The overall topic of Professor Schultz’s lectures will be “Two Agricultures and Economic Growth.” This topic will be broken down into four sub-topics; each of which will be covered by separate lecture, Monday through Thursday, April 13-16, at 4:15, in the Rackham Amphitheater. Monday’s lecture is entitled “Economic Basis.” It will consider divergent economic developments; covering everything from the United States and Western Europe to Russia, Japan and India. The paradox of food shortages with contemporary food surpluses will also be looked into. Dr. Schultz will also give attention to the distinction between traditional and modern agriculture.

“Traditional Agriculture” is the topic of Tuesday’s lecture. It considers the age-old struggle of the farmer, the why of the backwardness and stagnation of traditional agriculture. He also looks into how the problem goes beyond agriculture and how there is a lack of incentive to work. On Wednesday, Dr. Schultz considers “Transforming Traditional Agriculture.” He discusses the disappointing results of public programs, a result of mistaken expectations. The neglecting of agricultural sources of economic growth are considered; as are the use of schooling and research. He concludes with “Welfare and Efficiency of Modern Agriculture,” on Thursday. This final lecture deals with a re-examination of the sources of increased production, high quality material inputs and human agents, consumer surplus from research, how price and production policy approaches confuse efficiency and welfare, how the efficiency is being impaired and the welfare neglected, methods of redistributing the losses of farm people and various policy alternatives.

Professor Schultz will be the fourteenth Cook Lecturer. The first series was held during the 1944-45 school year. They are endowed by the William W. Cook Foundation which was set up by Mr. Cook at about the same time as he endowed the building of the Law Quadrangle.

EDITORS WASTERBASKET:

Constantly striving to keep you up to date on the insignificant, we offer the following, which may be of special value to any of you who plan to do much work counselling firebugs. The National Automobile Theft Bureau, in Detroit, makes setting fire to one's car a dangerous past-time. The Bureau, speaking through special agent, Robert F. Campbell, said that over 99 per cent of these fires are set for the same reasons and by the same methods wherever they occur. Common motives are: economic gain, financial problems, mechanical trouble, domestic difficulties, emotional or mental disturbances, malicious mischief and concealment of another crime. He stated that most car-burners are not criminals at heart; but usually persons of good repute, who do not realize the seriousness of their act. A trained investigator can tell where the fire started, whether any fuel was used to encourage it and whether other seemingly extraneous bits of evidence point to arson.

LIBEL AND SLANDER:

Last semester, the administration followed the wise policy of extending weekend library hours into the evening during exams. The result was that a rather significant number of students had a place to study at a time when most other facilities usually available were closed or overcrowded. The library was as full as or fuller than it normally is. It is our hope that, as exams again approach, the administration will follow the precedent of last December. Such measures are, indeed, a step towards more realistic library hours.
