for which the premises were sold, and credited with whatever he has paid on account thereof.

The complainant also seeks to hold the defendant liable for making an improper or insecure investment of her moneys. In March, 1875, the complainant received from the sale of some land located in Pennsylvania the sum of $6,000, and handed it over to the defendant to invest for her. The defendant, March 17, 1875, deposited the money to an account he kept in one of the Newark banks, as trustee. He is unable to tell how many different trusts this account represented, or when this particular $6,000 was disbursed, or to whom. On March 6, 1875, William A. Pruden and Amos W. Austin executed a second mortgage on a lot in Commerce street, in the city of Newark, to the defendant as executor of Robert C. Stoutenburgh, deceased, for $6,000. The defendant says he invested the complainant's money in this mortgage. The prior mortgage on this lot secured the sum of $10,000. The defendant says, before investing the complainant's money in the mortgage just described, he told her it was a second lien, that he was satisfied the security was sufficient and that the mortgagors were good and prompt payers, and that she thereupon directed him to make the investment. The mortgage was not assigned to the complainant at the time the investment was made, but the defendant says he took it from the package containing the papers of the Stoutenburgh estate, and placed it among the papers he held for the complainant. The mortgage was not formally assigned until after the complainant had revoked the defendant's authority as her agent, and called upon him to surrender her property. The defendant made seven indorsements of interest on the bond after he says he placed the mortgage among the papers of the complainant; four of them are made by him as attorney, two as executor and one without any designation.

It is evident at a glance that the defendant's conduct in this transaction is open to the very gravest suspicion. The security, in the first place, was one that a trustee could not accept without rendering himself personally liable in case it proved to be worthless or inadequate. Gilmore v. Tuttle, 32 N. J. Eq. 611. The defendant, therefore, occupied a position in respect to this security which entirely disqualified him, as the trusted adviser of the complainant, from giving her such counsel respecting it as she was entitled to have. Simply placing the mortgage among the complainant's papers, without other evidence of her ownership, not only put her title to it in a condition of extreme jeopardy, but left the defendant free to use it, as occasion might seem to require, as a security belonging to both funds, and thus make it answer a double purpose. The defendant kept no account of his transactions on behalf of the complainant, and she was, therefore, deprived of the protection which the performance of that duty would have afforded her. The defendant's conduct in this matter deserves, as I think, the severest condemnation.

But while it appears to be very clear that the defendant's conduct in this transaction has been highly improper, still I think it equally clear on the proofs as they now stand that no case is established against the defendant which can be made the basis of relief to the complainant. It has not been shown that the mortgage in question is either a worthless or an inadequate security. No loss has as yet been sustained, nor has any attempt been made to show that the complainant must inevitably or will probably suffer loss. All that has been shown is that the defendant has invested the complainant's money in a second mortgage. I know of no authority which goes to the length of declaring that a trustee shall be liable, whether loss is sustained or not, simply because he has invested the funds in his hands in a second mortgage. He is bound to make safe investments, such as will yield a reasonable income and a return of the principal when required. If he does that, though the security he takes may not be the most desirable, he incurs no personal liability. He should not, as a general rule, invest in second mortgages; if he does, he takes the risk of being personally answerable in case loss ensues, but he is not liable, as I understand the rule, simply because he has made such an investment, if no loss has been sustained, and in the absence of evidence that any will be sustained.

The next claim made by the complainant is uncontested. Among the property which the complainant received under the will of her husband were ten shares of the stock of a corporation known by the name of the Peters Manufacturing Company. Dividends, in both cash and stock or bonds, were declared on this stock in 1873, 1874, and 1875. Those of 1873 were 30 per cent. in cash, and 40 per cent. in stock; in 1874, 40 per cent. in cash, 25 per cent. in stock, and 35 per cent. in bonds; and in 1875, 30 per cent. in cash, and 20 per cent. in bonds. The defendant collected all these dividends. He paid the cash dividends to the complainant, but had the stock and bond dividends issued to himself as trustee. His explanation or justification of his conduct in this matter is this: he says when the first stock dividend was declared, he inquired of the complainant what he should do with it, and that she replied he might do with it what he liked, or what he had a mind to, and that he understood her by this form of expression to say to him that she meant that he should take it as a gift. When the subsequent dividends were declared, he says he supposed that she entertained the same intention with respect to them, and he procured them also to be issued to himself, though he made no further inquiry of her respecting her purpose, and she made no further declaration of her intention. The defendant sold the stock and bonds thus obtained, in January, 1877, for $1,300. But before making the sale, he had received on the stock so obtained by him dividends in cash to the amount of $561. The defendant, by his answer, admits that he is liable for the value of the stock and the amount that he has received thereon in dividends, and says that he is willing to account to the complainant for the same, if she insists that he shall do so. She does so insist. This claim is one of the foundations of her bill. The defendant, in the accounting, must be charged with what he received on the sale of the stock and bonds, and also with whatever he has received thereon as dividends.

I shall dispose of the other questions at issue between the parties by simply stating my conclusions, without attempting to review the evidence or stating the argument upon which they rest.

1. The complainant is not entitled to a decree setting aside the deed made by her to the defendant's daughter as compensation for the defendant's services.

2. The defendant, in the accounting, is entitled to a credit of $50 for money paid to the complainant in December, 1879.

3. The defendant, in the accounting, must be charged with the dividends received by him for the complainant on her stock in the American Insurance Company, for the years 1876, 1877 and 1878; also with three sums, of $17.50 each, for unpaid interest on the Graf bonds and mortgages, due February 1, 1873, August 1, 1873, and February 1, 1874; and also with $6.20 which, in his account, he has erroneously charged against the complainant.

The account between the parties will be stated and settled by the vice chancellor. Either party may bring on the hearing on the accounting on ten days' notice to the other.

The complainant is entitled to costs.

VIRGINIA LAND CO. v. HAUPT.

(19 S. E. 168, 90 Va. 533.)

Supreme Court of Appeals of Virginia. March 8, 1894.

Error to circuit court of city of Roanoke.

Action by the Virginia Land Company against one Haupt. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Affirmed.

Watts, Robertson & Robertson, for plaintiff in error. Griffin & Glasgow, for defendant in error.

LEWIS, P. The defendant in error was sued by the Virginia Land Company to recover certain unpaid assessments on the stock of the company aggregating $2,800. The principal grounds of defense were (1) fraud in procuring the contract of subscription; and (2) a material variance between the prospectus and the charter of the company. The jury found for the defendant, and the court refused to disturb the verdict. The defendant subscribed for the stock at the instance of one O'Leary, who was a real estate agent at Roanoke, and one of the promoters of the company. It was proposed in the prospectus "to organize a company for the purchase of a certain tract of land, lying near the said city, containing about 550 acres, and to lay it out in residence lots, and to develop its natural attractions." By the charter subsequently obtained the company was authorized to buy land, not exceeding 5,000 acres, also personal property, and to issue mortgage bonds; to loan money to develop lands; to construct street railways, and to use cars impelled by any kind of motive power; to erect and operate motor, gas, and electric works, etc. O'Leary was known to the defendant as a successful business man, and his name headed the subscription list. When he solicited the defendant to subscribe he informed him, in answer to a specific inquiry, that the land proposed to be purchased belonged to Gates, Moorman & Moorman. In point of fact, O'Leary and one Christian, another subscriber to the stock and a promoter of the company, held options on the land, which fact was not mentioned to the defendant. O'Leary recommended the stock to the defendant as a desirable investment, and upon his advice the defendant agreed to take 100 shares. After the organization of the company the land was transferred to the company, and in consequence O'Leary and Christian realized a very large profit. The company was chartered early in March, 1890, and on the 19th of the same month the first stockholders' meeting was held, at which meeting O'Leary represented the defendant as his proxy. At the same meeting an assessment of 10 per cent. of the capital stock was ordered, notice of which was afterwards sent to the defendant; and on the 23d of the ensuing August another assessment of 5 per cent. was ordered. Upon receipt of notice of this last assessment the defendant wrote the secretary of the company as follows: "Dear Sir: I have your notice of September 1st, calling for an assessment of $500.00,—five per cent. on one hundred shares of your stock. If you will please refer to my letter of April the 28th, addressed to your treasurer, you will notice that I am not a stockholder in your company. Although I have never received a reply to this letter, I take it, in the absence of such acknowledgment, my stock was, as a matter of course, canceled. So that there may be no further misunderstanding in the matter, however, I beg to advise that I am not a stockholder in the Virginia Land Company, having paid no assessment whatever on the subscription." In the notice of the 10 per cent. assessment of March 19, 1890, it was said: "This amount must be paid promptly, or the stock will be declared forfeited;" and in response to this the defendant's letter of the 28th of April, above referred to, was written, which is as follows: "Dear Sir: I have your favor of the 24th inst., calling attention to ten per cent. assessment of the Virginia Land Company's stock, and in reply beg to say that recent financial arrangements in another direction, that I am suddenly called upon to provide for, will make it impossible for me to pay this assessment now; and to prevent delays, as well as to avoid being a hindrance in any way to the success of the company, I will be glad if you will consider my stock forfeited, as provided for in notice of assessment. * * * I will be glad, therefore, if you will dispose of my stock to other parties. I have been informed that the stock is selling at a premium, so I presume there will be no difficulty in doing this. Having paid nothing on the stock, I am, of course, not entitled to anything from it." At the trial the defendant testified that when he made the contract of subscription he had no other information respecting the proposed enterprise than such as he obtained from the prospectus and what was told him by O'Leary; that he was induced to subscribe by the urgent solicitation of O'Leary, in whose judgment and integrity he had confidence, and who earnestly recommended the scheme as a good investment. He also testified that he had no idea that O'Leary was interested in the land which it was proposed to buy otherwise than as a stockholder, and that, so far from the fact being disclosed to him, O'Leary, when questioned on the subject, represented that it belonged to Gates, Moorman & Moorman. He testified further that he would not have consented to subscribe had he known of the promoter's interest in the land, and that he had no intimation of any such thing as a "promoter's fund" until several weeks after he had subscribed.

The court, among other things, instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that O'Leary and Christian held options on the land, and that O'Leary induced the defendant to subscribe in ignorance of that fact, relying on his (O'Leary's) supposed disinterested and superior judgment, and that he, the defendant, was thereby misled, to his injury, into making a contract that he otherwise would not have made, then the subscription was voidable, at his option. This construction propounds the law correctly. The authorities are abundant in support of the general rule that one who is fraudulently induced by an agent of a corporation—and a promoter is an agent of the proposed corporation—to subscribe to its capital stock may, at his option, repudiate the contract; and that a fraud may consist as well in the suppression of what is true as in the representation of what is false. Indeed, the law is that, where the person solicited to subscribe has no other information on the subject than that the agent chooses to convey, the statement of the agent ought to be characterized by the utmost candor and honesty. Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law (3d Ed.) § 147; Crump v. Mining Co., 7 Grat. 352; Bosher v. Land Co., 89 Va. 455, 16 S. E. 360; Directors, etc., v. Kisch, L. R. 2 H. L. 99. It is contended, however, that the defendant has by his conduct waived the right to annul the contract in question. But there can be no waiver in a case of this sort without full knowledge of the facts, and such knowledge of the facts and such knowledge on the part of the defendant has not been shown. He says he had an intimation a few weeks after the organization of the company that there was a large promoters' fund, but as to who were the parties interested in the fund he was not informed. He made inquiry on the subject, he says, but could ascertain nothing definite; and that he relied on his letter of the 28th of April, in reply to the notice of the first assessment, to which he received no reply. And afterwards, when notified of the 5 per cent. assessment, he promptly replied, calling attention to his said letter, and saying he was not a stockholder. He also called the attention of one of the directors of the company to the intimation he had had in regard to the promoters' fund, and informed him that he repudiated the contract. It is true, he gave a proxy to O'Leary to represent him at the first stockholders' meeting, at which meeting the facts in regard to the promoters' options on the land were disclosed; but, as was well said in the argument, it would be absurd to hold that he was affected by notice to O'Leary of what the latter knew from the beginning, and failed to disclose to him. And if he was not affected by notice to O'Leary, then there is no proof that he received any certain information of the facts constituting the fraud complained of before the institution of the present action. In treating of laches as a bar to the subscriber's remedies, Cook says: "The date from which laches begins to run is the time when the subscriber is first chargeable with notice that a fraud has been perpetrated upon him. Mere suspicions or random statements, heard in public or in stockholders' meetings, do not necessarily constitute notice. But, after a subscriber's suspicions are reasonably aroused, it is his duty to investigate at once. The corporation has the burden of proof in asserting that the subscriber had notice and was guilty of laches." Cook, Stock, Stockh. & Corp. Law (3d Ed.) § 162. Applying these principles to the present case, we are of opinion upon the ground of fraud the case is with the defendant, and that there has been no waiver of the fraud on his part; and, as this view is decisive of the case, it is needless to consider whether the case is within the ruling in Manufacturing Co. v. Hockaday, 89 Va. 557, 16 S. E. 877, on the ground of a variance between the prospectus and the charter of the company.

There were a number of exceptions taken to the rulings of the court during the progress of the trial, to review which seriatim would extend this opinion to a great length. It is enough to say in this connection that the case was submitted to the jury in substantial conformity with the views expressed in this opinion, and that the judgment must be affirmed.

ZAHN et al. v. McMILLIN et al.

(36 Atl. 188, 179 Pa. 146.)

Supreme Court of Pennsylvania. Jan. 4, 1897.

Appeal from court of common pleas, Lawrence county; William D. Wallace and S. H. Miller, Judges.

Action by William A. Zahn and others against E. A. McMillin and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

S. W. Dana, S. D. Long, A. Leo. Weil, and C. M. Thorp, for appellants. J. Norman Martin, D. B. Kurtz, and L. T. Kurtz, for appellees.

DEAN, J. On April 22, 1891, through negotiations conducted by E. A. McMillin, he and William Smith took by assignment from Thomas A. Book 19 oil and gas leases in Lawrence county. The written assignment was to Smith, he to hold the same in trust as follows: One-eleventh of three-fourths for McMillin, and ten-elevenths of three-fourths for such persons as should contribute towards the common enterprise and the cost of drilling two wells for the development of the common property for oil. Smith resided in Pittsburg, and McMillin in Newcastle; the last named, not far from the territory to be developed. It was alleged by plaintiffs that McMillin got his brother, J. M. McMillin, of Newcastle, to join in the project. Smith induced a number of his friends in Pittsburg to join as contributors, they to share in the profits in proportion to their contributions. From the money, two wells were drilled, which developed as good gas producers, but no oil was struck. At the time he made the assignment to Smith, Book had reserved one-fourth the oil or gas to be developed, which was afterwards purchased by E. A. McMillin, plaintiffs alleged, for himself and brother. As to the three-fourths in name of Smith, he made a written declaration that he held the same in trust for himself, the McMillins, and the other contributors. The production of the wells indicated that the property was valuable for gas purposes, and efforts were made by the parties to sell it at a profit. A committee, of which E. A. McMillin was one, was appointed to bring the property to notice of purchasers and conduct negotiations for a sale. Meetings were held in Pittsburg; two of them, at least, attended by both the McMillins, and others by E. A. McMillin alone. In January, 1893, both the brothers opened negotiations with O. C. Redick for the purpose of selling the property to him. They discovered from him, in their conversations, that the salt water which was obstructing production in one of the wells could be shut off at a small expense, and this would add largely to the value of the property. Full examination of the property by Redick resulted in an offer from him to take the gas, pipe it at his own expense to Newcastle, sell it, and pay to the owners one-half the gross proceeds of sales. Immediately after securing this offer, E. A. McMillin, on January 17, 1893, wrote to W. A. Zahn, one of his co-owners and one of these plaintiffs, at Pittsburg, asking him if he could get the consent of the contributors to take one-fourth the net earnings, and pay one-fourth the cost of drilling new wells. In this letter he concealed from his co-owner, Zahn, Redick's offer of one-half the gross proceeds of sales. Zahn replied that he thought he could get such consent. E. A. McMillin then went to Pittsburg with a contract drawn, naming the Pittsburg parties as the assignors, and the two McMillins as the assignees. In this agreement it was set forth that all the parties were associated together as owners of the property, and it was stipulated that the McMillins were to take the gas, pipe it to Newcastle, and pay one-fourth the net proceeds to all the owners, including themselves; they to retain three-fourths. The Pittsburg parties were urged to immediately execute the contract, but, as one or more of them desired to consult counsel, its execution was deferred. They finally prepared another draft of a contract, embodying substantially the same terms, with the names of the purchasers left blank. This was executed January 31, 1893. As to this contract, it is not disputed that J. M. McMillin solicited plaintiffs to affix their signatures. No disclosure of the Redick offer was made to the Pittsburg parties when they signed. After signature, the McMillins filled in the blank with their names as purchasers, and the same day contracted with Redick according to the terms of his proposition already noticed. He piped the gas to Newcastle, and paid to the McMillins one-half the gross proceeds of sales. About a year afterwards plaintiffs discovered the facts, and filed this bill against both the McMillins for an account; averring them to be joint owners or tenants in common with them of the leaseholds, and that a fraud had been practiced upon them in obtaining the contract of 31st January, 1893. The defendants made answer, denying all the material averments of plaintiffs' bill. J. M. McMillin especially denied having any interest in common with plaintiffs and his brother prior to the execution of the contract of 31st January, 1893. The court below, after full hearing, dismissed the bill, and from that decree we have this appeal by plaintiffs. The principal errors alleged are the finding of fact that J. M. McMillin was not interested in the original project, and the conclusion of the court that he was not liable to account, on the facts, even if his interest commenced at the date of the second purchase.

The court does not seem to question that on the evidence the bill could have been maintained if filed against E. A. McMillin alone, but being against the brothers jointly, and not sustained as to J. M. McMillin, it must be dismissed. The learned court below, in its opinion, speaks as follows: "There are two main questions of fact upon which plaintiffs' claim for relief must ultimately rest: First, that J. M. McMillin had an interest in the leases mentioned in plaintiffs' bill, and was a tenant in common with plaintiffs in said leases on January 31, 1893; second, fraud, actual or constructive, on the part of the defendants in procuring from plaintiffs the contract Exhibit A. If either of these grounds fall, the case must fall. * * * An examination of the whole evidence fails to show the relationship of tenant in common between the plaintiffs and J. M. McMillin. We would hesitate to find such a relationship from the evidence of the plaintiffs, if it was not contradicted. Both J. M. McMillin and E. A. McMillin, however, positively deny such relationship in their answer, and also upon the stand as witnesses, and their cross-examination by plaintiffs' counsel does not in the least weaken their evidence. The plaintiffs also contend that, even if J. M. McMillin was not a co-tenant, he occupied such a fiduciary relation towards them which required him to disclose the offer which Redick had made prior to January 31, 1893, and which offer was concluded in the contract of February 1, 1893. They urge that he had so conducted himself as to lead the plaintiffs to believe he was acting with them and for them. They also urge that he misrepresented the facts, by stating that the terms of the contract he was obtaining from them were the best that could be obtained for the property. We have already found that J. M. McMillin was not a co-tenant with the plaintiffs and E. A. McMillin. We find nothing in the evidence which should have induced the plaintiffs to believe that he was a co-tenant, or that he was acting in any fiduciary capacity for them or with them. It is true that he was present at two meetings of the parties in Pittsburg, but there was no evidence to show that he took any part in the proceedings, or acted other than as a spectator. The value of the property was purely speculative, and the plaintiffs had the same opportunity to form an opinion as to its prospective value as J. M. McMillin. It is true, Redick had proposed to him to lease the premises on more favorable terms than what the plaintiffs were to get by their contract, but there was no such fiduciary relation subsisting between J. M. McMillin and them as required him to disclose Redick's offer."

Whether a tenant in common, or merely a partner in a project for gain, E. A. McMillin, on the undisputed facts, by reason of his confidential relation with his co-contributors to the common enterprise, perpetrated upon them a palpable fraud,—not a constructive fraud merely, but an actual fraud. If the brother aided and abetted him in consummating this fraud, that they two might reap the fruits of it, and they have succeeded, they are jointly bound to make restitution. On sufficient evidence, the court below has found that J. M. McMillin had no interest in the purchase from Book, April 22, 1891. There was much evidence to the contrary, but the error is not so clearly manifest in the finding as to move us to disturb it. Therefore we assume as a fact that his property interest dated from the contract of 31st January, 1893. It is not denied—nor could it be, in the face of the evidence—that by that contract J. M. shares in the fruits of the fraud to which E. A. was an active party, and for which he is answerable in an account. But did J. M., by his declarations and conduct, aid his brother in procuring the fraudulent contract, so as to render him accountable in equity to these plaintiffs? The learned court below thinks not, because he was not one of the contributors to the first enterprise, and therefore must be treated as a stranger dealing at arm's length with the co-partners or co-tenants of his brother. This is a mistake, for that one fact warrants no such conclusion. If he had been a member of the first association, and had untruthfully represented a material fact to his associates, to induce them to part with their interests, that would have been conclusive against him, because of the legal presumption of a confidential relation; but, if there was not presumptively a confidential relation, still was there one in fact, or such relation as warranted them in relying on the truthfulness of his statements? The principle controlling such cases, and deducible from all the authorities, is well stated by Perry on Trusts (volume 1, p. 179): "There are cases where a party must not be silent upon a material fact within his knowledge, although he stands in no relation of trust and confidence. * * * If a party knows that another is relying upon his judgment and knowledge in contracting with him, although no confidential relation exists, and he does not state material facts within his knowledge, the contract will be avoided; for knowingly to permit another to act as though the action was confidential, and yet not state material facts, is fraudulent. It is said that a party in such circumstances is bound to destroy the confidence reposed in him, or to state all the facts that such confidence demands."

The court's twelfth finding of fact is that, at the time the contract was entered into, J. M. McMillin represented to the Pittsburg parties that the terms, one-fourth the net proceeds of the oil, embodied in the contract he was soliciting them to sign, were the best that could be got. This representation was willfully false. He admits that Redick had made an offer of double that price, which had been accepted by him and his brother, on which a contract had been framed, which he had in his pocket, ready to be signed as soon as the Pittsburg parties signed the contract for one-fourth. In whose interest was he acting when this falsehood was uttered? It is argued, his own expectant interest in the contract with the Pittsburg parties. But he was also dealing as the agent of his brother. They two were the purchasers, parties of the second part to the contract which inured to the benefit of both. He was there to conduct the negotiations and close the contract in pursuance of his brother's letter to Zahn of 10 days previous, which did not hint at Redick's offer. There can be no severance of the falsehood by imputing one half of it to E. A., who held a legal, confidential relation, and the other half to J. M., who, if representing himself alone, did not hold the same relation. By taking his brother's place and representing him, he spoke for both, and put himself in a position where the brother's co-tenants were justified in relying on this false statement of a most material fact. This gave him a vantage ground which naturally invited confidence in his statements, and he must be held to the same rule of conduct as E. A. would have been held to had he, on the same representation, personally solicited the assent of his co-partners to a sale at half price. "It is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer; but when he is gone his way he boasteth himself." This is the attitude of a stranger towards the seller whose wares he depreciates, and the one the court below finds J. M. to have held. It is not the one the facts put him in. To hold J. M. answerable, it is not essential that another case exactly like this on the facts should have been decided fraudulent. This, clearly, is within the scope of established principles, where in equity a party dare not falsely represent a material fact. "Courts have never laid down as a general proposition what [facts] shall constitute fraud, or any rule beyond which they will not go, lest other means of avoiding equity will be found" (2 Pars. Cont. 769), and certainly have never held that, where a party aiding in a fraud has not theretofore acquired a fractional interest in the property which is the subject of the fraudulent bargain, he cannot be called to an accounting. But, if he had no direct interest of his own, the misrepresentation went still further than as a representative of his brother, for the very agreement he had asked them to sign says: "Whereas, the said parties of the first part and of the second part are associated together as owners of leases for oil and gas purposes on one thousand acres of land in Shenango and Slippery Rock township, Lawrence county, * * * the said first parties owning one hundred and twenty shares and the said second parties owning fifty-six shares; and whereas, two wells have been drilled at the joint expense of all of said owners; * * * and whereas, all of said owners are desirous of having said gas used * * * so as to realize a profit. * * * True, this was not the agreement signed three days thereafter, but it was one E. A. McMillin had, acting for both, asked them to sign. E. A. was then acting for J. M. in efforts to secure a contract in which both concurred, and which was framed with a view to accepting the Redick proposition, and was therefore a false representation by both. It was not signed only because the Pittsburg parties desired their own counsel to frame it.

The one adopted by the two brothers, and first exhibited to the Pittsburg parties, contained a deliberate declaration in writing that J. M. McMillin was then a co-partner. This was a direct invitation to the co-partners to deal with them in securing the best price. The conduct of J. M. for months before, and during all the negotiations, seems to us, on this printed testimony, reconcilable only with the theory that he was interested in the leases at the date of the contract with the Pittsburg parties. Assuming, however, that, when he said on the witness stand he was not interested, he told the truth, he did not tell the truth to the confidants and partners of his brother when he contracted for himself and his brother at half price for their interests. The law cannot undertake to draw a line between his misrepresentation as agent for E. A. and his misrepresentation in his own interest as a stranger to the original association. And if his declarations and conduct misled, as they plainly did, the Pittsburg parties, and induced them to believe him interested with them in a common enterprise, he is estopped now from denying the truth of the representations. On both grounds the bill is sustained as against him, and both should account to plaintiffs as prayed for in the bill. As to the remark of the court that when the contract was made the value of the property was purely speculative, and all parties had the same opportunity for forming an opinion, it is certainly an error. The court must have overlooked the fact that J. M. McMillin had in his pocket, at the very time he was soliciting the signatures of the plaintiffs, the draft of the proposed agreement with Redick, which was to be signed as soon as the Pittsburg parties had executed their contract, and which was afterwards, on the same day, actually executed by Redick. As concerned the McMillins, there was nothing speculative in their estimate of value. They knew exactly the worth of the property, by knowing what they were to get for it. Their profit depended only on how low they could beat down the price by methods which some dealers call only shrewd, but which the law pronounces fraudulent, and holds the parties to a strict accountability.

It is ordered that the decree of the common pleas be reversed and plaintiffs' bill be reinstated, and further: (1) That the said E. A. McMillin and J. M. McMillin were trustees ex maleficio for all the owners of said leaseholds in making said contract with Oliver C. Redick, and that said contract, and all the rights of the first parties thereunder, are the property of all the present owners of said leaseholds, to whom, through their treasurer, all payments under the same should be made. (2) That the said E. A. McMillin and J. M. McMillin account to the orators for, and pay over to the said treasurer, all moneys received by them under said contract with Oliver C. Redick. (3) That an injunction issue, restraining the said E. A. and J. M. Mc-

Millin from selling, assigning, incumbering, or in any manner disposing of said last-mentioned contract. (4) That an injunction issue, restraining the Big Meadow Gas Company

| |
|--|
| from paying any further sum or sums of money to the said E. A. and J. M. McMillin under said last-mentioned contract. It is further ordered that defendants pay the costs. |
|--|

PHILLIPS v. PULLEN.

(16 Atl. 9, 45 N. J. Eq. 5.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Nov. 13, 1888.

On order to show cause why an injunction shall not issue to restrain the defendant from taking proceedings to enforce a judgment at law.

Bill for injunction by George E. Phillips against Ralph L. Pullen to restrain proceedings to enforce a judgment.

Wm. Y. Johnston and John P. Stockton, Atty. Gen., for complainant. Geo. O. Vanderbilt, C. H. Beasley, and W. D. Holt, for defendant.

McGILL, Ch. The judgment in question was recovered in a suit upon an agreement by the complainant to pay $7,500 in settlement of an action that had been commenced against him by the defendant for damages for debauching the defendant's wife, enticing her away, and harboring her. Upon a writ of error to Mercer circuit court, where the cause in which the judgment was recovered was tried, the court of errors and appeals affirmed the judgment of the court below, and thereby confirmed the decision of many of the questions sought to be again raised by the bill in this case. That decision determined that the complainant's attorney had authority to make the agreement sued upon; that the agreement did not lack consideration; that the consideration of the agreement was not executory; that there was no abandonment or rescission of the agreement by the defendant, Pullen; and that proof of the fraud, which is here alleged, was admissible in defense in that suit, but that the evidence of it there offered and admitted, was inadequate to establish it. Phillips v. Pullen, 50 N. J. Law, 439, 14 Atl. 222. All those matters must now be considered as settled between the parties to this suit. The doctrine is well settled that this court will not, on the application of the defendant in a judgment at law, who has had a fair opportunity to be heard upon a defense, over which the court pronouncing the judgment had full jurisdiction, enjoin the enforcement of the judgment simply on the ground that it is unjust. A court of equity limits its interference with the enforcement of a judgment at law to cases where that appears which clearly shows it to be against conscience to execute the judgment, and of which the injured party could not have availed himself in the court of law; or of which he might have availed himself at law, but was prevented by fraud or accident, unmixed with any fault or negligence in himself or his agents. Insurance Co. v. Hodgson, 7 Cranch, 332; Hendrickson v. Hinckley, 17 How. 443; Powers' Ex'rs v. Butler's Adm'r, 4 N. J. Eq. 465; Vaughn v. Johnson, 9 N. J. Eq. 173; Moore v. Gamble, Id. 246; Reeves v. Cooper, 12 N. J. Eq. 223; Holmes v. Steele, 28 N. J. Eq. 173; Bank v. Manufacturing Co., 33 N. J. Eq. 486, 35 N. J. Eq. 344; Simpson v. Hart, 1 Johns. Ch. 91; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1361, and note. It is insisted for the complainant that the contract, upon which the judgment in question is based, was so grossly unconscionable that this court will here interfere, and stay the enforcement of the judgment. The action of the court must depend upon the questions whether the defendant is too late in his application, whether the gross unconscionableness of the contract is a distinct principle of equity which could not be urged in defense of the suit at law, and whether in fact the contract was grossly unconscionable. I will consider these questions in the order in which I have stated them.

The complainant makes his application by supplemental bill, in which he alleges that by his original bill he sought to avoid the agreement for fraud, and because it was grossly unconscionable; and that he was denied an injunction to restrain the suit at law, because the grounds upon which the equity of his bill rested were good defenses to the action, at law. The defendant, by his answer to the supplemental bill, claims that the decision of the chancellor (Runyon) was based upon the defendant's denial of the facts upon which the equity of the complainant's bill was founded. No reasons for the chancellor's decision were given. It appears to me to be better that I shall assume that the merits of the last two questions under consideration were not passed upon, and that the original application for injunction affords an excuse for the apparent laches of the complainant in asking the aid of this court. It is established that for mere inadequacy of consideration, unconnected with fraud, a court of equity will not set aside a contract. Willis v. Jernegan, 2 Atk. 251; Griffith v. Spratley, 1 Cox, 383; Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 266; Low v. Barchard, 8 Ves. 133; Osgood v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. 1; Crane v. Conklin, 1 N. J. Eq. 346; Wintermute's Ex'rs v. Snyder's Ex'rs, 3 N. J. Eq. 489; Weber v. Weitling, 18 N. J. Eq. 441; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 251; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 925. The cases of expectant heirs or reversioners, who have bound themselves in unconscionable bargains with respect to their expectancies, have been regarded in many cases as an exception to this rule. Berny v. Pitt, 2 Vern. 14; Nott v. Hill, Id. 27; Wiseman v. Beake, Id. 121; Twisleton v. Griffith, 1 P. Wms. 310; Curwyn v. Milner, note c, 3 P. Wms. 292; Barnardiston v. Lingood, 2 Atk. 133; Gwynne v. Heaton, 1 Brown, Ch. 9; Coles v. Trecothick, 9 Ves. 246; Evans v. Peacock, 16 Ves. 512. Where, however, such inadequacy of price is so gross that it shocks the conscience, courts of equity will interfere, not upon distinct principle, but upon the ground that such inadequacy amounts to conclusive evidence of fraud. In Osgood v. Franklin, 2 Johns. Ch. 18, Chancellor Kent said: "The doctrine is settled that in setting aside contracts on account of inadequate consideration, the ground is fraud arising from gross inequality." In Copis v. Middleton, 2 Madd. 410, the vice-chancellor said: "Mere inadequacy of price, to invalidate a contract, must, per se, be so excessive as to be demonstrative of fraud." In Wintermute's Ex'rs v. Snyder's Ex'rs, 3 N. J. Eq. 489, 496, Chancellor Vroom said: "Still there may be such unconscionableness, such palpable and excessive inequality in a bargain, as to induce equitable interference. But in all such cases the court goes on the ground of fraud, being satisfied that gross imposition or undue influence must have been practiced. If the inadequacy be such as to shock conscience, it will amount to evidence of fraud, and will be so considered." In Gifford v. Thorn, 9 N. J. Eq. 702, 740, in the court of errors and appeals, Justice Potts uses this language: "Undoubtedly, if this transaction is to be considered as a matter of bargain and sale, here is a gross inadequacy of consideration; such an inadequacy as raises a violent presumption of fraud, deception, ignorance or imbecility." In Weber v. Weitling, 18 N. J. Eq. 441, Chancellor Zabriskie said: "For mere inadequacy of consideration equity does not set aside a deed, unless accompanied by fraud, or unless the inadequacy is so gross as to imply fraud." Judge Story, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (volume 1, p. 256,) after saying that inadequacy of consideration is not of itself a distinct principle of relief in equity, adds: "Still, however, there may be such an unconscionableness or inadequacy in a bargain as to demonstrate some gross imposition or some undue influence, and in such cases courts of equity ought to interfere upon the satisfactory ground of fraud. But then such unconscionableness, or such inadequacy, should be made out as would (to use an expressive phrase) shock the conscience, and amount in itself to conclusive and decisive evidence of fraud." Professor Pomeroy, in his work on Equity Jurisprudence (section 927) says: "Although the actual cases in which a contract or conveyance has been canceled on account of gross inadequacy merely, without other equitable incidents, are very few; yet the doctrine is settled by a consensus of decisions and dicta, that, even in the absence of all other circumstances, when the inadequacy of the price is so gross that it shocks the conscience, and furnishes satisfactory and decisive evidence of fraud, it will be a sufficient ground for canceling a conveyance or contract, whether executed or executory. Even then fraud, and not inadequacy of price, is the true and only cause for the interposition of equity, and the granting of relief."

At this point we are again confronted with the adjudication already had between the parties to this cause. Equity can interfere only upon the ground of fraud; and the question of fraud in the agreement, as I have stated, has been heard by a court having full jurisdiction over that question, and decided. Justice Magie, who wrote the opinion of the court of errors and appeals in the case there between the parties to this suit, disposed of the suggestion that the price Phillips agreed to pay is evidence of fraud, in the concluding sentences of that opinion, as follows: "In an action on an undertaking to pay a specific sum, the rule for measuring damages is compensation, which can only be afforded by a verdict for that sum, with interest. No reason why this case should be taken out of that rule is suggested, but that the agreement was unreasonable or unconscionable. But, if it might have been avoided in equity upon that ground, nothing short of fraud will affect it at law: and fraud would not be ground for reducing damages, but for defeating recovery. There is nothing in the stipulated sum to justify an inference of fraud. The original suit sought to recover damages incapable of accurate determination. Had it proceeded to trial, the quantum of damages must have been determined by a jury upon the circumstances. Where the parties, knowing the circumstances, liquidated the damages by an agreement not brought about by deceit or imposition, it cannot be said that such damages are unconscionable." If gross unconscionableness of a bargain were a distinct principle upon which equity would relieve, it would be impossible for me to say that the bargain, in this instance, was of that character. Lord Thurlow, in Gwynne v. Heaton, 1 Brown, Ch. 8, said of such bargains: "There must be an inequality so strong, gross, and manifest that it must be impossible to state it to a man of common sense, without producing an exclamation at the inequality of it." If there is nothing in the sum agreed to be paid that will justify an inference of fraud in the law courts, it can hardly be that there is so much in it here as to shock the conscience of this court. The reasoning of Justice Magie, in which I concurred in the court of errors and appeals, satisfies me that there is nothing in the stipulated sum to manifest gross inequality. Nor is there anything in the condition of the parties to make such gross inequality apparent. Both are farmers. Pullen has property valued at $1,000 or $1,500, and Phillips admits that he is worth $12,000, while the answer puts his estate at $40,000. I will discharge the order to show cause, with costs.

RAKESTRAW v. LANIER.

(30 S. E. 735, 104 Ga. 188.)

Supreme Court of Georgia. April 13, 1898.

Error from superior court, Screven county; R. L. Gamble, Judge.

Action by A. B. Lanier against Chauncey Rakestraw. Decree for plaintiff. Defendant brings error. Reversed.

The following is the official report:

On August 10, 1895, Lanier and Rakestraw, physicians residing in the town of Oliver, formed a partnership for the practice of medicine, surgery, and obstetrics. The articles of co-partnership contained, among other stipulations, the following: "In consideration of the advantages and benefits that will flow to said Rakestraw by reason of the formation of said firm and partnership business, he hereby agrees that in the event said firm shall at any time hereafter be dissolved, that he will not locate or engage in the practice of medicine, surgery, or obstetrics at said town of Oliver, or at any place within fifteen miles radius from the drug store of said Lanier, unless he shall first have obtained the written consent of said Lanier. And, in the event the said Rakestraw shall violate the terms of this article, the said Lanier shall be entitled to sue and recover, as his damages, the sum of one thousand dollars annually from said Rakestraw so long as he shall violate the terms of this article; said sum of $1,000 being agreed now between the parties hereto as damages, and not as a penalty. This partnership shall continue for the space and term of twelve months from the date when signed by the parties hereto, unless sooner dissolved. This partnership may be dissolved by either member giving to the other, in writing, a notice of his intention to withdraw from the partnership; and, at the expiration of thirty days from the service of such notice by either member on the other, said firm shall be dissolved." On June 3, 1896, Lanier wrote to Rakestraw as follows: "Under the provisions of our contract, a thirty-days notice is required to dissolve the same; and you are hereby notified that, on the third day of July next, you may consider the contract between us in the practice of medicine ended. This will enable you to make all collections of your one-third interest in all accounts now on our books, or what may become due within thirty days, at which time I shall expect a partner in the practice here. If you desire, you can fully withdraw from all office practice and drug-store duties from date. I shall expect to abide by the contract in the letter and in the spirit in which it was written." The partnership was accordingly dissolved. After the dissolution, Rakestraw continued to reside in the town of Oliver, and to practice medicine, surgery, and obstetrics therein, and within the radius of 15 miles referred to in the contract. On September 18, 1897, Lanier wrote to Rakestraw, at Oliver, as follows: "Under our contract, you are now due me $1,000, which you will pay at once, or discontinue practice in this place." Rakestraw refused to comply with this demand; and on October 26, 1897, Lanier brought to the superior court his petition, setting out the foregoing facts, and alleging that Rakestraw was still engaged in the practice of medicine, surgery, and obstetrics in the locality mentioned, contrary to his contract, in violation of equity and good conscience, and in fraud and damage of petitioner; that by reason of this breach of the contract, and under the express terms thereof, defendant became indebted to him in the sum of $1,000 at the expiration of the year from the date of the dissolution, and is still so indebted; that defendant is hopelessly insolvent; that petitioner has no adequate remedy at law; and that the injury complained of is continuing in its nature, and will necessitate a suit at the expiration of each year, and by reason of the bad faith of the defendant, and the nature of petitioner's business, his age, and his circumstances, the injury is irreparable in damages. Waiving discovery, he prayed a judgment against defendant for $1,000, a perpetual injunction, and, until the final hearing, a temporary injunction, restraining the defendant from engaging in the practice of medicine, surgery, or obstetrics at the town of Oliver, or any place within a radius of fifteen miles from the drug store of petitioner, unless he shall have first obtained the written consent of petitioner. The defendant demurred and answered, and, at the hearing of the application for temporary injunction, urged that the petition set forth no ground for injunction or other relief against him; that the stipulation in the contract upon which the petition was based is against public policy and illegal, and is not valid or enforceable against the defendant; that it is not a reasonable or proper stipulation, within the meaning of the requirements of the law, and is unjust, unfair, and against good conscience; that it is without sufficient consideration to support it, and is lacking in mutuality, and does not put the plaintiff under such obligation as would make the agreement of the defendant valid and binding; and, further, that, under the facts, the plaintiff was not entitled to the injunction or other relief. Defendant denied that he had acted in bad faith, or was inflicting any legal injury upon the plaintiff. He denied that he was hopelessly insolvent, but admitted that his assets, which consisted of personal property only, would not, if sold at public outcry, net more than enough to pay what he owed. He alleged: Before signing the agreement, plaintiff called his attention to the stipulation in question, and said that it had been put in by the lawyer as a matter of form, and that he (plaintiff) doubted its legality, and gave defendant to understand that he need not apprehend its enforcement. Before the agreement was entered into, certain residents of the town of Oliver had advertised in the newspaper that a physician was needed in the town, and plaintiff, understanding that defendant might locate in Oliver, induced him to sign the contract, with the purpose of thereby getting rid of defendant's competition. This purpose was fraudulent, and vitiated the contract, if otherwise legal. During the continuance of the partnership, and before any notice of dissolution was given, plaintiff so conducted himself with reference to the defendant as to deprive him of the possibility of gaining any advantage from the association, and made the partnership the means of injuring and damaging defendant, and of efforts to blast his good name and prospects. Plaintiff, before the notice, circulated reports which were untrue and unfounded, reflecting grossly upon the character and life of defendant, and which are set out in the answer. Plaintiff did not comply with his obligations under the contract. He declined upon different occasions to practice with defendant, declined to recognize notes addressed to the firm in the firm name, and announced that he would not notice any request for a visit that was not addressed to him personally. While the co-partnership continued, plaintiff announced that he intended to ruin defendant, and would drive him out of the country. As to these allegations the evidence at the hearing was conflicting. The court, after hearing the evidence, ordered that a temporary injunction as prayed for be granted, unless a bond with security, conditioned to pay the eventual condemnation money, should be given by the defendant within 45 days from the date of the order. Defendant excepted.

Denmark, Adams & Freeman, for plaintiff in error. Giquilliat & Stubbs and Oliver & Overstreet, for defendant in error.

LITTLE, J. Counsel for plaintiff in error, both by his argument and brief, rests his case on the proposition that the petition on which the judge below granted an injunction in default of bond sets forth no cause for relief, because the contract sought to be enforced is not a legal and binding instrument. Hence this court is called upon to determine the question whether the contract which is set out in the foregoing report is void, as contrary to public policy, or whether the same is valid, and therefore to be enforced. This question is to be settled by the rules of law governing contracts made in restraint of trade, and, in seeking to make application of such rules, we find ourselves furnished with precedents which seem to be authority for all phases of the question, and rulings distressingly in conflict. The plaintiff in error submits that the terms of the contract render it invalid, because it is harsh and unreasonable; it is against public policy; it is not a reasonable or proper contract, within the meaning or the requirements of the law; that it is without consideration to support it. If either one of these contentions is established, then, as we understand the law applicable to contracts of this character, the courts must refuse to enforce the contract relied upon, because agreements which are unlawful, without regard to the manner of execution, never in law become contracts, although frequently denominated and dealt with under the name of illegal contracts. We cannot, within reasonable limits, undertake to reconcile conflicting opinions in treating of contracts in restraint of trade, nor cite the authorities which bear upon the different constituent elements which render such contracts valid, or the want of which make them void, for the reason that the first are irreconcilable, and the latter inharmonious. It must suffice that we shall in this case present the rules which we consider established by the most satisfactorily reasoned cases of other jurisdictions, and the adjudications of our own court.

Mr. Clark, in his work on Contracts, says, on authority, that at one time in England it was considered that a contract was contrary to public policy if it placed any restraint at all on a man's right to exercise his trade or calling, but that, gradually, exceptions were recognized, until at last the court, in a leading case (Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181), established the rule that a contract in restraint of trade, upon consideration, which shows it was reasonable for the parties to enter into it, is good; "that whenever a consideration appears to make it a proper and useful contract, and such as cannot be set aside without injury to a fair contractor, it ought to be maintained," etc. By reference to that case, we find the conclusion of the court to be that "in all restraints of trade, where nothing more appears, the law presumes them bad; but, if the circumstances are set forth, that presumption is excluded, and the court is to judge of those circumstances, and determine accordingly, and if, upon them, it appears to be a just and honest contract, it ought to be maintained." Some question has arisen as to the proper construction of our Code, which declares that "contracts in general in restraint of trade are void" (Civ. Code, § 3668), and as to whether the proper interpretation of these words would have the effect to declare that contracts in general restraint of trade are void, or that contracts generally in restraint of trade are void. Speaking for myself, I interpret the language to mean that contracts generally in restraint of trade are void. The words of this section were not codified from any act of the general assembly, but the same language appeared in our first Code (1863), and ran without change through successive editions and revisions up to and including the Civil Code of 1896, from which I infer that, if the words were not intended to be accepted as written, subsequent codifiers, if not subsequent legislatures, would, by change or amendment, more clearly have expressed a different meaning. But I take it that the words "contracts in general in restraint of trade are void" (meaning that, generally, contracts in restraint of trade are void) were incorporated into the codification of laws in force in this state as expressing a recognized legal principle sanctioned by the highest authority. In Ross v. Sadgbeer, 21 Wend. 168, Mr. Justice Bronson says: "The law starts out with the presumption that a contract in restraint of trade is void." The same rule is stated in Pol. Cont. side page 311; is recognized in the leading case from 1 P. Wms., supra; and the principle laid down in Clark, Cont. p. 447. Besides, such a construction seems to be in harmony with the policy of the law in this state. To one class of persons at least—corporations—contracts of this character are forbidden when they tend to lessen competition in their respective business (Const. 1877; Civ. Code, § 5800); and various acts of the legislature seem to indicate such a policy to exist. However this may be, it is certain that contracts in unreasonable restraint of trade are contrary to public policy, and void, because they tend to injure the parties making them; diminish their means of procuring livelihoods and a competency for their families; tempt improvident persons, for the sake of present gain, to deprive themselves of the power to make future acquisitions, and expose them to imposition and oppression; tend to deprive the public of the services of men in the employments and capacities in which they may be most useful to the community as well as to themselves; discourage industry and enterprise, and diminish the products of ingenuity and skill; prevent competition, and enhance prices, and expose the public to all the evils of monopoly. Clark, Cont. p. 446. Against evils like these, wise laws protect individuals and the public by declaring all such contracts void. Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. (Mass.) 51. Since the early legislative history both of England and this country, statutes have been of force looking to the prevention of monopoly, and the interdiction of restraints upon the exercise of business, trades, or professions; and in no instance has a contract which imposed an unreasonable restraint upon the same, in the eye of the judiciary, been upheld; and the question of the reasonableness of the restriction is one of law for the court. 1 Whart. Cont. § 433; Bish. Cont. § 517; Benj. Sales, § 527; 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 934; Mallan v. May, 11 Mees. & W. 653; Wiley v. Baumgardner, 97 Ind. 66. In determining whether such restriction is reasonable, the court will look alone to the time when the contract was entered into. Rannie v. Irvine, 7 Man. & G. 969; Cook v. Johnson, 47 Conn. 175. It is, however, satisfactorily established that, as a matter of law, such a contract is to be upheld if the restraint imposed is not unreasonable, is founded on a valuable consideration, and is reasonably necessary to protect the interest of the party in whose favor it is imposed, and does not unduly prejudice the interests of the public. Clark, Cont. p. 446. In some jurisdictions it is held that a contract in restraint of trade which is unlimited as to space is void on its face, and will not be enforced. Id. p. 450, and authorities cited. On the other hand, it has been held that a contract restraining the exercise of a trade or business throughout the kingdom or state may be reasonable, and therefore valid. Rousillon v. Rousillon, 14 Ch. Div. 351; Beal v. Chase, 31 Mich. 490; Match Co. v. Roeber, 35 Hun, 421. In determining, however, whether such a contract is reasonable, the court will consider the nature and extent of the trade or business, the situation of the parties, and all the other circumstances; and even if the presumption to which we have before referred does not exist against the validity of such contracts, so as to require persons seeking to enforce them to show that they were made upon a sufficient consideration, and that the restrictions they impose are reasonable (Angier v. Webber, 92 Am. Dec., note on page 753), yet, in law, all such contracts are void, if considered only in the abstract, and without reference to the situation or objects of the parties, or other circumstances under or with reference to which they were made; and this, though the pecuniary consideration paid may have been sufficient to support the contract in any other aspect, or any ordinary contract for a legal purpose, or even though it may be sufficient in value to compensate the restraint imposed. But if, considered with reference to the situation, business, and objects of the parties, and in the light of all the surrounding circumstances with reference to which the contract was made, the restraint contracted for appears to have been for a just and honest purpose, for the protection of the legitimate interests of the party in whose favor it is imposed, reasonable as between them, and not specially injurious to the public, the restraint will be held valid. The true test, therefore, of the validity of such a contract, is whether it is supported by a sufficient consideration, and whether the restraint is reasonable.

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.—20

The plaintiff in error contends that the contract under review is without sufficient consideration to support it, and that for this reason it is void. That there must be an actual valuable consideration to support such a contract, and such consideration should be shown on the face of the declaration or complaint, although the contract be under seal, are propositions well established. Bish. Cont. § 126; Metc. Cont. p. 233; 1 Whart. Cont. § 434; Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181; Davis v. Mason, 5 Term R. 118; Hutton v. Parker, 7 Dowl. 739; Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223; Weller v. Hersee, 10 Hun, 431. That the consideration must thus be shown is generally said to be the only exception to the rule that a contract under seal imports a consideration which the party will not be permitted to deny. Metc. Cont. § 233. And in earlier times it was held that the consideration must be adequate. Mitchel v. Reynolds, supra; Gale v. Reed, 8 East, 80; Young v. Timmins, 1 Tyrw. 226. The courts, however, long since departed from this doctrine; and it may now be taken as settled that, if there is a legal consideration, it will not be inquired whether or not it is adequate, or, in other words, equal in value to the restraint agreed upon. See authorities cited in note to case of Angier v. Webber, 92 Am. Dec. 754. As was said by Tindal, C. J., in the case of Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Adol. & E. 438: "It is enough that there is actually a consideration for the bargain, and that such consideration is a legal consideration, and of some value." Accordingly, in the case of Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223, one dollar was held to be a sufficient consideration for a covenant not to run a stagecoach between given points, in opposition to the plaintiff. The consideration upon which the defendant entered into the contract under review as expressed was the advantages and benefits that would flow to him by reason of the "formation of said firm and partnership business." This, under the authorities cited, is a sufficient legal consideration, in so far as such contracts are dependent on a consideration to be sustained. The exact value of the consideration, the court ought not, and, in the nature of things, cannot, undertake to measure. There is nothing in the record of the case which shows such gross inadequacy of consideration as to shock the conscience, and amount in itself to evidence of fraud. See Metc. Cont. p. 271.

The remaining objections urged against the validity of the contract may all be passed upon in considering the other question upon which the validity of the contract depends, namely, is the restraint which it imposes reasonable? While public policy forbids any agreement which unreasonably restrains a person from exercising his trade or business, it is equally true that public policy also requires that the freedom of persons to enter into contracts shall not be lightly interfered with. Clark, Cont. p. 447. The contract under consideration imposed a restraint unlimited as to time, but limited as to space. We are aware that it has been repeatedly held that, where the restraint is otherwise reasonable, the circumstances that it is indefinite as to time will not affect its validity (1 Whart. Cont. § 432; Metc. Cont. p. 232; Benj. Sales, § 525; Hitchcock v. Coker, 6 Adol. & E. 438; Pemberton v. Vaughan, 10 Q. B. 87; Catt v. Tourle, 4 Ch. App. 654; Cook v. Johnson, 47 Conn. 175; Bowser v. Bliss, 7 Blackf. 344); and that our court, in more than one case, which will be presently referred to, held the same doctrine. Nevertheless, if the test of the validity of the contract is, as we have shown it to be, that it must be founded on a valuable consideration, and that the restraint imposed must be reasonable, and such as is reasonably necessary to protect the interest of the party in whose favor it is imposed, and at the same time not unduly prejudice the interest of the public, it seems to us that the question of time in the restriction imposed cannot be arbitrarily said to have no effect on the validity of a contract which, being reasonable in all other respects except in point of time, is, from the circumstances, unreasonable and oppressive as to the latter. See Mandeville v. Harman (N. J. Ch.) 7 Atl. 37; Keeler v. Taylor, 53 Pa. St. 469. In the case of Hitchcock v. Coker, supra, Lord Denman, construing a contract which imposed a restraint on one who, having entered the service of the plaintiff (who was a druggist), agreed that he would not at any time after leaving such service engage in the business of a druggist in that town, said: "It is not limited to such time as the plaintiff should carry on business in Taunton, nor to any given number of years, nor even to the life of the plaintiff; but it attaches to the defendant as long as he lives, although the plaintiff may have left Taunton, or parted with his business, or be dead;" and he accordingly held the restraint to be unreasonable and oppressive. That case was reversed on writ of error, but the point of reversal was that a restriction so extensive in point of time was necessary for the protection of the promisee in the enjoyment of the good will of his trade; and, as we understand the principle ruled in that case, a restriction so extensive is reasonable, and not oppressive, when it prevents the destruction of a property right or interest or the good will of a trade or business. See review of the case in Clark, Cont. pp. 455, 456. The contrary of this doctrine, however, is directly held in French v. Parker, 16 R. I. 219, 14 Atl. 870.

With conflicting authorities as to the application of the rules for testing the validity of contracts in partial restraint of trade, upon which all agree, we think a clear distinction must be taken between the class of cases binding one who has sold out a mercantile or other kind of business, and the good will therewith connected, not to again engage in that business within a given territory, and that class of cases binding one to desist from the practice of a learned profession. I can readily perceive that a successor of a merchant, broker, or shopkeeper might reasonably expect to retain the former patronage of the place of business, but fully concur with the views expressed by the court in the case of Mandeville v. Harman, supra, that professional skill, experience, and reputation are things which cannot be bought or sold. They constitute part of the individuality of the particular person, and die with him. In that case the court said: "There can be no doubt, I think, that if the complainant was the most distinguished physician of the city of Newark, and had by far the most lucrative practice in that city, and he should be so unfortunate as to die next month or next year, it would be impossible for his personal representative to sell his good will or practice, as a thing of property distinct from the office which he had occupied prior to his death, for any price; and I think it is equally obvious that, if it were sold in connection with his office, the only possible value which could be ascribed to it would be the slight possibility that some of the persons who had been his patients might, when they needed the services of a physician, go or send there for the next occupant of the office. The practice of a physician is a thing so purely personal, depending so absolutely on the confidence reposed in his personal skill and ability, that, when he ceases to exist, it necessarily ceases also, and after his death can have neither an intrinsic nor a market value. And, if the complainant should make sale of his practice in his lifetime, it is manifest all the purchaser could possibly get would be immunity from competition with him, and, perhaps, his implied approval that the purchaser was fit to be his successor; but it would be impossible for him to transfer his professional skill and ability to his successor, or to induce anybody to believe that he had."

So far as we have been able to examine, the cases which have ruled that, if the restraint is reasonably limited as to space, the fact that it is unlimited as to time will not render the agreement void, were cases in which some business or property, or property right, either of goods or good will, had been sold, and the restriction as to unlimited time was not considered unreasonable, because it affected property rights. Our own court has considered a number of cases involving contracts in restraint of trade, and in some of them held that restraints unlimited in point of time did not render the contracts void; but in every one of such cases, as far as we have examined, a property interest was involved. The first is that of Holmes v. Martin, 10 Ga. 503. In that case Holmes conveyed to Martin a house and lot in the town of Lawrenceville, with this restriction in the deed: "That said house and lot shall not be occupied by the said Martin or his assignees as a public tavern or hotel, which right is reserved in said property by Holmes." In that case the court held this contract to be good, and that contracts in partial restraint of trade only may be supported, provided the restraint be reasonable, and the contract founded on a consideration. In the case of Mell v. Mooney, 30 Ga. 413, no question arose which called for a ruling of the validity of contracts in restraint of trade, the points in the case relating alone to pleading. In the case of Jenkins v. Temples, 39 Ga. 655, it appeared that Jenkins had bought of Temples an entire stock of groceries and confectioneries at very high prices, and Temples had agreed that he would use all of his influence for Jenkins with his former customers, and bound himself not to deal in any of said articles at Spring Place until January, 1869. Temples violated the agreement. The court below held the contract to be void, and this court ruled, reversing the judge below, that a party might legally bind himself for a valuable consideration not to conduct a particular trade or business in a particular place for a reasonable and definite period of time. In the case of Spier v. Lambdin, 45 Ga. 319, Lambdin sold to Spier an unexpired lease of the Barnesville Academy, with the consent of the trustees, for the consideration of $475, representing that he wished to abandon school teaching, and would use his influence for Spier's benefit. The contract was held to be good and enforceable. In the case of Ellis v. Jones, 56 Ga. 504, Ellis & Palmer had purchased a stock of merchandise, consisting of dry goods, groceries, etc., from Jones & Co., and the store house containing the same, together with their custom and good will. Jones & Co. having recommenced business in the same place, Ellis & Palmer filed a bill to enjoin such action. The injunction was refused. It does not satisfactorily appear in the case that Jones & Co. covenanted not to engage in the same business. In the case of Goodman v. Henderson, 58 Ga. 567, the suit was upon a written agreement, whereby Goodman, in consideration of $100 a month for two years, and a further money consideration, agreed to retire from the business of purchasing green hides, sheep skins, etc., in the Savannah market forever, and that he would use his influence in favor of the purchaser, and sold to him the good will of the business. This court held in that case that the limit as to time made no difference if the contract was limited as to space. In the case of Brewer v. Lamar, 69 Ga. 656, there was an agreement to sell a certain proprietary medicine, and the seller agreed never to use or permit his name to be used on any preparation for the same class of complaints for which this medicine was made, and agreed also to surrender his trade-mark, and give to the purchasers the exclusive right to sell and manufacture the same under the old name. The consideration of the purchase was $275. The court held that the contract was in partial restraint of trade, and could be enforced. In the case of Newman v. Wolfson, 69 Ga. 764, Newman sold to Wolfson a stock of goods, etc., together with the good will of the business, for $1,466, and covenanted not to engage in a like business in that city for a period of five years. The court in this case held that the contract was not unreasonable. In the case of Swanson v. Kirby, 98 Ga. 586, 26 S. E. 71, this court held that where one has sold out a given business, and contracted not to again carry on the same in a particular locality, though unlimited as to time, such a contract, being reasonable and proper when limited as to place, and in other respects, was valid. In this case the consideration paid was $1,500, and the property purchased was a membership in the American Ticket Brokers' Association, a burglar-proof safe, desk, typewriter, and other office fixtures. The covenant was not to open a ticket office in the city of Atlanta without the consent of Kirby. In that case the court held that while contracts in total restraint of trade were void, where the restraint was partial, reasonable, and founded upon a good consideration, the contract would be enforced. It has never been decided in this state that a covenant between professional men (where no property rights were involved in the contract which imposed the restriction) so extensive in duration as that under consideration in the present case is valid. As was said by the court in the case of Mandeville v. Harman, supra: "It is one of the natural rights of every citizen of this state to use his skill and labor in any useful employment, not only to get food, raiment, and shelter, but to acquire property; and I think it may be regarded as very certain that the courts will never deprive any one of this right, or even abridge it, except in obedience to the sternest demands of justice."

We test this contract by the rules before referred to, and find it supported by a legal consideration. Being limited as to space, although unlimited as to time, we find that it may properly be classed among contracts in partial restraint of trade. When we seek its terms to ascertain whether it is reasonable, made to protect the promisee, and not oppressive on the promisor, we find that no money was paid by the promisee, and no property sold by the promisor. We find that the promisor, by the nature of the contract, must have rendered service for all the benefits he received. We find that, under the terms of this contract, if the promisee, the defendant in error, should remove from the town of Oliver, from the state of Georgia; if he should become permanently incapacitated, by disease, from continuing the practice of medicine; if he should die,—the promisor, in any event, would not be at liberty to practice his profession in Oliver, nor within 15 miles radius of that town. No matter what the changed conditions might be, it was so nominated in the bond that he should not exercise his calling within the territory prescribed. It must be clear, therefore, that the restrictions imposed upon the promisor in this contract were larger than were necessary for the protection of the promisee. Full protection would have been afforded to the latter if the time in which the restraint should apply had been limited to the life of the defendant in error, or to the time in which he was engaged in the practice of his profession in the county of Screven. Had this contract been so limited, it is obvious from the view which we take of the law that it should be upheld and would be enforced. But, when the terms of the contract prohibit one party from at any time in the future practicing his profession at a given place, without regard to the fact that the other party should not be engaged in the competitive business, without regard to the fact that he may have removed from the county and state in which such territory was located, without regard to the fact of the inability of the party, from age or physical infirmity, to continue his practice, it would seem to be unreasonable,—not necessary for the protection of the party in whose favor the restraint was imposed, oppressive to the party restrained, and opposed to the interests of the public; and, such being the case, the contract cannot be enforced. If it be said that it would be the right of the plaintiff in error, under any of the circumstances we have mentioned, to pray for a modification or rescission of such contract, the reply is that we are not dealing with such question. We are to construe it as it is written, and, so construing it, we hold it to be void and of no binding force and effect. The judgment of the court below must be reversed. All the justices concurring, except COBB, J., absent for providential cause.

COWEE v. CORNELL.

(75 N. Y. 91.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Nov. 12, 1878.

Appeal from order of the general term of the supreme court in the Third judicial department, reversing a judgment entered upon the report of a referee.

Plaintiff made a claim against the estate of Latham Cornell, of whose will defendants were the executors, for interest upon a promissory note executed by the deceased. This claim was rejected, and was referred by stipulation.

The facts, as stated by the referee, are in substance as follows:

Latham Cornell, the deceased, was the grandfather of Latham C. Strong. He was possessed of large property, consisting of real estate and of personal property invested in stocks, bonds and other securities. He died in 1876 at the age of ninety-five. For four years prior to his death he was partially blind. From July, 1871, until the time of his death, his grandson at his request attended to his affairs, writing his letters, looking after his banking business and his rents, making out his bills, cutting off his coupons, reading to him, and on occasions going away from home to transact other business. In July, 1871, Cornell gave to Strong a deed of two adjoining houses in the city of Troy, valued at about $32,000, in one of which houses the grandfather lived until the time of his death. The grandson moved into the adjoining house in the spring of 1872, and resided there until after his grandfather's death. During the time that the two thus lived in adjoining residences, they were in daily conference upon business matters of the old gentleman, in the house occupied by the grandson. The grandson with his family consisting of five persons, during all this time lived at the sole expense of the grandfather, and claims to have received, in addition to the note in suit, as gifts from his grandfather, $30,000 in government bonds and the assignment of a mortgage for about $1,700. At what particular time it is claimed these gifts were made is not in evidence. Mr. Cornell made his will in 1871, providing a legacy of $15,000 for Mr. Strong. In the fall of 1872, Mr. Strong expressed a desire to go into business for himself and to be independent of his grandfather, and actually was in negotiation with different persons in Troy and New York with a view of forming business associations. Mr. Cornell became uneasy at the prospect of losing the services of his grandson and caused him to be written for to come home. Mr. Strong came back to Troy, and his grandfather said to him then, as he had previously said, that he wanted him to give up his ideas of leaving and to devote his whole time to the business of his grandfather. Mr. Cornell further said that he had no one else to look after his business, and frequently said that there was money enough for all of them. Mr. Strong immediately abandoned his business projects and devoted his whole time and attention to his grandfather's business, until the death of the latter. After this Mr. Cornell sent for his legal advisers and proposed to alter his will so as to make provision to compensate his grandson for having devoted himself to his business. What provision was intended is not disclosed by the evidence. The lawyers advised that his will be left unaltered, and that he take some other way of compensating his grandson. Mr. Cornell gave to Mr. Strong the note in question. It is as follows: "$20,000. Troy, April 1, 1873. Five years after date I promise to pay Latham L. C. Strong, or order, $20,000, for value received, with interest yearly. L. Cornell."

The note was on a printed form, the name of the payee being printed "Latham Cornell." The note was filled up in the handwriting of the maker, but in striking out with his pen the name of the payee he left the word "Latham" and afterwards interlined the full name, "L. C. Strong." Annexed to the note was a stub with some printed forms, on which Mr. Cornell wrote: "Troy, April 1st, 1873, L. C. Strong, $20,000 at five years, to make the amount the same as Chas. W. Cornell." The stub was on the note when it was delivered to the payee, but was torn off by him before it was transferred to the plaintiff; and there is no evidence that the plaintiff ever knew of the existence of the stub. The stub and note were taken from a blank book which belonged to decedent. No payment of interest was made upon the note during the lifetime of the maker. The referee found that the note was given for a valuable consideration. Mr. Strong sold the note to the plaintiff for $19,000, taking his note, payable in one year after date. What that date was has not been disclosed. Mr. Strong testified at the trial that he still held the note. Mr. Strong was one of the executors.

Further facts are stated in the opinion.

Irving Browne, for appellant. John Thompson, for respondents.

HAND, J. The counsel for respondents suggested at the close of his argument before us that there was no evidence of a delivery of the note to Strong, the payee, and the finding of delivery by the referee was entirely unsupported. He does not however make this a point in his printed brief, and did not present it strenuously or with any emphasis in his oral remarks.

It is true that the evidence in this respect was not very satisfactory. Ordinarily the possession and production of the note by the payee will raise a presumption of delivery to him. But this presumption must be very much weakened when the possession is shown not to precede the possession of all the maker's papers and effects by the payee as executor, when the note appears to have been all in the handwriting of the maker and to have been taken with a stub attached, also in his handwriting, from a bank book belonging to him, and when installments of interest falling due in the maker's life-time were not paid and although years elapsed after they so became due before his death there is no proof of any demand of them by the payee or recognition of liability by the deceased. I am not prepared to say however that these circumstances absolutely destroy the presumption from possession and production of the instrument. While some evidence on the part of the plaintiff, showing that the note had been delivered to Strong in his grandfather's life-time, or at least negating the idea that Strong found it in the bank-book or among the papers of the deceased when he took possession of them as executor, could probably have been easily produced if consistent with the fact, yet we cannot hold its absence conclusive against the plaintiff upon this point, upon the record as it stands. No motion for judgment or to dismiss was made on this ground by the respondents although the trial was in other respects treated by the counsel on both sides as one before a referee appointed in the ordinary way to hear and determine and direct judgment as in an action, and we cannot say but that if the plaintiff had been notified of such an objection, the evidence would have been supplied. The finding of the delivery by the referee was not even excepted to, although there were exceptions to the finding of consideration. Under these circumstances we must, I think, assume an acquiescence in the truth of the finding by the respondents for reasons known to them, and which if disclosed would probably be entirely satisfactory.

The majority of the general term put their reversal of the judgment upon the ground that it conclusively appeared from the stub attached that the note was intended as a gift and was without consideration. In this I am unable to concur.

The referee's finding that the note was delivered not as a gift but for a valuable consideration has some evidence to support it, in the proof of the services rendered by Strong to the deceased, and his abandonment of a profession at the request of the deceased, in the intention expressed by the latter to make some compensation for those services, and the conversation had with his counsel not very long before the date of this note, in which he was dissuaded from making this compensation by will and advised to do it while alive, to which he assented. What appears upon the stub is not in my opinion conclusive against this result.

There is perhaps difficulty in giving any entirely satisfactory construction to this memorandum made by the deceased; but the interpretation of the general term seems to my mind inconsistent with the known facts of the case. Strong certainly had had and the deceased knew that he had had property of the value of $32,000 given him before the date of this note, and perhaps $30,000 more in bonds. The $20,000 note could not have been therefore as the general term supposes, a gift to make him equal in gifts with his cousin Charles, to whom only $20,000 had been given in all.

But not only do the circumstances show that the memorandum could not mean that this gift of the $20,000 to Strong would make him equal in gifts to Charles, but the memorandum itself does not say so. Its language is "to make the amount the same as Chas. W. Cornell." While, as has already been said, there is probably insuperable difficulty in discovering precisely all that the deceased meant by this expression, its intrinsic sense is merely that the amount of this note, $20,000, is so fixed to make it the same as an amount possessed in some way by Charles, and this is consistent with both amounts being gifts, or the one being fixed upon in the testator's mind as a fair compensation for Strong's services and at the same time equal to an amount he had given or intended to give to Charles. On the whole I think this memorandum was a piece of evidence to be submitted with the other evidence to be considered by the referee on the question of fact. His decision upon all this evidence cannot be disturbed by this court.

The same may be said of the proof of large gifts to Strong either all before, or some before and some after the date of the note.

The reversal by the general term is not stated to be upon the facts, and on the argument it was conceded by the counsel for the respondents to be upon the law merely. It may be that a finding upon all the evidence that the note was without consideration and a gift would not be disturbed, and would be held by us as not unauthorized by the evidence. On the other hand, we cannot accede to the proposition that a finding to the contrary, such as has been made by the referee here, must by reason of the contents of this stub or other testimony be reversed as erroneous in law.

It follows that except as bearing upon undue influence, and the relations of parties hereafter considered, the inadequacy of the services or the extravagance of the compensation are not material. That was a matter purely of agreement between Strong and the deceased, and with which the court will not interfere under ordinary circumstances. Earl v. Peck, 64 N. Y. 597; Worth v. Case, 42 N. Y. 362; Johnson v. Titus, 2 Hill, 606. Although the consideration of a promissory note is always open to investigation between the original parties (and we agree with the court below that the plaintiff here has no better position than Strong himself), yet as pointed out by the chief judge in Earl v. Peck, supra, mere inadequacy in value of the thing bought or paid for is never intended by the legal expression, "want or failure of consideration." This only covers either total worthlessness to all parties, or subsequent destruction, partial or complete.

Assuming then, as I think we must, that there was no error as matter of law in the finding of the referee that this note was given for a valuable consideration, and that the adequacy of that consideration is something with which we have no concern if the parties dealt on equal terms, the only point remaining to consider is the relations existing between the deceased and Strong at the date of the note.

It is insisted strenuously by the learned counsel for the respondents that these were such as to call for the application of the doctrine of constructive fraud, and threw upon the plaintiff the burden of proving not only that the deceased fully understood the act, but that he was not induced to it by any undue influence of Strong, and that the latter took no unfair advantage of his superior influence or knowledge.

The court below were hardly correct in the suggestion that the plaintiff conceded this burden to be upon himself, and for that reason, instead of resting upon the statement of consideration in the note, gave evidence in opening his case of an actual consideration; for this may have been done to show in the first instance that the note was not a gift and hence void under the law applicable to gifts. Indeed it appears from the findings and refusals to find, and the opinion of the referee, that such was not the theory upon which the action was tried or decided.

We return then to the question whether this case was one of constructive fraud. It may be stated as universally true that fraud vitiates all contracts, but as a general thing it is not presumed but must be proved by the party seeking to relieve himself from an obligation on that ground. Whenever, however, the relations between the contracting parties appear to be of such a character as to render it certain that they do not deal on terms of equality, but that either on the one side from superior knowledge of the matter derived from a fiduciary relation, or from overmastering influence, or on the other from weakness, dependence or trust justifiably reposed, unfair advantage in a transaction is rendered probable, there the burden is shifted, the transaction is presumed void, and it is incumbent upon the stronger party to show affirmatively that no deception was practiced, no undue influence was used, and that all was fair, open, voluntary and well understood. This doctrine is well settled. Hunt, J., Nesbit v. Lockman, 34 N. Y. 167; Story, Eq. Jur. § 311; Sears v. Shafer, 6 N. Y. 268; Huguenin v. Basely, 13 Ves. 105, 14 Ves. 273, and 15 Ves. 180; Wright v. Proud, 13 Ves. 138; Harris v. Tremeneere, 15 Ves. 40; Edwards v. Myrick, 2 Hare, 60; Hunter v. Atkins, 3 Mylne & K. 113. And this is I think the extent to which the well-considered cases go, and is the scope of "constructive fraud."

The principle referred to, it must be remembered, is distinct from that absolutely forbidding a purchase by a trustee or agent for his own benefit of the subject of a trust, and charging it when so purchased with the trust. That amounts to an incapacity in the fiduciary to purchase of himself. He cannot act for himself at all, however fairly or innocently, in any dealing as to which he has duties as trustee or agent. The reason of this rule is subjective. It removes from the trustee, with the power, all temptation to commit any breach of trust for his own benefit. But the principle with which we are now concerned does not absolutely forbid the dealing, but it presumes it unfair and fraudulent unless the contrary is affirmatively shown.

This doctrine, as has been said, is well settled, but there is often great difficulty in applying it to particular cases.

The law presumes in the case of guardian and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, attorney and client, and perhaps physician and patient, from the relation of the parties itself, that their situation is unequal and of the character I have defined; and that relation appearing itself throws the burden upon the trustee, guardian or attorney of showing the fairness of his dealings.

But while the doctrine is without doubt to be extended to many other relations of trust, confidence or inequality, the trust and confidence, or the superiority on one side and weakness on the other, must be proved in each of these cases; the law does not presume them from the fact for instance that one party is a grandfather and old, and the other a grandson and young, or that one is an employer and the other an employé. The question as to parties so situated is a question of fact dependent upon the circumstances in each case. There is no presumption of inequality either way from these relations merely.

In the present case it cannot be said that the fact that the deceased employed Strong as his clerk to read and answer his letters and cut off his coupons, and make out his bills, or as his bailiff to collect his rents, or that at this time he was old and of defective vision, or that Strong lived near him and was his grandson, taken separately or together raise a conclusive presumption of law that their situation was unequal, and that dealings between them as to compensation for these services were between a stronger and a weaker party, a fiduciary in hac re and the party reposing confidence. These relations as a matter of fact may have led to or been consistent with controlling influence on the part of the grandson, or childish weakness and confidence on the part of the grandfather, but this was to be shown, and is not necessarily derivable or presumable from the relations themselves, as in the case of trustee, attorney or guardian.

From these relations and the large gifts shown from the deceased to Strong, and from the extravagant amount of the compensation in the note, it is very possible the referee might have found as a fact the existence of weakness on the one side, or undue strength on the other, which rendered applicable the doctrine of constructive fraud, and threw upon the plaintiff the burden of disproving such fraud. These circumstances may have well been of a character, if not sufficient to shift the presumption, at least to authorize a setting aside of a contract without any decisive proof of fraud, but upon the slightest proof that advantage was taken of the relation, or of the use of "any arts or stratagems or any undue means or the least speck of imposition." Whelan v. Whelan, 3 Cow. 538, Lord Eldon, L. C.; Harris v. Tremeneere, 15 Ves. 40, Lord Brougham; Hunter v. Atkins, 3 Mylne & K. 135.

But the referee not only has not found as fact any inequality in the situation of the deceased and Strong, but refused to find as a matter of law its existence, and there is really no evidence whatever of any arts or stratagems or "speck of imposition" on the part of Strong as to this note.

We are not permitted to supply these findings even if we thought them proper for the referee to make, nor can we sustain a reversal of the original judgment upon facts not found and not necessarily inferable from uncontradicted evidence in the case, the general term not having in any way interfered with the findings of the referee.

On the whole therefore we reach the conclusion that there was no good reason for disturbing the judgment of the referee. This large claim upon the estate of the deceased is not so clearly justified and explained in the evidence as we could have wished, and the circumstances are such as to compel this court to look upon the case, if not with suspicion, certainly with anxiety, yet after careful examination we can find no material error in the original decision.

The order granting a new trial must be reversed and judgment for plaintiff affirmed with costs.

All concur, except MILLER and EARL, JJ., absent.

Judgment accordingly.

ALLORE v. JEWELL.

(94 U. S. 506.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Oct., 1876.

Appeal from the circuit court of the United States for the Eastern district of Michigan.

The facts are stated in the opinion of the court.

Alfred Russell, for appellant. A. B. Maynard, contra.

Mr. Justice FIELD delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a suit brought by the heir at law of Marie Genevieve Thibault, late of Detroit, Mich., to cancel a conveyance of land alleged to have been obtained from her a few weeks before her death, when, from her condition, she was incapable of understanding the nature and effect of the transaction.

The deceased died at Detroit on the 4th of February, 1864, intestate, leaving the complainant her sole surviving heir at law. For many years previous to her death, and until the execution of the conveyance to the defendant, she was seised in fee of the land in controversy, situated in that city, which she occupied as a homestead. In November, 1863, the defendant obtained from her a conveyance of this property. A copy of the conveyance is set forth in the bill. It contains covenants of seisin and warranty by the grantor, and immediately following them an agreement by the defendant to pay her $250 upon the delivery of the instrument; an annuity of $500; all her physician's bills during her life; the taxes on the property for that year, and all subsequent taxes during her life; also, that she should have the use and occupation of the house until the spring of 1864, or that he would pay the rent of such other house as she might occupy until then. The property was then worth, according to the testimony in the case, between $6,000 and $8,000. The deceased was at that time between sixty and seventy years of age, and was confined to her house by sickness, from which she never recovered. She lived alone, in a state of great degradation, and was without regular attendance in her sickness. There were no persons present with her at the execution of the conveyance, except the defendant, his agent, and his attorney. The $250 stipulated were paid, but no other payment was ever made to her; she died a few weeks afterwards.

As grounds for cancelling this conveyance, the complainant alleges that the deceased, during the last few years of her life, was afflicted with lunacy or chronic insanity, and was so infirm as to be incapable of transacting any business of importance; that her last sickness aggravated her insanity, greatly weakened her mental faculties, and still more disqualified her for business; that the defendant and his agent knew of her infirmity, and that there was no reasonable prospect of her recovery from her sickness, or of her long surviving, when the conveyance was taken; that she did not understand the nature of the instrument; and that it was obtained for an insignificant consideration, and in a clandestine manner, without her having any independent advice.

These allegations the defendant controverts, and avers that the conveyance was taken upon a proposition of the deceased; that at the date of its execution she was in the full possession of her mental faculties, appreciated the value of the property, and was capable of contracting with reference to it, and of selling or otherwise dealing with it; that since her death he has occupied the premises, and made permanent improvements to the value of $7,000; and that the complainant never gave him notice of any claim to the property until the commencement of this suit.

The court below dismissed the bill, whereupon the complainant appealed here. The question presented for determination is, whether the deceased, at the time she executed the conveyance in question, possessed sufficient intelligence to understand fully the nature and effect of the transaction; and, if so, whether the conveyance was executed under such circumstances as that it ought to be upheld, or as would justify the interference of equity for its cancellation.

Numerous witnesses were examined in the case, and a large amount of testimony was taken. This testimony has been carefully analyzed by the defendant's counsel; and it must be admitted that the facts detailed by any one witness with reference to the condition of the deceased previous to her last illness, considered separately and apart from the statements of the others, do not show incapacity to transact business on her part, nor establish insanity, either continued or temporary. And yet, when all the facts stated by the different witnesses are taken together, one is led irresistibly by their combined effect to the conclusion, that, if the deceased was not afflicted with insanity for some years before her death, her mind wandered so near the line which divides sanity from insanity as to render any important business transaction with her of doubtful propriety, and to justify a careful scrutiny into its fairness.

Thus, some of the witnesses speak of the deceased as having low and filthy habits; of her being so imperfectly clad as at times to expose immodestly portions of her person; of her eating with her fingers, and having vermin on her body. Some of them testify to her believing in dreams, and her imagining she could see ghosts and spirits around her room, and her claiming to talk with them; to her being incoherent in her conversation, passing suddenly and without cause from one subject to another; to her using vulgar and profane language; to her making immodest gestures; to her talking strangely, and making singular motions and gestures in her neighbors' houses and in the streets. Other witnesses testify to further peculiarities of life, manner, and conduct; but none of the peculiarities mentioned, considered singly, show a want of capacity to transact business. Instances will readily occur to every one where some of them have been exhibited by persons possessing good judgment in the management and disposition of property. But when all the peculiarities mentioned, of life, conduct, and language, are found in the same person, they create a strong impression that his mind is not entirely sound; and all transactions relating to his property will be narrowly scanned by a court of equity, whenever brought under its cognizance.

The condition of the deceased was not improved during her last sickness. The testimony of her attending physician leads to the conclusion that her mental infirmities were aggravated by it. He states that he had studied her disease, and for many years had considered her partially insane, and that in his opinion she was not competent in November, 1863, during her last sickness, to understand a document like the instrument executed. The physician also testifies that during this month he informed one Dolsen, who had inquired of the condition and health of the deceased, and had stated that efforts had been made to purchase her property, that in his opinion she could not survive her sickness, and that she was not in a condition to make any sale of the property "in a right way."

This Dolsen had at one time owned and managed a tannery adjoining the home of the deceased, which he sold to the defendant. After the sale, he carried on the business as the defendant's agent. Through him the transaction for the purchase of the property was conducted. The deceased understood English imperfectly, and Dolsen undertook to explain to her, in French, the contents of the paper she executed. Some attempt is made to show that he acted as her agent; but this is evidently an afterthought. He was in the employment of the defendant, had charge of his business, and had often talked with him about securing the property; and in his interest he acted throughout. If the deceased was not in a condition to dispose of the property, she was not in a condition to appoint an agent for that purpose.

The defendant himself states that he had seen the deceased for years, and knew that she was eccentric, queer, and penurious. It is hardly credible that, during those years, carrying on business within a few yards of her house, he had not heard that her mind was unsettled; or, at least, had not inferred that such was the fact, from what he saw of her conduct. Be that as it may, Dolsen's knowledge was his knowledge; and, when he covenanted to pay the annuity, some inquiry must have been had as to the probable duration of the payments. Such covenants are not often made without inquiries of that nature; and to Dolsen he must have looked for information, for he states that he conversed with no one else about the purchase. With him and with his attorney he went to the house of the deceased, and there witnessed the miserable condition in which she lived, and he states that he wondered how anybody could live in such a place, and that he told Dolsen to get her a bed and some clothing. Dolsen had previously informed him that she would not sell the property; yet he took a conveyance from her at a consideration which, under the circumstances, with a certainty almost of her speedy decease, was an insignificant one compared with the value of the property.

In view of the circumstances stated, we are not satisfied that the deceased was, at the time she executed the conveyance, capable of comprehending fully the nature and effect of the transaction. She was in a state of physical prostration; and from that cause, and her previous infirmities, aggravated by her sickness, her intellect was greatly enfeebled; and, if not disqualified, she was unfitted to attend to business of such importance as the disposition of her entire property, and the securing of an annuity for life. Certain it is, that, in negotiating for the disposition of the property, she stood, in her sickness and infirmities, on no terms of equality with the defendant, who, with his attorney and agent, met her alone in her hovel to obtain the conveyance.

It is not necessary, in order to secure the aid of equity, to prove that the deceased was at the time insane, or in such a state of mental imbecility as to render her entirely incapable of executing a valid deed. It is sufficient to show that, from her sickness and infirmities, she was at the time in a condition of great mental weakness, and that there was gross inadequacy of consideration for the conveyance. From these circumstances, imposition or undue influence will be inferred. In the case of Harding v. Wheaton, 2 Mason, 378, Fed. Cas. No. 6,051, a conveyance executed by one to his son-in-law, for a nominal consideration, and upon a verbal arrangement that it should be considered as a trust for the maintenance of the grantor, and after his death for the benefit of his heirs, was, after his death, set aside, except as security for actual advances and charges, upon application of his heirs, on the ground that it was obtained from him when his mind was enfeebled by age and other causes. "Extreme weakness," said Mr. Justice Story, in deciding the case, "will raise an almost necessary presumption of imposition, even when it stops short of legal incapacity; and though a contract, in the ordinary course of things, reasonably made with such a person, might be admitted to stand, yet if it should appear to be of such a nature as that such a person could not be capable of measuring its extent or importance, its reasonableness or its value, fully and fairly, it cannot be that the law is so much at variance with common sense as to uphold it." The case subsequently came before this court; and, in deciding it, Mr. Chief Justice Marshall, speaking of this, and, it would seem, of other deeds executed by the deceased, said: "If these deeds were obtained by the exercise of undue influence over a man whose mind had ceased to be the safe guide of his actions, it is against conscience for him who has obtained them to derive any advantage from them. It is the peculiar province of a court of conscience to set them aside. That a court of equity will interpose in such a case is among its best-settled principles." Harding v. Handy, 11 Wheat. 125.

The same doctrine is announced in adjudged cases, almost without number; and it may be stated as settled law, that whenever there is great weakness of mind in a person executing a conveyance of land, arising from age, sickness, or any other cause, though not amounting to absolute disqualification, and the consideration given for the property is grossly inadequate, a court of equity will, upon proper and seasonable application of the injured party, or his representatives or heirs, interfere and set the conveyance aside. And the present case comes directly within this principle.

In the recent case of Kempson v. Ashbee, 10 Ch. Cas. 15, decided in the court of appeal in chancery in England, two bonds executed by a young woman, living at the time with her mother and step-father,—one, at the age of twenty-one, as surety for her step-father's debt, and the other, at the age of twenty-nine, to secure the amount of a judgment recovered on the first bond,—were set aside as against her, on the ground that she had acted in the transaction without independent advice; one of the justices observing that the court had endeavored to prevent persons subject to influence from being induced to enter into transactions without advice of that kind. The principle upon which the court acts in such cases, of protecting the weak and dependent, may always be invoked on behalf of persons in the situation of the deceased spinster in this case, of doubtful sanity, living entirely by herself, without friends to take care of her, and confined to her house by sickness. As well on this ground as on the ground of weakness of mind and gross inadequacy of consideration, we think the case a proper one for the interference of equity, and that a cancellation of the deed should be decreed.

The objection of the lapse of time—six years—before bringing the suit cannot avail the defendant. If during this time, from the death of witnesses or other causes, a full presentation of the facts of the case had become impossible, there might be force in the objection. But as there has been no change in this respect to the injury of the defendant, it does not lie in his mouth, after having, in the manner stated, obtained the property of the deceased, to complain that her heir did not sooner bring suit against him to compel its surrender. There is no statutory bar in the case. The improvements made have not cost more than the amount which a reasonable rent of the property would have produced, and the complainant, as we understand, does not object to allow the defendant credit for them. And as to the small amount paid on the execution of the conveyance, it is sufficient to observe, that the complainant received from the administrator of the deceased's estate only $113.42; and there is no evidence that he ever knew that this sum constituted any portion of the money obtained from the defendant. A decree must, therefore, be entered for a cancellation of the deed of the deceased and a surrender of the property to the complainant, but without any accounting for back rents, the improvements being taken as an equivalent for them.

Decree reversed, and cause remanded with directions to enter a decree as thus stated.

Mr. Chief Justice WAITE and Mr. Justice STRONG, concur.

Mr. Justice BRADLEY (dissenting). I cannot concur in the judgment given in this case. Were there no other reason for my dissent, it would be enough that the complainant has been guilty of inexcusable laches. He knew every thing of which he now complains, in February, 1864, when the grantor of the defendant died, and when his rights as her heir vested; and yet he waited until six years and nine months thereafter before he brought this suit, and before he made any complaint of the sale she had made. Meanwhile, he accepted the money the defendant had paid on account of the purchase, and he stood silently by, asserting no claim, while the defendant was making valuable improvements upon the lot, at a cost of $6,000 or $7,000, a sum about equal to the value of the property at the time of the purchase. To permit him now to assert that the sale was invalid, because the vendor was of weak mind, is to allow him to reap a profit from his own unconscionable silence and delay. I cannot think a court of equity should lend itself to such a wrong.

GREENE et al. v. ROWORTH et al.

(21 N. E. 165, 113 N. Y. 462.)

Court of Appeals of New York. April 23, 1889.

Appeal from common pleas of New York city and county, general term.

Action originally brought by William Roworth, to vacate transfers of certain property made by him to his sons, Joseph G. and John W. Roworth. Pending the decision, William Roworth died, and the action was revived in favor of the present plaintiffs, Emma T. Greene and others. A judgment for plaintiffs was reversed in part and affirmed in part on appeal to the general term of the supreme court, and defendants now appeal to this court.

Thomas Darlington, (Samuel Jones, of counsel,) for appellants. J. M. & A. H. Van Cott, for respondents.

RUGER, C. J. The reversal by the general term of so much of the judgment of the special term as awarded relief to the plaintiffs in respect to the conveyance of personal property, eliminated from the case all questions predicated upon rulings in relation thereto. This determination left the issues in respect to the validity of the conveyances of two parcels of real estate as the only subjects of controversy on the appeal to this court.

The evidence of the exercise of fraud and undue influence by the defendants Joseph and John Roworth, in obtaining from their father, William Roworth, deeds of such property, was quite sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court respecting the same. The evidence tended to show that for many years prior to January, 1877, William Roworth and his son Samuel carried on the business of manufacturing confectionery at 354 Pearl street in the city of New York, under the firm name of Samuel W. Roworth & Co., and had established a prosperous business. William Roworth was then the owner of a one-half interest in the assets of said firm; of a three-quarters interest in the lot and building in which the business was carried on; of a house and lot in Devoe street, Brooklyn; and another in Fifth street in the same city; a mortgage on property in Detroit for $2,000; and deposits in bank of about $500. In January, Samuel W. Roworth died, devising his interest in the assets of said firm equally to the defendants, his two brothers, John and Joseph, and to his two sisters. Between the time of Samuel's death, in January, 1877, and March, 1880, the defendants John and Joseph had obtained from William Roworth, without consideration except a promise to pay him a small sum weekly from the partnership business, all of the property possessed by him. This was effected by transfers and conveyances of such property, or its proceeds, made successively at different times by William Roworth to one or both of said defendants, between the dates aforesaid. At the time of the death of Samuel the two defendants were each upwards of 45 years of age, and had been unsuccessful in the business operations theretofore carried on by them respectively, and were not then possessed of any property. They were supporting themselves as workmen, upon a small salary, in the employ of Samuel W. Roworth & Co. In 1877, William Roworth was 76 years of age, and had become quite infirm in health. His memory had greatly failed, and he was practically incapable of taking an active and responsible part in the management of his business, although he continued for some time thereafter to attend at the store and factory, and make entries in the books, draw up bills, and render other small services which he had been theretofore accustomed to perform. He had become very nervous and susceptible, being frequently overcome by emotion, and easily affected to tears, and subject to the influence of those surrounding him. He had an aged wife, who survived him, and was dependent upon him for support. The findings of fact made by the trial court as the basis of its judgment with respect to the two deeds which remain as the subject of controversy on this appeal are substantially the same, and that one relating to the transfer of No. 354 Pearl street, New York, reads as follows: That "the said William Roworth, at the time of the execution and acknowledgment of said instrument, did not know or comprehend the legal effect of the said instrument," and that its "execution, acknowledgment, and delivery * * * were procured by fraud and undue influence, exercised upon said William Roworth by the said defendants, Joseph G. Roworth and John W. Roworth, and by their taking advantage of his age and infirmities, and his confidence and trust in them, and his dependence and reliance upon them; and the signing and delivery of the same by William Roworth was reckless and improvident, was done without proper advice of counsel, and upon a grossly inadequate consideration, and while he was acting under the influence of said defendants, unduly exercised upon him." The evidence, as we have said, fully supports this finding, and, indeed, we are of the opinion that the proof would not have justified the contrary conclusion. In the consideration of this case the court cannot shut its eyes to the significant fact that William Roworth has been substantially stripped of all of his property by some one; and however or to whomever it passed originally, either the property or its proceeds found their way to a common end, viz., to the benefit and possession of the defendants. Whatever the defendants advanced, if anything, towards the acquisition of any part of the property, has been for their own advantage, and substantially from funds which they had received from their father.

The only material question in this case arises over an alleged inconsistency between the findings made by the trial court as the basis of its judgment, and a single one also found by the court out of 105 special requests to find on questions of fact submitted by the defendants at the close of the trial. It is undoubtedly an established rule of this court, where findings of fact, made by the court or referee, which are material to the determination of the case, are irreconcilably conflicting, that we will be governed by that finding which is most favorable to the party appealing; but this rule presupposes such a difference in the findings. So, far, therefore, as these findings are conflicting, it is the duty of the court to endeavor to reconcile them, and give to each some office to perform. It is only when this cannot, by a reasonable construction, be accomplished, that the court are bound to accept that finding most favorable to the appellant. Bennett v. Bates, 94 N. Y. 354; Redfield v. Redfield, 110 N. Y. 671, 18 N. E. Rep. 373. It was said in the latter case that "we have held that, where the special findings of a judge or referee differ from the findings formally made as the basis of the judgment, the appellant has the right to rely upon such findings as are most favorable to him. Those decisions were made at a time when the practice authorized the submission of proposed findings * * * after the decision of the case was rendered; and under that practice such findings were passed upon, generally weeks, and frequently months, after the formal findings had been made. And we held that where such findings differed from the prior findings, and contradicted them, that the appellant had the right to rely upon them if most favorable to him. Tompkins v. Lee, 59 N. Y. 662; Schwinger v. Raymond, 83 N. Y. 192; Bonnell v. Griswold, 89 N. Y. 122. Since those decisions, the practice has been changed, and now the proposed findings must be presented at the submission of the case, and the presumption is that those findings are passed upon when the case is decided and the formal findings made. Hence, for the purpose of construing the findings, we must look at all of them, both the general and special findings, and if they are in conflict we must attempt to reconcile them." In accord with the rule thus stated, we must look at the findings in question, to see how far they are inconsistent. The formal finding will be found much broader than the one alleged to be inconsistent therewith, as it especially finds that the deed was fraudulently procured, in ignorance of its effect by the grantor, and these facts are not negated by any subsequent finding. There is undoubtedly an apparent inconsistency between the additional and some parts of the formal findings, but upon examination we think it does not necessarily nullify the effect of the formal finding. The additional finding is as follows: "That the said Joseph G. and John W. Roworth did not, about said month of April, or at any time, persuade or influence said William Roworth to sign said alleged paper, or make any representations in respect thereto." We infer that this finding relates to the deed in question. In the same connection the court refused to find that the said William Roworth was not "by reason of bodily infirmities unable and incapacitated from participating in or taking part in the management and control of his business, property, and affairs," or that "Joseph G. and John W. Roworth were not intrusted by William Roworth * * * with the exclusive and entire management and control of his property and business," or that "he was not dependent upon the said Joseph G. and John W. Roworth for the proper management and control of his property and business, and was not solely reliant upon their advice in regard thereto," or that he was cognizant of "the real purpose and effect of his deed to Joseph G. and John W. Roworth." It seems quite evident, by these refusals to find, that the court did not intend, by its informal finding, to nullify the general force and effect of the formal findings. The court had, in its original findings, on seven distinct and separate occasions applying to as many different transfers of property, reiterated in substance the findings of fraud and undue influence on the part of these defendants in obtaining such transfers. The several findings were presumptively passed upon at the same time, and it is quite improbable that the court intentionally determined to leave two findings in the case radically inconsistent with each other, or to nullify and contradict its repeated findings, often expressed and confirmed in its previous statement of facts.

We are of the opinion that the court, by the additional finding, intended only to say that there was no direct or positive evidence of any special influence or persuasion with reference to the procurement of the deed in question, but left the judgment to stand upon the legal presumption of fraud arising upon the facts and circumstances of the case. The informal finding was substantially a finding as to the inferences to be drawn from the evidence, and not upon an existing and independent fact itself, and in that respect was rather a finding upon a question of law than one of fact. In that view it may be said to be erroneous, and as not affecting the judgments rendered. The leading facts of the case have been found, and are not impaired by any contradictory finding. They were, substantially, that the deed was secured by parties who had already obtained the larger portion of the grantor's property, without any adequate consideration therefor; that this conveyance left him comparatively destitute of property, and was made without consideration, in the absence of any legal adviser, by an aged man, whose mental and physical condition was much enfeebled, and in ignorance of its legal effect, to persons occupying a confidential relation towards him, and who had the management and control of his property and business affairs, and upon whose advice and counsel he was accustomed to rely. That these facts afford sufficient ground to support a finding of fraud and undue influence, even without positive or direct proof of persuasion or influence, cannot be questioned. They present a situation from which fraud is legally imputable to those benefited, and requiring an explanation from them, which was not furnished by the defendants.

As was said by Judge HAND in Cowee v. Cornell, 75 N. Y. 99: "We return, then, to the question whether this case was one of constructive fraud. It may be stated as universally true that fraud vitiates all contracts, but as a general thing it is not presumed, but must be proved by the party seeking to relieve himself from an obligation on that ground. Whenever, however, the relations between the contracting parties appear to be of such a character as to render it certain that they do not deal on terms of equality, but that, either on the one side from superior knowledge of the matter derived from a fiduciary relation, or from overmastering influence, or, on the other, from weakness, dependence, or trust justifiably reposed, unfair advantage in a transaction is rendered probable, there the burden is shifted, the transaction is presumed void, and it is incumbent upon the stronger party to show affirmatively that no deception was practiced, no undue influence was used, and that all was fair, open, voluntary, and well understood." The remarks of Judge ANDREWS in Re Will of Smith, 95 N. Y. 516, are so pertinent to the question that we repeat them here: "Undue influence, which is a species of fraud, when relied upon to annul a transaction inter partes, or a testamentary disposition, must be proved, and cannot be presumed. But the relation in which the parties to a transaction stand to each other is often a material circumstance, and may of itself, in some cases, be sufficient to raise a presumption of its existence. * * * and, when the situation is shown, then there is cast upon the party claiming the benefit or advantage the burden of relieving himself from the suspicion thus engendered, and of showing, either by direct proof or by circumstances, that the transaction was free from fraud or undue influence, and that the other party acted without restraint and under no coercion, or any pressure, direct or indirect, of the party benefited. This rule does not proceed upon a presumption of the invalidity of the particular transaction, without proof. The proof is made in the first instance when the relation and the personal intervention of the party claiming the benefit is shown." The general rule is stated in 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 238: "The doctrine, therefore, may be laid down as generally true that the acts and contracts of persons who are of weak understandings, and who are therefore liable to imposition, will be held void in courts of equity if the nature of the act or contract justify the conclusion that the party has not exercised a deliberate judgment, but that he has been imposed upon, circumvented, or overcome by cunning or artifice or undue influence." If, therefore, we should give full effect to the special finding, and come to the conclusion that the giving of the deed in question was the voluntary, unrestricted act of the grantor, it would not, under the circumstances of this case, justify the retention by the grantee of the property conveyed, or furnish a reason for refusing relief to the improvident grantor. We are therefore of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. All concur.

BROWN v. PIERCE.

(7 Wall. 205.)

Supreme Court of the United States. Dec., 1868.

Error to the supreme court, Nebraska territory.

Brown filed his bill in September, 1860, in the court below against three persons, Pierce, Morton, and Weston, alleging that in the spring of 1857, he settled upon and improved a tract of land near Omaha; that he erected a house on the tract and continued to occupy it until August 10th, 1857, when he entered the tract under the pre-emption laws of the United States; that Pierce claimed the land by virtue of the laws of an organization known as the Omaha Claim Club; that this organization, consisting of very numerous armed men, sought to, and did to a great extent, control the disposition of the public lands in the vicinity of Omaha in 1857, in defiance of the laws of the United States; that it frequently resorted to personal violence in enforcing its decrees; that the fact was notorious in Omaha, and that he, Brown, was fully advised in the premises; that as soon as he had acquired title to the land, Pierce, together with several other members of the club, came to his house and demanded of him a deed of the land, threatening to take his life by hanging him, or putting him in the Missouri river, if he did not comply with the demand; that the club had posted handbills calling the members together to take action against him; and that knowing all this, and in great fear of his life, he did, on the 10th of August, 1857, convey the land by deed to Pierce; that he, Brown, received no consideration whatever for the conveyance; that from the date of his settlement upon said land, until the time of filing the bill, he had continued to keep possession either actually or constructively; that Morton claimed an interest in the premises by virtue of a judgment lien, and that Weston also made some claim.

The prayer was, that the deed might be declared void, and Pierce be decreed to reconvey, and for general relief.

The bill was taken pro confesso as to all the defendants, except Morton, who answered.

This answer, stating that he, Morton, was not a resident of the territory, and had no knowledge or information about the facts alleged in the bill, but on the contrary was an utter stranger to them, and therefore could not answer as to any belief concerning them,—set forth that on the 28th August, 1857, Pierce was “the owner and in possession of, and otherwise well seized and entitled to, as of a good and indefeasible estate of inheritance in fee simple,” the tract in controversy; that being so, and representing himself to be so, and having need of money in business, he applied to him, Morton, to borrow the same, and that he, Morton, being induced by reason of the representation, and also by the possession, and believing that he, Pierce, was the owner, he was thereby induced to lend, and did lend to him $6,000, on the personal security of him, Pierce; that before the filing of this bill by Brown, he, Morton, had obtained judgment against Pierce for $3,400, part of the loan yet unpaid; that this judgment was a lien on the lands; and that as he, Morton, was informed and believed, if he could not obtain his money from this land, he would be wholly defrauded out of it.

The answer further stated that the defendant was informed and believed that Brown, the complainant, entered upon the lands as the tenant of Pierce, and that the suit by the complainant was being prosecuted in violation of the just rights of Pierce, as well as of him, Morton.

There was no replication. Proofs were taken by the complainant, and they showed to the entire satisfaction of the court that all the matters alleged in the bill and not denied by the answers, were true. See 7 Wall. 213. There thus seemed no doubt as to the truth of all the facts set out in the bill.

The court below declared Brown's deed void, and decreed a reconveyance from Pierce to him, and that neither Morton nor Weston had any lien on the premises. Morton now brought the case here for review.

Carlisle & Woolworth, for appellant. Redick & Briggs, contra.

Mr. Justice CLIFFORD delivered the opinion of the court.

Representations of the complainant were, that on the tenth of August, 1857, he acquired a complete title to the premises described in the bill of complaint, under the pre-emption laws of the United States, and that thereafter, on the same day, he was compelled, through threats of personal violence and fear of his life, to convey the same, without any consideration, to the principal respondent. Framed on that theory, the bill of complaint alleged that the first-named respondent was at that time a member of an unlawful association in that territory, called the Omaha Claim Club, and that he, accompanied by three or four other persons belonging to that association, came to his house a few days before he perfected his right of pre-emption to the land in question, and told the complainant that if he entered the land under his pre-emption claim, he must agree to deed the same to him, and added, that unless he did so, he, the said respondent and his associates, would take his life; and the complainant further alleged, that the same respondent, accompanied, as before, by certain other members of that association, came again to his house on the day he perfected his pre-emption claim, and repeated those threats of personal violence, and did other acts to intimidate him, and induce him to believe that they would carry out their threats if he refused to execute the deed as required.

Based upon those allegations, the charge is that the complainant was put in duress by those threats and acts of intimidation, and that he signed and executed the deed, and conveyed the land by means of those threats and certain acts of intimidation, and through fear of his life, and without any consideration; and he prayed the court that the conveyance might be decreed to be inoperative and void, and that the grantee might be required to reconvey the same to the complainant.

Two other persons were made respondents, as claiming some interest in the land in controversy. Pierce, the principal respondent, and Weston, one of the other respondents, were non-residents, and were served by publication pursuant to the rules of the court and the law of the jurisdiction. They never appeared, and failing to plead, answer, or demur, and due proof of publication in the manner prescribed by law having been filed in court, a decree was rendered as to them, that the bill of complaint be taken as confessed. Nations v. Johnson, 24 How. 201.

Morton, the other respondent, appeared and filed an answer, in which he alleged that the principal respondent, on the twenty-eighth of August, 1857, and for a long time before, was the owner in fee of the premises; that he was informed, and believed, that the complainant entered upon the land as the tenant of the principal respondent, and that he was prosecuting this suit in violation of the just rights of all the respondents; that the principal respondent wanting to borrow money, he, the respondent before the court, loaned him a large sum, and accepted bills of exchange for the payment of the same, drawn to the order of the borrower of the money, and which were indorsed by the drawer; that the bills of exchange not having been paid when they became due, he brought suit against the drawer and indorser, and recovered judgment against him for three thousand one hundred dollars; that the judgment so recovered is in full force and unsatisfied, and that the same is a lien on the premises described in the bill of complaint.

No answer, from any knowledge possessed by the respondent, is made to the allegation that the complainant acquired a complete title to the land under the pre-emption laws of the United States, nor to the charge contained in the bill of complaint, that the deed was procured by threats of personal violence amounting to actual duress. On the contrary, the answer alleged that the respondent before the court was an utter stranger to all those matters and things, and that he could not answer concerning the same, because he had no information or belief upon the subject.

Authorities are not wanting to the effect, that all matters well alleged in the bill of complaint, which the answer neither denies nor avoids, are admitted; but the better opinion is the other way, as the sixty-first rule adopted by this court provides that if no exception thereto shall be filed within the period therein prescribed, the answer shall be deemed and taken to be sufficient. Young v. Grundy, 6 Cranch, 51; Brooks v. Byam, 1 Story, 297, Fed. Cas. No. 1,947.

Material allegations in the bill of complaint ought to be answered and admitted, or denied, if the facts are within the knowledge of the respondent; and if not, he ought to state what his belief is upon the subject, if he has any, and if he has none, and cannot form any, he ought to say so, and call on the complainant for proof of the alleged facts, or waive that branch of the controversy; but the clear weight of authority is, that a mere statement by the respondent in his answer, as in this case, that he has no knowledge that the fact is as stated, without any answer as to his belief concerning it, is not such an admission as is to be received as full evidence of the fact. Warfield v. Gambrill, 1 Gill & J. 503.

Such an answer does not make it necessary for the complainant to introduce more than one witness to overcome the defence, and the well-known omissions and defects of such an answer may have some tendency to prove the allegations of the bill of complaint, but they are not such an admission of the same as will constitute a sufficient foundation for a decree upon the merits. Young v. Grundy, 6 Cranch, 51; Parkman v. Welch, 19 Pick. 234.

Proper remedy for a complainant, in such a case, is to except to the answer for insufficiency within the period prescribed by the sixty-first rule; but if he does not avail himself of that right, the answer is deemed sufficient to prevent the bill from being taken pro confesso, as it may be if no answer is filed. Hardeman v. Harris, 7 How. 726; Stockton v. Ford, 11 How. 232; 1 Daniell, Ch. Prac. 736; Langdon v. Goddard, 3 Story, 13, Fed. Cas. No. 8,061.

Attention is called to the fact, that no replication was filed to the answer; but the suggestion comes too late, as the respondent proceeded to final hearing in the court below without interposing any such objection.

Mere formal defects in the proceedings, not objected to in the court of original jurisdiction, cannot be assigned in an appellate tribunal as error to reverse either a judgment at law or decree in equity.

Legal effect of a replication is, that it puts in issue all the matters well alleged in the answer, and the rule is, that if none be filed, the answer will be taken as true, and no evidence can be given by the complainant to contradict anything which is therein well alleged. 1 Barb. Ch. Prac. 249; Mills v. Pitman, 1 Paige, Ch. 490; Peirce v. West, 1 Pet. C. C. 351, Fed. Cas. No. 10,909; Story, Eq. Pl. 878; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 329.

Undenied as the answer is by any replication, it must have its fair scope as an admission; but the court is not authorized to supply anything not expressed in it, beyond what is reasonably implied from the language employed. Proofs were taken by the complainant, and they show, to the entire satisfaction of the court, that all the matters alleged in the bill of complaint, and not denied in the answer, are true, and the conclusion of the court below was, that the complainant acquired a complete title to the land under his pre-emption claim, and that the deed from him to the principal respondent was procured in the manner and by the means alleged in the bill of complaint.

Nothing is exhibited in the record to support any different conclusion, or to warrant any different decree, unless it be found in one or the other of the first two defences set up in the answer.

First defence is, that the principal respondent, on the twenty-eighth of August, 1857, and long before that time, was the owner in fee of the premises; but neither that part of the answer, nor any other, denied that the complainant acquired a complete title to the land, as alleged in the bill of complaint, nor set up any defence in avoidance of those allegations, nor made any attempt to present any defence against the direct charge, that the deed under which the respondent claimed title was procured from the complainant through threats of personal violence and by means of duress. Indefinite as the allegation of title is, the answer must be construed as referring to the title under the deed in controversy, as it is not pretended that the respondent ever had any other, and, if viewed in that light, it is in no respect inconsistent with the conclusion adopted by the supreme court of the territory.

Such an indefinite allegation cannot be considered as presenting any sufficient answer, either to the alleged title of the complainant or to the charge made in the bill of complaint.

Briefly stated, the second defence set up in the answer is, that the respondent was informed and believed that the complainant entered upon the land as a tenant, but the time when the supposed entry was made is not alleged, nor are the circumstances attending the entry set forth, nor is any reason assigned why the allegations were not made more definite, nor is there any fact or circumstance alleged which shows or tends to show that there was any prior owner to the land, except the United States, nor that the respondent ever pretended to have any other title to the same than that derived from the complainant.

Viewed in any light, those allegations must be regarded as evasive and insufficient; and they are not helped by the omission of the complainant to file the general replication. Those parts of the answer being laid out of the case as insufficient to constitute a defence, the conclusion is inevitable that the title to the land was in the complainant as alleged, and that he parted with it through threats of personal violence and by duress, and without any consideration.

Argument to show that a deed or other written obligation or contract, procured by means of duress, is inoperative and void, is hardly required, as the proposition is not denied by the respondent. Actual violence is not necessary to constitute duress, even at common law, as understood in the parent country, because consent is the very essence of a contract, and, if there be compulsion, there is no actual consent, and moral compulsion, such as that produced by threats to take life or to inflict great bodily harm, as well as that produced by imprisonment, is everywhere regarded as sufficient, in law, to destroy free agency, without which there can be no contract, because, in that state of the case, there is no consent.

Duress, in its more extended sense, means that degree of constraint or danger, either actually inflicted or threatened and impending, which is sufficient, in severity or in apprehension, to overcome the mind and will of a person of ordinary firmness. Chit. Cont. 217; 2 Greenl. Ev. 283.

Text-writers usually divide the subject into two classes, namely, duress per minas and duress of imprisonment, and that classification was uniformly adopted in the early history of the common law, and is generally preserved in the decisions of the English courts to the present time. 2 Inst. 482; 2 Rolle, Abr. 124.

Where there is an arrest for an improper purpose, without just cause, or where there is an arrest for a just cause, but without lawful authority, or for a just cause, but for an unlawful purpose, even though under proper process, it may be construed as duress of imprisonment; and if the person arrested execute a contract or pay money for his release, he may avoid the contract as one procured by duress, or may recover back the money in an action for money had and received. Richardson v. Duncan, 3 N. H. 508; Watkins v. Baird, 6 Mass. 511; Strong v. Grannis, 26 Barb. 124.

Second class, duress per minas, as defined at common law, is where the party enters into a contract (1) for fear of loss of life; (2) for fear of loss of limb; (3) for fear of mayhem; (4) for fear of imprisonment; and many modern decisions of the courts of that country still restrict the operations of the rule within those limits. 3 Bac. Abr. tit. "Duress," 252.

They deny that contracts procured by menace of a mere battery to the person, or of trespass to lands, or loss of goods, can be avoided on that account, and the reason assigned for this qualification of the rule is, that such threats are held not to be of a nature to overcome the mind and will of a firm and prudent man, because it is said that if such an injury is inflicted, sufficient and adequate redress may be obtained in a suit at law.

Cases to the same effect may be found also in the reports of decisions in this country, and some of our text-writers have adopted the rule, that it is only where the threats uttered excite fear of death, or of great bodily harm, or unlawful imprisonment, that a contract, so procured, can be avoided, because, as such courts and authors say, the person threatened with slight injury to the person, or with loss of property, ought to have sufficient resolution to resist such a threat, and to rely upon the law for his remedy. Skeate v. Beale, 11 Adol. & E. 983; Atlee v. Backhouse, 3 Mees. & W. 642; Smith v. Monteith, 13 Mees. & W. 438; Shep. Touch. 6; 1 Pars. Cont. 393.

On the other hand, there are many American decisions, of high authority, which adopt a more liberal rule, and hold that contracts procured by threats of battery to the person, or the destruction of property, may be avoided on the ground of duress, because in such a case there is nothing but the form of a contract, without the substance. Foshay v. Ferguson, 5 Hill, 158; Bank v. Copeland, 18 Md. 317; Eadie v. Slimmon, 26 N. Y. 12; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (9th Ed.) 239; Harmony v. Bingham, 12 N. Y. 99; Id., 1 Duer, 229; Fleetwood v. New York, 2 Sandf. 475; Tutt v. Ide, 3 Blatchf. 250; Astley v. Reynolds, 2 Strange, 915; Brown v. Peck, 2 Wis. 277; Oates v. Hudson, 5 Eng. Law & Eq. 469.

But the case under consideration presents no question for decision which requires the court to determine which class of those cases is correct, as they all agree in the rule that a contract procured through fear of loss of life, produced by the threats of the other party to the contract, wants the essential element of consent, and that it may be avoided for duress, which is sufficient to dispose of the present controversy. 2 Greenl. Ev. 283; 1 Bl. Comm. 131.

Next question which arises in the case is, whether the judgment set up by the appellant creates a superior equity in his favor over that alleged and proved by the appellee.

Before proceeding to examine this question, it will be useful to advert briefly to the material facts exhibited in the record.

Title was acquired by the complainant under the pre-emption laws of the United States, and on the same day the principal respondent, through threats to take his life, if he refused, compelled him to convey the same to that respondent, and the record shows that the respondent before the court, within the same month, loaned the money to the grantee in that deed, for which he recovered judgment, although the grantor was then in possession of the land, and has remained in possession of the same to the present time.

The judgment is founded upon the bills of exchange received for that loan. Judgments were not liens at common law, but several of the states had passed laws to that effect before the judicial system of the United States was organized, and the decisions of this court have established the doctrine that congress, in adopting the processes of the states, also adopted the modes of process prevailing at that date in the courts of the several states, in respect to the lien of judgments within the limits of their respective jurisdictions. Williams v. Benedict, 8 How. 111; Ward v. Chamberlain, 2 Black, 438; Bayard v. Lombard, 9 How. 530; Riggs v. Johnson Co., 6 Wall. 166.

Different regulations, however, prevailed in different states, and in some neither a judgment nor a decree for the payment of money, except in cases of attachment or mesne process, created any preference in favor of the creditor until the execution was issued, and had been levied on the land. Where the lien is recognized, it confers a right to levy on the land to the exclusion of other adverse interests acquired subsequently to the judgment; but the lien constitutes no property or right in the land itself. Conard v. Insurance Co., 1 Pet. 443; Massingill v. Downs, 7 How. 767.

Such judgments and decrees were made liens by the process acts in the federal districts where they have that effect under the state laws, and congress has since provided that they shall cease to have that operation in the same manner, and at the same periods, in the respective federal districts, as like processes do when issued from the state courts. Federal judgments and decrees are liens, therefore, in all cases, and to the same extent, as similar judgments and decrees are, when rendered in the courts of the state.

Express decision of this court is, that the lien of a judgment constitutes no property in the land, that it is merely a general lien securing a preference over subsequently acquired interests in the property, but the settled rule in chancery is, that a general lien is controlled in such courts so as to protect the rights of those who were previously entitled to an equitable interest in the lands, or in the proceeds thereof.

Specific liens stand upon a different footing, but it is well settled that a judgment creates only a general lien, and that the judgment creditor acquires thereby no higher or better right to the property or assets of the debtor, than the debtor himself had when the judgment was rendered, unless he can show some fraud or collusion to impair his rights. Drake, Attach. § 223.

Correct statement of the rule is, that the lien of a judgment creates a preference over subsequently acquired rights, but in equity it does not attach to the mere legal title to the land, as existing in the defendant at its rendition, to the exclusion of a prior equitable title in a third person. In re Howe, 1 Paige, Ch. 128; Ells v. Tousley, Id. 283; White v. Carpenter, 2 Paige, 219; Buchan v. Sumner, 2 Barb. Ch. 181; Lounsbury v. Purdy, 11 Barb. 494; Keirsted v. Avery, 4 Paige, Ch. 15.

Guided by these considerations, the court of chancery will protect the equitable rights of third persons against the legal lien, and will limit that lien to the actual interest which the judgment debtor had in the estate at the time the judgment was rendered. Averill v. Loucks, 6 Barb. 27.

Objection is also made, that the affidavit showing that the defendants were non-residents, was not in due form, and that the order of notice, and the publication of the same, were insufficient to give the court jurisdiction; but the proposition is not supported by the record, and must be overruled.

Decree affirmed.

FRANCIS et al. v. WILKINSON et al.

(35 N. E. 150, 147 Ill. 370.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Oct. 26, 1893.

Appeal from circuit court, Stark county; T. M. Shaw, Judge.

Bill by Charity Francis and others against Sylvester Wilkinson and others. From a decree dismissing the bill, complainants appeal. Affirmed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by MAGRUDER, J.:

This is a bill filed on the 2d day of September, A. D. 1886, by Charity Francis, of Kansas, Rachel Curfman, of Kansas, and Nancy Cox, of Stark county, Ill., daughters of Solomon Wilkinson, deceased, formerly of Stark county, Ill., against Sylvester Wilkinson, Alonzo Wilkinson, and Newton Wilkinson, of said county of Stark, sons of said Solomon Wilkinson, deceased, and Frances Leffler, of said county, also a daughter of said Solomon, and John Leffler, of said county, a son of said Frances Leffler, and grandson of said Solomon, to set aside certain deeds executed to the defendants by the said Solomon in his lifetime, and for partition of the lands described in said deeds among the said children of the said Solomon. Answers were filed by said defendants denying the material allegations of the bill. Since the beginning of the suit Rachel Curfman, Frances Leffler, and John Leffler have died, and their representatives have been made parties. After hearing had upon testimony oral and documentary, and upon evidence submitted in the form of depositions, the circuit court dismissed the bill for want of equity, and the present appeal is prosecuted from said decree of dismissal.

Solomon Wilkinson came from Ohio to Stark county, Ill., in 1849, being at that time about 50 years old. He brought some money with him, and at once purchased a farm of 200 acres, on which he lived until his death. He died on April 2, 1885, leaving seven children, the four daughters and three sons above named, to wit, Rachel, Charity, Nancy, Frances, Sylvester, Alonzo, and Newton. His wife died in the spring of 1871. The oldest daughter, Frances, married in 1850, but her husband died in about six weeks, leaving one child, John Leffler. She never left her father, but kept house for him, and managed the household affairs after her mother's death; and she and her son John, who became of age in 1872, lived with the old man on the home place until his death. Charity married in 1853, Rachel in 1856, and Nancy in 1857 or 1858, each leaving home at the date of her marriage. It is in evidence that the last three daughters assisted in the work of the farm up to the dates of their respective marriages. Sylvester became of age in 1863, Alonzo in 1865, and Newton in 1868. The three sons remained on the home farm, Alonzo until his marriage in 1875, Sylvester until his marriage in 1876, and Newton until his marriage in 1881. Up to the latter date and longer they and John Leffler "worked" the home farm and adjoining farms purchased by their father. The deeds sought to be set aside are the following: A deed of 160 acres, executed on January 5, 1869, by Robert B. McChance to Sylvester Wilkinson; a deed of 80 acres, executed on February 16, 1870, by James A. McChance and his wife to Alonzo Wilkinson; four deeds executed by Solomon Wilkinson, all dated May 27, 1873,—one of 133 acres to Sylvester Wilkinson, one of 187 acres to Newton Wilkinson, one of 111 acres to John Leffler, and one of 169 acres to Frances Leffler; a deed dated May 27, 1873, executed by said Sylvester to said Alonzo, conveying one-half of the 160 acres conveyed to Sylvester by Robert B. McChance; a deed of 160 acres, dated October 21, 1874, executed by Davis Lowman and wife and Daniel Burge and wife to said Sylvester, Alonzo, Newton, and John. The first two deeds were recorded on the respective dates of their execution. The five deeds executed on May 27, 1873, were recorded on July 28, 1876. By the above deeds there were conveyed to Sylvester 253 acres, to Alonzo 200 acres, to Newton 227 acres, to John Leffler 151 acres, to Frances Leffler 169 acres, making 1,000 acres in all. The evidence showed that the sons participated in the profits and produce realized from the business of the farms, and received their respective shares of such business up to 1873, or perhaps 1881.

Miles A. Fuller and Frank A. Kerns, for appellants. C. C. Wilson and Frank Thomas, for appellees.

MAGRUDER, J., (after stating the facts.) The grounds upon which the bill seeks to set aside the deeds are: First, want of mental capacity; second, the exercise of undue influence. The three daughters of Solomon Wilkinson who filed the bill do not claim that he showed any want of mental capacity until after the death of his wife, in the spring of 1871. He was not able to read or write, but there is no testimony on either side that he was not a vigorous man, both mentally and physically, prior to 1871. Hence the deed of 160 acres, executed in January, 1869, to his son Sylvester Wilkinson, by Robert B. McChance, and the deed executed in February, 1870, to his son Alonzo Wilkinson, by James A. McChance, cannot be invalidated because of any want of mental capacity. Nor are we able to discover that the execution of those deeds was procured by any kind of fraud, deceit, or undue influence. The two tracts were purchased by Solomon Wilkinson, but the proof shows that he knew of and consented to the conveyances of them to his sons Sylvester and Alonzo, who had remained with him after reaching the age of majority, and had assisted him, the one for six and the other for five years, in his business of farming and stock raising. Ordinarily, where a purchase of real property is made by a father in the name of his legitimate child, no trust results in favor of the father, but the transaction is presumed to be a gift for the benefit of the child. 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1039. Undue influence will not be inferred from the relation of parent and child where the gift is from the parent to the child, unless the former at the time of the gift is under the control and dominion of the latter. Oliphant v. Leversidge, 30 N. E. Rep. 334, 142 Ill. 160; Burt v. Quisenberry, 132 Ill. 399, 24 N. E. Rep. 622. J. H. Cox, the husband of one of the complainants, says that the deceased directed the deed of the 160 acres to be made in 1869 to Sylvester, because he had then concluded to give each of his children 160 acres of land. If such was his intention at the time, he did not subsequently carry it out as to the complainants. The fact that a grantor, many years before making a final distribution of his property by the execution of deeds, expressed an intention to divide it equally among his children, affords no evidence of undue influence, or mental incapacity, where a different disposition of his property is made. Rutherford v. Morris, 77 Ill. 397. The labor of the sons for their father during a number of years constituted some consideration for the conveyances which were made to them by his vendors at his direction. Where a father disposes of property by way of advancement or distribution to his children during his life, instead of disposing of it by will, courts will not be as rigid in considering the adequacy of the consideration paid as if the transaction was with strangers. Clearwater v. Kimler, 43 Ill. 272. The deceased had the legal right to dispose of the two tracts in question as he pleased, and, if he saw proper to make his two sons the recipients of his bounty, the other children have no cause of complaint. Id.

But the main contention between the parties is as to the deeds executed by the deceased on May 27, 1873, thereby dividing 600 acres among his sons, his grandson, and his daughter Mrs. Leffler. It is first insisted that these deeds were invalid for an alleged want of mental capacity in Solomon Wilkinson to make them. We have frequently decided that a man has sufficient mental capacity to dispose of his property by will or deed if he is capable of transacting ordinary business, and of acting rationally in the ordinary affairs of life. Buying and selling property, settling accounts, collecting and paying out money, or borrowing or loaning money, have been mentioned as instances of what is meant by the transaction of the ordinary affairs of business. Meeker v. Meeker, 75 Ill. 260; Brown v. Riggin, 94 Ill. 560; Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. Rep. 267; Freeman v. Easley, 117 Ill. 317, 7 N. E. Rep. 656; Perry v. Pearson, 135 Ill. 218, 25 N. E. Rep. 636. The burden is upon the complainant who seeks to set aside an executed deed for want of mental capacity or for the exercise of undue influence to prove the allegations of his bill by a preponderance of the evidence. English v. Porter, 109 Ill. 285.

We do not think that there is in this case a preponderance of the evidence in favor of a want of mental capacity. In 1873, Solomon Wilkinson was about 72 or 73 years old. Witnesses for complainants swear that, after the death of his wife in the spring of 1871, he showed signs of feebleness, was much affected by the loss of his wife, was not as clear and active in his mind as he had been, was complaining and despondent, would sometimes shed tears in talking of his wife, showed the infirmities of age, complained of not being able to attend to his business as he had done, etc. Some of these witnesses give it as their opinion, based upon their conversations with him, that he was not competent to do business in 1873. On the contrary, an equal number of witnesses testifying for the defendants say that they saw no particular change in him after 1871, except such as was incident to advancing age; that they saw no difference in his business capacity; that he seemed to know as much as he ever did; that, although he fretted about his wife, "his mind was all right;" that "he was a very smart old man." One of the physicians who attended upon him for eight or ten years before his death and in his last sickness says that he would sit by his fireside and talk with him about the common topics of the day, and that he noticed no failing except what old age would account for. Another doctor, who was called in as consulting physician during his last illness, and had known him and his wife for 30 years, says that he was low-spirited after her death, but with that exception he noticed no difference in his mind. All the witnesses on both sides agree that he was a strong man physically, and before 1871 was an unusually competent man as a farmer and stock dealer. Particular instances are mentioned where he transacted business after 1873. In 1876 or 1877 he went to Peoria, 25 miles from his home, and paid a judgment of about $1,800 which had been obtained against himself and his son-in-law, Cox, upon a note signed by him as security for Cox; and the owner of the judgment states that at that time his mental condition was good, "his mind was as strong and reasonable as anybody's," and "he was capable of attending to any other business." In 1884, the year before his death, at the age of 83 or 84, he went to the office of a lumber merchant in Wyoming, distant about two miles and a half from his house, and directed an answer to be written to a letter about a pension claim, which he had received from the commissioner of pensions, dictating the replies to be made to the questions in the letter, listening to each answer when it was read to him, and approving of it as being what he wanted. In 1878 he sold a horse, making the trade himself, and the party buying the horse from him says that "his mind was all right," and that he was giving directions about the work on the farm. A merchant in Wyoming swears that he sold him hardware in 1876 and 1878, to be used on the farm, and that his mind was sound, and he was able to transact ordinary business. Another merchant swears that the old man did business with him at his store from 1873 to 1881, and paid the accounts from 1873 to 1876, and understood the nature of the business he was transacting, and that there was no impairment of his mind.

The grantor at the time of making the deed must know and comprehend the transaction in which he is engaged; or, in other words, the mental capacity to be considered is that which exists at the time of the execution of the deed. 1 Redf. Wills, p. 124; Campbell v. Campbell, 130 Ill. 466, 22 N. E. Rep. 620. The notary who wrote the deeds made on May 27, 1873, and before whom they were acknowledged, swears that Solomon Wilkinson came to his office in Wyoming on that day, in pursuance of a previous appointment; that he had his title papers with him, arranged and classified, so as to enable him to know what piece of land he wanted to convey to each grantee; that there was no one present while he was writing the deeds, although his son Sylvester may have come into the office with him; that the old man seemed to understand just what he wanted; that he said he was going to divide a portion of his property; that he would hand over one package of title deeds and then another, and direct how the property described in each should be conveyed; that the conveyances written on that day were read over to him after they were drawn up, and were signed by him by his mark; that he was not especially feeble, except so far as there was feebleness incident to declining years; that his hands were trembling, and tears came into his eyes, and he said he had reached that age when he did not feel able or competent to attend to his business; that he said he intended to provide for his other children in some other manner. While the evidence shows that on May 27, 1873, the deceased was somewhat infirm by reason of old age, and that he was conscious of not possessing as much vigor as would enable him to manage his large farms, and attend to the raising of stock thereon, with the efficiency of former years, yet we think that he was mentally capable of executing the deeds signed by him, and of making the division of property consummated by him on that day. Old age and loss of memory do not necessarily and of themselves indicate a want of capacity to make a conveyance. Burt v. Quisenberry, 132 Ill. 399, 24 N. E. Rep. 622; Pooler v. Cristman, (Ill. Sup.) 34 N. E. Rep. 57. There was here no such mental weakness as will justify a court of equity in setting aside the deeds, inasmuch as the grantor was not thereby rendered incapable of understanding and protecting his own interests. A deed will be permitted to stand notwithstanding the fact that the intellectual powers have been somewhat impaired by age, if it appears that the grantor retained a full comprehension of the meaning, design, and effect of his acts. Perry v. Pearson, supra.

It is next insisted that these deeds were obtained by the undue influence of the grantees therein over Solomon Wilkinson, and that for that reason they ought to be set aside. Undue influence which will justify the setting aside of an executed deed must have been of such a nature as to deprive the grantor of his free agency, and thus to render his act more the offspring of the will of another than of his own will. Rutherford v. Morris, 77 Ill. 397; Burt v. Quisenberry, supra. Some of the witnesses for the complainants testify that after the death of his wife in 1871, Solomon Wilkinson left the management of his business more to his sons than he had formerly done, while witnesses for the defendants say that he seemed to exercise no less control after that date than before. The sons themselves swear that each of them was given an interest in the proceeds and earnings of the farm after he became of age, on condition of his remaining at home and assisting his father. But, even if it be true that the father gave his sons greater control over his business affairs after 1871 than they had previously had, that fact alone does not establish such a dependence upon them that he could not freely exercise his own will in reference to the disposition of his property. There was money in the bank, which he had a right to draw when he pleased. He came and went as he saw fit. Burt v. Quisenberry, supra. Where the natural position of parent and child is so changed that the former becomes subject to the dominion of the latter, and where their situation is such that the child has a controlling influence over the will and conduct and interests of the parent, equity will interpose its jurisdiction to set aside instruments executed between them, and, under such circumstances, gifts from parents to children will be set aside, unless most satisfactory evidence is produced that they were not obtained by undue influence. Burt v. Quisenberry, supra; Harvey v. Sullens, 46 Mo. 147; Brice v. Brice, 5 Barb. 533. But the fraud or undue influence which will render a will or deed invalid must be connected with the execution of the instrument, and operating when it is made; Pooler v. Cristman, (Ill. Sup.) 34 N. E. Rep. 57; Guild v. Hull, 127 Ill. 523, 20 N. E. Rep. 665; and although a father may act under the advice of his son in his ordinary affairs, and may be influenced by that advice, yet such relation and influence do not tend to prove the exercise of undue influence in the execution of a conveyance by the former to the latter, (Brownfield v. Brownfield, 43 Ill. 148; Rutherford v. Morris, supra.) We discover nothing in the testimony in this case to indicate that the deceased was under any such control as that he was not able at all times to act freely and according to his own judgment. The circumstances already detailed in regard to the transaction of May 27, 1873, show that the execution of the deeds made by the deceased on that day was his own act, and not the offspring of another's will. He made no conveyance to Alonzo, but, in addition to the 80 acres conveyed to the latter in 1870, his brother Sylvester deeded to him 80 of the 160 acres which he obtained the title to in 1869. The notary testifies that Sylvester thus conveyed the 80 acres to his brother Alonzo at the request of their father, and that such conveyance was referred to by the father as a part of his arrangement for the division of his property. The same considerations already presented apply to the deed made by Lowman and Burge to the sons and grandson in 1874. Burge swears that he made the deed to the sons and grandson while they and Solomon were present; that Solomon gave his notes for a part of the purchase money, and that his mind was perfectly sound. This conveyance was a consummation of the division made in 1873, and, while it does not appear when the notes were paid, yet the evidence shows that the land was paid for out of the proceeds of the farm, as earned by the labors of the grantees in the deeds. The father may have been influenced by affection for the three sons and grandson who remained with him and aided him in managing his farms, and for the widowed daughter, who stayed at his home, and kept house for him, and managed his household affairs. "But influence secured through affection is not wrongful, and therefore, although a deed be made to a child at his solicitation, and because of partiality induced by affection for him, it will not be undue influence" if it is not such as to deprive the grantor of his free agency. Burt v. Quisenberry, supra.

The testimony shows that the complainants and their husbands received from their father from time to time about $2,000 apiece, paid in land and money and in the discharge of security debts. They had married many years before their father's death, and had left home, and reared families, and acquired property of their own. The husband of one of the complainants was a witness to the execution of the deeds made on May 27, 1873. They knew of those deeds soon after their execution, and two of them received money from their father a short time thereafter. The fact that they did not receive as much as the defendants is no ground for invalidating the deeds to the latter. Inequality in the distribution of the property is not of itself conclusive evidence of undue influence, although it may be considered as a circumstance tending to establish undue influence. The grantor or testator may give one child more than another without invalidating the conveyance or will. Salisbury v. Aldrich, 118 Ill. 199, 8 N. E. Rep. 777; Schneider v. Manning, 121 Ill. 376, 12 N. E. Rep. 267; Burt v. Quisenberry, supra; Pooler v. Cristman, supra.

Nearly all the testimony introduced by the complainants in this case for the purpose of showing the exercise of undue influence consists of proof of declarations made by Solomon Wilkinson after his execution of the deeds herein attacked. Those declarations were to the effect—First, that he had been persuaded by his sons; second, that he put the title out of himself in order to keep the property from being lost through suits brought against him on account of his signing notes for his son-in-law, Cox. But it is well settled that the declaration of a grantor when the grantee is not present cannot be admitted for the purpose of invalidating the deed. Parties making deeds or wills cannot invalidate them by their own parol declarations, made previously or subsequently. Dickie v. Carter, 42 Ill. 376; Bennett v. Stout, 98 Ill. 47; Bentley v. O'Bryan, 111 Ill. 53; Guild v. Hull, 127 Ill. 523, 20 N. E. Rep. 665; Burt v. Quisenberry, supra.

There was also some evidence of declarations made by one or more of the sons of Solomon Wilkinson, to the effect that he made the conveyances to them in order to keep the property from being swept away by the debts incurred as security for Cox. If such declarations made by the father and sons were properly admissible, the fraud upon creditors which they tended to show could in no way operate to the benefit of these complainants, who sue as heirs of the fraudulent grantor. The general rule is that voluntary conveyances, although void as to creditors, are valid as to the parties, and cannot be set aside by the grantor or his heirs. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 371; Miller v. Marckle, 21 Ill. 152; Harmon v. Harmon, 63 Ill. 512; Rawson v. Fox, 65 Ill. 200; Campbell v. Whitson, 68 Ill. 240; McElroy v. Hiner, 133 Ill. 156, 24 N. E. Rep. 435. The decree of the circuit court is affirmed.

ROSS v. CONWAY et al. (No. 13,341.)

(28 Pac. 785, 92 Cal. 632.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan. 6, 1892.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

Suit by James E. Ross against John M. Conway et al. to annul, on the ground of undue influence, a trust-deed made by his mother, Elizabeth G. Ross, for the benefit of defendants. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

George D. Collins and George A. Johnson, (D. M. Delmas, of counsel,) for appellants. John A. Wright, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff, as the sole heir of his mother, Elizabeth G. Ross, brought this action to cancel and annul two certain deeds of trust conveying certain real estate in Santa Rosa, executed by his mother, August 11, 1888, and August 18, 1888, respectively, alleging that at the time of their execution his mother was weak in body, and that her mind was impaired, and that the defendant Conway, who was the pastor of the Roman Catholic church of Santa Rosa, of which she had been for many years a member, and who was also her spiritual adviser, had thereby acquired great influence over her, and, taking advantage of such influence and of her mental weakness, had caused her to execute the said deeds of trust for the benefit of himself and of the church of which he was the pastor. The defendants denied these allegations, and the cause was tried by the court, a jury having been called in as advisory to the court upon certain issues. The verdict of the jury and the findings of the court were in support of the allegations of the complaint, and judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff. A motion for a new trial having been made and denied, an appeal has been taken from both the judgment and the order denying a new trial.

The two deeds of trust are substantially the same, the last one having been executed merely for the purpose of correcting an erroneous description in the first. Under the trust created by the deeds the trustees are directed to sell one of the parcels of land "as soon as practicable," and out of the proceeds thereof apply $8,000 in the improvement of the other parcel, and pay the remainder of the proceeds to the defendant Conway. Out of the income to be derived from the parcel to be improved, $75 per month was to be paid to the plaintiff, and the remainder monthly "to the pastor of the Roman Catholic church in Santa Rosa, to be disbursed by him in such manner as he may deem charitable." Other provisions contingent upon the death or change in circumstances of the plaintiff are unnecessary to be repeated here. The issues before the court were, in substance, whether Mrs. Ross was, at the respective dates on which the deeds of trust were executed, of weak mind, or able to comprehend the provisions of the instruments; and whether the defendant Conway used the influence which he had acquired over her, by virtue of being her spiritual adviser, for the purpose of procuring her to make such disposition of her property. Upon these issues there was much conflicting evidence before the court, both in the testimony of the witnesses who were examined, as well as in the circumstances under which the instruments were executed, and the purposes held by Mrs. Ross with reference to her son and to the church. Upon the evidence before it the court found in favor of the plaintiff. This finding was in accordance with the verdict of the jury, and upon a motion for a new trial, in which the evidence was again brought before the court for consideration, it adhered to its former conclusion. Under these circumstances we cannot disregard its finding. Inasmuch, however, as counsel have elaborately argued the facts, we have examined the record, and are of the opinion that the evidence fully justifies the findings of the court.

The court finds that at the dates of the execution of the deeds of trust Mrs. Ross was of weak mind, and in a dying condition, and that she died on the 20th of August; that the defendant Conway was, and had for a long time previously been, the pastor of the Roman Catholic church at Santa Rosa, and the spiritual adviser of Mrs. Ross; that a confidence was reposed in him by her, and that there existed on his part an influence and apparent authority over her arising out of his relation to her as her spiritual adviser, and that he took an unfair advantage of this influence, and used this confidence and authority for the purpose of procuring her to execute the two deeds of trust. The court also finds that Mrs. Ross had in December, 1887, executed a will of all her estate, with the exception of some minor legacies, in favor of the plaintiff herein, and that the provision in the deeds of trust for the defendants, other than the defendant Conway, were without any consideration from them, but were made solely through the influence of Conway.

The rule is inflexible that no one who holds a confidential relation towards another shall take advantage of that relation in favor of himself, or deal with the other upon terms of his own making; that in every such transaction between persons standing in that relation the law will presume that he who held an influence over the other exercised it unduly to his own advantage; or, in the words of Lord LANGDALE in Casborne v. Barsham, 2 Beav. 78, the inequality between the transacting parties is so great "that, without proof of the exercise of power beyond that which may be inferred from the nature of the transaction itself, this court will impute an exercise of undue influence;" that the transaction will not be upheld unless it shall be shown that such other had independent advice, and that his act was not only the result of his own volition, but that he both understood the act he was doing and comprehended its result and effect. This rule finds its application with peculiar force in a case where the effect of the transaction is to divert an estate from those who, by the ties of nature, would be its natural recipients, to the person through whose influence the diversion is made, whether such diversion be for his own personal advantage, or for the advantage of some interest of which he is the representative. It has been more frequently applied to transactions between attorney and client or guardian and ward than to any other relation between the parties, but the rule itself has its source in principles which underlie and govern all confidential relations, and is to be applied to all transactions arising out of any relation in which the principle is applicable. It is termed by Lord ELDON "that great rule of the court that he who bargains in any matter of advantage with a person placing confidence in him is bound to show that a reasonable use has been made of that confidence." Gibson v. Jeyes, 6 Ves. 278. It was said by Sir SAMUEL ROMILLY in his argument in Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 300, that "the relief stands upon a general principle applying to all the variety of relations in which dominion may be exercised by one person over another,"—a principle which was afterwards affirmed by Lord COTTENHAM in Dent v. Bennett, 4 Mylne & C. 277, saying that he had received so much pleasure from hearing it uttered in that argument that the recollection of it had not been diminished by the lapse of more than 30 years.

That the influence which the spiritual adviser of one who is about to die has over such person is one of the most powerful that can be exercised upon the human mind, especially if such mind is impaired by physical weakness, is so consonant with human experience as to need no more than its statement; and in any transaction between them, wherein the adviser receives any advantage, a court of equity will not enter into an investigation of the extent to which such influence has been exercised. Any dealing between them, under such circumstances, will be set aside as contrary to all principles of equity, whether the benefit accrue to the adviser, or to some other recipient who, through such influence, may have been made the beneficiary of the transaction. These principles have been so invariably announced whenever the question has arisen that a mere reference to the authorities will suffice. Norton v. Rely, 2 Eden, 286; Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 273; Thompson v. Heffernan, 4 Dru. & War. 291; Dent v. Bennett, 4 Mylne & C. 269; In re Welsh, 1 Redf. Sur. 246; Richmond's Appeal, 59 Conn. 226, 22 Atl. Rep. 82; Ford v. Hennessy, 70 Mo. 580; Pironi v. Corrigan, 47 N. J. Eq. 135, 20 Atl. Rep. 218; Connor v. Stanley, 72 Cal. 556, 14 Pac. Rep. 306; 1 Bigelow, Fraud, 352; Story, Eq. Jur. § 311.

The finding of the court that Mrs. Ross did not have any independent advice upon the subject of making the deeds of trust is fully sustained by the evidence. It appears from the record that the attorney who prepared the instruments was introduced to her by Conway, and that the only persons with whom she had any interview, or from whom she could receive any advice respecting the same, were this attorney and the defendant Conway. On the 9th of August she had expressed to Conway a desire to make a testamentary disposition of her property, and, upon his suggestion that Mr. Collins was a suitable person, she requested that he would send him to her at the hospital where she was lying. He thereupon sought Collins, and, telling him the wish of Mrs. Ross, accompanied him to the hospital. On their way he told Collins of the mode in which she proposed to dispose of her property, and, after their arrival, remained in the room with them while she was giving directions about the will, going out, however, occasionally, for short intervals to visit other people in the hospital, and leaving the building before the will was formally executed. Two days later he visited Collins at his office, and, after hearing the will read, he made to Collins a suggestion of some changes, and whether a deed of trust would not be preferable to a will. An appointment was then made between him and Collins to meet that afternoon in the room of Mrs. Ross at the hospital. After their arrival at the hospital, Conway made a suggestion to her that she execute a deed of trust instead of a will, and also other suggestions in reference to her disposition of the property. Only himself and Collins were in the room during this consultation, he, however, leaving it temporarily a few times during the period over which the interview extended, but remaining until Collins had received all the directions that she gave. Assuming that, by virtue of his relation to her, he had acquired an influence over her, it must be held that in the transaction under investigation there was an undue exercise of such influence; that by not insisting that she should have independent advice, and by continuing to remain in her presence during the interview with the only other person whom he permitted to see her, he exercised an influence over her actions which, though unseen and inaudible, was none the less effective in its results. "The question is," said Lord ELDON in Huguenin v. Baseley, 14 Ves. 300, "not whether she knew what she was doing, had done, or proposed to do, but how the intention was produced; whether all that care and providence was placed round her, as against those who advised her, which from their situation and relation with respect to her they were bound to exert on her behalf." While the contract of purchase made between the defendant Conway and the trustees under the instruments sought to be annulled was irrelevant to any material issue before the court, and would have been properly excluded from evidence, we are unable to see that its admission could in any way have been prejudicial to the rights of the appellants. The judgment and order denying a new trial are affirmed.

We concur: DE HAVEN, J.; McFARLAND, J.

Hearing in bank denied.

TATE v. WILLIAMSON.

(2 Ch. App. 55.)

Court of Appeals in Chancery. Dec. 17, 1866.

This was an appeal by the defendant, Robert Williamson, from a decree of Vice Chancellor Wood, setting aside a sale, on the ground that the purchaser stood in a fiduciary relation to the vendor, and did not make a full disclosure to him of all material facts within his knowledge relating to the value of the property. The facts of the case fully appear in the report of the case before the vice chancellor (L. R. 1 Eq. 528) and the judgment of the lord chancellor.

Mr. W. M. James, Q. C., and Mr. Little, in support of the decree. Attorney General (Sir J. Rolt), and Mr. Bristowe, for the appellant.

Solicitors for the plaintiff: Messrs. N. C. & C. Milne.

Solicitors for the appellant: Messrs. Clowes & Hickley.

LORD CHELMSFORD, L. C. In this case the vice chancellor has made a decree that an agreement for the sale by the intestate, William Clowes Tate, to the defendant, Robert Williamson, of the undivided moiety of an estate called the "Whitfield Estate," in the county of Stafford, consisting of messuages, lands, and coal mines, ought to be set aside, upon the ground of the defendant not having communicated to the intestate all the information which he had acquired with reference to the value of the property, and, in particular, of his not having communicated an estimate of the value of the mines which was obtained by the defendant pending the agreement.

The question raised by the appeal is whether any such relation existed between the defendant and the intestate as to render it the duty of the defendant to make the communication.

The jurisdiction exercised by courts of equity over the dealings of persons standing in certain fiduciary relations has always been regarded as one of a most salutary description. The principles applicable to the more familiar relations of this character have been long settled by many well-known decisions, but the courts have always been careful not to fetter this useful jurisdiction by defining the exact limits of its exercise. Wherever two persons stand in such a relation that, while it continues, confidence is necessarily reposed by one, and the influence which naturally grows out of that confidence is possessed by the other, and this confidence is abused, or the influence is exerted to obtain an advantage at the expense of the confiding party, the person so availing himself of his position will not be permitted to retain the advantage, although the transaction could not have been impeached if no such confidential relation had existed.

Did, then, the defendant, R. Williamson, when he put himself in communication with the intestate, clothe himself with a character which brought him within the range of the principle?

In considering this question, it will be necessary to bear in mind the situation of both the parties at the time when the agreement for the sale of the property was entered into.

The intestate, when he was quite an infant, had become possessed of the property in question independently of his father. He contracted habits of extravagance at the university, and in consequence of some displeasure which he had occasioned to his father on the subject of his debts, the father's doors were closed against him. He was thus thrown upon the world at an early age without any one to control him, and with scarcely a friend to counsel him, and towards the close of his life he became addicted to drinking and died prematurely at the age of twenty-four. The defendant is the nephew of Mr. Hugh Henshaw Williamson, the great uncle by marriage of the intestate, who had been the trustee and manager of the property, and the receiver of the rents, which latter duty the defendant had for some short time been deputed to perform for him. It does not appear that the defendant by his employment acquired any particular information respecting the property, but as he states in his answer that he had "previously" (to his first interview with the intestate) "some idea of endeavoring to be the purchaser of the estate, in case the same should come into the market," it is reasonable to suppose that he was not altogether ignorant of its character, and must have formed some idea of its value.

I think no stress can be laid upon the circumstance of Mr. H. H. Williamson having been the trustee of the property. The trusteeship, as to the intestate's moiety, had come to an end upon his attaining his majority, in July, 1857. The accounts had been settled, and Mr. Williamson, in surrendering his trust, had behaved generously to the intestate. Though he continued after this period to receive the rents and manage the property, yet there appears to have been nothing in the office which he undertook after his trusteeship expired which would have prevented his dealing with the intestate upon the same terms as a mere stranger. Much less could the mere receipt of the rents for his uncle have placed Robert Williamson in a different position from that of any ordinary purchaser. But a new and peculiar relation arose out of the circumstances which afterwards occurred. In the year 1859 the debts which the intestate owed at the university were causing him considerable embarrassment. He had been pressed by Mr. Holloway, acting for his Oxford creditors, for payment of an amount of £1,000. He was unable, in consequence of the unfor-fortunate quarrel with his father, to apply to him for advice, and, having before experienced the kindness of Mr. H. H. Williamson, he turned to him again in his difficulties. The letter by which the intestate made his situation known to Mr. Williamson is not forthcoming. The defendant, in his answer, says that he was informed by Mr. H. H. Williamson that it stated he was again involved, and either asked for assistance, or for advice as to the mode of procuring assistance. I should have been glad if we could have seen the terms of this letter, as it might have explained the exact nature of the office which Mr. Williamson was asked to undertake. In the answer to this letter, dated the 30th of July, 1859, which is set out in the bill, in paragraph 52, Mr. Williamson invited the intestate to his house, and desired him to bring with him "a correct account of his debts, omitting nothing, and he would see what could be done." The intestate did not accept the invitation, and nothing more was heard of the matter until about the 26th of August following, when Mr. H. H. Williamson received a list of the intestate's debts due to Oxford creditors, amounting, as already mentioned, to £1,000. The defendant, in his answer, says "that the list was given to him by Mr. H. H. Williamson, and that he, after perusing the same, remarked that the charges were excessive, and that the bills might probably be settled for half the amount; that Mr. H. H. Williamson thereupon requested him to see the intestate, and ascertain upon what terms he could be relieved from his debts, and, if this could be done for £500 or a little more, he authorized the defendant to advance the intestate that amount on further security of the property." The defendant accordingly wrote to the intestate on the 26th of August, 1859, the letter, which is set out in paragraph 58 of the bill, in which he states that his uncle is not sufficiently well to attend to business; that the list of debts owing forms a very heavy amount, which Mr. Holloway expects to have paid immediately; and adds, "I will meet you in the course of a few days in London, upon having a couple of days' notice, and, after hearing your views on the subject, will talk over the matter, and see in what way it can be arranged." The counsel for the defendant say that his office was merely to see whether a compromise of the debts could be effected, and that, at the time of the purchase, his mission was at an end. One can hardly believe that his advice and assistance could have been understood to be of this limited character. He knew that Mr. Holloway was pressing for immediate payment to the Oxford creditors, and that if he refused to reduce the amount the whole must be paid. It does not appear that, if Mr. Holloway had insisted on a payment in full, Mr. H. H. Williamson would not have been disposed to advance a larger sum than that which he had mentioned, as the property would have been an ample security for any amount required to cover the whole of the debts. And the defendant must have been perfectly aware that the intestate's property in Staffordshire was the only fund out of which the debts could be discharged.

The account of the defendant's interview with the intestate we have from the answer alone. He states that he offered to negotiate with the intestate's creditors for an abatement of their claims, telling him "that he was authorized by his uncle to advance £500 or more if required" (I suppose he must have added "upon the security of the property"), "but that the intestate positively refused to allow him to ask for any deduction from his debts, saying that any such application would injure his character." The answer then proceeds: "But he at the same time stated that he was desirous to sell his share of the Whitfield estate." Mr. Bristowe, for the defendant, said the instant the intestate refused to allow any attempt to compromise his debts, the defendant's office of adviser came to an end, and from that moment the parties, to use the familiar expression, were dealing "at arms' length." I cannot accept this view of the defendant's position. I think that his visit to London was not solely for the compromise, but generally for the arrangement of the intestate's debts; that he came with authority which involved a dealing with the property of the intestate, as he was to advance his uncle's money on the security of this property. And it may be observed that he had his attention particularly directed to the mode of satisfying the debts by a mortgage. He knew, too, that if the payment of the debts in full was insisted upon, and his uncle refused to advance a larger sum than "£500 or a little more," a sufficient amount to discharge all the debts could easily be raised upon the security of the property, which was subject only to a mortgage for £1,000. It seems to me that the defendant had placed himself in a position which rendered it incumbent upon him to give the best advice to the intestate how to relieve himself from his debts, and no one can doubt that if his judgment had been unbiased that he would have recommended a mortgage, and not a sale. But it appears, from the defendant's own statement, that he had a reason for not giving his advice. As already stated, he had previously thought of purchasing the estate in case it should come into the market for sale, "an event," he says, "he thought was not unlikely to happen." I asked the defendant's counsel what he understood by these words, and was answered that the defendant's expectation was founded upon the inconvenient nature of property consisting of an undivided moiety. This may have first led the defendant to expect that he might have an opportunity of purchasing the property at no distant period, but his belief in the probability of a sale must have been considerably strengthened at the time of his interview with the intestate, from the knowledge he had of his embarrassments. Whether the conversation between the defendant and the intestate turned so abruptly from the intestate's refusal to compromise his debts, to the expression of his desire to sell his share of the Whitfield estate, as represented by the defendant or not, it is quite clear to my mind that the confidential relation between the parties had not terminated when the negotiation for the purchase of the property by the defendant commenced, and that he did not then, or at any time afterwards, stand in the situation of an ordinary purchaser.

This being so, the defendant, pending the agreement, was bound to communicate all the information he acquired which it was material for the intestate to know in order to enable him to judge of the value of his property. It was admitted that the valuation of Mr. Cope was in the hands of the defendant at the time he wrote his letter of the 10th September, 1859. The defendant is charged with making untrue representations in that letter. If he had done so, it would of course strengthen the case against him, but I find nothing in the letter which amounts to a misrepresentation, nor anything more than a disparagement of the property, not uncommon with a purchaser when he desires to stimulate the owner of the property to close with his offer.

Having stated my opinion with regard to the duty cast upon the defendant to communicate Cope's valuation to the intestate, it seems unnecessary to pursue the case further. The fair dealing, in other respects, of the defendant during the negotiation, and before the agreement was signed, becomes almost irrelevant. The refusal of the solicitors to proceed with the agreement unless the young man had some legal assistance, the recommendation of the defendant that the intestate should apply to his father for advice, the opportunity afforded him pending the negotiation of consulting any friends who were capable of advising him, the reference to Mr. Payne whether merely for the purpose of completing the agreement, or to afford the intestate an opportunity of obtaining his opinion as to the value, all these considerations are of no consequence, when once it is established that there was a concealment of a material fact, which the defendant was bound to disclose.

Nor, after this, is it of any importance to ascertain the real value of the property.

Even if the defendant could have shewn that the price which he gave was a fair one, this would not alter the case against him. The plaintiff, who seeks to set aside the sale, would have a right to say, "You had the means of forming a judgment of the value of the property in your possession, you were bound, by your duty to the person with whom you were dealing, to afford him the same opportunity which you had obtained of determining the sufficiency of the price which you offered; you have failed in that duty, and the sale cannot stand." But, in truth, there are strong grounds for thinking that the price agreed to be paid by the defendant is quite inadequate to the value of the property. There is no occasion to weigh the opposite opinion of the engineers and surveyors, and to form a conclusion from them. It is sufficient to take the valuation of the mines by Cope, amounting to £20,000, and the valuation of the surface by the defendant's own witnesses, ranging from £10,000 to £11,200, and making every allowance for a reduction of the value of the intestate's share, in consequence of its being an undivided moiety, it will appear that the value, by the defendant's own shewing, must have been at the least £14,000. For this property the defendant agreed to pay £7,000 apparently about half the value, and that not at once, but £1,500 was to be advanced to the intestate, which was to bear interest till the day for the completion of the purchase, which advance must have been intended to enable the intestate to pay off his debts immediately; £2,000 was to be paid on the 25th March, 1860, and the residue by yearly instalments in the four following years.

It appears to me, upon a careful review of the whole case, that it would be contrary to the principles upon which equity proceeds, in judging of the dealings of persons in a fiduciary relation, to allow the purchase by the defendant, Robert Williamson, to stand.

I am satisfied that the defendant had placed himself in such a relation of confidence, by his undertaking the office of arranging the intestate's debts by means of a mortgage of his property, as prevented him from becoming a purchaser of that property without the fullest communication of all material information which he had obtained as to its value; that this openness and fair dealing were the more necessary when he was negotiating with an extravagant and necessitous young man, deprived at the time of all other advice, eager to raise money, and apparently careless in what manner it was obtained; and the defendant having, by concealment of a valuation which he had privately obtained, procured a considerable advantage in the price which the seller was induced to take, and which even the defendant's witnesses prove to be grossly inadequate, he cannot be permitted so to turn the confidence reposed in him to his own profit, and the sale ought to be set aside. Decree affirmed. Petition of appeal dismissed, with costs.

PRICE v. THOMPSON et al.

(1 S. W. 408, 84 Ky. 219.)

Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Sept. 14, 1886.

Appeal from circuit court, Barren county.

This is an action by appellant for a new trial in the case of Buford W. Thompson, etc., against George R. Price, Administrator of Joseph Price, Deceased. The court below refused to grant a new trial. From that judgment George R. Price prosecuted this appeal. Buford W. Thompson, etc., against George R. Price, Administrator of Joseph Price, was an action to settle the accounts of said administrator, and sell lands of his decedent to pay debts. By the commissioner's report in said action the administrator was found to be indebted to the estate in the sum of $295.50. This report was confirmed, and an order entered directing the administrator to pay said sum to commissioner, in default of which execution issued, and land belonging to administrator was levied on and sold. The equity of redemption was afterwards levied on, but, before the sale, this action was brought.

W. P. D. Bush, Finlay Bush, and Bales, Nuckols & Gorin, for appellant, George R. Price, Adm'r, etc. W. L. Porter, for appellees, B. W. Thompson and others.

BENNETT, J. The appellee filed his petition in the Barren circuit court against the appellees, Buford W. Thompson, and T. M. Dickey, the master commissioner of the Barren circuit court, and others. In his petition he alleges that appellee Thompson filed his petition in the Barren circuit court against him, as the administrator of Joseph Price, deceased, for the purpose of having the decedent's estate settled, and the sale of land to pay debts, etc.; that appellee T. M. Dickey, to whom the case was referred as the master commissioner of the court, reported that appellant was indebted to said estate, as administrator, in the sum of $295.59; that said report was confirmed without objection, and appellant was ordered to pay said sum to the commissioner, and in default of which execution was ordered to issue; no payment having been made, execution issued in the name of the commissioner, and by his direction, against appellant, which was levied on a tract of land containing 99 acres, belonging to appellant; that said land was sold at execution sale for the sum of $250, which was less than two-thirds of its appraised value. The appellee Dickey purchased it. Afterwards a second execution was issued, and levied on the equity of redemption in said land. He alleged that he had paid off and discharged various just claims and demands against the estate of his decedent, exceeding in amount the sum of $295.56; that he gave the receipts and vouchers evidencing these payments to his attorney, to file with the commissioner; that said receipts and vouchers had been lost, either by his attorney or by the commissioner, after they had been so given him; that he was not present when the commissioner's report was made, or when it was confirmed, or when the order was made directing him to pay said sum to the commissioner, nor did he know that such orders were made, or that his receipts and vouchers were lost, until after execution had issued against him. He prayed the court to set aside the report of the commissioner, the order and judgment directing him to pay said sum to the commissioner, the sale of his land, and grant him a new trial, etc. The court granted him an injunction until further orders, but, on final trial, dissolved the injunction, and dismissed his petition. From that judgment he appeals to this court.

The appellee Dickey made a joint answer with the other defendants. They do not deny that appellant did not know that the commissioner had reported an indebtedness against him of $295.56, and that the court had confirmed the report, and ordered him to pay the money to the commissioner, etc., or that his receipts and vouchers had been lost, until after execution had been issued against him. Besides, he swears in his deposition to the same thing. The evidence, therefore, as to that matter is conclusive.

The allegation of the petition is that the receipts and vouchers were placed in the hands of the attorney "to file with the commissioner in making said settlement, and they were either lost by said Bales (the attorney) or by said commissioner after they were given to him." The answer in reference to that allegation is: "They have no knowledge or information sufficient to form a belief as to whether they were placed in the hands of said Bales to be filed with the commissioner." So the answer does not deny that said receipts and vouchers were filed with the commissioner, or that "they had been lost by the commissioner after they had been given to him." The commissioner certainly knew whether such was the fact or not, and his silence is conclusive against him. Besides, the attorney, Bales, swears: "I placed them, as I now believe, and after the judgment in the cause was rendered then believed, in the hands of T. M. Dickey, master commissioner of the Barren circuit court. If I did not so place them, I lost them; but they were all put together in a paper, and handed to Dickey, and I find a part of them allowed, and the others not, and, as they were not disallowed or rejected, I took it Mr. Dickey mislaid them." Appellant swears that he did pay said claims against the estate, which were properly proved, etc. Mr. Bales also swears that said claims were properly proved, etc. No witness contradicts them, nor did appellees offer any evidence at all. So it may be regarded as conclusively proven (1) that appellant had paid and discharged said debt; (2) that he had placed the receipts and vouchers evidencing the payment in the hands of his attorney, to be filed with the commissioner; (3) that they were placed in the hands of the commissioner, and were lost or mislaid, so that they were not allowed by him in his settlement, and, by reason thereof, judgment was obtained against appellant on a demand which he had already paid.

We understand the general rules of law governing applications for new trials to be: (1) When for newly-discovered evidence, "the names of the witnesses who have been discovered;" (2) that the applicant has been vigilant in preparing his case for trial; (3) that the new facts were discovered after the trial, and would be important; (4) that the evidence discovered will tend to prove facts which were not directly in issue on the trial, or were not then known, nor investigated by the proof; (5) that the new evidence is not merely cumulative, etc.

Here the evidence was not newly discovered, but was known to appellant before the trial, and had been prepared by him to be used on the trial; and, judging from the record, had it been used on the trial, the issue would certainly have been decided for the appellant. So the question now is, was the appellant vigilant in preparing his case for trial? Ordinarily, we would say not. Had the trial of the case been before a jury, or before the court by depositions, it would have been his duty to see that his witnesses were duly subpoenaed to attend court to testify, or that their depositions were duly taken. Nor would it be reckoned proper vigilance to leave these matters in the hands of his attorney to attend to; for the attorney is but his agent, and his want of proper vigilance is also that of the principal. But a different case is presented here. The commissioner is the officer of the court,—“the hand of the court,”—whose duty it is in such cases to receive all vouchers presented to him, and preserve them, and, if properly proven, to allow and report them to court. This being his official duty, and the presumption being that he will discharge his duty, it cannot be said that after a person has filed his vouchers with him, properly proven, that it is his duty to keep a watch over him, as in the case of a private person, to see that he discharges that duty by reporting the claim to be allowed by the court. Had appellant's attorney, with whom he intrusted these vouchers to be delivered to the commissioner, failed to deliver them, then it could be truly said that he was wanting in proper vigilance; for in that case his attorney's negligence would be his negligence. But his attorney having delivered the vouchers to the officer of the court,—the hand of the court, in such matters,—properly proven as vouchers, that was all that was necessary, under the circumstances. That officer having lost them, and appellant not being apprised of it until after judgment and execution had been obtained against him, he should have had a new trial, and the injunction sustained, and the report of the commissioner charging him with $295.56 set aside, and the order directing the payment of it to the commissioner set aside.

Appellant also asks that the sale of his land under said execution be set aside. It is contended that this should not be done, for the reason that the reversal of an erroneous, not void, judgment does not and cannot set aside the sale of property made thereunder. That is, no doubt, the general rule. But in this case the return of the officer who made the sale shows that the appellee T. M. Dickey, the master commissioner, to whom the case was referred, was the purchaser of the property at the execution sale. It is also alleged in the petition that he was the purchaser at that sale. The answer says that the return of the officer in that regard was a mistake; that he was not the purchaser, but he offers no proof as to that matter, and, the return of the officer being presumptively correct, the commissioner must be regarded as the purchaser. So the question arises, was his purchase valid? Had he been free from a fiducial character, there can be no doubt that his purchase would have been valid; but, standing in a fiducial relation to decedent's estate, equity devolved upon him the duty to protect the interest of that estate. In such cases the fiduciary cannot avail himself of the influence which his position gives, for the purposes of his own gain or benefit, to the prejudice or injury of those interests which it is his duty to protect. It is a rule of equity that no man can acquire an interest where he has a duty to perform inconsistent with that interest. The rule which prevents a person, standing in a fiducial relation, from acquiring an interest which is inconsistent with those fiducial duties, stands mainly upon motives of general public policy; nor can a man, standing in such relation with respect to property, be allowed to purchase the property at a judicial or execution sale, unless the entire responsibility of obtaining the highest price has been removed or taken out of his hands. If he continues under the duty of seeing the property bring its highest price, he is incapacitated from purchasing.

These principles apply, not only to trustees proper, but to all persons invested with fiducial power; such as executors, administrators, assignees of a bankrupt, commissioners of bankrupts, sheriffs, and judicial officers in general. See Kerr, Frauds, 150, 160. See, also, Stapp v. Toler, 3 Bibb, 450.

While the same general principle governs all persons occupying a fiducial character, yet there are two classes controlled by “different special rules.” The first class includes all those instances in which the fiduciary and those with whom he stands in that relation consciously and intentionally deal with each other, each knowingly taking a part in the transaction from which results a contract or conveyance. Here the contract is not necessarily voidable,—it may be valid; but a presumption of its invalidity arises, and that so strong that nothing short of clear evidence of good faith, of full knowledge, of adequate consideration, and of independent thought, consent, and action, can overcome it. The second class is where the fiduciary, acting with reference to his trust, deals with himself in his private or individual character; as where an agent to sell, sells the property to himself, or a sheriff buys the property at his own sale. Such transactions are always voidable at the suit of the party concerned. They are not merely presumptively invalid, as in the first class, where good faith, full knowledge, adequate consideration, independent thought, consent, and action, may be proved; because the sale or purchase, if made privately, is not known, or, if made publicly, by coercive authority, cannot be controlled. Therefore the good faith, full knowledge, etc., do not control. For these reasons the presumption of invalidity in the first class is rebuttable, and the presumption of invalidity in the second class is conclusive. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 956, 957. These rules being sound, and so well sustained by authority, this court does not hesitate to adopt them for the government of all persons occupying a fiduciary character, whether of a private or a public nature.

Officers whose powers are not merely persuasive, but coercive, ex parte, and arbitrary, should be held to strict impartiality, fidelity, and integrity in the discharge of their trusts. All temptation to make private gain, to take unfair advantage, directly or indirectly, should be removed. The most effective way to do so is to declare all such transactions conclusively invalid. The master commissioner, Dickey, was still acting as commissioner in the case at the time he purchased the land at execution sale. It was to the interest of the estate that the land should bring its full value. It was his duty to encourage its bringing its full value. Therefore, for him to become a bidder for it at the sale antagonized his private interest with his fiducial duty. This he had no right to do. For these reasons the injunction should have been sustained, a new trial granted, the report of the commissioner allowing the $295.56, and the order of court directing its payment, set aside, and the sale of said land set aside, and appellant allowed credit for any sums proved to have been paid by him for said estate, not otherwise allowed. Wherefore the judgment of the lower court is reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent with this opinion.

LEWIS, J., not sitting.

ELMORE v. JOHNSON et ux.

(32 N. E. 413, 143 Ill. 513.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Oct. 31, 1892.

Appeal from superior court, Cook county; Kirk Hawes, Judge.

Bill by Susie K. Elmore against Frank A. Johnson and Annie C. Johnson to set aside a deed. The bill was dismissed for want of equity, and complainant appeals. Affirmed.

The other facts fully appear in the following statement by Magruder, J.:

This is a bill filed in the superior court of Cook county on December 11, 1890, by the appellant against the appellee and his wife for the purpose of setting aside a deed made by the appellant to the appellee on January 17, 1884, conveying to him the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, in the subdivision of S. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 22, township 39 N., range 13 E., etc., in Cook county; said west half consisting of 16 of the 32 sublots into which said lots 6, 9, 20, and 23 were subdivided. Also for the purpose of requiring Annie C. Johnson, the wife of appellee, to convey to appellant the title held by her to said west half; and also for the purpose of taking an account of moneys paid out by appellee for appellant, and of moneys received by him for her, and of services by her to him and by him to her, and of losses alleged to have been caused by want of diligence and skill and by alleged misconduct, etc. The defendants answered the bill. Replications were filed to the answers. Proofs were taken, and, the cause coming on to be heard in May, 1891, the bill was dismissed for want of equity, etc. The present appeal is prosecuted from such decree of dismissal.

The deed was executed by appellant to appellee in payment for his services to her as her solicitor and attorney in the matter hereinafter mentioned. The bill charges that the defendant Johnson was negligent and unskillful in the conduct of the complainant's business; that his services were worth less than the value of the 16 sublots conveyed to him; that the complainant was without means, and when defendant began to insist upon pay for his services she agreed to pay him $400 if he would obtain title for her to the 4 lots or 32 sublots; that, after a decision had been rendered in her favor, and before the execution of the master's deed to her, the defendant induced her, by fraudulent representations and false promises, to convey to him the west half of said lots; that she supposed the deed made by her to be a deed of an undivided one-half part of the lots when she signed it; that between the summer of 1883 and November, 1888, she did certain typewriting work for the defendant in his office, for which he had not paid her; that an execution issued in the attachment suit hereinafter mentioned was returned no part satisfied; that the executions issued upon the decree for alimony hereinafter mentioned could have been collected or secured; that a mortgage suit against the property was allowed to go by default; that the lots had been sold for taxes; that complainant did not know any of the facts in regard to said executions, or the abandonment of the mortgage suit, or the value of defendant's services in the chancery case until the day before filing her bill; that she first retained the defendant to collect her alimony, and obtain title to the lots "for a reasonable fee and reward;" that she did not learn of the tax sales until "somewhat over a year" before filing her bill; that she first discovered the facts as to defendant's negligence and misconduct, etc., within a few days before filing the bill.

The answer of the defendant denies all the allegations of the bill as to fraud, neglect, or misconduct, and as to the agreement to take $400 for services, and sets forth a history of his professional relations with the complainant, and gives his explanation of the various matters referred to in the bill, and charges laches, etc.

On September 24, 1879, the complainant, who was then about 33 years old, and had been divorced from a former husband named Elmore, delivered to one Collins Pratt, an attorney in Chicago, government bonds, owned by her, to the amount of $600, to be by him converted into money, and loaned out upon real-estate security. Pratt used this money to purchase said lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, and obtained a deed of the same to himself on September 24, 1879. He then executed his own note, dated October 4, 1879, for $600, payable in two years, to the order of complainant, with interest at 8 per cent., and also a trust deed to secure the same, upon said lots, to one Paul Mackenhaupt, as trustee, and delivered said note and trust deed to the complainant. On March 8, 1880, Pratt, who was at that time engaged to be married to the complainant, obtained the note and trust deed from her upon some representation that it would be necessary to change the securities in view of their approaching marriage, and applied to Mackenhaupt for a release of the trust deed, which was executed and delivered to Pratt on said 8th day of March, 1880. On March 24, 1880, the complainant and Pratt were married, and lived together until about May 1, 1880, when he abandoned her. During said marriage, and on April 13, 1880, Pratt borrowed $500 of one Eimers, and executed his note of that date for that amount, payable in two years, to the order of Eimers, and to secure said note he and appellant conveyed said lots 6, 9, 20, and 23 to Charles Thornton, trustee, by trust deed of same date. On the same day, April 13, 1880, there was filed for record a warranty deed, executed by Pratt, and purporting to have been also executed by complainant as his wife, conveying said lots 6, 9, 20, and 23 to one Addie Pratt, a reputed sister of Collins Pratt, in whose name subdivision was made of the 4 lots into the 32 sublots above referred to. On April 30, 1880, the defendant executed his unsecured note to the complainant for $600, payable two years after date, with 8 per cent. interest. This latter note complainant claims to have known nothing about until long afterwards, when she was trying to collect the $600 from Pratt, and he stated that he had given his note therefor. She says that she then examined her trunk and papers, and found the note for the first time. On November 1, 1881, complainant obtained a decree of divorce from Collins Pratt upon the ground of adultery, which decree required him to pay her $40 every month as alimony, and changed her name to Susie K. Elmore. Mr. John W. Waughop was her solicitor in the divorce suit. Soon after the separation between complainant and Pratt, she employed Mr. Leonard Swett to collect the $600 from Pratt, and Mr. Swett succeeded in obtaining $250 of that amount for her. About the time of the decree of divorce, or soon thereafter, Mr. Waughop had made an agreement for her with Pratt, by the terms of which Pratt was to pay $500 in full discharge of alimony and of the balance due upon the claim for $600, said sum of $500 to be paid at the rate of $5 per week. She was paid $5 per week up to and until February 18, 1882. It would appear that Mr. Swett received $50 for his services, and Mr. Waughop nothing. By deed dated January 7, 1879, one Arnold and his wife sold and conveyed to Collins Pratt and Edgar M. Wilson lots 2, 13, 16, and 27 in said subdivision for an expressed consideration of $600; and to secure their note for $500, payable in three years, to order of William Fitzgerald, with 10 per cent. interest, Pratt and Wilson executed a trust deed, dated January 21, 1879, conveying said last-named lots to O. T. Hartigan, trustee.

Such being the condition of affairs, the complainant, about the middle of February, 1882, applied to the defendant Johnson to act as her attorney and solicitor in recovering what might be due to her in money or property from her former husband, Collins Pratt. Accordingly, on February 23, 1882, the defendant filed a bill for the complainant, as her solicitor, in the circuit court of Cook county, against the said Collins Pratt, Addie Pratt, Eimers, and Thornton. This bill was sworn to by Mrs. Elmore. It sets up the facts hereinbefore stated. It charges that the note of April 30th was never delivered to her or accepted by her; that Pratt obtained the $600 to use for himself, and deceived her in respect thereto, and attempted to defraud her out of the money; that either her signature to the deed to Addie Pratt was forged, or obtained from her by fraud and misrepresentation, and without consideration; that lots 2, 13, 16, and 27 are of the value of $1,000, and are the only property owned by Pratt; that said $600 was not loaned to Pratt, but intrusted to him for conversion into real-estate securities drawing 8 per cent.; that the note and Mackenhaupt trust deed were obtained from her in order to cheat and defraud her, and get a release of the trust deed; that the Eimers note and Thornton trust deed were without consideration, or accepted with notice of her rights, and with the intent to cheat and defraud her. The bill offers to return and cancel the note of April 30th. It contains the following averment: "Your oratrix believes, and on belief avers the fact to be, that said defendant purchased said real estate (lots 6, 9, 20, and 23) with the money so intrusted to him as aforesaid, to be invested by him in good real-estate securities." The bill prays that the release deed made by Mackenhaupt may be set aside and canceled, and that the trust deed to him may be declared to be in full force, and a valid lien upon said lots for the balance of the $600 due from said Collins; and for such other relief as the nature of the case may require and may seem meet. On March 18, 1882, the bill was amended by averring that Pratt was then the owner of said lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, and held an unrecorded deed, dated February 9, 1882, from Addie Pratt to himself. On March 10, 1883, the prayer of the bill was amended as follows: "Or that Pratt may be declared to hold the title * * * in trust, * * * and may be required to convey the same to your oratrix, and that the said deed * * * to said Addie Pratt may be declared null and void, and may be set aside," etc. At the April term, 1882, Collins Pratt answered the bill, alleging that complainant loaned her money upon his note secured by the trust deed to Mackenhaupt, after investigation and advising with others; that said trust deed was released in order to borrow $500 to buy household furniture in view of the approaching marriage; that complainant has some of the goods bought with the money borrowed of Eimers; that she accepted the note of April 30th; that he has paid $290, instead of $250; that she fully understood the contents of the deed to Addie Pratt. The answer admits the purchase of lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, and the ownership of an undivided half of lots 2, 13, 16, and 27, and denies all charges of deception and fraud or forgery or misrepresentation, and also denies that he now owns lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, or holds an unrecorded deed of the same from Addie Pratt. Addie Pratt also filed an answer to the bill, denying that the deed to her was without consideration, or obtained by fraud, or that complainant's signature thereto was forged, or that defendant had made a deed to Collins Pratt; and averring that said deed to defendant was executed for a good consideration, and was understood by complainant when she signed it. April 13, 1882, replications were filed to the answers. March 17, 1883, the bill was dismissed as to Eimers and Thornton, and the cause placed upon the trial calendar. The hearing took place on November 23 and 27, 1883, the defendants being represented by counsel. The decision was in favor of the complainant, and a decree in accordance with the decision was entered on December 8, 1883. The decree found that Pratt purchased lots 6, 9, 20, and 23 with complainant's money; that the note to Eimers and trust deed to Thornton were valid, but that the $500 borrowed of Eimers was used by Pratt, and exceeded the amount which had been paid by him to complainant; that a resulting trust had therefore arisen in favor of complainant, and she was entitled to have the title acquired by Pratt in said lots conveyed to her; that the deed to Addie Pratt had been procured by fraud; that the lots had been sold under decree in favor of Eimers; that the unsecured note of April 30th had been surrendered on the hearing; the decree set aside the deed made by Collins Pratt to Addie Pratt, and ordered said Collins to execute a deed of the lots to complainant, subject to the right of the purchasee under the foreclosure decree of Eimers, within 30 days, and upon his failing to do so that the master execute said deed. On January 16, 1884, the master executed to the complainant a deed of lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, and on the next day, January 17, 1884, complainant executed and delivered to the defendant the deed of the west half of said lots above referred to. The deed from the master to her was not recorded until January 17, 1884. Some time in June, 1882, Eimers filed a bill to foreclose the trust deed securing his note upon lots 6, 9, 20, and 23. Appellee entered the appearance of appellant in said foreclosure suit, but a decree of sale was entered therein, and said lots were sold under said decree on September 3, 1883, to Eimers, for $676.23. The certificate of sale was purchased by appellee and appellant from Eimers on August 23, 1884, for $731; one half—$365.50—having been paid by appellee, and the other $365.50 by appellant. The certificate was assigned to Mrs. Johnson. As soon as the time for redemption expired, which was on December 3, 1884, the master took up the certificate, and made a deed conveying the whole of the four lots to Mrs. Johnson. Thereupon, on December 8, 1884, Mrs. Johnson and appellee, her husband, united in a deed conveying all their interest in the east half of the lots to the appellant.

In addition to the chancery suit, appellee took other proceedings. On March 1, 1882, he began an attachment suit to recover $388.38 sworn by the complainant to be the balance of the $600 then due to her, charging that the debt had been fraudulently contracted. The attachment writ was levied upon lots 6, 9, 20, and 23, and also upon lots 2, 13, 16, and 27. Judgment was rendered therein on April 5, 1882, and general and special execution issued on November 15, 1882. No levy, however, was made under the execution, but it was returned unsatisfied. Proceedings were also commenced to enforce the decree for alimony, and to set aside the agreement to settle for $500, payable at the rate of $5 per week. On March 6, 1882, appellee filed in the divorce suit an affidavit sworn to by complainant on March 2, 1882, setting up the decree for alimony, the receipt of $5 per week up to February 18, 1882, the delivery to Pratt of the $600, the release of the trust deed, etc., and alleging that there was due to her $388.38; that the settlement for $500 had been made upon representations as to Pratt's poverty, and had never been fully approved of by her; that she had given notice of her intention not to accept the $500; that Pratt had purchased lots 6, 9, 20, and 23 on September 29, 1879, for $600, "and affiant is informed that they are now worth about $3,000, and are incumbered to the extent of $540 only;" that Pratt owns lots 2, 13, 16, and 27, incumbered for $600; that he refuses to pay $75 due to her for alimony. A rule was entered by the court after a contest and after reading other affidavits, requiring Pratt to pay the $75 within a certain time. Upon his failure to do so, an attachment was issued, and he was arrested for contempt of court, and entered into a recognizance to appear in May, 1882, to answer the charge of contempt. He did not appear, however, but fled from the state, and went to Dakota, where he has remained ever since. During the period from April 8, 1882, to August 21, 1883, appellee caused six executions to be issued upon the decree for alimony for the amounts thereof accruing from time to time, but realized nothing. On May 6, 1882, Hartigan sold lots 2, 13, 16, and 27 under the trust deed to him for default in the payment of the principal of the note secured thereby, and interest thereon, and executed a trustee's deed to the purchasers, Edgar M. Wilson and Edward B. Holmes. All the lots were so sold for $682.43.

Alex. S. Bradley, for appellant. James E. Munroe and F. A. Johnson, for appellees.

MAGRUDER, J., (after stating the facts.) Appellee testifies that the deed made to him by appellant, conveying to him the west half of the lots in controversy, was executed by her in pursuance of a previous contract which she had made with him in reference to payment for his legal services. He swears that by the terms of this contract she was to pay all the costs, and he was to have a contingent fee of one-half of what should be recovered both in the suit for alimony, and in the chancery suit in regard to the lots. The evidence shows that this contract was made during the pendency of the legal proceedings which the appellee was conducting for the appellant. It was not entered into before or at the time of his original employment, which took place on February 15, 1882, nor did it exist when he filed the bill on February 23, 1882. His answer states that "early in the spring or summer of 1882 * * * it was * * * mutually agreed that this defendant should have and receive as a contingent fee for his services one-half." He testifies that he cannot fix the date of the agreement, but that, to the best of his recollection, "it was in March or April, possibly in May, after I discovered I had a pretty good-sized job on hand, and a good deal of work to do, and had done a good deal of work. * * * She claimed to have no money early in the proceedings, and could not pay my fees in money, and that was why I subsequently made a different arrangement with her." Appellant swears that she never made an agreement with the appellee to give him one-half of the money or of the land to be recovered. The deed to appellee was also executed while the relation of attorney and client existed between himself and the appellant. That deed was made on January 17, 1884, and he concedes that he did not cease to be appellant's solicitor until some time thereafter. In England "it is a settled doctrine of equity that an attorney cannot, while the business is unfinished in which he had been employed, receive any gift from his client, or bind his client in any mode to make him greater compensation for his services than he would have a right to demand if no contract should be made during the relation." Weeks, Attys. at Law (2d Ed.) § 364. More than 50 years ago the English doctrine was adopted by the supreme court of Alabama in an able opinion in the case of Lecatt v. Sallee, 3 Port. 115, where it was held that "an agreement made by a client with his counsel, after the latter has been employed in a particular business, by which the original contract is varied, and greater compensation is secured to the counsel than may have been agreed upon when he was first retained, is invalid, and cannot be enforced." The reason for the doctrine is to be found in the nature of the relation which exists between attorney and client. That relation is one of confidence, and gives the attorney great influence over the actions and interests of the client. In view of this confidential relation, transactions between attorney and client are often declared to be voidable which would be held to be unobjectionable between other parties. The law is thus strict, "not so much on account of hardship in the particular case as for the sake of preventing what might otherwise become a public mischief." Lewis v. J. A., 4 Edw. Ch. marg. p. 599, top p. 622. "No single circumstance has done more to debase the practice of the law in the popular estimation, and even to lower the lofty standard of professional ethics and self-respect among members of the legal profession itself in large portions of our country, than the nature of the transactions, often in the highest degree champertous, between attorney and client, which are permitted, and which have received judicial sanction. It sometimes would seem that the fiduciary relation and the opportunity for undue influence, instead of being the grounds for invalidating such agreements, are practically regarded rather as their excuse and justification." 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 960, note 1. Before the attorney undertakes the business of the client, he may contract with reference to his services, because no confidential relation then exists, and the parties deal with each other at arm's length. The same is true in regard to dealings which take place after the relation has been dissolved. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. (13th Ed.) §§ 310-313. But the law watches with unusual jealousy over all transactions between the parties which occur while the relation exists. In the case at bar it does not appear that any definite contract in regard to fees existed between appellant and appellee prior to the spring of 1882; but, inasmuch as he undertook to manage her legal interest before that time, there was an implied contract, created by operation of law, which entitled him to receive such reasonable compensation as his services might be worth. "If the amount of compensation be not fixed by the terms of the contract by which an attorney or solicitor was employed, he would be entitled to be paid such reasonable fees as have been usually paid to others for similar services." Lecatt v. Sallee, supra.

The question, then, arises, what was a reasonable compensation for the services rendered by the appellee to the appellant? He has introduced no independent evidence upon this subject. His only witness is an office companion, who says that, in his opinion, appellee's legal services were worth $30 per day, but does not claim to have full knowledge of the services rendered in the matter herein involved. Appellee is unable to state, except approximately, the time spent by him in attending to appellant's matter, but he says: "I believe that in the whole matter * * * I spent at least forty days." Forty days' services at $30 per day would be $1,200. We do not think, however, that the proof establishes $1,200 as the value of the services. Mr. W. J. Culver swears that the customary and usual charge for all the work done by appellee in the divorce attachment and "resulting trust" case would be $250 in money. Mr. B. F. Richolson, the attorney for Pratt, swore that appellee's services in the chancery or "trust" suit in regard to the land were reasonably worth from $300 to $350, and he made the following statement: "If the fee was contingent upon services, I think he would be justified in charging somewhat more. I hardly think double that, because I think the success was so reasonably assured there was not very much doubt." What was the value of the lots of which appellee was to have one-half? In the affidavit filed by appellant in the divorce proceeding on March 6, 1882, she swore that she had been informed that the lots were then worth $3,000, and were incumbered for $540, only. This affidavit was drawn by appellee, and was presented to the court upon an application to set aside the agreement of settlement for $500. We cannot suppose that the value of the lots was exaggerated in order to induce the court to believe that Pratt was not too poor to pay more than $500. Taking $3,000 as the estimated value of the lots on March 6, 1882, then, by appellee's agreement for fees, he was to get property worth $1,500, less $270 of incumbrance, amounting to $1,230. This amount exceeded the reasonable compensation to which appellee would have been entitled under the implied contract under which he began his services for appellee. We have recently held in Morrison v. Smith, 130 Ill. 304, 23 N. E. 241, that a sale by a client to an attorney will be sustained if it is fair and honest, and in no manner tainted with fraud, undue influence, or corruption, and that the law does not go so far as to hold such a sale voidable at the election of the client. In that case the subject-matter of the purchase by the attorney from the client was a judgment obtained by the former for the latter. The judgment debtor was insolvent, except as to his ownership of an undivided interest in land which was subject to a life estate. The doctrine of that case is the law of this court as applied to such a purchase by an attorney from a client as is there described. The litigation had reached the point where judgment had been obtained. The judgment was a lien upon a reversionary interest in land. Its value could, therefore, be easily ascertained by ascertaining the value of the interest in the land subject to the life estate. But there is a manifest distinction between a purchase by an attorney from a client and a contract made during the pendency of a litigation for the conveyance or transfer by the client to the attorney of a part of the property involved in the litigation as a compensation for his legal services therein. Where a purchase is proposed, the seller is always, to a certain extent, put on his guard. He knows that it is for the interest of the buyer to get the property as cheaply as possible. He has every motive to inquire into and learn the value of the thing to be sold. But, in case of the contract above indicated, the client is at a great disadvantage. The value of the property in litigation depends upon the result of the litigation, and, being unable to understand the legal aspects of the case, he is unable to foresee what such result will be. He must rely, not upon his own judgment, but upon the judgment and statements of his attorney. Moreover, he is unable to judge as to the value of his attorney's services, because he cannot know what legal steps are necessary to be taken in the conduct of the case. The advantage is overwhelmingly on the side of the attorney where such a contract is made. Whatever may be the rule as to a purchase by an attorney from a client, we think that, where the title to property is so involved in litigation that the value of the property depends upon the decision as to such title, a contract made during the pendency of the litigation to compensate the attorney for his legal services with a part of the property involved therein should be held to be voidable at the election of the client, irrespective of the fairness or unfairness of the contract, provided such election is exercised within a reasonable time. Such a rule as this is demanded by public policy, and in the interests of a wholesome administration of justice. The distinction here noted is pointed out in Berrien v. McLane, 1 Hoff. Ch. 420, where it is said: "A voluntary gift, made while the connection of attorney and client subsists, is absolutely void, and the property transferred by it can only be held as security for those charges which the attorney can legally make. Next, * * * a transfer of property, made upon an ostensibly valuable consideration, such as a lease or sale, is presumptively void. The client has the advantage of driving the attorney to produce evidence to prove its fairness, and to show that the price or terms were as beneficial as could have been obtained from a stranger. And, lastly, * * * a transfer of a part of the property actually in litigation, or a contract to transfer a part, * * * is void,—illegal,—because of the existing relation of the parties. * * * Such a contract will not be enforced on the application of the attorney; and, if the client applies, will be canceled on equitable terms." The above passage from the Berrien Case is quoted for the purpose of showing that a distinction is recognized between a sale and a transfer of a part of the property in litigation in payment of fees or a contract to transfer the same; but we do not go so far as to hold with the learned vice chancellor in that case that such a contract or transfer is absolutely void, but that it is voidable at the option of the client. The view here expressed is supported by the following authorities: Rogers v. Marshall, 3 McCrary, 76, 9 Fed. 721, and note to the first opinion, and cases cited in note; 4 Kent, Comm. (12th Ed.) p. 449, note b; Wallis v. Loubat, 2 Denio, 607; Lecatt v. Sallee, supra; Pearson v. Benson, 28 Beav. 598; Newman v. Payne, 2 Ves. Jr. 199; Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. 119; Lewis v. J. A., supra; Starr v. Vanderheyden, 9 Johns. 253; West v. Raymond, 21 Ind. 305; Simpson v. Lamb, 40 Eng. Law & Eq. 59; Hall v. Hallet, 1 Cox, 134; Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 717; Weeks, Attys. at Law, (2d Ed.) § 273; Armstrong v. Huston's Heirs, 8 Ohio, 552; Gray v. Em- mons, 7 Mich. 533; Merritt v. Lambert, 10 Paige, 352; Bolton v. Daily, 48 Iowa, 348; 1 Perry, Trusts (3d Ed.) § 202.

But even if the rule which applies to a purchase by an attorney from his client should be held to be applicable in the present case, the contract and the deed made in pursuance thereof must be subject to a rigid test. In case of such a purchase, the transaction is presumptively fraudulent, and the burden is on the attorney to show "fairness, adequacy, and equity." Lewis v. J. A., supra. He must remove the presumption against the validity of the transaction "by showing affirmatively the most perfect good faith, the absence of undue influence, a fair price, knowledge, intention and freedom of action by the client, and also that he gave his client full information and disinterested advice." 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 960. In order to sustain the deed made to appellee on January 17, 1884, it must appear that the consideration received by appellant was "adequate," and that the appellee paid "a fair price." This involves the determination of the question whether the services rendered to appellant were worth what the property was worth on the day of the delivery of the deed. Counsel on both sides have presented this as one of the material issues in the case, and have introduced testimony to show the value of the lots in January, 1884. Of appellant's witnesses three swore that the lots were then worth $3,200, two that they were worth $4,000, and two that they were worth $4,800. Of appellee's witnesses two placed the value of the lots at that time at about $900, one at from $1,000 to $1,400, one at $1,200, and one at from $1,950 to $2,400. It is claimed by counsel for appellee that the valuations of his witnesses are based upon actual sales, while the valuations proved by appellant are matters of opinion, formed from a general knowledge of values. It has been well said that "there is no more important factor in determining the value of particular property than the sale of similar property in the same neighborhood at about the time in question." Lewis, Em. Dom. § 443. We have held that "actual sales of property in the vicinity and near the time are competent evidence, as far as they go." Culbertson & Blair Packing & Provision Co. v. City of Chicago, 111 Ill. 631. But, while such sales may be the most satisfactory evidence of value, yet they are only one of the modes of proving value, and not the only mode. Railroad Co. v. Haller, 82 Ill. 208. It is true that the witnesses of appellant do not testify to actual knowledge of sales made in the neighborhood where these lots are located in the year 1884, or about that time, and that some of the witnesses of appellee do refer to sales. Purchases made in 1879 are not an exact criterion of values in 1884. Nor are forced sales under trust deeds and foreclosure decrees always a correct indication of value. After making allowance for the difference thus indicated between the testimony produced by appellee and that produced by appellant, we are unable to reach the conclusion that the value of the services rendered to the appellant was equal to the value of the lots conveyed to appellee in January, 1884.

We cannot say, however, after a careful review of the evidence, that the contract for compensation, and the deed made in pursuance thereof, are liable to any other objections than these two: First, they were executed during the existence of the relation of attorney and client; second, they secured a larger compensation for legal services than those services were really worth. We see no evidence of any undue influence exercised by the appellee over the appellant, except, perhaps, in the matter of obtaining from her a renewal of the contract. In the fall of 1882 appellee seemed to fear that appellant would make a settlement with Pratt without consulting him, or upon a basis not approved by him; and on November 24, 1882, he wrote her a letter, in which, after referring to her previously expressed desire that he should conduct her business "upon a contingent fee of 50 per cent. of the amount recovered," he said, "A definite understanding is therefore necessary before any further action is taken." He says that after this date she renewed the contract for one-half of what should be recovered; and thereafter, in March, 1883, as the record shows, he amended the bill by praying that Pratt be declared a trustee, etc. It was said in Bolton v. Daily, supra: "We think that where an attorney sets up an express agreement to pay more than an ordinary fee, exacted of a client where the work was two-thirds done, under a threat of withdrawing from the case if the agreement was not made, nothing but the best of reasons would be sufficient to uphold the agreement." Here, however, the implied threat to take no further action without a definite understanding had reference to reaffirming a contract already made, rather than to the making of a contract for the first time. Appellee had perhaps good reasons for asking for a definite understanding. The appellant had thrown out intimations of a settlement for her litigation. She had shown herself to be changeable in her humor, and had already employed two attorneys besides appellee in her lawsuit. She had repudiated the agreement of settlement entered into with her second husband. She had made some incorrect statements to her counsel; for example, she had charged that the note to Eimers and the trust deed to Thornton had been obtained by fraud, when the evidence overwhelmingly established the fact that those securities represented a bona fide loan, and that she herself had voluntarily united in the execution of the trust deed. Aside from the haste with which appellee secured his deed on January 17, 1884, we are satisfied that the action of appellant in the execution of that deed was free and voluntary. She admits that she was pleased with the result reached in getting a decree for the lots. The proof does not sustain her in the claim which she now makes,—that she thought she was conveying to appellee an undivided one-half of the lots, so that as cotenant she would have the benefit of his services in the further management of the property. On the contrary, the proof shows that the deed was fully explained to her, and that she well understood it to be a conveyance of the west half of the lots, and that she chose the east half in preference to the west half upon being given her choice. We think the proof also shows that appellant was fully advised of all the steps taken in the suit. She was acquainted with the value of the lots, and received information in relation thereto from the beginning of her troubles, having accepted a trust deed thereon in 1879, and having executed a trust deed thereon in 1880. In 1882 she had made an affidavit as to the value of the lots. Afterwards she is shown to have talked with a number of persons in regard to the future outcome of the property. She was a shrewd, capable, business woman; had been engaged in business before she married Pratt; and, though without much ready money, owned a house and two lots in a suburb called Melrose.

If appellant had filed her bill within a reasonable time, we are of the opinion that she would have been entitled to have the deed to appellee set aside, either upon the ground that both the deed and the contract which preceded it were obtained from her while the relation of client and attorney existed between herself and appellee, or upon the ground that the property agreed to be given and subsequently conveyed to appellee as compensation for his legal services was worth more than the reasonable and customary value of those services. But, inasmuch as the contract, which appellee could not have enforced, was fully completed and executed by the conveyance to him of one-half the property, the question arises whether or not appellant has not been guilty of laches in not sooner filing her bill to have the deed set aside. From January, 1884, when the deed was made, to December, 1890, when the present bill was filed, a period of almost seven years elapsed. In connection with the question of laches it is a fair subject of inquiry, under the facts of this case, whether the conduct of the appellant does not show acquiescence, if not confirmation, on her part. Where bills are filed to set aside contracts or deeds between parties standing in a confidential relation to each other, the defense of laches is not usually regarded with favor. It has been said that "length of time weighs less in such a case than in any other," and that it is "extremely difficult for a confidential agent to set up an available defense grounded on the laches of his employer." Wood v. Downes, 18 Ves. 120, note 1. But even in cases where it has been held that such contracts and sales, without reference to their fairness or honesty, will be set aside upon the application of the party in interest, it has at the same time been held that such application must be made within a reasonable time, to be judged of by the court under all the circumstances of the case. Hawley v. Cramer, 4 Cow. 717; Smith v. Thompson's Heirs, 7 B. Mon. 310; Fox v. Mackreth, 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. pt. 1 (4th Am. Ed.) p. 188, § 115; Id., p. 257; McCormick v. Malin, 5 Blackf. 509; Williams v. Reed, 3 Mason, 405, Fed. Cas. No. 17,733. What is a "reasonable time" cannot well be defined, but must be left, in large measure, to the determination of the court in view of the facts presented. Equity does not always follow the period of limitation fixed by statute and enforced in courts of law. Parties will be required to assert their rights within a shorter time in states where the values of real estate increase rapidly, and greater temptations are thereby afforded for speculative litigation. Burr v. Borden, 61 Ill. 389. But the party who is entitled to set the transaction aside cannot be charged with delay, or with acquiescence or confirmation, unless there has been knowledge of all the facts, and perfect freedom of action. Acts which might appear to be acts of acquiescence will not be held to be such if the client or cestui que trust is ignorant of the circumstances, or under the control of the original influence, or otherwise so situated as not to be free to enforce his rights. Rogers v. Marshall, supra; Hawley v. Cramer, supra. Confirmation may be evidenced by long acquiescence, "as by standing by and allowing the purchaser to lay out money in the firm belief that her title would not be contested." Pearson v. Benson, 28 Beav. 598.

Let us see how the appellant stood related to the two objections theretofore pointed out on January 17, 1884, and for nearly seven years thereafter. She must be held to have known that the property which she conveyed to appellee was worth more than his services. She alleges in her bill in this case that she agreed to pay him $400, and, while that allegation is not sustained by the proof, she must be held to be bound by it. In her testimony, after stating that appellee introduced the subject of his fees after Pratt's arrest, she says: "I asked him * * * what would be his fees for attending to all my business, and making everything perfectly clear and straight for me. * * * He said there was a great deal of work about the case, and would probably be a great deal more, and he would have to have $400." She swears that she thus knew the value of his services as fixed by himself. On January 17, 1884, with knowledge, according to her own evidence, that his services were estimated by himself to be worth only $400, she conveyed to him one-half of property which she had sworn to be worth $3,000 in March, 1882, and which was of greater value in 1884. With admitted knowledge as to the disparity between the value of the land and the value of the services, she permitted the appellee to deal with the west half of the land as his own, and recognized him as the owner thereof, for 6 years and 11 months, without giving any intimation that she intended to disturb his title. In December, 1884, he paid off one half of the incumbrance held by Eimers, and she not only permitted him thus to spend his own money on the property, but furnished him with the money to pay off the other half of the incumbrance for herself. From June 30, 1884, down to the time of filing the present bill, she paid taxes on the east half of the property, and suffered him to pay taxes on the west half; sometimes taking the money over to the treasurer's office for him, and paying his taxes for him on the west half. A little more than a month before filing the bill she paid $83.35 for an outstanding tax title against the east half, and he at the same time, with her consent, paid the same amount for a tax deed to himself of the same outstanding title against the west half. In 1888 and 1889 she made efforts not only to sell her own lots in the east half, but also to sell for him the lots in the west half which she had conveyed to him. She went out to the property in 1885, and employed a man to plant trees for her on the east half, telling him that appellee owned the west half. In 1886 she had some negotiation with one Whittemore about selling one of her lots in the east half to him, and spoke of Johnson as the owner of the west half by deed from herself for services. At another time she was present when appellee offered to sell his lots in the west half for $75 a lot, and talked to the same party about buying her own lots in the east half. In 1887 she occupied a part of the office of a real-estate agent named Hopson, and proposed to him that he should sell her lots, referring to appellee as the owner of the adjoining lots, and as being willing to sell them. The evidence shows that between January, 1884, and December, 1890, a belt line railroad was built to the west of these lots, and the Wisconsin Railroad Company laid its tracks in the neighborhood, and certain locomotive works were located in that vicinity. On account of these improvements, the lots, which had been bought for $600 in 1879, had become worth $16,000 in 1890.

It appears from the evidence that the defendant went into the office of the appellee as a typewriter in 1883, and did the business of a typewriter for several years. The appellee and two other attorneys had each a private room, and a large reception or waiting room. The appellant was permitted to use a typewriter belonging to appellee, occupying the reception room for that purpose. She was allowed the use of the room and of the typewriter without charge, and, in consideration thereof, she did for appellee such typewriting as he required. We cannot see that the appellee owed her anything for work done under this arrangement. While she was in his office she seems to have done a profitable business as a typewriter for outside parties. When she procured a typewriter of her own, and took another office in the same building, he paid her for the services which she rendered. Upon the ground of laches and acquiescence we think that the court below properly dismissed the bill. The decree of the superior court of Cook county is affirmed.

SOLINGER v. EARLE.

(82 N. Y. 393.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Nov. 9, 1880.

Appeal from judgment entered upon an order reversing a judgment for plaintiff upon an order overruling a demurrer to the complaint. The judgment of the general term sustained the demurrer and dismissed the complaint.

The facts appear in the opinion.

Abram Kling, for appellant. William M. Ivens, for respondents.

ANDREWS, J. The complaint alleges in substance that the plaintiff, to induce the defendants to unite with the other creditors of Newman & Bernhard in a composition of the debts of that firm, made a secret bargain with them to give them his negotiable note for a portion of their debt, beyond the amount to be paid by the composition agreement. He gave his note pursuant to the bargain, and thereupon the defendants signed the composition. The defendants transferred the note before due to a bona fide holder, and the plaintiff having been compelled to pay it, brings this action to recover the money paid. The complaint also alleges that the plaintiff was the brother-in-law of Newman, and entertained for him a natural love and affection, and was solicitous to aid him in effecting the compromise, and that the defendants knowing the facts, and taking an unfair advantage of their position, extorted the giving of the note as a condition of their becoming parties to the composition.

We think this action cannot be maintained. The agreement between the plaintiff and the defendants to secure to the latter payment of a part of their debt in excess of the ratable proportion payable under the composition was a fraud upon the other creditors. The fact that the agreement to pay such excess was not made by the debtor, but by a third person, does not divest the transaction of its fraudulent character.

A composition agreement is an agreement as well between the creditors themselves as between the creditors and their debtor. Each creditor agrees to receive the sum fixed by the agreement in full of his debt. The signing of the agreement by one creditor is often an inducement to the others to unite in it. If the composition provides for a pro rata payment to all the creditors, a secret agreement, by which a friend of the debtor undertakes to pay to one of the creditors more than his pro rata share, to induce him to unite in the composition, is as much a fraud upon the other creditors as if the agreement was directly between the debtor and such creditor. It violates the principle of equity, and the mutual confidence as between creditors, upon which the agreement is based, and diminishes the motive of the creditor who is a party to the secret agreement, to act in view of the common interest in making the composition. Fair dealing and common honesty condemn such a transaction. If the defendants here were plaintiffs seeking to enforce the note, it is clear that they could not recover. Cockshott v. Bennett, 2 Term R. 763; Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372. The illegality of the consideration upon well-settled principles would be a good defense. The plaintiff, although he was cognizant of the fraud, and an active participator in it, would nevertheless be allowed to allege the fraud to defeat the action, not, it is true, out of any tenderness for him, but because courts do not sit to give relief by way of enforcing illegal contracts, on the application of a party to the illegality. But if he had voluntarily paid the note, he could not, according to the general principle applicable to executed contracts void for illegality, have maintained an action to recover back the money paid. The same rule which would protect him in an action to enforce the note, protects the defendants in resisting an action to recover back the money paid upon it. Nellis v. Clark, 4 Hill, 429.

It is claimed that the general rule that a party to an illegal contract cannot recover back money paid upon it does not apply to the case of money paid by a debtor, or in his behalf, in pursuance of a secret agreement, exacted by a creditor in fraud of the composition, and the cases of Smith v. Bromley, 2 Doug. 696, note; Smith v. Cuff, 6 Maule & S. 160; and Atkinson v. Denby, 7 Hurl. & N. 934,—are relied upon to sustain this claim. In Smith v. Bromley the defendant, being the chief creditor of a bankrupt, took out a commission against him, but afterward finding no dividend likely to be made, refused to sign the certificate unless he was paid part of his debt, and the plaintiff, who was the bankrupt's sister, having paid the sum exacted, brought her action to recover back the money paid, and the action was sustained. Lord Mansfield in his judgment referred to the statute 5 Geo. II. c. 30, § 11, which avoids all contracts, made to induce a creditor to sign the certificate of the bankrupt, and said: "The present is a case of a transgression of a law made to prevent oppression, either on the bankrupt or his family, and the plaintiff is in the case of a person oppressed, from whom money has been extorted and advantage taken of her situation and concern for her brother." And again: "If any near relation is induced to pay the money for the bankrupt, it is taking an unfair advantage and torturing the compassion of his family." In Howson v. Hancock, 8 Term R. 575, Lord Kenyon said that Smith v. Bromley was decided on the ground that the money had been paid by a species of duress and oppression, and the parties were not in pari delicto, and this remark is fully sustained by reference to Lord Mansfield's judgment. Smith v. Cuff was an action brought to recover money paid by the plaintiff to take up his note given to the defendant, for the balance of a debt owing by the plaintiff, which was exacted by the latter as a condition of his signing with the other creditors a composition. The defendant negotiated the note and the plaintiff was compelled to pay it. The plaintiff recovered. Lord Ellenborough said: "This is not a case of par delictum; it is oppression on the one side and submission on the other; it never can be predicated as par delictum where one holds the rod and the other bows to it." Atkinson v. Denby was the case of money paid directly by the debtor to the creditor. The action was sustained on the authority of Smith v. Bromley and Smith v. Cuff.

It is somewhat difficult to understand how a debtor who simply pays his debt in full can be considered the victim of oppression or extortion because such payment is exacted by the creditor as a condition of his signing a compromise, or to see how both the debtor and creditor are not in pari delicto. See remark of Parke, B., in Higgins v. Pitt, 4 Exch. 312. But the cases referred to go no further than to hold that the debtor himself, or a near relative who out of compassion for him pays money upon the exaction of the creditor, as a condition of his signing a composition, may be regarded as having paid under duress and as not equally criminal with the creditor.

These decisions cannot be upheld on the ground simply that such payment is against public policy. Doubtless the rule declared in these cases tends to discourage fraudulent transactions of this kind, but this is no legal ground for allowing one wrongdoer to recover back money paid to another in pursuance of an agreement, illegal as against public policy. It was conceded by Lord Mansfield in Smith v. Bromley, that when both parties are equally criminal against the general laws of public policy, the rule is "potior est conditio defendentis," and Lord Kenyon in Howson v. Hancock, said that there is no case where money has been actually paid by one of two parties to the other upon an illegal contract, both being particeps criminis, an action has been maintained to recover it back.

It is laid down in Cro. Jac. 187, that "a man shall not avoid his deed by duress of a stranger, for it hath been held that none shall avoid his own bond for the imprisonment or danger of any one than himself only." And in Robinson v. Gould, 11 Cush. 57, the rule was applied where a surety sought to plead his own coercion as growing out of the fact that his principal was suffering illegal imprisonment as a defense to an action brought upon the obligation of the surety given to secure his principal's release. But the rule in Cro. Jac. has been modified so as to allow a father to plead the duress of a child, or a husband the duress of his wife, or a child the duress of the parent. Wayne v. Sands, 1 Freem. 351; Baylie v. Clare, 2 Brownl. & G. 276; 1 Rolle, Abr. 687; Jacob, Law Dict. "Duress."

We see no ground upon which it can be held that the plaintiff in this case was not in par delictum in the transaction with the defendants. So far as the complaint shows he was a volunteer in entering into the fraudulent agreement. It is not even alleged that he acted at the request of the debtor. And in respect to the claim of duress, upon which Smith v. Bromley was decided, we are of opinion that the doctrine of that and the subsequent cases referred to can only be asserted in behalf of the debtor himself, or of a wife or husband, or near relative of the blood of the debtor, who intervenes in his behalf, and that a person in the situation of the plaintiff, remotely related by marriage, with a debtor who pays money to a creditor to induce him to sign a composition, cannot be deemed to have paid under duress by reason simply of that relationship, or of the interest which he might naturally take in his relative's affairs.

The plaintiff cannot complain because the defendants negotiated the note, so as to shut out the defense, which he would have had to it in the hands of the defendants. The negotiation of the note was contemplated when it was given, as the words of negotiability show. It is possible that the plaintiff while the note was held by the defendants, might have maintained an action to restrain the transfer, and to compel its cancellation. Jackman v. Mitchell, 13 Ves. 581. But it is unnecessary to determine that question in this case. The plaintiff having paid the note, although under the coercion resulting from the transfer, the law leaves him where the transaction has left him.

The judgment should be affirmed.

All concur.

Judgment affirmed.

HANOVER NAT. BANK OF CITY OF NEW YORK v. BLAKE.

(37 N. E. 519, 142 N. Y. 404.)

Court of Appeals of New York. June 5. 1894.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, first department.

Action by the Hanover National Bank of the City of New York against Sarah F. Blake. From a judgment of the general term (20 N. Y. Supp. 780) affirming a judgment for defendant rendered at special term plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

The action is brought by the payee of a promissory note against the indorser. The facts were not in dispute, and were stated by the general term as follows: Frederick D. Blake and Charles Waterman were partners engaged in the dry-goods business under the firm name of F. D. Blake & Co. They were indebted to various creditors, including the plaintiff, and, becoming insolvent, executed a general assignment of all their property to James H. Thorp on the 24th day of April, 1888. On the 4th of June, 1888, the creditors of F. D. Blake & Co. signed a composition agreement by which they agreed to take 40 per cent. of their respective claims, to be paid by four notes, made by the members of the firm, each for 10 per cent. of the claim; two payable in 6 and 12 months, and two in 18 and 24 months,—the latter two indorsed by Sarah F. Blake. The Hanover Bank, desiring to have the security of Mrs. Blake upon all the notes, asked that she indorse the first two as well as the last two, which she did. This was not known to the other creditors, and was a security additional to that provided by the terms of the composition agreement. The note in suit is the third of the series, payable in 18 months, and properly indorsed by Mrs. Blake, in accordance with the composition agreement. At the trial both parties moved for judgment, which the court directed for the defendant. At the general term that judgment was affirmed, and the plaintiff has again appealed to this court.

Thos. S. Moore, for appellant. C. Bainbridge Smith, for respondent.

GRAY, J. (after stating the facts). In the general term opinion the question of law was stated thus: "Did the secret agreement, by which Mrs. Blake indorsed the first two notes, invalidate the whole composition agreement, so that notes given in pursuance of its terms are not enforceable by the plaintiff?" The learned justices, finding no controlling authority in this state, determined the question adversely to the plaintiff, and upon the ground, in substance, that, as the agreement was fraudulent, the fraud permeated and vitiated the whole composition agreement, and disabled the creditor from recovering anything under it. In this view we are not able to agree with them. It may be true that there was no decision, in the courts of this state, in its features so precisely in point as to compel adherence to its authority, and it is true that the view of the general term has support in decisions of English courts. I think, however, that in our state there are expressions of opinion by eminent judges of this court, and by a former very distinguished judge of the superior court of the city of New York, which rather commit us to a contrary view, and which should commend themselves to us, as furnishing a wise and more politic rule in these cases of composition by an insolvent debtor with his creditors. The general principle has been long settled in England and here that a secret agreement which induces a creditor to agree to a composition by the promise of a preference, or of some undue advantage, over the other creditors, is utterly repugnant to the composition agreement, and, from its fraudulent nature, is avoided by the law. The very essence of a composition agreement is that all creditors come in upon terms of equality, and that equality would be destroyed if the secret agreement were given effect. In Leicester v. Rose, 4 East, 372, at page 381, Lord Ellenborough observed that the principle of all the cases was "that where the creditors, in general, have bargained for an equality of benefit and mutuality of security, it shall not be competent for one of them to secure any partial benefit or security to himself." In Russell v. Rogers, 10 Wend. 474-479, Justice (afterwards chief justice) Nelson said: "So scrupulous are courts in compelling creditors to the observance of good faith towards one another in cases of this kind, that any security taken for an amount beyond the composition agreed upon, or even for that sum, better than that which is common to all, if unknown to the other creditors, is void and inoperative." It is in the extent of the operation of the principle, which was thus early asserted, that we will find the divergence of judicial opinions between English judges and those of this state. It is curious to observe that, though Leicester v. Rose was relied upon as the basis of authority for their conclusions, the application of the doctrine of that case has been different in each country. Leicester v. Rose was decided in 1803. Its facts were that several creditors of the insolvent refused to sign unless collateral security, which was to be given for the first two installments of the composition payment, should also be given for the last two. The defendant agreed to procure this additional security, and, not having done so, the action was brought to enforce his agreement. Lord Ellenborough stated the question to be whether any legal effect could be given to such an agreement, which gave to some creditors a better security than to others; and he held that it could not, as it was a fraud upon the rest of the creditors. The case of Howden v. Haigh, 11 Adol. & E. 1033, was decided in 1840, and was a suit upon composition notes. By a secret agreement between the plaintiff and defendant that the latter should indorse to him a bill accepted by a third party, in order to give him a preference beyond the other creditors, the former had been induced to sign the composition deed. It was held that he could not recover. Lord Denman, relying upon Leicester v. Rose and Knight v. Hunt, 5 Bing. 432, held that every part of the transaction was avoided by reason of the deceit upon the other creditors. Littledale, J., while agreeing with him that the fraud extended over the whole, remarked, rather significantly, "It is possible that the plaintiff may be entitled to sue for the original debt." The case of Knight v. Hunt, 5 Bing. 432, referred to by Lord Denman, if we are to regard the language of the opinion, did not expressly decide that the whole transaction was avoided. In that case the plaintiff had refused to accede to a composition of 10 shillings in the pound until a brother of the debtor agreed to supply him with coals to an amount in value equal to half the debt. The coals were furnished; but the notes remained unpaid, and the plaintiff brought this suit upon them. Best, C. J., stated the principle that the judgment of the creditors is influenced by the supposition that all are to suffer in the same proportion, and briefly concluded with the remark: "Here the plaintiff has had his ten shillings in the pound in coal, and he cannot have it again in money." In Mallalieu v. Hodgson, 16 Adol. & E. (N. S.) 689 (decided in 1851), Erle, J., held that "where any creditor, in fraud of the agreement to accept the composition, stipulates for a preference to himself, his stipulation is altogether void. Not only can he take no advantage from it, but he is also to lose the benefit of the composition." In this ruling he relied upon Leicester v. Rose and Howden v. Haigh. The plaintiff there was seeking to recover for the balance of his original debt, after allowing for the amount of the composition and the value of a preference. It was his claim that the composition deed had not released the debt to him, because he had been induced to believe that he alone was preferred, whereas some other creditors had also been secretly preferred. It will be observed that, in Mallalieu v. Hodgson, it was unnecessary to decide whether the plaintiff had lost the benefit of the composition. The question was whether the plaintiff could defeat the effect of the composition agreement by the plea that he had been deceived into supposing that he was the only creditor secretly preferred. As an expression of judicial opinion, it must, however, be accorded its weight as evidencing the continuance of the authority of Howden v. Haigh. That case furnishes the sole basis of authority on which subsequent decisions and text writers have rested the doctrine that the fraud in the secret agreement with the creditors so vitiates the whole transaction of composition as to disable him from recovering even the amount of the composition. Leake, Cont. 768; Chit. Cont. 694; Wald's Pol. Cont. 239. I say the sole authority, because Leicester v. Rose did not go so far as that, and Howden v. Haigh was an extension of the principle which was supposed to be justified by Lord Ellenborough's decision in the former case. The doctrine of Howden v. Haigh, it may be observed, did not go wholly unquestioned in England, as may be inferred from the remarks of Littledale, J., in that case, which I have quoted, and of Baron Alderson in Davidson v. McGregor, 8 Mees. & W., at page 763; who said he was "alarmed at the extent to which that decision goes."

In this state, with the case of Leicester v. Rose before him, Judge Duer, in Breck v. Cole, 4 Sandf. 79, formed quite a different conclusion as to the extent of the effect of a secret agreement which attempts to secure to a creditor an advantage over the other creditors. Breck v. Cole was an action upon a promissory note secretly given to the plaintiff, in addition to the composition notes, as an inducement to him to agree to the composition. Judge Duer, in his opinion, comments upon the fraudulent nature of the agreement, in its effect upon the other creditors; observing that "it is, in all cases, the concealment of a fact which it was material for them to know, and the knowledge of which might have prevented them from assenting to the composition. * * * Every composition deed is, in its spirit, if not in its terms, an agreement between the creditors themselves, as well as between them and the debtor. It is an agreement that each shall receive the sum or the security which the deed stipulates to be paid and given, and nothing more, and that upon this consideration the debtor shall be wholly discharged from all the debts then owing to the creditors who sign the deed." The learned judge then adverts to the violation of the equality among creditors worked by secretly giving additional security, and states this conclusion: "Hence, either the composition deed itself, * * * or the private agreement, which seeks to evade—and, if valid, would defeat—it, must be set aside; and sound policy and the principles of good faith require that the latter course should be followed. It is perfectly just that every creditor who signs a composition deed should be estopped from setting up any private agreement repugnant to its terms, or inconsistent with its intention and spirit, and * * * every private agreement * * * is of this character, and consequently * * * every security which is the fruit of such an agreement is illegal and void." He reviews the early decisions in the courts of England and of this state, and concludes that "it is the clear and inevitable result of the decisions that, where a composition is made with creditors, every security given to a particular creditor, not provided for in the terms of the deed, and not disclosed, is void, as a fraud upon the creditors from whom it is concealed." The importance of this expression of judicial opinion should not, in my judgment, be underestimated. It was delivered by one of the most eminent judges in this state, and was concurred in by his associates, Judges Mason and Campbell. It does not appear from the opinion that Howden v. Haigh was before him, although it had been decided 10 years before. But, whether his attention was called to it or not, the learned judge's opinion was formed after considering the same early English cases as were considered by Lord Denman in Howden v. Haigh and by Justice Erle in Mallalieu v. Hodgson. Judge Duer limited the effect of the fraudulent secret agreement to the nullification of any rights or advantages attempted to be gained under it, and regarded it as something quite separable from the composition agreement itself. From all the early cases in England and in this state, the inference from the decisions is, not that the composition agreement is avoided, but, as Justice Nelson stated it in Russell v. Rogers, "the security taken for an amount beyond the composition agreed upon, or even for that sum, better than that which is common to all, * * * is void and inoperative." So in Fellows v. Stevens, 24 Wend. 294, Justice Cowen held that the law would set aside "all secret terms made by the creditors with the debtor, more favorable to the former than is allowed to the other creditors." It is the secret agreement itself which is fraudulent and void. Bliss v. Matteson, 45 N. Y. 22; Harloe v. Foster, 53 N. Y. 385. And that is all that I think Leicester v. Rose decided. White v. Kuntz, 107 N. Y. 518, 14 N. E. 423, is one of the latest cases in which this court has considered the effect of composition agreements. In that case the plaintiff had signed a composition agreement by which he agreed with other creditors of the debtors to accept one-third of the indebtedness due them in four notes, to be indorsed by the father of the debtors. To induce the plaintiff to sign this agreement, Kuntz, the father of the debtors, secretly agreed to purchase of him the composition notes within a specified time, and to pay $10,000; the composition notes aggregating only about $6,000. This secret agreement Kuntz refused to perform, alleging that it was null and void. Thereupon, plaintiff brought an action, alleging these facts in his complaint, and also that several other creditors had been induced to sign by a secret agreement to pay them a larger percentage than the one-third provided for in the composition agreement, and, upon the ground that that agreement was void as to him, demanded its cancellation, and that of the notes delivered under it, and a judgment against the debtors for the amount of the original indebtedness. Demurrer to the complaint was sustained below, and in this court the judgment was sustained. It was held that the agreement between plaintiff and Kuntz, the debtors' father, was fraudulent, and could not be enforced, and that the composition agreement, as to all the innocent parties, was avoided. As the plaintiff was not an innocent party, but had himself taken a fraudulent advantage, he could not set up the fraud of the creditors. The opinion discusses what were his rights. It was said that he had not forfeited all claims upon his debtors; that "he must have either the composition notes, or his original notes;" that he could not avoid the composition agreement as to himself, and enforce his original notes for their full amount, as that would unjustly result in an advantage over the other creditors, and "he should be held to the composition." "His only remedy," it was said, "against the defendants, is upon the composition notes." Judge Earl, in delivering the opinion in White v. Kuntz, cited the English case of Mallalieu v. Hodgson, supra, as an authority in point; but that he did not adopt the opinion, in all its expressions, is evident, for he held that there was "no ground upon which he [the creditor in the case before him] can be deprived of all remedy." It is very plain, from the opinion in White v. Kuntz, that it is the secret agreement, by which the creditor receives an undue advantage, which is deemed to be avoided. It was so considered, again, by Judge Andrews, in Meyer v. Blair, 109 N. Y. 600, 17 N. E. 228, who, referring to White v. Kuntz as authority for the statement that a collateral agreement is void in composition cases, which secures to one creditor an advantage over others, said, "The court refuses to enforce the secret bargain, and confines the creditor, who is a party to the fraud, to a remedy to recover the sum which, by the terms of the composition, he agreed to accept." In Solinger v. Earle, 82 N. Y. 393, the facts were that a third party had given his note for a portion of the insolvent's debt to the defendants, to induce them to agree to the composition. Having paid the note to a transferee thereof, he brought an action to recover back from the defendants the money so paid. It was held that the action could not be maintained, for, though the transaction was a fraud upon the other creditors, the parties were in pari delicto. Judge Andrews, remarking that fair dealing condemned such a transaction, said: "If the defendants here were plaintiffs seeking to enforce the note, it is clear that they could not recover." Inasmuch as the note sued upon was for an additional amount beyond the amount of the composition agreement, the remark of the learned judge was in line with all the authorities. He held the secret agreement was void, and could not have been enforced. The case is in no wise in conflict with White v. Kuntz or Meyer v. Blair.

If we should say that the fraud of the secret agreement made by the creditor operated to avoid the whole transaction of composition, the result would be to leave him with the original indebtedness unreleased. If the composition agreement, by which the debt was compromised, is to be deemed nullified by the fraudulent transaction, I do not see why the creditor would not be at liberty to pursue the original debt; a view which Littledale, J., regarded as possible in Howden v. Haigh. It would certainly seem to be the logical outcome of the proposition asserted below that, if the composition agreement has been avoided, it has become inoperative as an agreement for any purpose. We assert a wholesome rule, and one which works a just result, if we hold that the secret and fraudulent agreement itself is illegal, and is inoperative to confer any rights or advantages upon the creditor. Perfect equality is to be maintained among the creditors. It was thought below that the secret agreement and the composition agreement constituted but a single and indivisible transaction or agreement. I am not prepared to accede to that proposition, though it has support in some of the English cases referred to. It seems to me the case falls easily within the rule which permits a severance of the illegal from the legal part of the covenant. Pickering v. Railway Co., L. R. 3 C. P. 235, 250; U. S. v. Bradley, 10 Pet. 343-360. In Mallam v. May, 11 Mees. & W. 653, the plaintiffs, who were surgeon dentists, agreed to take the defendant as an assistant, and to instruct him for a term of years, and he agreed, at the expiration of that term, not to practice his profession "in London, or any of the towns in, or places in, England or Scotland, where the plaintiffs might have been practicing." It was held that the covenant as to not practicing in London was valid, and that not to practice elsewhere was illegal, but that the valid part was not affected by the illegality of the other part. Here, the agreement with other creditors for a composition was lawful and valid, unless they should elect to rescind it upon the discovery of the secret agreement,—an element not present. But the agreement for, and the giving of, additional security, was unlawful and void. Is there any reason why the bad may not be rejected, and the good retained? If the alternative is, as it presents itself to my mind, that the composition agreement shall stand as a release of the plaintiff's original demand, or that it shall fall, and leave the plaintiff at liberty to recover the original debt, I am for upholding it, and I fail to see why the legal part of the transaction had with it cannot be severed from the illegal part. We should be careful, in our desire to punish the harsh and unscrupulous creditor, who presses his debtor, and bargains for an advantage over other creditors, by deprivation of legal rights and remedies, that we do not go too far, and lay down a rule which may result unjustly in other ways. It ought not to be possible that through his fraud he may be reinstated in his original position as a creditor for the whole sum due. The operation of a secret agreement is such that the other innocent creditors may, because of the fraud of their debtor, elect to refuse to be bound by their agreement of composition with him. If the secret agreement is executory, they may not so elect, and may rely that the creditor secretly seeking to obtain some promise of advantage over them will be prevented from enforcing it, and from gaining anything by his fraud. Its illegality is a perfect defense in the hands of the promisor. The composition agreement is one thing, as an agreement between all the creditors to release some part of the insolvent's indebtedness to them, upon terms equal as to each; and the secret fraudulent agreement with one or more of them is a stipulation which, from its inception, was unlawful, and which the law annuls. Bliss v. Matteson, 45 N. Y. 22.

It was also suggested in the opinion below, in support of the rule there asserted, that if it did not obtain there would be an inducement to an unscrupulous creditor to commit a fraud, for his only risk would be to lose his additional security, while assured of the amount of his composition. To a certain extent, that may be true; but, on the other hand, it may be suggested that if it were the rule the insolvent debtor would have the inducement to ensnare his creditors into some secret arrangement, and thus, by trick and device, to leave them wholly remediless,—disabled to recover the amount of the composition, and disabled from pursuing the original debt which the composition agreement released. It seems wiser simply to regard the secret agreement as one which the law avoids for its fraud. The creditor makes it with the risk of its worthlessness, if repudiated, and the debtor makes it with the peril that its discovery will furnish cause for his other creditors to avoid the composition agreement. The conclusion reached is the result of a careful examination of the authorities, and the doctrine they teach, and it is in accord with a wiser policy. It must not be forgotten that the defendant's contract of indorsement is within the terms of the composition agreement with respect to the note in suit. We know nothing of the fate of the earlier notes, the indorsement upon which by defendant was secretly and fraudulently procured to be added. She had a perfect defense to the enforcement of her contract. We are only concerned now with the question of whether the plaintiff shall have the amount of the composition, notwithstanding it may have been agreed secretly that it should have some better security for the payment of some of the composition installments. This question, for the reasons stated, should be answered in the affirmative; and therefore the judgments below should be reversed, and a new trial ordered, with costs to abide the event. All concur, except ANDREWS, C. J., and PECKHAM, J., dissenting. Judgments reversed.

CHANDLER et al. v. HOLLINGSWORTH
et al.

(3 Del. Ch. 99.)

Court of Chancery of Delaware. Sept. Term, 1867.

E. G. Bradford and Mr. Higgins, for complainants. Mr. McCaulley, for defendants.

BATES, Ch. The case presented for relief is this: William Chandler, three days before his marriage with the complainant Elizabeth Chandler, while under an engagement of marriage with her, made a voluntary conveyance of all his estate, real and personal, thereby, if it be allowed to operate, defeating the right of dower which otherwise would have accrued from the marriage, and also withdrawing from his own control the means he then had, whereby provision might be made for his intended wife and the issue of the marriage, either through a will or by law in case of his dying intestate. This conveyance was made without notice to her, and, as we must take it, without her knowledge derived in any way whatever before the marriage. Yet no misrepresentation as to his means appears; nor any positive deception as to what was done beyond simple nondisclosure. Nor are we to consider it as an element in the case that Mrs. Chandler, before the engagement, knew that Chandler had held this property or that she had formed any expectations with regard to it.

We may now take the legal question presented by such a case. Will a court of equity relieve against a voluntary conveyance by the husband of all his estate, made pending an engagement; or, as the English cases term it, pending a treaty of marriage made without any disclosure to the intended wife or knowledge on her part, though without any express misrepresentation or deception practiced by the husband? This is the general question; but it is to be considered in two forms:

(1) Will equity relieve, at least so far as to save to the wife her dower in the real estate, even though the conveyance must stand as it affects the personal estate and also the real estate, except as this may be subject to dower?

(2) Will equity go further, and set aside the deed wholly, thereby admitting to take effect the same consequences which would have followed if no such deed had been executed, so that, as Chandler in fact died intestate, the whole property shall descend or be distributed as in ordinary cases of intestacy?

Either form of relief will give Mrs. Chandler her dower. On the latter depends her claim to a share of the personal estate, and the claim on behalf of the infant complainant as heir at law and distributee.

1. Let us consider the first question. The English court of chancery has from the earliest times protected the marital rights of the husband against a fraudulent settlement by the wife pending a treaty of marriage. It is considered that he becomes a purchaser of the wife's property, in consideration of the charge he assumes of her maintenance and the payment of her debts; that this is a right upon which fraud may be committed, and which ought to be protected. Lord Thurlow, in Countess of Strathmore v. Bowes, 1 Ves. Jr. 27. This view has commanded universal consent from the beginning. But until a recent date the doubt has been as to what circumstances should be held to render the settlement fraudulent,—whether there must have been some misrepresentation or deception practiced upon the husband, such as amounts to actual fraud, or whether mere nondisclosure was sufficient as a fraud in law to invalidate the settlement; especially, whether mere nondisclosure should be fatal where the husband was at the time of the marriage ignorant as well of his wife's having held the property as of its having been disposed of away from him.

The first full examination of this subject was in Countess of Strathmore v. Bowes (decided in 1789) supra. That was a bill filed by Bowes, the husband, to set aside a settlement made before marriage by his wife, the Countess of Strathmore. There was also a cross bill filed by the wife to set aside a deed revoking the settlement, on the ground of duress by the husband in obtaining it from her. First, upon an issue directed to inquire whether the deed of revocation was obtained by the duress, and, a verdict so finding, that deed was set aside. 2 Brown. Ch. 345. Then the cause came to be heard upon the bill to set aside the settlement, before Justice Buller, sitting for the lord chancellor. He decreed in favor of Lady Strathmore. Upon a rehearing before Lord Chancellor Thurlow, the decree was affirmed; and, finally, it was affirmed again on appeal to the house of lords. The argument before Justice Buller and his opinion are reported in 2 Cox, Ch. 28. The rehearing before the lord chancellor, with his opinion, are reported both in Cox, Ch. and in 1 Ves. Jr. 22. Upon the rehearing the arguments are best reported in Ves. Jr., but the opinion of Lord Thurlow, in Cox, Ch. As a decision the case is of no importance upon the question before us, since the settlement made by Lady Strathmore was not a fraud upon the marital rights of her husband under any—the most liberal—construction of fraud. It was made before she knew Bowes, her future husband, even pending a treaty of marriage with another man, and with his consent; and her marriage to Bowes was itself obtained by a gross fraud on his part. But the case is valuable as containing a full review of all the prior decisions. Justice Buller considered that the decisions had gone only so far as to relieve the husband in cases of some actual fraud practiced upon him, and he so lays down the rule. The result, he says, is “that, if the wife is guilty of any fraud, and holds out to the husband that there is nothing to interfere with his rights, then any deed executed by her in prejudice of such representation shall be void." Bare concealment he held not to be sufficient. 2 Cox, Ch. 30. Lord Thurlow, though it did not affect the result of that case, seems to have held to the more liberal construction of frauds, which includes concealment as well as positive misrepresentation. In his opinion (1 Ves. Jr. 28) he says: "If a woman, during the course of a treaty of marriage with her, makes, without notice to the intended husband, a conveyance of any part of her property, I should set it aside, though good prima facie, because affected with that fraud." It is true, according to Justice Buller's view, that the early decisions were upon cases of actual misrepresentation or deception, but it is also true that the distinct question whether bare concealment was itself fraud had never before been raised; and therefore the cases prior to that of Strathmore v. Bowes are to be considered rather as presenting examples of fraud as they occurred in fact, than as deciding in what fraud on marital rights must consist so as to limit the construction of it. Lord Thurlow must so have regarded them in laying down his view of fraud in terms more comprehensive than Justice Buller had done, embracing in his definition mere concealment, which Justice Buller had expressly excluded. The later decisions in England and America have sanctioned the view of Lord Thurlow.

The first of these is Goddard v. Snow, 1 Russ. 485, decided by Lord Gifford, master of the rolls, in 1826. In that case, the wife, ten months before her marriage, settled to her separate use for her life, and subject to her appointment after her death, two sums of money, £900 in all, being not the whole of her estate. Her intended husband was ignorant both of her possession of the funds and of the settlement made of them, and so continued until after her death, when he filed his bill to set aside the settlement as one made in fraud of his marital rights. No actual misrepresentation was alleged, nor deception other than was implied in the concealment. Here the precise question was presented whether bare concealment was in itself a fraud. In the argument and decision of this case, Countess of Strathmore v. Bowes was fully reviewed, and the opinions of Justice Buller and Lord Thurlow considered. Concealment alone was held to be a fraud, and the settlement was set aside.

Next is a case in which the subject is considered by Lord Brougham, though the decision went upon other grounds. St. George v. Wake, 1 Mylne & K. 610. Lord Brougham raises the question, and upon a review of the cases says that in none, except Goddard v. Snow, had there been a positive decision avoiding a settlement by the wife on the mere ground of want of knowledge by the husband. "Yet," he proceeds to say, "it is certain that all the cases in which the subject is approached treat the principle as one of undoubted acceptance in this court; and it must be held to be the rule of the court, to be gathered from a uniform current of dicta, though resting upon a very slender foundation of actual decision touching the simple point." This was in 1833.

In England v. Downs (1840) 2 Beav. 522, in which the question concerned the validity of a settlement made by a widow upon children of a former marriage before a second marriage, the master of the rolls, Lord Langdale, considered it not sufficiently proved that the settlement was made pending a treaty of marriage; or, if so, that it was concealed up to the time of the marriage; and on these grounds he sustained the settlement. But he states the law quite fully on the point before us, and clearly in accordance with Goddard v. Snow, that mere concealment is sufficient to avoid an antenuptial settlement by the wife. He adds a qualification, not necessary to be here considered, viz. that the concealment is evidence of fraud, rather than fraud per se, and therefore is open to explanation; so that cases may occur in which noncommunication would not be held fraudulent.

Next is Taylor v. Pugh (1842) 1 Hare, 608. In this case, a settlement made before marriage, to the exclusion of the husband, was sustained on the special ground that the husband had previously seduced the woman, thus putting her in a situation in which she must submit to a marriage without being able to stipulate for a settlement out of her own property. In his opinion, the vice chancellor, Sir James Wigram, notices, with strong disapproval, the argument, that to avoid such an antenuptial settlement by a wife, without the intended husband's knowledge, actual fraud or deception must be proved; and he cites as the true rule a statement from 2 Ropers, Husb. & Wife, 162, that "deception will be inferred if, after the commencement of the treaty for marriage, the wife should attempt to make any disposition of her property without her intended husband's knowledge or concurrence."

It is true that the cases cited subsequent to that of Goddard v. Snow give only the dicta of judges in support of the rule of that case; but they show at least a concurrent judicial opinion, from that case down, in favor of the rule which holds mere concealment to be at least evidence of fraud. The real doubt has been whether the concealment should, in all cases, per se avoid the settlement, or whether a settlement not disclosed to the husband might, nevertheless, be sustained upon such equitable considerations as the meritorious character of the objects provided for, such as children of a former marriage (Hunt v. Matthews, 1 Vern. 408; King v. Cotton, 2 P. Wms. 675); so the poverty of the husband and his inability to make any settlement upon his wife (King v. Cotton, supra; St. George v. Wake, 1 Mylne & K. 610); so the fact that the settlement is of part only of the wife's property, which was the ground in De Manneville v. Crompton, 1 Veas. & B. 354.

The only equitable consideration relied upon in the pending case was that Mrs. Chandler, as we must assume, had no knowledge that William Chandler had held the property in controversy; and hence the expectation of it could not have been an inducement to the marriage. But this circumstance is certainly immaterial. The true ground of relief is not the disappointment of an expectation, but fraud upon a legal right; that is, the right to a marriage without any secret alteration of the circumstances of the parties as they stood at the time of the engagement. The husband's ignorance of the property settled, though urged in Goddard v. Snow and Taylor v. Pugh as a ground for sustaining the settlement, was expressly overruled and was disapproved in England v. Downs. In the latter case Lord Langdale says: "If both the property and the mode of its conveyance pending the marriage treaty were concealed from the intended husband, as was the case in Goddard v. Snow, there is still a fraud practiced on the husband. The nonacquisition of property of which he had no notice is no disappointment; but still his legal right to property actually existing is defeated, and the vesting and continuance of a separate power in his wife over property which ought to have been his, and which is, without his consent, made independent of his control, is a surprise upon him, and might, if previously known, have induced him to abstain from the marriage." In Taylor v. Pugh the same consideration was rejected by the vice chancellor; and he reasoned with great force that no equitable considerations arising out of the circumstances of the particular case, such as those before referred to, shall excuse a concealment from the husband, or sustain a settlement made without his knowledge.

In this country the ignorance of the husband of a settlement by the wife pending a treaty of marriage has of itself been uniformly held fatal to the settlement, though no actual misrepresentation or deceit might appear. The cases are collected in 1 White & T. Lead. Cas. Eq. 317. See, especially, Linker v. Smith, 4 Wash. C. C. 224, Fed. Cas. No. 8,373; Tucker v. Andrews, 13 Me. 124; Logan v. Simmons, 3 Ired. Eq. 487; Spencer v. Spencer, 3 Jones, Eq. 404, 409; Poston v. Gillespie, 5 Jones, Eq. 258; Ramsay v. Joyce, 1 McM. Eq. 236 (in which latter case an issue was directed to the single question whether the husband had knowledge of the settlement); and Manes v. Durant, 2 Rich. Eq. 404. In North and South Carolina the whole subject of fraud on marital rights has been examined in a series of cases contemporaneous with the later English decisions, and without reference to them, but reaching the same conclusion, viz. that no antenuptial settlement by the wife can be valid if made without the husband's knowledge; it matters not how meritorious may be the objects provided for by the wife, or what may be the circumstances of the husband. He is considered as having rights springing out of the treaty of marriage, not to be controlled by any equitable considerations between the wife and third person. And in North Carolina the result reached by frequent investigations of the subject has been to establish a rule requiring, in order to sustain a settlement by the wife, not only that the husband have general knowledge of her intention to make one, or that she has done so, but requiring his consent to the very act or instrument by which the settlement is made. Spencer v. Spencer, 3 Jones, Eq. 409; Poston v. Gillespie, 5 Jones, Eq. 262.

We see, then, both in England and in this country, since the decision of Countess of Strathmore v. Bowes, and the cases prior to it, the course of judicial opinion has tended more and more to strengthen the protection of marital rights against settlements made to their prejudice (1) by enlarging the ground of invalidity. This originally was only actual fraud, evidenced by positive misrepresentation or deceit, but now it includes also constructive fraud, such as arises from mere nondisclosure; and (2) by excluding all the exceptions founded on equitable considerations in the particular case, which were originally allowed to support such settlement; thus making in all cases the husband's knowledge, at least, and in some courts his positive assent, essential to the validity of a conveyance or settlement made after an engagement to marry.

Now, wishing to lay down a rule only for the case presented, it is enough to say that this court will protect a husband against a voluntary conveyance or settlement by the wife of all her estate, to the exclusion of her husband, made pending an engagement of marriage, without his knowledge, prior to the marriage, even in the absence of express misrepresentation or deceit, and whether the husband knew of the existence of the property or not. The concealment of what it is the right of the husband to know, and what it is the duty of the wife to disclose, is itself fraud in law. It is a doctrine of equity, not so fully developed at the date of Strathmore v. Bowes as now, that the concealment, to the prejudice of another party with whom one is dealing, of facts which, if known to him, might affect his decision, and which there is an obligation arising out of the transaction to disclose, is a fraud. It is so treated in equity without respect to the motive of the party in the concealment, being what is termed a "constructive fraud." But whether a conveyance or settlement made under the circumstances I have stated is always void, or whether it may be sustained upon such equitable considerations as were admitted in the earlier English cases, and in St. George v. Wade, 1 Mylne & K. 610. such as the reasonableness of its provisions as being made for children of a former marriage, or its embracing only a part of the wife's estate, or such as the husband's inability to make a settlement upon the wife, I leave as questions open in this state until they arise judicially.

We now reach a question which was discussed with much earnestness and ability on both sides: Will equity extend to the wife the like protection against an antenuptial conveyance by her husband which we have seen it affords to the husband against her?

After a patient examination of the argument and authorities, I find no just ground of discrimination against the wife. First, dower is a right of property, and, as such, a proper subject of protection; indeed, a right above all other rights of property favored. Again, dower is a marital right, as well as is the husband's interest in the wife's property. Protection, maintenance, and dower are the rights inuring to her from the marriage; and, though her dower is inchoate only until the husband's death, it is none the less, in his lifetime, a legal right, vested and indefeasible, except by her own act. This is so far recognized that a release of it by the wife is held a sufficient consideration to support a postnuptial settlement upon her, and to make it available, if bona fide, against the husband's creditors. Ath. Mar. Sett. (27 Law Lib.) 162; Bullard v. Briggs, 7 Pick. 533. Again, the wife is a purchaser of her marital rights, as much so as is the husband. She takes them for a consideration, rendered by her in the marriage,—a consideration not, indeed, the same in kind as that rendered by the husband for his marital rights, but, considering all the consequences involved in marriage, what the wife surrenders is in value or measure more, certainly not less, than what she receives. She surrenders her person, her services, her self-control, her means of self-support; and, as to property, far more than the interest she acquires. However, it should be said that whether the wife's dower, as well as the husband's interest in her estate, is to be protected against fraud, depends not at all upon such considerations as the comparative value of the consideration rendered by each, or the value of their respective rights, but solely upon the fact that there exists a marital right, which, in common with all legal rights, is a proper subject of legal protection, whether it be itself of more or less value, or whether it spring from a larger or less consideration rendered. If there could be any ground, in addition to the mere existence of a right defrauded, to evoke a swifter interposition for one sex rather than the other, it would be the consideration that the wife, being of the weaker sex, the more needs legal protection.

It was argued by the defendant's counsel that in England dower is not protected as a marital right against a conveyance by the husband before the marriage, even though made on the eve of marriage and expressly to exclude the wife, that under the English decisions, the husband and wife, in this respect, stand on a different footing. There is no decision upon the precise question, but the weight of opinion is in favor of the position taken. Prior to the statute of uses, estates were largely held in trust; and it was, from the beginning, considered that dower did not attach to a use, even when it was one reserved to the husband under a conveyance made by himself. Whether a conveyance with a use reserved to himself by the husband, made on the eve of marriage, and with the express purpose of barring dower, was, at that period, held to be effectual, does not appear by any decided case. The case Ex parte Bell, 1 Glyn & J. 282, cited in 1 Roper, Husb. & Wife (32 Law Lib.) 354n, that a voluntary settlement made by the husband, though set aside as fraudulent against creditors, prevents his wife's right of dower, cannot be taken as a decision upon the question, since it does not appear whether the settlement was made pending a marriage treaty. The dicta on this point are conflicting. Lord Chief Baron Gilbert is reported to have said that such a conveyance would be fraudulent as to the wife. 4 Cruise, Dig. 416; 1 Roper, Husb. & Wife (32 Law Lib.) 354n. In 1 Crusie, 411, and in 4 Cruise, 416, it is laid down that a secret conveyance by the husband, in trust before marriage, to defeat dower, is void; and the whole doctrine as to antenuptial settlements by the wife is expressly applied to conveyances by the husband made under like circumstances. On the other hand, Lord Hardwicke, in Swannock v. Lyford, Co. Litt. 208a, note 1, also reported fully in Park, Dower, 382, treats it as admitted "that if a man, before marriage, conveys his estate privately, without the knowledge of his wife, to trustees in trust for himself and his heirs in fee, that will prevent dower." Upon this authority, Park, Dower, 236, so lays down the rule. So, also, does 1 Washb. Real Prop. 161. After the statute of uses, which converted all uses into legal estates, and so admitted dower to attach to them, another mode of avoiding the inconveniences of dower was resorted to by the practice of settling jointures in lieu of dower. By a statute of Henry VIII., which was passed to remedy the inconvenient effect of the statute of uses as to dower, the husband was authorized to settle upon his intended wife, before the marriage, a jointure, which, if reasonable, was held effectual as an equivalent for dower, and barred it, even though made without the wife's privity, the courts of equity reserving the power to relieve the wife against a jointure unfair or merely illusory. Such, after much controversy was the construction finally given to this statute in Earl of Buckingham v. Drury, 3 Brown, Parl. Cas. 492, cited in 1 Roper, Husb. & Wife, 477. The effect was that dower, under the English system, became a precarious, and, in the case of large estates, an infrequent mode of provision for the wife; and hence its value as a marital right, and the importance of protecting it, was the less appreciated. Marriage was not presumed to have been contracted in expectation of it, unless upon representations to the wife that she would become entitled to it. This may account for what otherwise must appear as an unjust discrimination made by the English courts of equity in withholding from the wife such protection as is given to the husband against secret antenuptial settlements. Such a reason is suggested in the note to 1 Roper, Husb. & Wife, 354. But in this country, clearly the same reasons do not apply. Her dower is the only provision made by law for the wife out of the husband's real estate. Practically it is a most important resource, and the only form of provision out of real estate enjoyed by her, except under wills. It does, in fact, to a large extent, enter into the wife's expectations in contracting marriage, and properly so. It, therefore, ought to receive all the protection accorded to any marital right. To refuse it would, in this country, where jointures are unknown, render the right of dower precarious, if not wholly illusory.

In none of the American cases has this subject been thoroughly examined; but so far as they have gone they treat the wife's marital rights and their claim to protection as being on the same footing with those of the husband. In Swaine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. 482, a conveyance was made by a husband before marriage, with a view to defeat the wife's dower. The deed was to his daughter, was kept concealed for many years, and possession did not go with it. After the husband's death the widow filed her bill for dower, and it was decreed to her; the deed being adjudged fraudulent as against her. It is true, that in a previous suit, the deed had been held void as against a mortgagee claiming under a mortgage subsequent in date to the deed; but the widow was admitted to her dower not at all in consequence of the decree previously made, that the deed was void as against the mortgagee. It was expressly declared to be fraudulent as against her also; and she would have been relieved quite as certainly, had there been no previous controversy between the husband's representatives and another party touching the deed. It is also true that this was treated by the chancellor as a case of fraud in fact. It is, then, an authority for the relief of the wife against an antenuptial conveyance by the husband, fraudulent in fact; but whether she should be relieved against a conveyance on the ground of mere nondisclosure is a question not decided in Swaine v. Perine.

To the same extent precisely is the ruling of Petty v. Petty, 4 B. Mon. 215. In that case a settlement by the husband, on the eve of marriage, of all his property, upon his children by a former marriage, was declared void so far as it affected the wife's dower in the real estate. It was a case of fraud in fact, very gross in its circumstances, being in violation of express representations made to the wife before marriage, in order to induce her consent. This case, like Swaine v. Perine, decides nothing as to the effect of mere concealment. It is, however, in one of its features, a valuable recognition of the meritorious character of dower as a marital right, and of its claim to legal protection; for the wife was relieved upon a bill filed in her husband's lifetime, while her dower was inchoate only, the deed being adjudged void, lest it should, through delay, become an impediment to her right of dower in the event of her surviving the husband.

Now, although, in Swaine v. Perine and Petty v. Petty, relief was given against fraud in fact, yet in weighing the effect of these decisions upon the case before us this is to be considered. They recognize the wife's dower to be a marital right, and as such a proper subject of protection in equity against a fraudulent antenuptial conveyance, placing it upon an equal footing in this respect with the husband's marital rights. Then, with respect to the sort of fraud against which she should be relieved; whether it must be only what is termed fraud "in fact," or whether she should be protected against "constructive fraud," such as bare concealment, the same rule must apply in her favor which we have already seen has become settled for the husband's protection, viz. that constructive, as well as actual, fraud will invalidate an antenuptial conveyance.

Two cases, at least, have carried the protection of the wife thus far. One is Cransom v. Cransom, 4 Mich. 230. A husband, two weeks before his marriage, made a voluntary conveyance of his lands to his sons, with the design to exclude his intended wife. There was no misrepresentation to the wife; no positive deception. It was a case of mere concealment. The deed was held void on two distinct grounds, viz. the absence of a sufficient delivery, and also that, "being executed secretly, for the purpose of cutting off the wife's dower, it was a fraud in law upon her rights accrued directly from the marriage." The other case of this class is Smith v. Smith, 6 N. J. Eq. 515. A husband, on the day of the marriage, but before it, without the wife's knowledge, settled property upon himself and a daughter by a former marriage, with intent to defeat dower. Actual misrepresentation was alleged by the bill, but denied by the answer. No proof to that effect appears, and the decision does not rest upon any such feature; but the chancellor assumes the broad ground that "a voluntary conveyance by a man on the eve of marriage, unknown to the intended wife, and made for the purpose of defeating the interest which she would acquire by the marriage in his estate, is fraudulent as against her. I see no sound distinction," he adds, "between this case and the like conveyance by a woman under the like circumstances."

In 1 Scrib. Power, 561, there are cited, to the same point, Littleton v. Littleton, 1 Dev. & B. 327, and Rowland v. Rowland, 2 Sneed, 543; but these cases I have not seen. Scribner refers to the American decisions as "not being entirely uniform"; and in 1 Washb. Real Prop. 175, it is said that "the cases are singularly conflicting." On examination of the cases, I find no conflict whatever as to the power of a court of equity to relieve the wife. It is only in courts of law, where a legal seisin is essential to dower, that the claim to it against the husband's conveyance prior to marriage has been denied; as in Baker v. Chase, 6 Hill, 482. The other case cited in Washburn as against the doctrine of Swaine v. Perine is Jenny v. Jenny, 24 Vt. 324. I have examined this case, and think it not relevant to the question, though, not having it by me, I cannot state its circumstances. The rule to be derived from the equity decisions is that the wife's dower will be protected against a voluntary conveyance of the husband, made pending a marriage engagement, under precisely the same circumstances in which the husband is relieved against an antenuptial settlement by the wife.

I am therefore of opinion that Mrs. Chandler is entitled to dower out of the real estate described in the deed of trust, notwithstanding the execution of the deed before her marriage, together with one-third of the rents and profits accrued since her husband's death. It appears from the answer that part of the real estate—a lot in Wilmington—has been sold by the trustees for $400, its value. Assuming, as it is proper to do, that the purchaser was a bona fide purchaser, without notice, the court will not follow this lot into his hands; but the widow is nevertheless entitled, as against the defendants, to an assignment of such a share of the remaining real estate as she would have taken if the lot had remained in their hands; and therefore, in assigning the dower, although it will be assigned only out of the remaining real estate, yet in estimating her share of that, the whole real estate, including the lot sold, will be considered.

2. It now remains to consider briefly the claim of the complainants to relief beyond the allowance of dower to the widow. The prayer is that the trust deed be declared wholly void, so that the real estate may descend under the intestate law, and the personal estate be distributed precisely as if no deed had been executed. This relief the court cannot decree.

A court of equity will not interfere to set aside a voluntary conveyance, because the conveyance disappoints hopes or expectations, however just and reasonable; not even because it violates obligations, if they are only natural or moral ones. Courts of equity, as well as of law, protect only legal rights, and enforce legal obligations; legal, I mean, as distinguished from such as are merely natural or moral. For example, a promise, however solemnly made and binding in morals, if without a consideration, is not enforced in equity any more than at law; nor is the obligation of a parent to provide for children after his death. So a conveyance will be set aside on the ground of fraud only when it is in fraud of some legal right, and one existing at the time it is made. Now, in this case, we may waive the fact that, as to the infant complainant, he was not in esse at the execution of the trust deed. It is a consideration decisive of the whole of this branch of the case that, even had William Chandler not conveyed his estate, his marriage would have vested no rights in it, nor have restricted his absolute control of it beyond the wife's dower in the real estate. He could, after marriage, have effectually disposed of his whole personal estate and of the inheritance of his real estate by just such a trust deed as this. It follows that his control of the property could not be less absolute before the marriage than after it; for, otherwise, an engagement to marry would be of more force than marriage itself. Besides, as any disposal of property before marriage, which he could as freely have made after marriage, defeated no right, but removed only a bare chance that the complainants might succeed to it if Chandler should continue to hold it and die intestate, the loss of such a chance cannot be treated as the disappointment of a just and reasonable expectation in marriage, nor as so altering the circumstances of the husband as to have influenced the decision of the intended wife. Again, it is clear that this deed would have stood against any attempt by Chandler to dispose of the personal estate and the inheritance of the real estate by another deed or by will. That he made no such attempt, but died intestate, so that, as it happened, these complainants would have succeeded to the whole property but for this deed, cannot affect the deed. A conveyance can be set aside only for causes affecting it when it is made, as for fraud then committed, or for the protection of rights then existing. Its validity cannot be held in suspense, to be determined by future contingencies. This would subject titles to a distressing uncertainty.

But it was argued for the complainants that the deed, being fraudulent in respect to dower, is, therefore, wholly void, passing no title whatever; so that the heir at law may succeed to the real estate, and the distributees to the personal estate, as a consequence of the fraud on the right of dower, though they themselves might have no equity to set the deed aside. Such would be the effect if the deed were illegal; as where it violates the provisions of a statute which avoids the deed itself. It is then a nullity, and stands in the way of no claim which otherwise would be valid. And so, where a conveyance is tainted with fraud in fact, in which the parties claiming under it are implicated, such a conveyance is wholly void; for no effect whatever can be given to an instrument actually fraudulent; and therefore it is that, although a conveyance which is merely voluntary, and not fraudulent in fact, is invalid only against existing creditors, and not against subsequent creditors. Yet, if the conveyance is tainted with actual fraud, it is void altogether, and subsequent creditors are let in. But such is not the effect of constructive fraud. The object of the doctrine of constructive fraud is to protect some right or interest which, in equity, ought to be preserved, against the effect of a conveyance which is in other respects valid; and therefore equity does not avoid the deed altogether, but saves against it the rights or interests which are to be protected. A deed containing some provisions or having some operation forbidden by statute or public policy, or contrary, as in this case, to some equity, is held invalid only so far as the statute or policy or equity requires, upon the principle "ut res magis valeat quam pereat." Bredon's Case, 1 Coke, 76; Shep. Touch. 68; Doe v. Pitcher, 6 Taunt. 359; Darling v. Rogers, 22 Wend. 483. Thus a voluntary conveyance, if not fraudulent in fact, passes the title to the grantor, but subject to the rights of existing creditors, which are preserved by raising an implied trust in the grantor. See 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 371. So in this case the trust deed is effectual between the parties, but equity preserves the right of dower against the real estate in the hands of the grantees. Precisely as at law, dower follows real estate conveyed by the husband after the marriage, though the conveyance is otherwise good. It does not seem accurate to say that a deed is void for constructive fraud. The deed is valid; title under it passes, but subject in equity to those rights which are affected by the fraud.

Decree for complainant, Mrs. Chandler, in accordance with the foregoing opinion.

HUTCHINS v. VAN VECHTEN.

(35 N. E. 446, 140 N. Y. 115.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Nov. 28, 1893.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, first department.

Action by Elizabeth E. Hutchins, as executrix, etc., against Abraham Van Vechten, to have adjudged that defendant held certain real property, and the proceeds arising from the possession thereof, in trust for the joint and equal benefit of himself and plaintiff's testator. From a judgment of the general term (20 N. Y. Supp. 751) affirming a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Matthew Hale, for appellant. Augustus S. Hutchins and Charles N. Morgan, for respondent.

O'BRIEN, J. The judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the courts below adjudges that the defendant, under a deed of conveyance to him by Reuben E. Fenton on the 23d day of December, 1870, of certain lands in the county of Chautauqua, then became and was, and ever since has been, seised and possessed thereof, and of the proceeds, rents, issues, and profits, in trust for Waldo Hutchins, the plaintiff's testator, to the extent of an equal undivided one-half part thereof, as tenants in common. It appearing that the defendant, before the commencement of the action, had sold the land, the title to which he held in his own name, an accounting concerning the proceeds and the rents and profits was directed before a referee designated in the judgment. There is little, if any, dispute with reference to the facts, and practically the only question presented by the appeal is whether the trust impressed by force of the judgment upon the defendant's title was sufficiently or legally established. The defendant relies upon the provisions of the statute of frauds concerning trusts of this character, and it therefore becomes necessary to determine whether the plaintiff's proofs are such as that statute requires. The English statute on this subject, (29 Car. II. c. 3,) in its essential features, was enacted in this state by the act of February 26, 1787, the twelfth section of which provides that "all declarations or creations of trusts of any lands shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party entitled by law to declare the trust." Thus the law stood for about 40 years, until the general revision of the statutes, when it was changed, and made to read as follows: "No estate or interest in lands, other than leases for a term not to exceed one year, nor any trust or power over or concerning lands, or in any manner relating thereto, shall hereafter be created, granted, assigned, surrendered or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by a deed or conveyance in writing subscribed by the party creating, granting, assigning, surrendering or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized by writing." 2 Rev. St. p. 135, § 6. After the revision a trust of the character claimed by the plaintiff in this case could not be created or established except by a deed or conveyance in writing. But by chapter 322 of the Laws of 1860 the legislature restored the law to its original condition by an amendment to the seventh section substantially providing that a declaration of trust in lands might be proved by any writing subscribed by the party declaring the same. It is not necessary now to produce a deed or a formal writing intended for the purpose in order to prove the trust, but letters or informal memoranda signed by the party, and even admissions in a pleading in another action between other parties, if signed by the party with knowledge of its contents, will satisfy the requirements of the statute, if they contain enough to show the nature, character, and extent of the trust interest. Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. 696; Fisher v. Fields, 10 Johns. 494; Wright v. Douglass, 7 N. Y. 564; Cook v. Barr, 44 N. Y. 156; Loring v. Palmer, 118 U. S. 321, 6 Sup. Ct. 1073; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 972; McArthur v. Gordon, 126 N. Y. 597, 27 N. E. 1033; Urann v. Coates, 109 Mass. 581.

The evidence produced in behalf of the plaintiff was sufficient, within this rule, to establish an interest in the lands by her testator at the time of his death, which occurred on the 9th day of February, 1891. The conveyance to the defendant was shown by the production of the deed, which appeared to have been recorded in the proper clerk's office December 3, 1875. The plaintiff produced and put in evidence three papers found in an envelope in the safe of Mr. Hutchins after his death, and which were shown to have been in his possession during his life: (1) A power of attorney under the hand and seal of the defendant to John H. Platt, who was at the time of its execution the law partner of the deceased, bearing date June 5, 1873, acknowledged before a notary public in the city of New York, who also became a subscribing witness thereto. This instrument authorized and conferred full power upon Platt to sell the land for $8,000, payment to be made in the manner and as specified therein. (2) A letter in the defendant's handwriting, and bearing his signature, of the same date as the power of attorney, addressed to Platt, in which, after referring to the power of attorney, and giving instructions permitting him to take certain notes for the purchase price of the land, the defendant says: "Whatever is realized, you will understand that it belongs to Waldo Hutchins and myself, jointly and equally; and any further instructions Mr. Hutchins may give you, you may comply with." (3) Another paper, unsigned, but wholly in the defendant's handwriting, describing the land conveyed to him by Fenton. It begins with the statement that the "deed from Fenton to me is a warranty deed, with full covenants," and, after the description, ends with the statement that "the above is the description of the property as contained in a deed to me; nothing about our being entitled to 600 inches." The plaintiff also produced several letters written by the defendant to the deceased and one of his sons, after the execution of the power of attorney, in regard to taxes on the land; also, a letter written by the defendant to E. H. Fenton, then a tenant of a portion of the land, bearing date February 14, 1887, in which the defendant states that, "although the title of the whole property is in me, there is another party who has an interest. I expect to go to New York some time next week, when I will see him, and let you know what it is decided to do." It is not necessary to the plaintiff's case to show that the trust was created by, or originated in, a writing. The statute enacts a rule of evidence, and is satisfied if the trust is manifested or proved by a writing, however it originated, whether by parol arrangement or otherwise. Crane v. Powell, 139 N. Y. 379, 34 N. E. 911. The defendant's letter to Platt refers to the power of attorney, and that refers to the deed under which the title was held; giving its date, and the parties to it. Both are signed by the defendant, and reading them together, as they should be, the subject-matter and extent of the trust is sufficiently defined and specified, even without the unsigned paper and other letters. This proof is sufficient to sustain the findings of the learned trial judge, to the effect that the defendant took and held the title to the land in his own name, but in trust for the benefit of himself and the plaintiff's testator, in equal shares, as tenants in common. It was not, of course, one of the express trusts authorized by statute, but one arising under the forty-seventh section, which, in equity, entitled the deceased to a beneficial interest, and vested in him an estate of the same quality and duration as such interest. Ellwood v. Northrup, 106 N. Y. 172-179, 12 N. E. 590.

We agree with the learned counsel for the defendant that a trust cannot be impressed upon what appears by the deed alone to be an absolute title in the defendant, without clear proof showing a beneficial interest in another, as well as its nature, character, and extent, and that a failure to execute or deliver the necessary legal evidence to qualify the title is fatal to such a claim. Wadd v. Hazelton, 137 N. Y. 215, 33 N. E. 143; Van Cott v. Prentice, 104 N. Y. 45, 10 N. E. 257. With this point clearly in view, we have carefully considered the very able argument of counsel in behalf of the defendant, mainly devoted to the proposition that the proof in this case does not come up to the standard which the law demands in such cases. But we think that the written evidence produced at the trial is not fairly open to any construction except that given to it by the learned trial judge, and is consistent only with the theory that the deceased had in fact a beneficial interest in the lands. The defendant stated under his own signature, when authorizing his attorney in fact to sell the property, that he was entitled to one-half the price, and directed the attorney to consult with him in regard to the execution of the agency. There is nothing in the case to warrant the belief that this division of the proceeds of the sales, when made, referred to compensation as a broker, or to anything else, save an interest in the property to be sold. That is the natural conclusion which the judicial mind must reach upon reading the letters and papers in the light of all the circumstances. The trust, it is true, must be established wholly by a writing sufficient within the statute; but, when the writing is produced, it must be interpreted, like all other contracts and written instruments, according to the intention of the parties, ascertained from the language used, and all the surrounding circumstances. The fact that no proof was given by the plaintiff of payment by the testator of any part of the consideration is not material. It is not always possible, after the death of the party interested, to give such proof, and it is not essential to the process of establishing the trust. A writing without any consideration whatever affords sufficient proof that the title conveyed by the deed is for the benefit of another. The unsigned paper and the letters of the defendant bearing date subsequent to the power of attorney, and the letter which accompanied it, relating to the taxes on the land, and the nature of the defendant's interest therein, were properly admitted in evidence. They were all in the defendant's handwriting, presumptively sent or delivered by him to the deceased; and they explained, and tended to confirm, what the defendant had stated in the first letter in regard to the interests of the parties in the land.

There are some other exceptions in the record, but it is not necessary to refer to them in detail. It is sufficient to say that we have examined them all, and have found nothing in them that would warrant us in disturbing the judgment, and it should therefore be affirmed, with costs. All concur, except PECKHAM, J., not sitting.

URANN v. COATES et al.

(109 Mass. 581.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
March, 1872.

A. conveyed to B. certain land by an absolute conveyance, B. agreeing orally to hold in trust for A. after satisfying claims he held against A. At B.'s death the following writing was found among his papers.

"Boston, July 21, 1865. I, Benjamin Rand, having purchased the estate of Isaac P. Rand, of Roxbury, said estate being situated partly in Roxbury and partly in Dorchester, in the state of Massachusetts, for his deed delivered to me on July 21, 1865, do hereby agree and bind myself and my heirs to pay over to the said Isaac P. Rand whatever balance shall remain over and above the amount necessary to discharge my original claims against Isaac P. Rand, and the charges against the said estate, which by my purchase of the same have become vested in me, the said payment to be made when all such claims and charges shall have been fully liquidated and discharged. * * * And also in all charges and expenses which have been or shall be incurred by me or my heirs in discharging the above claims and charges and in carrying on the estate. Benjamin Rand."

This was followed by the memorandum which is given in the opinion. The plaintiff, who is the assignee of A., brings this action against the heir and administrator of B. to recover the balance remaining after the satisfaction of the claims of B.

H. F. French & J. E. Maynadier, for plaintiff. E. D. Sohler & C. A. Welch, for defendants.

COLT, J. The bill charges that Benjamin Rand held the land conveyed to him by the absolute deed of Isaac P. Rand, upon trust to apply the avails of it to the payment of certain incumbrances and debts due him, and to account for any surplus to Isaac P. Rand, the grantor, to whose right the plaintiff, as assignee, has succeeded. The writings by which it is claimed that this trust is declared are fully set forth, and it is alleged that under the trust sales have been made of more than enough to pay all demands and charges, leaving a surplus, to which the plaintiff is entitled.

The defendants file a plea denying that Benjamin in his lifetime held the land upon any such trust, or that any trust was devolved upon them, as his representatives, by his death. The purpose, no doubt, is to obtain first the decision of the court upon the question whether, upon the facts disclosed, any trust is raised which can be enforced; for, if no trust shall be found to exist, then the investigation of long and detailed accounts will be avoided. This is the point which was argued at the bar, and we proceed to its consideration without regard to supposed irregularities in the pleadings.

The land in question was conveyed by an absolute quitclaim deed, dated on the 15th, but delivered on the 21st day of July, 1865, to Benjamin, who then held large demands against Isaac P. Rand, secured by mortgage on the same premises. The evidence sufficiently proves that Benjamin orally agreed, at and before the time of the delivery of the deed of the equity, and as part of the transaction, that any surplus over and above his claim that might remain of the estate or its proceeds should belong to Isaac P. No written memorandum of the agreement was made before the delivery of the deed, but it was suggested at the time that Benjamin should put it in the shape of a memorandum, safely deposited, in case anything should happen to him. And Benjamin afterwards informed Isaac P. that soon after the transaction he made a memorandum of the agreement. No such paper was ever delivered to, or came into the possession of, Isaac P., but after the death of Benjamin a writing of that description was found safely deposited in his bank trunk. By the terms of this writing, he agreed to pay over any balance of the estate remaining, substantially in accordance with the oral agreement. It was signed by Benjamin, and dated July 21, 1865; and underneath the first signature was an additional statement, also signed, in these words: "This memorandum is made by me for the use of my executor or administrator only. Neither Isaac P. Rand, nor those claiming under him, have any legal or equitable claim against me or my estate; but upon the payment of my debt, interest, and all charges, as above mentioned, any balance shall enure to the benefit of Isaac P. Rand and those claiming under him."

We are of opinion that this writing is sufficient as a declaration of trust, within the meaning of our statute. It is much more formal and particular in its statement than declarations of this description by letter, by answer in chancery, affidavit, recital in bond or deed, or in pamphlet, which have all been held sufficient, and with reference to which it is held to be no objection that they were drawn up for another purpose and not addressed to, nor intended for the use of, the cestui que trust. See cases cited in Browne, St. Frauds, §§ 98, 99.

It is not essential that the memorandum relied on should have been delivered to any one as a declaration of trust. It is a question of fact, in all cases, whether the trust had been perfectly created; and upon that question the delivery or nondelivery of the instrument is a significant fact, of greater or less weight according to the circumstances. If the alleged trust arises from mere gift, delivery of the writing by which it is declared is not always required as proof that the gift was perfected, for the court will consider all the facts bearing upon the question of intention, and it has been held that if a party execute a voluntary settlement, and the deed recites that it is sealed and delivered, it will be binding on the settlor, even if he never parts with it and keeps it in his possession until his death. Bunn v. Winthrop, 1 Johns. Ch. 329; Perry, Trusts, § 103, and cases cited. It must always, however, appear that the fiduciary relation is completely established, and not left as a matter of executory agreement only, regard being had to the situation of the property, the relations of the parties, and the purposes and objects had in view. In this case the verbal agreement in which the trust originated was made in consideration of the conveyance by Isaac P. of his interest in the real estate, and the trust is founded on a good consideration. The fact is of weight in aiding the court to carry out the intentions of the parties; and the want of a delivery of the memorandum becomes of less significance.

The law as thus laid down is to be found mainly in decisions under the words of the English statute, which requires that all declarations and creations of trust shall be manifested or proved in writing. These were the words of our earlier law (St. 1783, c. 37, § 3), and they remained until the first general revision of the statutes; the requirement of the present statute being that the trust shall be created or declared in writing. Gen. St. c. 100, § 19. The same change has been made in other states; and in those in which the question has been incidentally before the courts the tendency is to rule that this abbreviation in the words does not change the law, and that "created or declared" are equivalent to "manifested or proved." Trusts may be created in the first instance in writing. They more commonly originate in the oral agreements and transactions of the parties, and are subsequently declared in writing. Our statute embraces both descriptions. It had been settled by repeated decisions under the old statute, when this change was made, that an express trust was sufficiently declared if shown by any proper written evidence disclosing facts which created a fiduciary relation. Under this construction, the additional words of the old statute seemed immaterial, and are omitted. And we are of opinion that no change in the meaning or effect of it was intended or made. Perry, Trusts, § 81, and cases cited.

In view of the law thus stated, the fact that there was no delivery of the memorandum in this case is not of controlling importance. It is impossible to account for its existence and safe preservation, unless there was an intention that it should be used, if necessary, to prove a trust. The statement that it is made for the use of the executor or administrator of the trustee implies this. The cestui que trust was informed of its existence; and by its terms a perfect trust is declared. It is, indeed, declared that neither Isaac P., nor those claiming under him, have any legal or equitable claim against the maker or his estate. But this statement, if such was its intention, cannot control the effect of the memorandum in establishing the trust. That results, as matter of law, from the proof. We are inclined to think that its intention was not to defeat an equitable claim to the proceeds of the estate conveyed, but only to protect the maker against personal responsibility beyond the actual receipts in administering the trusts.

Decree for the plaintiff.

BATES et al. v. HURD.

(65 Me. 180.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. Franklin.
May 2, 1876.

Bill in equity to declare a trust and for an account.

P. H. Stubbs, for plaintiff. H. L. Whitcomb, for defendants.

BARROWS, J. In 1847 one Kennedy gave to Nicholas Bates and his brother Thomas, the plaintiff, a bond conditioned for the conveyance of certain parcels of land (estimated at about two hundred and fifty acres) upon payment of the obligee's notes. In 1851, before the maturity of all the notes, an adjustment was made, by which, in satisfaction of the bond, he made conveyances of the bonded land in two separate parcels,—one to Wm. W. Bates, a third brother, and the other to Nicholas, who (with Wm. W. and the plaintiff) subscribed and delivered to Kennedy a receipt indorsed upon the bond, setting forth that he had received the deed of his portion, "for himself and in trust for his brother Thomas Bates, according to what the said Thomas has or may pay towards the same real estate, which amounts at present to seventy-five dollars." The price of the parcel thus conveyed to Nicholas was $450, and Nicholas seems to have admitted a resulting trust in favor of the plaintiff to the amount of one-sixth of the purchase, which was binding upon him and all claiming under him with notice.

Indeed the writing subscribed by Nicholas Bates seems to be tantamount to a declaration of an express trust, so as to satisfy Rev. St. c. 73, § 11.

The words "created and declared" in that statute seem to be construed by the courts to be synonymous with "manifested and proved" as they stood in the original seventh section of the statute of frauds,—29 Car. II. c. 3. Forster v. Hale, 3 Ves. 707, 5 Ves. 308; Unitarian Society v. Woodbury, 14 Me. 281; Barrell v. Joy, 16 Mass. 221; Pinnock v. Clough, 17 Vt. 508.

From the cases just cited and numerous others we see that a letter, memorandum, or recital subscribed by the trustee, whether addressed to or deposited with the cestui que trust or not, or whether intended, when made, to be evidence of the trust or not, will be sufficient to establish the trust when the subject, object, and nature of the trust, and the parties and their relations to it and each other, appear with reasonable certainty.

The existence of a trust in favor of the plaintiff, which he may enforce against Nicholas Bates and his representatives, and all claiming under him with notice of the trust, may be regarded as established.

Nicholas Bates mortgaged the property to Kennedy to secure a balance of the purchase money, and subsequently made two other mortgages thereon to Philip M. Stubbs, the scrivener who drew the conveyances from Kennedy and wrote the indorsement upon the bond containing the declaration of the trust. Both of these last-named mortgages were assigned to Prince Thompson, who had no knowledge of the trust, and has given notice of foreclosure, but has never been in possession of the property.

Nicholas Bates died in January, 1866, leaving a widow, Keziah M. Bates, now Keziah M. Hurd, who is one of the respondents, and who took out letters of administration on his estate, inventoried the land as subject to the mortgage to Prince Thompson, "and being also held as a trust estate for Thomas Bates to the amount of about $140." This sum is apparently the amount of the $75 originally paid in by the plaintiff towards the purchase money, with interest up to the time of the making of the inventory. The widow continued in possession of the land, receiving the rents and profits until November, 1868, when she made sale thereof by license from the probate court, without making mention of the trust, to Daniel Day, who mortgaged it back to her for part of the purchase money, and took possession. The widow married George Hurd, the other respondent, and on September 9, 1870, took a quitclaim deed from Day, and since then the two defendants have occupied or had the exclusive use, income, and profit of the premises.

The plaintiff does not claim any rights as against the mortgagees. The heirs of Nicholas Bates are no longer interested, as the sale by the administratrix devested them of all right and title in the premises.

The administratrix, in her inventory, admitted the plaintiff's rights, and is fully chargeable with notice of them. The other respondent, her husband, seems to have occupied only under her. But a joint reception by them of the rents and profits is admitted in the agreed statement. He is therefore responsible to the plaintiff on this score with her. The testimony establishes the fact that the plaintiff made a claim upon the administratrix for his interest, and that there was more or less negotiation between them looking to an adjustment. It is unfortunate for both that an equitable adjustment could not be reached without litigation.

In the hands of these respondents it is obvious that the property is subject to the trust which the plaintiff seeks to enforce.

They object that he might have had an adequate remedy at law by a suit for his share of the income. But cases of trust are, under our statute, specially made the subject of remedies in equity, and, moreover, it might be desirable for him to have the decree to which he is entitled in equity as against them, in view of the possibility of a redemption.

Unless the parties can agree as to the proper sum to be allowed for the past rents and profits, a master must be appointed to ascertain them.

Bill sustained. Estate declared subject, in the hands of these respondents, to the trust asserted. Costs for the complainant. Master to be appointed at nisi prius, if required.

APPLETON, C. J., and WALTON, DAN-FORTH, and PETERS, JJ., concurred.

McVAY v. McVAY.

(10 Atl. 178, 43 N. J. Eq. 47.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. July 12, 1887.

On final hearing on bill, answer, and proofs taken before a master.

C. F. Axtell and E. A. Quayle, for complainant. Theodore Little, for defendant.

VAN FLEET, V. C. This suit is brought to enforce an express trust. Prior to April 2, 1879, the complainant was the owner of a lot of land in Morristown. On that day he conveyed it to his son John, who on the same day conveyed it to the complainant's wife. Both deeds were voluntary. The complainant's wife continued to hold the title until November 26, 1883, when she and complainant conveyed it to their daughter Celia, the defendant in this suit. Celia, on the same day, and as part of the transaction by which she became invested with title, made a deed to the complainant. The object of the two conveyances was to change the title from the wife to the husband. No consideration was paid for either. Celia, at the time of this transaction, was a minor, being only 19 years of age. Her deed, therefore, while not void, was voidable. No acts, in confirmation of her deed, performed since she attained full age, are either alleged or proved. Since attaining full age, she has refused to execute a deed in confirmation of the one she made while a minor, but now insists that that deed, by reason of her minority, is of no effect, and that the title to the land still remains in her, and that she is under no duty to convey it to the complainant. The complainant, on the contrary, insists that the defendant took title subject to a trust, the trust being that she should convey the land to him, and having thus far failed to execute it effectually, and now refusing to do so, the court should compel her to execute it.

There can be no doubt about the fact. The circumstances attending the transfer of the title to the defendant render it conspicuously clear that the purpose of all persons concerned in the transaction was to change the title from the wife to the husband. It is obvious that the transaction had no other object. It is clear, therefore, that the defendant took title subject to a trust, and that the trust was an express one. The only question which the case presents is, is the trust manifested in such manner that equity can take cognizance of it and enforce it? The existence of such a trust can be proved by nothing short of written evidence. The direction of the statute of frauds upon this subject is imperative. It declares that all declarations and creations of trust of lands shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party enabled to declare the trust, or else they shall be utterly void and of no effect. Revision, 445, § 3. This statute merely prescribes a rule of evidence. It declares that the existence of an express trust of lands shall be proved by nothing but written evidence and rigorously excludes all other evidence as a means of establishing the fact of the existence of such a trust, but it does not inhibit the creation of a trust of this kind by parol. It has accordingly been held that a valid express trust of land may be created by parol, provided it is subsequently declared and manifested in the manner directed by the statute.

In Smith v. Howell, 11 N. J. Eq. 349, the trust sought to be enforced was not declared by writing until more than 16 years after its creation, and yet the court decreed its execution. Chancellor Williamson in that case said the statute does not require that the trust shall be created by writing, but that it shall be manifested and proved by writing. And he also held that where the integrity of a trust not put in writing at the time of its creation, but subsequently declared by writing, was assailed, parol evidence was competent to show whether or not it had in fact been created at the time the conveyance was made. On this point he said: "A question of fraud—that is, whether the trust was really created at the time of the execution of the instrument or deed to which the manifestation of the trust refers—is always an open question. Suppose a judgment or some other lien has attached to the property in the interval between the execution of the deed and the declaration of the trust, it would be necessary, in order to defeat such lien, to show that the trust was bona fide created at the time of the execution of the deed. This may, however, be done by parol evidence, because the statute does not require that the trust shall be created, but only manifested by writing." The doctrine of this case was fully approved by the court of errors and appeals in Jamison v. Miller, 27 N. J. Eq. 586. Parol evidence was admitted in this case to establish the fact that a trust had been created by parol contemporaneously with the execution of the deed by which the title was made to the trustee. The trust was declared, some time subsequent to its creation, by several writings, one of which was the defendant's answer. The court said: "The writings [meaning the declaration of trust] are but evidence; the trust is anterior and independent; and the rights which the court regards are those that spring from the creation, not the mere proof of the trust." The rule must be considered settled that a valid parol trust of land may be created by parol, but the existence of the trust cannot be proved except by written evidence. The written evidence, however, may be made long subsequent to the creation of the trust.

The only written evidence or manifestation of the trust which the complainant has offered in this case is that which is contained in the pleadings. The bill alleges that the land in question was conveyed by the complainant and his wife to the defendant for the sole purpose and with the express understanding that the defendant should, immediately after acquiring title, convey it to the complainant. The defendant was required to answer under oath, and has done so. By her answer she says that she has no reason to doubt the truth of the above allegation of the bill. Does this constitute such evidence of the trust as to render it proper for the court to decree its execution? The proof of the trust, in my judgment, is complete. The declaration is in writing; it is signed by the trustee; it was made after she became competent to declare a trust; it is verified by her oath; and its terms are plainly stated. The principle is settled that an answer to a bill in equity may be sufficient, as a declaration of a trust, to justify the court in decreeing its execution. Chancellor Vroom, in Hutchinson v. Tindall, 3 N. J. Eq. 357, held that, where a complainant files a bill, alleging that a deed made to the defendant is subject to a trust in his favor, and praying that it may be so decreed, and the defendant answers, admitting the trust, the defendant's answer will constitute sufficient evidence of the trust to warrant the court in decreeing its execution. And the same efficacy was given by the court of errors and appeals to an answer in chancery, even in case where the declaration was volunteered, or rather was not made in response to the bill. Jamison v. Miller, 27 N. J. Eq. 586. It is wholly unimportant on what part of the declaration of trust the trustee signs his name. He may sign it at the bottom, at the top, at the side, or in the middle. He may sign by simply making his initials. Wherever or in whatever form his signature may be made, it will be sufficient within the meaning of the statute, if what he does is done for the purpose of giving authenticity to the instrument. Smith v. Howell, 11 N. J. Eq. 349.

The defendant in this case signed the affidavit to her answer, not only for the purpose of authenticating the answer, but also for the purpose of verifying its contents. It must therefore be held that a valid trust in the land in question in favor of the complainant has been proved by evidence of the kind required by the statute. This being so, the complainant now stands invested with a full and complete estate in equity in the land in question. The land, in equity, belongs to the complainant, and the defendant simply holds the dry, naked legal title in trust for the complainant. In this condition of affairs, the defendant cannot defeat the complainant's right to a conveyance by showing that the land was conveyed to her, or to her grantor, in fraud of creditors. Ownes v. Ownes, 23 N. J. Eq. 60, is decisive against the validity of such a defense. Chancellor Zabriskie in that case said: "I know of no case in which a court of equity has refused to enforce a trust, actually declared and vested, on account of fraud in the conveyance to the trustee who declared the trust." The fraud here charged is against the conveyance by which title was put in the wife. The defendant says that the complainant put the title to the land in controversy in his wife to defraud his creditors. The proof in support of this charge is of the most meager character. But suppose it be admitted that that conveyance was fraudulent as to the complainant's creditors, there can be no doubt that it was good against him, nor that it gave to his wife as full and complete dominion over the land, against everybody except his creditors, as an honest conveyance would have given. As against everybody except creditors her title was unimpeachable, and she consequently might, as against all the world except the creditors of her husband, make a valid conveyance of it in trust or otherwise.

The complainant is entitled to a decree.

DANSER v. WARWICK.

(33 N. J. Eq. 133.)

Court of Chancery of New Jersey. Oct. Term, 1880.

George C. Beekman, for complainant. Joel Parker, for defendant.

VAN FLEET, V. C. The complainant is the widow of David C. Danser. She seeks to have a parol trust established and enforced against the defendant. She alleges that her husband, some months before his death, assigned the bond and mortgage in controversy to the defendant, upon a parol trust or understanding that he would forthwith, or by a short day, transfer them to her. The transfer to the defendant was intended to be merely a step in vesting her with title. The assignment to the defendant bears date February 1, 1875, and Danser died on the 13th day of the following September. The bond and mortgage were in Danser's possession at the time of his death, and have since then been constantly in the possession of the complainant. The defendant has never asked for them, nor attempted to get possession of them. A month or six weeks prior to Danser's death, the defendant directed an assignment to be drawn to the complainant, stating to the person to whom he gave the direction that he must draw it for Danser, who would pay him. He, at the same time, said it was right that the old lady—referring to the complainant—should have the bond and mortgage. Danser, at this time, was prostrated by the disease which shortly afterwards caused his death. The defendant did not remain to execute the assignment, but said he would return soon and do so. He did not return that day. He was subsequently informed, on two or three different occasions, while Danser was living, that the assignment had been drawn and was ready for execution. On each occasion he said he had forgotten or neglected to execute it, but would call soon and do so. He never fulfilled his promise. Two or three weeks after Danser's death, he called for the assignment Danser had made to him, and which he had left when he gave direction for the draft of the one to the complainant, and stated that he meant to do what was right about the matter, but he would not execute the assignment to the complainant until things were fixed up; Danser owed him. He took both papers, and has never executed the assignment to the complainant.

This narrative comprises only those facts which are not disputed by either party.

The defendant denies that the mortgage was transferred to him subject to a trust, but says, on the contrary, that the assignment was made to satisfy a promissory note he held against Danser, upon which there was due $2,000 of principal and a year and six or seven months' interest. His explanation of the preparation, by his direction, of an assignment to the complainant, is this: He says, some time after the execution of the assignment to him, he ascertained that the person who made the mortgage had no title on record for the mortgaged premises; that he went at once to Danser, and told him he had swindled him, and that if he did not take the mortgage back he would make him. He says that Danser replied that the mortgagor's title was all right, but if he was dissatisfied he would pay him his debt, or give him another security, and he could then reassign the mortgage. He further says that it was ultimately arranged that Danser should have two mortgages, which were then liens on his lands, canceled, and execute a mortgage thereon to him, and he was then to assign the mortgage in controversy to the complainant. He says it was after this scheme had been agreed upon that he ordered the assignment to the complainant to be drawn.

These statements present the question of fact to be decided. The counsel of the defendant, however, insists that, as a matter of law, the bill in this case must be dismissed, regardless of what the evidence demonstrates the truth to be in respect to the trust alleged, his contention being that the trust set up by the complainant is one which cannot be established except by written evidence. The trust, it will be observed, affects personal property, and not lands. The subject of it is a debt. That part of the statute of frauds which enacts that all declarations and creations of trust shall be manifested by writing, and signed by the party creating the same, or else shall be void and of no effect, applies only to trusts of lands, and has no application to trusts of personal property. A valid trust of personalty may be created verbally, and proved by parol evidence. A trust of personal property, almost precisely like the one under consideration, and which had been created by mere spoken words, and was supported by only parol evidence, was upheld by Chancellor Williamson in Hooper v. Holmes, 11 N. J. Eq. 122; also Kimball v. Morton, 5 N. J. Eq. 26; Sayre v. Fredericks, 16 N. J. Eq. 205; Eaton v. Cook, 25 N. J. Eq. 55; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 972; 1 Perry, Trusts, § 86. A valid trust of a mortgage debt may be created by parol; for, though a trust thus created cannot embrace the land held in pledge, yet it is good as to the debt, and will entitle the cestui que trust to sufficient of the proceeds of sale, when the land is converted into money, to pay the debt. Sayre v. Fredericks, supra; Benbow v. Townsend, 1 Mylne & K. 506; Childs v. Jordan, 106 Mass. 321.

It must be held, then, that the trust alleged in this case is valid, and if it has been sufficiently proved, the complainant is entitled to have it established and enforced. The question then is, has it been proved? A high degree of evidence should be required.

Before the court ingrafts a trust upon a written instrument, absolute on its face, it should require the most cogent proof. Such proof, I think, has been furnished in this case. The undisputed facts make a strong case against the defendant. He attempts to explain and moderate the force of the one having the greatest weight. I refer, of course, to the fact that he had an assignment drawn to the complainant, and that when he gave the order he said it was right that she should have the bond and mortgage. His attempted explanation has, however, resulted in a series of contradictions which utterly destroy his testimony.

By his answer, which is under oath, he says that after he sent his assignment to Ocean county for record, he was informed that the mortgagor had no title on record for the mortgaged premises, and that he went at once to see Danser, and that an arrangement was then made by which Danser was either to pay his debt or substitute another security, and he was then to reassign the mortgage. His assignment was not lodged for record until October 23, 1875. Danser had then been dead more than a month, so that the arrangement, at the time stated, was unquestionably a fabrication. When the defendant came to testify, he swore that, before he lodged his assignment for record, he had heard, from one George P. Conover, that the mortgagor had no title, and he went at once to see Danser. But it is perfectly clear, from the evidence, that Conover could not have given this information until long after Danser's death; for he did not have it himself. Conover obtained his information from the mortgages, and the mortgagor swears that he first obtained it from a search made in December, 1876. The defendant was subsequently recalled and re-examined, against the complainant's objection, and without an order for that purpose, and then swore that one Edward P. Jacobus first informed him that the mortgagor had no title, and that this information was given to him very soon after the assignment was made to him. But, upon the examination of Jacobus, it was shown that the search from which he obtained his information was not made until after Danser had been dead more than a month. So it is perfectly clear that the information which the defendant says led to his interview with Danser did not come to him until after Danser was dead, and the conclusion is therefore unavoidable that no such interview as he describes took place. The tergiversation of the defendant upon this point renders his testimony unworthy of credit. I find it impossible to believe him.

It must also be remarked that the defendant's conduct in relation to the custody of the bond and mortgage, as portrayed by himself, shows very clearly that he did not believe they were his property. He says the bond and mortgage were delivered to him, with the assignment, on the day of the date of the assignment, and that he took them to a hotel, in which he and Danser were jointly interested, and which was under the management of Danser, and threw them in a desk in the bar-room. He retained the assignment. He gave them no further care or attention, but carried the assignment to his house, and placed it in his safe. He does not know when or how Danser got possession of the bond and mortgage. So far as appears, he has never tried to find out. Danser did not live in the hotel, but occupied a dwelling in the village where the hotel was located. The defendant says, that while Danser was sick, on the occasion of his last visit to him, Danser told the complainant to get the bond and mortgage and give them to him, but that she refused to do so, and, to repeat his own words, "she was just as cross to me as she could be." He did not ask Danser why he had taken them from the desk, nor did he insist upon their being at once surrendered. He never asked for them after Danser's death, nor did he make any attempt to obtain possession of them. Every phase of his conduct evinces a consciousness that he had no right to them, and that any attempt to take them from the possession of the complainant would be met by a resistance which he knew was grounded in right and truth. The evidence, in my opinion, fully establishes the trust alleged.

The defendant also insists that the trust upon which the complainant's action is founded should not be enforced, because it was concocted to cheat and defraud Danser's creditors. It is enough to say of this contention that no such defence is presented by the answer, and that the complainant's right to a decree cannot be defeated by a defence she has had no opportunity to meet and disprove.

There must be a decree establishing the trust, and requiring the defendant to execute it. The defendant must pay costs.

TOBIAS v. KETCHUM.

(32 N. Y. 319.)

Court of Appeals of New York. March, 1865.

Action to recover dower and mesne profits. Defendant pleaded a provision by will in lieu of dower, and failure of the widow to elect. There was a judgment for plaintiff, from which defendant appealed.

T. W. Dwight, for appellant. Charles Tracy, for respondent.

DAVIS, J. The testator not having declared in express terms that the provisions made by his will for his widow are given in lieu of dower, she is not put to her election unless the devises of the will "be so repugnant to the claim of dower, that they cannot stand together." Lewis v. Smith, 9 N. Y. 502; Church v. Bull, 2 Denio, 430; Jackson v. Churchill, 7 Cow. 287; Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 562. This rule is a familiar one, and needs no further citation of authority.

In this case the provisions made by the will and codicil for the widow are as follows: 1. The will gives her all the household furniture and jewelry of every kind in use by her and the testator, or either of them. 2. One-third of the net income of all the real estate belonging to the testator, after payment of all taxes, assessments and interest due thereon, to commence to be paid to her six months after the testator's decease, and to be paid to her every six months thereafter, during her life. The codicil adds, "a suitable provision in money," "to be paid to her during the first six months, till the payment of her provisions under the will shall commence," and the use during her natural life of the apartments in the house No. 615 Fourth street, New York, as occupied by her and her husband, as a residence at the date of the codicil, with the election to have such other suitable residence in any other house belonging to him at the time of his decease that she might prefer.

After making these provisions the will disposes of all the "rest, residue and remainder of the estate," by directing in substance that it be divided equally among his surviving children and the children of his deceased children, if any there should be, six months after the death of his widow.

The will then nominates executors, and clothes them "with full power and authority to carry out all the provisions of the will," and if they deem it necessary or proper to a fair division of the property among the parties entitled thereto, to sell either at public or private sale the personal and real estate, or any portion thereof, and execute deeds thereof, and to divide the proceeds as thereinbefore directed; but no sale to be made till six months subsequent to the death of the testator and his wife. It also clothes the executors, "the survivor or survivors of them, with full power and authority to rent, lease, repair and insure any portion of the estate during any period of time the same may remain unsold or undivided."

In Savage v. Burnham, 17 N. Y. 561, the testator devised and bequeathed all of his estate, real and personal, to trustees; the real estate upon trust to sell after the death of his wife. The will provided that during her life, the widow should "receive and take to her own use one-third part of the clear yearly rents and profits of the real estate, and that the residue of the clear yearly rents and profits should be deemed a part of the personal estate, and subject to the dispositions of the will concerning the personal estate."

The entire estate, with all its income, except the one-third of the rents and profits of the land, was given (through the trusts) to the testator's children and the children of his daughters. It was held that a claim of dower could not stand consistently with these provisions, and that the widow was put to her election.

Upon the authority of that case, if the will in question creates a trust and vests the entire legal estate in the trustees, the provision made for the widow is inconsistent with the right of dower, and she was bound to elect. In that case her claim of dower, if allowed, would inevitably defeat the scheme of the will, for it would prevent the trustees from holding the legal title of the whole estate, and receiving the entire rents and profits for the purpose of paying taxes, assessments, interest, repairs and insurance, and ascertaining the net income, of which one-third is to be paid to the widow, and the residue ultimately to the other beneficiaries.

The first question then is, are the executors, under this will, made trustees of an express trust? The word "trust" or "trustee" is not used in the will, but that is only a circumstance to be noted in considering the question. "It is by no means necessary that the donee should be expressly directed to hold the property to certain uses or in trust, or as a trustee. * * * It is one of the fixed rules of equitable construction, that there is no magic in particular words; and any expressions that show unequivocally the intention of the parties to create a trust will have that effect. It was said by Lord Eldon, that the word 'trust' not being made use of, is a circumstance to be alluded to, but nothing more; and if the whole frame of the will creates a trust, the law is the same though the word 'trust' is not used." Hill, Trustees (3d Am. Ed.) 99; (Orig. Ed. 65) and cases there cited.

We are in this case to determine the question by the authority conferred and the duties imposed. The executors are clothed "with full power and authority to rent, lease, repair and insure" the estate "during any period of the time it shall remain unsold and undivided." That period is, at all events, to last until six months after the decease of the widow. They are also in general language clothed "with full power and authority to carry out all the provisions of this will." It is apparent that the "net income of all the real estate" is to be ascertained by some person or persons once in six months during the life of the widow, "after all taxes, assessments and interest due thereon are paid." One-third of this net income is to be paid to the widow. By whom is this duty to be performed? It is clearly impracticable for the various tenants of the estate to perform it; neither collectively nor individually have they the means of determining the facts upon which the net income is ascertained, and it would be extremely embarrassing so to frame leases that each tenant should be subject to pay to the widow an amount of his rent that should discharge the proportion his rent bore to the net income of the whole estate, after payment of all taxes, assessments and interest due on the whole. Collating the power to rent, lease, repair, and insure, with the duty that rests somewhere to pay all taxes, assessments and interest, and then to pay to the widow one-third of the net income after such payment, there seems to be no embarrassment in determining where the duty rests. To my mind it is apparent that the scheme of this will requires that the whole income, rents and profits of the real estate shall be received by the executors until the sale and division provided for; and that they are the persons on whom the duty to pay one-third of the net income to the widow is imposed. They are to make the ultimate division, and consequently to retain for that purpose the income not paid semi-annually to the widow. The rents and profits of all the real estate are given to them for several purposes: 1. To keep down taxes, assessments and interest by paying them; 2. To ascertain the "net income" by deducting from the gross receipts the amount paid for those purposes; 3. To pay one-third of the net income thus ascertained to the widow every six months; 4. To repair and insure the premises out of the residue; and 5. To retain the balance for division, and finally divide it among the daughters or their children after the decease of the widow. The imposition of these various duties by the will make the acting executors trustees for their performance to the same extent as though declared to be so by the most explicit language. The authority to sell the real estate and execute deeds thereof, as given by the will, standing by itself, would confer nothing but a power; but coupled as it is with the various provisions for leasing, repairing and insuring, with the obligation to give to the widow a residence as she may elect in any of the houses of the testator, it goes far to show that it was the testator's intention to vest the fee of the estate in the trustees. But however that may be, it is well settled that trustees take the legal estate whenever they are clothed with the authority which the foregoing construction of the will gives to the executors in this case.

"If land be devised to three persons and their heirs in trust to permit A. to receive the net profits for her life for her own use, and after her death to permit B. to receive the net profits for her life, etc., it has been held that the legal estate is in the trustees, for that they are to receive the rents and thereout pay the land tax and other charges on the estate, and hand over the net rents only to the tenant for life." Lewin, Trusts, 248; Baker v. Greenwood, 4 Mees. & W. 421; White v. Parker, 1 Bing. N. C. 573.

In White v. Parker, the trustees were to permit the testator's wife and daughters to receive the clear rents of three parts and his son the clear rent of one part—the trustees to pay all outgoings, to repair and let the premises. It was held that the legal estate vested in the trustees. In the note to 2 Wms. Saund. 11, the rule is thus laid down: "Where something is to be done by the trustees which makes it necessary for them to have the legal estate, such as payment of the rents and profits to another's separate use, or of the debts of the testator, or to pay rates and taxes, and keep the premises in repair, the legal estate is vested in them, and the grantee has only a trust estate."

In Birmingham v. Kerivan, 2 Schoales & L. 444, Lord Redesdale said that a direction to keep a house in repair applied to the whole house, and could not be considered an obligation on a person claiming dower. When therefore the testator authorized his executors to repair, he did not expect that they would control two-thirds of the estate and the widow one-third, but that they would manage the entire property.

The authority to rent and lease, to repair and to insure, by necessary implication vests the trustees with the legal title. They must not only execute leases, but enforce them, put in tenants and dispossess them, the proper performance of which requires the title of the estate. So to repair there must be such a right of entry and control in the trustees as gives them complete dominion; and to insure involves the necessity of ownership, for the policy must be taken in the name of the trustees. But to repair and to insure necessarily involve expenses chargeable upon the rents and profits; and an executor who is authorized to lease, repair and insure by necessary implication may so lease that rents will come to his hands out of which to pay repairs and insurance, and if a net income is to be paid out of such rents, the executor becomes the party whose duty it is to ascertain and pay it. In Leggett v. Perkins, 2 N. Y. 297, the testator constituted his executors trustees of the estate devised to his daughters for life, and authorized them to take charge of, manage and improve the same, and pay over to them from time to time the rents, interest and income thereof. It was held to be "very obvious that the legal estate in the premises was necessary to enable the trustees to discharge their duties," and that the trust was a valid one under the third subdivision of section 55 of the statutes of uses and trusts (1 Rev. St. 729), and that by section 60 of the same statute, the whole estate in law and equity vested in the trustees.

In Brewster v. Striker, 2 N. Y. 19, the testator devised his real estate to his grandchildren, and then provided that the lands should not be sold or alienated, but that his executors should lease or rent the same and pay the rents, issues and profits to his said grandchildren, etc.; it was held that the executors were trustees for the purposes of the will, and took, by implication, the legal estate during the lives of the grandchildren.

These authorities are conceived to be abundant to establish the proposition that the authority to lease, rent, repair, insure, pay taxes, assessments and interest, and pay net income to devisees, carried the legal title to the executors in this case, and created a trust in them valid under the statute.

It follows therefore from the decision of this court in Savage v. Burnham, that a claim of dower is totally inconsistent with the provisions of the will, and the plaintiff was not at liberty to take both the provisions of the will and dower.

In the language of Comstock, J., in the case cited: "During her life she was to have one-third of the clear rent and profits, and the other two-thirds were to go into a general fund for distribution. The entire estate, with all its income, except the one-third, is given in the clearest possible terms, to the testator's children and the children of his daughters. It is therefore impossible for her to receive any part of it, except what is expressly given to her, without subverting the will to that extent."

The circuit judge erred in directing a verdict for plaintiff.

I have considered the question as to the effect of the alleged release of dower. In my opinion, the instrument was not designed for any such purpose as a release of dower, and ought not to be so construed. Its objects are apparent on its face; to-wit, to dispose of the vexed question as to her rights under the provision of the will directing moneys to be paid to her for her suitable support the first six months, and protecting the executors on paying her a sum which might prove larger than was designed by the surrogate's decree, and the instrument ought to be construed accordingly.

I am not embarrassed by the question of parties, nor the form of the judgment. The Code authorizes all persons having conflicting claims to be made parties. Code, § 118. The defendants who appeared and answered, admitted the receipt of the rents and profits as alleged in the complaint, putting nothing but the amount in issue. They are the heirs at law, and the statute authorizes the verdict for rents and profits against them.

The judgment below should be reversed, and new trial ordered, costs to abide event.

All the judges concurring, the judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered.

Judgment reversed.

HUTCH.& BUNK.EQ.—24

WARNER v. BATES.¹

(98 Mass. 274.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Nov., 1867.

Bill in equity filed September 4, 1865, by a son of Sarah I. Bates, deceased, seeking for a decree to enforce performance by the respondent, his stepfather, of a trust created by her will.

The bill alleged that on December 12, 1833, the deceased, being a widow, having a daughter and two sons, of whom the complainant was one, and owning property to the amount of more than $100,000, was married to the respondent, and her property secured by a settlement from any marital right or claim which otherwise he might have thereto; that thereafter, until her death on May 17, 1859, she and the respondent, with these children, and with another daughter, the issue of this marriage, lived together as one family in her house, where she and her children had formerly resided; that the expenses of maintaining the family in a liberal style suitable to their circumstances were defrayed chiefly from the income of her property, the respondent having but little property of his own, but acting as the head of the family, having the general care thereof, and managing the funds for its maintenance; and that she left a will of which she named the respondent sole executor, and an estate of which there was a large residue after paying her debts.

This will was set forth in the bill; bore date of December 30 1857; was indorsed with the approval of the respondent under date of October 1, 1858; was amended by a codicil dated April 14, 1859, in particulars not needful to be recited; and disposed of the estate during the respondent's life as follows:

"I give and bequeath unto my husband, George Bates aforesaid, the use, income and improvement of all the estate, real, personal and mixed, of which I shall die seised and possessed, for and during the term of his natural life, in the full confidence that upon my decease he will, as he has heretofore done, continue to give and afford my children" (enumerating them) "such protection, comfort and support as they or either of them may stand in need of."

Upon the death of the respondent, it gave one half of the estate to the complainant and his brother; and the other half to three persons designated by name, "and to the survivors or survivor of them, their or his executors, administrators or assigns, to have and to hold the same upon and for the uses, trusts and purposes mentioned and expressed of and concerning the same." and then set forth minutely certain trusts for the benefit of the two daughters.

The bill further alleged that, after the death of the testatrix, the respondent, under the clause of the will first above quoted, took possession of the estate remaining after payment of the debts; that the complainant with his brother and unmarried sister continued to reside in the house as before, and to receive from the respondent, without payment or charge therefor, the benefits and privileges which children of their condition usually receive in their own families, until, on or about April 1, 1863, the respondent, in the complainant's absence, removed the complainant's effects from the house, and ever since forbade and prevented him from coming into it, and neglected and refused to give him the said benefits and privileges which he had before enjoyed, or make him any reasonable compensation instead thereof; that in 1850 the complainant became and ever afterwards was a clerk in a counting room in Boston; that up to the time of his mother's death his salary had never exceeded $400 per annum, which fact she well knew; that in 1858, 1859 and 1860, it was at that rate, but from 1860 to 1864 did not in any year exceed $200; that from 1864 until the filing of this bill it was at the rate of $600 per annum; that at the time of his exclusion from the house in 1863 he had saved from his salary of previous years only $250; that afterwards, during that year, in order to obtain means for his support, he sold for $700 his reversion of some land belonging to his mother's estate; that these two sums, together with his salary, included all his means of support, except such provision as was made for him in the will, and were and are wholly inadequate thereto; that he stood in need of such support as he had been accustomed to receive in his mother's lifetime; and that the respondent, though well aware thereof, and often requested therefor, refused to give it.

The respondent filed a general demurrer; and the case was reserved by Chapman, J., for the consideration of the full court.

G. O. Shattuck and J. B. Thayer, for complainant. E. D. Sohier and C. A. Welch, for respondent.

BIGELOW, C. J. We see no sufficient ground for calling in question the wisdom or policy of the rule of construction uniformly applied to wills in the courts in England and in most of the United States, that words of entreaty, recommendation or wish, addressed by a testator to a devisee or legatee, will make him a trustee for the person or persons in whose favor such expressions are used, provided the testator has pointed out with clearness and certainty the objects of the trust, and the subject-matter on which it is to attach or from which it is to arise and be administered. The criticisms which have been sometimes applied to this rule by textwriters and in judicial opinions will be found to rest mainly on its applications in particular cases, and not to involve a doubt of the correctness of the rule itself as a sound principle of construction. Indeed, we cannot understand the force or validity of the objections urged against it, if care is taken to keep it in subordination to the primary and cardinal rule that the intent of the testator is to govern, and to apply it only where the creation of a trust will clearly subserve that intent. It may sometimes be difficult to gather that intent, and there is always a tendency to construe words as obligatory in furtherance of a result which accords with a plain moral duty on the part of a devisee or legatee, and with what it may be supposed the testator would do if he could control his action. But difficulties of this nature, which are inherent in the subject-matter, can always be readily overcome by bearing in mind and rigidly applying in all such cases the test, that to create a trust it must clearly appear that the testator intended to govern and control the conduct of the party to whom the language of the will is addressed, and did not design it as an expression or indication of that which the testator thought would be a reasonable exercise of a discretion which he intended to repose in the legatee or devisee. If the objects of the supposed trust are certain and definite; if the property to which it is to attach is clearly pointed out; if the relations and situation of the testator and the supposed cestuis que trustent are such as to indicate a strong interest and motive on the part of the testator in making them partakers of his bounty; and above all if the recommendatory or precatory clause is so expressed as to warrant the inference that it was designed to be peremptory on the donee,—the just and reasonable interpretation is, that a trust is created, which is obligatory and can be enforced in equity as against the trustee by those in whose behalf the beneficial use of the gift was intended. 1 Jarm. Wills, 333; 1 Redf. Wills, § 17, cls. 11–13; Id. § 43; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. §§ 1068–1070; Malim v. Keighley, 2 Ves. Jr. 333, 529; Bernard v. Minshull, Johns. Eng. Ch. 287; Williams v. Williams, 1 Sim. (N. S.) 358; Bonser v. Kinneer, 2 Giff. 195; Knight v. Boughton, 11 Clark & F. 513, 551; Harrison v. Harrison's Adm'x, 2 Grat. 1; Coate's Appeal, 2 Pa. 129; McKonkey's Appeal, 13 Pa. 253; Erickson v. Willard, 1 N. H. 217; Van Amee v. Jackson, 35 Vt. 173. The doctrine was recognized as an established rule of construction by this court in Whipple v. Adams, 1 Metc. 444, and Homer v. Shelton, 2 Metc. 194, 206.

¹ Argued November, 1866.

Turning now to the clause of the will which is the subject of the present controversy, it seems to us that it does not leave the support of the children of the testatrix to the discretion of the respondent, to be afforded or withheld at his pleasure, but that the devise to him was made on the trust that he should furnish such support so long as he lived and received the income of her property. The objects of the trust are distinctly named.

The nature and extent of the trust is clearly stated and defined. It was such a sum of money as might be necessary to the comfort and support of each one of the children of the testatrix. Nor is the amount of the beneficial interest left indefinite or without a standard by which it can be measured. It is to be such comfort and support "as they or either of them may stand in need of." The extent of such a beneficial interest can be ascertained and enforced by suitable proceedings either at law or in equity. Thorp v. Owen, 2 Hare, 607, 610; Sanderson's Trust, 3 Kay & J. 497–507; Farwell v. Jacobs, 4 Mass. 634. In the last case, it was held by this court that an action at law would lie against an executor who was directed by the testator to furnish support to a person in whose behalf the suit was brought. But in the present case the phrase "comfort and support" is made more definite and certain by an express reference in the terms of the gift to the continuance of a previously existing state of things in the family of the testatrix and her husband, in which the children of the former had resided and received support during her life. Nor is it to be overlooked that the language addressed to the respondent in the clause of the will under consideration is not confined to words expressive of a wish or recommendation only, but the property is given to the respondent "in the full confidence" that he will afford to the children of the testatrix adequate support. Although these words would not necessarily create a trust in a case where a different intent is clearly indicated, they are nevertheless strong and significant to show that such was the purpose of the testatrix, when taken in connection with other facts and circumstances which have a like tendency. Wright v. Atkins, 17 Ves. 255, 258, 261; Meredith v. Heneage, 1 Sim. 542, 556.

We think it also worthy of remark in that connection that it is not left to the respondent to determine the amount or extent of the support which he was to afford to the children. The gift to him is not in the confidence that he will give them such support as he may think proper, or as in his judgment they may need, but to such an extent as they shall in fact "stand in need of." It was to be measured, not by the exercise of his discretion in the matter, but by the actual wants of the children.

The view which we have taken of the construction of the clause of the will by which the property of the testatrix is given to the respondent for his life is greatly strengthened when we take into consideration the relations of all the parties toward each other, the nature and condition of the property which was the subject of the gift, and the ultimate disposition which was made of it by the will after the death of the respondent. The objects for whose comfort and support the testatrix was aiming to provide were her own children, three of them by a former husband, and one by the respondent. They had always lived in the family of the testatrix and her husband, and received all needful support as members thereof. They had no property of their own; and, if they were deprived after her death during the life of the respondent of all benefit of the estate of their mother, from which the support of the family had been chiefly drawn during her life, they would not only lose the support which they had previously enjoyed, but would be in danger of being left without adequate means of support, and without habits or abilities which would enable them to obtain a livelihood. To these children she gives the entire beneficial interest in her whole estate after the death of her husband. Is it reasonable to suppose that under such circumstances she intended that these children, who were so clearly the chief objects of her bounty, should be left during the lifetime of her husband without any such right or interest in her estate as would enable them to enforce a claim for support in the event that, from alienation of feeling, imbecility of mind, or any other like cause, the respondent should be unwilling or unable to comply with her wish or to exercise a discretion in their behalf?

It is suggested that in other clauses of the will, in which she creates a trust in favor of her daughters for their respective shares of her estate, of which they are to have the entire income after the death of her husband, she does not use words of entreaty, request and recommendation, but apt and technical words by which to establish a trust in their behalf. But we think this suggestion is not entitled to much weight. She might well express herself in a different language when addressing her husband from that which she would use toward strangers, and at the same time intend a similar result. Words of confidence, entreaty and recommendation were natural and appropriate when used to express the will of a testatrix who intended to direct and control the conduct of her husband in a matter in which the right to give directions and to control belonged to her. In such a case, the words used by Lord Loughborough are applicable: "Where a person recommends to another who is independent of him, there is nothing imperative; but if he recommends that to be done by a person whom he has a right to order to do it, the mode is only civility." Malim v. Keighley, ubi supra.

After a careful consideration of the case, we are of opinion that the will creates a trust in favor of the complainant, which it is our duty, sitting as a court of equity, to enforce.

Decree accordingly.

HESS et al. v. SINGLER et al.

(114 Mass. 56.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts.
Nov., 1873.

Bill in equity by Charles Hess and August Eiler, executors of the will of George A. Kramer, to which all the persons interested in the estate were made parties defendant, to obtain the directions of the court.

The bill alleged that Matthias Kramer, the father of George A., died having devised his property by a will, the material parts of which were as follows:

"All the rest, residue and remainder of all my estate and property, real, personal and mixed; including all of which I may be seised, and to which I may be entitled at the time of my decease, I give to my son George A. Kramer: To have and to hold the same to him, his heirs and assigns forever, to his and their own use, but subject however to the following charges: namely: To pay to and for the use, support and maintenance of my wife, Polly Kramer, for and during her natural life, at the rate of fifteen dollars a week: and to pay to or for the use of my sister Genevieve Singler, for and during her natural life, at the rate of twelve dollars and a half a month.

"I hereby authorize the executor or executors acting under this will, or my said son, to purchase annuities for the abovementioned payments at the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company, or at some other secure office, in favor of my said wife and my said sister, at any time or times, and by and upon such purchases the said charges upon the estate and property given to my said son shall cease and be discharged.

"It is my will, and I hereby direct the executor or executors acting under this will to expend, in addition to the above provision for my wife, any and all sums of money which may be necessarily incurred in or about the proper nursing and taking care of my wife in any sickness or sicknesses with which she may be visited or afflicted, whether for medical attendance, medicines, nursing or other necessary or proper attentions to her or for her comfort in sickness; it being my intention to provide for the suitable and comfortable support, care and maintenance of my wife (who is subject to mental derangement) during her natural life; and the provision which I have thus made for her is intended by me to be in lieu of and in full and in the stead of any dower or right to dower or thirds or interests in my estate or property.

"I hereby signify to my said son my desire and hope that he will so provide, by will or otherwise, that in case he shall die leaving no lawful issue living, the property which he will take under this will shall go in equal shares,—to the children of my late brother Melchior Kramer, one share; to the children of my said sister Genevieve Singler, including any she may have after the date of this will, one share; to my cousin John Kramer, of Liverpool, in the state of Ohio, one share; to my cousin Matthias Kramer, of said Liverpool, one share; and to my cousin Crescenz Kramer, of said Boston, one share."

The bill then alleged that the greater portion of the estate devised by George A. Kramer, of whose will they were executors (a copy of the will being set forth), was that devised to him as the residuary devisee under the will of his father, and that the children of Genevieve Singler, the surviving children of Melchior Kramer, and John Kramer, Matthias Kramer and Crescenz Kramer, mentioned in the will of Matthias Kramer, contended that by the true construction of that will they were entitled to a greater proportion of the estate than had been devised to them by the will of George A. Kramer, and denied the plaintiffs' authority to sell the real estate according to the authority given by the will of George A. Kramer.

The answer of those claiming under the will of Matthias Kramer alleged that George A. Kramer died leaving no lawful issue living, and alleged that they were entitled to the residue and remainder of the estate of Matthias Kramer, the son George A. Kramer having taken it subject to the trust that in the event of his dying without lawful issue it should go to them respectively in the shares provided in the will.

The other defendants admitted the allegations of the bill.

The case was heard and reserved by Ames, J., on the bill and answers.

E. H. Abbot & L. A. Jones, for those claiming under the will of Matthias Kramer. D. Foster and G. W. Baldwin & J. F. Colby, for those claiming under the will of George A. Kramer.

GRAY, C. J. It is a settled doctrine of courts of chancery that a devise or bequest to one person, accompanied by words expressing a wish, entreaty or recommendation that he will apply it to the benefit of others, may be held to create a trust, if the subject and the objects are sufficiently certain. Some of the earlier English decisions had a tendency to give to this doctrine the weight of an arbitrary rule of construction. But by the later cases, in this, as in all other questions of the interpretation of wills, the intention of the testator, as gathered from the whole will, controls the court; in order to create a trust, it must appear that the words were intended by the testator to be imperative; and when property is given absolutely and without restriction, a trust is not to be lightly imposed, upon mere words of recommendation and confidence. Warner v. Bates, 98 Mass. 274, 277; Spooner v. Lovejoy, 108 Mass. 529; In re Pennock's Estate, 20 Pa. 268; Van Duyne v. Van Duyne, 14 N. J. Eq. 397; Knight v. Knight, 3 Beav. 148, 172, s. c. nom. Knight v. Boughton, 11 Clark & F. 513; Lambe v.

Eames, L. R. 10 Eq. 267, s. c. L. R. 6 Ch. 597; 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 439, 499; 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 64-70.

In the case at bar, the testator devises and bequeaths the residue of his estate to his son, "to have and to hold the same to him, his heirs and assigns forever, to his and their own use, but subject however to the following charges:" These charges are first, the payment of specified sums yearly to the testator's wife and sister for their respective lives, unless discharged by the purchase of annuities in their favor by the executors (of whom the son is one) under the authority given them by the will; second, the further payment, which the testator expressly "directs" the executors to make, of all the wife's expenses in case of sickness, in lieu of her right to dower or thirds in his estate. Subject to these charges during the lives of the testator's wife and sister, the son is given, by the fullest, clearest and most formal words, an absolute estate in fee.

By the further clause of the will, the testator merely signifies to his son his "desire and hope that he will so provide, by will or otherwise, that in case he shall die leaving no lawful issue living, the property which he will take under this will shall go in equal shares" to certain nephews, nieces, and cousins of the testator. This clause, if construed as creating a trust, leaves nothing to the discretion of the son, but amounts to an executory devise over, in case of his death leaving no issue, to the persons named, in definite amounts. To give it that construction would be inconsistent with the principal intention of the testator, as previously manifested, to give the son an absolute title, as well as with the description of the estate in this very clause as "the property which he will take under this will."

It follows that the son had full power to dispose of the estate by will, unfettered by the supposed trust, and that there must be a decree for the son's devisees.

CLAY et al. v. WOOD et al.

(47 N. E. 274, 153 N. Y. 134.)

Court of Appeals of New York. June 8, 1897.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, First department.

Action by George S. Clay and others against Lucretia M. Wood and others for partition, and incidentally to construe the will of William W. Clay, deceased. A judgment dismissing the complaint on the merits was affirmed by the general term (36 N. Y. Supp. 317), and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

This action was brought for the partition of real property, and it involves the construction of the will of William W. Clay, deceased. By that will the testator, after directing the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, and particularly an indebtedness secured by mortgage upon his house and lot, in the second clause gave to his wife, Lucretia, "and to her heirs and assigns, forever," the house and lot mentioned, and also his household goods and personal effects in said house, "to have and to hold the said house and lot to her, my said wife, Lucretia M. Clay, and to her heirs and assigns, forever, and to have and to hold the said household goods, etc., unto her, my said wife, Lucretia M. Clay, and to her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, forever." He also gave to her the sum of $20,000. In the third and fourth clauses he gave legacies to his brothers, to a sister, to nephews, and to an adopted daughter, providing at the same time that none of those legacies should be a charge upon the house and lot and household goods, etc., which he had given to his wife. By the fifth clause he gave all the residue of his estate to his wife, and "to her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, forever," and then stated as follows: "And it is my desire and request that my said wife do sustain, provide for, and educate Lucretia M. Wood, the daughter of my said adopted daughter, Josephine M. Wood. And it is my further desire and request that my wife do make the said Lucretia M. Wood, Josephine M. Wood, and my nephews and nieces, the children of my brothers, Caleb S. Clay and George Clay, joint heirs after her death in the said estate which by this will I have bequeathed to my said wife." The question in this case arises upon the effect to be given to that concluding sentence of the fifth paragraph. The plaintiffs, who are the nephews and nieces referred to therein, claim in their complaint that a trust was thereby created in favor of the persons named, and that Lucretia M. Clay, the widow of the testator, having died, those persons had become tenants in common of the property, or entitled thereto under the trust alleged. It appears that Mrs. Clay died, leaving a will whereby she gave the property equally to Josephine M. Wood and Lucretia M. Wood.

John F. Dillon, for appellants. James L. Bishop, for respondents.

GRAY, J. (after stating the facts). Upon reading this will, we can infer some conflict in the mind of the testator with respect to the ultimate disposition which he should make of his property. It was as to how he might benefit the persons named in the fifth clause, after his widow's death. He could have created, in terms, a life estate in his wife, with a remainder over in their favor, in which case there would be a certainty with respect to their interest; or he could have created a power of appointment in their favor, with a like certainty; or he could take the course which he did, namely, of desiring that his wife should make them "her heirs." The mental conflict was not serious respecting the superior claims of his wife, as we seem clearly to see from the careful and elaborate provisions of his will; but it appears when we read his expressions of desire and of request, addressed to his wife, respecting a disposition of the estate which he had given to her, and which she might well have heeded. What was the dominant intention of Mr. Clay in making his will as he did? To discover that, we must take into consideration the whole scheme of the will, and weigh the expressions which he has made use of when defining the interest of his wife. Whether the will in question was drawn with the aid of a lawyer, or by a lay hand, we are not informed. The language is somewhat inartificial, and yet it is so plain and emphatic as to leave little room for doubt in the mind as to what was the principal purpose of the testator. His general scheme was to give everything to his wife upon his death, except the legacies which he gave by the third and fourth clauses. That was the simple plan which he evidently had in mind, and the question is whether the disposition which he made resulted in vesting in her the full beneficial interest in, and in absolute right of disposal of, the property, or whether, as the appellants claim, a trust was created with respect to that property, or a power of trust imperative in its nature. It is very earnestly and ably argued in behalf of the appellants that by force of the last clause in the fifth paragraph of the will, while the widow took a legal estate in fee, it was subject, as to the real and personal property, to a trust, or to a power in trust, in favor of the persons and the classes of persons named therein; and they base the argument upon the proposition, substantially, that the provision is couched in such precatory words as to fulfill all the conditions named by the authorities as requisite to create a trust, in that the words used exclude any option or discretion in the wife, and the subject of the request and the objects of the bounty are definitely pointed out. They argue, too, that the relations sustained by the persons named to the testator are such, and are shown by other parts of the will to be such, as to indicate a strong interest on his part to make the gift. If, however, the conclusion must be reached that the testator intended an absolute gift to his wife of his real and personal property, carrying with it an absolute right of disposal, then it will become unnecessary for us to consider questions of trust or of power in trust; for the existence of an absolute and beneficial estate in fee in the widow would be equally destructive of the claim of a trust, or of the claim of an imperative trust power.

The testator, it must be admitted, was very emphatic in the use of language when defining the nature of the holding by his wife of the estate devised and bequeathed. When he gave to her the house and lot where he resided, he added the words, "and to her heirs and assigns, forever." In the same paragraph where he had so given her the house and lot, and also all of his household goods and effects, he repeats that she was "to have and to hold the said house and lot to her, * * * and to her heirs and assigns, forever"; and he states with reference to the personal effects that she was to have and to hold them "unto her, * * * and to her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, forever." This repetition of language, indicating completeness and perpetuity of ownership, arrests the attention. It will be observed, too, that there was discrimination in the employment of language defining her holding, in the use of words which would be appropriate in speaking of the succession to either class of property. He had been particular, in the first clause, to direct that in the payment of his debts the mortgage upon the house and lot should be discharged, and he was equally particular, in the promotion of the interests of his wife, in directing, in the fourth clause, that the legacies given should not be a charge upon either the house and lot, or the personal effects mentioned. When he disposes of his residuary estate, in the fifth clause, he is again emphatic in defining the estate which his wife shall take therein, by giving it to her, "and to her heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, forever." Again, in expressing his desire and request as to the disposition to be made by his wife in that clause, he refers to "the said estate which by this will I have bequeathed to my said wife." It is hardly conceivable that the intention of a testator that his wife should have the absolute title to, and the completest right of disposal of, the estate given could be stated in more forcible language. The words which have been sometimes used, and which the counsel for the appellants think would be more appropriate to express the intention to make an absolute gift to the wife, such as "with full power of disposal," or "for her sole use and benefit," would not be any stronger, and, indeed, would seem to be more appropriately used when providing for the case of a married woman, and to protect her against her husband's acts. Where there is an absolute gift of real or personal property, in order to qualify it, or to cut it down, the latter part of the will should show an equally clear intention to do so, by the use of words definite in their meaning, and by expressions which must be regarded as imperative. That is a general rule, and can it be said of the concluding clause of this fifth paragraph that it stands the test? We cannot think so. It undoubtedly contains the desire and request of the testator that his wife should make the persons named her "joint heirs" after death; but, in view of the very emphatic and precise language which he had seen fit to employ in defining the estate which his wife should take in his property, it would be going too far in the effort to give effect to the testator's desire to hold that it dominated his previous expressions of intention, and affected their legal force and significance. In Phillips v. Phillips, 112 N. Y. 197, 19 N. E. 411,—a case upon which much reliance is placed by the appellants,—Judge Finch observed of the testator's will, in the course of his opinion, "that in the gift to his wife he does not add words that could seem inconsistent with a subsequent charge upon it, as for her own use and benefit, or to her and her heirs, forever, but leaves the path to a trust or a charge unobstructed so far as possible." That case differed from the present one in that the testator "wished" his wife, who was his executrix, "if she finds it always convenient," to pay to his sister and brother during their lives the interest on $10,000. In that case there was no cutting down of his wife's fee to a life estate; but, it being seen that a gift was made, dependent only upon the fact of ability to do so, a precatory trust was deemed to have been created with respect to the annuities. The very words of distinction pointed out by Judge Finch are present here. In Re Gardner, 140 N. Y. 122, 35 N. E. 439, the testator gave the residue of his estate to his wife, to have and to hold the same, to her and her assigns, forever, providing that what should remain unexpended or undisposed of at her death he gave to his son and his heirs. The testator added this clause: "And I expect and desire that my said wife will not dispose of my said estate by will in such a way that the whole that might remain at her death shall go out of my own family and blood relation." It was held that "the estate of the wife was not qualified by the precatory words mentioned," and that they were "merely the expression of an expectation or desire." The construction of a trust was refused by us upon the ground that the words of the will in the first instance clearly indicated a disposition in the testator to give the entire interest, use, and benefit to the donee. In Re Hamilton [1895] 2 Ch. 370, which is relied upon in the prevailing opinion at the general term, the following language is used: "I give, bequeath, and appoint to my dear nieces * * * the sum of £2,000 apiece, for their sole and separate use, and to be independent of their husbands, and I wish them to bequeath the same equally between the families of my nephew Silver Oliver and my dear niece Mrs. Packenham in such mode as they shall consider right." It was held that the niece took absolutely, and a construction of the words was refused which should imply that the ladies took for life only, instead of absolutely.

We are referred to many cases on the one side and on the other, but precedents in will cases are not very satisfactory aids in reaching a conclusion in the work of interpretation; for each will will differ in its scheme, as in its forms of expression. At most, they furnish illustrations of the application of those general rules of construction which have been laid down in the decisions of the courts. Whether the precatory words in a will shall be accorded such force as to deprive the donee of the absolute right of disposal, and thereby qualify the beneficial interest in the gift, must be determined in connection with what may be gathered from the rest of the will as an intention which would be reconcilable with the idea of a trust imposed upon the legal estate. Where to impose such a trust would be to nullify previous expressions in the will, and to create a repugnancy between its different parts, then the rules of construction forbid the attempt, and this is not disputed by the appellants' counsel. Their contention in that respect is that that principle of construction has no application to the present case, because of the absence of words showing that the wife was to have the whole beneficial interest. Thus we see that the pivotal point of construction is as to the significance of the expressions used by the testator when giving his estate to his wife, and the inferences to be drawn therefrom. In our view, they are unmistakable, and create an atmosphere about the instrument of an entire subjection of the claims of others upon his bounty to the paramount claim of his wife, and to her ultimate testamentary disposition. In the present case we can only read the language, in which the testator expresses his desire and request, in the light of the emphatic language previously used in the will, and, as so read, award to it the force of a suggestion and of an expectation, which, however strongly phrased, were only morally binding upon the widow. Within the case of Colton v. Colton, 127 U. S. 300, 8 Sup. Ct. 1164, where the testator gave to his wife all of the real and personal estate of which he should die seised, possessed, or entitled to, with a recommendation to her as to the care and protection of his mother and sister, and with a request to her to make such gift and provision for them as in her judgment would be best, the present case might be said to be within the exception there recognized. It was there held that the language of the bequest was sufficient to convey to the testator's wife the whole estate absolutely, if it stood alone, but that nevertheless, as it did not stand alone, and did not "contain any expressions which necessarily anticipate or limit any subsequent provisions affecting it," the bequest was affected by the request. Precisely that did occur in the will under consideration, as we view it, and the language of the devise and bequest to the wife did contain such expressions as to anticipate and limit the possible effect of the subsequent provision. The cases of Dominick v. Sayre, 3 Sandf. 555, and Smith v. Floyd, 140 N. Y. 337, 35 N. E. 606, related to devises for life, with a power, in the one case, and with a "right and privilege," in the other case, of disposal by will in favor of certain persons, and we do not perceive how they affect the conclusions we have reached. We have sufficiently expressed our views upon the questions presented by this appeal, and they lead to an affirmance of the judgment. The judgment should be affirmed, with costs. All concur. Judgment affirmed.

RICHARDS v. DELBRIDGE.

(L. R. 18 Eq. 11.)

Chancery Division. April 16, 1874.

Demurrer. The bill filed by Edward Bennetto Richards, an infant, by his next friend, stated: That John Delbridge, deceased, was possessed of a mill, with the plant, machinery, and stock-in-trade thereto belonging, in which he carried on the business of a bone manure merchant, and which was held under a lease dated the 24th of June, 1863. That on the 7th of March, 1873, John Delbridge indorsed upon the lease and signed the following memorandum: "7th March, 1873. This deed and all thereto belonging I give to Edward Bennetto Richards from this time forth with all the stock-in-trade. John Delbridge." That the plaintiff was the person named in the memorandum, and the grandson of John Delbridge, and had then for some time assisted him in the business. That John Delbridge, shortly after signing the memorandum, delivered the lease on his behalf to Elizabeth Ann Richards, the plaintiff's mother, who was still in possession thereof. That John Delbridge died in April, 1873, having executed several testamentary instruments which did not refer specifically to the said mill and premises, but he gave his furniture and effects, after his wife's death, to be divided among his family. That the testator's widow, Elizabeth Richards, took out administration to his estate, with the testamentary papers annexed. The bill, which was filed against the defendants Elizabeth Delbridge, Elizabeth Ann Richards, and the testator's two sons, who claimed under the said testamentary instruments, prayed a declaration that the indorsement upon the lease by John Delbridge and the delivery of the lease to Elizabeth Ann Richards created a valid trust in favor of the plaintiff of the lease and of the estate and interest of John Delbridge in the property therein comprised, and in the good will of the business carried on there, and in the implements and stock-in-trade belonging to the business. The defendants demurred to the bill for want of equity.

Fry, Q. C., and Mr. Phear, in support of the demurrer. W. R. Fisher (Mr. Southgate, Q. C., with him), and T. D. Bolton, for plaintiff. Gregory, Rowcliffes & Rawle, for defendants.

JESSEL, M. R. This bill is warranted by the decisions in Richardson v. Richardson, L. R. 3 Eq. 686, and Morgan v. Malleson, L. R. 10 Eq. 475, but, on the other hand, we have the case of Milroy v. Lord, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 264, before the court of appeals, and the more recent case of Warriner v. Rogers, L. R. 16 Eq. 340, 348, in which Vice Chancellor Bacon said: "The rule of law upon this subject I take to be very clear, and, with the exception of two cases which have been referred to (Richardson v. Richardson and Morgan v. Malleson), the decisions are all perfectly consistent with that rule. The one thing necessary to give validity to a declaration of trust—the indispensable thing—I take to be, that the donor, or grantor, or whatever he may be called, should have absolutely parted with that interest which had been his up to the time of the declaration, should have effectually changed his right in that respect, and put the property out of his power, at least in the way of interest."

The two first mentioned cases are wholly opposed to the two last. That being so, I am not at liberty to decide the case otherwise than in accordance with the decision of the court of appeal. It is true the judges appear to have taken different views of the construction of certain expressions, but I am not bound by another judge's view of the construction of particular words; and there is no case in which a different principle is stated from that laid down by the court of appeal. Moreover, if it were my duty to decide the matter for the first time, I should lay down the law in the same way.

The principle is a very simple one. A man may transfer his property, without valuable consideration, in one of two ways: he may either do such acts as amount in law to a conveyance or assignment of the property, and thus completely divest himself of the legal ownership, in which case the person who by those acts acquires the property takes it beneficially, or on trust, as the case may be; or the legal owner of the property may, by one or other of the modes recognized as amounting to a valid declaration of trust, constitute himself a trustee, and, without an actual transfer of the legal title, may so deal with the property as to deprive himself of its beneficial ownership, and declare that he will hold it from that time forward on trust for the other person. It is true he need not use the words, "I declare myself a trustee," but he must do something which is equivalent to it, and use expressions which have that meaning; for, however anxious the court may be to carry out a man's intention, it is not at liberty to construe words otherwise than according to their proper meaning.

The cases in which the question has arisen are nearly all cases in which a man, by documents insufficient to pass a legal interest, has said: "I give or grant certain property to A. B." Thus, in Morgan v. Malleson, L. R. 10 Eq. 475, the words were: "I hereby give and make over to Dr. Morris an India bond"; and in Richardson v. Richardson, L. R. 3 Eq. 686, the words were, "grant convey, and assign." In both cases the judges held that the words were effectual declarations of trust. In the former case, Lord Romilly considered that the words were the same as these: "I undertake to hold the bond for you," which would undoubtedly have amounted to a declaration of trust.

The true distinction appears to me to be plain, and beyond dispute; for man to make himself a trustee there must be an expression of intention to become a trustee, whereas words of present gift shew an intention to give over property to another, and not retain it in the donor's own hands for any purpose, fiduciary or otherwise.

In Milroy v. Lord, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 264, 274, Lord Justice Turner, after referring to the two modes of making a voluntary settlement valid and effectual, adds these words: "The cases, I think, go further, to this extent: That if the settlement is intended to be effectuated by one of the modes to which I have referred, the court will not give effect to it by applying another of those modes. If it is intended to take effect by transfer, the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, for then every imperfect instrument would be made effectual by being converted into a perfect trust."

It appears to me that that sentence contains the whole law on the subject. If the decisions of Lord Romilly and of Vice-Chancellor Wood were right, there never could be a case where an expression of a present gift would not amount to an effectual declaration of trust, which would be carrying the doctrine on that subject too far. It appears to me that these cases of voluntary gifts should not be confounded with another class of cases in which words of present transfer for valuable consideration are held to be evidence of a contract which the court will enforce. Applying that reasoning to cases of this kind, you only make the imperfect instrument evidence of a contract of a voluntary nature which this court will not enforce; so that, following out the principle even of those cases, you come to the same conclusion.

I must, therefore, allow the demurrer; and, though I feel some hesitation, owing to the conflict of the authorities, I think the costs must follow the result.

YOUNG v. YOUNG.

(80 N. Y. 422.)

Court of Appeals of New York. 1880.

Appeal from judgment of the general term of the supreme court, in the Third judicial department, reversing a decree of the surrogate of the county of Sullivan upon the accounting of plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of Joseph Young, deceased.

Upon such accounting the administrator claimed that certain United States and town coupon bonds belonged to himself and to his brother, John N. Young. The surrogate disallowed the claim, and charged him with said bonds.

These bonds, upon the death of the intestate, were found in two packages inclosed in envelopes, upon which were indorsed memoranda signed by him, one dated March 14, the other March 14, 1874, each of which described the bonds inclosed by numbers, and stated that certain of them belonged to William H. Young, that the others belonged to John N. Young. Then followed a statement of the indorsements, of which the following is a copy: "But the inst. to become due thereon is owned and reserved by me for so long as I shall live; at my death they belong absolutely and entirely to them and their heirs." The other was similar.

The circumstances under which the memoranda were made, and the further material facts, are set forth in the opinion.

Hezekiah Watson, for appellant. Homer A. Nelson, for respondent.

RAPALLO, J. The intention of Joseph Young, deceased, to give the bonds in controversy on this appeal to his son, William H. Young, reserving to himself only the interest during his life-time, was so clearly manifested, that we have examined the case with a strong disposition to effectuate that intention and sustain the gift, if possible.

The transaction is sought to be sustained in two aspects: First, as an actual executed gift, and secondly, as a declaration of trust. These positions are antagonistic to each other, for if a trust was created, the possession of the bonds, and the legal title thereto, remained in the trustee. In that case there was no delivery to the donee, and consequently no valid executed gift; while if there was a valid gift, the possession and legal title must have been transferred to the donee, and no trust was created. As each of these theories thus necessarily excludes the other, they must be separately considered.

To establish a valid gift, a delivery of the subject of the gift to the donee or to some person for him, so as to divest the possession and title of the donor, must be shown, and the first question which arises under the peculiar circumstances of this case is, whether it is practicable to make a valid gift in present of an instrument securing the payment of money, reserving to the donor the accruing interest, and if so, by what means this can be done. The purpose of such a gift may undoubtedly be accomplished by a proper transfer to a trustee and perhaps by a written transfer delivered to the donee, but the question now is, can it be done in the form of a gift, without any written transfer delivered to the donee, and without creating any trust? I can conceive of but one way in which this is possible, and that is by an absolute delivery of the security which is the subject of the gift, to the donee, vesting the entire legal title and possession in him, on his undertaking to account to the donor for the interest which he may collect thereon. But if the donor retains the instrument under his own control, though he do so merely for the purpose of collecting the interest, there is an absence of the complete delivery which is absolutely essential to the validity of a gift. A gift cannot be made by creating a joint possession of donor and donee, even though the intention be that each shall have an interest in the chattel, especially where, as in this case, the line of division between these interests is not ascertainable. The reservation of the interest on the bonds to the donor was for an uncertain period; that is, during his life-time, and until his death it was impossible to determine the precise proportion of the money secured by the bonds, to which the donee was entitled.

If therefore the donor retained the custody of the bonds for the purpose of collecting the accruing interest, or even if they were placed in the joint custody or possession of himself and the donee, there was no sufficient delivery to constitute a gift. But if an absolute delivery of the bonds to the donee, with intent to pass the title, was made out, the donor reserving only the right to look to the donee for the interest, the transaction may be sustained as an executed gift. Doty v. Willson, 47 N. Y. 580.

This brings us to an examination of the evidence. The written memoranda attached by the donor to the envelopes containing the bonds, evinced his intention to make a present gift to the respondent of an interest in the bonds, and shows that the disposition was not intended to be of a testamentary character. He declares that the bonds are owned by William H. Young, but the interest to become due on the same is owned and reserved by the donor for so long as he shall live, and that at his death the bonds are owned by the donee "absolutely and entirely" in one case, and "wholly and entirely" in the other. There are some verbal differences in the two memoranda, but the purport of both is the same. They both express in the same words that the interest to become due on the bonds is "owned and reserved" by the donor for so long as he shall live, and that the bonds are not to be long "wholly" or "absolutely" to the donees till after his death.

The exhibition of these memoranda to the wife of the donee, and the declarations of the donor, show that what he had thus done was in pursuance of a settled purpose, and that he believed that he had made a valid disposition of the bonds according to the memoranda, but they do not satisfy the requirement of an actual delivery.

The evidence touching the point of delivery is that the deceased for several years before his death resided at the house of his son, William H. Young, where there was a safe which had formerly belonged to the deceased, but which he is said to have presented to his grandson, James C. Young, a son of William H., reserving to himself the right to use the safe, and in fact using it as a place of deposit for his valuable papers. That William H. Young also kept papers in the same safe, but rarely went to it himself, the deceased being in the habit of depositing therein for him such things as he desired, and removing them for him at his request.

The upper part of this safe was divided into pigeon-holes, where the deceased usually kept his papers and was in the habit, up to the time of the transaction now in question, of keeping the bonds in controversy. The lower part of the safe was divided into larger open compartments, one of which had been appropriated as the receptacle of the papers of William H. Young.

After affixing to the two envelopes in which the bonds were contained, the memoranda showing the dispositions in favor of his sons William H. Young and John N. Young, and after exhibiting these memoranda to the respective wives of the donees, the deceased replaced the two packages of bonds in this safe, and after his death they were found, not in the pigeon-hole where they had formerly been kept, but in the compartment where William H. Young's papers were kept. After the memoranda had been made, the bonds were generally kept in that compartment, but the deceased had been seen by William H. to put them in the pigeon-holes and take them out with the indorsements on.

On the occasion of exhibiting the packages of bonds and the indorsements to Mrs. William H. Young, the deceased asked her to take them in her hands and see what he had written on them. But this was not intended as a delivery to her, for she asked him whether he wanted her to take them and put them up, and he said, "No." After having thus exhibited them he took them back and placed them in the safe. The memoranda were made on the 14th March, 1874. The testator died November 12, 1875. In the meantime installments of interest on the bonds became due. The deceased cut off the coupons, and on some occasions William H. Young assisted him in so doing, but William H. testified that he never asserted any ownership over the bonds as against his father. And the testimony shows that they were at all times under the control of the deceased, although William H. Young and his son, James C. Young, also had access to the safe. Those three however were the only persons having access to the safe, and it does not appear that John N. Young, the other donee named in the memoranda, ever had any control over the bonds or access thereto. It was also shown that after the alleged gift, when solicited for a loan, the deceased said that he supposed he might with the boys' consent take some of their bonds. Also that he called the attention of his grandson, James C. Young, to the memoranda and said, "you see what I have done with them." That he declared to a witness, Benjamin Grant, that what he had left he had given to William and Newton. That in September, 1875, he took from one of the envelopes a bond of $1,000, being one of those stated in the memorandum indorsed to belong to John N. Young, and gave it to a third party, but it also appeared that he had, before making the memorandum, presented John N. Young with $1,000.

This is the substance of all the testimony by which a delivery to the donee is sought to be established. It shows that the deceased at no time parted with the possession or control of the bonds, but merely confirms the intention expressed in the memoranda. The change of the position of the bonds in the safe where they were kept, from the pigeon-hole to the compartment, might have been significant had William H. been the only donee, and had the intended gift been unaccompanied by any reservation. But under the existing circumstances it cannot be construed into a delivery of the bonds. In the first place, part of the bonds were stated in the memoranda to be given to William H., and part to John N. Young. The intention of the donor toward each of his sons was the same. Yet no attempt appears to have been made to effect any sort of delivery to John N. Moreover, the form of the intended gift shows that no immediate delivery could have been contemplated by the deceased. The memorandum on each envelope says that the interest to become due on the bonds is "owned and reserved" by the donor. This interest, up to the dates of the maturity of the bonds respectively, was represented by coupons attached to the bonds. It clearly could not have been intended to deliver them, for so many of them as might become due during the life of the donor were reserved from the gift, as the interest was expressly declared to be "owned" by the donor, and not parted with. The possession of these coupons was necessary to enable him to collect the interest, and he availed himself of it for that purpose from time to time. No intention was manifested to deliver up these vouchers and look to the donees for the interest. No division of the coupons could be made, for the period of the donor's life was uncertain; and further, if all the coupons were retained by the donor, they might not represent the entire interest reserved by him. The bonds matured in 1887 and 1888, and some were redeemable earlier; and if he had lived until the maturity of the bonds, or until the United States bonds were called in by the government, as they were liable to be, the donees would not then have been entitled to the possession of the bonds or their proceeds. The reservation accompanying the gift would entitle the donor to possession of the fund. The intention of the donor, as deducible from the memoranda and the evidence, was, not to part with his title to the accruing interest, but to keep the bonds and collect the interest for his own use till he should die; and that then, and not before, his sons should have possession of them and own them absolutely. That although he meant that their right to this interest in remainder should be vested and irrevocable from the time of the supposed gift, yet that at no time during his life did the donees have exclusive possession of the bonds or the legal right to such possession.

The declarations of the donor that he had given the bonds to his sons must be understood as referring to the qualified gift which he intended to make. There is nothing to indicate that he ever relinquished his right to the interest, and all the circumstances of the case show that he could not have intended to admit that he had made an absolute gift, free from the qualification expressed in the memoranda. The cases of Grangiac v. Arden, 10 Johns. 295; Davis v. Davis, 8 Nott & McC. 226, and kindred cases, consequently have no application. The principle of those cases was applied in the late case of Trow v. Shannon, 78 N. Y. 446, but in that case the gift was intended to be absolute. No qualification was attached to it, and the bonds were placed where they were accessible to the donee, and he had himself collected the interest for his own use. There was nothing inconsistent with a full delivery, but there was no direct evidence of such delivery, and the admissions of the donor that she had given the bonds and they belonged to the donee, were received, and weight given to them, as some evidence from which the jury might infer that the gift had been completed by an absolute delivery.

It is impossible to sustain this as an executed gift, without abrogating the rule that delivery is essential to gifts of chattels inter vivos. It is an elementary rule that such a gift cannot be made to take effect in possession in futuro. Such a transaction amounts only to a promise to make a gift, which is nudum pactum. Pitts v. Mangum, 2 Bailey, 588. There must be a delivery of possession with a view to pass a present right of property. "Any gift of chattels which expressly reserves the use of the property to the donor for a certain period, or (as commonly appears in the cases which the courts have had occasion to pass upon) as long as the donor shall live, is ineffectual." 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. p. 118, and cases cited; Vass v. Hicks, 3 Murph. (N. C.) 494. This rule has been applied even where the gift was made by a written instrument or deed purporting to transfer the title, but containing the reservation. Sutton's Ex'r v. Hallowell, 2 Dev. 186; Lance v. Lance, 5 Jones Law, 413.

The only question remaining therefore is whether a valid declaration of trust is made out.

The trust contended for, if put into words, would be that the donor should hold the bonds and their proceeds for his own benefit during his life and to the use of the donees from the time of his own death.

Of course no trust was created of the interest for the donor's own life, for he was the legal owner of the income of the bonds, and never parted with this right—nor could he be at the same time trustee and cestui que trust. The trust then would be to hold to the use of the donees an estate in remainder in the bonds, which should vest in possession in the donees, at the time of his death.

The difficulty in establishing such a trust is that the donor did not undertake or attempt to create it, but to vest the remainder directly in the donees. Assuming, for the purposes of the argument, that he might have created such a trust in himself, for the benefit of his sons, and, further, that he might have done so by simply signing a paper to that effect and retaining it in his own possession, without ever having delivered it to the donees, or any one for them, yet he did not do so. He simply signed a paper certifying that the bonds belonged to his sons. He did not declare that he held them in trust for the donees, but that they owned them subject to the reservation, and were at his death to have them absolutely. If this instrument had been founded upon a valuable consideration, equity might have interfered and effectuated its intent by compelling the execution of a declaration of trust, or by charging the bonds, while in his hands, with a trust in favor of the equitable owner. Day v. Roth, 18 N. Y. 448. But it is well settled that equity will not interpose to perfect a defective gift or voluntary settlement made without consideration. If legally made, it will be upheld, but it must stand as made or not at all. When therefore it is found that the gift which the deceased attempted to make failed to take effect for want of delivery, or a sufficient transfer, and it is sought to supply this defect and carry out the intent of the donor by declaring a trust which he did not himself declare, we are encountered by the rule above referred to. Story, Eq. Jur. 706, 787, 793b-793d; Antrobus v. Smith, 12 Ves. 39, 43; Edwards v. Jones, 1 Mylne & C. 226; 7 Sim. 325; Price v. Price, 8 Eng. Law & Eq. 281; Hughes v. Stubbs, 1 Hare, 476. It is established as unquestionable law that a court of equity cannot by its authority render that gift perfect which the donor has left imperfect, and cannot convert an imperfect gift into a declaration of trust, merely on account of that imperfection. Heartley v. Nicholson, 44 L. J. Ch. 279. It has in some cases been attempted to establish an exception in favor of a wife and children on the ground that the moral obligation of the donor to provide for them constituted what was called a meritorious consideration for the gift, but Judge Story (2 Eq. Jur. § 987, and 1 Eq. Jur. § 433) says that that doctrine seems now to be overthrown, and that the general principle is established that in no case whatever will courts of equity interfere in favor of mere volunteers, whether it be upon a voluntary contract, or a covenant, or a settlement, however meritorious may be the consideration, and although the beneficiaries stand in the relation of a wife or child. Holloway v. Headington, 8 Sim. 325; Jeffreys v. Jeffreys, 1 Craig & P. 138, 141.

These positions are sustained by many authorities. To create a trust, the acts or words relied upon must be unequivocal, implying that the person holds the property as trustee for another. Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, per Church, C. J. Though it is not necessary that the declaration of trust be in terms explicit, the donor must have evinced by acts which admit of no other interpretation, that such legal right as he retains is held by him as trustee for the donee. Heartley v. Nicholson, 44 L. J. Ch. 277, per Bacon, V. C. The settler must transfer the property to a trustee, or declare that he holds it himself in trust. Milroy v. Lord, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 264, per Lord Knight Bruce. In cases of voluntary settlements or gifts, the court will not impute a trust where a trust was not in fact the thing contemplated. The distinction between words importing a gift and words creating a trust is pointed out by Sir Geo. Jessel in Richards v. Delbridge, L. R. 18 Eq. Cas. 11, as follows: "The making a man trustee involves an intention to become a trustee, whereas words of gift show an intention to give over property to another, and not to retain it in the donor's hands for any purpose, fiduciary or otherwise."

The words of the donor in the present case are that the bonds are owned by the donees, but that the interest to accrue thereon is owned and reserved by the donor for so long as he shall live, and at his death they belong absolutely to the donees. No intention is here expressed to hold any legal title to the bonds in trust for the donees. Whatever interest was intended to be vested in them was transferred to them directly, subject to the reservation in favor of the donor during his life, and free from that reservation at his death. Nothing was reserved to the donor, to be held in trust or otherwise, except his right to the accruing interest which should become payable during his life. It could only be by reforming or supplementing the language used, that a trust could be created, and this, as has been shown, will not be done in case of a voluntary settlement without consideration. There are two English cases where indeed the circumstances were much stronger in favor of the donees than in the present case, which tend to sustain the position that a settlement of this description may be enforced in equity by constituting the donor trustee for the donee. They are Morgan v. Malleson, L. R. 10 Eq. Cas. 475, and Richardson v. Richardson, L. R. 3 Eq. Cas. 686. In the first of these cases, Morgan v. Malleson, L. R. 10 Eq. Cas. 475, the intestate signed and delivered to Dr. Morris a memorandum in writing: "I hereby give and make over to Dr. Morris one India bond," but did not deliver the bond. Sir John Romilly sustained this gift as a declaration of trust. The case is referred to by Church, C. J., in Martin v. Funk as an extreme case. In Richardson v. Richardson, an instrument purporting to be an assignment, unsupported by a valuable consideration, was upheld as a declaration of trust. In speaking of these cases in Richards v. Delbridge, L. R. 18 Eq. Cas. 11, Sir Geo. Jessel, M. R., says: "If the decisions of Lord Romilly (in Morgan v. Malleson), and of Wood, V. C. (in Richardson v. Richardson) were right, there never could be a case where the expression of a present gift would not amount to an effectual declaration of trust." And it may be added that there never could be a case where an intended gift, defective for want of delivery, could not, if expressed in writing, be sustained as a declaration of trust. Both of the cases cited are now placed among overruled cases. Fisher, Ann. Dig. (1873 and 1874) 24, 25. In Moore v. Moore, 43 L. J. Ch. 623, Hall, V. C., says: "I think it very important indeed to keep a clear and definite distinction between these cases of imperfect gifts and cases of declarations of trust; and that we should not extend beyond what the authorities have already established, the doctrine of declarations of trust, so as to supplement what would otherwise be mere imperfect gifts." If the settlement is intended to be effectuated by gift, the court will not give effect to it by construing it as a trust. If it is intended to take effect by transfer the court will not hold the intended transfer to operate as a declaration of trust, for then every imperfect instrument would be made effectual by being converted into a perfect trust. Milroy v. Lord, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 264.

The case of Martin v. Funk and kindred cases cannot aid the respondent. In all those cases there was an express declaration of trust. In the one named the donor delivered the money to the bank, taking back its obligation to herself in the character of trustee for the donee; thus parting with all beneficial interest in the fund, and having the legal title vested in her in the character of trustee only. No interposition on the part of the court was necessary to confer that character upon her; nor was it necessary, by construction or otherwise, to change or supplement the actual transaction. None of the difficulties encountered in the present case stood in the way of carrying out her intention. It was capable of being executed in the form in which it was expressed.

The question whether a remainder in a chattel may be created and given by a donor by carving out a life estate for himself and transferring the remainder, without the intervention of a trustee, is learnedly discussed in the appellant's brief; but the views we have expressed render it unnecessary to pursue that inquiry. We are satisfied that it is impossible to hold that the facts as they appear establish a valid transfer of any interest in the bonds in question to the donee, and that the attempted gift cannot be sustained as a declaration of trust. It follows that the judgment of the general term must be reversed and the decree of the surrogate affirmed. Costs of all the parties in this court and in the supreme court to be paid out of the estate.

All concur.

Judgment reversed.

In re WEBB'S ESTATE.

(49 Cal. 541.)

Supreme Court of California. Jan., 1875.

Appeal from probate court, city and county of San Francisco.

Lloyd Baldwin, for appellant. George W. Tyler, for respondent.

CROCKETT, J. The claim of the father and sisters of the deceased to the fund in controversy can be sustained, if at all, on no other ground than that, by the two letters of the deceased to his sisters, he created and declared a present trust, to the effect that he held the policy of insurance in trust for his father and sisters. The transaction cannot be upheld merely as a donation inter vivos. There was no assignment or delivery of the policy to the father and sisters, and treated simply as a donation, it would fail for that reason. But a person intending to make a donation to another, and who clearly declares his purpose and transfers the title, need not necessarily part with the possession, provided he declares himself, in proper form, to be a trustee, holding possession for the donee. In such a case, he would thenceforth hold the property as a trustee and not in his own right. That such a trust, when properly declared, even in favor of a volunteer, is valid, and will be enforced, is established by numerous authorities. "Where there is no valuable consideration, yet, if the settler, by a clear and explicit declaration, duly executed, and intended to be final and binding upon him, makes himself a trustee, courts of equity will enforce the trust." Perry, Trusts, § 96. "If the trust is perfectly created, so that the donor or settler has nothing more to do, and the person seeking to enforce it has need of no further conveyances from the settler, and nothing is required of the court but to give effect to the trust as an executed trust, it will be carried into effect, although it was without consideration, and the possession of the property was not changed. Whether the trust is perfectly created or not is a question of fact in each case, and the court, in determining the fact, will give effect to the situation and relation of the parties, the nature and situation of the property, and the purposes or objects which the settler had in view making the disposition." Id. §§ 98, 99.

HUTCH. & BUNK. EQ.—25

In such cases the point to be determined is, whether the trust has been "perfectly created;" that is to say, whether the title has passed and the trust been declared, and the trust being executed nothing remains for the court but to enforce it. In discussing this question the court say, in Stone v. Hackett, 12 Gray, 227: "It is certainly true that a court of equity will lend no assistance toward perfecting a voluntary contract or agreement for the creation of a trust, nor regard it as binding so long as it remains executory. But it is equally true that if such an agreement or contract be executed by a conveyance of property in trust, so that nothing remains to be done by the grantor or donor to complete the transfer of title, the relation of trustee and cestui que trust is deemed to be established, and the equitable rights and interests arising out of the conveyance, though made without consideration, will be enforced in chancery." The same proposition is announced, and the authorities fully collated and examined, in Kederick v. Manning, 1 De Gex, M. & G. 176. To the same effect are Jones v. Lock, L. R. 1 Ch. 25, and Wason v. Colburn, 99 Mass. 342.

We think these cases announce the correct rule, and are decisive of the present controversy. The letters from the deceased to his sisters did not purport and were not intended to be an assignment of the policy, the title to which remained in the deceased. It was not an executed trust, but at most nothing more than a voluntary executory agreement to create a trust in futuro, and such agreements cannot be enforced in equity. This view of the case renders it unnecessary for us to decide whether the probate court had jurisdiction to enforce the trust, if it had been established.

Judgment reversed and cause remanded for a new trial.

McKINSTY, J., did not express an opinion.

MARTIN v. FUNK.

(75 N. Y. 134.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Nov. 12, 1878.

Nehemiah Millard, for appellants. M. W. Divine, for respondent.

CHURCH, C. J. The facts in this case are substantially undisputed, as found by the judge before whom the case was tried. The intestate Mrs. Boone, in 1866, deposited in the Citizens' Savings Bank $500, declaring at the time that she wanted the account to be in trust for Lillie Willard, who is the plaintiff. The account was so entered, and a pass-book delivered to the intestate, which contained these entries: "The Citizens' Savings Bank in account with Susan Boone, in trust for Lillie Willard. 1866, March 23, $500."

A deposit of the same amount and in the same manner was made in trust for Kate Willard, now Mrs. Brown. This money belonged to the intestate at the time of the deposits. The plaintiff and Mrs. Brown are sisters, and were at the time of the age respectively of eighteen and twenty, and were distant relatives of the intestate, their mother being a second cousin. The intestate retained possession of the pass-books until her death in 1875, and the plaintiff and her sister were ignorant of the deposits until after that event. The money remained in the bank with its accumulated interest until the death of the intestate, except that she drew out one year's interest. Mrs. Brown assigned to the plaintiff her interest in the deposit purporting to have been made for her benefit, and the action is brought against the administrator of the intestate and the bank for the delivery of the pass-books and the recovery of the money. The question involved has been very much litigated, and many refinements may be found in the books in respect to it. Many cases have been found difficult of solution, not so much on account of the general principles which should govern, as in applying those principles to a particular state of facts. It is clear that a person sui juris, acting freely and with full knowledge, has the power to make a voluntary gift of the whole or any part of his property, while it is well settled that a mere intention, whether expressed or not, is not sufficient, and a voluntary promise to make a gift is nudum pactum, and of no binding force. Kekewich v. Manning, 50 Eng. Ch. 175, and cases cited. The act constituting the transfer must be consummated, and not remain incomplete, or rest in mere intention, and this is the rule whether the gift is by delivery only, or by the creation of a trust in a third person, or in creating the donor himself a trustee. Enough must be done to pass the title, although when a trust is declared, whether in a third person or the donor, it is not essential that the property should be actually possessed by the ces-tul que trust, nor is it even essential that the latter should be informed of the trust. In Milroy v. Lord, 4 De Gex, F. & J. 264, Lord Chief Justice Turner, who adopted the most rigid construction of trusts, in delivering an opinion against the validity of the trust in that case, laid down the general principles as accurately perhaps as is practicable. He said: "I take the law of this court to be well settled, that in order to render a voluntary settlement valid and effectual the settler must have done every thing which according to the nature of the property comprised in the settlement was necessary to be done in order to transfer the property, and render the settlement binding upon him. He may of course do this by actually transferring the property to the persons for whom he intended to provide, and the provision will then be effectual, and it will be equally effectual if he transfer the property to a trustee for the purpose of the settlement, or declare that he himself holds it in trust for those purposes, and if the property be personal, the trust may I apprehend be declared either in writing or by parol."

The contention of the defendant is that the transaction did not transfer the property, and that there was no sufficient declaration of trust and that by retaining the pass-books the intestate never parted with the control of the property. If what she did was sufficient to constitute herself a trustee, it must follow that whatever control she retained would be exercised as trustee, and the right to exercise it would not be necessarily inconsistent with the completeness of the trust. The question involving substantially the same facts has been several times before different courts of the state, and in every instance the transaction has been sustained as a good gift.

The Case of Wetzel before Surrogate Bradford, and Millspaugh v. Putnam, 16 Abb. Prac. 380, were deposits in the same form, and in the former the cestui que trust had no notice of the deposit, and in both cases the gift was held effectual. In Smith v. Lee, 2 Thomp. & C. 591, money was deposited with the defendant, and a note taken payable to the depositor for another person, and it was held that the depositor constituted himself a trustee. The case of Kelly v. Manhattan Inst. for Savings (not reported) was a special term decision of the New York common pleas before Robinson, J., where precisely such a deposit was made as in this, and it was upheld as an absolute gift. These decisions although not controlling upon this court are entitled to respect, and they show the tendency of the judicial mind to give these transactions the effect which on their face they import. So in Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512, a similar deposit was upheld as a declaration of trust. Park, J., noticed the point urged there as here of the retention of the pass-book, and said: "She retained possession therefore because the deposit was made in her name as trustee, and not because she had not given the beneficial interest of the deposit to the plaintiff," and in that case the depositor had drawn out the deposit, and the action was sustained against her administrator. So in Ray v. Simmons, 11 R. I. 266; the facts were precisely like the case at bar, except that the cestui que trust was informed of the gift, and the court held the trust valid.

But the supreme court of Massachusetts in two cases (Brabrook v. Boston Five Cent Sav. Bank, 104 Mass. 228, and Clark v. Clark, 108 Mass. 522) seem to hold a different doctrine. In the first case the circumstances were deemed controlling, adverse to an intent to create a trust, and in the last, which was similar in its facts to this, the court express the opinion that the trust was not complete, but without giving any reasons for the opinion. The last decision, although entitled to great respect, is exceptional to the general current of authority in this country.

In the English courts I do not find any case where these precise facts appeared, but the cases are numerous where the general principles have been elaborately discussed and applied to particular facts. It is only deemed necessary to refer to a few of them. In Richardson v. Richardson, L. R. 3 Eq. Cas. 684, it was held that an instrument executed as a present and complete assignment (not being a mere contract to assign at a future day) is equivalent to a declaration of trust. Morgan v. Malleson, L. R. 10 Eq. Cas. 475, was decided upon this principle, and is an extreme case in support of a declaration trust. It appeared that the testator gave to his medical attendant the following memorandum: "I hereby give and make over to Dr. Morris, an Indian bond No. D 506, value £1,000, as some token for all his very kind attention to me during my illness." This was held to constitute the testator a trustee for Dr. Morris of the bond which was retained by him. These cases are commented upon, and the latter somewhat criticised in Warriner v. Rogers, L. R. 16 Eq. 340, but Sir James Bacon, in delivering the opinion, substantially adheres to the general rule before stated. He requires only "that the donor or grantor, or whatever he may be called, should have absolutely parted with that interest which had been his up to the time of the declaration—should have effectually changed his right in that respect, and put the property out of his power, at least in the way of interest." This case was decided against the validity of the trust, mainly upon the ground that the memoranda produced were upon their face testamentary in character. In Pye's Case, 18 Ves. 140, money was transmitted to an agent in France to purchase an annuity for a lady. Owing to circumstances which the agent supposed prevented its purchase in her name, he purchased it in the name of the principal. When the latter learned this fact, he executed and transmitted to the agent a power of attorney to transfer the annuity, but before its arrival the principal died. Lord Eldon held that a declaration of trust was established.

Wheatley v. Purr, 1 Keen, 551, is quite analogous to the case at bar. A testatrix directed her brokers to place £2,000, in the joint name of the plaintiffs, and herself as a trustee for the plaintiffs. The sum was placed to the account of the testatrix alone, as trustee of the plaintiffs, and a promissory note was given by them to her as such trustee. The note remained in her possession until her death, when her executor received the money. It was held that the transaction amounted to a complete declaration of trust.

Mr. Hill, in his work on Trustees, after saying "that it is extremely difficult, in the present state of authorities, to define with accuracy the law affecting this very intricate subject," lays down the following as the result: "When the author of the voluntary trust is possessed of the legal interest in the property, a clear declaration of trust contained in or accompanying a deed or act which passes the legal estate will create a perfect executed trust, and so a declaration or direction by a party that the property shall be held in trust for the object of his bounty, though unaccompanied by a deed or other act divesting himself of the legal estate, is an executed trust." Hill, Trustees, 130.

If there is a valid declaration of trust, that is sufficient of itself, I apprehend, to transfer the title, but the difficulty is in determining what constitutes such a declaration, and whether a mere formal transfer of the property, as in the case of the medical attendant, is sufficient, is a question upon which there is some difference of opinion. No particular form of words is necessary to constitute a trust, while the act or words relied upon must be unequivocal, implying that the person holds the property as trustee for another.

Let us now consider the case in hand. In form at least the title to the money was changed from the intestate individually to her as trustee. She stated to the bank that she desired the money to be thus deposited. It was so done by her direction, and she took a voucher to herself in trust for the plaintiff. Upon these facts what other intent can be imputed to the intestate than such as her acts and declarations imported, and did they not import a trust? There was no contingency or uncertainty in the circumstances, and I am unable to see wherein it was incomplete. The money was deposited unqualifiedly and absolutely in trust, and the intestate was the trustee. It would scarcely have been stronger if she had written in the pass-book: "I hereby declare that I have deposited this money for the benefit of the plaintiff and I hold the same as trustee for her."

This would have been a plain declaration of trust, and accompanied as it was with a formal transfer to herself in the capacity of trustee, would have been deemed sufficient under the most rigid rules to be found in any of the authorities. It seems to me that this was the necessary legal intendment of the transaction, and that it was sufficient to pass the title. The retention of the pass-book was not necessarily inconsistent with this construction. She must be deemed to have retained it as trustee. The book was not the property, but only the voucher for the property, which after the deposit consisted of the debt against the bank.

There are many cases where the instrument creating the trust has been retained by the author of it until his death, especially when he made himself the trustee, and yet the trust sustained. Exton v. Scott, 6 Sim. 31; Fletcher v. Fletcher, 4 Hare, 67; Souvery v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 240; Bunn v. Winthrop, Id., 329. This circumstance, among others, has been considered upon the question of intent, but is never deemed decisive against the validity of the trust. Id. See, Hill, Trustees, supra. Some confusion has been created by judicial expression, that the author of such a trust must do all in his power to carry out his intention, that the nature of the property will admit of. This general proposition requires some qualification. In this case the intestate might have notified the objects of her bounty, but this is not regarded as indispensable by any of the authorities, and she might have made the deposits in their name, and delivered to them the books, or delivered to them the money. The rule does not require that the gift shall be made in any particular way, it only requires that enough shall be done to transfer the title to the property, and one of the modes of doing this is by an unequivocal declaration of trust. In Richardson v. Richardson, supra, the court, in noticing this point, said: "Reliance is often placed on the circumstance that the assignor has done all he can, and that there is nothing remaining for him to do, and it is contended that he must in that case only be taken to have made a complete and effectual assignment. But that is not the sound doctrine on which the case rests; for if there be an actual declaration of trust, although the assignor has not done all that he could do, for example, although he has not given notice to the assignee, yet the interest is held to have effectually passed as between the donor and donee. The difference must be rested simply on this: aye or no, has he constituted himself a trustee."

As notice to the cestui que trust was not necessary, and as the retention of the pass-books was not inconsistent with the completeness of the act, the case is peculiarly one to be determined by this test: did the intestate constitute herself a trustee? After a careful consideration of the case in connection with the established rules applicable to the subject, and the authorities, I think this question must be answered in the affirmative. It was not done in express formal terms, but such is the fair legal import of the transaction. I have considered the case thus far upon what appears from the face of the transaction, without evidence aliunde, bearing upon the intent. It is not necessary to decide that surrounding circumstances may not be shown to vary or explain the apparent character of the acts, and the intent with which they were done. The facts developed may not be so unequivocal as to be regarded as conclusive. It is sufficient to say that there is no finding of an intent contrary to the creation of a trust, and the facts found do not establish such an adverse intent. But looking at the evidence it is fairly inferable that the intestate designed that the plaintiff and her sister should have the benefit of these deposits, and there are some circumstances from which an inference may be drawn that she regarded the gifts as fixed and complete. The circumstance that she did not intend that the objects of her bounty should know of her gift until after her death is not inconsistent with it, and the most that can be said is that she may have believed that the deposits might be withdrawn during her life, and the money converted to her own use. It is not clear that she entertained such a belief, but if she did, it would not change the legal effect of her acts.

The judgment must be affirmed.

All concur except MILLER and EARL, JJ., absent at argument.

Judgment affirmed.

BEAVER v. BEAVER et al.¹

(22 N. E. 940, 117 N. Y. 421.)

Court of Appeals of New York. Nov. 26, 1889.

Appeal from supreme court, general term, third department.

The action was commenced by the plaintiff, as executrix of Asiel G. Beaver, against the Ulster County Savings Institution, to recover certain deposits amounting to the sum of $2,800 or thereabouts, standing to his credit on the books of the bank. The administrators of John O. Beaver claiming the money as part of his estate, they were substituted as defendants in place of the bank, the money having been brought into court. The question litigated was whether the money represented by the deposits and the accumulations had been vested in Asiel G. Beaver, as a gift from John O. Beaver. The account with the bank consisted of two deposits,—one July 5, 1866, of $854.04, and one of October 5, 1866, of $145.96,—making in the aggregate $1,000, and the accumulations thereon. It is undisputed that the deposit of $854.04 was made in person by John O. Beaver, and that the money deposited belonged to him. The only evidence to sustain the claim that it was given by him to Asiel G. Beaver is found in the relations between them and the circumstances attending the deposit. Asiel G. Beaver was the son of John O. Beaver, and in 1866 was 17 years of age, and resided with his father, as one of a family of 13 children. John O. Beaver made the deposit of July 5, 1866, in the name of Asiel. The rules of the bank required that on making the first deposit the depositor should subscribe a declaration of his assent to the by-laws of the institution, and his promise to abide by them. John O. Beaver, at the date of the first deposit, signed in his own name a declaration presented to him by the treasurer of the bank, commencing with the words: "I, Asiel G. Beaver, of Esopus, Ulster county, hereby request the officers of the Ulster County Savings Institution to receive from me $854, and open an account with me," etc. At the same time the savings bank entered on its books an account beginning, "Dr., Ulster County Savings Bank, in account with Asiel Beaver," and crediting said Asiel with the deposit of $854. Under the name of Asiel Beaver were originally written the words, "Payable to John O. Beaver." The bank also at the same time issued and delivered to John O. Beaver a pass-book, with a similar entry as in the account on the books of the bank, containing also, as originally written, the words, "Payable to John O. Beaver." These words in the account and in the pass-book were in the handwriting of the treasurer of the bank, and were written at the same time and by the same hand as the other part of the entries. But before the delivery of the pass-book the words "Payable to John O. Beaver" were erased therefrom, and the same erasure was made in the account on the bank-books. How the interlineation came to be made in the first instance does not appear, nor does it appear at whose suggestion or under what circumstances the erasures were made. Subsequently, on October 5, 1866, another deposit of $145.96 was made to the account, and credited on the pass-book.

There are no facts, except as above stated, tending to show a gift of the money deposited to Asiel. On the other hand, many circumstances were shown which are claimed to be inconsistent with a gift by the father to the son of the money deposited. The son married a few years after the deposit was made, and died in 1886, 20 years after the date of the deposits, being then of the age of 37 years, leaving a wife, but no children, surviving. John O. Beaver, the father, died in 1888. The father retained possession of the pass-book at all times until his death. In April, 1867, he drew $27.29 from the account, and signed a receipt therefor in the pass-book in his own name. No other sum was ever drawn from the account. From time to time John O. Beaver presented the pass-book to the bank to have the interest credited, and the bank officers had no dealings with any other person in respect to the account. There is no evidence that Asiel G. Beaver ever had the pass-book in his possession, or knew of the deposits. In May, 1870, Asiel opened an individual account at the bank in his own name, which continued until March, 1886, when he drew out $1,818.56, in full of the account. It appears that John O. Beaver had eight or nine pass-books in the bank, representing deposits made in the names of other persons. He left at his death real estate of the value of $12,000 to $15,000, and more than $20,000 in personal property. One of the rules of the bank provides that "drafts may be made personally, or by the order in writing of the depositor, (if the institution have the signature of the party,) or by letters of attorney, duly authenticated, but no person shall have the right to demand any part of his principal or interest without producing the original book, that such payment may be entered thereon," and another declares that, "although the institution will endeavor to prevent fraud or impositions, yet all payments to persons presenting the pass-books issued by it shall be valid payments to discharge the institution." The rules were printed on the pass-books of the bank.

A. T. Clearwater, for appellants. F. L. Westbrook, for respondent.

ANDREWS, J., (after stating the facts as above.) It is found that the money with which John O. Beaver made the deposit of $854.04, July 5, 1866, belonged to him. The inference that the deposit of $145.96, made October 5, 1866, was also made by him, from his own means, does not admit of reasonable question. The pass-book was at all times in his possession. Concurrently with the last deposit the amount was entered therein. It is affirmatively shown that Asiel, who was then a minor, lived with his father, and had no money of his own, and the circumstances are quite satisfactory to show that he never at any time during his life knew of the bank account. The question in the case turns upon the legal effect of the deposit, made in connection with the attendant and subsequent circumstances. If they established either a trust in favor of Asiel as to the $854.04, deposited July 5, 1866, or a gift of the fund deposited, then, clearly, the subsequent deposit would, in the absence of explanation, be impressed with the same character, and be governed by the same rules. On the other hand, if the first deposit was not affected with any trust, and was not a gift, neither is the last one. Both were the property of John O. Beaver, or both the property of the son, either by a beneficial or legal title. The trial court seem to have sustained the transaction as a gift, but at the same time refused to find that there was no trust.

¹ Reversing 6 N. Y. Supp. 536.

There is no warrant, under the decisions of this court, to uphold the deposit of July 5, 1866, as a trust. The case of Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134, established a trust in favor of the claimant in that case, in respect to a fund deposited by another in a savings bank to his own credit, in trust for the former; the latter taking from the bank at the time a pass-book in which the account was entered in the same way. The court applied the doctrine that the owner of a fund may, by an unequivocal declaration of trust, impress it with a trust character, and thereby convert his absolute legal title into a title as trustee for the person in whose favor the trust is declared. There was no declaration of trust in this case, in terms, when the deposit of July 5, 1866, was made, nor at any time afterwards, and none can be implied from a mere deposit by one person in the name of another. To constitute a trust there must be either an explicit declaration of trust, or circumstances which show beyond reasonable doubt that a trust was intended to be created. It would introduce a dangerous instability of titles if anything less was required, or if a voluntary trust inter vivos could be established in the absence of express words, by circumstances capable of another construction, or consistent with a different intention. See Young v. Young, 80 N. Y. 438, and cases cited.

The plaintiff's title to the fund must depend, therefore, upon the question of gift. The elements necessary to constitute a valid gift are well understood, and are not the subject of dispute. There must be on the part of the donor an intent to give, and a delivery of the thing given, to or for the donee, in pursuance of such intent, and on the part of the donee acceptance. The subject of the gift may be chattels, choses in action, or any form of personal property, and what constitutes a delivery may depend on the nature and situation of the thing given. The delivery may be symbolical or actual, by actually transferring the manual custody of the chattel to the donee, or giving to him the symbol which represents possession. In case of bonds, notes, or choses in action, the delivery of the instrument which represents the debt is a gift of the debt, if that is the intention; and so, also, where the debt is that of the donee, it may be given, as has been held, by the delivery of a receipt acknowledging payment. Westerlo v. De Witt, 36 N. Y. 340; Gray v. Barton, 55 N. Y. 72; 2 Schouler, Pers. Prop. § 66 et seq. The acceptance also may be implied where the gift, otherwise complete, is beneficial to the donee. But delivery by the donor, either actual or constructive, operating to divest the donor of possession of and dominion over the thing, is a constant and essential factor in every transaction which takes effect as a complete gift. Anything short of this strips it of the quality of completeness which distinguishes an intention to give, which alone amounts to nothing, from the consummated act, which changes the title. The intention to give is often established by most satisfactory evidence, although the gift fails. Instruments may be even so formally executed by the donor, purporting to transfer title to the donee, or there may be the most explicit declaration of an intention to give, or of an actual present gift, yet, unless there is delivery, the intention is defeated. Several cases of this kind have been recently considered by this court. Young v. Young, supra; Jackson v. Railway Co., 88 N. Y. 520; In re Crawford, 113 N. Y. 560, 21 N. E. Rep. 692.

We are of opinion that there is lacking in this case two of the essential elements to constitute a gift by John O. Beaver to his son of the money deposited July 5, 1866, viz., an intent to give, and a delivery of the subject of the alleged gift. The only evidence relied upon to establish an intent on the part of the father to make a gift to his son is the transaction at the bank on the day the deposit was made, in connection with the relation between the parties. There is no proof of any oral statement made by the father on that occasion disclosing an intention to make a gift, and not a scintilla of evidence that afterwards, during the 20 years which elapsed before the son's death, the father made any declaration or in any way recognized that the money belonged to the son, or had been given to him. Evidence offered on the part of the defendant of declarations of John O. Beaver, made on the day of the deposit and afterwards, inconsistent with the theory of an intent to give the money to Asiel, were excluded, on the objection of the plaintiff. The acts of John O. Beaver after the account was opened tend strongly to negative the claim that the money was deposited with intent to give it to the son. The drawing out of the interest by John O. Beaver on one occasion; his retention of the pass-book for 22 years, and procuring it to be written up from time to time; the fact that the son, so far as appears, never was informed of the existence of the account,—are strong indications that John O. Beaver did not make the deposit in the son's name, with intent to make a present gift of the money. The father dealt with the account as his own, and, if the control he exercised over it during the minority of Asiel could be reasonably explained on the theory that he acted as the natural guardian of the son, no such explanation is possible as to the 16 years of the life of the son after he reached his majority.

The trial court having found that there was a consummated gift, which, of course, includes a finding of an intent to give, this court is concluded from reviewing the finding, if there was any competent and sufficient evidence to support it. The form of the account is the essential fact upon which the plaintiff relies. It may be justly said that a deposit in a savings bank by one person, of his own money to the credit of another, is consistent with an intent on the part of the depositor to give the money to the other. But it does not, we think, of itself, without more, authorize an affirmative finding that the deposit was made with that intent, when the deposit was to a new account, unaccompanied by any declaration of intention, and the depositor received at the time a pass-book, the possession and presentation of which, by the rules of the bank, known to the depositor, is made the evidence of the right to draw the deposit. We cannot close our eyes to the well-known practice of persons depositing in savings banks money to the credit of real or fictitious persons, with no intention of divesting themselves of ownership. It is attributable to various reasons,—reasons connected with taxation, rules of the bank limiting the amount which any one individual may keep on deposit, the desire to obtain high rates of interest where there is a discrimination based on the amount of deposits, and the desire on the part of many persons to veil or conceal from others knowledge of their pecuniary condition. In most cases where a deposit of this character is made as a gift, there are contemporaneous facts or subsequent declarations by which the intention can be established, independently of the form of the deposit. We are inclined to think that to infer a gift from the form of the deposit alone would, in the great majority of cases, and especially where the deposit was of any considerable amount, impute an intention which never existed, and defeat the real purpose of the depositor. The relation of father and son does not in this case, we think, strengthen the plaintiff's case. It may be true that, as between parent and child, a presumption of a gift may be raised from circumstances where it would not be implied between strangers. Ridgway v. English, 22 N. J. Law, 409. But where a deposit is made in the name of another, without any intention on the part of the depositor to part with his title, he would be quite likely to select a member of his own family to represent the account, and in this case this is the natural explanation of the transaction.

The circumstances of the erasure in the declaration signed by John O. Beaver, and also in the account on the books of the bank, of the words, "Payable to John O. Beaver," throw no light upon the actual intention. If they were originally inserted at the suggestion of John O. Beaver, it would seem to imply that when he came to make the deposit he did not intend to part with the control of the money, and it is scarcely presumable that he changed his intention at the very time of making the deposit. If the words were inserted by the treasurer without authority, he may have erased them so as to leave no evidence of an intent to evade the law or the rules of the bank in respect to deposits, or he may have done it for some other unexplained reason. Again, it is possible that John O. Beaver desired that the fund should be placed so that it could be drawn on presentation of the pass-book, without the necessity of a written order, and the erasure was made for this reason. In short, the reason for the insertion of the words, and the subsequent erasure, is matter of speculation merely, and does not aid in the interpretation of the main transaction. There was not only a failure to prove an intent on the part of John O. Beaver to make a gift, but the case is, we think, equally defective on the proof of delivery. The declaration and request drawn by the treasurer ran in the name of Asiel, as did the promise recited to abide by the rules of the bank. But it was signed by John O. Beaver in his own name, and not as agent for Asiel, and in law was his request and his promise. John O. Beaver took and retained possession of the pass-book on which the rules were printed. The rules prescribed the undertaking of the bank, and the conditions to be observed by depositors in requiring payment. Under these rules, John O. Beaver had the exclusive dominion over the account, and the exclusive right to draw upon it so long as he retained the pass-book. It was his signature that the bank had, and not that of Asiel, and the rule authorizing drafts by the depositor only applies when the bank has his signature. But the rule also prescribed that "no person shall have the right to demand any part of his principal or interest without producing the original book, that such payments may be entered thereon," and also that "all payments to persons producing the pass-books shall be valid payments to discharge the institution." Under these rules, Asiel was never in a situation to control the account, while John O. Beaver had complete authority over the fund at all times. If John O. Beaver had delivered the pass-book to Asiel with intent to give him the deposit, there would have been a constructive delivery of the subject of the gift. In re Crawford, supra. But he never did this, or any equivalent act.

We think, for the reasons stated, that the plaintiff failed to establish a gift, or to justify a finding of a gift. The question of gifts, in connection with deposits in savings banks, has of late years been frequently considered by the courts in various states. The preponderance of authority seems to be in favor of the views we have expressed. See Robinson v. Ring, 72 Me. 140; Burton v. Bank, 52 Conn. 398; Marcy v. Amazeen, 61 N. H. 131; Schick v. Grote, 42 N. J. Eq. 352, 7 Atl. Rep. 852; Scott v. Bank, 140 Mass. 157, 2 N. E. Rep. 925; 8 Amer. & Eng. Cyclop. Law, tit. "Gifts," and notes. The cases of Howard v.

Bank, 40 Vt. 597; Blasdel v. Locke, 52 N. H. 238; Gardner v. Merritt, 32 Md. 78,—go the furthest towards sustaining transactions, similar to the one in question, as gifts, of any we have noticed, but they are distinguishable in material respects from this. Our conclusion is that the cause of action in this case was not made out, and the judgment should therefore be reversed, and a new trial ordered. All concur, except DANFORTH, J., dissenting, and FINCH, J., not voting.

BATH SAV. INST. v. HATHORN et al.
(33 A. 836, 88 Me. 122.)

Supreme Judicial Court of Maine. June 7, 1895.

Report from supreme judicial court, Sagadahoc county.

This was a bill of interpleader brought by the Bath Savings Institution against the defendant Hathorn, as administrator of the estate of Henry Walker, deceased, and against Alice B. Files, to determine the title to a certain deposit in that institution.

The course of procedure adopted by agreement between all parties was this: Each defendant filed an answer, and then, by agreement, a decree of interpleader was filed, and by further agreement it was stipulated that the answers should be taken as the pleadings in the case, and the cause set down for hearing on bill, answers, and proof, and that Miss Files be regarded as plaintiff in the continuance of the suit. It thus became, practically, a suit in equity by Alice B. Files against the administrator of Henry Walker's estate. The facts in the case were practically undisputed.

It appears that Henry Walker died October 2, 1891, leaving neither wife nor children, his wife having died nearly six years before. Their home was in Woolwich, opposite Bath, and Miss Files, who was a second cousin of Mrs. Walker, frequently visited there, and Mr. and Mrs. Walker often visited the Files family in Winslow, the two families being in close and intimate relations. On July 1, 1882, Mr. Walker deposited the sum of $700 in the Bath Savings Institution in his own name, but "in trust for Alice B. Files," and took out a depositor's book in that form. At the time of making the deposit he had a conversation with the treasurer of the bank as to its form, and the treasurer told him that if he put the book in any one's name, in trust for any one, it would go to that person at his decease; and Mr. Walker said he wished it to, that he wished it to go to Miss Files. In accordance with his direction, the signature book, which all depositors are required to sign, was signed by Mrs. Potter, then a clerk in the bank, in the same form, "Henry Walker, in trust for Alice B. Files, of Woolwich." Mr. Walker retained the bank book in his possession ever after, but never drew any part of the principal or interest therefrom, but took the book to the bank occasionally to have the accrued dividends added. On one occasion, very soon after the deposit was made, Miss Files' sister, now Mrs. White, was visiting at his house, and saw the book, among some other papers that he happened to be examining. She took it up, and looked at it, saw the form of entry, and he told her then, "Yes, that is for Alice at my decease, and the next will be for you," and Mrs. White communicated this information to Alice, her sister, immediately on her return home from the visit, who expressed her satisfaction thereat.

Mrs. Trott, who was in the family as housekeeper for about six years, going there before Mrs. Walker's death, saw the book on three different occasions, and Mr. Walker explained to her, also, when she spoke of its being in trust, that the book was for Alice; and again, just a few months before his death, after he had the July dividend added, he was examining the book, spoke of it as Alice's bank book, and asked Mrs. Trott to guess how much it had gained. She told him she supposed it was between ten hundred and eleven hundred dollars, and his reply was: "You are pretty good for guessing. You guessed pretty nearly right; and that will be a great help to Alice, won't it, Mrs. Trott?" Decree against estate.

Orville D. Baker and Leslie C. Cornish, for Alice B. Files. Charles W. Larrabee, for defendant Hathorn.

HASKELL, J. Henry Walker, of Woolwich, died, solvent and intestate, October 2, 1891, leaving brothers and sisters and nephews and nieces, but neither wife nor children. His wife died January 1, 1886. She was a cousin to the father of plaintiff, Alice B. Files, of Winslow, who knew the old people as uncle and aunt, and seems to have been always welcome at their house and a favorite with them.

On July 1, 1882, Mr. Walker deposited in the Bath Savings Institution $700 "in trust for Alice B. Files," saying, in substance, that he wished it to go to her at his decease. That deposit remained intact during Mr. Walker's life, and at his death amounted to something over $1,000. He always retained the book, and it was found among his papers by his administrator, the defendant, who now claims the deposit as a part of his estate. The evidence shows that Mr. Walker intended the deposit for Alice at his decease, but never communicated his intention to her.

The authorities all say that a gift inter vivos must be complete. The donor must divest himself of all dominion over the thing given, and the title to it must pass absolutely and irrevocably to the donee. Northrop v. Hale, 73 Me. 66; Dale v. Lincoln, 31 Me. 420; Robinson v. Ring, 72 Me. 140; Bank v. Fogg, 82 Me. 538, 20 Atl. 92.

A voluntary trust is an equitable gift, and, like a legal gift inter vivos, must be complete. A declaration of trust as effectually passes the equitable title of the fund to the cestui as a gift inter vivos passes the legal title to the donee. The distinction between them is of a technical nature. In a trust, the real title vests in the donee, but the legal title, perhaps, carrying control of the property, may be placed elsewhere; while in a gift both the real and legal title instantly fall to the donee. It is not necessary, therefore, that he who declares a trust should divest himself of the legal title, if, perchance, he so does it as to transfer the real or equitable title to the cestui; for then he creates an estate really no longer his own. He may retain the legal title, giving him the control, but for the benefit of the cestui, according to the terms of the trust. His control becomes subject to the direction of courts of equity, that always supervise the administration of trusts. They are the children of equity. They spring from it, and cannot survive without its aid and control. The trustee is merely an agent to administer them, and nothing more.

An express trust of lands can only be created by some writing signed by the party or his attorney (Rev. St. c. 73, § 11), but a trust of personal property may be created or declared by parol. It is necessary, however, to clearly establish the terms of it, and show an executed gift, so that the equitable title shall have passed to the donee as effectually as a gift inter vivos. Gerrish v. Institution, 128 Mass. 159; Dresser v. Dresser, 46 Me. 48.

Says Lord Cranworth: "If a man chooses to give away anything which passes by delivery, he may do so, and there is no doubt that, in the absence of fraud, a parol declaration of trust may be perfectly good, even though it be voluntary. If I give any chattel, that of course passes by delivery; and if I expressly or impliedly say I constitute myself trustee of such and such personal property for a person, that is a trust executed, and this court will enforce it, in the absence of fraud, even in favor of a volunteer. * * * The authorities all turn upon the question whether what took place was a declaration of trust, or merely an imperfect attempt to make a legal transfer of the property. In the latter case, the court will afford no assistance to volunteers; but when the court considers that there has been a declaration of trust, it is a trust executed, and the court will enforce it, whether with or without consideration." Jones v. Lock, 1 Ch. App. 25.

In this case, the deposit is in the name of the donor, "in trust for the donee." Standing alone, this entry does not work an absolute, indisputable gift in the form of a dry trust,—that is, a trust without limitation or condition, that may be terminated at the will of the cestui; but extrinsic evidence is competent to control its effect. Brabrook v. Bank, 104 Mass. 228; Clark v. Clark, 108 Mass. 522; Powers v. Institution, 124 Mass. 377; Stone v. Bishop, 4 Cliff. 593, Fed. Cas. No. 13,482; Northrop v. Hale, 72 Me. 275.

The evidence discloses that, at the time the donor made the deposit, he expressed a desire that the donee should have the money at his death. That certainly shows no intent to part with the legal title at an earlier day. He is said to have subsequently made talk of the same purport; but he neither informed the donee of the deposit, nor made any effort or did any act to apprise her of it, or of his intention concerning it. The deposit on his part was both voluntary and secret. Information of it may have been communicated to her by others, but never at his request or with his knowledge. What evidence, then, operates to pass the equitable title in the deposit to her? He had consummated no contract with her. His intentions were kept in his own breast. He could have withdrawn the money at any time, and have made a new disposition of it, and she may not have been the wiser, so far as he knew. It is just as essential, to establish the trust sought to be set up here, to prove some act on the part of the donor that shall operate to pass the equitable title to the donee, as it is to prove delivery in a gift inter vivos. Both require the same essentials. In both, some title must pass from the donor, differing only in degree. A gift must be executed by delivery; a trust, by declaration.

In Bank v. Fogg, 82 Me. 538, 20 Atl. 92, the donor deposited a sum of money in the name of the donee, subject to his own order, with intent that, at his death, it should go to the donee. No trust was claimed or shown. It was an unexecuted purpose, an ineffectual attempt at testamentary disposition.

In Parcher v. Institution, 78 Me. 470, 7 Atl. 266, a depositor caused to be entered upon the bank ledger words, in substance, "Payable also to Mrs. Leavitt in case of my death," and it was held no gift.

In Curtis v. Bank, 77 Me. 151, the entry of "Subject also to" the donee was held to constitute no gift, but that a subsequent delivery of the bank book completed the gift.

In Barker v. Frye, 75 Me. 29, a deposit in the name of the donee, subject to the order of the donor during life, afterwards changed by erasing words giving the donor any control of the fund, and after notice to the donee of the change and that the bank book would be delivered to him the first time they met, and after his reply requesting that the book be sent to him, which the court says "was an acceptance of the gift," it was held that the gift was complete.

The same doctrine is held in Northrop v. Hale, 73 Me. 66; Robinson v. Ring, 72 Me. 140; Drew v. Hagerty, 81 Me. 231, 17 Atl. 63; Parkman v. Bank, 151 Mass. 218, 24 N. E. 43.

All of our cases require something more than a mere intention to give, a promise to give, or an expectation to give. Benevolence alone will not do. There must be beneficence also. The mystery sometimes supposed to exist about a trust cannot change the nature of a transaction. A voluntary trust is a gift, and requires all the essentials of a plain gift to sustain it.

In Dresser v. Dresser, supra, a writing specifying the terms of a voluntary trust, and a delivery of the trust property so that the dominion of the donor over it was thereafter lost, is a good example of a trust of this sort.

In Alger v. Bank, 146 Mass. 418, 15 N. E. 916, the donor made a deposit similar to the one under consideration. It was in his own name, as trustee for the donee, his house-keeper, who claimed the deposit as a payment for her services. It was shown that, shortly before his death, he told her, "I put it in for you;" "that money is yours;" and the court held that the judge, who tried the case, was authorized to find a perfected gift, if he chose to do so.

Some of the cases are in conflict concerning the question now under consideration, more in the application of the law to the ever-varying facts in the numerous cases than otherwise; but our own cases are all consistent, and squarely hold to the doctrine that a trust in personal property may be created by parol, and that a deposit in bank in the name of another may be explained or controlled by evidence outside the written terms of the deposit. In this case, the terms of the deposit clearly show an intended trust in favor of the donee, but may be controlled or limited by extrinsic evidence. This evidence confirms the trust, showing that it should cease at the death of the donor, and that the legal title should then pass to the cestui. When the deposit was made, the treasurer of the bank told the donor that, at his decease, the money would go to the donee, and the donor replied that was his wish. All the subsequent acts and declarations of the donor show the same intent. The gift cannot be upheld as an absolute gift inter vivos, nor as a gift causa mortis, for these gifts require a delivery of the res, a complete transfer of title. They differ from a gift in trust in that they purport to, and must, pass the whole title, so that the donor can have no dominion or control over them. But a gift in trust withholds the legal title from the donee. It may be transmitted to a third person, or it may be retained by the donor, but in either case the equitable title has gone from him, and unless the declaration of trust contains the power of revocation, or the wide discretion of chancery attaches (Coutts v. Acworth, L. R. 8 Eq. 558; Wollaston v. Tribe, L. R. 9 Eq. 44; Everitt v. Everitt, L. R. 10 Eq. 405; 7 Ch. App. 244; 15 Ch. Div. 570; Lister v. Hodgson, L. R. 4 Eq. 30; Sharp v. Leach, 31 Beav. 491; Anderson v. Elsworth, 3 Giff. 154; Toker v. Toker, 31 Beav. 629; Phillips v. Mullings, 7 Ch. App. 247; Smith v. Iliffe, L. R. 20 Eq. 666; Welman v. Welman, 15 Ch. Div. 570, 578, 579; Prideaux v. Lonsdale, 1 De Gex, J. & S. 433), it leaves him powerless to extinguish the trust. Of course, the trust must be established by proof, and the fact that no evidence of a voluntary trust once created remains, or can be shown, does not alter the principle. Many rights fail of enjoyment from the lack of evidence that might once be adduced. So, a secret trust may be valid when it can be proved; but if the donor conceals the evidence of it, and later appropriates the fund to his own use, it is simply a wrong on his part, that prevails because of his perfidy, and goes unpunished and unnoticed because unknown. The cestui's rights are the same, although his remedy may have been destroyed.

In the case of In re Smith's Estate, 144 Pa. St. 428, 22 Atl. 916, a lad of 3 years went to live with his uncle. When the lad was 12 the uncle placed $13,000 in bonds in an envelope, on which he had written and signed a declaration that he held them for his nephew. The bonds remained in the uncle's possession until his death, and the court held a completed gift in trust for the nephew.

In Bank v. Albee, 64 Vt. 571, 25 Atl. 487, the court says: "A completed trust, although voluntary, may be enforced in equity. It is not essential that the beneficiary should have had notice of its creation or have assented to it. The owner or donor of personal property may create a perfect or complete trust by his unequivocal declaration in writing, or by parol, that he himself holds such property in trust for the purposes named. The trust is equally valid whether he constitutes himself or another person the trustee."

In that case a father deposited money in a savings bank in the name of his son, naming himself trustee. It appeared that one motive of the father was to avoid taxation; but, said the court, "that fact does not negative the idea that he also intended to create a trust for the benefit of his son. It is perfectly consistent with it, and the retention of the pass book is not inconsistent with such a purpose. He must have retained it as trustee."

Ray v. Simmons, 11 R. I. 266, is in point. One Bosworth deposited money in a savings bank in his own name as trustee for a stepdaughter. He did not tell her what he had done, nor show her the pass book. He kept that himself. After his death, the court held that the stepdaughter was entitled to the money,—that the transaction constituted a trust in her favor.

So is Martin v. Funk, 75 N. Y. 134. Susan Boone deposited $500 in a savings bank "in trust for Lillie Willard." Susan kept the pass book, and Lillie had no knowledge of it until after Susan's death. Want of notice to Lillie, and the retention of the pass book by Susan, were urged in defense; but the court held a gift in trust complete. This is an exhaustive case, and contains a review of authorities by Chief Justice Church prior to 1878.

So is Minor v. Rogers, 40 Conn. 512. A widow deposited $250 in her own name, "as trustee of William A. Minor," the child of a neighbor. The child knew nothing of the deposit until after the depositor's death, and meantime did not have possession of the pass book; and the court held the trust complete, and allowed a recovery of the money from the depositor's executor.

So is Re Gaffney's Estate, 146 Pa. St. 49, 23 Atl. 163. It appeared that Hugh Gaffney deposited $560 in his own name, as trustee for Polly Kim, and the court held the entry itself prima facie evidence of the trust, and, unexplained, sufficient to uphold it.

In Gerrish v. Institution, supra, the court says: "No particular form of words is required to create a trust in another, or to make the party himself a trustee for the benefit of another; that it is enough for the latter purpose if it be unequivocally declared in writing,—or orally, if the property be personal; that it is held in trust for the person named; that when the trust is thus created, it is effectual to transfer the beneficial interest, and operates as a gift perfected by delivery."

The same case holds that notice to the beneficiary is unnecessary where the transaction is clear; but when ambiguous, or susceptible of different interpretations, it removes the doubt, and is decisive of the purpose of the donor. Some of the earlier Massachusetts cases seem to hold notice to the beneficiary essential to the validity of a trust, but, when considered in the light of this case, rather consider the notice a controlling than an essential element in the creation of a voluntary trust. The prevailing doctrine now is that notice is unnecessary, but, when shown, has controlling effect.

In this case, the entry "in trust for" is of clear and unmistakable import, and sufficient to create a prima facie trust. It might have been controlled by evidence that would have shown a contrary intention, but such evidence is wholly wanting. Moreover, all the declarations, acts, and conduct of the donor are consistent with the presumption arising from the entry itself, and show that it expresses the true import of the transaction, and creates a completed trust in favor of the donee.

Decree accordingly, with costs against the estate.

KIRKLAND v. COX et al.

(94 Ill. 400.)

Supreme Court of Illinois. Jan. Term, 1880.

Appeal from circuit court, Montgomery county; Charles S. Zane, Judge.

Alex. J. P. Garesche and E. Lane, for appellant. James M. Truitt and Rice & Miller, for appellees.

SOHOLFELD, J. In this form of action, since the naked legal title must control, we think it sufficient to show that title is not in appellees, and the judgment below cannot, therefore, be sustained.

The rule is, undoubtedly, as claimed by appellees' counsel, that trustees must be presumed to take an estate only commensurate with the charges or duties imposed on them; but this, however, is subject to the qualification that such presumption shall be consistent with the intention of the party creating the trust, as manifested by the words employed in the instrument by which it is created. Shelley v. Edlin, 4 Adol. & El. 582-589, 31 E. C. L. 143; Cadogan v. Ewart, 7 Adol. & El. 636, 666; Davies v. Davies, 1 Adol. & El. (N. S.) 430, 41 E. C. L. 611.

Under the statute of uses, which is in force here, where an estate is conveyed to one person for the use of or upon a trust for another, and nothing more is said, the statute immediately transfers the legal estate to the use, and no trust is created, although express words of trust are used. Perry, Trusts, § 298. And so we have expressly held. Witham v. Brooner, 63 Ill. 344; Lynch v. Swayne, 83 Ill. 336.

But this, it will be observed, has reference only to passive trusts, or what are sometimes termed simple or dry trusts; and in such cases the legal estate never vests in the feoffee for a moment, but is instantaneously transferred to the cestui que use as soon as the use is declared. 2 Bl. Comm. (Sharswood's Ed.) 331, 332; and Witham v. Brooner, supra.

It is said in Perry on Trusts (section 300): "Although it is probable that it was the intent of the statute (i. e., of uses) to convert all uses or trusts into legal estates, yet the convenience to the subject of being able to keep the legal title to an estate in one person, while the beneficial interest should be in another, was too great to be given up altogether, and courts of equity were astute in finding reasons to withdraw a conveyance from the operation of the statute. Three principal reasons or rules of construction were laid down whereby conveyances were excepted from such operation: First, where a use was limited upon a use; second, where a copyhold or leasehold estate, or personal property was limited to uses; third, where such powers or duties were imposed with the estate upon a donee to uses that it was necessary that he should continue to hold the legal title in order to perform his duty or execute the power. In all of these three instances courts, both of law and equity, held that the statute did not execute the use, but that such use remained as it was before the statute, a mere equitable interest to be administered in a court of equity." And again, in section 305, it is said: "The third rule of construction is less technical, and relates to special or active trusts, which were never within the purview of the statute. Therefore, if any agency, duty or power be imposed on the trustee, as, by a limitation to a trustee and his heirs to pay the rents, or to convey the estate, or if any control is to be exercised or duty performed by the trustee in applying the rents to a person's maintenance, or in making repairs, or to preserve contingent remainders, or to raise a sum of money, or to dispose of the estate by sale, in all these and in other and like cases, the operation of the statute is excluded, and the trusts or uses remain mere equitable estates. So, if the trustee is to exercise any discretion in the management of the estate, in the investment of the proceeds or the principal, or in the application of the income, or if the purpose of the trust is to protect the estate for a given time, or until the death of some one, or until division. * * * And again, in regard to enlarging and extending estates given to trustees, the same author, in section 315, says: "So, if land is devised to trustees without the word heirs, and a trust is declared which can not be fully executed but by the trustees taking an inheritance, the court will enlarge or extend their estate into a fee simple to enable them to carry out the intention of the donors. Thus, if land is conveyed to trustees without the word heirs, in trust to sell, they must have the fee, otherwise they could not sell. The construction would be the same if the trust was to sell the whole or a part, for no purchasers would be safe unless they could have the fee, and a trust to convey or to lease at discretion would be subject to the same rule. A fortiori, if an estate is limited to trustees and their heirs, in trust to sell or mortgage or to lease at discretion, or if they are to convey the property in fee, or to divide it equally among certain persons, for to do any or all of these acts requires a legal fee." See, also, to the same effect, Hill, Trustees (4th Am. Ed.) 376; Rees v. Williams, 2 Mees. & W. 749.

In those cases where the legal fee is not vested in the trustee, it will, of course, in the absence of a devise prevailing to the contrary, vest in the heir at law. And there are also cases in which, it having been the duty of the trustee to convey to the heir at law, it will be presumed, after the lapse of considerable time, that such conveyance has been made. Hill, Trustees (4th Am. Ed.) 401; Perry, Trusts, § 350; Gibson v. Rees, 50 Ill. 383; Pollock v. Maison, 41 Ill. 516. But it is not claimed, nor could it be, that there is any foundation for such presumption in the facts found in this record.

In Harris v. Cornell, 80 Ill. 67, it was said, referring to Hardin v. Osborn, Sept. Term, 1875, that it had been held the purposes of a trust having been accomplished, the owner of the trust became, by operation of law, re-invested with the legal title and could sue in ejectment. This was unadvisedly said. A rehearing was granted in Hardin v. Osborn, and the opinion therein referred to was withdrawn. In McNab v. Young, 81 Ill. 11, language of like import as that used in Harris v. Cornell, supra, was used upon the authority of the same case, although it is therein erroneously referred to as being reported in 60 Ill., at page 93. The case there reported, of that name, does not discuss that or any kindred question.

The true doctrine in regard to active trusts, and that adhered to by this court, is expressed in Vallette v. Bennett, 69 Ill., at page 636, that where the legal title is vested in the trustee, nothing short of a reconveyance can place the legal title back in the grantor or his heirs, subject, of course, to the qualification that, under certain circumstances, such reconveyance will be presumed without direct proof of the fact.

The language of Walsh's will is: "As to my worldly estate, all the real, personal and mixed, of which I shall die seized and possessed, * * * I hereby grant, devise, convey and confirm unto" (naming the trustees), "in trust," etc. He then directs his said trustees to assume and take entire control of his estate; to collect all outstanding dues, rents, profits and interests of whatever character, derived therefrom, and to govern and control all such interests as may accrue and arise to said estate from time to time; to make such disposal of said estate as shall in their judgment benefit and increase the value of said estate; that said trustees "shall pay, or cause to be paid, out of said estate," to his daughter, Mary Lucy, "such installments of money as in the judgment of said trustees shall be deemed proper and sufficient to meet her current expenses, and provide her an ample and comfortable support;" that said trustees should transfer his estate to his said daughter upon her reaching the age of 35 years, she being then unmarried, but if then married, they are directed to transfer the estate to her only upon the contingency that they should deem her husband a person in whom confidence might be placed; but if the trustees should deem the husband an incompetent and unfit person to have the care and control of the estate, they are directed to continue to make payments to his daughter, "in such amounts and at such times as in their judgment they may think proper," and that the circumstances and station of his daughter may demand; that in the event of the death of his daughter without issue, certain specific legacies, amounting to some $2,- 600 in the aggregate, are given, and the balance of his estate is to be divided equally between the House of the Good Shepherd, Saint Joseph's Male Orphan Asylum, and Saint Ann's Infant Asylum; and he then exempts his trustees from liability for all losses occurring without their fault.

This very clearly gave the entire control and management of the estate to the trustees until Mary Lucy should arrive at the age of 35 years—being unmarried; and she having died before she reached that age, the control and management of the estate continued to devolve upon them. The language employed so plainly conveys this idea that it can admit of no controversy.

