MICHIGAN LAW REVIEW

Vol. 50

JUNE, 1952

No. 8

To the lawyer in the United States one of the most significant facts of the past fifty years has been the growing importance of legislation, both statutory and administrative, as a source of law. This ascendancy is a phenomenon of which all have been aware. While legal scholarship has by no means ignored this development, it has not yet made the rich, constructive contribution in this field that it has made in common law areas. The editors believe that the future will find legal writers increasingly absorbed with the broadening and deepening stream of legislation. They feel, therefore, that it is particularly appropriate to devote this, the fiftieth anniversary issue of the MICHIGAN LAW REVIEW, to articles by distinguished writers on the subject of legislation in fields in which it has assumed special importance.
