The Marquest Military Academy (MMA) is a public military college. Student-cadets at MMA must comply with rigorous physical training exercises, and the academic curriculum includes courses on military history, ethics, and leadership. Approximately 85% of MMA graduates enter military service after graduation.

The MMA first began to admit women in 1996, following the Supreme Court’s decision in United States v. Virginia. But by 2013, women still only made up 3% of the incoming class. Female enrollment at MMA has never exceeded 5%. Roughly 30% of women drop out.

In January 2014, the state passed legislation which created an affirmative action program designed to increase the number of women at MMA. The Act authorizes a private cause of action if female enrollment does not reach reasonable levels by 2020.

In response to the Act, MMA established a point system governing admissions. There are 40 possible points; applicants who score 35 or above are automatically admitted. Female applicants receive five additional points. The point system was first implemented during the 2014–15 admissions cycle. Female enrollment increased to 4.5% of the 2015–16 class, up from 3% the prior academic year.

Michael Roberts was denied admission to MMA, after he received a score of 32. Roberts sued MMA, arguing that its admissions policy unfairly discriminated against him in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment. He also brought a facial challenge to the Act.
