1917

State Legislation Extending to Navigable Waters

Ralph W. Aigler

University of Michigan Law School

Available at: https://repository.law.umich.edu/articles/1335

Follow this and additional works at: https://repository.law.umich.edu/articles

Part of the Admiralty Commons, Constitutional Law Commons, and the State and Local Government Law Commons

Recommended Citation

NOTE AND COMMENT

STATE LEGISLATION EXTENDING TO NAVIGABLE WATERS.—In Southern Pacific Company v. Jensen, 37 Sup. Ct. —, decided May 21, 1917, the Supreme Court announces a decision in some respects of far reaching importance. It was held therein, Mr. Justice Holmes dissenting, that the WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT of the State of New York did not support an award to the widow and children of a workman killed on board a ship of the Company while at the pier in New York City. Clearly the terms of the New York act covered the case, unless the fact that the accident occurred on navigable waters of the United States had a controlling effect to the contrary.

If the death was tortious, there can be no doubt under Atlantic Transport Co. v. Imbrovek, 234 U. S. 52, 59, that it was a maritime tort and within admiralty jurisdiction.

By Art. III, §2 of the Constitution, the judicial power of the United States is extended “To all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction,” and this has been held to confer paramount power upon Congress to fix and determine the maritime law which shall prevail throughout the country. Butler v. Steamship Co., 130 U. S. 527, In re Garnett, 141 U. S. 1. In the latter case the court said: “As the Constitution extends the judicial power of the United States to ’all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction,’ and as this jurisdiction is held to be exclusive, the power of legislation on the same subject must necessarily be in the national legislature, and not in the State legislatures.

It is well established, however, that within certain limits, not clearly defined, State legislation in a sense affecting the general maritime law, may be upheld. The Lottawanna, 21 Wall. 558 (lien for repairs upon vessel in home port); The J. E. Rumbell, 148 U. S. 1 (same); Cooley v. Board of Wardens, 12 How. 299 (pilotage fees fixed); Ex parte McNeil, 13 Wall. 236 (same). In Sherlock v. Alling, 93 U. S. 99, a death act of the State of Indiana was held to give a cause of action for negligent injury suffered on the Ohio River; and in The Hamilton, 207 U. S. 398, and La Bourgogne, 210 U. S. 95, the laws of Delaware and France, respectively, giving a cause of action for negligently causing death were recognized and enforced in admiralty cases, the deaths having been caused on the high seas. Under the general maritime law there could have been no cause of action for causing death, but the court enforced rights created by the law of Delaware and France. Apparently these laws were not given the effect of changing the maritime law—that could be done only by Congress—but as creating rights under the state municipal law which courts of admiralty would enforce, just as one State may give recognition to and enforce rights created by the law of another State or country.

On the other hand, State law cannot authorize proceedings in rem as in admiralty. The Moses Taylor, 4 Wall. 411; The Glide, 167 U. S. 606. Nor will a State statute creating liens for materials used in repairing a foreign ship under circumstances not sufficient to create a lien under maritime law be upheld. The Roanoke, 180 U. S. 138. And where a certain act would give rise to a liability under maritime law, a rule of the law of the State within the territory of which the liability was incurred denying recovery will be disregarded. Workman v. Mayor, 179 U. S. 557.

The Compensation Act in the principal case, under the police powers of the State, created a liability for accidental injury not recognized by maritime law, just as the law of Delaware considered and upheld in The Hamilton, supra, created a liability for negligently causing death not recognized by maritime law, and if the court was right in the earlier case in giving effect in a court of admiralty to such right under the law of Delaware, it would seem that in the principal case like force should have been given to the New York statute. It is interesting that Mr. Justice Holmes, who wrote the unanimous opinion of the court in The Hamilton, vigorously dissented in the principal case. A resulting lack of uniformity seems to have been the main reason for the majority of the court refusing to recognize the liability created by the statute. It is said that "If New York can subject foreign ships coming into her ports to such obligations as those imposed by her compensation statute, other States may do likewise. The necessary consequence would be destruction of the very uniformity in respect to maritime matters which the Constitution was designed to establish, and freedom of navigation between the States and with foreign countries would be seriously hampered and impeded". But how about the lack of uniformity under Sherlock v. Alling, supra, and The Hamilton, supra?

The court in determining whether State law shall stand as against or along with the maritime law, applies the same tests that are applied when the question is between State action and the national control over interstate commerce. In this connection it is interesting to refer to The New York Central Railroad Company v. Winfield, decided the same day, where it was held, Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Clarke dissenting, that the Compensation Act of New York did not apply to non-tortious injuries to employees of the company, although the Federal Employers' Liability Act covers only negligent injuries. It apparently was conceded by all that but for the Federal Act the State statute would apply to employees engaged in interstate commerce as well as to those not so engaged. Congress, however, having acted, the State action was displaced.

R.W.A.