2022

Professionalism in Tribal Jurisdictions

Matthew L.M. Fletcher
Michigan School of Law, nimrod@umich.edu

Available at: https://repository.law.umich.edu/articles/2720

Follow this and additional works at: https://repository.law.umich.edu/articles

Part of the Indigenous, Indian, and Aboriginal Law Commons, Legal Ethics and Professional Responsibility Commons, and the Legal Profession Commons

Recommended Citation
COLUMNS

10 FROM THE PRESIDENT
Respecting the rule of law
James W. Heath

32 ETHICAL PERSPECTIVE
Embrace the right to a second opinion
Alecia M. Chandler

34 PLAIN LANGUAGE
How to draft a bad contract (Part 3)
Mark Cohen

38 BEST PRACTICES
Best practices for preliminary injunction motions
Daniel D. Quick

40 LIBRARIES & LEGAL RESEARCH
Practice makes professionalism
Virginia C. Thomas

42 PRACTICING WELLNESS
Embrace ease to improve your career experience
Karissa Wallace

44 LAW PRACTICE SOLUTIONS
Lawyer training shouldn’t be one size fits all
Heidi K. Brown

NOTICES

50 ORDERS OF DISCIPLINE & DISABILITY

56 FROM THE COMMITTEE ON MODEL CRIMINAL JURY INSTRUCTIONS

64 FROM THE MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT

70 CLASSIFIEDS
American Indian law is an important area of law. There are 12 federally recognized Indian tribes in the state of Michigan. Indian tribes throughout the United States do business in Michigan. Indian tribal governments and corporations employ hundreds of thousands of non-Indians and received billions in federal pandemic relief. Indian gaming generated nearly $40 billion in revenues nationally last year. Still, many lawyers ignore the field or claim ignorance about the basic precepts of federal Indian law.

This article will canvass several themes of professionalism in tribal practice, drawing from this author’s tribal law experience over the last few decades. Many lawyers undervalue — and even disrespect — tribal governance. This lack of professionalism has significant costs to tribal governments, tribal business, and their business partners.

SKEPTICISM OF INHERENT TRIBAL POWERS AS INCIVILITY
As I was completing my final law school exams in 1997, the United States Supreme Court issued a decision devastating the prospects of tribal governments and tribal justice systems to regulate the activities of nonmembers in Indian country in Strate v. A-1 Contractors. That case involved a car wreck on an Indian reservation in North Dakota. The plaintiff was a non-Indian woman who married into a large Native family. The defendant was a nonmember-owned company. In a unanimous and casually cruel opinion by Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, the Court held that since both parties were nonmembers, the tribe and its justice system... were “strangers” to the accident and rejected tribal court jurisdiction over the claim.

Later, I took my first job out of law school with the Pascua Yaqui Tribe of Arizona. At that time, Pascua had little common law. A large part of my job as in-house counsel was negotiating contracts on behalf of tribal procurement with outside vendors, hoping to steer any conflicts to tribal court. I “negotiated” dozens of contracts with the tribe’s business partners, but they were hardly negotiations. Vendors rarely consented to tribal court jurisdiction or tribal law as the governing law. Some of this had to do with the tribe’s bargaining power, but much of it had to do with Strate. Counsel representing the vendors argued to me that the Court had eliminated tribal jurisdiction over nonmembers. That’s not what the Court said — nonmembers could still consent in writing — but counsel for nonmembers also knew if they didn’t consent, they lost nothing. From their point of view, Strate gave nonmembers license to roam unfettered. My tribal client could either allow nonmember vendors onto the reservation to do as they wished or exclude itself from business. At that time, my client had little choice but to accede to these prejudices.

A few years later, it got worse. The Court issued another tribal jurisdiction decision in 2001 in Nevada v. Hicks, rejecting a tribal court’s authority to exercise jurisdiction under 42 USC 1983 over state officials. Once again, the decision was unanimous. This time, there was a concurring opinion by Justice David H. Souter roundly condemning tribal laws and tribal courts. Justice Souter wrote that tribal law was “unusually difficult for an outsider to sort out.”

He described tribal law as “frequently unwritten,” the product of “customs, traditions, and practices … handed down orally or by example from one generation to another.” This was the second Supreme Court writing in four years disrespecting and gutting tribal powers over nonmembers — both written by two different justices supposedly to the center-left of the Court.

As a tribal practitioner, Justice Souter’s description of tribal law was news to me. In 2001, I was working in house for the Suquamish Tribe on Puget Sound in Washington. My experience working with the Pascua and Suquamish (and in between, the Hoopa Valley Tribe in northern California) was completely different from the story Justice Souter told. These tribes took their cultures, customs, and traditions very seriously. In child welfare cases, property rights cases, and other cases involving only tribal members, tribal custom law that could be difficult for outsiders to understand might apply. But in relations with nonmembers, tribal law was written down — and in English. Where tribal law was silent, we looked to state commercial law and state court procedures for guidance, usually adopting blackletter law from the Restatements of Law. The last thing my tribal clients wanted was for tribal customs and traditions to interfere with the business dealings critical to funding basic tribal governmental services like health care, public safety, and child welfare.

Following that decision, when I worked with counsel for my tribal clients’ business partners and vendors, they were often radicalized by Strate and Justice Souter’s concurrence in Hicks. From their perspective, not only was tribal power over nonmembers unnecessary to tribal governance but was dangerous to nonmembers. The Supreme Court said so. Evidence to the contrary often was irrelevant. Outside counsel became far more aggressive with me.

A short while after Hicks, I returned home to work in-house for my own tribe, the Grand Traverse Band of Ottawa and Chippewa Indians in Peshawbestown. One attorney representing a vendor demanded that I provide him a hard copy of every tribal council resolution and ordinance and every single tribal court decision before he would even talk to me. A county attorney told me he could not discuss an agreement to plow snow at a tribal elder’s complex because, in his words, Hicks had overruled Worcester v. Georgia, an 1832 decision acknowledging tribal sovereignty and treaty rights over Indian lands. Yet another attorney, this time representing a tribal member in an employment suit against the tribe in a tribal forum, told me he would win a $1,000,000

The views expressed in “In Perspective,” as well as other expressions of opinions published in the Bar Journal from time to time, do not necessarily state or reflect the official position of the State Bar of Michigan, nor does their publication constitute an endorsement of the views expressed. They are the opinions of the authors and are intended not to end discussion, but to stimulate thought about significant issues affecting the legal profession, the making of laws, and the adjudication of disputes.
judgment against the tribe as soon as he got the case moved to state court, where he believed the law was fair. Ultimately, each of those attorneys walked back their demands, but not before I wasted an enormous amount of time educating my friends on the other side.

IGNORANCE OF TRIBAL LAW AS COUNSEL’S LACK OF DILIGENCE

These uncivil incidents were relatively unusual; after all, most of the work of in-house counsel is not in dealing with nonmembers but with the tribal client. Still, these incidents evidence a lack of diligence on the part of counsel for my client’s legal adversaries. It is a lawyer’s job to learn the law on behalf of their client, not to demand legal research from opposing counsel, misrepresent precedent, or fail to research basic tribal jurisdiction and sovereign immunity questions.

A recurring theme in the Supreme Court’s decisions on tribal powers and jurisdiction is concern for nonmembers being unfairly victimized by confusion around tribal laws. Justice Souter’s worry for “outsiders” being subjected to tribal laws was just one example. As I drove in a moving van with my father from Ann Arbor to Tucson, Arizona, to start my legal career at Pascua, the Supreme Court issued a decision affirming tribal sovereign immunity in *Kiowa Tribe v. Manufacturing Technologies, Inc.*7 I was excited to see the Court actually rule in favor of tribal immunity, but Justice Anthony Kennedy’s majority opinion ridiculed the notion of tribal immunity, asserting that it developed “almost by accident.”8 Worse, he argued that Congress should abrogate tribal immunity in part because “[i]n this economic context, immunity can harm those who are unaware that they are dealing with a tribe, who do not know of tribal immunity, or who have no choice in the matter, as in the case of tort victims.”9 Ultimately, as my friend Prof. Bill Wood pointed out years later, tribal immunity was no accident.10

Moreover, after careful consideration and multiple contentious hearings, Congress decided not to undo tribal immunity, which the Court acknowledged 16 years later in Michigan v. Bay Mills Indian Community.11 The Court’s signaling of disdain and skepticism of tribal immunity feeds practitioners’ attitudes about tribal economic development. Throughout my career as in-house counsel, attorneys for my tribal clients’ business partners sometimes insisted that my client abrogate its immunity entirely before they would even talk about a contract. These attorneys advised me that it was best to drop sovereign immunity or no one would ever do business with the tribe. These attorneys either talked their own clients out of a business partner by insisting on a complete tribal waiver or eventually walked back their initial demands, tails between their legs, when they learned about the possibility of a contract-based limited waiver of tribal immunity. These attorneys wasted everyone’s time and money.

But many lawyers continued to engage me and my client in good faith. In the early 2000s, my client and the other Michigan tribes were negotiating with the state government over taxes12 in light of a groundbreaking court rule cocreated by tribal and state court judges in the 1990s.13 The Michigan tribal courts and Michigan Supreme Court had agreed on a reciprocal court rule in which tribal and state courts would grant comity to each other’s judgments, awards, and other orders so long as the other court system would do the same.14

The resulting state court rule formed the basis for a provision in Michigan’s tribal-state tax agreements a decade later where the state agreed to litigate tax disputes in the tribal courts.15 Michigan probably is the only state government to consent to tribal court jurisdiction. The state’s attorneys zealously advocated for their client but did so in respect for the sovereign prerogatives of Michigan’s tribal nations. Once again, my lived experience as a tribal law practitioner was the polar opposite of the way the U.S. Supreme Court saw tribal law and courts.

OBSERVATIONS AS A TRIBAL JUDGE

Congress has been supportive of tribal self-determination for about the last half century, but in the last decade or so Congress recognized more tribal authority over nonmembers, primarily through the Violence Against Women Reauthorization Acts of 2013 and 2022. The Supreme Court’s aggressive rhetoric skeptical of tribal powers over nonmembers in limited contexts.

Interestingly, Wisconsin law was fairly liberal on the interpretation of forum selection clauses, allowing for parties to select a forum other than the one(s) delineated in the transaction documents so long as the clause did not explicitly prohibit an additional forum. Since the transaction documents ordered me as judge to apply Wisconsin law, I did so, and applied the more liberal rule from Lake of the Torches Economic Development Corporation v. Saybrook Tax Exempt Investors, LLC. In short, I declined to dismiss the action on the pleadings. It all came down to use of passive voice (legal writing students pay heed) in very hastily drafted transaction documents. Perhaps with more development of the record, it would come to pass that the EDC really intended for the forum selection clause to exclude tribal courts, but it was far from obvious based on the text of the transaction documents alone.

The nonmember companies then sued in federal court to enjoin the tribal parties from invoking tribal jurisdiction. They prevailed, with the district court casually denigrating the tribal judge as a “blogger” who once published a law review article critical of federal courts. The federal courts chose not to follow Wisconsin law on forum selection clauses, instead choosing to apply their own precedent, leading to the opposite outcome I reached. So be it.

Following that litigation from afar, I was surprised to see my name in the district court and appellate opinions. How odd. Later, I learned the nonmember companies, perhaps emboldened by the district court judgment, used me and my writings in what appears to be an effort to denigrate the fairness of the tribal justice system. No party challenged my professionalism in tribal court but in federal court, tactics seemingly differ. After all, Justice Souter’s concurrence in Hicks gave attorneys license to do so.

That said, I think there has been a gradual shift in attitudes about tribal powers. In 2018, serving on the Nottawasaeppi Huron Band of the Potawatomi Supreme Court, my colleagues and I decided Spurr v. Spurr, a case involving the power of the tribal court to issue a protection order against a nonmember who lived 100 miles from the reservation. We invoked a federal statute granting full faith and credit to tribal civil protection orders against nonmember harassers. The nonmember brought suit in federal court to challenge the order and, implicitly, the authority of Congress to recognize tribal powers; this was exactly the kind of case the Supreme Court was likely to review with an eye toward undercutting tribal powers. But instead, after the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit affirmed tribal powers, the Supreme Court declined the nonmember’s petition for certiorari.

Even more recently, I have had the privilege of serving on tribal appellate cases involving nonmember defendants challenging tribal court jurisdiction. The first, Rincon Band of Luiseño Indians v. Donius, decided in 2020, affirmed the power of the tribe to inspect nonmember-owned property it suspected of being the source of pollution. Serving on the Rincon court with me were retired federal court judges James Ware and Arthur J. Gajarsa. The second, Cabazon Band of Mission Indians v. Lexington Insurance Company, decided in 2022, affirmed the jurisdiction of the tribal court over a suit brought by the tribe against its insurance company over COVID 19-related business losses.

In 2011, I proposed to the membership of the American Law Institute a restatement project on federal Indian law. The first comment from the audience was not positive. The commentator asked how there could be a restatement of blackletter law when “the embers of sovereignty have long since grown cold.” I was told to expect skepticism from some members of the institute. Being used to questions like that from my days as in-house counsel for Indian tribes, I answered and we moved on. It was the last time anyone asked a question like that during the entire project, which we just completed. The law is the law. Tribal sovereignty is a real thing. Professionals realizing that learn and react appropriately.
Matthew L.M. Fletcher is the Harry Burns Hutchins Collegiate Professor of Law and Professor of American Culture at the University of Michigan. An enrolled citizen of the Grand Traverse Band of Ottawa and Chippewa Indians, he serves as an appellate judge for four Michigan tribes. The Michigan Supreme Court recently appointed Fletcher to the Michigan Task Force on Well-Being in the Law.

ENDNOTES
4. Id. at 39-40.
5. Congress’ recognition of tribal powers are codified mostly in 25 USC 1304 (criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians for certain crimes) and 18 USC 265(a) (civil protection orders against nonmembers).
9. Allheimer & Gray v Sioux Manufacturing Corp, 983 F2d 803 [CA 7, 1993].
13. MCR 2.615.
15. Id. at 39-40.
16. Congress’ recognition of tribal powers are codified mostly in 25 USC 1304 (criminal jurisdiction over non-Indians for certain crimes) and 18 USC 265(a) (civil protection orders against nonmembers).
20. Allheimer & Gray v Sioux Manufacturing Corp, 983 F2d 803 [CA 7, 1993].
21. The circuit court merely referenced my then-professional affiliation with Michigan State University College of Law, Stifel, Nicolaus & Company, 807 F3d at 192.
25. 18 USC 1165.