INTERVIEW WITH DEAN ALLAN SMITH by John Fiske

The 21 years of former Dean E. Blythe Stason's direction of Michigan Law School ended approximately one month ago when a professor who had been taking French classes at 8 a.m. for two years in anticipation of a year of study abroad became the new Dean of the Law School. "I was just about ready," said Dean Allan F. Smith, "when the roof fell in."

The 49 years between his birth in Belgrade, Nebraska and the roof falling in here in Ann Arbor have been productive years for Dean Smith. Graduating from Nebraska State Teachers' College with the intention of teaching high school English, he was compelled by 1933 teaching conditions to look elsewhere. He joined his brother-in-law's law firm in Kearney, Nebraska, for three years as a stenographer—an experience which prompted his enrollment in the Nebraska Law School from which he graduated in 1940. Again bleak economic conditions ($75 a month starting salary in Nebraska) were a factor in his decision to accept a post-graduate fellowship for a year at Michigan Law School. Then he worked for the Office of Price Administration until he left as "Chief Counsel" two years later. ("Chief Counsel," Dean Smith points out, was at that time subordinate to the General, Associate, and Assistant-General Counsels.) Three years in the Military Intelligence Service were his last before teaching law full time in 1946 at Stanford and in 1947 at Michigan, where he became a full professor in 1953.

As for his family, he married Alene Mullikin of Kansas in 1939; they have two children—Stephanie, 17, and Gregory, 14.

Besides collaborating with Professor Lewis Simes on a revision of the latter's four volume treatise on future interests, Dean Smith co-edited the West casebook on property and published his own work on personal life insurance trusts. His "extra-curricular" responsibilities have included direction of research activities and the Graduate Committee of the Law School, besides work outside the Law School as chairman of the Real Property Committee of the Michigan Bar Association.

His interest in foreign law developed during a trip abroad in 1956 with Professor Philip Jessup of Columbia Law School. They toured mid-eastern law schools (cont'd on attached page)

These dates are: (1) Friday, October 21, 1960; (2) Friday, November 18, 1960. Both trips will be afternoon excursions, leaving Ann Arbor about noon and returning about 5:00. The trip, by chartered bus, is free to members of the SBA. A nominal charge of $1.00 will be made to non-members to help defray transportation costs.

Jackson State Prison is a Michigan State Prison and is the largest prison within one walled area in the world. Further information will be provided to those interested before the date of each trip. A sign-up list giving full details has been posted on the SBA bulletin board in Hutchins Hall.

Interview with Dean Smith (contd) to explore the possibility of exchange programs and other cooperative measures. Decoration with the Order of the Cedars by the Lebanese government, insists Dean Smith, was nothing more than the result of his accompanying the grandson of the founder of the American University in Beirut (Professor Jessup). It was this trip which led to Dean Smith's desire to study land controls under the civil law system in Paris. Nor have his efforts in French been in vain, since he accepted his present position on the understanding that the trip is to be postponed and not cancelled.

Several administrative and curricular aspects of the Law School already reflect anticipated changes. There are now two Associate Deans, Professors Russell Smith and Charles Joiner, where there was formerly one. They will continue their teaching on a half-time basis and devote the rest of their time to their respective administrative duties--Professor Smith as head of both the Graduate Research Committee and the Personnel Committee, and Professor Joiner in charge of the Law School’s external relations.

The curriculum is presently undergoing its first comprehensive review since World War II, with all faculty members participating in an examination of the content of every course presently offered. The Curriculum Committee, headed by Professor Kauper, may then be able to recommend an acceptable "core curriculum" to be required of every law student to equip him with all essential training needs. He would thus enjoy more freedom of selection in a wider range of electives than is presently possible. Though Dean Smith is careful to couch his hopes in long-range terms, his present aspiration is to increase the faculty from 40 to 50 "as soon as possible" in order to reduce the size of some present sections and to further diversify course offerings. The hope that every law student may someday be required to participate in at least one seminar before graduation is corollary to the curriculum change and increase in faculty.

"Any vigorous program can always use more money." On this premise plans are being made to increase alumni support of Law School needs in the ambitious years ahead. Until about two years ago the Cook endowment fund for faculty research has been adequate; recent additions to the faculty and increased research activity have outgrown the capacity of the fund.
The demand for student scholarships and loans continues to increase. In order to maintain the high level of present library facilities a heavy library budget must be met. Teaching and training a student to become an attorney is but one of the three obligations which Dean Smith feels a law school must perform for its society. It must also provide facilities and encouragement for legal research and serve as a focal point of law reform. It is within this tripartite framework that the Law School is to operate.

Though already acclaimed for producing the most astonishing change in female representation at the Law School in the last few millennia, Dean Smith has refused any personal credit; however, he has remarked that he is hardly adverse to such aesthetic improvements.

His political sentiments may be reflected by a remark with which he began his first class on adverse possession back in the fall of 1952 one November morning: "After 20 years of open, notorious, and adverse possession of the White House....." His present job, however, is "strictly a-political."
